It may be assumed that Jehoiachin had virtually no chance of developing an independent policy, because it is recorded that he endorsed the religious and social attitudes of his father (2 Ki. 24:9). At his accession, Judah was already under pressure from Moabites and other Transjordanians, who had been encouraged by NEBUCHADNEZZAR. The Babylonian king now advanced S from Syria, where he had reestablished his authority after recovering from his repulse by Egypt in 601 B.C., and was able to invest Jerusalem, which offered surprisingly little resistance. In view of the sieges that the city withstood on other occasions (for instance, a few years later under ZEDEKIAH), it is obvious that the Jewish leaders thought it politic to make terms with Nebuchadnezzar (see Albright in JBL 51 [1932]: 84 – 92, who argues that NEHUSHTA the queen-mother, of a Jerusalem family, would have exercised no small influence).

Nebuchadnezzar aimed at rendering Judah powerless to hinder his operations against Egypt. Accordingly he deported the nobility, soldiers, and men of ability, leaving only a population sufficient to maintain agriculture; appointed a puppet king (Zedekiah), binding him by a special oath of loyalty; and stripped the capital of significant wealth, even from the temple, leaving only what was needed for the religious service. Thus there is no need to see, with J. Gray (I and II Kings, 2nd ed. [1970], 760), a contradiction in 2 Ki. 24:13 with Jer. 27:19 – 20; moreover, the Babylonian Chronicle mentions heavy tribute, and it appears that the prisoners and booty were not moved till late April or May (cf. 2 Chr. 36:9 – 10; D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of the Chaldaean Kings [1956], 34;

E. Kutsch in ZAW 71 [1959]: 270 – 74).

IV. Exile. Jehoiachin was not a hostage for the good behavior of those left in Jerusalem, else his story would have ended at Zedekiah's revolt. Taken with his people, he was treated as their chief representative, under duress and later in relaxation; for toward the end of the thirty-seventh year (spring 560 B.C.), King Amel-Marduk released him from prison and gave him a place at court. Tablets have been found in the ruins of a storehouse in Babylon, recording issues of oil rations to prisoners, among whom "Jehoiachin king of Judah" is named with his sons and their Jewish governor; the sons, five of the seven named in 1 Chr. 3:17, were therefore children. One of the Jehoiachin tablets published by E. Weidner (Melanges syriens II [1939], 146 – 48) is dated 592 B.C.; others in the find date from 595 to 569 (cf. 2 Ki. 25:27 – 30).

The discovery of two impressions at Tell Beit Mirsim, and one at Beth Shemesh, from a seal of Eliakim "steward of Joiachin," suggests that Jehoiachin's estates were not confiscated, and probably his needs were largely supplied from them. It seems that the Babylonians regarded him as the legitimate king, even in prison, whereas Zedekiah and Gedaliah were virtually regents. A party in Jerusalem yet hoped and schemed for his return; and it has been pointed out that dating by years of captivity (Ezekiel) was equivalent to dating by the reign of Jehoiachin (Albright in JBL 51 [1932]: 93ff. cf. H. May in AJSL 56 [1939]: 146 – 48). JEREMIAH, however, although he saw the exiles as "good figs" and heirs of the promise, would have nothing to do with the idea of the king's return (Jer. 28 – 29), and had even denied that his posterity would reign (22:24 – 30). Jehoiada ji-hoi'uh-duh (יְהוֹיָדָה H3381, "Yahweh has known [i.e., has been concerned]"; for a technical sense, see H. Huffmon in BASOR 181 [Feb. 1966]: 31ff. cf. also JOIADA). (1) Father of BENA-IAH, who was a commander of DAVID'S bodyguard (2 Sam. 8:18; 20:23; 23:20 – 22; 1 Ki. 1:8; et al.; once he is referred to as a priest (1 Chr. 27:5). See also #2 below.

The Babylonian Chronicle recounts historical events during the years 605 – 595 B.C., including Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem while Jehoiachin was king.

(2) An Aaronite leader who joined David at HEBRON (1 Chr. 12:27). He is probably the same as #1 above.

(3) Son of a certain Benaiah and successor of AHITHOPHEL as David's counselor (1 Chr. 27:34). It has been suggested that "Jehoiada son of Benaiah" here should be emended to "Benaiah son of Jehoiada" and that therefore this Jehoiada is the same as #1 above.

(4) A very influential high priest in Jerusalem who organized the coup that ousted A THALIAH and set JOASH on the throne; he was for many years the young king's trusted adviser (2 Ki. 11 – 12; 2 Chr. 23 – 24). Jehoiada already had adult children when Athaliah massacred the royal family (2 Chr. 23:11), but his wife JEHOSEBA, daughter of King JEHORAM, must have been relatively young.

Some six years after Jehosheba had rescued her infant nephew Joash from the massacre, Jehoiada ventured all when he appealed to popular loyalty to the House of David. First he secured the support of the mercenaries (CARITES), who were assigned as temple and palace guards (2 Ki. 11:4 – 8). The Chronicler adds that he enlisted the chiefs of the towns where the Levites resided; this tallies with references to "the people of the land" (vv. 14, 20; see AMHA-AREZ). W. Rudolph (in Festschrift Alfred Bertholet, ed. W. Baumgartner et al. [1950]: 473 – 78) thinks this is an interpolation, arguing that such an assembly could not have been secret; however, the queen's policy had evidently not restricted access to the temple, and the crowd present when the guard was changed that Sabbath appeared orderly and peaceable. Upon the king's coronation, their rejoicing drew the attention of Athaliah; but Jehoiada was ready, and her death ended all opposition. Jehoiada followed up the coronation with a covenant of religious restoration in which "the people" took part (vv. 16 – 17; not the country folk as such, but the congregation, as representing all Judah).

Jehoiada continued to guide Joash, though age doubtless weakened his administrative ability (2 Chr. 24:4 – 7). He was honored with a royal burial; but the nobility soon rebelled against his strict religious tradition (vv. 17 – 18).

(5) A priest during the time of JEREMIAH; Shemaiah the Nehelamite replaced him as chief officer of the temple with a certain Zephaniah so that the latter might arrest Jeremiah (Jer. 29:26). Some have argued, without good reason, that this Jehoiada is the same as #4 above.

Jehoiakim ji-hoi'uh-kim (יהויקים H3383, "Yahweh raises up," i.e., "may Yahweh deliver"; cf. ELIAKIM, "God raises up," see also JOIAKIM). Throne name of Eliakim, son of JOSIAH, appointed king of Judah by Pharaoh NECO. The form Yoiqim is found on a seal of unknown provenance (D. Diringer, Le iscrizioni antico-ebraiche palestinesi [1934], 197; perhaps 5th cent., G. A. Cooke, A Text-Book of North-Semitic Inscriptions [1903], no. 150/8, p. 362); the formation with the imperfect is rather unusual (Noth, IPN, 28; but cf. postexilic examples including "Joiakim," Neh. 12:10; note also "Jehoioakim" for "Eliakim," the son of Hilkiah, in Bar. 1:7).

I. Chronology. Whereas the dates of Jehoiakim's accession (autumn 609 B.C.) and death (winter 598/7) are now known to within a month, his regnal years are still debated for two reasons. (a) Authorities differ as to whether a fall or spring New Year was used, and whether a change in that system was made at this time. (b) The date of Josiah's death is not exactly known. Jehoiakim's eleventh year began in Tishri or in Nisan 598; his fourth (which saw the battle of CARCHEMISH, Jer. 46:2) began in Tishri 606 or Nisan 605. Josiah probably used a fall regnal year; Jehoiakim's first would then run from Tishri 609, with his accession a little earlier. On this basis, however, at the end of 598 he would have reigned twelve years by Hebrew reckoning. E. Auerbach (in VT 10 [1960]: 69 – 70) has therefore suggested that Jehoiakim was compelled, when he submitted to NEBUCHADNEZZAR, to use the Babylonian CALENDAR, which would have extended his fifth year by six months to Nisan 603. The winter “ninth month” of Jer. 36:9, 22 is not strictly relevant to this conclusion, for months were always numbered from the spring (cf. 1 Ki. 6:1; 12:33; 2 Chr. 35:1).

The correlation of Jehoiakim's fourth year with Nebuchadnezzar's first (Jer. 25:1) may be explained by taking “first” (Heb. ri'šônî H8038) as the Akkadian reš šarruti, that is, accession year (J. Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, rev. ed. [1998], 247), or by assuming that Jewish scribes regarded Nebuchadnezzar as already king (so D. Freedman in BA 19 [1956]: 50 – 60; cf. Jer. 52:12 with 52:29). Daniel may have interpreted the standard correlation by Babylonian information, thus dating Carchemish in Jehoiakim's third (Dan. 1:1), and making no distinction of the years immediately following.

II. Family. In 1 Chr. 3:15, Jehoiakim is named as Josiah's second son, ranking before JEHOAHAZ (Shallum). In 609 B.C., they were twenty-five and twenty-three respectively (2 Ki. 23:31, 36); but ZEDEKIAH, only ten (24:18), appears between them in the Chronicles passage. W. F. Albright (in JBL 51 [1932]: 92) would emend 2 Ki. 23:36 to avoid making Josiah a father at fourteen; but 2 Chr. 36:5 preserves the same reading, and in that year Jehoiakim's son was already seven (2 Ki. 24:8).

III. Egyptian overlordship. Neco, committed to support the failing power of Assyria against the Babylonians, needed to secure the flank of his line of march up the coast. He had no time to turn aside at MEGIDDO, but on his return that fall, taking Jehoahaz as hostage, he appointed Eliakim to govern in the Egyptian interest, symbolizing his dependence by giving him a new name, Jehoiakim. The fact that he only altered the divine prefix (from God to Yahweh) suggests that he was aiming to conciliate Judean feeling. The tribute (a talent of gold and a hundred of silver) was more of a warning than a penalty. Jehoiakim remained loyal to the Egyptian cause, if only from self-interest. The majority of the people also, or at any rate of the ruling class, preferred Egyptian overlordship to that of the Babylonians, if it came to a choice.

IV. Relations with Nebuchadnezzar. For nearly four years, Jehoiakim lived secure in Egypt's shadow; then the “pot” of Jeremiah's vision (Jer. 1:13) was upset. The Babylonian victory at Carchemish not only finished the Assyrians, but spelled the end of Egyptian power in Asia, though for years the rulers of Judah could not believe this. Nebuchadnezzar's follow-through was interrupted by the death of his father, but in 604 B.C., according to the Babylonian Chronicle, he received tribute from "all the kings of Hatti-land"; it is probable that Judah was included. ASHKELON fell early in 603. Its king became Nebuchadnezzar's vassal for three years, but rebelled, evidently after the Egyptian repulse of the Babylonians (601).

In December of 599, Nebuchadnezzar returned to Syria, reestablishing his authority there as a preliminary to renewing the contest with Egypt. A year later he advanced S to recover Judah. Meanwhile, he induced the Ammonites and Moabites and the "Arameans" (2 Ki. 24:2; possibly, as Peshitta, "Edomites," cf. Jer. 35:11) to raid Judah. Their incursions are explained by H. Ginsberg (in Alexander Marx Jubilee Volume, ed. S. Lieberman [1950], 350ff.) as motivated by fear that Jehoiakim might repeat the recovery of Israelite territory E of the Jordan, which Ginsberg attributes to Josiah; he appears to underrate the age-old enmity of these peoples, who would more readily have seen Judah as a prey than "fellow-vassal" (cf. Ps. 137:7; Obad. 8 – 16).

V. Attitude to Jeremiah. The prophet JEREMIAH characterized Jehoiakim as competing in cedar (Jer. 22:15 NRSV), greedy and unprincipled. He ordered the death of URIAH of KIRIATH JEARIM, who prophesied as Jeremiah did (26:20 – 23) "against this city," but clearly it was the call to repent that was unacceptable to the people and leaders as well as to the king. In December 605 (or, less prob., a year later) Jehoiakim burned the first written edition of Jeremiah's prophecies, which had been confiscated after BARUCH had read from it in the temple; he would have arrested (and doubtless murdered) both Jeremiah and Baruch, "but the Lord had hidden them" (Jer. 36:26). His antagonism might indicate determination to resist the Babylonians, or resentment that the outcome of his diplomacy was being questioned.

VI. Death and burial. If the three-month reign of Jehoiakim's son, JEHOIACHIN, ended with his surrender on 2 Adar (March 16) 597, Jehoiakim must have died about 7 December 598, before Nebuchadnezzar reached Jerusalem, but while the district was subject to raids from across the Jordan (2 Ki. 24:2; Freedman in BA 19 [1956]: 53 n. 2). Some mystery surrounds Jehoiakim's burial (cf. A. R. Green in AUSS 20 [1982]: 103 – 9). The phrase “rested with his fathers” (2 Ki. 24:6) normally indicates a natural death, and as the same information was available to the Chronicler, he can hardly have meant that Jehoiakim ended his reign in captivity (2 Chr. 36:6). However, several authorities note the possibility that he was murdered, referring either to Jer. 22:19; 36:30, or to JOSEPHUS's account of a double siege in 598/7 B.C. (Ant. 10.6.3). The latter cannot be reconciled with the Babylonian Chronicle, but may have been constructed from Jeremiah's words; whereas these may well have been fulfilled in an undignified burial because of the raids. There is a dispute whether a proper burial would have been in the palace or outside the city; Manasseh and Amon were buried in the “garden of Uzza,” which is named in 2 Chr. 36:8 (LXX). S. Yeivin (in JNES 7 [1948]: 34ff.) accepts this suggestion but locates the garden in the city. See also CHRONOLOGY (OT); ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

Jehoiarib ji-hoi'uh-rib (יְהוֹיָרִיב H3384, “Yahweh contends [for me]”; see JARIB, JOARIB, JOIARIB). (1) A priest who received the first lot of the twenty-four divisions in DAVID's time (1 Chr. 24:7). He was possibly the ancestor of #2 below. In the Maccabean period, MATTATHIAS traced his lineage to him (called JOARIB, 1 Macc. 2:1).

(2) One of six priests (prob. family heads) who resettled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:10). He is usually identified with a JOIARIB mentioned three times in Nehemiah's lists (Neh. 11:10; 12:6, 19).

Jehonathan ji-hon'uh-thuhn (יְהוֹנָתָן H3387, “Yahweh has given [a child]”; see JONATHAN). (1) Son of Uzziah; an official in the time of DAVID who was in charge of storehouses (1 Chr. 27:25 KJV; modern versions render the name “Jonathan”).

(2) One of six Levites whom King JEHOSEPHAT sent to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Chr. 17:8). Appointed to the same mission were a number of princes and priests.

(3) The head of the priestly family of Shemaiah in the days when JOIAKIM son of Jeshua was high priest (Neh. 12:18).

Jehoram ji-hoh'ruhm (יְהוֹרָם H3393, short form יֹרָם H3456, “Yahweh is exalted”). (1) One of six Levites whom King JEHOSEPHAT sent to teach the law in the cities of Judah (2 Chr. 17:8). Appointed to the same mission were a number of princes and priests.

(2) Son of AHAZ and ninth king of the northern kingdom of Israel; mainly called Joram (2 Ki. 1:17; 3:1 – 13; 8:16; 9:15 – 24; 2 Chr. 22:5 – 7). The NIV consistently uses Joram to distinguish him from the son of Jehoshaphat (see #3 below), and that practice will be followed in this article. A number of stories in connection with the marvelous deeds of ELIJAH and ELISHA refer to “the king” of Israel without mentioning his name; inasmuch as the precise chronological connections of the Elijah-Elisha narratives are seldom clarified, it is hard to know for certain just how many of those in which “the king” figures in some way are related to King Joram of Israel.

Elijah must have survived at least until the sixth year of his reign (cf. 2 Chr. 21:12), while Elisha began his remarkable ministry during that reign. The seven years of famine foretold to the Shunammite woman (2 Ki. 8:1) must be the same as that referred to at 4:38 (note the “had said” of 8:1), and this period would have begun no later than the fifth or sixth year of Joram, who seems still to have been alive seven years later. Likely, then, the many exploits of Elisha detailed in 2 Ki. 3 – 9 took place during Joram’s reign (c. 852 – 841 B.C.; see E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], 99). If ever a Jewish king was witness to miracles enough to encourage faith, Joram was he.

Throughout his reign the two Jewish kingdoms were allied. Upon his accession, almost at once he was joined by Judah (under Jehoshaphat) and EDOM (tributary to Judah) in a war against the Moabites in an effort to recover the submission of MOAB under its King MESHA. The combined expedition came to near disaster from want of water near the frontier of Edom and Moab. It was Jehoshaphat’s truly pious reliance on genuine prophecy that saved them all, for Elisha was brought forward from the ranks, and through his function as prophet a life-saving miracle brought both water and military victory (2 Ki. 3:4 – 27). This alliance ended with the destruction of the house of Ahab by Joram’s successor, JEHU. After that, enmity between the two Hebrew kingdoms was renewed.

Though a venal and weak man, he was not without some good, for he at least diminished BAAL worship early in his reign (2 Ki. 3:2), though he did not end the divisive and perverse worship of the calves’ images at BETHEL and DAN (PLACE) (3:3; cf. 1 Ki. 12:25 – 33; see CALF, GOLDEN). Baal worship was thoroughly prosperous when Jehu destroyed it scarcely a decade later (2 Ki. 10:15 – 28). Though in a moment of desperation he once sought to kill Elisha (6:24—7:20, esp. vv. 31 – 32), Joram did on occasion give heed to Elisha’s wise and frequently friendly advice (6:20 – 23; 3:13). Yet when the Syrian raids diminished he seems to have begun to resent Elisha’s advice and admonition (6:23) and quickly relapsed to worse idolatry. Divine judgment in the form of siege and famine were not slow to follow (6:24 – 25). It was at this juncture that Joram (for he is surely “the king” here), in despair, sought to kill Elisha (6:31 – 32).

Joram was the last king of the line of OMRI. His mother JEZEBEL and he both were killed by the rampaging Jehu, who also exterminated all members of the family and all officials of the Baal cult (2 Ki. 9 – 10). The two long chapters devoted to the extermination of the house of Ahab indicate what a terrible peril they were to the ongoing of the messianic nation and thereby the divinely revealed Mosaic faith. Through ATHALIAH (daughter of Ahab and Jezebel), who married Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, the line of Ahab may have passed into the ancestral line of the Lord Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:8). This wife of the Davidic Jehoram became a “second Jezebel,” as she is sometimes called, being responsible not only for introducing vile paganism to the house of David, but also for the murder, in her old age, of all male members of the line of David save one (see JOASH #7).

(3) Son of JEHOSEPHAT and fifth king of the southern kingdom of Judah; sometimes called Joram (c. 848 – 841 B.C., but previously regent, 853 – 848; see Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, 99 – 101). Scripture portions relating to this man are chiefly an entire chapter in Chronicles (2 Chr. 21), but only four verses in Kings (2 Ki. 8:16 – 19). The latter passage gives an important picture of the relations familial and diplomatic between the two Jehorams: “In the fifth year of Joram son of Ahab king of Israel, when Jehoshaphat was king of Judah, Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat began his reign as king of Judah. He was thirty-two years old when he became king, and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years. He walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, as the house of Ahab had done, for he married a daughter of Ahab. He did evil in the eyes of the LORD.” Except for a few months when his son AHAZIAH reigned after him, his reign corresponds with the last eight years of the reign of the northern Joram. His life and reign make up one of the saddest and most to be regretted pages of the history of the Davidic dynasty.

Jehoram’s personal and domestic life were tragically wrong. His wife, Athaliah, brought with her the corruption of the Baalism (fertility cult religion) of her mother’s Phoenician ancestors. As a result, Jehoram “walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, as the house of Ahab had done, for he married a daughter of Ahab” (2 Chr. 21:6). Soon after ascending the throne, Jehoram assassinated his six brothers and other “princes of Israel” (21:4; in light of Athaliah’s behavior after Jehoram’s death, she may have engineered this murder). The motive may have been either to gain the wealth with which the prosperous father Jehoshaphat had richly endowed them; it is also possible that they opposed his ruinous political and religious policies. At any rate, the direct line of the reigning family was in consequence reduced during his reign to one male descendant (Ahaziah, 21:16 – 17), as it was again shortly after his death when the bloodthirsty Athaliah superintended the slaughter of all Jehoram’s grandsons except Joash. Everything recorded of this man indicates complete religious and moral apostasy, even worse than that of the Baal-worshiping heathen of his time. Apostates usually find themselves in complete reaction against the holy faith and practice of the biblical religion.

The expected consequence of such apostasy would have been destruction of the dynasty and transfer of the regnal power to another leading family. This is how the house of JEROBOAM I had been punished for apostasy (1 Ki. 14:10 – 11), as likewise the house of BAASHA (16:1 – 4), of AHAB (21:20 – 26), and of SAUL (1 Sam. 13:13 – 14; 15:22 – 26). The promises of God, however, guaranteed that such would not be the case with the now ancient dynasty of David (2 Ki. 8:19). The terms of the David COVENANT were: “I will raise up your offspring to succeed you...and I will establish his kingdom...When he does wrong, I will punish him...But my love will never be taken away from him, as I took it away from Saul...Your house and your kingdom will endure forever before me” (2 Sam. 7:12 – 16). This covenant is specifically related to Jehoram’s case: “Nevertheless, for the sake of his servant David, the LORD was not willing to destroy Judah. He had promised to maintain a lamp for David and his descendants forever” (2 Ki. 8:19; cf. 16 – 18). This perpetual “light” is mentioned also elsewhere (1 Ki. 15:4; 2 Chr. 21:7). The figure is apparently a popular one drawn from the custom of reserving the home fire perpetually by a pilot light in an oil burning lamp (cf. Prov. 31:18). This “promise doctrine,” so eminently illustrated in Jehoram’s case, is the great theme of the Samuel-Kings narrative.

Nor was the chastening promised for apostasy withheld. There was first a revolt of Edom, which since David’s time had been under tributary kings with only brief interruptions (2 Ki. 8:20; cf. 2 Sam. 8:14; 1 Ki. 11:14 – 16). From that point on throughout OT times the Edomites would have a “king over themselves” who owed neither fealty nor tribute to Judah (note Isaac’s prophecy of this revolt, Gen. 27:40). Not only so, a southwestern area with a center at Libnah also successfully revolted (2 Ki. 8:22). Further chastening came through successful inroads by rampaging Philistines and Arabs (2 Chr. 21:16 – 17). Not for generations was there significant recovery of this lost ground.

The climax of these judgments to Jehoram himself was the particularly horrible manner in which he died (2 Chr. 21:15, “disease of your bowels, until your bowels come out,” NRSV) after living to see God’s judgment on all his sons save one, loss of his harem and all his goods. His sons had joined in destruction of the Lord’s worship as “seed royal” in a manner lesser citizens would not have dared to do (24:7) and therefore were destroyed, according to the word of Elijah, sent by letter to the miserable apostate king (21:12 – 17; the report of this letter shows that Elijah’s attention was not confined to the affairs of the northern kingdom only, and indicates that he was still alive after the death of Jehoshaphat). What horrible consequences from a bad marriage arranged by an otherwise wise and godly parent! See also CHRONOLOGY (OT); ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

Jehoshabeath jee hoh-shab’ee-ath. Alternate form of JEHOSEBA.

Jehoshaphat ji-hosh’uh-fat (יהושפט H3398, “Yahweh has judged”; cf. JOSHAPHAT, ELISHAPHAT, SHEPHATIAH; Ἰωσαφάτ G2734). (1) Son of Ahilud and recorder in the time of DAVID and SOLOMON (2 Sam. 8:16; 20:24; 1 Ki. 4:3). (2) One of the priests appointed to blow the trumpet when David transferred the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:24 KJV; modern versions render the name “Joshaphat”). (3) Son of Paruah; he was one of twelve district governors of Solomon commissioned to supply provisions for the royal household (1 Ki. 4:17). (4) Son of ASA and fourth king of the southern kingdom of Judah (1 Ki. 22; 2 Chr. 17 – 20; included in Matthew’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, Matt. 1:8). (5) Father of King JEHU of Samaria (2 Ki. 9:2, 14). The rest of this article is devoted to Jehoshaphat king of Judah.

I. Introduction. Jehoshaphat reigned twenty-five years, 873 – 849 B.C., and was thus contemporary to the reigns (in whole or part) of the entire Omride dynasty—OMRI, AHAB, AHAZIAH, JEHORAM—and contemporary to the ministries of the prophets ELIJAH and ELISHA. One of the oddities of the biblical narrative is that his notable reign is almost passed over in the books of KINGS, except as it impinges on the affairs of the northern kingdom (1 Ki. 15:24; 22:1 – 49; 2 Ki. 1:17; 3:1, 7 – 27; 8:16, 24 – 25; 12:18), while in the CHRONICLES account four long chapters (2 Chr. 17 – 20) are devoted to his story, scarcely equalled in extent by any other king (there are also notices in 1 Chr. 3:10; 2 Chr. 22:9). The reason seems to be that important matters leading to the ultimate demise of the northern kingdom are the center of interest in the Kings account, the disobedience to the Mosaic covenant and the efforts of Elijah and Elisha to correct matters being more central to the author’s interest. In Chronicles the famous piety of the great king and his succession, both reviving and preserving the institutions and standards of the Mosaic covenant, are cited at length to the postexilic RESTORATION community to produce both guidance and inspiration for that dispirited generation. The colorful career of Elijah is emphasized in the one, while the marvels of Jehoshaphat's faith and his revivals of religion are detailed in the other.

II. His military policy. The Hebrew text of 2 Chr. 17:1 – 2 indicates a policy of strong defense against expected inroads from the N. Omri, founder of the current dynasty at SAMARIA, had been a military commander-in-chief (1 Ki. 16:16); his son Ahab, Jehoshaphat's opposite number in Samaria, while not courageous, was strong. The reign of Asa, Jehoshaphat's father, had been one of uninterrupted warfare with the kings of Israel (2 Chr. 16:1 – 9; 1 Ki. 15:32). As a patriotic and foresighted head of state, Jehoshaphat placed armed men in all the fortified cities of Judah and garrisons of soldiers in lesser towns. The warfare of the time offered small protection to rural village folk. At the approach of enemy forces, they simply drove their livestock ahead of them to the fortified cities and moved in. Under such circumstances, conflict tended to be siege warfare unless there was professional military organization and soldiery to drive invading forces from the field. Jehoshaphat believed: "In time of peace prepare war."

III. His general religious policy. The Mosaic commonwealth of Israel was no democracy in matters of religion. Obedience to the law of Moses was not optional for anyone. It was the duty of magistrates and priests to practice the Mosaic faith and to see that all citizens at least outwardly and publicly did the same. Jehoshaphat was outstanding in the way in which as head of state he put the religious laws into effect. He heartily embraced the ancestral religion (2 Chr. 17:3 – 6), following the example of DAVID. Two striking expressions underscore this fact: "His heart was devoted to the ways of the LORD" (17:6) and the comment of Jehu the seer: "[you] have set your heart on seeking God" (19:3). The success of the public measures taken to restore the practice of Mosaic faith to the entire nation is summarized in these words: "Jehoshaphat lived in Jerusalem, and he went out again among the people from Beersheba to the hill country of Ephraim and turned them back to the LORD, the God of their fathers" (19:4).

IV. Special measures employed for restoring Mosaic religion. In his religious reforms, Jehoshaphat built upon the effective measures taken by Asa, his pious and energetic father. The backslidings of SOLOMON in his last years, the juvenile policies of REHOBOAM, and the religious carelessness of ABIJAH had brought matters, moral and religious, sadly downward. It was Asa's praiseworthy accomplishment that he rid the land of foreign altars and the cult objects of Canaanite Baalism (2 Chr. 14:3 – 5). He also reviewed the physical instruments of Yahweh worship, and compelled outward conformity to the Mosaic observances (15:8 – 11) even threatening death for apostates (as provided by the Law, Deut. 13). Yet the need for public instruction pointed out plainly by a certain prophet named Azariah (2 Chr. 15:1 – 7) evidently remained unmet. It was Jehoshaphat's goal to correct that omission, a matter he cared for early, in the third year of his reign, by sending officials, Levites, and priests "to teach in the towns of Judah"; these men "taught throughout Judah, taking with them the Book of the Law of the LORD" (2 Chr. 17:7 – 9). Evidently the Pentateuchal provisions for acquainting the people with the content and meaning of the law had been long neglected (Deut. 31:9 – 13; cf. 4:10; 6:1 – 9).

V. Prosperity of his reign. Jehoshaphat's military and religious measures were successful: "The fear of the LORD fell on all the kingdoms of the lands surrounding Judah, so that they did not make war against Jehoshaphat” (2 Chr. 17:10). He brought the nation back, at least formally, to “the God of their fathers” (19:4).

VI. The new policy of conciliation with Israel. Whereas the policy of his three predecessors, beginning with Rehoboam, had been one of unremitting enmity, and frequently warfare, toward Israel (1 Ki. 14:30; 15:6), some time fairly early in his reign Jehoshaphat and Ahab of Samaria put an end to the old feud. After the custom of the time, the two reigning families were united by marriage—in this case ATHALIAH daughter of Ahab and Jezebel with Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat. The poisonous effect of that marriage is traced elsewhere (see esp. JEHORAM #3). The arrangement became expensive to Judah by reason of the treasure and manpower contributed to Ahab’s wars (1 Ki. 22; 2 Chr. 18), and to the wars of Jehoram/Joram son of Ahab (2 Ki. 3), for Jehoshaphat assisted in at least two fruitless campaigns of the kings of Israel. This was not without personal physical peril to Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. 18:28 – 32; 1 Ki. 22:29 – 33) and spiritual loss to himself and his kingdom (2 Chr. 19:1 – 3). Nevertheless, the reduction in armament possible upon the cessation of the military feud with Israel produced material prosperity—“less guns; more butter”—though it scarcely lasted beyond the lifetime of the pious king. Since the conciliatory policy led in the three following reigns (Jehoram, Ahaziah, and Queen Grandmother Athaliah) to the near extinction of the dynasty, it was an ill-conceived policy.

VII. His judicial reforms. Judicial laws and procedures prescribed by Pentateuchal laws provided mainly for courts at the local level. There was really no distinction between civil laws and courts on the one hand and religious on the other. To the present day in the Near East, including the new secular-religious state of Israel, the distinctions are frequently obscure. But with the institution of the monarchy, with its claims of taxes and services as well as manpower upon the population, there was need to expand the judicial system. Hence the “chief priest” was made head of the system of religious courts (“Amariah the chief priest will be over you in any matter concerning the LORD,” 2 Chr. 19:11), while a separate non-Levite became head of a court dealing strictly with secular matters (“Zebadiah son of Ishamel, the leader of the tribe of Judah, will be over you in any matter concerning the king”). These national courts were not courts of appeal for plaintiffs dissatisfied with rulings of local courts, but they functioned rather as courts of referral for local judges who ruled themselves incompetent for some reason (Deut. 17:8). Equity was a matter, in the main, for courts of local elders and appears not to have been involved in Jehoshaphat’s reforms. (See further W. F. Albright, “The Judicial Reform of Jehoshaphat,” in Alexander Marx Jubilee Volume, ed. S. Lieberman [1950], 61–82.)

VIII. Foreign invasion and its miraculous repulse in the wilderness of Tekoa. There appears to be only one reference to this quite amazing incident in the book of Kings, and that a very oblique statement to the effect that Jehoshaphat successfully conducted certain undescribed wars (1 Ki. 22:43). On the other hand, 2 Chr. 20:11 represents the invaders (Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunites, 20:1; cf. 26:7) as seeking actually to dispossess the Jews of their land rather than mere conquest. Precisely because the invaders expected to stay and brought along families, flocks, and goods, the people of Judah reaped the large and valuable booty reported. The locale is the desert border area SE of BETHLEHEM and NE of HEBRON. The present road between these two cities skirts the western edge of the territory involved in this incident.

IX. Assessment of his reign. Although he attained a moderately advanced age (sixty years) and enjoyed twenty-five years of prosperous reign, and although personally loyal to the ancestral faith and pure of life and motive, Jehoshaphat's greatest failures lay in the precise areas of his greatest success—international relations and religious reformation (2 Chr. 20:31–37). He could not root out the unlawful (Deut. 12, esp. vv. 5–7) and probably clandestine high place worship, for “the people still had not set their hearts on the God of their fathers” (2 Chr. 20:33). His diplomacy by intermarriage of his own house with that of Ahab brought all his gains to ruin within a few years of his death. Already in his lifetime it was bearing unwanted and bitter fruit (1 Ki. 22:48–49; cf. 2 Chr. 20:35–37) in a futile joint naval venture with Ahaziah of Israel. His death and succession are recorded in a laconic statement (2 Chr. 21:1), to which JOSEPHUS adds: “he was buried in a magnificent manner in Jerusalem, for he had imitated the actions of David” (Ant. 9.3.2).

Jehoshaphat, Valley of. A valley adjacent to the city of JERUSALEM and regarded as the place of the judging of the nations (Joel 3:2, 12); it is also referred to as the “valley of decision” (3:14; cf. Zech. 14:1–5).

Christian tradition has identified it as the Valley of the KIDRON (the portion just E of the city) at least as early as the 4th cent., perhaps beginning with the Bordeaux Pilgrim's account (A.D. 333): “Also as one goes from Jerusalem to the gate which is to the eastward, in order to ascend the Mount of Olives, is the valley called that of Josaphat” (P. Geyer, Itinera Hierosolymitana saeculi IIII–VIII [1898], 23; English trans. by A. Stewart, Itinerary from Bordeaux to Jerusalem [1887], 24). EUSEBIUS at one point (Onomasticon 118.18–19) describes the Valley of Jehoshaphat as being “between Jerusalem and the Mount of Olives,” thus the Kidron Valley, but elsewhere (170.8–10) he appears to identify it with the Valley of HINNOM. The concept of it as a place of final judgment is shared by Jewish, Muslim, and Christian tradition, and is witnessed to by the extensive cemeteries of all three faiths on the slopes of the valley. The pseudepigraphical book of 1 Enoch (53.1) places the judgment in a deep valley near Hinnom.

The valley probably was named after King JEHOSHAPHAT (a name meaning “Yahweh has judged”) and also was known as the “King's Valley” (2 Sam. 18:18), where ABSALOM erected a pillar and apparently expected to be buried (the monument now called Absalom's Tomb is of a later period, as are the adjacent Tomb of St. James and Tomb of Zechariah). The GIHON SPRING and the Pool of Looking N through the Kidron Valley, thought by many to be the same as the Valley of Jehoshaphat.

SILLOAM, with the exits of Hezekiah's (or Siloam) Tunnel, as well as the Spring of EN ROGEL, are to be seen, with some remnants of older water systems. The Garden of GETHSEMANE and the nearby Basilica of the Agony are located in the floor of the valley, and at the confluence of the Kidron with the Valley of GEHENNA (OT Hinnom) there is the Potter's Field.

The theme of judgment is perpetuated in the names of the gates in the E wall of the city. Up to the 14th cent. the northern gate, now called the Damascus Gate, was designated as St. Stephen's Gate, and later the name was transferred to the gate opening on the Kidron Valley, previously known as the Gate of the Valley of Josaphat. The VULGATE identifies the MUSTER GATE (NIV, "Inspection Gate," Neh. 3:31) as Porto judicialis, "Gate of Judgment." A 6th-cent. Laura (i.e., monastic center) was located near the gate, and a 12th-cent. monastery nearby was called St. Mary of Josaphat, corresponding to the Arabic Bab Sitti Mariam. Muslim legends name the two closed portals of the Golden Gate the "door of mercy" and the "door of contrition," continuing the judgment theme, and the part of the Kidron Valley opposite this gate is called by them the Djahannum (Gehenna). (See E. Robinson and E. Smith, Biblical Researches in Palestine 1 [1841]: 396–405; J. Simons, Jerusalem in the Old Testament [1952], 10, 14; E. Kraeling, Rand McNally Bible Atlas [1956], 342.)

M. H. HEICKSEN

Jehosheba ji-hosh'uh-buh (יהושבעָ H3394, variant יהושבעָ H3395, "Yahweh is abundance [or prosperity, happiness]"). The daughter of King JEHORAM (Joram) of Judah (2 Ki. 11:2) and wife of JEHOIADA, the high priest (2 Chr. 22:11; KJV, NRSV, "Jehoshabeath"). When her brother A HA-ZIAH and most of the rest of the royal family were about to be murdered, she took Ahaziah's son JOASH, who was kept hidden for six years, until he could be made king.

Jehoshua ji-hosh'yoo-uh. KJV alternate form of JOSHUA (Num. 13:16; 1 Chr. 7:27 [some editions, "Jehoshuah"]).

Jehovah ji-hoh'vuh. Traditional English rendering of the Tetragrammaton or divine name, Yahweh (Heb. יהוה H3378; Exod. 6:3 et al., KJV). Because Jewish tradition does not allow the pronunciation of this name, in public reading it is regularly substituted with Adonay, “my Lord” (אֲדֹנָי from אֲדֹנָי H123). To indicate such a reading, Hebrew copies of the Bible preserve the consonants of Yahweh, but insert the vowels of Adonay (thus, יְהוָה, the first vowel being a short sound pronounced ĕ, roughly equivalent to ä); according to some, the inserted vowels come from Aram. שְׁמָא, “the Name” (partly on the grounds that in some MSS the Tetragram-maton is pointed simply יְהוה, that is, without the o vowel). This practice in the writing of the divine name misled translators (not only in English) to create the hybrid form Jehovah, which never existed in Hebrew. Most versions render the name with small caps as “the LORD.” See GOD, NAMES OF.

Jehovah-jireh ji-hoh’vuh-ji’ruh (יְהוה יִרְאֶה, the latter word being impf. of רָאָה H8011, “to see, consider, be concerned about”). The name ABRAHAM gave the place on Mount MORIAH where God substituted a ram for his son ISAAC (Gen. 22:14 KJV; NIV, “The LORD Will Provide”). Evidently, by the time of the Mosaic record, the statement had become a current proverb. The designation “mount of the Lord” was the usual one for the TEMPLE mount in Jerusalem (Isa. 2:3, among many others). In view of the end of Gen. 22:14 (which has the verb rāâ in the niphal stem), some have suggested that a better vocalization of the Hebrew text would read: “Yahweh will be seen” (the passive force) or “Yahweh will reveal himself” (the reflexive force). Actually, a supposed inconsistency does not exist between the renderings “Yahweh will provide” and “Yahweh will be seen [i.e., appear],” for there is an evident play on the Hebrew word that can convey both significations, depending on the stem in which it occurs. Interestingly, the Syriac and Latin versions render the two Hebrew forms as though they were in the same verbal stem.

Jehovah-nissi ji-hoh’vuh-nis’i (יְהוה נִסִּי, “Yahweh is my banner”). The name given the altar erected by MOSES to commemorate the defeat of the Amalekites (see AMALEK) in the wilderness at REPHIDIM at the hands of Israel under the leadership of JOSHUA (Exod. 17:15 KJV; NIV, “The LORD is my Banner”; the Gk. and Aram. versions read differently). The name revealed Israel’s assurance that God was the One who gave them the victory and that he was the One around whom they in the future were to rally as a standard.

C. L. FEINBERG

Jehovah-shalom ji-hoh’vuh-shah’lohm (יְהוה שְׁלֹמִים, “Yahweh is peace”). The name GIDEON gave the altar he constructed in OPHRAH to commemorate the visit of the angel of the Lord, who assured Gideon that he would not die as a result of seeing an angel, and commissioned him to liberate Israel from the Midianites (Jdg. 6:23–24 KJV; NIV, “The LORD is Peace”).

C. L. FEINBERG

Jehovah-shammah ji-hoh’vuh-sham’muh (יְהוה שָׁמָּה, “Yahweh is there”). The name to be given the restored and beautified Jerusalem of the MESSIAH’S kingdom (Ezek. 48:35 KJV mg.). The Lord had departed from his temple and city (ch. 11); he is to return to Jerusalem (ch. 43) and remain in favor and glory among his redeemed people forever. This is God’s goal for his elect people. God’s name is inseparably linked with his chosen city, the place of his abode. Compare the parallel in Rev. 21.

C.L. FEINBERG

Jehovah-tsidkenu ji-hoh'vuh-tsid-kee'nyoo (יהוה צדקנו), “Yahweh is our righteousness”). This name is employed, by JEREMIAH alone, in a twofold way. It is the designation of the future Davidic king, who will rule over restored Israel (Jer. 23:6 KJV mg.). RIGHTEOUSNESS is a divine attribute of the MESSIAH in providing salvation; the implication appears to be that his righteousness becomes ours (cf. the notion of imputed righteousness, 1 Cor. 1:30; 2 Cor. 5:21). In the second reference (Jer. 33:16 KJV mg.), the prophet is pointing to the capital of the king, which partakes of the nature of the righteous monarch.

C. L. FEINBERG

Jehozabad ji-hoh'zuh-bad (יהוזבד H3379, “Yahweh has granted”; cf. ELZABAD and JOZABAD). (1) Son of Shomer; he was an official who, with JOZABAD (NRSV, “Jozacar,” following many Heb. MSS) son of Shimeath, murdered King JOASH of Judah at BETH MILLO (2 Ki. 12:21). The parallel passage identifies the officials as “Zabad, son of Shimeath an Ammonite woman, and Jehozabad, son of Shimrith a Moabite woman” (2 Chr. 24:26). Some consider Shimrith a variant form of Shomer (cf. NIV mg.); others speculate that Shomer was Shimrith's father.

(2) Son of OBED-EDOM, included in the list of divisions of the Korahite doorkeepers in the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:4).

(3) A commander of units of one thousand in the army of Judah during the reign of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 17:18).

S. BARABAS

Jehozadak ji-hoh'zuh-dak (יהוזדק H3392, short form יהזק H3449 “Yahweh has been righteous”). Son of Seraiah and descendant of AARON through ELEAZAR; apparently the last high priest prior to the destruction of the temple, he was among those deported to Babylon by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (1 Chr. 6:14–15). He is known primarily for being the father of Joshua (JESHUA) the high priest (Hag. 1:1, 12, 14; 2:2, 4; Zech. 6:11; KJV, “Josedeck”). In Ezra-Nehemiah the name is shortened to Jozadak (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; 10:18; Neh. 12:26); similarly in the APOCRYPHA (1 Esd. 5:5, 48, 56; 6:2; 9:19; Sir. 49:12; KJV, “Josedec”).

S. BARABAS

Jehu jee'hyoo, jay'hoo (יהוי H3369, “Yahweh is he” [i.e., he is the true God; cf. Noth, IPN, 15ff., 143]; see ELIHU). (1) Son of Obed and descendant of JERAHMEEL, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:38).

(2) Son of Joshibiah, listed among clan leaders in the tribe of SIMEON whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (1 Chr. 4:36; cf. vv. 38–41).

(3) A man from ANATHOTH, listed among the warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined with DAVID when the latter took refuge at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:3).

(4) Son of HANANI; he was a prophet who warned King BAASHA (c. 909–886 B.C.) that he would be judged for following the heretical cult instituted by JEROBOAM (1 Ki. 16:1–4, 7). Much later (c. 853), Jehu had to rebuke King JEHOSHAPHAT for allying himself with AHAB in an attempt to recover RAMOTH GILEAD from the Arameans (2 Chr. 19:2, where he is called “the seer”). Jehu wrote annals on the reign of Jehoshaphat that were incorporated in “the book of the kings of Israel” (1 Chr.

(5) Son of a certain Jehoshaphat (not the king of Judah), sometimes also identified as son of Nim-shi (apparently his grandfather; cf. 1 Ki. 19:16 with 2 Ki. 9:2). Jehu was king of the northern kingdom of Israel, c. 841–814 B.C. Jehu had been a commander in the Israelite army who accepted the divine commission through ELISHA to take over the royal office, avenge the persecution of Yahwists, and extirpate Phoenician BAAL worship from Israel (1 Ki. 19:16–17; 2 Ki. 9–10; brief references elsewhere). The rest of this article is devoted to King Jehu.

I. Chronology. According to 2 Ki. 3:1; 8:25, JEHORAM (Joram) of Israel reigned twelve years; AHAZIAH of Judah acceded in Jehoram's twelfth (or eleventh, by the accession-year reckoning that appears to have been used in 9:29) and reigned (part of) one year. This was the year of Jehu's coup, in which both kings were killed. A definite synchronism is available with Assyrian history, for SHALMANESER III records the battle of Qarqar (at which AHAB fought), in his sixth year, and the receipt of tribute from Jehu in his eighteenth (respectively 853/2 and 841/0 B.C.; there is a faint possibility that the dates should be one year higher; see E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], ch. 3). If Ahab was killed at Ramoth Gilead in the campaign season of 853, Ahaziah of Israel reigned in 853/2 and 852/1; Jehoram's first year was 852/1, and his twelfth, 841/0.

In 841, Shalmaneser attacked DAMASCUS, devastating SYRIA (ARAM) and HAURAN, so Jehu's revolt can hardly have been later than the middle of the campaigning season of 841. This correlation with the years of a single Assyrian king affords the clearest proof that nonaccession-year reckoning ("antedating") was used in Israel, and that it was being adopted also in Judah, presumably as a result of the intermarriage between the royal houses (and, perhaps, of the close alignment of foreign policy). It may seem unlikely that the Arameans attacked Ramoth in the year of Shalmaneser's expedition; J. Miller (in JBL 76 [1967]: 285ff.) therefore adopts Lucian's recension of the synchronisms, implying a shorter reign for Jehoram, and allowing 844/2 for Jehu's revolt. Jehu reigned twenty-eight years (2 Ki. 10:36), dying in 814/3.

II. Revolution. In Jehoram's twelfth year, the Israelites held a defensive position at RAMOTH GILEAD, a key point on the N-S trade route E of the Jordan, against the Arameans. Jehoram, wounded in an Aramean attack, had gone to JEZREEL to recover, leaving his commanders (of whom Jehu may have been chief) to carry on the war in Gilead. Ahaziah, king of Judah, who was assisting Jehoram in the campaign, later went down to Jezreel to see how he was progressing; and the court was there, including JEZEBEL the queen mother.

At this juncture, a young emissary arrived from the community of prophets in the Jordan valley, of which ELISHA was head. As directed by Elisha, he requested a private interview with Jehu, and commissioned him in the name of the Lord to avenge the murder of Yahwist prophets on the Omride dynasty and to take over the kingdom. To confirm his message, he anointed Jehu on the spot. Jehu's fellow officers, on hearing this, rallied immediately and proclaimed him king (2 Ki. 9:1–13).

The subsequent passage (2 Ki. 9:14–37) begins by restating that Jehu rebelled against Jehoram while the latter was in Jezreel recovering from a war wound. Jehu requested his colleagues to prevent anyone else from leaving Ramoth while he went to Jezreel in his chariot (prob. with a small guard, as inferred by JOSEPHUS in Ant. 9.6.3). As Jehu approached Jezreel, he detained two scouts who were sent to question him, which probably gave Jehoram the impression that he wanted to confer privately. Puzzled by his commander's presence and behavior, and perhaps fearing that something extraordinary had happened at Ramoth, Jehoram went with Ahaziah to meet him.

Jehu was waiting by the royal garden that Ahab had obtained by the death of NABOTH. Having witnessed, as a young officer, ELIJAH'S condemnation of this murder, Jehu may already have been thinking of the scandal (2 Ki. 9:25). He returned Jehoram's greeting with a challenge and shot him as he turned to escape; then he pursued Ahaziah and wounded him mortally as he took the hill road by Ibleam (v. 27). Ahaziah was evidently making for Samaria by the DOTHAN valley; if the text of Kings is sound, his charioteer then turned along the plain to MEGIDDO (cf. 2 Chr. 22:9). Jehu, in returning to Jezreel, came face to face with Jezebel, who tried to reassert her authority from the vantage point of an upper window; but her courtiers were not prepared to stand against the new master, and on his orders two or three of them seized Jezebel and hurled her down in front of his chariot.

In view of the family loyalty characteristic of Semitic people, Jehu could only secure his hold by extirpating Ahab's family; his problem was to do so and yet avoid the odium of sole responsibility for the blood bath. He wrote to the governors of the royal household at Samaria, offering them the choice of putting up a successor to the throne (and taking the consequences) or pledging their submission with the heads of Jehoram's children and young relatives. They took the latter course, enabling Jehu to point to the evidence and deny responsibility (2 Ki. 10). The number of victims is given as seventy, which may be conventional (G. A. Cooke, A Text-Book of North-Semitic Inscriptions [1903], no. 62, pp. 171ff., cites a parallel example from Zenjirli in N Syria), but there were enough to make "two heaps" (10:8).

Jehu now moved to Samaria; on the way he met and liquidated a group of forty-two relatives of Ahaziah who, all unsuspecting, were on their way to visit the royal house in Jezreel. Clearly, Ahaziah's body had not yet reached Jerusalem when they left. The rest of the Judean royal family (except JOASH) were then killed by ATHALIAH; so when she died, the Phoenician contamination had been eradicated, whereas the Davidic succession hung by a slender thread.

In Samaria, Jehu completed his purge of the Omride family and partisans. The next objective, to break the grip of Phoenician culture and religion, was gained by stratagem. He announced that he would adopt Baalism with even more fervor than Ahab, proclaiming an assembly in the temple of Baal to celebrate his accession; when the ceremony was fairly under way, he sent in his guards to massacre the Baalists. Although some scholars can scarcely believe that Jehu was accepted as a Baalist, there is reason enough for his coup to be seen first as an army revolt or possibly as social in character (see below). Yahwism was thus reestablished as the official religion; but further reform stopped, not touching the cult of Bethel and Dan, nor were the older forms of Baalism abandoned.

III. Jehu's reign. Jehu ruled for twenty-eight years (2 Ki. 10:36) and died a natural death; but his reign was a period of decline. Having broken with the Phoenicians, he found himself paying tribute as they did to Shalmaneser III; this is recorded in the “black obelisk” from Nimrud (where he is called “Yaua son of Omri”). E. Kraeling (Aram and Israel [1918], 80) defines Jehu’s policy as “continued political alignment” with PHOENICIA, but this appears to go beyond the evidence, and his citation of 2 Ki. 10:31 is hardly relevant.

As other authorities rightly point out, Jehu had administered the most insulting rebuffs to TYRE. Neither is it evident that the Phoenicians paid tribute for any reason but to secure their own safety. Jehu may have been seeking the protection of Assyria against the Arameans; but a discovered copy of Shalmaneser’s annals supports the suggestion that the Assyrians reached the sea, not first at Nahr el-Kelb toward Byblos, but at Mount Carmel, after marching through Hauran and northern Israel (A. T. Olmstead, History of Assyria [1923], 139). The tribute apparently was not large; probably Shalmaneser was not seeking more than a satisfactory climax to his somewhat inconclusive campaign against HAZAEL.

The famous Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III (859–824 B.C.). This register shows King Jehu prostrate as he brings tribute to the Assyrian king.

The threat from the Assyrians faded out as their attention was engaged first by Urartu (see ARMENIA), then by civil war. Hazael, regaining his strength, went on to occupy the country E of Jordan (see 2 Ki. 10:33; there is no need to infer from this text that Jehu first retook the MEDEBA district and then lost it to Hazael). Isaiah and Jeremiah refer to many of the towns there as Moabite (Isa. 15:16; Jer. 48), so MESAHA of MOAB had probably settled and held them, though at various times Aramean suzerainty was asserted.

IV. Evaluation. Jehu failed to keep his early promise, both in religious zeal and in leadership (cf. the negative judgment in Hos. 1:4). One can only guess whether he found the problems too big, or succumbed to the deeper temptations of the society that he had set out to purge. Certainly, he was gifted with courage, even audacity, and with a power of command. His name, and his father’s, indicate a conservative background, which helps to explain his readiness to do Elisha’s bidding. His association with Jehonadab (JONADAB) the RECAHITE is unquestionably significant (2 Ki. 10:15, 23). J. Morgenstern (in HUCA 15 [1940]: 230–48), who finds the significance sinister, claims that Jehonadab brought Elisha’s directions for the religious purge, which he sees as a follow-through from ASA’S reforms (fifty-eight years earlier). It is more probable, as W. F. Albright suggests (The Biblical Period [1952], 36), that the support of the pastoral Recabite leader stemmed from hatred of civilized society, which had brought poverty to the country and also discontent to the militia, as well as frustration to at least some of the officers. Jezebel miscalculated when she compared Jehu to Zimri; this time, the army did not react.

Socially, the episode may be seen as a revolt against the abuses of wealth. It could not touch the roots of the problem; as prosperity returned, so did the abuse, as observed in the prophecy of Amos in the next century. In divine providence, Israel was saved on the brink of desperate peril and utter rejection of the Lord, and given yet another opportunity of repentance. The purge, as Morgenstern points out, seriously weakened the upper class and therefore the army. This, however, only partly explains the failure to withstand Hazael; the stories of Elisha record dramatic reversals of position in wars between BEN HADAD and Jehoram. The apparent lethargy of Jehu's reign is still an enigma. (See L. M. W. Beal, The Deuteronomist's Prophet: Narrative Control of Approval and Disapproval in the Story of Jehu (2 Kings 9 and 10) [2007].)

Jehubbah ji-hub'uh. KJV, RSV form of HUBBAH.

Jehucal ji-hyoo'kuhl (יְהוּכָל H3385, short form יֻכָּל H3426, "Yahweh has been [or has proven himself] able, powerful"; cf. JECOLIAH). TNIV Jehu-kal. Son of Shelemiah; he and a priest were sent by King ZEDEKIAH to JEREMIAH to ask the prophet to pray for him and the people (Jer. 37:3). He was also one of four officials who told the king to kill Jeremiah for predicting the fall of Jerusalem (38:1; KJV and other versions, "Jucal").

Jehud jee'huhd (יְהוּדָה H3372; in Heb. inscriptions and in Aram., this form corresponds to יְהוּדָה H3373; see JUDAH). One of the towns originally allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:45; the Danites were unable to occupy the territory, v. 47). Mentioned between BAALATH and BENE BERAK (19:45), Jehud is identified with modern el-Yahudiyeh, 8.5 mi. ESE of JOPPAH.

Jehudi ji-hyoo'di (יְהוּדִי H3375, "of Judah," "Jewish"). Son of Nethaniah; an officer, probably a scribe, of King JEHOIAKIM who was sent to BARUCH so that the latter might read the prophecies of JEREMIAH to the princes of Judah, and who himself afterward read them to the king (Jer. 36:14, 21, 23). His great-grandfather's name is given as CUSHI. The tracing of Jehudi's lineage to the third generation suggests the importance of his family and thus the significance of his task. Some argue that the name Cushi indicates a Cushite (i.e., Ethiopian) origin and that therefore Jehudi was a naturalized Judean. Because an extended genealogy in this context is unusual, various scholars emend the text from "Jehudi son of Methaniah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of Cushi" to "Jehudi son of Methaniah and Shelemiah son of Cushi."

Jehudijah jee'huh-di'juh. KJV rendering of yěhudiyyâ (fem. of y#277; hûdî H3374, "Judean, Judahite") with reference to a wife of MERED (1 Chr. 4:18). Modern versions more accurately translate "his Judean wife" (cf. KJV mg., "the Jewess"); the word is probably used to distinguish the woman from BITHIAH, an Egyptian also mentioned in this verse.

Jehuel ji-hyoo'uhl. Alternate form of JEHIEL (2 Chr. 29:14 NRSV).

Jehukal ji-hyoo'kuhl. TNIV form of JEHUCAL.

Jehush. See JEUSH #3.

Jeiel ji-i'uhl (יעאל H3599, variant יעאל H3590, possibly “God is strong” or “God cures”; see also JEUEL). (1) A clan chief from the tribe of REUBEN (1 Chr. 5:7). His genealogical connection as well as the period in which he lived are unclear.

(2) Descendant of BENJAMIN, “father” (i.e., founder or leader) of GIBEON, and ancestor of King SAUL (1 Chr. 9:35 [Ketib, “Jeuel”]; the name is missing in 8:29 MT, but NIV and NRSV insert it on the basis of some Gk. MSS). Many identify Jeiel with ABIEL.

(3) A Levite in the time of DAVID appointed among others to play the lyre (NRSV, harp) as a part of the ministrations before the ARK OF THE COVENANT (1 Chr. 15:18, 21; 16:5; the latter passage mentions Jeiel twice, but the first occurrence should probably be emended to JAAZIEL).

(4) Son of Hotham the Aroerite (see AROER); he and his brother Shama are included among DAVID’S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:44 [Ketib, “Jeuel”]).

(5) Son of Mattaniah, descendant of LEVI through ASAPH, and ancestor of a certain JAHAZ-IEL who prophesied in aid of King JEHOSEPHAT just before the famous victory of BERACAH (2 Chr. 20:14).

(6) An official who held the office of secretary under King UZZIAH (2 Chr. 26:11 [Ketib, “Jeuel”]).

(7) A Levite, descendant of ELIZAPHAN, who served during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:13; NRSV, “Jeuel,” following the Ketib).

(8) A leader of the Levites in the reign of JOSIAH who gave liberally toward the sacrifices (2 Chr. 35:9; called “Ochiel” in 1 Esd. 1:9).

(9) One of the descendants of Nebo who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43).

(10) One of the descendants of Adonikam who returned with EZRA from Babylon (Ezra 8:13 KJV [most other versions have “Jeuel,” following the Bomberg ed. of the Hebrew text]; the parallel in 1 Esd. 8:39 has “Jeuel” [KJV, “Jewel”]).

Jekabzeel ji-kab'zee-uhl. Alternate form of KABZEEL.

Jekameam jek'uh-mee'uhm (קמאם H3694, possibly “the Kinsman [i.e., ancestral god] establishes [or takes a stand]”). Son of HEBRON, grandson of KOHATH, and great-grandson of LEVI (1 Chr. 23:19; 24:23).

Jekamiah jek'uh-mi'uh (קמיה H3693, “Yahweh establishes [or takes a stand]”; see JAKIM). (1) Son of Shallum and descendant of JUDAH through JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:41).

(2) Son of JEHOIACHIN, last king of Judah (1 Chr. 3:18; KJV “Jecamiah”); he was apparently born after the royal family was led away into EXILE in Babylon.

Jekoliah jek'uh-li'uh. TNIV form of JECOLIAH.

Jekuthiel ji-kyoo'thee-uhl (קיתאל H3688, “God nourishes”). Son of MERED by his Judean wife; included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:18).

Jemima je-mi'muh. KJV form of JEMIMAH.

Jemimah je-mi'muh (יְמִימָה H3544, possibly “dove”). KJV Jemima. The first daughter of JOB born to him after his fortunes were restored (Job 42:14).

Jemnaan jem'nay-uhn. KJV alternate Apoc. form of JABNEEL (Jdt. 2:28).

Jemuel jem'yoo-uhl (יְמוּאֵל H3543, derivation uncertain). First son of SIMEON and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15); called NEMUEL in the parallel passages (Num. 26:12; 1 Chr. 4:24).

Jephthae jef'thee. KJV NT form of JEPHTHAH (Heb. 11:32).

Jephthah jef'thuh (יִפְתָּח H3653, “[God] opens [the womb?]” or “[God] frees” [see also IPHTAH, PETHAHIAH]; Ἰεφθαῖ G2650). A Gileadite warrior who as a judge delivered Israel from the Ammonites (see AMMON), sacrificed his daughter to fulfill his vow to God, and defeated the Ephraimites (Jdg. 11:1—12:7).

I. The Ammonite oppression. The pattern of the episodes in the book of JUDGES is cyclical. The people of Israel lapsed into idolatry and disobedience of God's commands. God punished them by surrendering them to one of the surrounding nations who oppressed them. In their misery, the Israelites repented of their apostasy and cried out for forgiveness and deliverance. God sent a leader (called a “judge”) through whom he gave victory over the enemy oppressor.

The background of the Jephthah story, therefore, is an Israelite lapse followed by oppression from Ammon (Jdg. 10:6–9). The duration of the Ammonite oppression was eighteen years (10:8). It consisted of two phases. First, the Ammonites exerted direct and sustained pressure on the Israelites settled in GILEAD to the E of the Jordan, in the land formerly controlled by the two AMORITE kings, OG king of BASHAN and SIHON king of HESHBON (Deut. 2–3). Second, Ammonite raiding parties crossed over the Jordan to plunder and harass settlements in the territories of EPHRAIM, BENJAMIN, and JUDAH (Jdg. 10:9). This twofold campaign caused intense suffering and misery among the Israelites, who confessed they had forsaken Yahweh to serve the local Baals (10:10, 15) and removed the idols of foreign gods from their midst to show their sincere determination to return to the God of their fathers (10:16).

II. Jephthah the judge. Jephthah was the son of a man named Gilead. Some scholars have supposed that the real name of his father was unknown, so he was reputed to be the son of an eponymous hero who had given his name to the territory of Gilead. But since the term gld occurs as the name of an ordinary citizen in the tablets from UGARIT (c. 1250 B.C., only a century before Jephthah), it seems unreasonable to refuse the possibility that a real man named Gilead was Jephthah's father, regardless of the relationship of that man with the place of the same name. Jephthah's mother was a prostitute (Heb. zōnâ H2390; some think she was a temple prostitute, but the word for this is the fem. of qādēš H7728). Because he was not born of Gilead's legitimate wife, Jephthah was excluded from his father's inheritance by his half-brothers (Jdg. 11:1–2). To make a living, Jephthah gathered a group of comrades in arms and formed a band of robbers who operated out of TOB, NE of RAMOTH GILEAD (v. 3).

When the Ammonite crisis arose, the leaders or elders of Gilead traveled to the land of Tob to secure the services of the robber baron against the Ammonites. The elders offered to make him their temporary commander against the Ammonites and, following the successful defeat of the enemy, their permanent chieftain (Heb. rōš H8031, "head"). The contract was solemnly entered at Mizpah, accompanied by the exchange of oaths (Jdg. 11:4–11). The term "judge" was employed by neither of the two parties. It was applied to him in retrospect by the inspired author-editor of Judges, who saw Jephthah as a member of the larger group of "judges" whose stories are told in this book. See JUDGES, PERIOD OF.

III. Jephthah defeats the Ammonites. In Jdg. 11:12–28 is recorded an exchange of indictments between Jephthah and the Ammonite chief much in the spirit of the charges and countercharges exchanged before battle by later kings (ABIJAH and JEROBOAM in 2 Chr. 13:2–20; AMAZIAH and Jehoash [JOASH] in 2 Ki. 14:8–10 and 2 Chr. 25:17; cf. also the exchange of challenges before battle in 1 Sam. 17:41–47). Some scholars insist that this is unhistorical and the adornment of a Deuteronomistic editor (see DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY), but such indictments were exchanged through envoys before most battles in the ANE (cf. many examples in the Annals of the HITTITE King Mursili II). Indeed, even in modern times a nation is not likely to go to war before first attempting to seek redress of wrongs through diplomatic channels.

Other scholars consider this section (Jdg. 11:12–28) irrelevant to the Jephthah story, since it deals with Israel's seizure of the land from the Amorites and the Moabites, not the Ammonites. They also point to Jephthah's identification of his enemy's god as CHEMOSH (11:24), who was the national god of MOAB, whereas Ammon's god was MILCOM. But Jephthah recounted the story of the Israelite conquest, singling out Moab and the Amorites, because the Ammonites had accused Israel of taking their land when they took the territory of Gilead. Jephthah's reply was to point out that Israel took it from the Amorites (Og and Sihon), and not from either Ammon or Moab. His second argument was that a people should keep what its god gives to it. The mention of Chemosh may be explicable in that Ammonites and Moabites venerated one another's gods, as was often the practice in polytheistic societies.

When negotiation failed (Jdg. 11:28), the case was submitted to a trial by battle. God would decide the case by granting victory to the party in the right (11:27). Jephthah apparently did not feel sufficiently secure in the knowledge of the justness of his people's cause. He made a vow that, if Yah-weh would grant him victory over the Ammonites, he would make a human sacrifice to God of whoever came forth from the doors of his house to meet him (11:31). Because of Jephthah's consternation (11:35) when his daughter came forth to meet him, some have supposed that he anticipated an animal. But an ordinary sacrificial animal (ox, sheep, goat) would hardly come forth to meet him from his own house. A pet dog would hardly have been an acceptable sacrifice to any god. The entire context rather suggests that he contemplated human sacrifice from the beginning. The battle took place near MIZPAH of Gilead and was a total victory for Jephthah (11:32–33).

IV. Jephthah sacrifices his daughter. The daughter who came to meet Jephthah on his return Locations in the story of Jephthah.

(cf. MIRIAM in Exod. 15:20–21 and the women in 1 Sam. 18:6–7) was his only child (Jdg. 11:34). Perhaps he had hoped that a slave would greet him. But despite his grief (11:35), he was determined to keep his promise to God, perhaps still hoping that God would spare the child at the last moment, as with ABRAHAM (Gen. 22). The girl (like ISAAC in Gen. 22) was calm and full of faith (Jdg. 11:36), only asking that she be permitted a final farewell to life with her friends (11:37). And thus was born the custom in Israel of an annual pilgrimage of Israelite girls to lament the daughter of Jephthah for four days (11:39–40; cf. 21:19–20 for another such annual convocation of virgins). Some scholars believe that the annual four-day lamentation for Jephthah's daughter masks a heathen rite in which women wept for the vegetation god TAMMUZ (cf. Ezek. 8:14) or his Canaanite counterpart BAAL, fearing the perpetual “virginity” (i.e., barrenness) of “Mother Earth.” Because the season of the year of this four-day ritual is not given here, this conjecture cannot be verified. (See B. Miller, Tell It on the Mountain: The Daughter of Jephthah in Judges 11 [2005].)

V. Jephthah and the Ephraimites. The Ammonites during their period of harassment had raided the territory of EPHRAIM to the W of Jordan (Jdg. 10:9). Jephthah had not recruited here (12:1; cf. 11:29), apparently feeling more secure with troops from his own country, perhaps many of them members of his band. Indeed Jephthah says that he did call upon Ephraimites (12:2), although stressing at the same time that the feud with the Ammonites was his and his people’s. The entire provocation may have grown out of a long-standing hostility felt by the Ephraimites W of Jordan and the Gileadites to the E, the former sarcastically labeling the latter as “renegades from Ephraim and Manasseh” (12:4). The fighting broke out to the E of Jordan and soon went badly for the Ephraimites. When many attempted to flee across the Jordan to safety, they were put to a linguistic test by the Gileadite guards at the fording places. Since the two dialects of Hebrew treated the initial (sibilant) consonant in the word šibbōlet H8672 differently, it was a simple matter for the Gileadite guards to detect Ephraimites. Forty-two thousand of them failed the test and were slain (12:5–6; see J. A. Emerton in Melanges bibliques et orientaux en l’honneur de M. Mathias Delcore, ed. A. Caquot et al. [1985], 149–57).

Jephthah emerges from these chapters as a man of faith (Heb. 11:32) who overcame the disadvantages of his disreputable birth, was chosen by God and his people in their hour of need, led God’s people to victory over the Ammonite foe, and secured them against further threat from that quarter until the days of Saul. He was firm with himself, refusing to hold back his only child from God. As such he was long remembered in Israel (1 Sam. 12:11) and in the early Christian communities (Heb. 11:32). When judged by the standards of the Christian community today, Jephthah may appear crude, insensitive, and bloodthirsty. But the Spirit of God saw fit to use him (Jdg. 11:29), and the Word of God honors him. (See JUDGES, BOOK OF, and the commentaries listed there.)

Jephunneh ji-fuhn’uh (יֶפְנִיחַ H3648, possibly “[God] turns [i.e., becomes reconciled]”). (1) A Kenizzite (see KENAZ), descendant of JUDAH; always referred to as the father of CALEB (Num. 13:6; 32:12; et al.).

(2) Son of JETHER (1 Chr. 7:38), listed among the “heads of families, choice men, brave warriors and outstanding leaders” of the tribe of ASHER (v. 40).

Jerah jihr’uh (יָרָח H3733, “month,” possibly a reference to the S Arabian moon god; cf. J. A. Montgomery, Arabia and the Bible [1934], 40 n. 10). Son of JOKTAN, grandson of EBER, and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chr. 1:20). Some believe the name Jerah is reflected in Arabic Warāh, the designation of a region in S ARABIA (cf. ABD, 3:683).

Jerahmeel ji-rah’mee-uhl (יֶרַחְמֵאל H3737, “God has compassion”; gentilic יֶרַחְמֵאֵלִי H3738, “Jerahmeelite”; see JEREMIEL). (1) Firstborn son of HEZRON, grandson of PEREZ, and great-grandson of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:9). His brothers were RAM and CALEB, although the identity of the latter is disputed. Jerahmeel had two wives and six sons (2:25–26), and his many descendants are given prominence in this genealogy (2:27–41), suggesting that his clan played a significant role in the history of the tribe of Judah. Because the Jerahmeelites, who lived in the NEGEV, are mentioned in connection with the KENITES (1 Sam. 27:10; 30:29), some scholars argue that the clan had non-Israelite origins and that the Chronicler's genealogy is a means of legitimating the status of its families during the postexilic period (cf. ABD, 3:683).

(2) Son of Kish (not the father of King SAUL) and descendant of LEVI through MERARI; he was among the first Levites to serve in the permanent sanctuary established under DAVID (1 Chr. 24:29). He apparently married a daughter of Kish's brother ELEAZAR, who had no sons (cf. 23:21–22). A central sanctuary, successor to David's, was being fitted and staffed when Chronicles was written, which explains the emphasis on Levite genealogies.

(3) A royal official (the apparent meaning of the designation "a son of the king") who, with two others, was deputized by King JEHOIAKIM to arrest JEREMIAH and his assistant, BARUCH; the effort ended in failure because "the LORD had hidden them" (Jer. 36:26; the KJV understands the Heb. word for "the king" as a proper name and translates "the son of Hammelech"; cf. also 38:6 and see HAMMELECH). The same individual is apparently referred to in a 7th-cent. seal that bears the inscription, "Belonging to Jerahmeel, the king's son" (see N. Avigad in BA 42 [1979]: 114–18).

Jerechus jer'uh-kuhs (Ἰερεχός. Ancestor (or place of origin) of a family that returned from the EXILE (1 Esd. 5:22 [RSV, "Jericho"]; the parallel passage has JERICHO, Ezra 2:34).

Jered jehr'id (יֶרֶד H3719, derivation disputed; cf. JARED). (1) Son of MERED (by the latter's Juda-hite wife), "father" (i.e., founder) of GEDOR, and descendant of JUDAH, although his precise genealogical connection is unclear (1 Chr. 4:18). Apparently, the town of Gedor was founded by both Jered and PENUEL (v. 4).

(2) KJV alternate form of JARED (1 Chr. 1:2).

Jeremai jer'uh-mi (יֵרֵמִי H3757; possibly short form of JEREMIAH or JEREMOTH). One of the descendants of Hashum who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:33; 1 Esd. 9:34 [KJV, "Jeremias"]).

Jeremiah jer'uh-mi'uh (יֵרֵמְיָהוּ H3759, short form יֵרֵמְיָה H3758, derivation uncertain, possibly "Yahweh loosens [the womb?]" or "Yahweh raises up"; Ἰερεμίας G2635). KJV NT Jeremias (Matt. 16:14) and Jeremy (2:17; 27:9). (1) Son of Hilkiah; a prophet in the southern kingdom (Judah) during the last forty years of its existence (627–586 B.C.). He lived through the period of the disintegration of the kingdom, witnessed the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and spent the remaining years of his life in Egypt. See JEREMIAH, BOOK OF.

(2) One of the ambidextrous Benjamite warriors who joined DAVID while he was in exile from SAUL at the Philistine city of ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4; cf. v. 2).

(3–4) Two Gadite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. 10, 13); these Gadites are described as "brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains" (v. 8).

(5) A clan chief of the half-tribe of MANASSEH; he and others are described as "brave warriors, famous men, and heads of their families" (1 Chr. 5:24). Because of their unfaithfulness, however, they and their families were taken captive by the Assyrians (vv. 25–26).

(6) Father of Hamutal, who was the mother of Kings JEHOAHAZ and ZEDEKIAH (2 Ki. 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1) and thus the wife of King JOSIAH. This Jeremiah is identified as being from LIBNAH.

(7) Son of Habazziniah and father of Jaazaniah; the latter was a leader of the RECABITES, whose loyalty to their ancestral precepts the prophet Jeremiah used as a lesson to his own countrymen (Jer. 35:3).

(8) A priest who returned from the EXILE (Neh. 12:1, 12). He is probably the same who signed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (10:2), while the Jeremiah who took part in one of the choirs at the dedication of the wall may be a different individual (12:34).

B. Political and religious conditions. About the mid-7th cent., when Jeremiah was born, the kingdom of Judah was at a very low point religiously as well as politically. Following the era of HEZEKIAH'S extensive religious reformation and successful resistance of Assyrian aggression, Judah was plunged into ominous reverses when MANASSEH became sole ruler after Hezekiah's death in 686 B.C.

Religiously, Manasseh plunged Judah into gross IDOLATRY similar to that which had prevailed in the northern kingdom under AHAB and JEZEBEL. Altars to BAAL were erected, and Asherim were built (see ASHERAH). MOLECH, the Ammonite deity, was acknowledged by the sacrificing of children in the Valley of HINNOM near Jerusalem. Worship of stars and planets was instituted. Official approval was given to ASTROLOGY, DIVINATION, and occultism. The TEMPLE itself was desecrated with graven images of Asherah, the wife of Baal. God was openly defiled at altars in the court of the temple, where the host of heaven was worshiped (cf. Jer. 19:13).

Innocent blood was shed under the rule of Manasseh. It is likely many prophets and pious leaders who raised their voices in protest were silenced by death (2 Ki. 21:16). The tradition that charges Manasseh with the martyrdom of ISAIAH may be correct, since this prophet is mentioned no more after the death of Hezekiah. If the report of SENNACHERIB'S death is acknowledged in Isa. 37:38, then Isaiah lived at least until 681/80 B.C. With the martyrdom of the righteous God-fearing people, it is quite likely that the copies of the law were neglected and possibly destroyed. The religious feasts and seasons must have been curtailed, and it is doubtful that the law was ever publicly read to the people during the reign of Manasseh.

Politically, ASSYRIA extended its domination of the FERTILE CRESCENT and reached its pinnacle of wealth and prestige under ESARHADDON (681–668 B.C.) and ASHURBANIPAL (668–633). Esarhaddon rebuilt the city of BABYLON (which his father had destroyed in 689), resubjugated TYRE in 678, occupied MEMPHIS in 673, and captured TIRHAKAH. Among the twenty-two kings he brought from the HITTITE country on a compulsory visit to NINEVEH in 678, Esarhaddon lists Manasseh. By the year 663 the city of THEBES was sacked by the Assyrians, but the little kingdom of Judah continued without destruction under the shadows of the Assyrian advance. It may have been that Manasseh subsequently involved Judah in the rebellion of the Moabites and Edomites against Assyria. Afterwards he was taken as a prisoner to Babylon (2 Chr. 33:10–13) and then released after his repentance. During the last half of the 7th cent., Assyria was weakened by rebellions throughout the kingdom, especially in Babylon. After the death of Ashurbanipal in 633, the kingdom declined rapidly and terminated with the destruction of Nineveh by the coalition of the Medes under Cyaxares and the Babylonians under Nabopolassar in 612.

In the course of these developments throughout the Fertile Crescent, the little kingdom of Judah had three decades of relative freedom, c. 640–610 B.C. When Manasseh died in 642, he was succeeded by AMON, who was slain by his servants after a two-year reign. This left the throne to eight-year-old JOSIAH. As the young king grew to manhood and assumed leadership, he had the opportunity to develop religious and political policies without interference from the surrounding nations, especially Assyria, which had exerted a continual influence upon Judah for over a century.

Josiah reacted against the apostate conditions that had prevailed under his predecessors. At the age of sixteen, or about 632 B.C., he began to seek after God, turning away from the idolatry that surrounded him. In 621, while the temple was being repaired, the "Book of the Law" was found. Greatly concerned, Josiah sponsored an observance of the PASSOVER that was unsurpassed in the history of Judah. Drastic measures were taken to rid the land of idolatry. Pagan practices were abolished, Asherim were demolished, chambers of cult PROSTITUTION were renovated, horses dedicated to the sun and chariots in the temple entrance were destroyed by fire. Manasseh's altars were destroyed and high places remaining from the Solomonic times were demolished and desecrated with dead men's bones. Priests appointed by former kings but committed to idolatry were removed from office. This terminated the burning of incense to Baal, the sun, moon, and stars. Josiah, however, made material provision for the support of these men who could no longer serve as priests.

The political leaders associated with Josiah may have had aspirations of gaining control of the area that formerly constituted the northern kingdom to re-establish the Solomonic kingdom boundaries. How far these hopes were realized is not delineated in the scriptural accounts, but the religious reformation did extend into the northern tribes. People from numerous cities responded to invitations extended by Josiah and joined in the festivities in Jerusalem as well as the reformation program throughout the land.

The era of religious and political optimism was suddenly terminated in 609 B.C. when Josiah was fatally wounded in his attempt to stop Neco of Egypt at MEGIDDO. After three months, Neco returned from his military expedition to the EUPHRATES, where he temporarily stopped the Babylonians and took JEHOAHAZ captive, enthroning JEHOIAKIM in Jerusalem as king of Judah. Since Josiah as king had prompted the religious reformation, it is likely that many leaders in Judah supported him primarily for the sake of expediency. Under Jehoiakim, the God-fearing people and prophets such as Jeremiah faced opposition repeatedly and even martyrdom.

Politically, the fortunes of Judah waned rapidly. In 605 B.C. the Babylonians defeated the Egyptians at CARCHEMISH so that they withdrew to the borders of Egypt. Babylonian domination of Palestine included Judah so that in 605 Jehoiakim yielded tribute and royal hostages (among whom was DANIEL) to NEBUCHADNEZZAR. In 601 the Babylonian advance was temporarily stopped on the borders of Egypt, which may have encouraged Jehoiakim to resist the Babylonians in 598. Before the latter came to Jerusalem, Jehoiakim likely was killed and was succeeded on the throne by his son JEHOIACHIN, who ruled only three months. The Babylonian armies arrived in Jerusalem by the spring of 597, taking the king with at least 10,000 captives to Babylonian exile. ZEDEKIAH, another son of Josiah, was left to rule in Jerusalem, but his rebellion ultimately resulted in the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in 586. This event represented the most extensive and severe judgment upon the nation of Israel in OT times. With the people in exile, the Israelites were regarded as a byword among the nations from the human perspective.

II. Biography of Jeremiah. Jeremiah was born into the priestly family of HILKIAH, from ANA-THOTH (this Hilkiah is not to be confused with the high priest in Jerusalem associated with the discovery of the law in the temple, 2 Ki. 22:4–11). The city of Anathoth, though near Jerusalem, was within the borders of the tribe of BENJAMIN and assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:18). ABIA-THAR, who served as priest under DAVID, resided in Anathoth (1 Ki. 2:26). It is quite reasonable to conclude that Jeremiah was from the Abiathar lineage of priests and not from the Zadokite line that had been instituted under Solomon in Jerusalem (see ZADOK). The birth of Jeremiah (c. 650 B.C.) would have been overshadowed by the birth of Josiah in the royal family. Living only about 2.5 mi. from Jerusalem, Jeremiah may have followed with keen interest the coronation and reign of Josiah, who grew to young manhood about the same time.

A. During Josiah's reign. Jeremiah was called to the prophetic ministry in 627 B.C. (Jer. 1:1–2) when he was probably in his early twenties. Although the account of his call is brief, Jeremiah was divinely informed that he had been created, sanctified, and ordained to be a prophet (1:4–10). His ministry was not to be limited to his own people, but he was commissioned to be a prophet to the nations. Explicit was God's message to Jeremiah that he was to be a spokesman who would convey God's message. In addition to being specifically created and equipped as God's messenger, Jeremiah was also assured of divine deliverance.

As a representative of God, Jeremiah was assured that he would not lose face. The fulfillment of his message was as certain as the annual budding of the almond tree that was the harbinger of spring in Palestine. That this message contained divine judgment upon Jerusalem and that the invader of Judah would come from the N was also explicitly made plain to Jeremiah in his call (Jer. 1:11–19). During the first eighteen years of Jeremiah's ministry, when Josiah was providing leadership in religious reformation, it may not have seemed reasonable to Jeremiah that Jerusalem and the temple would actually be destroyed. Furthermore, the Assyrian power, which for over a century had dominated the Fertile Crescent, had been declining since 633 B.C. and capitulated with the fall of Nineveh in 612.

In his call to service Jeremiah was also prepared for the fact that he would need to withstand much opposition. He was warned that the kings of Judah, the princes, the priests, and the common people would be against him as the Lord's messenger. Not only was he promised divine protection, but he was assured that God would make him like a fortified city to stand successfully against them. This divine assurance must have taken on realistic significance during the period from 609 to 586 B.C., when he was subjected to persecution and suffering as others were martyred or exiled.

The relationship between Jeremiah and King Josiah is almost passed over in silence in the scriptural accounts. The only mention of Jeremiah in the accounts of the books of Kings and Chronicles is the fact that Jeremiah lamented the death of Josiah (2 Chr. 35:25). In the book of Jeremiah, the only direct references to Josiah are in Jer. 1:2, where Jeremiah dates his call in Josiah's thirteenth year; in 3:6, where he indicates that he was speaking in the days of Josiah; and in 25:1–3, where he points out that in the fourth year of Jehoiakim he had been active for twenty-three years, having begun his ministry in the days of Josiah.

Since Jeremiah and Josiah were both Godfearing men and genuinely concerned with the reformation of idolatrous Judah, it is generally recognized that these two leaders must have worked in close harmony. The major part of Jer. 1 – 18 is usually regarded as representing the preaching of Jeremiah during the reign of Josiah. Having the favor of the king, it was possible for Jeremiah to delineate the sins and the apostasy of the people without being molested. Illustrative of this probability is the “temple speech” (ch. 7). Although there are many similarities between chs. 7 and 26, the former likely was given during Josiah’s reign when no one dared to oppose the prophet openly. The latter is definitely dated during Jehoiakim’s reign when the people and religious leaders were keenly aware of the fact that the king supported them in their opposition to Jeremiah.

Jeremiah’s preaching undoubtedly aided Josiah in his reform program. Under the leadership of this young king, optimism may have prevailed politically as well as religiously. Nationally and internationally, conditions seemed to be favorable, so that both Josiah and Jeremiah may have enjoyed popular support with a minimum of opposition to their efforts. The fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C. may have intensified the hopes for the kingdom of Judah.

B. Under Jehoiakim’s rule. For Jeremiah, the sudden and unexpected death of Josiah in 609 B.C. must have been one of the crucial periods in his entire ministry. Jeremiah lamented the king’s death. The tenuous three months’ reign of Jehoahaz ended with his captivity in Egypt. Jehoiakim, enthroned by King Neco of Egypt, was not favorably disposed toward Jeremiah nor his message. After this crisis, the disintegration of the kingdom of Judah took its course as the political and religious optimism faded away, leading to the termination of the kingdom of Judah and the destruction of Jerusalem in 586.

Not too long after Josiah’s death, Jeremiah may have delivered his message against the wicked leadership exhibited by the kings of Judah (Jer. 22–23). He specifically admonished the people not to weep for the “dead one,” which may be a reference to Josiah. He also predicted that Jehoahaz would not return from Egyptian exile but would die in Egypt. Boldly he denounced the wickedness and injustice prevailing under Jehoiakim. The latter would be given the burial of a donkey and the people would not lament his death. Jehoiachin, heir to the Davidic throne, would be taken into Babylonian exile without royal succession in the kingdom of Judah.

Numerous experiences of Jeremiah that occurred are identified in his book. In the beginning of his reign when he delivered the “temple speech,” the public opposition led by the priests and prophets developed to the point of threatening Jeremiah’s life. Through the influence of Ahikam and some of the elders, Jeremiah’s life was saved. Their defense brief for the prophet was the historic precedent in the days of Hezekiah, when Micah also had announced the destruction of Jerusalem but was not executed by the king. The attitude of Jehoiakim and the military leaders was apparent in the execution of the prophet Uriah, who proclaimed the same message of judgment that was given by Jeremiah. Under the godless rule of Jehoiakim it became increasingly difficult for Jeremiah to continue an effective ministry. In all likelihood, many of the religious leaders who had before cooperated with Josiah for the sake of expediency openly took issue with Jeremiah and influenced the populace to ignore God’s message of warning and reverted to idolatry.

The fourth year of Jehoiakim was a crucial and eventful year in the ministry of Jeremiah. This was the year in which Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians in the Battle of Carchemish in June of 605. By September, Nebuchadnezzar was enthroned as the king of Babylonia. During these crucial months the Babylonians exacted royal hostages from Jerusalem as a token of Jehoiakim’s subservience to Nebuchadnezzar. During this fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah reminded the citizens and leaders of Israel that he had warned them for twenty-three years. Since they had not responded to God's message, the kingdom of Judah as well as the surrounding nations would be devastated by the Babylonians (Jer. 25:1–38). The enemy from the N (1:14) was now identified as Nebuchadnezzar, who was God's servant to bring judgment upon God's chosen people in Jerusalem. This cup of God's fury was for Judah and all the nations mentioned in Jeremiah's message. The fourth year marked the beginning of the end for the kingdom of Judah. The captivity, according to Jeremiah's prediction, would last seventy years. This warning and prediction, given during the year that the Judean trek into Babylonian exile began, offered little hope for the immediate future, but with it came the assurance that there would be a restoration after seventy years.

During this crucial year Jeremiah was also instructed to provide a written record of his messages. The purpose was to make available a copy for the people to read, with the hope that the citizens of Judah would be informed about God's plan and given the opportunity to repent. BARUCH served as Jeremiah's secretary (Jer. 36:1–8), and then was instructed to read these messages to the people who were assembled in the temple for the annual day of fasting.

During the fifth year of Jehoiakim, when Baruch was reading publicly from Jeremiah's scroll, some of the political leaders who heard Jeremiah's message advised Baruch and Jeremiah to hide while they made known to the king the content of the message (Jer. 36:9–19). King Jehoiakim called for the scroll, listened to the contents, and then supervised the burning of the scroll, page after page in spite of the pleas of some of his associates and servants. Jehoiakim not only ignored the solemn message of warning by the prophet but ordered the arrest of Jeremiah and Baruch, who fortunately could not be located at that particular time (36:20–26).

Once more Jeremiah was divinely commissioned to replace the scroll that the king had destroyed. Among the additional messages of Jeremiah was the specific prediction that Babylonian occupation was certain and that Jehoiakim's body would be exposed to the heat by day and the frost by night (Jer. 36:27–32). The reference to frost indicated the time of year when the king's death would occur. War conditions would be such that this king, who had defied God's message by burning the prophet's scroll, would not be given a royal burial. Little seems to be known about the remaining years of Jeremiah's ministry under Jehoiakim.

C. During Zedekiah's reign. Jeremiah apparently was less restricted in his ministry after the second Babylonian captivity, 597 B.C. Jehoiakim's policy and the Babylonian advance had resulted in Jehoiakim's death in 598. When Jehoiachin (after a three-month reign) and 10,000 Jews were exiled, Jeremiah remained in Jerusalem and continued his ministry to the poorer class of people, who were left under the rule of Zedekiah.

Soon after this deportation, Jeremiah proclaimed a message concerning good and bad figs (Jer. 24:1–10). The interpretation was plain. The good figs depicted the people in exile and the bad figs represented those who remained in Jerusalem. Consequently they would also be taken into exile in due time. Jeremiah's prophecy against ELAM is also dated at this time. To the exiles in Babylon, Jeremiah wrote letters advising them to be submissive, and warned them not to listen to the false prophets who predicted a speedy return to Jerusalem (29:1–23). After Shemaiah in Babylon sent instructions back to Jerusalem to have Jeremiah placed in stocks for writing to the exiles, Jeremiah announced God’s judgment upon Shemaiah (29:24–32).

In the year 593 Jeremiah addressed a group of ambassadors from surrounding nations who were gathered in Jerusalem. He urged them to be submissive to Babylon, illustrating the power of this nation by placing a wooden yoke about his own neck (Jer. 27:1–22). When HANANIAH, a prophet from GIBEON, publicly broke Jeremiah’s yoke and announced that within two years the exiles would return, Jeremiah predicted Hananiah’s death within one year (28:1–17). Hananiah died before the year ended.

In spite of Jeremiah’s continual advice of submission to Babylon, Zedekiah concurred with the pro-Egyptian leaders in rebelling against the Babylonians (Jer. 34:1–7). By 15 January 588, the latter began a siege of the city of Jerusalem. As Nebuchadnezzar was advancing toward Jerusalem, Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah for advice, hoping a miraculous deliverance might be in the offing (21:1–14). Jeremiah once more pointedly predicted defeat and death, with unconditional surrender as the only way of escape.

During the serious conditions of the siege, Zedekiah secured the cooperation of the people to make a covenant to emancipate the slaves (Jer. 34:8–11). When the siege was temporarily lifted, this covenant was revoked and the servants were enslaved again (34:12–22). While the siege was temporarily lifted, Jeremiah was arrested, beaten, and imprisoned (37:11–21). Zedekiah, however, called for Jeremiah and secretly inquired about God’s message. In response to Jeremiah’s warning and appeal, Zedekiah did not return the prophet to the prison but assigned him to the court of the guard, with an allowance of bread as long as the supply in Jerusalem lasted. While held in the court of the guard, Jeremiah received an option on the purchase of Hanameel’s field in Anathoth. Divinely instructed, Jeremiah secured this piece of property, and with this transaction proclaimed the message that after the Babylonian EXILE the Israelites would be gathered to their own land (32:1–44).

As conditions became more severe, some of the leaders accused Jeremiah of treason and secured the consent of Zedekiah to put Jeremiah into the cistern in the court of the guard. Abandoned and sinking in the mire, Jeremiah was rescued by EBED-MELECH, an Ethiopian EUNUCH (Jer. 38:1–13), and returned to the court of the guard. For this Ebed-Melech was promised safety through the period of Jerusalem’s siege and destruction (39:15–18). Zedekiah had one final consultation with Jeremiah (38:14–28). On 18 July 586, Zedekiah escaped as far as Jericho, but there was overtaken by the Babylonians and exiled as Jeremiah had predicted (39:1–10).

D. Last days in Egypt. Jeremiah lived through the destruction of Jerusalem, which began on 14 August 586 B.C. (2 Ki. 25:8; Jer. 52:12). Jeremiah was courteously treated by the Babylonians and entrusted for safety to GEDALIAH, who was appointed as ruler over those who were not taken into exile (39:11–14). About two months later Gedaliah was killed. Shortly after that, Jeremiah was taken by the remnant down to Egypt, even though he patiently advised them to remain in Palestine (42:1—43:7). At TAHAPANHES, Jeremiah warned his people in a symbolic message that God would send Nebuchadnezzar into Egypt to execute judgment (43:8–13). In ch. 44, Jeremiah reminded the people that Jerusalem was in ruins and that God’s judgment had come upon them because they had ignored the messages of warning delivered through the prophets.

Judah had become a curse and a taunt among the nations because she had provoked God to anger. The people however were not moved by Jeremiah’s message and warning even in Egypt after they had seen all these developments take place. They claimed that this evil had come upon them because they ceased to worship the QUEEN OF HEAVEN. Very likely Jeremiah died in Egypt among a people who still were not willing to repent.

III. Authorship and text. Although more is known about Jeremiah and the circumstances concerning the writing of the book bearing his name than about the other books of the OT, numerous questions about its composition remain. It was in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, 605 B.C., that Jeremiah was specifically instructed to commit his messages to writing (Jer. 36:1–8). Baruch was engaged as the prophet’s scribe to record that which pertained to Jeremiah’s ministry, which had begun in 627. This scroll was burned by King Jehoiakim the next year.

Once more Jeremiah was instructed to write down what had been consumed in the fire. Again it was Baruch who served as scribe. How much was included in the “many similar words” that were added (Jer. 36:32) is difficult to ascertain. Significant also is the fact that in the year 605 Baruch was assured by Jeremiah that his life would be preserved through the perilous years that awaited Judah and Jerusalem as predicted in the prophet’s message, which was committed to writing (45:1–5).

The MT and the SEPTUAGINT texts of the book of Jeremiah vary in length and arrangement. The latter is about one-eighth, or approximately 2,700 words, shorter than the MT. Among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS there are some fragments that attest a shorter Hebrew text; some such form may lie behind the Greek version (cf. K. H. Jobes and M. Silva, Invitation to the Septuagint [2000], 173–77). Some other fragments among these scrolls, however, reflect the longer Hebrew text.

The order of the material in the SEPTUAGINT differs from the Hebrew (and English), as follows:

LXX	MT
1:1 to 25:12	1:1 to 25:12

25:14–20	49:34–39
26:1–28	ch.46
ch.27	ch.50
ch.28	ch.51
ch.29	ch.47
ch.30	ch.49
ch.31	ch.48
chs.32–51	25:13 to 45:5

Two variations are apparent in this rearrangement. The prophecies concerning foreign nations given in Jer. 46–51 are inserted in the Greek text beginning with 25:14. The order within this series of messages has also been changed. In addition to the differences noted above is the fact that in the Greek text some verses in whole or part are omitted, as well as some longer passages (e.g., 33:14–26; 39:4–13; 51:44b–49a; 52:27b–30. Although some of these minor omissions can be explained as errors in transmission, it is apparent that the LXX reflects a variant edition from the MT.

That Baruch was primarily responsible for writing (recording) Jeremiah’s messages is clearly evident in the book itself. After the burning of the first scroll by Jehoiakim in 604, a second edition was again prepared by Baruch. During the next two decades or more that remained of Jeremiah’s ministry, Baruch undoubtedly added more messages and recorded the events associated with his master in Jerusalem as well as later in Egypt. One possible explanation of the variance in the two texts is that the MT represents the final edition of this book by Baruch after Jeremiah’s death. In this would be reflected Baruch’s arrangement and additions. The shorter text—which was subsequently preserved in the Greek version—may have been an earlier form that Baruch later rearranged and edited (cf. Archer, Eissfeldt, and Young).

A number of rationalistic scholars deny considerable portions of the book of Jeremiah both to the prophet himself and to Baruch. Beyond that, some consider the present text to reflect numerous editorial additions subsequent to Jeremian times. The ascription of Jer. 10:1–16 to “Deutero-Isaiah,” warning the exilic Jews against idolatry, is based on the theory that denies the unity of the book of ISAIAH. The viewpoint that Jer. 17:19–27 is dependent upon the Sabbath-keeping passages in EZEKIEL, or the priestly code, is based on the theory that document P (see PENTATEUCH) is postexilic. Moreover, chs. 30–31 are assigned to the postexilic era on the assumption of an evolutionary hypothesis concerning the development of the messianic hope, in contrast to the view that such messages were given to the prophets through divine revelation.

Since positive evidence is lacking to the contrary, it is reasonable to ascribe to Baruch the entire book in its written form. Intimately associated with Jeremiah, he faithfully recorded the messages and the events as long as the prophet lived, and then may have completed and arranged the final edition subsequent to Jeremiah’s death.

IV. Archaeological light on Jeremiah. The LACHISH letters provided interesting aspects concerning the book of Jeremiah from historical and linguistic perspectives. At the 22-acre site of the ancient city of Lachish (Tell ed-Duweir), located in a strategic valley 25 mi. SW of Jerusalem, an excavation was conducted by J. K. Starkey (1932–38). In a guard room of the outer western gate were found twenty-one letters written on broken pieces of pottery. These OSTRACA date from the year 588 B.C. (cf. ANET, 321–22).

Historically, the Lachish letters reflect the wartime conditions that prevailed during these years. Lachish and AZEKAH were the last two cities to be conquered by the Babylonians before the fall of Jerusalem (Jer. 34:7). These letters were written by a military captain named Hoshai to his superior, Joash, at Lachish. Although a reference in these letters to “the prophet” may be ambiguous, and other matters may be difficult to interpret, it is quite apparent that they were written during the siege of Lachish, which fell to the Babylonians in 587. Linguistically, these ostraca, written with carbon ink in the ancient Hebrew script, are even more important. A marked similarity between them and the book of Jeremiah in the area of grammar and style seems to confirm the dating of these letters in the beginning of the 6th cent.

The Babylonian Chronicle provides more extensive information concerning numerous references in Jeremiah's book. In the year 606, Nebuchadnezzar as crown prince commanded the Babylonian army in Assyria, and the following year he defeated Neco II of Egypt at Carchemish and Hamath (cf. Jer. 46:2; 2 Ki. 23:29; 2 Chr. 35:20). He advanced to take the whole land of Hatti, namely Syria and Palestine, and exacted hostages from Jehoiakim, king of Judah. When news reached him about his father's death, Nebuchadnezzar rushed across the desert to be enthroned as king of Babylon on 6 September 605. For three years Jehoiakim remained a vassal of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. 25:1), but in 601, when the Egyptians defeated the Babylonians, he transferred his loyalty to the former despite the warnings of Jeremiah (27:9–11). In 599/98, Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Arab tribes of KEDAR and the region E of Jordan as Jeremiah had predicted (49:28–33). When he reached Jerusalem, Jehoiakim had already been killed and was succeeded by Jehoiachin. Jerusalem yielded to the Babylonians not only her king but also 10,000 captives. In 596, Nebuchadnezzar fought against Elam (49:34).

In 587, the Babylonians used RIBLAH as their base of operation to direct another campaign against Jerusalem when Zedekiah rebelled. The siege of Jerusalem was temporarily interrupted when Apries, who succeeded Neco II as king of Egypt, invaded Gaza and Phoenicia (Jer. 47:1). Subsequent to the fall of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar ordered another deportation of Jews to Babylon (52:30) in 582, which was the twenty-third year of his reign.

VI. The message and ministry of Jeremiah

A. *The prophet and his people (Jer. 1:1—18:23). To read the messages and experiences of Jeremiah is to get acquainted with this great prophet. He revealed more of his inner feelings and personal reactions toward God and people than did any other prophet in OT times. His deep involvement with his own nation was intensified by the imminence of the terrible judgment of God that was awaiting Jerusalem within his own lifetime. His theology and character emerged in his preaching.

The messages of Jeremiah reflect the response and reaction that the people had toward him and his message. Although he seldom recorded what the people said to him, his message can often be regarded as his part in the dialogue, leaving the reader to fill in the counterpart by the participants. Jeremiah's messages were timely and directly related to the prevailing conditions in the political, social, and religious life of the people. Since the reproof, warnings, and admonitions of Jeremiah were so pointed and incisive, the response often was very intense—at times reaching the stage of violence as conditions permitted.

The content of Jer. 1–18 may well be the summary of his messages and activities during the reign of Josiah. When the book is considered as a whole, it is apparent that the events and messages are not in chronological order (esp. evident beginning with ch. 20). Consequently there may be some passages even in the first eighteen chapters that should possibly be dated later. Since there is no indication of violent opposition erupting in these chapters, it seems probable that they represent the period during Josiah's reign when Jeremiah likely enjoyed the favor of the ruling king. Although there were threats made to Jeremiah's life by the men of Ana-thoth, it is quite apparent that there was no open or public interference with the prophet's ministry as long as Josiah lived.

Portraying the sinful conditions existing in Judah, Jeremiah pointed out the basic problem—their love and devotion toward God was lacking (Jer. 2:1—3:5). Positively, they had forsaken God, who had redeemed them from Egyptian bondage and entrusted them with the blessings of Canaan. They had ignored the instructions, given them by Moses in Deuteronomy, of exemplifying in their daily lives a wholehearted love for God. Negatively they had turned to idolatry and consequently they were guilty of harlotry. Fear, reverence, respect, and love for God were missing.

Pointing to history, Jeremiah warned his people that the northern kingdom had been taken into captivity because the people had turned to idolatry and were guilty of religious harlotry. God's judgment upon Judah was near at hand. Because they had forsaken God, they would be abandoned by God to exilic conditions to serve strangers in a foreign land. Priests and prophets had practiced deceit and the people had followed their examples. Because of their evil actions calamity would befall them. Like refuse silver, God had rejected them, and time for judgment had come (3:6—6:30).

Jeremiah became explicit in pointing out the social evils and injustice that prevailed, as well as the fact that the temple would be destroyed. The people oppressed the widows, orphans, and strangers, and simultaneously assumed that God's presence was continuing among them in the temple. They evidently reasoned from the correct theological basis that God is powerful enough to save the temple, but were wrong in their assumption that God's presence was limited to the building in Jerusalem. By their sins of murder, adultery, burning incense to Baal, and other idolatrous practices, they had made the temple into a den of robbers. Consequently Jerusalem and the temple would be razed to the ground. Jeremiah warned them that the ruins of SHILOH served as an example of what would happen to Jerusalem (7:1–15).

Jeremiah was warned not to pray for his people who worshiped other gods on the streets of Jerusalem and throughout the cities of Judah. Repeatedly they ignored the prophets. The people assumed that they were wise but at the same time disregarded God's written revelation as given in the law. Prophets and priests alike misinterpreted God's message. Consequently, God's judgment was coming upon them like serpents from whose sting they would not be able to escape (7:16—8:17).

This message so gripped Jeremiah that he was moved to deep compassion for his people (8:18—9:26). Conscious of the fact that it was too late to avert this terrible judgment upon them, Jeremiah was moved to tears. He pondered the rationale for God's judgment. Jeremiah recognized that punishment was due because they had forsaken the law of God and had been disobedient. The time was coming when they would lament greatly because of the devastation, destruction, death, and exile that was imminent. Consequently his ultimate perspective was that man's confidence in his own wisdom, might, and riches were all futile. Ultimate value rests in the knowledge that God is the one who exercises loving-kindness, justice, and righteousness in the earth. Israel was uncircumcised in heart—therefore divine judgment overtook them.

When Jeremiah warned his people not to conform to the pattern of behavior of the heathen nations (Jer. 10:1–5), he pondered the question of who God is. He pointed out that God is the everlasting King who created all things in nature. This God who is the Lord of hosts is the God of Israel. Since Israel had not sought after God, they were to be scattered. Even though Jeremiah knew this, he still appealed to God to save them (10:6–25). Once more God's message comes through explicitly clear. Israel is God's covenant people, but they have broken the COVENANT (11:1–13). Jeremiah was commanded not to pray for them. They had no right to be in God's house because of their wickedness (11:14–17).

When suffering and threats came to Jeremiah personally, his concern for himself emerged in self-pity. The men of Anathoth, his home town, plotted to kill him if he did not stop prophesying in the name of God. Learning of this plot, Jeremiah's reaction was expressed in his imprecatory prayer in which he requested divine vengeance upon his enemies (Jer. 11:18—12:4). Although he was assured that these enemies would be subjected to the exile without a remnant of them remaining, he was troubled by the apparent prosperity of the wicked. For this, however, God's servant was rebuked. Even though he was mistreated by his relatives, he was not to be enticed by them. God had forsaken his people and was abandoning them to the exile. In the near future the entire land would be desolate, but ultimately God would have compassion on them (12:5–17).

Dramatically Jeremiah portrayed the reality of the exile (Jer. 13:1–27). In obedience to a divine command, Jeremiah purchased a linen waistcloth and deposited it in the cleft of a rock near the Euphrates (NIV, "Perath"). Later he recovered it, but in the meantime it was ruined. The application was cogently plain: what had happened to the garment would also occur concerning the pride of Judah in Babylonian captivity, because of their stubborn attitude and their refusal to obey God. Likewise, the leaders of Judah—kings, priests, and prophets—were filled with drunkenness and could end up like jars filled with wine that break when dashed one against another. The pride of Judah resulted in the downfall of the nation. Because of this haughty attitude, God allotted to them the humiliation of destruction and exile.

When a drought brought suffering to the people because of their erring ways, Jeremiah once more was commanded not to pray or intercede for his fellow citizens (Jer. 14:1–22). Moved with compassion for them, Jeremiah appealed to God again, pointing out that the false prophets and priests had misled the people. At this point Jeremiah raised the question as to whether or not God had utterly rejected his people. In his prayer the prophet reasoned that God should do something for the sake of God's name and glory.

God's answer was sobering indeed (Jer. 15:1–21). Even if Moses and Samuel would intercede, God would not avert the fourfold judgment awaiting them. The sword and exile were divinely fixed upon them because of their sin, but with it came the assurance of restoration for some. Once more Jeremiah reflected on the fact that he as God's messenger, proclaiming such an unpopular message, was cursed and persecuted by his people. Faithful in his service, he did not participate in the festivities of his people but suffered reproach for God's sake. In this state of despondency Jeremiah was divinely assured that God would sustain him successfully against the opposition of the people. He would be delivered out of the hands of the wicked and the grip of the tyrants.

The nearness of the national doom of Judah was also realistically conveyed through word and deed in Jeremiah's ministry. As God's representative at that particular time, he was forbidden to marry, nor was he to participate in any normal festivities or pleasure. His celibacy was to signify to the people that Jerusalem would be destroyed during his lifetime. Consequently, if he married and in the course of time had a family, Jeremiah's children would be taken into captivity (Jer. 16:1–21).

The gravity of Israel's sin is vividly projected in Jer. 17:1—18:17. The nation's sins were engraved on the horns of the altar where the people came to bring their sacrifices to God. These sins were inscribed with the point of a diamond so that they could not be erased. It was their sinfulness that precipitated God's judgment. God's curse rested upon them because they had put their trust in man rather than God. By contrast, however, was the promise of God's blessing upon the one who placed his trust and confidence in God. Such a person would prosper. Externally, the observance of the SABBATH was a sign of acknowledging God, whereas those who broke the Sabbath reflected their disregard for God. In the potter's house, Jeremiah learned the lesson that when the clay was not pliable it had to be remolded. In a similar manner the people of Judah would have to go through the remolding process in captivity.

Keenly conscious of the sneering attitude his people had toward him because of this message of God's judgment upon them, Jeremiah reminded God again of the fact that their enemies had dug a pit for his life. He prayed that God would not forgive their sin but subject them to his wrath (Jer. 18:18–23). It is significant, however, that Jeremiah did not assume responsibility for bringing judgment upon his enemies, but appealed to God to deal with them.

B. The prophet and the leaders (Jer. 19:1—29:32). Repeatedly Jeremiah came face to face with the religious and political leaders of Judah. For better or for worse, Jeremiah faithfully confronted them with the message God had given to him. Some heeded his warning whereas others responded with persecution and hatred.

Leading some of the elders southward out of Jerusalem into the Valley of Ben HINNOM, Jeremiah broke the potter's vessel before them. This signified the destruction of Jerusalem that was precipitated by their gross idolatry (Jer. 19:1–15). Returning to the temple to proclaim this same message, Jeremiah was subjected to a whipping by PASHHUR and then confined to the prison for one night. Released the next morning, Jeremiah pointedly rebuked Pashhur. In the wake of this experience, Jeremiah sank into another slough of despondency and cursed the day he was born. He was keenly sensitive to the fact that God had called him, and that God's word within him was like a burning fire that he could not contain without sharing it with others (20:1–18).

Zedekiah's interest in the prophet's advice at the time Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem (c. 588 B.C.), is significantly reported in Jer. 21. This must have been years or even decades after the personal experience of Jeremiah recorded in the previous chapter. It has been suggested that the sequence in the text is to assure the reader that Jeremiah did not despair when he cursed the day of his birth, but was still active when Jerusalem was about to fall to the Babylonians. Zedekiah probably hoped for a word of encouragement, but Jeremiah warned the king that Jewish resistance was futile. God was about to deliver the king as well as the people into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar.

Jeremiah's denunciation of the kings succeeding Josiah is explicit and direct (Jer. 22:1–30). Speaking during Jehoiakim's reign (c. 609–598 B.C.), he admonished the king that it was his responsibility as ruler on the throne of David to execute justice and to rule righteously. Jehoiakim was warned, however, that since he had forsaken the Lord in his responsibilities, he would die, and would not be accorded the honor of a decent burial. Shallum, also known as Jehoahaz, would not be restored to the throne but would die in Egypt. Coniah, also known as Jehoiachin, would be exiled to Babylon and not be succeeded by a son as ruler.

Jeremiah's denunciation of the false shepherds (Jer. 23) is not dated, but may have been given during the reign of Zedekiah. The people had been deceived and misled by the prophets who were not true representatives of God. The prophets of Samaria prophesied in the name of Baal, and the prophets in Jerusalem were guilty of adultery and evil devices. Consequently, God was against these prophets: they therefore would be driven out of Jerusalem. In contrast to this denunciation, Jeremiah offers a message of hope. The Lord, the God of Israel, will gather the remnant of his people from all lands. These people shall be secure and safe under a ruler seated on the throne of David who will be identified as "The LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS" (23:6).

After Jehoiachin was exiled to Babylon in 597 B.C., Jeremiah had a vision of two baskets of figs, which provided the basis for a very timely message (Jer. 24:1–10). The good figs represented the exiled people from whom a remnant would return according to the divine promise. The bad figs symbolized the people who were still left in Jerusalem. Zedekiah and his people would be subjected to the curse of the sword, famine, and pestilence until they would be completely dispersed from the promised land.

Among the messages of Jeremiah that were given in the crucial fourth year of Jehoiakim (605 B.C.) was the explicit word that the Babylonian captivity would last seventy years (Jer. 25:1–38). The prophet's warning was not only to Judah but also to all the surrounding nations and city-states. Babylon was compared to God's "cup filled with the wine of my wrath" (v. 15). All the nations Jeremiah listed—Judah, Egypt, Philistine cities, Moab, Edom, Tyre, and others—were to be subjected to Babylon. The seventy years allotted to the Jews has received two basic interpretations. Since this message was given in the year 605, when the Babylonians initially invaded Judah, some have regarded the return of ZERUBBABEL and Joshua (JESHUA) in 538–536 as the termination of this seventy-year period. Others consider 586 as the terminus a quo, and the dedication of the rebuilt temple in 516 as the terminus ad quem. Support for the latter is based on Zech. 1:12, which is dated in 519. If this verse is correctly interpreted as saying that the seventy-year period is still unexpired, then it would seem logical that the resumption of sacrifice in the rebuilt temple would be considered the terminal point.

The drastic political and religious changes in Jerusalem after Jehoiakim became king are realistically apparent in Jeremiah's experience (Jer. 26). Publicly preaching that the temple would be destroyed, Jeremiah no longer had the protection or favor of the king that he had formerly enjoyed under Josiah (cf. ch. 7). The priests and prophets led the people in seeking the execution of Jeremiah. Fortunately some of the elders supported by Ahikam saved Jeremiah's life, appealing to the historic precedent set by Hezekiah, who did not execute Micah for preaching a similar message of judgment concerning Jerusalem.

After the second captivity of the Jews in 597 B.C., Jeremiah vividly portrayed the reality of Babylonian servitude by publicly wearing a yoke around his neck (Jer. 27:1—28:17). Jeremiah warned his people not to listen to the false prophets who predicted that the temple vessels the Babylonians had taken would soon be returned. One of these prophets, named Hananiah, took the yoke of Jeremiah and broke it in pieces, predicting that in a similar manner the Jews would break the yoke of Babylonian bondage within two years. Although Jeremiah withdrew and “went on his way” at that time (28:11), he returned, subsequently predicting that Hananiah would die that year. Hananiah died that same year, but there is no indication in this account that the people were any more favorably inclined to believe Jeremiah after this public confirmation of his prophetic ministry.

Jeremiah continued to maintain contact with his people even after they were taken to Babylon. By letters he advised the exiles that they should plant vineyards, build houses, and adjust to the situation since their captivity would last for seventy years. Jeremiah warned that the false prophets, named Ahab and Zedekiah, would be executed by Nebuchadnezzar. He also had a message of rebuke for Shemaiah, who negated God’s word as Jeremiah proclaimed it (Jer. 29:1–32). In this manner Jeremiah tried to counter the false prophets who were active in exile as well as those in Jerusalem. In accordance with the warning in ch. 1, Jeremiah frequently had kings, prophets, priests, and the people against him as he proclaimed the message that God had given him.

C. Restoration prospects (Jer. 30:1—33:26). Jeremiah was so involved in his message of warning that he seldom delineated the prospects of restoration. Ministering on the eve of Israel’s greatest judgment in OT times, Jeremiah dogmatically asserted that the Israelites would again be brought back from exile. His messages in these chapters are more specific concerning the future kingdom of Israel than those of any other prophet in the OT.

God’s purpose in sending this judgment upon Israel was to discipline them through servitude in exile. The day was coming, however, when they would no more serve other nations, but their service would be wholly devoted to God. Divine compassion and love would be manifest in Israel’s restoration. The city of Zion would be rebuilt and the people would rejoice in the fact that Israel had been redeemed. Both Judah and Israel (the latter often identified as Ephraim) would be gathered from the distant parts of the earth where they had been scattered. God who had caused his people to be dispersed would also regather them.

Jeremiah did not minimize the severity of God’s discipline upon Judah and Israel. In this process of uprooting and destroying his people, God watched over them as they were sown with the seed of man and the seed of beasts. God, however, would also watch over them in like manner in building and planting them again. A new covenant was to be made between God and his people (see COVENANT, THE NEW). Unlike the old covenant that they had broken, the new covenant would be written upon their hearts. Teaching about God would be unnecessary since every one would be fully acquainted with God. All their sins would be forgiven. The assurance that Israel would be restored is stated in the strongest language possible. God, who ordained the sun, moon, and stars in their courses and controls the seas and the armies—this God asserts that if the ordinances cease, if the heavens can be measured and the foundations of the earth can be explored, then God will also cast off his people.

During the siege of Jerusalem (586 B.C.), when Jeremiah had been confined to the court of the guard by King Zedekiah, the divine message was again made known that Israel would be restored after the destruction of the city. Jeremiah was given option on a field in Anathoth by the right of inheritance and redemption. Purchasing this real estate, Jeremiah meticulously sealed the purchase deeds so that they would be preserved for a long time. The divine message with this transaction was that in the future, houses, fields, and vineyards would again be bought in the land of Judah. When Jeremiah realized what this prediction involved he was almost overwhelmed. With the Chaldeans besieging Jerusalem and the fall of the kingdom inevitable, due to the persistent disobedience of the people, Jeremiah prayed expressing his doubt about the prospects of restoration but recognized that he had acted and spoken according to divine instructions by purchasing this real estate.

Once more God's message came to the prophet confirming that God was working out his purpose. The Chaldeans would burn the city of Jerusalem because the Jews had aroused God's wrath and anger through their gross idolatry and had even used the temple for their foreign gods. Consequently God abandoned Jerusalem and Judah to the invading Babylonians. However, it was God who also would gather the Israelites out of all the countries where he had scattered them. God would establish an everlasting covenant with them so that they would revere and honor him and not turn again to idolatry. In this land that was occupied by the Babylonians, the real estate business would thrive once more. The fortunes of Israel would be restored.

Jeremiah was still confined to the court of the guard. Another divine message came delineating to Jeremiah the hopes of restoration even more explicitly (Jer. 33:1–26). Because of its wickedness, Jerusalem would be destroyed but God would subsequently cleanse her from her iniquity and pardon her sin. The goodness of God manifested in Israel's restoration was to be an amazement and wonder among all the nations. Desolation and ruin would be replaced by prosperity, so that the Israelites would once more be jubilant and thankful in making their sacrifices to God.

At that time a Branch of Righteousness would be ruling on the Davidic throne executing justice and equity for all. Peace and prosperity was to be so extensive in Jerusalem and Judah that the kingdom would be known as "The LORD Our Righteousness." The fulfillment of this promise of the new covenant was as certain as God's established order of maintaining the ordinances of day and night with regularity. Israel's national fortunes would be restored with an innumerable multitude enjoying the blessings of the Davidic covenant and the ministry of the Levites.

D. Disintegration of the kingdom (Jer. 34:1—39:18). Jeremiah lived through one of the most difficult experiences that any prophet faced in his ministry. Having been active for over eighteen years during the favorable circumstances of the rule of Josiah, Jeremiah endured the discouraging developments under the reigns of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah as the kingdom gradually disintegrated. Although these events are not in chronological order, they provide insight into the conditions that precipitated the terminal judgment upon the kingdom of Judah.

When the Babylonians began the final siege of Jerusalem in 588 B.C., Jeremiah significantly informed Zedekiah that the city would capitulate and that he would be taken into captivity. During this time of pressure Zedekiah made a covenant with the people to release the slaves. Subsequently the siege of Jerusalem was temporarily lifted while the Babylonians pursued the Egyptians. When this dramatic act of releasing the slaves was revoked as soon as the siege was lifted and the famine ended, Jeremiah announced God's judgment upon the covenant breakers. The city of Jerusalem was doomed for burning by the Chaldeans (Jer. 34:1–22).

The godless attitude of the leaders had already been apparent in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer. 35:1—36:32). On one occasion Jeremiah led the Recabites into the temple and offered them wine to drink. They, however, refused to accept this wine to be faithful to an oath that their forefathers had made over two centuries earlier. Jeremiah used this loyalty of the Recabites as an example to warn the Jews. If the Recabites were faithful to a promise made by their ancestors, how much more should the Israelites be to their covenant with God. In spite of the fact that prophet after prophet had been sent to them, they had disobeyed and ignored God and turned to idols. Consequently God's blessing awaited the Recabites, whereas the citizens of Judah would be subjected to the exile.

Jehoiakim's attitude toward Jeremiah was pointedly expressed in his burning of the scroll (Jer. 36:1–32). As king of Judah sitting on the Davidic throne, Jehoiakim failed to recognize that he had stewardship responsibility to obey the law and the messages given by the prophets. Since he was not a God-fearing man, he was alarmed at the divine judgment announced concerning Jerusalem. Demanding that Jeremiah's scroll be read to him, Jehoiakim listened to three or four columns at a time, cut them in pieces and threw them into the brazier fire before him. Subsequent to this, Jeremiah announced that Jehoiakim would not have a successor upon his throne, and that circumstances at the time of his death would be such that his body would be exposed to the frost by night and the heat by day.

The conditions during the siege and fall of Jerusalem did not facilitate the ministry of Jeremiah (Jer. 37:1—39:19). Neither the people nor the king were genuinely interested in listening to Jeremiah's message from God. Zedekiah, however, sent to Jeremiah to request prayer. While the siege was temporarily lifted, Jeremiah warned Zedekiah not to be deceived by this relief. The Chaldeans would soon return to burn the city of Jerusalem.

During this brief period of freedom Jeremiah was arrested, beaten, and imprisoned by the princes. Hearing this, Zedekiah sent for Jeremiah to inquire once more about God's word concerning the siege. Again Jeremiah emphasized that Jerusalem would be conquered. In addition, Jeremiah reminded the king that the false prophets had predicted that the Babylonians would not even come to Jerusalem. Subsequently Zedekiah assured Jeremiah a supply of bread as long as the royal supply lasted and confined him to the court of the guard.

When Jeremiah announced safety for those who surrendered to the Babylonians, and sword, famine, and pestilence for those who resisted, some of the princes exerted pressure on Zedekiah so that they were able to cast Jeremiah into a cistern. Left to sink in the mire, Jeremiah was rescued by an Ethiopian eunuch named Ebed-Melech. After this, Zedekiah requested further counsel from Jeremiah. With the verbal assurance from the king to spare his life, Jeremiah once more spoke to Zedekiah. The alternative was plainly set before him. Surrendering to the Babylonians would preserve his life, whereas rebellion would precipitate the burning of Jerusalem and the capture of the king. Zedekiah, however, was not willing to comply with Jeremiah's advice. Jeremiah remained in the court of the guard until Jerusalem was conquered by the Chaldeans.

When Jerusalem was on the verge of capitulation, Zedekiah and his associates fled as far as Jericho, where they were overtaken by the Babylonians. Taken to Riblah, Zedekiah was sentenced by Nebuchadnezzar. The sons of Zedekiah were killed, after which he was blinded and then taken in chains to Babylon. Jeremiah, in accordance with Nebuchadnezzar's orders, was treated with favor. Ebed-Melech likewise lived through these difficult days, having been previously assured that his life would be spared.

E. Jeremiah's post-Jerusalem activity (Jer. 40:1—45:5). Even though Jeremiah was taken in chains from Jerusalem, he was freed at Ramah. Given the option of joining the exiles in Babylon or remaining in Palestine, he chose the latter.

The remnant of Jews remaining in Palestine settled at MIZPAH, which was identified by EUSEBIUS with Nabi Samwil, located about 5 mi. NW of Jerusalem. Contemporary biblical scholarship is more inclined to identify Mizpah with Tell en-Nasbeh, located about 8 mi. N of Jerusalem. Gedaliah was appointed as governor of this remnant by Nebuchadnezzar. In a plot designed by Baalis (the chieftain of the bedouin Ammonites

Nebuchadnezzar's invasion and defeat of Judah.

E of Jordan) and executed by Ishmael, this newly appointed governor was killed. Ishmael brutally killed many of the pilgrims en route to Jerusalem and then forced the citizens of Mizpah to march southward, hoping to take them to Ammon across the Jordan.

At GIBEON, Johanan rescued this group and put Ishmael to flight. Going southward this remnant settled temporarily at KIMHAM, a caravansary near BETHLEHEM. On their way they must have passed by the ruins of Jerusalem and the temple, which had been burned to the ground. Seeing the desolate remains of the city where Jeremiah spent forty years of his ministry may have provided the occasion for writing the book of LAMENTATIONS.

Uprooted from Mizpah, these Jews were determined to migrate to Egypt. They prevailed upon Jeremiah, however, to pray for divine guidance. After a ten-day period Jeremiah had an answer instructing them to remain in Palestine (Jer. 42:10) and warning them that war, famine, and death awaited them if they migrated to Egypt. In spite of their being definitely informed what God's will was, they went down to Egypt under the leadership of Johanan (43:1–7). Jeremiah and Baruch apparently had no choice but to go with them.

In Egypt, Jeremiah continued as God's messenger as he reflected interpretively on the developments of his life and ministry. He predicted that Nebuchadnezzar would come down into Egypt to execute divine judgment. Jerusalem was in ruins because the Israelites abandoned God and failed to heed the warnings of the prophets. Divine wrath had come because of their disobedience, so that God's people had become a taunt and a proverb among the nations. Jeremiah's audience, however, did not repent. They had a different interpretation. Defiantly they asserted that they would not obey, and claimed that this evil had come upon them because they ceased to worship the queen of heaven. Once more Jeremiah announced God's wrath upon them. He warned them that when they experienced the consequences they would realize that God was fulfilling his word (Jer. 43:8—44:30).

Significantly, after being informed about all these developments, we learn in Jer. 45 that Baruch some twenty years earlier had been assured that his life would be spared. Intimately associated with Jeremiah, Baruch also was exposed to danger but was assured of divine protection. This promise was fulfilled in his continued ministry even after he migrated to Egypt.

F. Foreign nations and cities in prophecy (Jer. 46:1—51:64). It was in the crucial fourth year of Jehoiakim that Jeremiah delivered these messages against foreign nations. The decisive defeat of the Egyptians at Carchemish advanced the Babylonians into Palestine, signaling the Jews that this was the beginning of the end for the kingdom of Judah. Isaiah had predicted nearly a century earlier that Jerusalem would be conquered by the Babylonians (Isa. 39).

Jeremiah predicted that Nebuchadnezzar, who began to rule that year, would ultimately conquer Amon of Thebes, 500 mi. up the Nile River. Philistia would be invaded and Moab's national life would be destroyed because of her pride. The Ammonites would be scattered without any promise of restoration, and even Edom would be demoted from her haughty position. Judgment likewise awaited Damascus, Hazor, Kedar, and Elam.

The most powerful nation of all—Babylon—would likewise be severely judged. Babylon with her idols faced destruction. This was dramatically portrayed by sending Seraiah, a brother of Baruch, to Babylon. There he read this message, tied the scroll to a rock, and then threw it into the Euphrates River. In a similar manner, Babylon was doomed, never to rise again.

G. Appendix (Jer. 52:1–34). The last chapter of the book seems to provide an appropriate conclusion to the ministry of Jeremiah. The predictions he had given as warnings for over forty years had actually been fulfilled. In spite of his compassionate pleas and prayers, the people had been disobedient and consequently had to face the realities of the exile. This conclusion likely was added by Baruch.

Jeremiah, Epistle of (Επιστολή Ἰερεμίου). A short pseudonymous writing, known also as the Letter of Jeremy, included in the APOCRYPHA as an addendum to Baruch (see BARUCH, BOOK OF). In the SEPTUAGINT, the book of LAMENTATIONS is usually inserted between Baruch and the Epistle of Jeremiah, the three works together being appended to the book of Jeremiah. In the VULGATE (and KJV), the letter is reckoned as Bar. 6 (some English versions follow this numbering, but title it separately).

I. Content. Despite the introductory assertion that it is a copy of the letter sent by Jeremiah to give instruction to those about to be deported to BABYLON, this document is not by Jeremiah, nor is it really a letter. It is, in fact, a powerful exhortation against IDOLATRY. The author's argument, which is quite repetitious, focuses on the powerlessness of idols and the consequent futility of idol worship. Two main threads of mockery run through the course of the book. First is the utter inability of these gods to do anything for themselves. They cannot speak; they cannot hear; they cannot see; they cannot move. They cannot defend themselves against the robbery of unscrupulous priests. They cannot keep themselves clean from dust and tarnish; their garments rot upon their backs. They cannot protect themselves against termites and worms, nor from the defilement of all manner of birds and the prowling of cats. Finally, they are made only as men choose to make them. The second thread of mockery runs: If they are unable to help themselves, neither are they able to help others. They can in no way bless or curse a man. Therefore it is of no use to worship or fear them, and only humiliation awaits those who put their trust in them.

There is no logical development in the structure of the book, but the contents are punctuated by the repeated refrain, "Since you know by these things that they are not gods, do not fear them" (which occurs five times with slight variations, and an additional five times in the form of a rhetorical question).

II. Origin. This polemic against idolatry was easily set forth as a product of Jeremiah. Not only is Jeremiah known to have written at least one letter to the exiles (Jer. 29), but he was also the author of a similar diatribe against idolatry (10:1–10). See JEREMIAH, BOOK OF. The unknown author of the Epistle of Jeremiah seems indeed to have borrowed from this very passage (cf. Jer. 10:5 with Ep. Jer. 70), and was possibly also influenced by other OT traditions on the same subject (cf. Isa. 44:9–20; Pss. 115:4–8; 135:15–18). Either the author himself or a later editor added the opening sentence, which identifies the treatise as a letter of Jeremiah.

Whereas the "letter" ostensibly attacks the idolatry of Babylonia, referring to sacred processions (Ep. Jer. 4, 26), cultic prostitution (v. 43), the god BEL (v. 41), and the mourning for a dying god (prob. TAMMUZ, v. 32), occasional lapses into pagan idolatry are known to have occurred among the Jews in Palestine during the 3rd and 2nd centuries B.C., and thus a Babylonian provenance for the polemic is by no means assured. If this is true, the addressees of the "letter" also remain unknown. Was it originally written for a particular community of the DIASPORA, or for the Diaspora generally, or perhaps for Jews living in Palestine?

With regard to the dating of this writing, there is considerable uncertainty. A fragment dated to the 1st cent. B.C. has been discovered among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, and since the Greek text seems to be a translation of a Hebrew (or Aramaic) document, the Semitic original was probably produced no later than the 2nd cent. B.C. A further clue is perhaps found in Ep. Jer. 3, which states that the exiles are to remain in Babylon "for a long time, up to seven generations." Reckoned from 586 B.C., seven generations leads to about 300 B.C., and some scholars infer that the writing must have been composed late in the 4th cent. B.C. (cf. C. A. Moore, "Jeremiah, Additions to," in ABD, 3:698–706). Others date it in the 3rd or even 2nd cent B.C.

III. Canonicity and text. As one of the writings not contained in the Hebrew Bible, the Epistle of Jeremiah has never been accepted as canonical by the Protestant church. It is, however, accepted as fully canonical by the Roman Catholic Church (since the Council of Trent) where, following the Vulgate, it is reckoned not as a separate book, but as the concluding chapter of Baruch. The Greek text of the epistle (which survives in the main MSS, except CODEX SINAITICUS) is obtainable in the standard printed editions of the LXX (but regularly following Lamentations, and not Baruch). English translations are ready at hand in the various editions of the Apocrypha. (See further C.J. Ball in APOT, 1:596–611; R. H. Pfeiffer, History of New Testament Times with an Introduction to the Apocrypha [1949], 426–432; D.J. Harrington, Invitation to the Apocrypha [1999], ch. 8; D. Jeremiah, Paraleipomena of. See BARUCH, FOURTH.

Jeremias jer'uh-mi'uhs. KJV Apoc. and alternate NT form of JEREMIAH (Sir. 49:6 et al.; Matt. 16:14).

Jeremiel ji-rem'ee-uhl (Lat. Hieremihel, possibly corresponding to JERAHMEEL). An archangel who answers the questions asked by the righteous dead (2 Esd. 4:36; KJV, “Uriel”). He is perhaps to be identified with Ramiel/Remiel (2 Bar. 55.3; 1 En. 20.8). See URIEL #3.

Jeremoth jer'uh-moth (ירמוֹת H3756, variant יְרִימוֹת H3748 [JERIMOTH], possibly “stout” or “exalted”). (1) Son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:8; KJV, “Jerimoth”).

(2) Son of BERIAH (or of ELPAAL; cf. NRSV) and descendant of Benjamin, listed among the heads of families living in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:14; cf. v. 28). He is usually identified with JEROHAM (v. 27; see the discussion in KD, Chronicles, 147–48). See also AHIO.

(3) Son (or descendant) of Mushi; he was one of the descendants of LEVI through MERARI appointed by DAVID to work in the temple (1 Chr. 23:23 KJV, NRSV; the NIV has “Jerimoth” on the basis of 24:30).

(4) Son of HEMAN, David’s seer (1 Chr. 25:4, 22; in the former verse he is called “Jerimoth,” and on that basis the NIV has “Jerimoth” in v. 22 as well). He and his thirteen brothers were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal” (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the fifteenth lot (v. 22).

(5) One of the descendants of Elam who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:26; 1 Esd. 9:27 [KJV, “Hieremoth”).

(6) One of the descendants of Zattu who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:27; 1 Esd. 9:28 [KJV, “Jarimoth”).

(7) One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29 [KJV, “Ramoth,” following the Qere]; 1 Esd. 9:30 [KJV, “Hieremoth”).

Jeremy jer'uh-mee. KJV alternate NT form of JEREMIAH (Matt. 2:17; 27:9).

Jeriah ji-ri'uh (יֵרִיָּה H3746, short form יֵרִיָּה H3745 “Yahweh sees [me]”; cf. JERIEL). Firstborn son (or most important descendant) of Hebron; he was one of the descendants of LEVI through KOHATH appointed by DAVID to work in the temple (1 Chr. 23:19; 24:23). He is also described as chief of the Hebronites; his twenty-seven hundred relatives were heads of families whom David put in charge of the tribes E of the Jordan (1 Chr. 26:31–32; KJV and other versions, “Jerijah”). See HEBRON (PERSON) #1.

Jeribai jer'uh-bi (יֵרִבַּי H3744, “[Yahweh] contends [for me]”; see JARIB, JEHOIARIB, JOIARIB). Son of Elnaam; he and his brother Joshaviah are included in the Chronicler's list of DAVID'S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:46), which adds sixteen names (vv. 41b–47) beyond the military elite known as the Thirty (vv. 10–41=2 Sam. 23:8–39).

Jericho jer'uh-koh (יֵרִיְחוֹ H3735 [with variant spellings], possibly “[city of] the moon [god]”; יֵרִיְחוֹ G2637). The OT city of Jericho is today represented by a much eroded ovoid-shaped mound identified as Tell es-Sultan on the NW outskirts of the modern town. This tell is about 10 mi. NW of the mouth of the DEAD SEA and about 17 mi. ENE of Jerusalem. Because the occupation of the site lasted many centuries, there has been built up a mound which rises some 50 ft. above bedrock. A modern road cuts into the E side of the tell. Across the road from the tell is the spring of <sup>c</sup>Ain es-Sultan, which explains the attraction of the site from the earliest times. It is this copious spring which waters the modern oasis. Tell es-Sultan is about 400 yards long from N to S and covers about ten acres. NT or Herodian Jericho is located one mile W of the modern city in the ruins on both banks of the Wadi Qelt. This site is known as Tulul Abu el-Alayiq. The hills of JUDEA rise abruptly W of the two sites.

I. Ancient Jericho. The history of Jericho goes back far beyond the time of JOSHUA. A Neolithic community settled by the perennial spring around the 8th millennium B.C. The inhabitants had not yet begun to manufacture pottery. It is possible that these food-gathering hunters may have constructed a shrine at the site. Early in the 7th millennium a town was built with a revetment wall, at least one tower, round houses, and many of the attributes of civilization except that of a written language. This first urban phase of Jericho gave way to a later Neolithic phase that marked the beginning of pottery. The inhabitants were probably semi-nomadic and did not build houses. They seem to have camped on the ruins in flimsy huts. In every way these occupants represent a retrogression from the life of the first occupants except that they began to make pottery.

In the Early Bronze Age (c. 3000 B.C.), Jericho again was occupied by a people who built up a settlement with defense walls and towers around the edge of the mound. This occupation did not have a long history. In fact, from that time on there was much building and rebuilding because of a variety of catastrophes that hit the community. Earthquake and fire ended some occupations and required from the new settlers major rebuilding activity. Sometimes existing foundations were used. On occasion a new foundation was constructed on the smoothed-over debris of the earlier occupations or the trench for the foundation was dug out of earlier occupation levels. Some of the building or repair work was required because wind and rain erosion had weakened or collapsed the existing wall or structure. In early archaeological excavations these Early Bronze Age walls were incorrectly dated to the time of JOSHUA (an error often repeated in subsequent literature).

Because of Jericho's location, it was a point at which nomadic tribes entered the land W of the JORDAN. Joshua's instruction to the spies to "Go, look over the land...especially Jericho" (Josh. 2:1) was ancient practice. The site was W of the main ford on the lower Jordan River. From Jericho ascend several main valleys going up to the central ridge of the country. At Jericho the occupants controlled also a vital fresh water supply. In addition, the citizens could and did become greatly involved in commerce as well as in agriculture. The proximity to the Dead Sea made the citizens dealers in salt, bitumen, and sulphur. These settlers also continued to display their nomadic training and frequently moved on W toward the Mediterranean mingling and merging with the people already there.

The Early Bronze Age occupation of Jericho was destroyed by nomadic invaders about 2300 B.C. These invaders were identified by Kathleen M. Kenyon as AMORITES (Digging Up Jericho [1957]; cf. K. M. Kenyon et al., Excavations at Jericho, 5 vols. [1960–83]). Jericho was not the only city destroyed in the Amorite invasion of Palestine and Syria. Excavations of Jericho tombs provide much of the information that gives an understanding of the wave of nomadic newcomers. In turn, a new inundation of immigrants hit Jericho and the Jordan area in the Middle Bronze Age, about 1900 B.C. These invaders were the Canaanites (cf. Num. 13:29, "the Hittites, Jebusites and Amorites live in the hill country; and the Canaanites live near the sea and along the Jordan"). Their culture has been found extending the full length of the Palestinian-Syrian coast in the 2nd millennium. The excavated artifacts at Jericho show that this Middle Bronze Age culture lasted until at least 1200 B.C.

The rule of foreigners such as the HYKSOS did not change the pattern greatly. The Hyksos did introduce the sloping bank defensive wall in place of the independent free-standing wall but they had very little additional cultural impact. The tombs of Jericho make it possible to reconstruct town life in the time of the PATRIARCHS. Excellent pottery, wooden three-legged and four-legged tables, stools and beds, basketry, trinket-boxes of bone inlay, metal daggers, circlets, platters of fruit, and joints of meat have all been preserved due to the presence of methane gas in some of the tombs. This material made available to the dead was the equipment used by the living.

About 1550 B.C. Jericho was violently destroyed. This was probably the work of EGYPT'S 18th dynasty as it expelled the Hyksos from the area. One of the benefits of a violent destruction is the preservation of archaeological evidence under collapsed walls. Fire also hardens walls and preserves organic material in carbon form, which then can be analyzed. Middle Bronze Age Jericho has been so preserved. The cobbled streets have been uncovered. The one-room shops opening out to the street have been preserved. A two-story house with living quarters on the first floor and a grain-milling complex and storage facility were found. In both the tombs and the houses, the evidence indicates that the people of Jericho were not wealthy. This town was not a major trade center, but rather a typical urban complex similar to many towns of that period.

After the destruction of Jericho in 1550, the only Late Bronze Age occupation verified by archaeological evidence dates mainly between 1400 and 1350. There was a definite abandonment of the town between 1550 and 1400. Wash-layers cover the burned town, and the burned material was gradually spread down the slope of the mound. Much of the material from the Middle Bronze Age city did not survive at all, but was scattered and destroyed by the power of the wind and the rains. The material that is preserved under the wash layers provides a distinct contrast with the Late Bronze Age material from the 1400–1350 occupation. There is also evidence in the form of tomb material.

II. OT Jericho. From the 13th cent. B.C., the frequently accepted date of the Israelite conquest of Palestine, virtually nothing is known about Jericho from either John Garstang's reports of his six seasons of archaeological work on the site (Jericho: City and Necropolis [1932–36]), or from Kenyon's seven seasons. Unfortunately, when the highest site on the mound was excavated by the Austro-German archaeologists in 1907–09, there was a greater interest in architecture than in ceramic materials. The plans of those excavations show no house walls from the Late Bronze period, 1300–1200. Noted French scholar L.-H. Vincent, however, reported in his writings that sufficient pottery sherds were recovered from the period to demonstrate conclusively that there was a city on the site at that time.

The excavations carried out by John Garstang at Jericho from 1930 to 1936 bear upon the 13th cent. B.C. in the clearing of five tombs. These burial spots were constructed originally in the Middle Bronze Age but were reused for burial in that century. Nothing survived on the tell from the city defenses of the period. No wall structure left for study relates to that which figures prominently in the OT record in the conquest of Palestine by Joshua and the Israelites. Archaeology can offer little evidence of the conquest of Jericho in the 13th cent. because that period of the city's history has been eroded by winter storms and modern surface structures that have cut into the level.

The OT narrative of Josh. 3–8 tells of the fall of Jericho. The Israelites crossed the Jordan River without a problem because the water ceased to flow. Earth slides and the shutting off of the water of the Jordan for an extended period of time have been reported periodically. In A.D. 1267 such an event was recorded. In 1906 and again in 1927 the phenomenon was observed and reported. Older students of the conquest assumed that the capture of Jericho was the most important factor in the conquest. Actually it was the crossing of the Jordan River at high flood that was of the greatest significance. All the evidence that can be gathered to date seems to imply that the Jericho of Joshua's conquest was only a small city guarding the crossing of the Jordan.

The key city in Joshua's conquest of Palestine is HAZOR, which was the largest urban center in all of Palestine and a major city in the ANE as a whole. Comparing the size of Hazor and Jericho, Jericho would be simply a small oasis town. Hazor, internationally known, grew to a great size because it was located strategically as an international trade center. The key emphasis on the conquest of Jericho in Scripture is that it was the firstfruits of the conquest and completely dedicated to Yahweh.

The book of JUDGES demonstrates the chaotic nature of the Early Iron Age in Palestine. This condition is reflected in the lack of substantial remains of the period at Jericho. While °Ain es-Sultan is an ideal source of irrigation, the volume of the WATER demands a strong stable government for its efficient use. Jericho flourished when irrigation systems were developed and maintained.

A curse was placed on Jericho by Joshua (Josh. 6:26). The oasis was occupied by EGLON, king of MOAB (Jdg. 3:14), for a short time. Some representatives of DAVID spent time at Jericho after being mistreated by HANUN of AMMON (2 Sam. 10:4; 2 Chr. 20:22–23). In the time of AHAB (9th cent. B.C.), HIEL of BETHEL attempted to build a city at Jericho. The archaeological evidence for this occupation is meager. The loss of Hiel's two sons is interpreted as a fulfillment of a curse placed on the site by Joshua (1 Ki. 16:34). This was the Jericho of ELIJAH and ELISHA (2 Ki. 2:4–5, 18–22). It was the locale of a school of the prophets. The purifying of the spring by Elisha is described as an act which had permanent results. Several times in the OT, Jericho is referred to as the City of Palms (Deut. 34:3; Jdg. 1:16; 3:13; 2 Chr. 28:15; cf. Jos. War 1.7.6 §138).

There is a little archaeological evidence indicating that there was an occupation of Jericho in the 7th cent. B.C. This town came to an end at the time of the Babylonian capture of ZEDEKIAH, the last king of Judah, in the Plains of Jericho (2 Ki. 25:5; 2 Chr. 28:15; Jer. 39:5; 52:8). From that time Tell es-Sultan was not occupied as far as archaeological evidence is concerned. Both EZRA and NEHEMIAH refer to a Persian period occupation at Jericho (Ezra 2:34; Neh. 7:36). The population is numbered at 345. These people are credited with aiding the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:2). When the Arabs, Crusaders, and Turks moved into Palestine, they utilized the waters of °Ain es-Sultan but they built the town of Jericho about 2 mi. SE of the ancient tell. The present city of Jericho has expanded to the place where it surrounds the old mound.

III. NT Jericho. HEROD the Great and his successors built a winter capital S of OT Jericho on both banks of the Wadi Qelt. The ruins of this site are known today as Tulul Abu el-Alayiq. Usually the winter climate at this site is warm and pleasant compared to the frequent damp and chilly winter days and nights in Jerusalem. The site for Herodian Jericho was determined by the constant ample supply of water in the Wadi Qelt at a point where the stream opens out onto the plain of the Jordan River. A small fortress had been erected on the site as a control point over a road from the Jordan Valley to Jerusalem. In the Maccabean Period, BACCHIDES fortified Jericho (1 Macc. 9:50). Simon MACCABEE was killed by his son-in-law Ptolemy at Jericho (16:14–16). In 63 B.C. POMPEY captured two forts at Jericho, Threx and Taurus. These are probably the Maccabean fortresses built on the N and S banks of the Qelt.

Herod the Great apparently carried out a two-phased building program at Jericho. In the first phase, the construction was of cut-stone similar to that used in other cities. In the second phase, a peculiar use of small uniform rectangular stones set in mortar characterized the construction. This opus reticulatum architectural feature noted by the archaeologists in many walls is peculiar to Jericho in the whole of the Middle East. This feature has been discovered on the Tiber and dated to the time of AUGUSTUS. It has also been uncovered at Pompeii. Apparently Herod was attracted to this unique form of construction on a visit to Rome.

Herodian Jericho was oriented toward the Qelt. This stream provided water for elaborate reflecting pools lined by fifty statuary niches which were in a sunken garden. At each end of the garden were several buildings. At the E end a grand stairway 150 ft. long rose to a prominent building looking down upon the garden and the stream. In the account of JOSEPHUS, reference is made to the burning of the palace and some other buildings at Jericho at the time of the death of Herod the Great. His son Archelaus restored the town. (See Excavations at New Testament Jericho and Khirbet en-Nitla, ed. W. F. Albright and V. Winnett, AASOR 29–30 [1955].)

ZACCHAEUS had a lucrative position as TAX COLLECTOR at Jericho (Lk. 19:1–10). Jericho was the winter capital of the kingdom. In addition, rich balsam groves were nearby and the tax on the product was considerable. When Jesus of Nazareth was entertained by the tax collector in Jericho, it would likely be in a home in keeping with Herod's grand building program. The finest villas in Pompeii would be similar. One of the Hellenistic forts had sycamore timbers in it indicating that this wood was common in the area. The gospel accounts make reference to the presence of blind beggars in the vicinity of Jericho (Matt. 20:29–34; Mk. 10:46–52; Lk. 18:35–43). Wherever wealth exists in the Middle East, a multiplicity of beggars can be noted.

NT Jericho was captured by VESPASIAN'S troops. There is no archaeological evidence of a destruction of the city. From Jericho, Vespasian sent his army 7 mi. S to Khirbet QUMRAN and destroyed that sectarian site on the W shore of the Dead Sea. The fact that the sect abandoned the site while Herod was at Jericho raises unanswered questions about the relationship between Jericho and Qumran during that time. Upon Herod's death Qumran was reoccupied by the followers of the Teacher of Righteousness. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

After TITUS destroyed Jerusalem in A.D. 70, sending the Tenth Legion from Jericho for the final assault, the town declined. There was a brief revival at the time of BAR KOKHBA'S defiance of Rome in A.D. 132–135. The Bordeaux Pilgrim reported the location of Jericho in A.D. 333 to be where Herod built. A Byzantine Jericho was built a mile or more E of Herodian Jericho. The present city is built on the Byzantine site. (See further T. A. Holland and E. Netzer in ABD, 3:723–40.)

H. JAMIESON

Jeriel jîhr'i-uhl (יִרְיָאֵל H3741, "God sees [me]"; cf. JERIAH). Son of TOLA and grandson of ISSACHAR, described as head of family (1 Chr. 7:2).

Jerijah ji-ri'jah. See JERIAH.

Jerimoth jer'i-moth (יֵרֵמוֹת H3748, variant (יֵרֵמוֹת H3756 [JEREMOTH], possibly "stout" or "exalted"). (1) Son of BELA and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:7).

(2) One of the ambidextrous Benjamite warriors who joined DAVID while he was in exile from SAUL at the Philistine city of ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:5; cf. v. 2).

(3) Son (or descendant) of Mushi; he was one of the descendants of LEVI through MERARI appointed by DAVID to work in the temple (1 Chr. 23:23 [KJV, NRSV, "Jeremoth"]; 24:30).

(4) Son of HEMAN, David's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). He and his thirteen brothers were set apart "for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal" (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the fifteenth lot (v. 22 [KJV and other versions, "Jeremoth"]).

(5) Son of Azriel; an officer over the tribe of NAPHTALI during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:19 [RSV, "Jeremoth"]).

(6) Son of David and father of MAHALATH; the latter married REHOBOAM (2 Chr. 11:18). The name of Jerimoth does not appear in any of the lists of David's sons, and some scholars argue that the text is not reliable.

(7) A Levite included in the list of supervisors of the temple storerooms during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:13).

Jerioth jer'ee-oth (יֵרֵעוֹת H3750, possibly "fearful" or "tents"). Wife of CALEB son of Hezron (1 Chr. 2:18). The MT is difficult, however, and can be interpreted in different ways: (a) Jerioth may be another name for Caleb's wife AZUBAH; (b) Azubah had been previously the wife of a man called Jerioth; (c) Jerioth was the daughter of Caleb and Azubah. Other suggestions have been made (cf. R. Braun, 1 Chronicles, WBC 14 [1986], 37; G. N. Knoppers, 1 Chronicles 1–9, AB 12 [2004], 298–

Jeroboam jer'uh-boh'uhm (יִרְבֵּעַם H3716, “the people are great” or “my kinsman [=deity?] is great”; some believe that this form is a scribal alteration of an original יִרְבַּעַל “Baal is great,” but a beautiful jasper seal from biblical times, picturing a roaring lion, bears the inscription לְשִׁמְעָה עֶבֶד יִרְבֵּעַם, “belonging to Shema, the minister of Jeroboam”). The name of two kings of the northern kingdom of Israel.

I. Jeroboam I. As the first king of the secessionist kingdom of Israel, he reigned twenty-two years (1 Ki. 14:20; 930–909 B.C. according to E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], 81; according to an alternate chronology, 922–901) and established a short-lived dynasty: his son NADAB was assassinated by BAASHA after a reign of less than two years (1 Ki. 15:25–30). Jeroboam’s career is described in 1 Ki. 11:26—14:20 and 2 Chr. 10:1—13:20.

A. His rise to power

1. Three different accounts. There are three different accounts of Jeroboam’s life prior to his becoming king, two in the SEPTUAGINT and a third in the MT; the latter forms the basis of most English translations. (a) The Greek version of 1 Ki. 11:26—12:24 agrees in substance with the MT, with the following variations. It omits 12:2–3a, but in place of that material it reads as follows at 11:43: “And Solomon slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the city of David his father. And when Jeroboam son of Nebat—now he was yet in Egypt, as he had fled from before Solomon and dwelled in Egypt—heard, he went directly and came to his city, to Sarira in the hill country of Ephraim. King Solomon slept with his fathers, and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead.” In addition, the SEPTUAGINT omits the reference to Jeroboam at 12:12, reading, “And all Israel came to King Rehoboam on the third day.”

(b) A second account is found in the LXX as a lengthy addition to 1 Ki. 12:24 (marked “a-z” in Rahlfs’s ed.). This account differs markedly from the previous one and often contradicts it. Some believe that there is “a genuine historical source behind” it (J. Gray, I and II Kings [1963], 268), but the material is suspect (see D. W. Gooding in VT 17 [1967]: 173–89, esp. 188). Among the midrashic elements added to put Jeroboam in the worst possible light are the following: his mother Sarira was a harlot, so his father is unnamed; he attempted a siege of Jerusalem during SOLOMON’S reign; having fled to Egypt, he married Shishak’s eldest and most prominent daughter Ano, who bore him a son, Abia; Shemaiah (not Ahijah; cf. 1 Ki. 11:29–39) the prophet was told by the Lord to go to Jeroboam at SHECHEM, to tear a new garment into twelve pieces, and to tell Jeroboam, “Take for yourself ten shreds for you to wear” (a rather sarcastic purpose clause!). Each of these details seeks to discredit Jeroboam and should probably be ignored when reconstructing his rise to power.

(c) The MT of 1 Ki. 11:26—12:24 raises several questions when compared with the LXX. When did Jeroboam return from his exile in Egypt? Immediately upon hearing of the death of Solomon (LXX 11:43) or after Israel had assembled in Shechem to make Rehoboam king (MT 12:1–3a)? What part did Jeroboam play in the negotiations with Rehoboam? Did he stay in the background until after the revolt, or did he take a prominent role, perhaps even lead, in the grievances against the king (MT vv. 3a and 12a)? Furthermore, many scholars have argued that the MT is inconsistent and that the LXX is to be preferred.

2. Evaluation of the accounts. The reason for the scholarly skepticism of the MT account and preference for the LXX of 1 Ki. 11:26—12:24 (but not LXX additions to 12:24) is a supposed contradiction in the MT account. It is thought, the argument runs, that the MT at two points (12:1–3a and v. 12a) places the return of Jeroboam in the context of the Shechem conference, but that elsewhere (v. 20) it places his return to prominence after the revolt. By omitting any reference to Jeroboam in these same verses, LXX<sup>BL</sup> (i.e., CODEX VATICANUS and the Lucianic recension) represents a better Hebrew Vorlage than that preserved in MT; the latter is said to have borrowed 2 Chr. 10:2–3a, placed it in its present location as MT 1 Ki. 12:2–3a, and changed v. 12 to include Jeroboam.

On the contrary, the evidence presently available argues that the MT represents the original text. The following reasons can be cited: (a) It is not true that LXX<sup>BL</sup> has omitted the material in MT 1 Ki. 12:2–3a. Rather, the Greek version has placed its account at 11:43, modified it for a purpose, and, in the process, left a clue that this is, in fact, what has occurred. In fitting in the account, the LXX has interrupted the stock formula: (i) X slept with his fathers, (ii) was buried in Y, and (iii) Z reigned in his stead. The unparalleled result of the insertion, as quoted above, is: (i) X slept with his fathers, (ii) was buried in Y, (iii) inserted account of Jeroboam, (iv) X slept with his fathers, and (v) Z reigned in his stead.

(b) It is far more probable that the LXX felt the same difficulty with its Hebrew Vorlage as modern scholars do with the MT and excised or repositioned the offending texts than that MT added vv. 2–3a from 2 Chronicles and the name “Rehoboam” to v. 12, which in fact would create a difficulty.

(c) The grammatical difficulty in the Hebrew text of vv. 2 – 3a can be solved simply by ending the parenthesis, not at the end of v. 2 (as KJV does), but rather at the words, “...and they sent and called him” (e.g., ASV; for the alternate solution found in NIV and NRSV, see below).

(d) It is more likely that the Chronicler quoted 1 Ki. 12 extensively with slight changes to suit his purposes than that a later recension of Kings added vv. 2–3a from the parallel in Chronicles. First, as the texts now stand, 2 Chr. 10:2 has šēlōmōh hammelek (“Solomon the King”), whereas 1 Ki. 12:2 has the reverse order, hammelek šēlōmōh (“King Solomon”). The former order is more typical of later Hebrew (BDB, 573a), so if the recension of Kings had borrowed from 2 Chronicles, one could expect to find the normal late order of these words preserved in Kings. Second, the preposition b in bē; misrāyim at the end of v. 2 probably has the older meaning “from” rather than the more common meaning “in,” so by repointing the verb wayēšleb as wayāšāb, the resulting translation is “and Jeroboam returned from Egypt” (rather than “and Jeroboam lived in Egypt”; cf. 2 Chr. 10:2 and N. M. Sarna in JBL 78 [1959]: 310–16; so also NIV and NRSV). Third, there is no sufficiently good reason to suppose that the reference to “the whole assembly [qāhāl H7736] of Israel” (1 Ki. 12:3a) and to “the congregation [ēdā H6337]” (v. 20) indicates two different sources, with the earlier reference and its context supposed to be an insertion from Chronicles (2 Chr. 10:3 does not even have the word qāhāl). It is more likely that there were in fact two assemblies. If so, 1 Ki. 12:3a would refer to the assembled group that had come to meet with Rehoboam, and the more specific term ‘ēdā would refer to the national assembly convened at Shechem for the express purpose of making Jeroboam king (v. 20).

For these reasons, the MT is to be preferred to the LXX in its account of Jeroboam’s rise to power.

3. Resultant picture. Jeroboam the son of Nebat and Zeruah (a widow) became a recognized leader during the reign of SOLOMON, who put him in charge of the forced labor crew from the house of Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh). Meeting Jeroboam alone in the country, the prophet AHIJAH from SHILOH tore his own new garment into twelve pieces and had Jeroboam take ten to symbolize the fact that God was about to tear ten of the tribes away from Solomon and his son. Only one tribe, JUDAH, would remain to perpetuate the Davidic line (BENJAMIN, which never seems to have recovered from the slaughter and near extinction mentioned in Jdg. 20–21, was counted with Judah; cf. 1 Ki. 11:32, 36; 12:20–21). When Solomon heard of the prophecy, or perhaps of a plot by Jeroboam to bring Ahijah's prophecy to an early fulfillment, he sought to kill Jeroboam, who fled to safety in Egypt (the full account is in 1 Ki. 11:26–40).

When Solomon died, his son Rehoboam went to SHECHEM to be made king over the twelve tribes. “When Jeroboam son of Nebat heard this (he was still in Egypt, where he had fled from King Solomon), he returned from Egypt. So they sent for Jeroboam, and he and the whole assembly of Israel went to Rehoboam” (1 Ki. 12:2–3 NIV; for the basis of this translation see above). With Jeroboam leading a delegation, the twelve tribes demanded that Rehoboam lighten the demands of the monarchy. Instead, three days later, he announced burdensome increases. At that, the northern tribes revolted.

Soon afterward, Rehoboam foolishly sent the worst possible man he could have chosen, Adoram (ADONIRAM), who headed the hated corvée, to try to pacify the northern ten tribes. They stoned Adoram to death and forced Rehoboam to flee back to Jerusalem. By now it was widely known that Jeroboam had returned from exile in Egypt, that he had played a prominent part in the futile negotiations with King Rehoboam and was sympathetic to their cause, and most importantly, that one of their own prophets, Ahijah from Shiloh, had prophesied that Jeroboam would be king after the death of Solomon. So northern Israel called Jeroboam to the coronation convocation to make him their king (1 Ki. 12:4–20; cf. the reaction later to the prophetic word that JEHU was to be king, 2 Ki. 9:1–13).

B. His reign. The first threat to newly crowned Jeroboam came from Rehoboam, who massed an army for an invasion of Israel. SHEMAIAH intervened with a word from the Lord not to begin intertribal warfare, so the troops returned home. Meanwhile, Jeroboam fortified Shechem and Penuel, both in strategic passes and both connected with the patriarchs.

1. The sins of Jeroboam. Contrary to the message of Ahijah that had brought him to power (1 Ki. 11:38–39), Jeroboam perverted the worship of the Lord by reviving the Mesopotamian bull worship of pre-Abrahamic days as AARON had done (12:27–30; Exod. 32:1–5; Josh. 24:14–15; on comparisons between Jeroboam and Aaron, see JBL 76 [1967]: 129–40, and U. Cassuto, A Commentary on the Book of Exodus [1967], 407–10), to keep the people from making religious pilgrimages to Jerusalem. Golden bulls (prob. not just bull-pedestals; see R. K. Harrison, Old Testament Times [1970], 210–11) became the objects of worship at BETHEL and at DAN (PLACE), contrary to the law (Exod. 20:4; see CALF, GOLDEN). This was the great sin of Jeroboam. Further, he promoted worship at the HIGH PLACES, appointed non-Levites as priests, and changed the date of the Feast of Tabernacles (perhaps by changing the calendar; see JBL 83 [1964]: 109–18). An unnamed prophet from Judah prophesied at Bethel against the altar there: JOSIAH would profane it by burning dead men's bones upon it and tear it down (fulfilled about 300 years later, 2 Ki. 23:15–16). Jeroboam continued his policies and became the prime biblical example of an idolatrous king. (See E. T. Mullen, Jr., "The Sins of Jeroboam: A Redactional Assessment," CBQ 49 [1987]: 212–32.)

2. The wars of Jeroboam. After the initial peace resulting from Shemaiah's prophecy (1 Ki. 12:22–24), Jeroboam's kingdom was at war first with Rehoboam and then with ABIJAM of Judah (14:30; 15:6; 2 Chr. 12:15). In the fifth year of his reign, SHISHAK of Egypt invaded Judah and Israel in an attempt to gain control of Palestine during the civil war that had weakened both parties (1 Ki. 14:25–28; Egypt's invasion of Israel is not mentioned in the Bible, but Shishak's victory inscription at Karnak lists Taanach, Shunem, Rehob, Mahanaim, and Megiddo—all Israelite cities—among the conquered places).

C. His ruin. Finally, in a decisive battle with Abijam, described in 2 Chr. 13:1–22, Jeroboam's forces were decisively defeated with the loss of Bethel and other border cities. Jeroboam never regained his power, and his son Nadab lasted only two years before Baasha's coup d'état. Ahijah's second recorded prophecy had been fulfilled (1 Ki. 14:2–18; 15:27–30). The dynasty of Jeroboam I was finished.

II. Jeroboam II. As the thirteenth (fourteenth, if TIBNI is counted) king of Israel (coregent 793–782 B.C.; king, 782–753 according to Thiele; others, c. 786–746), Jeroboam II extended the Israelite empire into TRANSJORDAN from the ARABAH to the borders of HAMATH, in accordance with JONAH's lesser-known prophecy of national expansion (2 Ki. 14:25). The biblical account is very short (14:23–29; he is mentioned in 1 Chr. 5:17 in a genealogy), but his territorial expansion occurred in a power vacuum in the ANE and can be pieced together from archaeological sources (for the most thorough discussion, see Mena-hem Haran in VT 17 [1967]: 266–97). Briefly, the Assyrians weakened the kingdom of BEN-HADAD, Jeroboam recovered Transjordan from Ben-Hadad, and then the Assyrians were too busy with more important local and national problems to worry about Jeroboam's increasing power until after his death.

During this period, Israel enjoyed a peace, political prestige, and economic prosperity unparalleled since the days of Solomon, but its moral and religious life was bankrupt. HOSEA and AMOS reflect the religious and social decay (e.g., Hos. 6:4–10; 10:1–15; Amos 2:6–8; 3:13—4:5) of this period. The prosperity was only temporary. When Jeroboam II died, his son Zechariah ruled only six months before he was murdered, ending the Jehu dynasty in the fourth generation (2 Ki. 15:8–12). Thirty years later, Israel was no longer a nation. See also ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

Jeroham ji-roh'ham (יִרְחָם H3736, derivation debated, possibly “soft” or “[God] is compassionate”; see JAROAḤ). (1) Son (or descendant) of Elihu, father of ELKANAH, and grandfather of SAMUEL (1 Sam. 1:1). In the Levitical genealogies of KORAH, his immediate ancestor is given as Eliab or Eliel (1 Chr. 6:27, 34). He may have been a nonpracticing Levite domiciled in the tribe of EPHRAIM (there were grave anomalies in the period of the judges that affected the Levites; cf. Jdg. 17:7—18:31).

(2) A descendant of BENJAMIN whose sons are listed among the heads of families living in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:27; cf. v. 28). He is usually identified with JEREMOTH (v. 14; see the discussion in KD, Chronicles, 147–48).

(3) Descendant of Benjamin and father of Ibneiah; the latter was an early settler in Jerusalem following the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:8; cf. vv. 2–3).

(4) Son (or descendant) of Passhur and father of Adaiah; the latter is included in a list of priests who were heads of families and who are described as “able men, responsible for ministering in the house of God” in postexilic Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:12–13; in Neh. 11:12 his immediate ancestor listed is Pelaliah, with Passhur given as a more distant ancestor).

(5) A Benjamite living in GEDOR whose two sons, JOELAH and ZEBADIAH, were among the ambidextrous warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:7).

(6) Father of AZAREL; the latter was an officer over the tribe of DAN during David’s reign (1 Chr. 27:22).

(7) Father of AZARIAH; the latter was a military commander who assisted the high priest JEHOIADA in the successful overthrow of the apostate queen ATHALIAH (2 Chr. 23:1).

Jerome juh-rohm'. Eusebius Sophronius Hieronymus was born of Christian parents about A.D. 345 (according to some, 330) in Strido, a town in DAL-MATIA, near the border with Italy and not far from the N coast of the Adriatic Sea. He studied literature and rhetoric in ROME, traveled in Gaul, and settled for a time in the Italian city of Aquileia, which was a short distance from Strido. Then, with some friends, he traveled to Palestine around 374 and spent a few years as a hermit in the Syrian desert, after which he was ordained as priest in ANTIOCH OF SYRIA. In 382 he was called to Rome by Pope Damasus, whom he served as secretary, but four years later he returned to the E and settled in BETHLEHEM, devoting the rest of his life to biblical and theological scholarship.

Jerome was a vigorous proponent of ASCETICISM, became involved in various theological controversies, and was at times unrestrained in his polemics. But as one of the few church fathers who knew the Hebrew language and who had firsthand familiarity with the Holy Land, Jerome made a singular contribution to the study of Scripture through voluminous writings, especially his commentaries and his translation of the Bible into Latin (see VULGATE). He died in the year 420. (See further J. Steinmann, Saint Jérôme [1958]; H. F. D. Sparks in The Cambridge History of the Bible, ed. P. R. Ackroyd et al., 3 vols. [1963–70], 1:510–41; J. N. D. Kelley, Jerome: His Life, Writings, and Controversies [1975]; D. Brown, Vir Trilinguis: A Study in the Biblical Exegesis of Saint

Jerub-Baal ji'ruhb-bay'uhl (רבעל H3715, “Baal contends [for me]”; cf. JARIB; alternately, “Baal is [or shows himself] great”). Also Jerubbaal. The name given to GIDEON when he destroyed his father’s BAAL altar at OPHRAH. The text says, “So that day they called Gideon ‘Jerub-Baal,’ saying, ‘Let Baal contend with him,’ because he broke down Baal’s altar” (Jdg. 6:32; the name is also used in 7:1; 8:29, 35 [the last occurrence of the name Gideon]; ch. 9 [which according to some scholars is the product of literary confusion and refers to someone other than Gideon]; and 1 Sam. 12:11). Some suggest that prior to this incident Jerub-Baal had been his name, reflecting the syncretism which then prevailed among the Israelites, but that his act of iconoclasm gave it a new significance. It should be noted that the Hebrew word ba'al H1251 means “lord, owner,” and in the early history of Israel was sometimes applied to the true God. Later, when the term came to be regarded as disgraceful, the name Jerub-Baal was altered to Jerub-Besheth (from bōšet H1425, “shame,” 2 Sam. 11:21); cf. ISH-BOSHETH and MEPHIBOSHETH. (See J. A. Emerton in JTS 27 [1976]: 289–312.)

Jerub-Besheth ji-rub'uh-sheth (ירבשת H3717, deformation of רבעל H3715). Also Jerubbesheth. See JERUB-BAAL.

Jeruel ji-roo'uhl (ירואל H3725, “foundation of God”). An area in the Judean wilderness where King JEHOSEPHAT defeated a Transjordanian coalition (2 Chr. 20:16). The exact location is not known, but it was apparently between the Pass of ZIZ (just N or NW of EN GEDI, cf. v. 2) and the Desert of TEKOA (cf. v. 20; see Y. Aharoni et al., The Carta Bible Atlas, 4th ed. [2002], map 129).

Jerusalem ji-roo'suh-luhm (ירושלם H3731 [Ketib apparently ירושלם, while the fully written Qere perpetuum, ירושלים in Jer. 26:18 et al., seems to be a late form, perhaps after the analogy of מצרים H5213, see EGYPT], meaning “foundation of peace” or “foundation of the god Shalem”; Aram. ירושלם H10332; Gk. Ἱερουσαλαμ G2647, variant Ἱεροσόλυμα, a [cf. BDF §56.1], gentilic Ἱεροσόλυμα G2643). Capital of the Hebrew nation and of modern Israel, widely regarded as the world’s most significant city (cf. Ps. 87:2–5). Beginning with the time of DAVID, it served as God’s dwelling place (1 Ki. 8:13). Jerusalem was the scene of Christ’s passion, death, and resurrection (cf. Lk. 9:51), and it will be the venue of the events of the end time (Zech. 14).

I. Geography

A. *Location. Jerusalem is situated 33 mi. E of the Mediterranean Sea and 14 mi. W of the Dead Sea, at an elevation of c. 2,500 ft., at a major road junction on the crest of W Palestine's central ridge. This ridge rises slowly from the promontory of Mount GILBOA in the N (1,700 ft.) to a point near HEBRON, c. 20 mi. S of Jerusalem (3,370 ft.). Although Jerusalem's highest point (under 2,600 ft.) cannot rival Hebron to its S, DAVID properly described its location, for most of his subjects, as a place "where the tribes go up" (Ps. 122:4).

From the W, the rail line approaches Jerusalem through SAMSON'S rugged valley of SOREK (Jdg. 16:4), and ending in the valley of REPHAIM (2 Sam. 5:22) just S of the city. For most of the city's modern history, the only alternative route consisted of the Jaffa highway, which branched off from the valley of AIJALON to the N and snaked its way along the canyons through Abu Ghosh. But the burned out bodies of modern Israeli armored cars that have lined its shoulders bear mute testimony to the difficulty of going up to ZION (cf. Isa. 7:6).

From the E, one leaves the JORDAN, by JERICHO, at over 1,200 ft. below sea level and must then ascend through the barren Senonian chalk wilderness of Judah by the gorge ADUMMIM (Josh. 15:7), today called "the ascent of blood," probably because of its red ochre deposits. Rainfall is practically nonexistent here, the winds from the western sea having been drained of their life-giving moisture by the intervening ridge. The highest point is reached just E of the city, on the 2,650 ft. crest of the MOUNT OF OLIVES.

Though difficult of access, Jerusalem enjoys a correspondingly protected location. Furthermore, whereas lacking significant natural resources, it does lie astride the major N-S trade route, which renders its location both commercially and politically strategic. It was its control of this ridge route that probably dictated its settlement in the first place. Because of the mountains that "surround Jerusalem" (Ps. 125:2), the city's plateau remains hidden until the traveler suddenly tops one of the higher ridges that surround it. From the E, for example, as one crosses Olivet—as is still done every Palm Sunday, following the course of Christ's triumphal entry—the whole city of Jerusalem suddenly appears, spread out in a great panorama.

B. Topography. Jerusalem consists of a complex of five hills, once sharply distinguished, carved out of hard Cenomanian limestone, roughly one-half mile square. On the W and S sides lies the “L” shaped Valley of HINNOM (Josh. 15:8); eastward is the gorge of the brook KIDRON, perhaps Joel's Valley of Jehoshaphat (Joel 3:2; see JEHOSEPHAT, VALLEY OF).

Aerial view of Jerusalem looking N.

The topography of modern Jerusalem.

The interior of the square was once bisected by a ravine running from N to S and finally curving into the Kidron just N of its junction with the Hinnom. In NT times it was called the Tyropoeon Valley (Jos. War 5.4.1, tōn tyropoiōn, “of the cheese-makers,” possibly a corruption of some Heb. or Aram. term), and it may be (partially) equivalent to the OT “Mortar” (Zeph. 1:11 NRSV). Though still discernible in the N, in the form of a depression W of the Damascus Gate, successive destructions of the city have now obliterated most of its course. Jerusalem’s present day profile, with its apparently uninterrupted rise from the Kidron escarpment westward to “Mount Zion” (see below) and then with an abrupt drop into the Hinnom Valley, fails to indicate the up to 100 ft. of debris with which the central ravine is now choked.

East of the Tyropoeon lie three hills. The southernmost is the smallest, its crest having an elevation of only c. 2,250 ft.; but its sharp declivities and narrow ridge-like character, slightly pinched off in the N (cf. K. M. Kenyon, Jerusalem: Excavating 3000 Years of History [1967], 27), made it the most easily defensible part of the whole. Archaeological investigation has confirmed that this was the original ZION, or CITY OF DAVID (2 Sam. 5:7).

Northward (Ps. 48:2) lies the broader summit of MORIAH, originally a threshing floor, but designated by David as a place of sacrifice and the temple mount (2 Chr. 3:1), which it has remained to this day. Its rocky peak, over which the altar of sacrifice was erected, may be identified with the spot on which ABRAHAM was willing to offer up his son ISAAC, “on one of the mountains” of “the region of Moriah” (Gen. 22:2). For nearly thirteen centuries it has been covered by the Muslim shrine known as the Dome of the Rock. The surrounding area is now artificially leveled off to form a roughly rectangular court (1,000 by 1,500 ft.; 2,450 ft. in elevation) called the Haram esh-Sharif, or “Noble Sanctuary.”

A fairly flat saddle once separated Moriah from the third or NE hill, Mount Bezetha, the peak of which still lies outside the NE city wall. The natural lines of demarcation are somewhat obscured, for when HEROD expanded the Haram area northward, he obliterated a ravine that had formerly cut across the NE corner of the temple area. It should also be noted that between Moriah and the City of David lies a promontory, usually referred to as the OPHEL (“swelling”; see below), which in the past was a distinct hill at almost 2,400 ft. in elevation, but no longer visible because of quarrying and construction.

Jerusalem’s western half was subdivided by a larger ravine that branched off midway in the course of the Tyropoeon: the “cross valley” (Transversal Valley) cutting westward to the present Jaffa Gate. To its S lay what the OT may have designated as Mount GAREB (Jer. 31:39; cf. J. Simons, Jerusalem in the Old Testament [1952], 231–33, and IDB, 2:853, though see below, II.C.3), but to which subsequent history, after the abandonment of the original City of David in A.D. 70, has assigned the old name of Zion (Jos. War 5.4.1), probably because of the dominant position of its 2,550 ft. elevation peak. Though Gareb was once again embraced within expanded Byzantine Jerusalem, in A.D. 985 the Muslim Caliph of Cairo, so as to shorten the city’s line of defense, once more redirected the southern wall roughly 1,000 ft. farther N, with the result that the southern part of Gareb, together with the whole of ancient Zion, have henceforward remained outside the walls of Jerusalem and have become partially unoccupied.

To the NW, the land stretches off in an incline, broken only by what was once a hill or spur, on which now rests the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

C. Characteristics. The annual rainfall at Jerusalem amounts to about 25 in., but this is concentrated in the winter months (see RAIN). Temperature, moderated by the elevation, shows seasonal averages ranging from 40° to 85°F. Snow is rare; but the stone buildings of old Jerusalem can, upon occasion, become dank and cold. Yet from May until October, the grass turns brown, and the hamsin wind that blows from off the eastern deserts may produce a period of serious heat and drought. Generally, however, the western sea breeze keeps the days mild and the evenings cool.

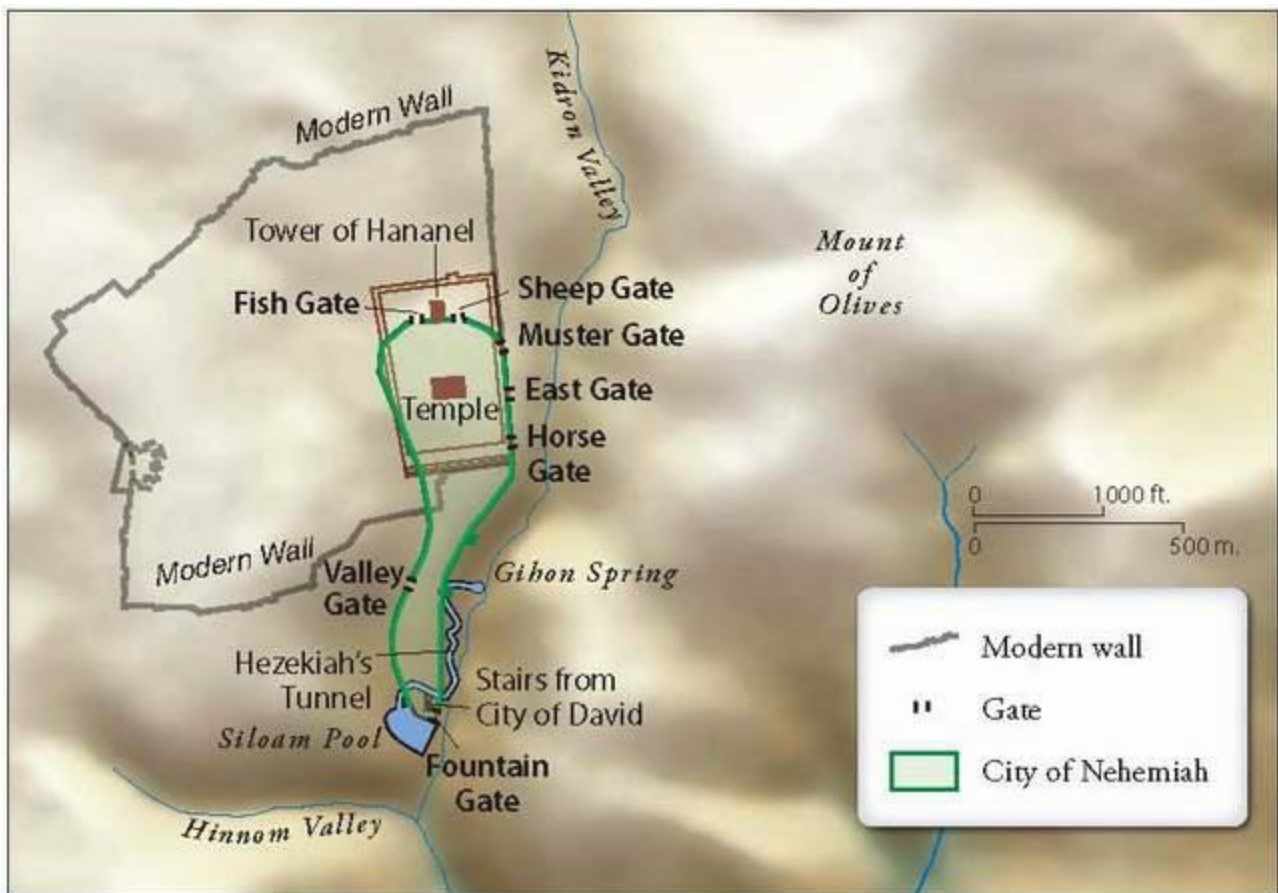

Two springs provide the water that was so essential for occupation, especially prior to the coming of the Israelites, with whom appeared also the development of cisterns with linings of waterproof lime. The GIHON SPRING (1 Ki. 1:33; 2 Chr. 32:30), or Virgin’s Spring, issues from a grotto on the Kidron Valley side of the City of David and produces an intermittent stream. EN ROGEL (Josh. 15:7; 2 Sam. 17:17), or Job’s Well, perhaps the JACKAL WELL of Neh. 2:13, lies farther S, below the junction of the Kidron and the Hinnom. It is a true well, which in winter bubbles up in artesian fashion (November to March, after the seasonal rain has raised the surrounding water table).

II. History. The scientific study of Jerusalem’s history begins with the coming of Edward Robinson, an American pastor, to the city in 1838. It was taken up in earnest by the Palestinian Exploration Fund in 1865, who sponsored the extensive tunneling projects of Captain (later Sir) Charles Warren (1867–1869), around the temple area. Muslim opposition then brought such work generally to an end, though F. J. Bliss and E. C. Dickie were able to sink similar shafts and tunnels around parts of the perimeter of the former city (1894–97). Scientifically controlled excavation, checked by an accurate system of pottery chronology, began yet another generation later; and even then, religious controls, plus the urban construction that covers most of the land, prevented thorough archaeological investigation. A noteworthy exception was the series of campaigns conducted by Kathleen Kenyon in various parts of the city (1961–67). With the reunification of the city under Israeli control in 1967, opportunities reopened; and the Hebrew University excavations, commenced by B. Mazar in 1968 outside the western and southern walls of the temple area, have helped to clear up a number of remaining historical uncertainties (see further N. Avigad, Discovering Jerusalem [1983], 13–22). The Bible constitutes the primary source for reconstructing the history of Jerusalem, unequalled for any other ANE city. Its words are supplemented by an increasing flow of archaeological data and also, especially in its later periods, by contemporaneous, secular literary sources.

A. Canaanite. The earliest remains from Jerusalem consist of Early Paleolithic hand-axes (but no skeletons), systematically excavated in 1933 from the SOREK plain, or Valley of Rephaim (see REPHAİM, VALLEY OF), just SW of the present city. Urban culture, however, arose with the coming of the Canaanites in 3000 B.C.

Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah.

1. Pre-Israelite, to 1406 B.C. The Early Bronze Age (3000–2000 B.C.) Canaanitish settlement developed on the SE ridge, the old city of Zion. Its first historical mention is found at the close of this period, in Scripture, when the patriarch ABRAHAM honored its priest-king MELCHIZEDEK, minister of EL ELYON (“God Most High,” Gen. 14:19) as a true servant of Yahweh (v. 22; he serves indeed in his double office as a type of Jesus Christ, Ps. 110:4; Heb. 7). It was to the adjoining hill of Moriah (2 Chr. 3:1) that Abraham later returned, c. 2015, to offer up his son ISAAC as a sacrifice to God (Gen. 22:2).

The city is first named in Middle Bronze Age times (2000–1600) in Egyptian 12th-dynasty EXECRATION TEXTS, c. 1900–1800, which employ the form (U)rušalimum, “foundation [?] of Shalem”; compare its initial biblical designation, in MOSES’ writing of Genesis, as SALEM (Gen. 14:18; cf. Ps. 76:2). The Hebrew adjective “salem H8969 signifies “complete, prosperous, safe, peaceful” (cf. Heb. 7:2), though it may also have been the name of a “prospering”

Canaanite deity, Shalem. The name was not originally Hebrew in any event.

The choice of Jerusalem's location seems to have been dictated by factors of defense and of WATER. The latter was supplied from the Gihon Spring in the Kidron Valley below and to the E (2 Chr. 32:30, and see below). Correspondingly, the E walls, which were once thought to have run along the eastern edge of the crest, and hence to have restricted the city to a width of about 100 yards, are now known to have lain, at least from 1800 B.C. onward, some 50 yards farther E, two-thirds of the way down the slope, which was crowded with houses. The area of the wide northern wall, over 20 ft. in thickness, has been closely pinpointed by K. Kenyon's excavations. They demonstrate that occupation prior to the 10th cent. B.C. began at a point 100 yards S of the present S wall of Jerusalem (Kenyon, Jerusalem, 26). The city then extended about one-quarter mile southward. Its western wall lay on the summit of the ridge, along its W side. Its total area, once thought to have been less than 8 acres (not uncharacteristic of Canaan's towns), is now known to have been at least 12 acres. Finally, its elevation, while less than Moriah or Gareb, was not such as to impair its security, fire power being limited as it was in those days. To sustain its population, the surrounding cultivated areas must have covered some 10,000 acres (M. Ben-Dov, Historical Atlas of Jerusalem [2002], 15).

2. Jebusite, to 1003 B.C. Midway in the Late Bronze Age (1600–1200), the records of JOSHUA'S wars at the time of the conquest (1406–1400) identify a certain ADONI-ZEDEK as "king of Jerusalem" (Josh. 10:1). This AMORITE, indeed, headed up the confederacy of southern Canaanitish kings that opposed Joshua; and he lost his life, following their defeat at BETH HORON (10:23, 26; 12:10). But Jerusalem itself seems to have escaped unscathed.

A decade or so later, after the death of Joshua, Jerusalem was captured by the tribe of JUDAH (Jdg. 1:1, 8), only to be reoccupied by the Canaanitish Jebusites (1:21; see JEBUS). The TELL EL-AMARNA tablets, from the Egyptian 18th dynasty, include letters from an <sup>c</sup>Abdi-Kheba (a HURRIAN, or

HORITE, name), king of Urusalim or Bethšalem, to the pharaoh AKHENATEN (prob. 1379–1361; see

This recent discovery in Jerusalem is thought to have been part of David's palace.

CAH 2/2, 3rd ed. [1975], 105). They speak of the former's need for Egyptian mercenary troops in view of the threatening presence of the HABIRU, possibly the Hebrews. At the time of the Benjamite outrage early in the 14th cent. (cf. 20:28: Aaron's grandson was still high priest), Jerusalem is thus disparagingly described as "the city of foreigners" (19:12 NRSV), "this city of the Jebusites" (v. 11), though actually its moral standards could not have been worse than those of the Hebrew Benjamites to its N (vv. 18, 22, 25). It remained Jebusite until David's final victory and conquest in 1003 (Josh. 15:63; 1 Chr. 11:5).

During the period of the judges, the city carried the corresponding name of Jebus (Jdg. 19:10–11; 1 Chr. 11:4). It was at this point, in the 14th cent., that the Jebusites constructed a series of stone-filled platforms down the hill slope to the wall on the E side of the city (cf. Josh. 15:8; 18:16, though technically the city did not then reach to the Hinnom Valley). These stone "shoulders" enabled a more efficient use of the slope for building; but unhappily the eventual collapse of the hillside platforms, combined with quarryings on the crest, have removed all traces of Canaanite buildings.

B. United kingdom

1. David, to 970 B.C. Immediately after his consecration in HEBRON in 1003 as king over the united tribes of Israel (2 Sam. 5:3) and his repulse of the PHILISTINES' attempt to check him at BAAL PER-AZIM in the Valley of Rephaim (vv. 18–20), David advanced against the still Canaanitish city of Jerusalem, which was separating his own tribe of Judah from that of Benjamin and from the other tribes farther N. Rather than risk a direct assault against the well-nigh impregnable walls of the Jebusites (cf. v. 6), David ordered a surprise attack through the "water shaft" (v. 8; but see below, III.B). Both to reward the individual who would lead this dangerous ascent through the water tunnel, and possibly at the same time to accomplish the replacement of his uncontrollable half-nephew JOAB as commander of the armed forces (cf. 3:23–27, 39), David offered this supreme post to whoever should "lead the attack against the Jebusites"; but Joab himself "went up first, and so he received the command" (1 Chr. 11:6). The term ZION (Heb. siyyôn H7482, possibly meaning "fortress") described the citadel that David then succeeded in taking (v. 7), though it came to signify the SE hill as a whole

(2 Ki. 19:31) and eventually the entire, expanded city of Jerusalem (cf. Ps. 133:3).

David forthwith transferred his residence to Zion, the fortified city of Jerusalem, and named it after himself, “the City of David” (2 Sam. 5:9). He also engaged in considerable building. This included his palace, by means of cedar timbers and skilled craftsmen provided by HIRAM king of TYRE (v. 11), and the MILLO (v. 9), “a filling,” which may refer to a reinforcing of the system of platforms and terraces already established by the Canaanites on the eastern slope of Zion (cf. NIV and see K. Kenyon in BA 27 [1964]: 43; note also the similar activity by Solomon, 1 Ki. 9:15, 24, and Hezekiah, 2 Chr. 32:1–5).

The strategic importance of David’s move cannot be overestimated. Although the “City of David” was no larger than 15 acres (at the SE corner of modern Jerusalem), it gave him a military location of exceptional strength as well as a political position in a city that was essentially his “personal property,” not subject to any of the Israelitish tribes. It was “neutral” as well, being situated on a tribal border and associated with neither N Israel nor S Judah. David then proceeded to the most significant act of all—making it the religious capital of his nation, by bringing up within its walls the ARK OF THE COVENANT (2 Sam. 6:12), which made Jerusalem the dwelling place of God himself. For Yahweh had graciously condescended to come to his people in the form of the SHEKINAH or glory cloud (Exod. 40:34–35), which rested between the two cherubim on the golden plate or “mercy seat” that covered the ark (25:21–22; cf. Num. 7:89). He could thus be described as “the LORD Almighty, who is enthroned [lit., dwells] between the cherubim” (1 Sam. 4:4; 2 Sam. 6:2).

Ever since its capture by the Philistines at the battle of EBENEZER, c. 1080 (1 Sam. 4:11, 22), the ark had remained apart from the public worship of Israel (1 Chr. 13:3; but cf. 1 Sam. 14:18). Even after its return to Israel, however, because of the disaster it had produced at BETH SHEMESH (1 Sam. 6:19–20), it had been left at KIRIATH JEA-RIM (7:1–2), farther inland on the road to Jerusalem. But soon after his occupation of Zion in 1003, David assembled 30,000 of the leading men of Israel formally to conduct it into his new capital (2 Sam. 6:1–2). After a three-months’ delay at the house of OBED-EDOM, occasioned by the death of UZZAH for having profaned the sacred object (vv. 7, 11), the king finally achieved his goal, conducting the ark within the walls of the City of David and placing it in a tent sanctuary (vv. 12, 17). He instituted regular offerings and a musical service in conjunction with it (1 Chr. 16); henceforward Zion was to be “the city of God” (Ps. 46:4; cf. 48:2). See below under IV.

David reigned in Jerusalem for thirty-three years, 1003–970 (2 Sam. 5:5). He “took more concubines and wives in Jerusalem” (v. 13), and there were born to him eleven additional sons, including both NATHAN and SOLOMON (vv. 14–16), who appear respectively in the lineal and the official genealogies of Christ as recorded in the Gospels (Lk. 3; Matt. 1; see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST). The city came increasingly to be settled by Israelites, especially of the neighboring tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. 8:28, 32), but also the tribes of Judah, Ephraim, and Manasseh (9:3), and of course the Levites (v. 34). Within his new palace, David cared for MEPHIBOSHETH, the crippled son of his former friend JONATHAN, and his family (2 Sam. 9:12–13); he received officials (10:15; 11:8, 13, 22; 20:22; 24:8); but he also committed his basest crimes, adultery with BATHSHEBA and the murder of her husband (11:1–4, 14–15). Solomon was eventually born of this union (12:24), c. 990. David’s own high-handedness seems to have contributed to the subsequent deeds of lawlessness committed by his own sons; cf. the insinuation of immunity for AMNON as “the king’s son” (13:4) and yet his murder two years later by his half-brother ABSALOM (vv. 23, 28–29).

After three years of flight and exile from Jerusalem (2 Sam. 13:38), Absalom was enabled to return (14:23; cf. 15:8); but in about 980, after additional years of plotting, this oldest surviving son succeeded in driving his father out of Zion (15:16, 37) and even occupied the palace, on the roof of which he publicly cohabited with his father's concubines (16:22; on its retributive character, cf. 11:2; 12:8, 11–12). Scripture traces David's flight in detail. Whereas certain points, such as his initial tarrying "at a place some distance away" (Heb. bêt hammerhāq, 15:17; ASV mg., "at the Far House") remain uncertain, much of his route is identified by yet recognizable geographical features.

When David's party had moved eastward, across the brook Kidron (2 Sam. 15:23), he was overtaken by the high priest ZADOK and all the Levites bearing the ark of the covenant from its tent on Mount Zion; but David had them return to Jerusalem. The group moved E and "continued up the Mount of Olives" (v. 30). David was met by HUSHAI at "the summit, where people used to worship God" (v. 32), indicating the existence of a shrine, perhaps near the present Dome of the Ascension close to the summit of Olivet. David had taken the shorter, and harder, route over the crest of the ridge rather than going around the S end of Olivet, as does the modern highway to Jericho. Then, "a short distance beyond the summit" (16:1), he was met by ZIBA with provisions, from which point he proceeded past BAHURIM (v. 5), perhaps the modern Ras et-Temim, E of Mount Scopus (N of Olivet; cf. G. Wright and F. Filson, The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible, rev. ed. [1956], 108) and on toward the Jordan. Meanwhile the sons of the priests Zadok and Abiathar were waiting at En Rogel, just S of Jerusalem, to carry intelligence from Hushai to David (17:16–17); they were almost apprehended at Bahurim (v. 18), but managed to hide and then get the necessary word to David for a prompt crossing of the Jordan River (v. 22). After the defeat and death of Absalom, David was again installed in his capital of Jerusalem (19:15, 40; 20:3).

Near the end of his reign, David, in a moment of faithlessness (cf. Ps. 30:5–6), ordered a military census of Israel (2 Sam. 24:1–3), with the result that a divinely sent plague decimated the land (v. 15). When the angel of Yahweh had reached the threshing floor of A RAUNAH the Jebusite on Mount Moriah, he "stretched out his hand to destroy Jerusalem" (v. 16), but God stayed his hand. The king therefore erected an altar on the spot and offered up propitiating sacrifices (v. 25). He then consecrated the site as "the house of the LORD [Yahweh] God," where would be "the altar of burnt offering for Israel" (1 Chr. 22:1; cf. 2 Chr. 3:1); and he proceeded to make elaborate preparations for the construction there of the temple of Yahweh (1 Chr. 22:2–19; 28:1—29:19), to replace the tent sanctuary on Mount Zion (cf. 2 Sam. 1:1–7; 1 Chr. 6:32).

In 970, at the close of David's reign, his son ADONIJAH, who stood next to Absalom in point of age, proposed to usurp the throne of Israel from Solomon, the heir designate. While in the very act of being crowned at En Rogel (1 Ki. 1:9), Adonijah heard sounds from the Gihon Spring, 700 yards farther up the Kidron (which seems incredible but is still possible today), indicating that Nathan and Zadok had persuaded David to have Solomon anointed there, immediately, as his successor (vv. 38–45). Thus Adonijah's attempt was frustrated. Shortly thereafter, David died and was buried in the City of David (2:10; see below, III.B).

2. Solomon, to 930 B.C. Along with his positive admonitions of faithfulness to God and to the Mosaic law (1 Ki. 2:2–4), David had given his son Solomon certain more negative, deathbed instructions about the removal or liquidation of those who had at various times opposed the king (vv. 5–9). Some were soon slain by Solomon (vv. 25, 34) or banished from Jerusalem (vv. 26–27); but the Benjamite SHIMEI, who had cursed David during his flight through Bahurim (2 Sam. 16:5–13; cf. 19:16–23), was ordered to build a house in Jerusalem, with the understanding that this asylum should last only so long as he stayed within the city. He was to make no attempt to cross even the Kidron, eastward toward his home (1 Ki. 2:36–38; cf. J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Kings, ed. H. S. Geh-man, ICC [1951], 96). Three years later, in 967, Shimei broke his parole by a sudden pursuit westward to Gath to recover two runaway slaves. Upon his return Solomon was informed and Shimei was executed (vv. 39–49).

Like most of his royal successors in Judah, Solomon was born, lived, reigned, died, and was buried at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 12:24; 1 Ki. 11:42–43; 2 Chr. 1:13; 9:30; cf. Cant. 3:3). He considered Jerusalem as a standard of perfection (Cant. 6:4). Solomon conducted his Egyptian bride into this Davidic city, until he had built her a palace of her own (1 Ki. 3:1). He sacrificed before God's ark in Jerusalem (v. 15), and he left the city for his initial act of dedication to Yahweh (and his resultant acquisition of divine wisdom) only because the Mosaic TABERNACLE had not yet been moved down from GIBEON, 6 mi. to the N (1 Ki. 3:4; 2 Chr. 1:3–6).

Solomon proceeded to perform the actual construction of the Jerusalem TEMPLE that his father David had wished to build. It took from April/May of 966 (1 Ki. 6:1) to October/November of 959 (v. 38). Israel provided the labor force (5:13–17), but once again it was Hiram and the Phoenicians of Tyre who furnished both the timber and the skilled workers (5:6–12; cf. 2 Chr. 2:7). The great cedar logs were floated as rafts to the port of JOPPA, from which they were then transported overland to Jerusalem (2 Chr. 2:16). The basic plans for the temple called for an arrangement twice the size of the older tabernacle but also corresponded to the double chamber, porch, and court of known Egyptian and Phoenician temples of this period. They had been given their written formulation by David and, more fundamentally, by the very Spirit of God (1 Chr. 28:11–12, 19): it was the dwelling of God and, as the tabernacle before it, symbolized and typified the way of salvation, by which sinners may come to the presence of God (cf. Heb. 8:1–5; 9:23–24). The building itself faced E and was relatively small: 60 cubits (c. 90 ft.) long, 20 cubits (30 ft.) wide, and 30 cubits (45 ft.) high. Importance lay not only in the building but also in the sacred enclosure, with presumably the outdoor altar rather than the most holy place (the "oracle") of the building resting over the Moriah threshing floor (1 Chr. 22:1). This in turn would have required certain leveling and construction of retaining walls (see below, III.B).

The city walls of Jerusalem were necessarily extended northward to include the Moriah area (1 Ki. 3:1); and Kenyon discovered that occupation N of the original Canaanite northern wall (see above, A.1) did in fact begin in Solomonic times (Jerusalem, 56). On the W, the new walls simply continued along the western edge of the summit of the Zion-Moriah ridge; on the E, however, Zion's walls stood two-thirds of the way down the slope. These Solomon did not seek to extend, but built his northern prolongation along the eastern edge of the crest only (Kenyon, Jerusalem, 200 n. 20a), thus pinching off the width of the city to a little more than 50 yards, at least at the point where Solomon's addition joined the former northern wall. As a result of this expansion, the city grew from about 12 – 15 acres (and a population of perhaps 2,000–3,000) to about 35 acres (with a doubling or tripling of the population).

Solomon brought the ark up to Mount Moriah from Mount Zion during the Feast of Tabernacles the following year, 958 (2 Chr. 5:2–10). He also reunited it with the remaining elements of the Mosaic sanctuary by bodily transporting the tabernacle to Jerusalem from Gibeon and laying it up within the new temple (5:5). The climax of the dedication occurred when the theophanic cloud of God's glory entered and filled the temple (1 Ki. 8:10–11), so that it became in very truth the "house of the LORD." Jerusalem was thus confirmed as the chosen city of God, as the place in which his Name condescended to dwell (2 Chr. 6:6).

Solomon also constructed an acropolis complex, with casemate walls and presumably extensive stable facilities (cf. 1 Ki. 9:19; 10:26), at the N end of the crest of Zion (K. Kenyon, BA 27 [1964]:

41; cf. Jerusalem, 56). Among his other public buildings were the following: the “House of the Forest of Lebanon,” a 180-ft. hall resting on 45 columns of cedar in three rows; the throne room, which was distinguished as “the porch of judgment”; and a large palace, adequate for the king’s HAREM of 1,000 women (1 Ki. 7:2–8). This last edifice, in fact, required thirteen years for its construction, as opposed to the seven for the temple (v. 1), though the latter did have the benefit of David’s advance preparations. These structures are described as built “of blocks of high-grade stone cut to size and trimmed with a saw on their inner and outer faces of costly stones” (v. 9), topped by courses of cedar beams (v. 12). Kenyon’s discovery, by the N wall of the old city of Zion, of a proto-Aeolic pilaster capital and of carefully polished facing stones similar to those found in Ahab’s (Phoenician) palace at Samaria suggest the remnants of at least one of the Solomonic buildings at this point (Jerusalem, 59). Others were presumably erected to the S of the temple (where the Aksa Mosque now stands), at the SE end of Moriah, and in nearby areas.

The palace of the daughter of PHARAOH lay outside the City of David (1 Ki. 9:24), perhaps between Moriah and Zion, but not on either because of the presence of the holy ark, with which her own residence was felt to be incompatible (2 Chr. 8:11). It may have been associated with Ophel, possibly to the NE of the old Zion, where the ridge swings eastward; for the same term (‘ōpel H6755) may designate a similar “hill” or “projection” at Samaria (2 Ki. 5:24).

Scripture states also that Solomon made pools to water his trees (Eccl. 2:6), which may well refer to an “upper pool” near Gihon (cf. Isa. 7:3; 36:2; the old pool of 8:11?) and to the construction of the Shiloah water conduit (Isa. 8:6) for the water of the spring along the eastern side of Zion to the “Lower Pool” (22:9). This latter may be identified with the “King’s Pool” (Neh. 2:14), or the Pool of Shelah (3:15), at the southern end of the city by the king’s garden (2 Ki. 25:4), below the later Pool of SILOAM.

Evidence concerning the higher, western hill of Jerusalem used to be sparse. Kathleen Kenyon discovered no occupation on its SE slopes prior to the first Christian century, so she and others inferred that its S portion must not have been included within the city walls until HASMONEAN times. Excavations during the 1970s, however, have changed the picture dramatically (see below, II.C.3), and it is possible that some expansion to the W may have taken place as early as Solomon, who is said to have labored on the wall of Jerusalem (1 Ki. 9:15).

View looking SE across the Kidron Valley to the village of Silwan. The forested area above is called the Mount of Offense or Hill of Corruption because Solomon built residences and worship sites here for his foreign wives.

In the absence of clear evidence, we may envision a city shaped like a great inverted “L,” extending W and S from Mount Moriah. The large wall at the extreme S that moves across the central Tyropoeon Valley and along the rim of the Hinnom Valley was first identified by F. J. Bliss and E. C. Dickie in 1898 as the original Solomonic wall, but Kenyon dated it only to the time of Herod Agrippa I, A.D. 41–44 (Jerusalem, 155–161), and must be abandoned in favor of something more closely approximating the present SW wall of Jerusalem. The N wall of the W arm would have followed the natural defense line along the S edge of the “cross valley” (see above, I.B), moving directly W from the temple area (Jos. War 5.4.1).

Some time after the completion of Solomon’s various building projects, c. 945, he was visited in Jerusalem by the Arabian QUEEN OF SHEBA (1 Ki. 10:2), who was amazed by his civic accomplishments (vv. 4–5) as well as by his wisdom and spiritual blessings. The king had “made silver as common in Jerusalem as stones, and cedar as plentiful as sycamore-fig trees in the foothills” (v. 27). Yet in his latter years, Solomon’s faith suffered eclipse as he became ensnared in the idolatrous practices of his numerous foreign (pagan) wives (11:4–8). He built, for example, “a high place for Chemosh the detestable god of Moab” on a hill E of the city (v. 7). Tradition locates its site on “the Mount of Offense,” across the Kidron from the Pool of Siloam and the southern end of the SE hill that is Zion. See CORRUPTION, HILL (MOUNT) OF. As a result, Yahweh threatened the forfeiture of his kingdom (v. 11); indeed, it was at one of the very exits from Jerusalem that he awarded the whole of N and E Israel to JEROBOAM, subsequently the first ruler of the northern kingdom of Ephraim (v. 29). (For evidence that Jerusalem was a major city in the time of David and Solomon, see J. Cahill in BAR 30/6 [Nov.-Dec. 2004]: 20–31, 62–63.)

C. Divided kingdom. Even in his condemnation of Solomon’s latter-day apostasy (cf. Eccl. 1:16–17; 2:9–11), Yahweh had promised a continuation for at least one tribe under the Davidic dynasty, “for the sake of David my servant and for the sake of Jerusalem, which I have chosen” (1 Ki. 11:13; cf. vv. 32, 36). Actually, to the one group related to David, the tribe of Judah (12:20), there was added the tribe of Benjamin also (12:20–21), due doubtless to the location of Benjamin, “on the border of which Jerusalem was situated” (KD, Kings, 179). The prophet AHIJAH thus symbolically awarded JEROBOAM ten of the tribes, reserving two for Solomon’s son REHOBAM (11:31; on Benjamin’s association with Judah, cf. 2 Chr. 11:3, 23; the tribe of Simeon, though in the S, was associated with the northern kingdom of Israel, 15:9; 34:6).

1. Judah, to Jehu’s revolt, 841 B.C. Upon Solomon’s death in 930, and the refusal at SHECHEM of northern Israel (often referred to as EPHRAIM) to accept the kingship of Rehoboam, the latter fled to Jerusalem and sought to raise troops to subdue Ephraim (1 Ki. 12:18, 21). But God forbade it, and Rehoboam was forced to content himself with defensive measures (2 Chr. 11:5–12). Immediately after his own accession in the N, Jeroboam prohibited further pilgrimages to Jerusalem by members of the ten tribes (1 Ki. 12:27–28), though as a result many of the Levites emigrated S, strengthening the religious position of Jerusalem. Northern secular support for Rehoboam came to an end in three years (2 Chr. 11:14–17).

The division left Judah seriously weakened from a military standpoint, so that in 926, SHISHAK (Sheshonk I), first pharaoh of Egypt’s 22nd dynasty, was able to raid, almost at will, throughout Israel (2 Chr. 12:2–4). Jerusalem escaped actual plundering, but only by the payment of a heavy indemnity in treasure (v. 9) arranged between Shishak and Rehoboam, presumably at Gibeon (Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 327). This is confirmed by the omission of Jerusalem from the list of plundered cities, as inscribed on the wall of Shishak’s Karnak temple. The years that followed witnessed a further comparative impoverishment of Judah as opposed to the wealth of Israel and its successive capitals. ABIJAM (913–910) acted in faith and gained a striking victory against Israel, but only when almost overcome (2 Chr. 13).

All of the Judean kings of this period are stated to have been buried “in the City of David” (2 Chr. 12:16; 14:1; 21:1, 20), just as had David and Solomon before them (1 Ki. 2:10; 11:43). In the case of ASA son of Abijam in 869, Scripture states, “They buried him in the tomb that he had cut out for himself in the City of David” (2 Chr. 16:14). This statement might suggest that he was not buried “in the general tomb of the kings” (KD, Chronicles, 370), but elsewhere he is said to have been “buried with his fathers” (1 Ki. 15:24 KJV), a feature that had not appeared in the summaries of previous reigns but that is found henceforth for every monarch up to Hezekiah. Some infer from it that Asa may have been responsible for the construction of Jerusalem’s royal necropolis (see below, III.B, and cf. Simons, Jerusalem, chart of biblical citations on pp. 201–4).

JEHOSHAPHAT (872–848) succeeded in strengthening the garrisons in Jerusalem (2 Chr. 17:2, 13, 19); and he regularly employed the city as a center for judicial reform (19:8), for assembly in times of crisis (20:4–5, 18), and for the celebration of triumphs (vv. 27–28). Under his son JEHORAM, Jerusalem suffered attack by Philistines and Arabs, who succeeded in breaking into the city and even looting the royal palace (21:16–17). It is significant that Jehoram is singled out for having led Jerusalem into apostasy (vv. 11, 13), due in large measure to his wife ATHALIAH, daughter of AHAB and JEZEBEL in the N (v. 6). He died early in 841, after a reign of only eight years, of an incurable disease of the bowels (vv. 18–19). This, plus the fact of his whole unworthy administration, may account for his burial outside the tomb of the kings, though still in the City of David (v. 20) and “with his fathers” (2 Ki. 8:24, i.e., others of the royal family). His son AHAZIAH reigned during only part of one year and then lost his life to JEHU, in the latter’s northern revolt against the dynasty of Ahab.

Ahaziah was brought to Jerusalem and buried in the royal tomb (9:28).

2. To the fall of Samaria, 722 B.C. Jehu's revolt of 841 disrupted the course of both Hebrew kingdoms. In the S it led to a six-year usurpation by Athaliah, queen mother of Ahaziah. The boy king JOASH was restored to the throne at the age of seven by the high priest JEHOIADA. The latter had summoned faithful leaders out of all Judah (2 Chr. 23:2) and had Athaliah executed at the horse gate of the palace (v. 15, prob. not to be confused with the HORSE GATE that was one of the main entrances to the city; see below, III.A). In both N and S, it made possible a period of Aramean domination. See ARAM (COUNTRY). HAZAEL of Damascus advanced as far as Gath in the SW, and only a tribute gained by stripping Jerusalem's temple and royal palace of their gold and treasures was able to save the city itself (2 Ki. 12:18–19). This was particularly discouraging, for Joash had been distinguished by his concern for the repair of the now deteriorating temple (v. 5). Finally in 813, his twenty-third year, he and his high priestly adviser, Jehoiada, had overcome priestly inertia and inefficiency by means of a special campaign and offering chest, so that considerable improvement was achieved (vv. 11–14). It was Joash's own later faithlessness, including even the execution of Jehoiada's son Zechariah, who had rebuked him, that led Yahweh to deliver up Jerusalem to a markedly inferior Aramean army (2 Chr. 24:23–24). The merit of Joash's regent Jehoiada is indicated by the latter's receiving burial in the City of David among the kings (v. 16); but, as in the case of his grandfather Jehoram, Joash died in disgrace and was buried outside the tomb of the kings, but within the City of David (v. 25).

His son AMAZIAH, who acceded to the throne in 796, suffered such a defeat before the armies of N Israel that Jerusalem was plundered; in this attack, much of the northern wall, from the EPHRAIM GATE to the (NW) CORNER GATE, was demolished (2 Ki. 14:13–14). This event can be dated precisely to 790 B.C., the time of UZZIAH's elevation to coregency (E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 1st ed. [1951], 70–72; contrast his less likely, earlier date in the 2nd ed. [1965], 83; cf. the 3rd ed. [1983], 118–119).

Uzziah, the son, accomplished major reconstruction, including the wrecked Corner Gate and the VALLEY GATE (see below, III.A; 2 Chr. 26:9). He erected catapults and other military engines for the defense of Jerusalem's ramparts. "His fame spread far and wide, for he was greatly helped until he became powerful" (v. 15). Kenyon's excavations have indicated a fairly complete rebuilding of the old Jebusite walls of 1800 B.C. at this time, after some 1,000 years of use, and a bit farther down the E slope of Zion (Jerusalem, 67; cf. Manasseh's "outer" wall, 2 Chr. 33:14). Uzziah may also have been responsible for a fortress and palace 3 mi. to the S of Zion, modern Ramat Rahel (M. Avi-Yonah, Jerusalem [1960], 38).

Uzziah and his son and coregent JOTHAM (751–736) seem to have been responsible for leveling out the "pinched off" area of the Solomonic extension of Jerusalem between Zion and Moriah (2 Chr. 27:3; cf. above, II.B.2, and see OPHEL), by running a wall so as to include much of the slope of this eastern part of the ridge, just as was already included along Mount Zion to the S (cf. ANGLE, THE). Because of Uzziah's eventual death by leprosy in 739, his interment, although in the City of David (2 Ki. 15:7), is specified as "in a field for burial that belonged to the kings" (2 Chr. 26:23); that is, he "was not buried in the graves of the kings, but only in the neighbourhood of them...that his body might not defile the royal graves" (KD, Chronicles, 430). That he was buried "with his fathers" (2 Ki. 15:7) might then indicate the less honorable tomb of his grandfather Joash, and perhaps of Jehoram as well (see above). Simons, however, suggests: "not in one of the monumental rock tombs underneath, but in the 'field' above" (Jerusalem, 205). This might account in turn for the subsequent removal of his remains to another location. In 1931, E. L. Sukenik discovered in a museum on the Mount of Olives a marble tablet, a little over one foot square, dating to the late 1st cent. B.C., and reading in four lines of Aramaic, “Hither were brought the bones of Uzziah, king of Judah. Not to be opened.” (See photo under UZZIAH.)

The works of Uzziah and Jotham proved sufficient for the latter’s son, AHAZ, to withstand a siege by PEKAH of Samaria and REZIN of Damascus in 734 (2 Ki. 16:5; Isa. 7:1–2). Both Ephraimites and Arameans were able to carry off thousands of Judean captives (2 Chr. 28:5, 8; cf. vv. 9–15 on the return of 200,000 from Samaria). The Philistines and Edomites did the same on their respective borders (vv. 17–18), which may account for the prophecies of Obadiah and Joel at this time (cf. Obad. 11, 19–20; Joel 3:4, 19; cf. E.J. Young, An Introduction to the Old Testament, rev. ed. [1960], 255, 260) and Joel’s proclamation of a fast and solemn assembly in Jerusalem (2:15). Contrary to the admonitions of Isaiah (Isa. 7:4–9), Ahaz forsook faith in God, submitted to the rising power of the Assyrians, and appealed to them for deliverance (2 Ki. 16:7–9; 2 Chr. 28:16), though this led to the fall of the northern kingdom, twelve years later in 722, and to the great Assyrian oppressions of Judah in the decades following.

Ahaz (743–728) was one of Judah’s most undesirable monarchs. He “cut in pieces the utensils of the house of God. He shut up the doors of the house of the LORD and made himself altars in every corner of Jerusalem” (2 Chr. 28:24 NRSV). He is the first to be mentioned as practicing idolatry in the Hinnom Valley (v. 3), going as far as child sacrifice. Among the 8th-cent. prophets, Isaiah and Micah were particularly outspoken in their condemnation of the sins of contemporary Jerusalem (cf. Isa. 3:8; 10:10–11; Mic. 1:5; 3:10; cf. also Amos 2:4–5 regarding the northern kingdom). Ahaz lost his throne in 728 after a sixteen-year reign (2 Ki. 16:2; cf. 17:1; 18:1) and died two years later (Isa. 14:28; cf. v. 29 and see J. B. Payne in BSac 126 [1969]: 41–42). For his weakness and iniquity he was excluded from the tombs of the kings, though he was interred in Jerusalem (2 Chr. 28:27) in the City of David (2 Ki. 16:20).

In 725, which seems to have constituted the first official year of his son HEZEKIAH, the latter instituted a series of reforms in Jerusalem: reopening the temple (2 Chr. 29:3); burning the pagan articles that were found in its courts, over the ledge in the Kidron Valley to its E (v. 16; cf. 30:14); and sending from Dan to Beersheba, including the northern tribes, proclamations to keep the Passover (30:1, 5–9). Some of the Ephraimites mocked, but others did come (vv. 10–11, 26); for the Assyrians had already begun their final assault on Samaria and perhaps even encouraged such departures from the authority of N Israel (cf. ibid., 44).

3. To the fall of Jerusalem, 586 B.C. Hezekiah strengthened the walls of Jerusalem in the face of the Assyrian danger (2 Chr. 32:5; cf. Isa. 22:10). He stopped up the local water sources (2 Chr. 32:3–4) and constructed his famous tunnel (see below, III.B). He seems also to have advanced Jerusalem’s line of fortifications southward by “another wall” (v. 5), so as to include the KING’S GARDEN and the Pool of SHELAH (Neh. 3:15 NRSV; NIV, S ILOAM; cf. the “reservoir between the two walls,” Isa. 22:11). An impressive wall (about 210 ft. long and 23 ft. thick) has been discovered in what is now the Jewish Quarter, and many scholars are confident that it should be identified with Hezekiah’s new wall and with Nehemiah’s BROAD WALL (Neh. 3:8; 12:38; see the account of this dramatic find in Avigad, Discovering Jerusalem, 46–54; according to Ben-Dov, Historical Atlas, 64 [illustration on p. 65], this wall was part of an internal system of fortification, possibly protecting a palace). The evidence now makes clear that, by this time, the city had expanded to cover 120 acres or more, and that therefore the population had grown to at least 15,000 and perhaps as many as 25,000 (possibly in part because of the influx of refugees from the N after the Assyrian conquests; see Avigad, Discovering Jerusalem, 55).

The entire ministry of the greatest of the prophets, ISAIAH, centered in Zion (cf. Isa. 2:1; 40:2; 62:1), though it is chs. 13–66 of his book that date to the reign of Hezekiah (14:28; 20:1; 36:1; cf. 1:1). He preached justice and holiness (e.g., 28:14, 15; 29:13; ch. 57) and condemned Hezekiah's dependence upon an Egyptian alliance or upon his own building projects, in the king's vain hope of defying Assyria (20:5–6; 22:11–12; 30:1–5). In the days of Ahaz, shortly after 734, Isaiah had predicted an Assyrian attack, advancing against Jerusalem from Bethel and Ai (Aiath) in the N down to Nob, from which the Assyrians could “shake their fist at the mount of the Daughter of Zion, at the hill of Jerusalem” (10:28–32; cf. Mic. 1:9). NOB probably identifies the ridge with that which was later called Mount Scopus, NE of the city, a N extension of Olivet.

SARGON II of Assyria campaigned in the W in 720, when he defeated the Egyptians at RAPHIA on their border, and again in 711, when he destroyed ASHDOD on the Philistine plain. Because in his annals of the latter event Sargon spoke of “punishing Judah,” the Isa. 8 passage may be descriptive of the route of the 711 attack (G. A. Barton, Archaeology and the Bible [1937], 469). Yet it may refer to the year 701, when although the main army of Sargon's successor SENNACHERIB moved against Jerusalem from LACHISH in the SW (cf. Mic. 1:10–15), another Assyrian unit may have marched against it via Samaria (cf. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible, 393).

Although Hezekiah had been forced to make peace with Sennacherib soon after the latter's advance into the outlying areas of Judah, and although he had surrendered a rich tribute by stripping the Jerusalem temple and palace of their treasures (2 Ki. 18:13–16), the Assyrians had treacherously broken faith with Hezekiah (cf. Isa. 33:7–8; 36:2), perhaps in the hope of further plunder from Jerusalem itself. Having laid the city under siege, the Assyrian commander or RAB-SHAKEH stood by the old Solomonic conduit and upper pool in the Kidron and ridiculed and blasphemed the God whose agent Assyria had, up to this point, unwittingly been (Isa. 10:5–7; 36:17, 20; cf. 37:10, 12). Rabshakeh's speech bears indirect testimony to the effectiveness of Hezekiah's earlier reforms toward a purified, centralized sanctuary, for he accused the king of opposing Yahweh, “whose high places and altars Hezekiah removed, saying to Judah and Jerusalem, ‘You must worship before this altar in Jerusalem’” (2 Ki. 18:22; cf. Isa. 36:7).

In sincere repentance for his militarism, Hezekiah then turned to Yahweh and to his servant Isaiah (Isa. 37:2–7). As a result, the prophet fearlessly proclaimed the inviolability of Zion, that “the Virgin [inviolable] Daughter of Zion” would laugh the Assyrian to scorn (v. 22), and that God would defend Jerusalem, saving it “for my sake and for the sake of David my servant” (v. 35; cf. v. 33, or 31:4–5, 8–9). Soon thereafter, the Assyrian armies withdrew from the capital because of word of an Egyptian advance from the SW (37:8–9); and though Sennacherib's messengers continued to bring threatening letters against the city (vv. 10–14), the Lord did miraculously deliver Judah, striking down 185,000 of the enemy in one night, so that Sennacherib withdrew, never to return (vv. 36–38; 31:8; cf. 2 Chr. 32:23).

It is significant, however, that Isaiah's contemporary, Micah, proclaimed an opposite destructibility for Zion because of sin (Mic. 3:10–12). Punishment had been merely alleviated through the king's repentance (Jer. 26:19), and Isaiah too could speak of a postponed but still inevitable destruction (Isa. 39:5–8). Even at that time it was but a “remnant” that escaped the depredations and deportations of Sennacherib (37:32; cf. 36:1), and much of the next period of Isaiah's ministry was devoted to comforting Jerusalem, which had received of Yahweh's hand (through Sennacherib) double for all her sins (40:2; 51:17; cf. J. B. Payne in WTJ 29 [1966–67]: 179–90, and 30 [1967–68]: 50–59, 185–203).

Hezekiah's burial is located "on the ascent to the tombs of the descendants of David" (2 Chr. 32:33 NRSV). The language does not necessarily imply a burial place outside the royal sepulchres, but possibly the higher part of the graves, perhaps "due to the lack of room in the hereditary burying place of the kings" (E. L. Curtis, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Chronicles, ICC [1910], 493–94; see below, III.B). During the preceding 8th cent., Hezekiah's grandfather Jotham (2 Ki. 15:38) and great-great-grandfather Amaziah (14:20; 2 Chr. 25:28) had been buried in the royal necropolis, and Hezekiah was apparently the last monarch to be so interred.

Hezekiah's weaker successor, MANASSEH, resubmitted to Assyria and forfeited the independence that his father had gained at such cost (cf. 2 Chr. 33:11), though he did later rebuild the walls of old Zion (v. 14). K. Kenyon (Jerusalem, 66–68) describes, in fact, no less than six rebuildings of the SE wall during the last century and a half of the southern kingdom (Judah). None were built on the bedrock, as had been the previous Jebusite wall, which may account for some of the collapses even apart from hostile attack.

The ruins of a few small 7th-cent. houses have also been recovered from the top of the E slope of Zion, the earliest actual floorplans known from Jerusalem (ibid., 82–84). Their contributions to cultural knowledge, however, are disappointing. The homes there must have belonged to the lower classes: irregular in shape, with poorly built walls of rough stone covered with mud plaster. Pottery fragments were abundant, including a number of figurines of the fertility goddess and of animals, perhaps also used in apostate worship. Most significant were forty-one disk shaped stone weights of assorted sizes up to twenty-four shekels (c. 10 ounces), carefully polished and marked with their values.

The reign of Manasseh marked, indeed, the lowest point of religious practice in Jerusalem since the time of the Jebusites; and from a theological viewpoint the sins of this king rendered the destruction of Jerusalem inescapable (2 Ki. 21:13; cf. 23:26; 24:3). Both he and his short-lived son and successor AMON (642–640) maintained the idolatrous Solomonic shrines that still existed on the Hill of Corruption (23:13). "In both courts of the temple of the LORD" (2 Ki. 21:5) he practiced astral worship, which had been a temptation even from Mosaic times (Deut. 4:19; 17:3) but which now revived, perhaps as an adjunct to Assyrian overlordship. He rebuilt the high places that his father Hezekiah had overthrown (2 Ki. 21:3), "shed so much innocent blood that he filled Jerusalem from end to end" (v. 16), and even returned to the practices of the Canaanites, whom the Lord had cast out from before the children of Israel (2 Chr. 33:2), including child sacrifice in the Valley of Hinnom (v. 6). "Manasseh led Judah and the people of Jerusalem astray, so that they did more evil than the nations the LORD had destroyed before the Israelites" (v. 9).

Late in his reign, Manasseh was summoned to Babylon by the Assyrian monarch ASHURBANIPAL, perhaps in 648 after a major revolt in that city had been brought to an end. In fear for his life, Manasseh turned to Yahweh and was delivered (2 Chr. 33:12–13). Although he removed "all the altars he had built on the temple hill and in Jerusalem," throwing them out of the city (v. 15), he was unable at that late date to undo a lifetime of corruption or to stop the people from a continuing resort to the high places (v. 17).

At some point during his long, fifty-five year reign, the original tombs of the kings seem to have been sealed off or at least abandoned, perhaps because of being filled. As a result, royal burials from the time of Manasseh onward to the end of the southern kingdom were performed in "the garden of Uzza" (2 Ki. 21:18, 26; cf. 23:30 with 2 Chr. 35:24). The location is undefinable, except that it formed a part of the gardens of Manasseh's palace.

Upon the murder of Amon in 640, JOSIAH acceded to the throne of Judah at the age of eight years.

Twelve years later, in 628, Assyria was overrun by the SCYTHIANS; and Josiah assumed adult control in Jerusalem, expanding his nation politically as far as Naphtali in N Galilee (2 Chr. 34:6) and purifying it religiously, especially its capital, of all forms of idolatry (vv. 3–4). Still, the prophets Zephaniah and Jeremiah paint a gloomy picture of the complacency and yet continuing superstitions of the Jerusalem of this period (cf. Zeph. 1:4, 12; Jer. 1:15–16; 4:14; 7:17–18).

Evidence of the Babylonian siege and destruction of Jerusalem was discovered along these foundation walls (Area G, Bullae House).

With the discovery of the Mosaic lawbook in 622 came Josiah's great reformation. "He did away with the pagan priests...around Jerusalem" (2 Ki. 23:5; cf. v. 13) and eliminated the high places and local sanctuaries, even when conducted in the name of Yahweh, that he might bring the priests to the one authorized, central temple (v. 8; cf. Deut. 12:4–14). The Passover on Zion in 622 proved thus to be the greatest one observed in Israel since the days of the judges (2 Ki. 23:22–23; cf. 2 Chr. 35:18). Many of the local priests, however, refused to transfer to the service of the Jerusalem altar (2 Ki. 23:9).

Three specific areas of Jerusalem are first mentioned at this time. A place named TOPHETH lay in the Valley of Hinnom near the Potsherd Gate (Jer. 19:2, 6, 14). The name means "hearth, fireplace" (cf. Isa. 30:33), for it was here on HIGH PLACES in the valley that in previous reigns children had been burned as sacrifices (Jer. 7:31). But Josiah defiled Topheth by converting it into the city refuse dump (2 Ki. 23:10) so that the Valley of Hinnom (NT GEHENNA) and its constant fires became a designation for HELL itself (Mk. 9:47–48). Within the city, Scripture speaks of Josiah's SECOND DISTRICT or "New Quarter" (mišneh H5467, 2 Ki. 22:14; Zeph. 1:10), presumably indicating the N and W portion of the city (Montgomery, Kings, 526); cf. Nehemiah's later division of the city's administration into half-districts (Neh. 3:9, 12). On Moriah, at the NW corner of the temple, was built the Tower of HANANEL (Jer. 31:38; Neh. 3:1; Zech. 14:10).

After Josiah's death in 609, Jerusalem suffered under its four last, incompetent Davidic kings.

JEHOIAKIM (608–598), for example, practiced injustice and the enslavement of his people to erect an extravagant palace (Jer. 22:13–15; cf. 2 Ki. 24:4) that was doomed to destruction within a score of years and not a stone of which can yet be identified in Jerusalem. In 605, Jehoiakim was forced to submit to NEBUCHADNEZZAR II of Babylon, who proceeded to plunder the temple treasure and take captive certain prominent hostages (2 Chr. 36:7; Dan. 1:1–4), a fact validated by the appearing of the king's own contemporaneous chronicles of his western campaigns (D. J. Wiseman, Chronicles of Chaldean Kings [1956]). A subsequent revolt resulted in a brief Babylonian siege of Jerusalem in 597. The city capitulated on March 16, with more plundering as a result, as well as the deportation of the newly installed Jewish king with over 10,000 captives (2 Ki. 24:10–16).

Shortly after this event (cf. Jer. 29:2), the prophet JEREMIAH attempted to encourage his people with a prediction of future restoration, in the course of which he defined a rough outline of the city of Jerusalem: “this city will be rebuilt for me from the Tower of Hananel to the Corner Gate. The measuring line will stretch from there straight to the hill of Gareb and then turn to Goah. The whole valley where dead bodies and ashes are thrown, and all the terraces out to the Kidron Valley on the east as far as the corner of the Horse Gate, will be holy to the LORD. The city will never again be uprooted or demolished” (31:38–41).

Because the Tower of Hananel stood at the NW corner of the temple and the Horse Gate at its SE (see below, III .A), the prophet must have been making a counterclockwise circuit of what would some day be a dedicated community, omitting the temple area on the city's NE as already holy ground. The geographical question involved is whether Jeremiah was envisioning a future expansion or simply describing the preexilic city as it existed in 597, that is, whether Mount Gareb (if it really is the SW hill of Jerusalem; see above, I.B) did or did not as yet lie within the existing walls. It probably did, especially since the Corner Gate had existed since at least 800 B.C. (2 Ki. 14:13; 2 Chr. 26:9; cf. Simons, Jerusalem, 231, and see above, B.2).

A final desperate revolt under Judah's last king, ZEDEKIAH, ended in a two and one-half year siege of Jerusalem, from January 588 to July 586 (2 Ki. 25:1–3). One month later, the Babylonian commander burned the temple, the palaces, and the houses of Jerusalem and broke down its surrounding walls (vv. 8–11).

D. Restoration. As indicated above, the same prophets who had foretold the fall of Jerusalem were often the very ones who went on to anticipate its restoration (cf. Isa. 39:7 with 52:2, 11–12; and Mic. 3:12 with 7:11). In 587, just one year before the final catastrophe, Jeremiah was even directed of God to purchase property in nearby Anathoth as a concrete testimony to Jerusalem's forthcoming reoccupation (Jer. 32:1, 9, 43–44).

1. Exile, to 538 B.C. From the burning of the temple, which began on 14 August 586 (2 Ki. 25:8–9; Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, 3rd ed., 190), Jerusalem lay desolate. Jeremiah, who had elected to stay in Judah (Jer. 40:4–6), remained in MIZPAH with the Jewish governor GEDALIAH; and he had no more apparent contacts with the ex-capital, except by way of allusion to its former sins and to God's punitive wrath (42:18; 44:9, 13). It was presumably he who at this time composed the moving LAMENTATIONS, with their description of Jerusalem's burning, deaths, and incurable overthrow (e.g., Lam. 2:3–5, 13), due however to her sins (1:8; 4:13). The city is personified as one who, during a time of affliction, “remembers all the treasures that were hers in days of old” (1:7) and exclaims, “Is it nothing to you, all you who pass by?” (v. 12).

At the Feast of Tabernacles in September/ October of 586 (cf. Jer. 41:1), groups of pilgrims came from N Israel, having “shaved off their beards, torn their clothes and cut themselves,” yet “bringing grain offerings and incense with them to the house of the Lord” (41:5), for the site of the temple “still retained its sanctity even after it was destroyed” (J. Bright, Jeremiah, AB 21 [1965], 254). It was at this time that Gedaliah was murdered (41:2–3), and the last hope of Judah was extinguished (cf. 52:30 on a final, fourth deportation of 745 persons, in 582, that may have been the result of this action). Jeremiah, in Egypt, spoke of Jerusalem and the cities of Judah as “deserted and in ruins” (44:2; cf. v. 6). Although it is possible that the disorganized remnant that was scattered over the countryside (cf. 2 Ki. 25:12, 22) may have continued some sort of ritual on Mount Moriah, the actual city lay in ruins. The critical theories of C. C. Torrey, who denied any real exile, have been discredited by convincing archaeological testimony to the thoroughgoing depopulation of Judah and the transfer of the center of Jewish life to Babylonia (cf. W. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity: Monotheism and the Historical Process, 2nd ed. [1957], 322–23).

Among the exiles of all four deportations (years 605, 597, 586, and 582), Jerusalem remained the focus of their devotion, first in sorrow (Ps. 137:1) but then in hope of restoration (e.g., Ezek. 34:13; 36:38). They were determined not to forget Jerusalem (Ps. 137:5). The custom of making prayer when facing toward the holy city (1 Ki. 8:30, 35) was maintained at three regular times in the day (Dan. 6:10), and at all costs. Jeremiah had limited the time of captivity and of Jerusalem’s desolations to seventy years (Jer. 25:11–12; 29:10; cf. Dan. 9:2), presumably from the date of 605 (Jer. 25:1). As this time approached, EZEKIEL in particular gave detailed instructions and patterns for a reconstruction of the Jerusalem temple by his exilic contemporaries (cf. Ezek. 43:10–11).

When Babylon finally fell to the armies of Medo-Persia in October of 539, DANIEL fervently interceded, “turn away your anger and your wrath from Jerusalem, your city, your holy hill” (Dan. 9:16); and he was assured of a decree “to restore and rebuild Jerusalem” (v. 25). In point of fact, the Persian decrees for the reconstruction of the city were not issued until the following century, under ARTAXERXES I. But in 538, the first official year of CYRUS as king in Babylon, permission was granted for the Jews to return and rebuild the house (temple) of God which was in Jerusalem (2 Chr. 36:23; Ezra 1:2; cf. Isaiah’s Cyrus prophecy, which had spoken of Jerusalem’s rebuilding, but with emphasis upon the temple, Isa. 44:28).

2. Persian, to 332 B.C. Cyrus’s decree of 538, which authorized the Jews to go up to Jerusalem out of their Babylonian exile and to reestablish the services of the temple (Ezra 1:2–4; cf. 6:2–5), came because of Yahweh’s having touched the heart of the Persian king (v. 1). Even in its religious wording it is not without parallel among other contemporaneous grants of freedom that he bestowed to win over former Babylonian subjects to his own administration (cf. J. Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past, 2nd ed. [1959], 229–30). Cyrus even ordered the return to Jerusalem of the temple vessels that had been plundered by Nebuchadnezzar (Ezra 1:7, 11; 5:14–15; 6:5). This was followed in 637 by the return of the Jews under SHESHBAZZAR (1:8, 11; 5:14; he was presumably the Shenazzar of 1 Chr. 3:18, and hence a Jewish prince, one of the seven sons of Jehoiachin; cf. IDB, 4:325–326) and by the rededication of the altar under his nephew ZERUBBABEL, who had become associated with him as governor (Ezra 2:2; 3:1–2). Then in the spring of 536 the people reassembled in Jerusalem (3:8; cf. v. 1) and began the rebuilding of the temple, under both Sheshbazzar and Zerubbabel (3:8; 5:16), by an official relaying of the foundation accompanied by trumpets, singing, and thanksgiving (3:8–11; cf. 2:69). See CHRONOLOGY (OT) XII.

SAMARITAN opposition, however, prevented further progress in the construction of the second temple until 520, sixteen years later (Ezra 4:4, 5, 24). The ex-captives were not lacking in potential, since they numbered c. 50,000 (2:64–67); but most of them settled down in their respective towns and villages rather than in Jerusalem (vv. 1, 70; cf. vv. 21–28), becoming increasingly concerned with their own individual welfare, whereas the Lord’s house lay waste (Hag. 1:2–4). God then sent a series of natural catastrophes that resulted in impoverishment for the entire community (Hag. 1:6,9–11; 2:16–17; Zech. 8:10).

In the summer of 520, by the preaching of the prophets HAGGAI and ZECHARIAH, God shook the Jewish leaders and people out of their lethargy (Ezra 5:1; cf. Hag. 1:7–8; Zech. 1:16; 4:7–9); he reiterated his own undying concern for Jerusalem (Zech. 1:17; 2:4, 12; 3:2; 8:3, 15), and building was resumed. The Persian satrap TATTENAI was initially suspicious; but an inquiry sent to the new king DARIUS I not only confirmed Cyrus’s original decree (Ezra 6:2) but also granted imperial support for the Jerusalem temple, where God “has caused his Name to dwell” (v. 12). It was finally completed early in 515 and dedicated with joy, and the regular Mosaic service was reestablished (vv. 14–18).

No remains of Zerubbabel’s temple have survived; not even a description is extant. Only negative data is available, namely, that it failed badly of attaining the specifications that Ezekiel had laid down for the postexilic sanctuary, as stated above (cf. the disappointment expressed by certain of its contemporaries when comparing it with the first temple, Ezra 3:12). Jerusalem lay undefended and largely uninhabited except for the leaders of the community (Ezra 6:9; Neh. 11:1; cf. Zech. 7:3). There were factors involved in Jerusalem and its new shrine, however, that were greater than mere population or silver and gold; for the postexilic prophets spoke of Messiah’s coming to this second temple (Zech. 9:9; 11:12–13; Mal. 3:1). Thus the city’s name, Jerusalem, “foundation of peace,” took on a new and deeper meaning as the place in which God would effectuate his peace (Hag. 2:9; Heb. 7:2; cf. Matt. 11:28; Jn. 14:27).

Conditions in late-6th and early-5th-cent. Jerusalem can be only surmised from Scripture. In 518, the prophet Zechariah recorded the coming of a delegation from Bethel to inquire of the priests and prophets at the temple about a matter of ceremony, which indicates the capital’s status as a center for religious guidance (Zech. 7:1–3). Their particular inquiry concerned the need for a continual observance of fasting, commemorative of the tragic events of 586—the fall of Jerusalem on July 18 (fourth month), its burning on August 14 (fifth month, vv. 3, 5), and the murder of Gedaliah in October (seventh month, 8:18), as well as the inception of the siege on 15 January 588 (tenth month, 8:18; cf. Thiele, Mysterious Numbers, 3rd ed., 190)—now that seventy years had passed and the temple was well on its way to restoration (7:5). God’s reply through Zechariah laid down ethical standards of truth, justice, and mercy (7:8–10; 8:16–17), by the observance of which the fasts should be converted into “happy festivals” (8:19; cf. the beautiful picture of vv. 4–5). That the actual continuation of the fasts suggests a generally unre-formed society in Jerusalem received confirmation from later, 5th-cent. writers (cf. Neh. 5:5–8; Mal. 2:7, 11; 3:15).

At the close of his ministry, probably after the Greco-Persian war of 480–479 (cf. Zech. 9:13), Zechariah predicted that the city would be “raised up and remain in its place, from the Benjamin Gate [on the E, probably the MUSTER GATE] to the site of the First Gate [perhaps the EPHRAIM GATE or the OLD GATE], to the Corner Gate [on the W], and from the Tower of Hananel [on the N] to the royal winepresses [perhaps at the KING’S GARDEN on the S]” (14:10). These details indicate a set of traditional extremities for the city (see below, under “Nehemiah’s walls,” and in III.A). The nature of Samaritan complaints against the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem during the reign of XERXES, 485–465 (Ezra 4:6), remains unknown; but they were probably due to a continuing policy of exclusion by the Jews (cf. v. 3).

A major, second return of Israel to Jerusalem was accomplished in the 5th cent., in the summer of 458, under the leadership of EZRA (Ezra 7:7), with authorization and support by the Persian monarch ARTAXERXES I (vv. 12–26). The numbers were smaller, about 1,500; but the wealth that was brought to beautify God’s house was greater (7:27; 8:25–30, 33–36). Ezra then assembled the men of Judah and Benjamin in Jerusalem, early in January of 457 (10:7–10), this time to enforce the regulations of the Mosaic law, to which he had committed himself (cf. 7:10, 25–26), especially in reference to mixed marriages.

At some point during the reign of Artaxerxes (465–424), the Samaritans are known to have frustrated an attempt to reconstruct the walls of Jerusalem (Ezra 4:16, 23), presumably by Ezra, at his return in 458 (cf. 9:9 with 7:18, 25). Their accusations of intended rebellion were false (4:12–13, 16), though they provide a significant commentary on both the power and the faithless rebelliousness of preexilic Jerusalem (v. 15; cf. vv. 19–20).

A decade later, NEHEMIAH, a high-ranking Jew and cupbearer to King Artaxerxes, upon learning of the overthrow of Ezra’s attempt at refortification (Neh. 1:3), gained royal permission to return and reconstruct the walls of Jerusalem (2:8). Three days after his arrival, Nehemiah made a nighttime reconnaissance of the S part of the city (vv. 11–15), then formulated his plans, and upon their presentation was able to persuade the Jewish rulers to undertake the task (vv. 17–18). Like Zerubbabel before him (Ezra 4:3), Nehemiah made it clear that only God’s redeemed people of Israel had portion or right in respect to Jerusalem (Neh. 2:20). The result was bitter opposition on the part of the Samaritans (4:7–8; 6:2, 5–7, 12, 19; cf. 2:19). During the summer of 444, by an energetic campaign of only fifty-two days, during which assigned segments of the wall were rebuilt by specific groups of volunteers, Nehemiah was able to achieve his goal (4:6; 6:15).

The third chapter of Nehemiah’s book describes the course of the walls, beginning at the NE of Jerusalem and moving in a counterclockwise direction (by this time the size of the city had been reduced to about 30 acres). The features he listed are these:

1. the SHEEP GATE (Neh. 3:1)
2. the Tower of the HUNDRED (3:1; KJV, “Meah”)
3. the Tower of HANANEL (3:1)
4. the FISH GATE (3:3)
5. the OLD GATE (3:6; NIV, “Jeshanah”)
6. the BROAD WALL (3:8)
7. the Tower of the OVENS (3:11; KJV, “furnaces”)
8. the VALLEY GATE (3:13)
9. the DUNG GATE (3:14)
10. the wall of the Pool of SHELAH (NIV, SILOAM) by the KING’S GARDEN (3:15)
11. the FOUNTAIN GATE (3:15)
12. a place “opposite the tombs of David” (3:16)
13. a place “facing the ascent to the armory as far as the angle” (3:19; cf. vv. 20, 24–25; see ANGLE, THE)
14. “the tower projecting from the upper palace near the court of the guard” (3:25)
15. the WATER GATE on the E (3:26)
16. the wall of OPHEL (3:27)
17. the HORSE GATE (3:28);
18. the EAST GATE (3:29)

19. the MUSTER GATE (3:31; KJV, “Miphkad”; NIV, “Inspection”)
20. “the corner” (3:31–32; see CORNER, UPPER ROOM OF THE)
21. the SHEEP GATE (3:32, repeated).

Apparently Nehemiah did not intend this list to be exhaustive of distinguishable points on the perimeter of Jerusalem, but simply to mark off the building segments. Elsewhere he mentions other landmarks: the CORNER GATE (Zech. 14:10); the JACKAL WELL (Neh. 2:13; see above, I.C); and the Gate of the Guard (12:39; see GUARD, GATE OF THE), though this last may have been only an inner gate of the temple. No distances for the segments are given, except for 1,000 cubits (c. 1,500 ft.) between the Valley Gate and the Dung Gate (3:13), one of the two unusually long assignments on the SW side of the city.

A general agreement now exists over the location of items no. 1–3 and 9–20 (cf. Simons, Jerusalem, ch. 7); but that of nos. 4–8 depends upon whether Nehemiah’s city embraced all of Jerusalem’s SW hill (L.-H. Vincent, J. Simons, M. Ben-Dov), only part of it, or none (K. Kenyon, Y. Aharoni, and M. Avi-Yonah; see maps with alternate views in Ben-Dov, Historical Atlas, 86–87). The total length of the walls in Nehemiah’s time may thus have been as little as c. 2,500 meters (8,200 ft.) or as much as 4,000 meters (13,000 ft.). (Correspondingly, the population may have been as small as several hundred or as large as a few thousand.) The longer distance is supported by the large number of gates mentioned; small cities usually had only one or two gates for security reasons. In any event, large elements of earlier walls must have been reused for their completion in the fifty-two days indicated.

In its S portion, however, the work of 444 enclosed only the crest of the City of David. These are the solid but rough walls, 9 ft. thick, reported by J. W. Crowfoot and R. A. S. Macalister, which the latter from his digging in 1923–26 erroneously identified as David’s eastern wall. Nehemiah’s reduced circuit would seem to have been dictated by the availability of water from Hezekiah’s tunnel, which obviated the need for fortifications that would extend down to the lower slopes on the E side of Zion for access to the Gihon Spring, and by the now irreparable collapse of the old Jebusite terraces above it, following 586 (note Nehemiah’s inability even to pick a way through while on his initial reconnaissance, Neh. 2:14). Thus, whereas the W part of his reconstruction may have consisted in the repair of former gates and walls still largely in existence (e.g., nos. 8, 9, 11; 3:1–15), his really new and hardest work lay along the E crest of Zion (note how nos. 12, 13, 14, 16 are all interior designations; vv. 16–27). It was an ascent (12:37), and a resumed notation of former gates comes only with the N part of the eastern walls (e.g., nos. 17–19, 28–32), which would have again followed the line of Solomonic fortifications.

To the W lay no. 8, the Valley Gate, whichever be its location among the above-cited proposals.

From it Nehemiah set out, and to it he returned, on his preliminary tour of inspection (Neh. 2:13–15). From it also set out the two great companies of national leaders, priests, and Levitical singers, to march along the walls at their dedication (12:27–43). The one group, under Ezra, turned right, moving S, E, and N to the temple area, where they were met by the other, under Nehemiah, which had turned left and moved N, E, and S to Moriah (see below, III.A, on modern locations that correspond to the points listed on the perimeter of restored Jerusalem).

Almost immediately, Nehemiah set up regular daily watches on the walls of the capital (Neh. 7:3), for “the city was large and spacious, but there were few people in it, and the houses had not yet been rebuilt” (v. 4). In the fall of 444, he assembled all Israel to Zion to hear the law read by Ezra and his fellow Levites at “the square before the Water Gate” (8:1–3) and to keep a Feast of Tabernacles in Jerusalem that proved to be the greatest since the days of Joshua (vv. 14–18). Then, by a casting of lots, Nehemiah set about repopulating the “holy city” (11:1, 18) with ten percent of the Judean community (vv. 1–2). Figures follow that list c. 1,400 valiant men of Judah and Benjamin (vv. 4–9) and 1,650 men in the various Levitical ranks (vv. 10–19), though the totals may not be complete.

Nehemiah’s first governorship, of twelve years, expired in 432; and he returned to the court of Artaxerxes (Neh. 13:6). After a time, however, he was granted leave to reassume oversight of the affairs of Jerusalem. He executed a number of reforms in both temple and city (v. 7), which correspond to the problems described by the (presumably contemporaneous) prophet Malachi. Nehemiah specifically utilized the rebuilt gates to keep certain Tyrian merchants out of the city, who were attempting to conduct business on the Sabbath (vv. 19–22). The expiration date of his second governorship is unknown, except that it seems to have extended into the reign of Darius II, 423–404 B.C. (12:22), at which point the OT and its information about Jerusalem comes to a close.

Letters from the Jewish colony of ELEPHANTINE in S Egypt refer in 410 B.C. to Johanan (Neh. 12:22) as high priest in Jerusalem and in 407 to a Persian governor Bagoas over Judah (ANET, 491–92). During the reign of Artaxerxes II, 404–359 (cf. T. H. Robinson and W. O. E. Oesterley, A History of Israel, 2 vols. [1932], 2:170n.), a brief allusion is made by JOSEPHUS (Ant. 11.7.1) to an attempt of Bagoas to replace Johanan with his brother Jeshua, to Jeshua's murder within the temple by Johanan, and to subsequent reprisals by Bagoas. Otherwise, the only known facts of the remaining Persian period that relate to Jerusalem concern Artaxerxes III, who carried many Jews captive in 344, following an unsuccessful revolt incited by Pharaoh Nekhtenebef II of Egypt's thirtieth dynasty.

3. Hellenistic, to 165 B.C. In 332, during his advance into Egypt (prob. between the capture of Tyre in July and that of Gaza in November), ALEXANDER THE GREAT assumed control over Jerusalem from the Persians, thus inaugurating its Greek period. Josephus (Ant. 11.8.3–5) has preserved legends of an armed advance by Alexander against the capital and of the city's miraculous preservation, following which the conqueror is said to have made sacrifices to God under the direction of the Jewish high priest. But behind these unreliable tales, it does appear that the Greeks treated Jerusalem with tolerance and that a number of Jews actually enlisted in his armies (cf. Robinson and Oesterley, History of Israel, 2:189–90).

Upon Alexander's death in 323, Antigonus, one of his senior generals, gained control over Palestine, only to lose it to PTOLEMY, the Greek monarch in Egypt, after the Battle of Ipsus in 301. The Ptolemies continued to hold it for over a century. Ptolemy IV probably visited Jerusalem after his victory over ANTIOCHUS III, Greek monarch of Syria, in 217, though the story (in 3 Macc. 1:9–2:24) about Yahweh's thwarting his attempt to enter the most holy place of the temple is legendary. Subsequent fighting led to considerable destruction within Jerusalem by Ptolemy V's general Scopas in the year 200, but in 198 Antiochus did permanently conquer Palestine and was welcomed into the capital city (Jos. Ant. 12.3.3). An official of his son SELEUCUS IV (187–175), in accordance with Daniel's prophecy of over three centuries before (Dan. 11:20), attempted to rob the temple but was in some way prevented (cf. 2 Macc. 3:7–40).

Archaeological information on Jerusalem is lacking for most of the Greek period, except for certain tomb construction in the Kidron Valley (see below, III.B). During Hellenistic times, the ARAMAIC LANGUAGE came increasingly to replace Hebrew as the commonly spoken language, and the city's Aramaic name, yě'rûšlem (Ezra 4:8 et al.; cf. šālēn H8970 in Ps. 76:2), was rendered into Greek as Ierousalēm. This is the form used in the biblical books of the SEPTUAGINT and later adopted by the NT. An alternate NT form, Hierosolyma, is first documented by the Greek historian Polybius (c. 140 B.C.; see Hist. 16.39.4), and is frequent in the APOCRYPHA (1 Esd. 2:11 et al.). The two names appear to be interchangeable, but the latter, with its declensional ending, is the more Hellenistic form, and it may have been designed to suggest hieros Salēm, "sacred Salem."

Antiochus IV (175–164), called Epiphanes, reduced Jerusalem to the lowest point in its religious history. In his attempt to spread Hellenistic culture, he and his supporters among the Jewish aristocracy introduced a cultural center (1 Macc. 1:14; see GYMNASIUM), which may have included a stadium, probably in the Tyropoeon Valley. In 170, after a victory in Egypt, he broke into the sanctuary, plundered it of its golden vessels, and killed a number of the Jews (vv. 19–24; cf. the prediction of Dan. 11:28). Finally in December of 168, following a repulse by the Romans, Antiochus resolved to put an end to the distinctive practices of Judaism, including the worship of Yahweh in Jerusalem; and he set up the ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION, an altar to ZEUS upon the brazen altar of the temple (1 Macc. 1:54, 59; cf. Dan. 11:30–31). As a part of his general oppression, Antiochus is said to have burned houses and to have destroyed city walls (1 Macc. 1:31).

In 167, a Greco-Syrian garrison erected and then continued to maintain the akra ("citadel") on a site near the Jerusalem temple, so as to maintain full control over the area (cf. 1 Macc. 3:45). "They fortified the city of David with a great strong wall and strong towers, and it became their citadel” (1:33). “They stored up arms and food, and collecting the spoils of Jerusalem they stored them there, and became a great menace, for the citadel became an ambush against the sanctuary, an evil adversary of Israel at all times” (1:35–36).

The location of this acra has been one of the major problems in the topographical history of Jerusalem. Its association with the City of David (1 Macc. 1:33; 14:36) suggests Ophel or Zion to the S of the temple (see below, on the possible artificial lowering of this hill under Simon). On the other hand, presently known altitudes would suggest the E slope of Gareb as preferable for dominating the temple (although Ben-Dov argues that the acra was at the foot of the temple mount, which could be supervised from the top of the fortress towers; see Historical Atlas, 93–94, with map and illustrations on 92–97). It appears significant, however, that in contrast with the strongly Hellenistic type pottery found at Samaria, with its Greek colonies, that jar fragments from 2nd-cent. Jerusalem exhibit only slight Grecian influence: Zion was not about to capitulate to the sons of Greece (Zech. 9:13; cf. Kenyon, Jerusalem, 136–37).

4. Hasmonean, to 63 B.C. At this point, in 167, a priest named MATTATHIAS raised the standard of revolt in MODEIN, E of LYDDA (1 Macc. 2:1–28); and when Mattathias died later that same year, his son Judas MACCABEE, or “Hammerer,” proceeded to win a series of brilliant victories against four successively larger armies of the Greeks (3:10–4:35; cf. Dan. 8:25; Zech. 9:13–17). The climax came in December of 165 when Judas was able to reoccupy Jerusalem and cleanse the temple and its courts of the abomination of Antiochus. Despite the continuing presence of the Greek garrison in the acra (1 Macc. 4:41), he rebuilt the altar (v. 47) and celebrated an eight-day feast of dedication (v. 56), which has continued to be observed as Hanuk-kah, or the Feast of the DEDICATION (Jn. 10:22). Judas went on to subdue various Gentile territories that surrounded Judah and in 163 gained an edict of religious toleration from young Antiochus V (1 Macc. 6:57–61).

Meanwhile, Judas had rebuilt the fortifications of Jerusalem (1 Macc. 4:60), but Antiochus took advantage of the edict to enter the city and then to destroy the protecting walls that Judas had raised (6:62). The following year Judas defeated another Greek army under NICANOR, who fled to Jerusalem and threatened to burn the temple (7:32–35). The priests prayed for divine intervention; in March of 161 Judas proceeded to rout the Greeks, and Nica-nor’s head and right hand were subsequently exhibited outside Jerusalem (v. 47).

In 160, after the death of Judas, the corrupt high priest, ALCIMUS, attempted further to dismantle Jerusalem’s inner temple walls, but he was prevented by a fatal attack of palsy (1 Macc. 9:54–56). Starting in 153, Judas’s brothers Jonathan and Simon were able progressively to refortify the city “with squared stones, for better fortification” (10:11; cf. 12:36–37; 13:10; 14:37); but it was not until Jonathan’s death in 143 that SIMON MACCABEE was granted full political liberty from Demetrius II (13:36–42).

Simon finally starved out the acra in 142 (1 Macc. 13:49–51; 14:36). Josephus (Ant. 13.6.7) elaborates: “He also...cast it down to the ground, that it might not be any more a place of refuge to their enemies, when they took it, to do them a mischief, as it had been till now. And when he had done this, he thought it their best way, and most for their advantage, to level the very mountain itself upon which the citadel happened to stand, that so the temple might be higher than it. And, indeed, when he had called the multitude to an assembly, he persuaded them to have it so demolished...so they all set themselves to the work, and levelled the mountain, and in that work spent both day and night without any intermission, which cost them three whole years before it was removed, and brought to an entire level with the plain of the rest of the city. After which the temple was the highest of all the buildings, now [that] the citadel, as well as the mountain whereon it stood, were demolished.” If the site of the acra was indeed the old City of David, this would account for much of the disappearance of earlier relics from this part of Jerusalem (though it suffered post-NT quarrying as well). The whole tale, however, remains suspect because Simon seems actually to have cleansed and continued to use the acra (1 Macc. 13:50; 14:37).

The later HASMONEANS constructed a palace across the central valley and connected it with the temple area by a bridge. Over the ruins of the 7th-cent. houses along the eastern edge of the summit of Zion, they constructed a series of bulwarks; and archaeological remains become more plentiful with this period. At the top of Kenyon’s 1961 digging above the Gihon Spring stands a large tower with corners of squared stones; formerly credited to David and Solomon, the tower now is usually assigned to the second half of the 2nd cent. B.C. (Kenyon, Jerusalem, 114–16) as the work of Simon (143–135) or of his son John Hyrcanus (135–105). The so-called Jebusite ramp to its N must therefore have been a slightly later, subterranean stone buttress to support a weakness in the wall above it. The statement in 1 Macc. 13:52 that Simon “strengthened the fortifications of the temple hill alongside the citadel, and he and his men dwelt there” probably refers to the NW corner of Moriah, where the preexilic Tower of Hananel had stood. This fortress came to be called Baris (and later the Tower of Antonia; see below, E.1).

The history of Hasmonean Jerusalem is one of repeated devastations. Antiochus VII (139–129) besieged the city and, when a submission was arranged, broke down the walls. John Hyrcanus rebuilt them (1 Macc. 16:23). His son Alexander Jannaeus (104–78) maintained constant warfare with his Greek neighbors but alienated his own Jewish people by an increasing secularism, which led after his reign to a final loss of independence for the restored Jewish state in 63 B.C. and to the downfall of the Hasmoneans.

E. Roman. Alexander’s son Hyrcanus II, the last legitimate Hasmonean priest-king, was displaced from Jerusalem by his brother Aristobulus II (69–63 B.C.). Both appealed to the Roman general POMPEY in Damascus, but when the latter arrived at Jerusalem, Aristobulus resisted. Hyrcanus surrendered the W part of the city, on Gareb; but Aristobulus cut the Tyropoeon bridge and held out in Baris and the temple area to the E. After a three months’ siege, the citadel fell; Pompey killed 12,000 Jews and carried many more off as slaves. He dismantled the walls of Jerusalem but allowed Hyrcanus to continue as high priest and as an ETHNARCH under Rome, though with the actual power slipping more and more into the hands of Antipater, an Idumean (Edomite) administrator. The Romans entered Jerusalem again in 54 but allowed its walls to be rebuilt. In 40 B.C., the PARTHIANS from NE Mesopotamia plundered the city and carried off Hyrcanus to Babylon. Rome then appointed Antipater's son HEROD as client king over Israel; and in the year 37, Herod's Roman troops brought Jerusalem under siege again, broke through the city's N wall, and with great slaughter set up this Idumean as king.

1. Herod, to 4 B.C. With the advent of Herod, the Romans, and their aqueducts, Jerusalem ceased to remain dependent upon the springs in the Kidron and expanded rapidly northwestward. At the NW corner of the temple, Herod developed the former Baris into one of his two major fortresses in Jerusalem: his Tower of ANTONIA, named in honor of his friend and patron, the Roman general Mark Antony. Beneath the paving stones of its court, two huge underground cisterns were cut into the rock, and at each of its four corners stood an interior tower: the tallest, to the SE, dominated the temple area (cf. its use in Acts 21:34 as a refuge for PAUL from the Jewish mob).

Herod's other major fortress guarded the W (Jaffa) gate of the city, with three great towers named for his friend Hippicus, his brother Phasael, and his wife Mariamne. To its S lay his extensive personal palace, which he connected with the temple area by a great bridge over the Tyropoeon (see below, III.B). Farther S in the valley were his theater, amphitheater, and hippodrome, though their exact locations remain uncertain. It was presumably Herod who built a second NW wall, N of the city's former upper limit along the southern bank of the "cross valley." The size of the city, which had already grown to over 160 acres during the Hasmonean period, increased to approximately 230 acres, with an estimated population of 40,000–50,000 (and considerably larger after Herod Agrippa). Excavations in the Upper City have uncovered several sumptuous homes during this time; their pottery and furnishings reflect considerable wealth (see Avidgad, Discovering Jerusalem, ch. 3).

Herod's greatest achievement was his reconstruction and expansion of the sacred Jerusalem TEMPLE. Designed to placate the Jews, his project included a major extension of the court area, to a N-S length of c. 2,500 ft. and an E-W breadth of c. 1,000 ft. On the N, this meant cutting off and leveling the base rock, up to the very foundations of Antonia; on the S it required the construction of an artificial platform (see below, III.B). Within various courts lay the temple itself, of approximately the Solomonic surface dimensions, but with the roof of the entrance tower 165 ft. in height. Begun in 20 B.C., the work was not completed until A.D. 64, six years before its total destruction (cf. the statement made to Christ in Jn. 2:20 that the construction had occupied forty-six years up to that point, c. A.D. 27).

The biblical records, whose narrative references to Jerusalem had closed with Nehemiah shortly after 423 B.C., resume with the last years of Herod's reign. The opening chapters of the Gospels describe the annunciation of the birth of JOHN THE BAPTIST to his father ZECHARIAH while performing his Levitical function within the temple (Lk. 1:8–23). John was probably born early in 5 B.C.; six months later (cf. v. 36), at Jesus' birth, "Magi from the east came to Jerusalem and asked, 'Where is the one who has been born king of the Jews?'" (Matt. 2:1–2). They were informed from the prophecy of Micah that Christ should be born in David's city of BETHLEHEM, 5 mi. to the S (vv. 5–6). While the climax of history, the saving INCARNATION of the divine Son IMMANUEL ("God with us") occurred outside the city of the great King (Ps. 48:2), Zion was the first place to which Joseph and Mary took the baby Jesus after his birth for presentation in the temple. There he received prophetic blessings from Simeon and also from Anna, who "spoke about the child to all who were looking forward to the redemption of Jerusalem" (Lk. 2:38). Almost immediately, however, the holy family was compelled to flee to Egypt to escape the jealous wrath of Herod (Matt. 2:13–18). The latter's slaying of the Bethlehem innocents, although not recorded outside of Scripture, corresponds to Herod's other, numerous, known political murders, which culminated just before he died in 4 B.C.

2. Jesus and Jerusalem, to A.D. 30. Advised by an angel of Herod's death, Joseph brought his family back to Nazareth, avoiding Judah and Jerusalem for fear of Herod's son Archelaus, who ruled in the city as ethnarch of Judah until A.D. 6 (Matt. 2:19–23). Jesus, when of the age of twelve, traveled again to Jerusalem for a Passover feast, where he amazed the teachers with his understanding and answers (Lk. 2:41–50). His youth was spent in Nazareth, his baptism occurred at the Jordan, and his inaugural temptations were located in the neighboring wilderness (prob. of Judah). At this time, Satan took him “to the holy city and had him stand on the highest point of the temple,” vainly tempting Christ to cast himself down and thus question Yahweh's care (Matt. 4:5–7). But it was some time after his ministry had begun, in Galilee, before he revisited his “Father's house” (cf. Lk. 2:49).

Archelaus was replaced by Roman PROCURATORS who ruled Jerusalem successively from A.D. 6 to 41 and then from 44 to 66, but who preferred coastal CAESAREA for actual residence. Although they were generally unscrupulous and wasteful, the fifth in the series, Pontius PILATE (26–36), succeeded in constructing a major aqueduct from Bethlehem to Jerusalem, sections of which remain to this day. It was under Pilate's administration that all of Jesus' adult contacts with Jerusalem transpired. Up until the Passion Week, the Synoptic Gospels generally limit themselves to noting the presence of Jerusalemites among Jesus' hearers (e.g., Mk. 3:8, 22; 7:1); but John records three Jerusalem Passovers (Jn. 2:13; 6:4; and 12:1 in Passion Week), with the “feast” of 5:1 probably constituting a fourth (A. T. Robertson, A Harmony of the Gospels for Students of the Life of Christ [1922], 269–70). On the first, probably A.D. 27 (according to some, A.D. 30), Jesus cleansed the temple of its commerce (Jn. 2:14–16), gained many believers among the pilgrims (v. 23), and spoke of salvation to NICODEMUS, who came to him by night at an unspecified location (3:2; cf. 4:1–3 on his departure). On the second, in the year 28 (or 31), he healed a lame man by the Pool of Bethesda (5:8; see below, III.B); but he left again, following a controversy over his having performed this miracle on the Sabbath (5:9; 6:1).

Jesus deliberately avoided Jerusalem on the third Passover (Jn. 6:4; 7:1) because the Jewish leaders were now threatening his life. But he did appear in the midst of the fall Feast of Tabernacles and taught in the temple (7:14–39), so effectively indeed that the officers of the priests refused to apprehend him (vv. 45–46). This was followed by further teaching in the temple (8:12–58, until he was almost stoned, v. 59), and by his healing of a blind man whom he sent to wash in the Pool of Siloam (ch. 9; cf. 10:1–21). In December, at Hanukkah, he spoke in SOLOMON'S COLONNADE, asserting his Messiahship and deity (10:22–38) and yet escaping beyond Jordan “from their hands” (v. 39). His return to Judea for the raising of LAZARUS (11:7) brought him to the village of BETHANY just over the Olivet ridge from Jerusalem (vv. 17–18), but apparently not to the city itself until his final Passover (vv. 55–57) in the year 30 (or 33).

Jesus had forewarned the disciples that his death would occur in Jerusalem (Matt. 16:21; 20:17–18; cf. Lk. 9:31; 13:33). On Palm Sunday, his triumphal entry started from Bethany (Jn. 12:1) and passed through BETHPHAGE (Matt. 21:1), down the slope of Olivet (where he wept over Jerusalem's blindness toward himself and its resultant destruction, Lk. 19:41–44), across the Kidron, and on into the city, into the temple area, before his return to Bethany (Mk. 11:11). On Monday he cleansed the temple a second time (vv. 15–18), and on Tuesday debated in its courts with the Jewish leaders (11:27—12:35, 41). He concluded with his lament over the city, “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing. Look, your house is left to you desolate. For I tell you, you will not see me again until you say, ‘Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord’” (Matt. 23:37–39). These words indicated his triumph that was yet to be, in Jerusalem. Later that day, as he and the disciples rested on Olivet, he again predicted the city’s fall of A.D. 70 (e.g., Lk. 21:5–24) but also the coming of false Christs, final tribulation, heavenly wrath, and his own second advent in glory (vv. 25–36; cf. Matt. 24:23–25:13).

On Wednesday he probably remained at Bethany (Mk. 14:1–9; Jn. 12:2–8); but on Thursday came the Paschal last supper at an unlocated “large upper room” in Jerusalem (Mk. 14:15; Lk. 22:12), where Jesus confirmed the testament in his blood (Matt. 26:28). This was followed by his night arrest in GETHSEMANE on the slopes of Olivet (Mk. 14:26–52). Before dawn Jesus was tried, first before the senior priest, ANNAS (Jn. 18:12–13), then at the house of the current high priest, CAIAPHAS (18:24; Matt. 26:57), and then before Pilate in the praetorium (Jn. 18:28), before Herod’s son Antipas (Lk. 23:7), perhaps in the old Hasmonean palace (IDB, 2:862), and again before Pilate (v. 11). He was condemned and led outside the city to GOLGOTHA (Jn. 19:20), wherever this may have been (see SEPULCHRE, CHURCH OF THE HOLY). On the afternoon when others were preparing Passover lambs, the Son of God offered himself on the CROSS as the ultimate sacrifice for our sins (Isa. 53:10; 1 Cor. 5:7). His burial was by “the place where he was crucified” (Jn. 19:41 NRSV).

Good Friday was followed by Easter Sunday. Through his victorious resurrection from the tomb, Christ assured his people’s triumph over condemnation and death (Rom. 4:25; 2 Tim. 1:10). After forty days of postresurrection appearances, both in Jerusalem and in Galilee, he ascended bodily into heaven from the Mount of Olives on the E of Jerusalem (Acts 1:12; cf. Lk. 24:50), whence he shall return to judge the world in righteousness.

3. To the fall of Jerusalem, A.D. 70. Jesus had commanded his disciples to preach “repentance and forgiveness of sins...to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem,” but they were to “stay in the city, until... clothed with power from on high” (Lk. 24:47–49; cf. v. 52). Ten days later, in a Jerusalem “upper room” or some other unknown “place” (Acts 1:13; 2:1), they did in fact experience the Pentecostal outpouring of God’s Spirit, which empowered them to carry the gospel world-wide (2:1–3; cf. 1:8; 2:41–42).

The history of the early church, recorded in Acts, continued to center in Jerusalem. The early Christians engaged in worship and evangelization, both at the temple and in private homes (Acts 2:46; 3:1; 5:12, 21, 42; 21:26; 24:11); note the references to PETER’S activities at the temple’s BEAUTIFUL GATE (3:2, its main interior entrance on the E) and Solomon’s Colonnade (KJV, “porch”; NRSV, “Portico”; 3:11; 5:12) and the church’s gathering for prayer at the house of MARY the mother of John Mark (12:12). The apostles regularly reported to Jerusalem the progress of their missions (11:2; 21:17) and here sought for important decisions (11:18; 15:2; cf. 8:14). On several occasions PAUL carried relief offerings to the city’s impoverished believers (11:29–30; 24:17; cf. Rom. 15:25–27; 1 Cor. 16:1–6; 2 Cor. 8:1–4; 9:1–14). Peter, Paul, and others suffered from Jerusalem trials and imprisonments, sometimes with miraculous releases (Acts 4:3, 7; 5:18–19, 27; 12:3–4, 7–10; 22:24, 30), perhaps at the house of Caiaphas and later at the barracks of Antonia (21:34; 22:24); and STEPHEN and JAMES the apostle suffered martyrdom, within or near the city (7:58; 12:2). Though increasingly scattered by persecution (8:1, 4), the Jerusalem church in the mid-50s was composed of thousands of believing Jews (21:20).

Earlier, in A.D. 41, all Palestine had been united for a three year period under the rule of Herod's grandson, Herod Agrippa I (cf. Acts 12:1, 19–23; see HEROD VII). This energetic monarch commenced a third N wall, approximately coextensive with the present N fortifications of the "Old City." His Tower of Psephinus (Jos. War 5.4.2) would thus have stood at about the NW corner of the modern walls; and the main N gateway (or at least its small side arch, for pedestrians) was uncovered by J. B. Hennessy (1966), directly beneath the present Damascus Gate. There does, confessedly, exist a ruin, the "Castle of Goliath," farther to the N, as well as certain wall fragments found in 1925–27 by E. Sukenik and L. Mayer (The Third Wall of Jerusalem: An Account of Excavations [1930]). The latter were once identified with Agrippa's third N wall but are now known to be of a later date and may represent TITUS's siege works of A.D. 70. Josephus had indeed located the third wall over the "royal caverns" (War 5.4.2; cf. also Ant. 20.4.3), which are near today's Damascus Gate. According to Kenyon, it was also Herod Agrippa who first enclosed the S part of Gareb, joining it to Zion on the E by the massive walls and gates discovered by Bliss and Dickie in 1894–97. (See maps and diagrams in Ben-Dov, Historical Atlas, 111–22.)

The later Roman procurators faced an increasing breakdown of law and order in Jerusalem. JAMES the brother of the Lord (Acts 15:13; 21:18) suffered martyrdom by stoning in 62 (Jos. Ant. 20.9.1); and before the city's demise, its Christian community fled to safety across the Jordan, in obedience to Christ's word in Matt. 24:15–22. The fatal Jewish revolt began in 66 and lasted three and one-half years (cf. Lk. 19:43; 21:20). The Roman general Titus finally forced his way into the city, breaking successively through the three N walls; and on August 6 of the year 70 his army burned the temple, eventually leveling it, just as Jesus had predicted (Mk. 13:2). Except for Herod's three W towers, the city and its fortifications were totally destroyed.

F. Postbiblical. The history of Jerusalem by no means terminated with Titus. Rebuilt in 135 as the Roman colony Aelia Capitolina, the city has since experienced nine major periods: Roman, which continued to 330; Byzantine, to 638; Arab, to 1099; Crusader, to 1187 (plus 1229–44); Arab again, to 1516; Turkish, to 1917; British, to 1948; Jordanian, to 1967; and Israeli, to the present. But Jesus made it clear that until his eschatological kingdom should appear (Lk. 19:11; Acts 1:6), Jerusalem was to have no preeminence in matters relating to God and his worship (Jn. 4:20–24).

Yet with the visible SECOND COMING of Christ, the biblical history of Jerusalem will resume. Christ and his saints will descend to Olivet on its E (Isa. 35:10; Zech. 14:4–5; Acts 1:11); and, though unbelievers will ravage Jerusalem (Zech. 12:2; 14:2), Christ shall rescue its repentant and purified Jewish remnant (Isa. 4:3–4; Zech. 12:10; 13:1; 14:5; Mal. 3:2, 5) and, at Zion, join them to his church (Zech. 12:5; Rom. 11:26). Prophecy, if interpreted literally, describes Jerusalem as the Messiah's millennial capital (Jer. 31:40; 33:16; Zech. 8:4–5; 14:20–21). His peace-making law will go forth from its "house of God" (Mic. 4:1–4), causing submission (Isa. 23:18; 45:14) and worship (60:3; Zech. 14:16–17). This temple will involve sacrifices, not of atonement (Heb. 9:12–28; note that Ezek. 43:20–21 seems to concern postexilic times only, cf. vv. 10–11), but of praise and thanksgiving (Isa. 60:6–7; Jer. 17:26; 33:18). At Zion, even nature will be affected (Isa. 65:25; Ezek. 47:1–12; Zech. 14:10). If interpreted nonliterally (amillennialism), these verses symbolize the church (cf. below, IV.C).

An attack by GOG and MAGOG (Ezek. 38–39) will bring in God's final judgment; but Jerusalem will continue eternally (Isa. 33:20; Mic. 4:7; cf. Heb. 12:27), though without a temple (Rev. 21:22) because of the perfect holiness (v. 27) of the new earth (Isa. 65:17–18; Rev. 21:2). In language drawn from both Eden and Zion (cf. Isa. 54:11; Rev. 21:19), the final state of the church is identified as "the Holy City, the new Jerusalem" (Rev. 21:2, 10–27; see NEW JERUSALEM).

III. Installations. From a literary viewpoint, Jerusalem is blessed with an abundance of citations both canonical and otherwise, far more than for any other ancient capital. Josephus in particular describes the city just prior to its fall to Rome in A.D. 70 (War 5.4.1–4). Yet with but few exceptions, these references concern its outer boundaries and fortifications, not its inner structure. From an archaeological viewpoint, Jerusalem remains largely inaccessible. It has not been systematically excavated, like other sites, due in part to religious taboos. Particularly in the Haram area, these cut off any major investigation, from the time of C. Warren and his primitive shafts of 1867 up until the start of excavation by B. Mazar and the Hebrew University at the Southern temple wall, which commenced in 1968. Even more, the lack of archaeological work is due to the continuous occupation of the city; it is primarily the fringes of Jerusalem that have been touched, where certain walls and tower fragments can be dated as far back as the pre-Davidic Jebusites.

A. Borders. The present "Old City" walls and gates stem from A.D. 1542 and the Turkish sultan Suleiman II. Admittedly, this city does not extend all the way southward to the Hinnom Valley: its perimeter excludes part of modern "Zion" (the ancient SW hill of Gareb) and almost the whole of the City of David (SE hill). This receives compensation from its bulged out Christian Quarters to the NW and its large Muslim Quarter E of Bezetha, resulting in a somewhat disproportionate 4,200 ft. for Suleiman's N wall. As a result, the Old City walls as visited by today's traveler do not differ too greatly in total length from those known by Jesus. Especially on the E and W sides of the temple area, the huge lower stones, with their characteristically Herodian grooved edges, indicate rebuilding on top of the actual NT foundations. The extent of these fortifications far outstrips that of the other towns of Palestine (contrast the one gate of the northern capital of Samaria [1 Ki. 22:10] with Jerusalem's seven).

On the N, over the central Tyropoeon Valley, lies the commercially important Damascus Gate, equivalent to Nehemiah's more southerly located Ephraim, Old, and Fish Gates (Neh. 3:6; 12:39; 2 Ki. 14:13; 2 Chr. 33:14; the last named may be the Middle Gate mentioned in Jer. 39:3). Farther E is Herod's Gate, S of which, probably opening into the temple area itself (which constituted at the time the NE corner of the city), lay the biblical Sheep Gate (Neh. 3:1; 12:39; Jn. 5:2). West of the Sheep Gate were the Tower of the Hundred—so called perhaps because of its height, in steps or cubits, or its capacity for troops—and the Tower of Hananel (Neh. 3:1). Around the NE corner and facing the Kidron Valley stood the Benjamin or Muster Gate (Jer. 37:13; 38:7; Zech. 14:10), now called St. Stephen's Gate. (See above, II.D.2, for a list of landmarks in Nehemiah's days.)

On the E, opposite Olivet and opening directly into the Haram esh-Sharif, is the Golden Gate (possibly corresponding in the OT to the East Gate, Neh. 3:29), with its double Byzantine arch. It probably corresponds to the location of Christ's triumphal entry, or exit, on Palm Sunday (Mk. 11:11); and farther inside the temple area is the site of the Beautiful Gate (Gk. Hōraia, mistranslated in Latin as aurea, thus "Golden" Gate), scene of Peter's great healing miracle (Acts 3:1–10). With the expulsion of the crusaders from Jerusalem in A.D. 1187, the Golden Gate was mortared in, as have been four other gates on the E and S Haram walls (cf. the Horse Gate, 2 Ki. 11:16; Jer. 31:40; Neh. 3:28), probably for security reasons. According to Arabic legend, it will not be reopened until the resurrection and the final judgment in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (Kidron), the slopes of which around the Golden Gate are crowded with Muslim graves. The OT's Water Gate should correspond to the Gihon Spring, midway in the E wall of Zion (Neh. 3:26; 12:37). S of the "angle" wall (3:19, 24), near the SE extremity of Zion, lay the Fountain Gate (v. 15), corresponding to the Pool of Siloam, the "gate between the two walls" (Jer. 39:4; cf. Isa. 22:11; see above, II.C.3).

On the S, over the old central valley, lies the Gate of the Moors, or Dung Gate—but the OT Dung Gate (perhaps the Potsherd Gate of Jer. 19:2) was farther S, on Hinnom's edge (Neh. 2:13; 3:13), at the southern limit of the OT walls. Westward, up on the crest of Gareb, is the Zion (or David) Gate, considerably W of the OT Valley Gate (2 Chr. 26:9; Neh. 2:13), which would seem to correspond more closely to the Gate of the Moors (contrast Simons, Jerusalem, 443).

On the W, where the "cross valley" used to drop into the Hinnom, stands the Jaffa Gate (OT Corner Gate, 2 Ki. 14:13; 2 Chr. 26:9), once again, since the reunification of Jerusalem in 1967, the main artery for commerce to the coast or to Hebron. To its N stood Nehemiah's Tower of the Ovens (Neh. 3:11); and built into the foundations of the present "Tower of David," just S of the Gate, are the typically grooved stones of Herod's Tower of Phasael. Similar stones appear in the basement of the nearby School of the Brethren. In 1890, the Turkish government opened up the New Gate just past the NW corner of the city, thus restoring the number of gates to seven. From 1948 to 1967, when no-man's-land extended along the W part of the wall, the New Gate, Jaffa Gate, and Zion Gate were barricaded and unapproachable.

B. Interior. Until recently, most scholars have thought that water was supplied to the city through a rock-cut feature known as Warren's Shaft, a vertical well 6 ft. in diameter and extending upward over 40 ft. from the water level (other sloping passages extend westward into the rock for an additional 100 ft.; cf. the existence of similar tunnels to reach water at MEGIDDO, GIBEON, and GEZER). It now appears, however, that the ancient water system bypassed this opening and that a short tunnel led water from the Gihon Spring to a large basin (see P.J. King and L. E. Stager, Life in Biblical Israel [2001], 213–15). Although the entrance to Warren’s Shaft lies over 30 yards outside and below Macalister’s wall on the crest of the slope, it is still located 20 yards inside the Jebusite wall discovered by Kenyon in 1961. Many have thought that it was by this tunnel that David encouraged Joab and his men to advance at the capture of Jerusalem in 1003 B.C. (2 Sam. 5:8; see above, II.B.1), but recent archaeologists have argued that Warren’s Shaft must be dated later than that. Its ascent would have been difficult and dangerous under any circumstances.

The site of David’s palace can no longer be identified, though it seems to have been in the SE of Zion, the City of David (Neh. 12:37). Although most tombs that are claimed for kings or prophets of Israel are spurious, David’s sepulchre is known to have been at the S end of the E side of Zion, near the surviving “steps going down from the City of David” (3:15 –16); the same site is presumably confirmed by Peter’s words that David’s tomb “is with us to this day” (Acts 2:29 NRSV). It may possibly be equated with two “barrel vaults” at that point.

First excavated by R. Weill in 1913–14, these tunnel-like structures were reached at their S ends by vertical shafts and arched doorways, 3.5 ft. high and 2 ft. wide. The tunnels themselves are about 6 ft. wide and 50 ft. long. Both have lost much of their upper portions through Roman quarrying in post-NT times; but half of the more western tunnel’s vaulted ceiling is preserved, over 12 ft. from the floor. Yet the floor in the back 20 ft. (N) is higher, only 6 ft. from the ceiling, and a deep groove midway up the stone walls of the front portion (S) still shows remains of a masonry flooring and indicates a division into two stories. Features of the construction indicate that the lower was the later addition. A trough across the rear of the upper level, 3.5 ft. wide and 1 ft. deep, might possibly have served as a sarcophagus for David or Asa (2 Chr. 16:14; see above, II.C.1); or the added level, as Hezekiah’s added part (32:33; see above, II.C.3). Certain notches and lines do correspond to features of Hezekiah’s undeniably authentic water tunnel, and Simons finds it “difficult to resist the impression that with these tombs we have indeed come into possession of some remains of the royal sepulchres” (Jerusalem, 220–21). Josephus (War 5.4.1; cf.

© Dr. James C. Martin

The site of Araunah’s threshing floor purchased by David was probably located near the present Dome of the Rock. (View to the NW across the Kidron Valley.)

Ant. 7:15.3; 13.8.4; 16.7.1) seems to have located falsely the tomb of David on Gareb, where a Jewish shrine is marked to this day, next to the Church of the Dormition, S of the present Old City walls.

North of Zion, the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite probably stood on the highest point of Moriah, which is clearly distinguished by a crag that is now surmounted by the Muslim Dome of the Rock (Qubbet es-Sakhra). In addition, Solomon built the house of Yahweh “on Mount Moriah, where the LORD had appeared to his father David. It was on the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite, the place provided by David” (2 Chr. 3:1); this description may suggest that it was the most holy place of the temple that rested on the rock (cf. R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel [1961], 318–19; cf. L. Ritmeyer’s more recent investigation in Secrets of Jerusalem’s Temple Mount [1998], ch. 5). Such a resting place would indeed provide a level foundation for the temple; but it would considerably crowd the holy place, the porch, and the courts, all of which then would have had to lie to the E, before the sharp drop-off of the Kidron. (For the view that the temple was located some 300 ft. NW of the Dome of the Rock, see A. S. Kaufman in BAR 9/2 [March-April 1983]: 40–59.)

It should be noted that (a) a channel runs N from the rock, presumably to carry off the blood and the other liquids that were employed in libations; (b) a cave exists under the rock, which would serve well for ashes and other refuse; and (c) 1 Chr. 22:1 specifically designates the rock for the altar. In light of these facts, it seems more likely that the rock supported the foundation of the altar and that the temple would originally have stood to its W, probably on supporting walls that were built up. Whether or not any such still remain within and beneath the sacred enclosure of the Haram it has been impossible to investigate.

From Gihon, the Solomonic aqueduct that once flowed southward and irrigated the E slopes of Zion (2 Chr. 32:4; Eccl. 2:6) and terminated in the “old pool” (Isa. 22:11) may find some correspondence in the modern garden of Birket el-Hamra. Under threat of the Assyrian attack that materialized in 701 B.C., Hezekiah sent a large force of men who “blocked all the springs and the stream [Solomon’s aqueduct?] that flowed through the land” (2 Chr. 32:4); he also “made the pool and the tunnel by which he brought water into the city” (2 Ki. 20:20) and “built a reservoir between the two walls for the water of the Old Pool” (Isa. 22:11). Specifically, he constructed a 1,750-ft. gravity tunnel out of solid rock and channeled Gihon’s water southward, under the walls, into a new pool of SILOAM (Jn. 9:7; cf. its celebration into intertestamental times, Sir. 48:17). The present pool of Birket Silwan, deeply sunk below the surface, is built over a later Roman installation; but the authenticity of the tunnel is demonstrated by the dedicatory Siloam Inscription, discovered on the tunnel wall in 1880 (see further Ben-Dov, Historical Atlas, 59–64).

The so-called tombs of Absalom and Zechariah, on the E side of the Kidron Valley, are actually examples of what is called the nepes H5883 (“soul”) or monument placed above a tomb, the latter for the priestly family of Bene Hezir. Their pyramid, or conical, tops with supporting Ionic columns and cornices cut out of the solid rock of the hillside indicate a Greco-Egyptian style of the 3rd cent. B.C. Many more Hebrew graves followed in this general Olivet area, probably because of Zechariah’s prophecy that the Messiah’s advent in victory would occur upon this ridge (Zech. 14:5); and it is then that the resurrection of the saints will take place (1 Thess. 4:16).

In the Hellenistic period, oven-like horizontal shafts began to replace the bench-like shelves or alcoves cut into tomb walls for the reception of bodies. The so-called Tomb of Joseph of Arimathaea, inside the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, exhibits this structure. Examples that contain dozens of such shafts appear in the “Tombs of the Kings” (actually, of the family of Queen Helen of Adiabene, mid-1st Christian cent.), N of the city, beyond the present St. George Cathedral, and in the “Tombs of the Judges” (or, Sanhedrin), with their Greek façades and even with a great forecourt and benches cut from the living rock for funerary meals, to the NW. At the former, and at a Herodian family tomb W of the Hinnom, SE of the King David Hotel, may still be found in place the 6-ft. disks of stone that were rolled in a carved trench to seal the tomb doorways. The trench, though not the stone, appears likewise at the Garden Tomb, just N of the Damascus Gate. Ordinarily, tombs were located outside the walls of the city.

Of King Herod's mighty building projects, only some significant fragments survive. His temple has vanished, but much of the Herodian terracing for its surrounding courts (see above, II.E.1) remains intact. This is especially the case for the southern platform, with its supporting arches—the so-called “Stables of Solomon,” dating to the Crusader period, but with the lower parts of the pillars being genuinely Herodian—and for its surrounding wall. On the W are the massive stones of the “Wailing Wall”; and at the SE corner, where the platform rises 150 ft. above the natural ground level, what some have identified with the “pinnacle” of the temple (Matt. 4:5, Lk. 4:9). At this point, the Herodian construction still rises 130 ft., or to within 20 ft. of its original height (cf. Mk. 13:1). Indeed, one of the top “railing” stones was recovered in the 1968 excavations of the Hebrew University, at the very spot where it fell outside the S wall in A.D. 70.

Two stone bridges connected the temple area with, respectively, valley stairs and Herod's palace to the W. Only the spring of ROBINSON'S ARCH, projecting from the SW temple wall, remains of what was once a great span. About 150 yards farther N is “Wilson's Arch,” which yet stands practically intact, though beneath more modern structures. Smaller arches carry the causeway westward from what was once the Tyropoeon Valley to his citadel between the SW and the NW hills. There the footings of his three huge towers of Hippicus, Phasael (incorporated into the present “Tower of David”), and Mariamne still determine the pattern of the Turkish fort at the Jaffa Gate.

Finally, Herod's Tower of Antonia (Acts 21:34–37) underlies today's convent of the Dames of Zion. They may be similar to GABBATHA, “the Stone Pavement” (Jn. 19:13), where Jesus appeared before Pilate. The location of the PRAETORIUM (Mk. 15:16) cannot be conclusively verified. Though some might identify it with Herod's palace, to the W, the factor of the pavement at Antonia would indicate that the present “Via Dolorosa” does commence at the proper point, namely, at this Tower.

Except for such general locations as the Garden of GETHSEMANE, somewhere on the W side of Olivet (Matt. 26:30, 36; cf. Acts 1:12), little can be said for authentic sites associated with the Jerusalem ministries of Jesus. The Pool of BETHESDA, near the Sheep Gate (Jn. 5:2), just may be identifiable with a reservoir, far below the present land surface, by the Abbey of St. Anne in the Bezetha area; and a case can be made for the equation of the ruins at St. Peter's of Gallicantu “cockcrowing” on Gareb with the house of Caiaphas and hence of the trial of Christ and the prison of the apostles (Matt. 26:57; Acts 5:18; however, see J. Wilkinson, Jerusalem as Jesus Knew It [1978], 133–36). A 1st-cent. flight of steps that here descends into the Tyropoeon Valley may have felt the feet of the Master. The present western site of the “House of the Last Supper” has little to commend it; and Calvary-Golgotha, “the place of a skull” (Jn. 19:17), despite popular identification with a “hill,” is not even known to have been an elevation.

The hill of “Gordon's Calvary,” with its accompanying “Garden Tomb,” now resembles a skull, but probably did not do so in A.D. 30. Its location cannot be said to be impossible. The same is the case for the traditional Church of the Holy Sepulchre, on a spur of Jerusalem's NW hill. The one known fact of Calvary is that it lay outside the city (Jn. 19:17, 20; Heb. 13:12). On the one hand, wherever it was above the “cross valley” that Herod built his second N wall, it might seem unlikely that this commanding spur would not have been included within his defenses. On the other hand, excavations have found fragments of ancient walls S and E of the church and have failed to establish settled occupation of this area until after the time of Pontius Pilate. The presence within the church of the so-called “Tomb of Joseph” might favor its location outside the city of A.D. 30. K. Kenyon's excavation just S of the church uncovered an old quarry that lay outside the 7th-cent. B.C. town and that remained vacant until the Roman rebuilding of A.D. 135. She therefore insists that the church site must have lain outside also (Jerusalem, 154). Because this area clearly lay within Agrippa's third N wall, it seems possible that it might have lain within the second wall as well.

Two inscriptions from ancient Jerusalem have been plausibly associated with incidents in the early apostolic church. At the southern end of old Zion has appeared the floor plan of a building complex and the "Inscription of Theodotus," identifying it as a synagogue, hospice, and bathing establishment for pilgrims "from abroad" (see photos in "Freedmen, Synagogue of" and "ruler of the synagogue"); it may correspond to the Synagogue of the FREEDMEN that opposed Stephen (Acts 6:9). From the temple area have come two separate inscriptions (out of a whole regularly spaced series) that warned Gentiles to approach no closer into the inner courts: "Whosoever maybe caught attempting to do so will have only himself to blame if his death should ensue in consequence," a prohibition that Paul was accused of violating (21:28). (See inscription photo under COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM.)

IV. Symbolism. Because of the city's role in the history of the people of God, the name Jerusalem inevitably acquired broad metaphorical usage within Scripture, especially among the OT prophets and poets (cf. Pss. 48; 87; 122).

A. Significations. A capital city typically represents its nation. "What is Jacob's transgression? / Is it not Samaria? / What is Judah's high place? / Is it not Jerusalem?" (Mic. 1:5). Frequently, therefore, Jerusalem simply designates the southern kingdom (Judah), whether in commendation (Jer. 2:2; Obad. 20) or in censure (Mic. 3:10; Zeph. 1:12).

"Pray for the peace of Jerusalem" (Ps. 122:6). (In this aerial view looking NW, the temple mount is left of center, with the Kidron Valley below it and the slope of the Mount of Olives to the far right.)

More significantly, however, God's approval upon David at his bringing up the ark to Zion (2 Sam. 6:12) meant in effect that he had chosen Jerusalem for his habitation (Ps. 132:13). It had come to fulfill the Pentateuchal anticipations of the place the Lord would choose "to put his Name there for his dwelling” (Deut. 12:5); it became “the city of the Great King” (Ps. 48:2; Matt. 5:35). As the “holy mountain” of his presence (Ps. 48:1), Jerusalem received the highest of praises: “It is beautiful in its loftiness / the joy of the whole earth” (v. 2). Men were to pray for “the peace of Jerusalem” (Ps. 122:6–9; cf. 137:5–6), enshrining the House of God. The city came thus to signify the confidence of those who trusted in Yahweh (Pss. 48:3; 128:5); hence, “God is within her, she will not fall; / God will help her at break of day” (46:5). To be “born in Zion” means neither more nor less than to participate in the salvation of those who know God (Ps. 87:4–5; cf. 9:10), in “moral and religious adoption by Yahweh” (C. A. and E. G. Briggs, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Psalms, ICC, 2 vols. [1906–07], 2:240). The person who is “recorded among the living in Jerusalem” (Isa. 4:3; cf. Ps. 87:6) is thereby a justified saint of God; he is “spiritually a citizen of Zion” (IB, 4:470).

Though Jerusalem was “the city of God” (Pss. 46:4; 48:1, 8), it became also the city of God’s anger. Isaiah thus took what may have been a name of one of the parts of Jerusalem, ARIEL (“lion [or hearth] of God”), and used it as a symbolical name for the doomed city: “Woe to you, Ariel, Ariel, / the city where David settled! / Add year to year / and let your cycle of festivals go on. / Yet I will besiege Ariel; / she will mourn and lament, / she will be to me like an altar hearth [NRSV, like an Ariel]” (Isa. 29:1–2). Jerusalem’s character as a “mountain of holiness” comes also to symbolize Israel’s reformation and restoration, whether postexilic (Jer. 31:23) or yet future (Joel 3:17).

B. Personification. On more than one occasion Christ addressed the city as though it were a person: “O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, you who kill the prophets and stone those sent to you, how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing!” (Lk. 13:34; cf. v. 35 and 19:42–44). The city’s women, or possibly all of its inhabitants, are spoken of as her “daughters” (Lam. 3:51 KJV; cf. Zech. 9:9; Lk. 23:28; Cant. 3:5, 11); or sometimes the “daughter of Jerusalem” is simply the city herself (Lam. 2:13, 15). If the poet could exclaim, “Let the daughters of Judah rejoice,” it required but a step to the parallelistic expression, “Let Mount Zion be glad” (Ps. 48:11 NRSV); Jerusalem became the entire nation personified. She also personified the privileges of the people of God; the psalmist could therefore picture the water of life and address the city, saying, “All my fountains are in you” (Ps. 87:7).

The person addressed might exhibit changing connotations. Referring to the national return from exile, Isaiah exclaims: “Awake, awake, O Zion, / clothe yourself with strength. / Put on your garments of splendor, / O Jerusalem, the holy city... Shake off your dust; / rise up, sit enthroned, O Jerusalem. / Free yourself from the chains on your neck, / O captive Daughter of Zion” (Isa. 52:1–2). But after the Servant Song of ch. 53 and Jerusalem’s justification, Isaiah continues, “Sing, O barren woman, / you who never bore a child; / burst into song, shout for joy, / you who were never in labor; / because more are the children of the desolate woman / than of her who has a husband” (54:1; cf. 53:10). The prophet thus symbolically predicts the church as the bride of Christ (54:5), persecuted, but gaining gentile converts (v. 3) more numerous than Israel had before (Gal. 4:26–28). This suggests a final symbolism:

C. Universalization. If the phrase “born in Zion” represents the salvation of those who know God, it is significant that the psalmist also lists Rahab (or “Egypt,” Ps. 87:5, ASV mg.; cf. Isa. 30:7; Pss. 74:13; 89:10), Babylon, Philistia, Tyre, and Ethiopia as “among those who acknowledge me”; and, after describing the assurance of those native to Jerusalem, he adds, “The LORD will write in the register of the peoples [note the pl.], ‘This one was born in Zion’” (Ps. 87:6). As Briggs summarizes it, “Other nations are enrolled with Israel as the people of Yahweh, cf. Is. 19<sup>18-25</sup>” (Psalms, 2:240). From this comes the NT usage with its references to the church militant and the newer testament, when it asserts, “But the Jerusalem that is above is free, and she is our mother” (Gal. 4:26), or to the church triumphant, when it explains, “But you have come to Mount Zion, to the heavenly Jerusalem, the city of the living God. You have come to thousands upon thousands of angels in joyful assembly, to the church of the firstborn, whose names are written in heaven” (Heb. 12:22–23).

Jerusalem, new. See NEW JERUSALEM.

Jerusha ji-roo’shah (יְרוּשָׁה H3729, variant יְרוּשָׁה H3730, “possession” or “inherited one”). Daughter of a certain Zadok, wife of King UZZIAH, and mother of King JOTHAM (2 Ki. 15:33; 2 Chr. 27:1 [KJV and other versions, “Jerushah”]).

Jerushah ji-roo’shah. See JERUSHA.

Jesaiah ji-say'yuh. KJV alternate form of JESHAIAH (1 Chr. 3:21; Neh. 11:7).

Jesarelah jes'uh-ree'luh (יֶשָׁרֵאל H3777). KJV Jesharelah. See ASARELAH.

Jeshaiah ji-shay'yuh (יֵשַׁעְיָהוּ H3832, short form of יֵשַׁעְיָהוּ H3833, “Yahweh is salvation [or victorious]”; see ISAIAH). (1) Son of Hananiah, grandson of ZERUBBABEL, and descendant of DAVID (1 Chr. 3:21 [KJV, “Jesaiah”]).

(2) Son of JEDUTHUN; he and his brothers “prophesied, using the harp in thanking and praising the LORD” (1 Chr. 25:3). He was also the head of the eighth company of temple musicians appointed by lot under David (v. 15).

(3) Son of Rehabiah; his descendant SHELOMITH was a Levite who shared the supervision of David's treasury (1 Chr. 26:25).

(4) Son of Athaliah and descendant of Elam; he was head of a family that returned with EZRA to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:7; 1 Esd. 8:33 [KJV, “Josias”]).

(5) Descendant of MERARI; he was head of a Levitical family that returned with EZRA to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:19; 1 Esd. 8:48 [KJV, “Osaias”]).

(6) Descendant of BENJAMIN and ancestor of Sallu; the latter is mentioned in a list of Israelites living in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:7 [KJV, “Jesaiah”]).

S. BARABAS

Jeshanah jesh'uh-nuh (יֶשְׁנָה H3827, “old [city]”). A town taken by ABIJAH king of Judah from JEROBOAM king of Israel (2 Chr. 13:19). It is mentioned with BETHEL and EPHRON, and was probably located on the border of Judah and Israel. Jeshanah is thought to be the same as Isanas, where HEROD the Great achieved a great military victory over the Syrian king Antigonos (Jos.Ant. 14.15.12). The generally accepted identification is modern Burj el-Isaneh, some 16 mi. N of Jerusalem, and about 5 mi. N of Bethel. (Some believe that SHEN in 1 Sam. 7:12 is a variant of Jeshanah; cf. NRSV.)

S. BARABAS

Jeshanah Gate. See OLD GATE.

Jesharelah jesh'uh-ree'luh. KJV form of Jesare-lah; see ASARELAH.

Jeshebeab ji-sheb'ee-ab (יֵשְׁבָעָב H3784, possibly “[my] father lives” or “may [my] father stay alive”). A descendant of AARON whose family in the time of DAVID made up the fourteenth division of priests (1 Chr. 24:13).

Jesher jesh'uhr (יֶשֶׁר H3840, “uprightness”). Son of CALEB (apparently by AZUBAH); included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:18).

The wilderness area of Jeshimon.

Jeshimon ji-shi'mon (יִשְׁמוֹן H3810, “wasteland”). Name given to a desolate area in the Judean wilderness, apparently S of the Desert of ZIPH and N of the Desert of MAON. This region, described as facing the hill of HAKILAH (to the N), is mentioned to help locate DAVID’S whereabouts when he fled from SAUL and hid in the strongholds of HORESH (1 Sam. 23:19, 24; 26:1, 3). The name Jeshimon also occurs in the KJV with reference to the region of PISGAH in MOAB (Num. 21:20; 23:28), but in these passages the Hebrew word is probably used as a common noun (cf. NIV and NRSV, “the wasteland”).

Jeshimoth. See BETH JESHIMOTH.

Jeshishai ji-shish'i (יִשִּׁישַׁי H3814, “aged”). Son of Jahdo, descendant of GAD, and ancestor of Abihail; the sons of Abihail and other Gadites occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:14; cf. v. 10).

Jeshohaiah jesh'uh-hay'yah (יֵשׁוּחַיָּה H3797, meaning uncertain). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:36). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Ham-ites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38–41).

Jeshua (person) jesh'yoo-uh (יֵשׁוּעַ H3800, short form of יְהוֹשֻׁעַ H3397, “Yahweh is salvation [or help]”; see JOSHUA, JESUS). (1) Son of JEHOZADAK and high priest at the time of the return from Babylon and the rebuilding of the TEMPLE (Ezra 3:2). In EZRA and NEHEMIAH he is mentioned because of his official position; the only personal statement is that one or more of his sons were among those who had married foreign wives (10:18). In HAGGAI and ZECHA-RIAH he is called Joshua. He and ZERUBBABEL were exhorted to further the work of rebuilding the temple (Hag. 1:14; 2:2, 4). He figures in the great prophecies regarding the “Branch”: one of them describes in vision the replacing of the filthy garments of the high priest by clean ones (Zech. 3), and the other refers to the crowns to be placed upon his head as the type of the man whose name is “the Branch” and who “will be a priest on his throne” (6:11–13). (See J. C. VanderKam, From Joshua to Caiaphas: High Priests after the Exile [2004], 18–42.)

(2) A descendant of AARON whose family in the time of DAVID made up the ninth division of priests (1 Chr. 24:11 [some KJV editions, “Jeshuah”]). He was probably the ancestor of a large priestly family that returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39; 1 Esd. 5:24 [KJV, “Jesus”]).

(3) A Levite who faithfully assisted KORE in distributing the contributions made to the temple (2 Chr. 31:15).

(4) Ancestor of a group (connected with the families of Pahath-Moab and Joab) that returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11; 1 Esd. 5:11 [KJV omits]).

(5) A Levite who, with others, “joined together in supervising those working on the house of God” (Ezra 3:9; 1 Esd. 5:58 [KJV, “Jesus”]). He is probably the same Jeshua listed among returnees (Ezra 2:40; Neh. 7:43; 1 Esd. 5:26 [KJV, “Jessue”]) and named first among thirteen Levites who explained the law to the people in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:26; 1 Esd. 9:48 [KJV, “Jesus”]). There are several other passages that likely refer to him: he was a leader in worship (Neh. 9:4–5; 12:8) and was among those who sealed the covenant (10:9, where he is identified as “son of Azaniah”; in 12:24 he is called “son of Kadmiel,” but many scholars suspect textual corruption and emend “son of” [bēn] to “Bani”). It is often thought that this Jeshua was also the father of EZER, ruler of MIZPAH, listed among those who helped to repair the wall (3:19), as well as the father of JOZABAD, a Levite who assisted in taking inventory of the silver, gold, and sacred articles (Ezra 8:33).

(6) Alternate name for JOSHUA son of Nun (Neh. 8:17 KJV and other versions).

Jeshua (place) jesh’yoo-uh (יֵשׁוּעַ H3801, possibly “prosperous [town]” or short form of יְהוֹשֻׁעַ H3397, “Yahweh is salvation [or help]”; see JOSHUA). A town in the S of Judah, listed among the settlements occupied by those who returned from the EXILE (Neh. 11:26). Its location is uncertain, but some identify it with modern Tell Jeshua, about 9 mi. ENE of BEERSHEBA.

Jeshuah jesh’yoo-uh. KJV alternate form of JESHUA (1 Chr. 24:11, some editions).

Jeshurun jesh’uh-ruhn (יֵשׁוּרֻן H3843, “upright” [cf. JASHAR]; according to some, a diminutive, affectionate form). A poetic designation for Israel as the ideal “righteous” nation. It occurs three times in Deuteronomy, both in negative and positive contexts (Deut. 32:15; 33:5, 26), and once in Isaiah: “Do not be afraid, O Jacob, my servant, /Jeshurun, whom I have chosen” (Isa. 44:2). Some have speculated that the name may be linguistically connected with יִרְאֵל H3776 (Israel) and that it originally designated a non-Israelite people group (see ABD, 3:771–72).

Jesiah ji-si’uh. KJV alternate form of ISSHIAH (1 Chr. 12:6).

Jesimiel ji-sim’ee-uhl (יֵשִׁמְיָאל H3774, “God sets down, establishes”). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:36). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Ham-ites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38–41).

Jesse jes'ee (יֵשׁוּעַ H3805 [variant יֵשׁוּעַ H414, 1 Chr. 2:13], possibly short form of יֵשׁוּעַ H3808 [see ISSHIAH]; Ἰεσσαί G2649). Son of Obed, grandson of BOAZ and RUTH, father of King DAVID (Ruth 4:17, 22; 1 Chr. 2:12); included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:5–6; Lk. 3:32). A member of the tribe of Judah, Jesse was a wealthy landholder in BETHLEHEM. He was the father of seven or eight sons and two daughters (1 Sam. 16:1–2; 17:12; the name of Elihu is omitted in 1 Chr. 2:13–17). The two daughters were mothers of famous warriors in David's army: ZERUIAH's sons were JOAB, ABISHAI, and ASAHIEL; ABIGAIL's son was AMASA. (The difficult statement in 2 Sam. 17:25 that Abigail [Abigal] was the daughter of NAHASH has been interpreted by some to mean that David's mother had been married to Nahash before she married Jesse, making Zeruiah and Abigail stepdaughters of Jesse and stepsisters of David. Other explanations have been offered, but the matter cannot be settled with certainty.)

Jesse is formally introduced to the reader of the OT at the point where SAMUEL is instructed to anoint the future king of Israel (1 Sam. 16:1–13). At the command of Yahweh, the prophet journeyed to Bethlehem for a sacrificial meal to which Jesse and his family were invited. In the course of events, seven of Jesse's sons passed in review before Samuel, but none was chosen of God. Upon inquiry, the prophet found that the eighth and youngest son was in the field tending sheep. David was summoned, reviewed, given the divine sanction, and anointed. The indications are that neither Jesse nor David understood all the implications of Samuel's actions on this occasion.

Jesse is next mentioned in connection with SAUL, who sent a messenger requesting him to allow David to come to court and play his harp to cure the king's melancholia (1 Sam. 16:14–15). Jesse agreed to the king's request, and not only sent his son, but also a present of meat, bread, and wine for the king. This indicates that Jesse was a prosperous and generous farmer, and also one who knew the courtly protocol of his day. He was also magnanimous enough to leave David at Saul's court when the latter made further request of his services (16:22–23).

Jesse, on another occasion, unwittingly initiated David into his military career by sending him to the battle front at the appropriate moment. Laden with fresh provisions for his three older brothers who were serving in Saul's army, David stumbled into camp just as the Israelites were confronted by a huge PHILISTINE force whose champion was GOLIATH of GATH. The stripling David gained immortal renown by slaying the Philistine giant (1 Sam. 17).

Jesse's safety and welfare became the concern of David during the years he lived as a fugitive from Saul. Fearing that Saul, in one of his periodic fits of depression, might harm his aged parents, David sent them away to the land of MOAB until the danger was past. They apparently survived the sojourn in MOAB without mishap (1 Sam. 22:2–4).

David is often called "the son of Jesse" in the OT. It was a derisive and hateful term in the mouth of Saul and other enemies of David (1 Sam. 20:27, 30–31; 22:7–9, 13; 25:10; 2 Sam. 20:1; 1 Ki. 12:16; 2 Chr. 10:16). In time, however, it became a term of honor and renown, and greatly beloved by the people of Israel (2 Sam. 23:1; 1 Chr. 10:14; 29:26; Ps. 72:20; Acts 13:22).

Jesse is mentioned in the prophecies of Isaiah as an ancestor of the future messianic king. Here the shoot that "will come up from the stump of Jesse" (Isa. 11:1; cf. v. 10, "the Root of Jesse") is symbolic for that messianic personage who was to bring in the long-awaited end-times. Paul used the expression "the Root of Jesse" (Rom. 15:12) to identify Jesus with the messianic prophecies of the OT. The same could be said for Matthew's and Luke's inclusion of Jesse in the genealogies of Jesus (Matt. 1:5–6; Lk. 3:32; cf. Acts 13:22).

Jesui jes'yoo-i. KJV alternate form of ISHVI (Num. 26:44).

Jesus jee'zuhs ('Ιησοῦς G2652, from יֵשׁוּעַ H3800, short form of יְהוֹשֻׁעַ H3397, “Yahweh is salvation [or help]”; see JOSHUA). (1) JESUS CHRIST. See separate article.

(2) Son of Sirach (named after his grandfather) and author of ECCLESIASTICUS.

(3) KJV Apoc. alternate form of JESHUA (1 Esd. 5:5 et al.).

(4) Son of Eliezer, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:29 NJB and other versions; KJV, “Jose”; most versions, “Joshua”).

(5) Possibly the personal name of BARABBAS (Matt. 27:16–17 v.l.).

(6) A Jewish fellow worker of PAUL (Col. 4:11). See JUSTUS #3.

(7) KJV NT form of JOSHUA (Acts 7:45; Heb. 4:8).

I. The significance of the name. The separate names warrant careful examination. Jesus represents the Greek form of Hebrew Joshua (yěhōšua<sup>c</sup>, short form yěšûa<sup>c</sup>, meaning “Yahweh is salvation” or “Yahweh saves”), a name borne by several OT characters. It was a common name among the Jews in the time of Jesus. Jesus Christ is generally distinguished from other bearers of the same name by the addition of the description “of Nazareth,” at least when first introduced in the gospel narrative. Mark, after using the title Jesus Christ in the introductory statement, refers to Jesus as having come from NAZARETH OF GALILEE (Mk. 1:9). A similar procedure is followed by Matthew, who nevertheless also uses the description several times in the body of his work. In all the Gospels, the name Jesus is used alone in the great majority of cases, while in Acts we find a mixture of uses. In Matt. 1:21, the Christian significance of the name is explained. It is seen as a divinely appointed name and its meaning is derived from the root idea of salvation—“because he will save his people from their sins.” It was not until later in the postresurrection period that the significance of the name was recognized.

The other name, Christ, is of essential importance, because it at once makes an assertion about the human Jesus that differentiates him from all other men. There had been false Christs, but only one true Christ. The word corresponds to the Hebrew MESSIAH (māšîah H5431), which means “anointed one,” but had come to be used specifically of the Anointed of God, who was to come in fulfillment of ancient prophecies. At this point it is the intent of this article not to discuss the variety of concepts current among the Jews regarding this messianic hope, but rather to denote its meaning in the Christian sense. There can be no doubt that the identification of the historical Jesus with the expected Messiah was the key to the early Jewish Christian understanding of the mission of Jesus. The name Jesus Christ carries with it therefore deep theological significance. One must consider not only the bare historical facts about Jesus of Nazareth, but also the interpretation of those facts.

II. The background to the life of Jesus. A vast store of literature describes the historical background of the period of the life of Jesus. A true historical perspective cannot afford to neglect this information, which has been valuably reinforced by the DEAD SEA SCROLLS and related discoveries. Since only the briefest sketch can be given of the historical background, the developments within JUDAISM from a religious point of view and the political position leading to the time of the INCARNATION of Jesus will have to be largely by-passed. Our concern will be the conditions that obtained during the brief span of the life of Jesus, and to this end some account will be given of the political, social, cultural, and religious situation.

A. The political situation. The Roman occupation of Palestine had brought with it many benefits, but it had also incurred the implacable hatred of the Jewish people. The occupying forces were in their eyes a threat to their national heritage and aspirations. They accordingly objected most violently to the taxation system that had been introduced and that was the cause of constant irritation. Any Jew who stooped low enough to assist in the collection of any of these taxes was the object of contempt and was socially ostracized. Under the system, a chief TAX COLLECTOR was responsible for a whole district and then farmed out the task of collecting the taxes to subcollectors, a process that lent itself to considerable abuse and extortion.

One feature of the political situation was the considerable measure of self-government allowed to the Jews. Much of the government of Palestine was in the hands of the ruling religious party and was conducted in accordance with OT principles. There was a central council (SANHEDRIN) in Jerusalem and local councils in various other centers. Punishment, where possible, was administered as the Jewish law decreed, the main method being flogging, of which there are several instances in the NT (note esp. the case of Jesus himself). The fact that the Jewish accusers of Jesus required PILATE'S sanction for the execution of the death sentence suggests that this was the usual procedure, although in the case of STEPHEN it was not followed. No doubt there were many occurrences of the operation of a kind of mob law. The central Jewish council consisted of elders, chief priests, and scribes, a grouping often mentioned in the Gospels and Acts. Although there was officially only one high priest who presided over the ecclesiastical-political administration, those who had previously held office could be included under the same term, as were also others who held high temple offices

(cf. J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus [1969], ch. 8).

Within the Roman empire as a whole, a fair degree of political stability had been achieved under the rule of AUGUSTUS. It was a period of great consolidation in the realm of administration and jurisdiction. The Romans found that the Jews were, however, among the most turbulent of their subjects, mainly because of their religious peculiarities and their strongly isolationist and nationalistic aspirations.

It was the policy of the occupying power to attempt to achieve some degree of adhesion among the various peoples of the provinces by absorbing their local deities into the Roman pantheon, but this policy was impossible in the case of the Jews, who possessed no image for their God. No doubt the Romans had little real understanding of the Jewish people, which was reflected in their series of procurators sent to Palestine. Pilate may be cited as an example, although he was worse than most, as is seen from the fact that the Roman authorities recalled him because of his mishandling of the situation. He committed many atrocities against the Jews that bitterly antagonized them. He took no steps to avoid offending their religious scruples. It is no wonder that at the trial of Jesus they threatened to regard Pilate as ill-disposed toward Caesar if he let Jesus go, a threat that had considerable thrust in view of the mounting tension between the procurator and the people, and in view of the former's fear of incurring the emperor's displeasure. On a previous occasion the Jews had appealed to Caesar, who overrode Pilate's action. Such was the uneasy political situation into which Jesus Christ came and under which he died.

B. The social situation. The main points to be noted here are the structure of society generally and of the home in particular. The Jewish nation was still governed by the patriarchal concept of society. Moreover, there was considerable veneration for age, which placed the older men in a position of influence. Women and children were not favorably placed in the Jewish society. In this respect the Romans had advanced further toward their emancipation. There are incidents in the Gospels, such as the story regarding the Samaritan woman, that illustrate the inferior position of women. As far as the law was concerned, women were not obliged to be taught the law. Jewish education, which centered in the learning and interpretation of the law, was provided for boys but not for girls. It is one of the more surprising features of the ministry of Jesus, although it took place in an essentially Jewish setting, that women were numbered among his followers.

In the realm of marriage there were two divergent schools of thought among Jewish teachers regarding the permissibility of divorce. The school of HILLEL was less stringent than that of Shammai, the former allowing divorce for a number of reasons in which the wife displeased the husband, while the latter allowed it only in the case of infidelity. This illustrates the fluidity of social ethics even among the PHARISEES. Generally speaking, the home was an important unit in the Jewish social structure. It was a matter of social honor for a man to marry (see FAMILY; MARRIAGE). Moreover, among the Jews there was no sanction for the widespread heathen practice of exposing unwanted babies to the elements to die.

In the time of Jesus the Jewish society was roughly divided into two groups. The religious parties—especially the SADDUCEES and Pharisees—considered themselves apart from the ordinary people. There was considerable contempt for the “people of the land” (AM HA-AREZ), particularly among the Pharisees, a factor that will be commented on when the religious situation is outlined below. From a social point of view it is important to recognize this distinct division, because it explains many of the sayings of Jesus about his contemporaries.

C. The cultural situation. In the northern district of Palestine there were many Hellenistic cities in which Greek ideas and practices flourished. Not only was this true of the cities known as the DECA-POLIS, but also of many other cities on the borders of Palestine. Something of the impact of Hellenistic culture could not fail to affect those sections of Jewish society that were most open to outside influence. See HELLENISM. Previous to the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, it seemed most unlikely that Hellenistic ideas would have permeated into Jewish circles, but the Qumran community, although Jewish, was not impervious to Greek and even Oriental influences. Whereas the major currents of Jewish thought, particularly that of the Pharisees, were still resistant to the inroads of Greek culture, yet in the time of Jesus the narrower exclusiveness was beginning to break down.

An interesting question arises regarding the possibility that Jesus may have used the GREEK LANGUAGE in Galilee, in addition to ARAMAIC. No certain answer can be given, but there is little doubt that many in Galilee used Greek. In all probability the area was bilingual, and it is very likely that Jesus was acquainted with Greek. Most of his teaching was certainly in Aramaic, for not only have a few of the Aramaic expressions been preserved in the Greek Gospels, but Aramaic was the language of the common people, to whom Jesus mainly addressed himself. It is not impossible, however, that Jesus was acquainted with Greek modes of thought, and it need not be considered incredible that at times he expressed his teaching in forms that would have affinity with those modes

(as appears at times to happen in the fourth gospel).

D. The religious situation

1. Worship among the Jews. In the Jewish religious outlook of the 1st cent. there were two major foci, the law and the temple. The Jewish people may well be described as the people of the Torah, for the teaching of the law was normative for Jewish life. It was not just the written code of law (the TORAH), but also a great body of oral tradition (see MISH-NAH), which for them possessed equal validity. All Jewish boys were grounded in the teaching of the PENTATEUCH from their earliest schooling. The book of LEVITICUS was, in fact, their first textbook. It was the parents' responsibility to instruct their children in the minutiae of the ceremonial law as the various festivals came around. The SYNAGOGUE services would serve the same purpose. These services comprised confession of faith, prayer, Scripture reading, address, and benediction.

The Scripture reading was in accordance with a lectionary, based on a three-year cycle, in which a passage from the books of the law was linked with a passage from the prophets. It is possible, however, that no fixed passages were set for the prophetic books in the time of Jesus, although such an arrangement is known to have been followed at a later date. The choice of reader and preacher was left to the RULER OF THE SYNAGOGUE, who could invite anyone capable of doing it. This accounts for the number of occasions when Jesus addressed synagogue audiences. The ruler of the synagogue exercised a great deal of influence and was regarded with respect by the people. The local communities were essentially religious communities.

Although the synagogue was the center of community life, the TEMPLE cultus exerted a powerful influence over the pious Jew for a number of reasons. The Jews of Palestine and those of the DIASPORA (in regions outside Palestine) were still considered a single unit, and one important unifying factor was a common allegiance to the temple cultus. Every year pilgrims came to Jerusalem from other parts of Palestine, and from Jewish settlements throughout the empire, to attend the various festivals and particularly at Passover time. The temple worship was highly organized, with twenty-four divisions of priests who worked on a rotation system to insure continuity and efficiency.

The sacrifices of burnt offerings were offered twice daily in the temple, but there were many other kinds of offerings in addition. The burnt offering was significant for the people of Israel as a whole, but there were other types of offerings for individuals, whether offerings for unintentional sins, or votive offerings before some hazardous undertaking, or thank offerings for some deliverance. The temple cultus had great relevance to the everyday life of the people. But it was at festival times that special focus was upon the temple. Since the festivals play some part in the gospel events, it is fitting for some description to be given, as John makes a feature of them in his account of the activity of Jesus.

There was a festival for the New Year, but this is not referred to in the Gospels, nor in fact is the Day of Atonement, observed shortly afterward, in which the high priest alone was permitted to enter the Holy of Holies (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF). There are several references to the PASSOVER, which assumes particular importance for the life of Jesus, for this festival was in progress at the time of the crucifixion. It was not long before the historical connection led to the recognition of a theological link. This was indeed implicit in the institution of the Last Supper. It was customary for the family group, in fact, to remain together over the Passover night. This throws light upon the group of disciples whom Jesus had with him for the final Passover meal, and explains why he did not leave Jerusalem that night for Bethany. In close connection with the Passover was the feast of Unleavened Bread, also mentioned in the Gospels. This was held as a festival of remembrance of the exodus, although it originally commemorated the commencement of harvest.

The most joyful festival was Tabernacles (see FEASTS), which was popular because it involved the worshipers in dwelling in booths constructed from foliage. In the temple courts were special illuminations and a daily ritual involving the pouring out of water. Both of these features furnished Jesus with a teaching point when he was in Jerusalem at the time of the feast (Jn. 7). In John's gospel the feast of DEDICATION is also mentioned, but no particular significance is attached to it. The feast of PENTECOST, which was a thanksgiving festival for the grain harvest, is not mentioned in the Gospels, but is prominent in Acts.

It is a fair deduction that since Jesus was a Jew the temple cultus must have had great importance for him, a fact that is borne out by two particular occasions: the first when he questioned the doctors of the law in the temple at the age of twelve and regarded this incident as his Father's business, and the second when he cleansed the temple of unworthy elements by appealing to what Scripture said about his Father's house.

There was one more feature that was shared by all Jews regardless of the party to which they belonged, namely, their sense of exclusiveness. In some ways this was a beneficial feature, but in other ways not. Those tenets which the Jewish people held to tenaciously were better preserved through an exclusive policy than would have been the case had they allowed themselves to become mixed up with Gentile ideas and practices. The Maccabean wars had been sparked off by an attempt to do this (see MACCABEE), and in the time of Jesus the Jewish people could not forget the heroism that had preserved for them the uniqueness of their faith. There were two main areas in which the Jews were superior to their heathen neighbors—in their theology and in their ethics. Their concept of God was infinitely more exalted than the idolatry of the contemporary Gentile world and caused many of the finer minds among the Gentiles to seek satisfaction as Jewish proselytes. The same may be said of the ethical ideals of Judaism, which were in marked superiority to the debased morals of the heathen religions. This sense of superiority and the desire to hedge themselves around contributed in no small measure to the intense dislike for Jews noticeable among many Gentile peoples.

2. The Jewish parties. For a right evaluation of the religious atmosphere in the time of Jesus it is necessary to survey the four major groups—PHARISEES, SADDUCEES, ESSENES, and ZEALOTS. Of these the first is the most important for one's purpose because of its more dominant religious influence and because of the frequent interchange Jesus had with them. The Sadducees were more politically powerful, but Jesus did not find himself so often taking up issues with them on religious matters. The Essenes are not mentioned in the Gospels at all, but should not for that reason be ignored, for their very existence was a protest against the other parties, a protest with some aspects of which Jesus would find himself in sympathy. The Zealots come into the gospel story only incidentally.

(a) A comparison between Sadducees and Pharisees. It will be valuable to make such a comparison before giving more detailed attention to the Pharisees. The Pharisaic party had its rise in the movement of the Hasidim (see HASIDEANS), who were opposed to the militarism of the HASMONEANS and were devoted to a campaign to bring about repentance and spiritual renewal. Among the Pharisees this concern sometimes developed into a legalistic approach, which is amply illustrated by many incidents recorded in the Gospels. They spared nothing in their devotion to the law. They were committed to carry out what the scribes prescribed. It is not surprising, therefore, that at the time of Jesus the majority of scribes belonged to the Pharisees. The party was characterized by a deep religious zeal that extended not only toward the Torah, but also to the oral law. This was the same position that rabbinic Judaism maintained toward the HALAKAH, or traditional law. Pharisaism can be rightly assessed only against this sense of devotion to a tradition that was as binding as the written code. Some of the reasons for this legalistic approach will be discussed below, but for the present it is the purpose to compare Pharisaism in these features with Sadducean ideas.

The Sadducees adhered only to the teaching of the Pentateuch and strongly rejected the Pharisaic overloading of the law with tradition. The Sadducees thus appeared to be nearer to a strictly biblical approach, although it must be remembered that the Pharisees sincerely believed that oral tradition provided an adequate, indeed the most adequate, interpretation of the Mosaic law. They were basically agreed therefore on the importance of the Pentateuch as a foundation for Jewish society.

This modern reconstruction of Jerusalem in Jesus' day shows the Nicanor Gate with the temple behind. The Sadducees exerted their control from the temple.

The difference in attitude toward the oral law led to some fundamental disagreements. The most notable controversies were over the RESURRECTION, which Pharisees maintained, but which Sadducees denied. The latter disputed supernaturalism generally, as is seen from their rejection of belief in angels. They were, in fact, hard-headed, with a tendency toward materialism.

In Palestine in the time of Jesus, the Sadducees were the land-owning class, whose main interests were political rather than religious. They regarded the Roman subjugation as rather less obnoxious than their Pharisaic brethren. In matters of jurisdiction, the Sadducees were inclined to greater severity of action than the Pharisees, who erred on the side of leniency for fear of unwittingly opposing truth. GAMALIEL'S advice of caution (Acts 5:38–39) is typical of this approach. When the Sadducean CAIAPHAS was considering the threat of Jesus to the Jewish hierarchy, he displayed a devotion to political expediency which no Pharisee would have expressed so unequivocally (Jn. 11:48). Compared with the Pharisees, the Sadducees had a lesser concept of God and a greater confidence in man, although still related to the Jewish law.

(b) The Pharisees and their doctrines. Mention has already been made of the schools of Hillel and Shammai, but it is important to have a clear understanding of the difference between them when considering the attitude of Jesus toward Pharisaism as a whole. Hillel, who originally came from Babylon, maintained a liberal approach toward the law, whereas Shammai was more rigorous. The former was probably a city man and the latter more in touch with agriculture, and this difference appears to have had some bearing on their general religious attitudes. It should be remembered that these two schools of thought virtually constituted the national bar for local jurisdiction under the Roman constitution. Their decisions were more than niceties of Jewish casuistry, but affected the everyday running of the country.

Some examples of the differences in their rulings may be given to illustrate the fact that judgments on some issues could differ considerably. It has already been pointed out that Shammai allowed divorce only for unchastity or gross immodesty, whereas Hillel admitted it for any cause that displeased the husband. The same tendency is seen in relation to debts outstanding in the Sabbatical year. Since the law specified that all debts must be forgiven during that year, it became impossible for poor people to obtain loans during the previous period, but Hillel found a way around this by inventing the device known as Prosbol, which circumvented the requirement for all debts to be forgiven. This is an example of the liberalizing treatment of the law which went to such an extent that it virtually nullified the Mosaic requirement.

The Pharisees, particularly Hillel's party, were making serious attempts to face new problems realistically. The Sadducees tended to take the view that where no law existed on any issue, none could be made. But the Pharisees, convinced that the law must be normative in all situations, were prepared to see how the law could be adapted to new issues. Some of the criticism of Jesus directed against this party were against the casuistry with which they were attempting to apply their chosen policies. It may assist in appreciating the tendency of Pharisaism to impose minute directions in all spheres of ethical conduct if it is realized that the restrictions themselves were regarded as safeguards. The common people, it was supposed, would too easily transgress the law if sufficient barriers were not erected to hedge it around. Their casuistry was thought to possess social implications, and whereas they despised the common people as an inferior breed, they prided themselves with having their welfare at heart.

Of the Pharisees and Sadducees, the former were the most popular with the people. They shared with them a common hatred of the Romans, as against the more compromising tendencies of the Sadducees. Moreover, their doctrines and practices were respected even when they were not acted upon. They had a studied policy to court popularity, as for instance, by street corner prayers, which were condemned by Jesus for ostentation. In the light of this popularity, it may seem strange that Jesus was so strongly critical of them, but reasons will later be given why his denunciations were so strong.

The tenets of Pharisaism formed the background for some of the teaching of Jesus. The Pharisees had a high concept of God. He was powerfully active in human history, particularly in the history of Israel. This exalted concept had been pushed so far that he had become transcendental. While there was still divine activity, it was through intermediaries. The Torah had indeed become the major agency of God in his dealings with his people. It was against such a view of God that the teaching of Jesus about the FATHERHOOD OF GOD must be placed.

It was because the law was the expression of the eternal will of God that it became for the Pharisee the norm in all matters of behavior. Any action that contravened the law, as the Pharisees understood it, was an act of impiety and must be condemned. It was not easy for a Pharisee to accept such authoritative pronouncements as those which fell from the lips of Jesus, which went beyond the precepts of the law. The national existence was so bound up with observation of and loyalty to the law that the Pharisees could not accept that any personal authority could abrogate or even modify the official understanding of the law.

It is not surprising to find that some Pharisees were addicted to pride. Their theology centered not only in the superiority of Israel over other nations as special objects of God's favor, but also in the additional favor shown to those whose piety was proved by exceptional devotion to legal observance. It is the very nature of legalism, with its emphasis on human achievement, to engender pride.

Another feature of Pharisaic belief was acceptance of the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and future retribution. Those eligible for resurrection, according to JOSEPHUS, seem to have been restricted to the righteous. Since the Sadducees denied the resurrection altogether, it is evident that in the realm of ESCHATOLOGY Jesus stood nearer to the Pharisees. For the latter the future world judgment was regarded as the consummation toward which all human history was moving. This accounts for the absence, among the Pharisees, of the materialistic and political considerations that were so dominant with the Sadducees. The idea of the end (eschaton) played no inconsiderable part in the teaching of Jesus.

When the messianic beliefs of the Pharisees are examined, it is not easy to form a consistent picture. There was frequent use of both the titles, Messiah and Son of David. These show the expectancy that one would come to occupy the throne as King in Israel. This Messiah was to be anointed by God, raised up to lead the people in righteousness. It was as much a spiritual as a political concept; it had inevitable political overtones, since Israel was itself a theocratic nation. Various opinions existed concerning the nature of the Messiah to come. Some thought in terms of a heavenly being, others in terms of a warrior king. None ever supposed that the Messiah would be rejected by his people. It was for this reason that the notion of a suffering Messiah was a great stumbling block to the Jewish people. The bare idea of a suffering Messiah was not completely unknown, but where it existed it was in the sense of chastisements encountered through fidelity to the law, and in any case it did not belong to Jewish beliefs in the time of Jesus.

Many of the rigid ceremonial requirements imposed on the Pharisees were aimed at preserving ritual purity. The detailed requirements had obscured the original purpose of the law, which merited and received the severest condemnation of Jesus. Yet, it is important to note that at no time did he condemn their sincere desire to fulfill the law. He made it clear that he himself had not come to destroy the law but to fulfill it. It will be seen that whereas there is much in the actions and teaching of Jesus that would not have conflicted with the Pharisaic ideals, the unique approach of Jesus would lead to a direct confrontation with cherished traditions, and the many controversies recorded in the Gospels are therefore not surprising.

(c) The Essenes. Until the discovery of the DSS, knowledge of this group came mainly from PHILO JUDAEUS, JOSEPHUS, and PLINY the Elder. Most scholars are convinced that there is a close relationship between the Essenes and the community of Qumran, although there are some who seriously dispute this. The Qumran community may well have been a special sect within the Essene movement, which would account for the similarities and differences between the evidence from the scrolls and that from Josephus. The main divergences concern the regulations for admittance.

The Essenes were a separatist group who regarded the Jerusalem temple worship as corrupt.

Their monasticism was therefore essentially a protest. They were as devoted to the law as the Pharisees, but in a different way. They were, in fact, more stringent. There were rigorous rules for the government of the group, as the Rule of the Community or Manual of Discipline shows. There were severe penalties for any offense against the community. The organization was equally rigid, but the details need not be repeated. The purpose is to show what possible contribution the Qumran evidence can make to the understanding of the mission of Jesus, and the following considerations may be noted.

The absence from the gospel records of any reference to contact between Jesus and the people of Qumran is not surprising. Qumran was essentially a monastic order to which men withdrew to escape involvement in the contemporary Jewish world. The ministry of Jesus, therefore, passed it by. Yet the movement points to a real dissatisfaction within Judaism with current religious life and enables a better understanding to be made of the protests of Jesus himself against the Pharisees and Sadducees. Moreover, the teaching of Jesus in some aspects possessed greater affinity with Essenism than with the other groups. As far as the Essenic doctrine is concerned, an interesting factor was the belief in two Messiahs, a Messiah of Aaron and a Messiah of Israel. Since the Messiah of Aaron takes precedence, it no doubt arose from the conception of Qumran as a priestly community. In itself the messianism of this community contributes little to the understanding of the messianic claims of Jesus.

Of more importance is the place of the COVENANT in the community. The members were people of the “new covenant,” and each person had to signify annually his allegiance to it. It was really a reaffirmation of the old covenant, which contrasts with the new covenant inaugurated by Jesus (see COVENANT, THE NEW). His presentation of the covenant was in line with the prediction of Jeremiah (Jer. 31).

There has been much discussion regarding the Teacher of Righteousness, who is often mentioned in the Qumran literature. He may well have been the founder of the community. He was certainly highly esteemed, especially for his exposition of Scripture. A few scholars (such as J. L. Teicher) have maintained that the title is describing Jesus, but this view is generally discounted. Unlike Jesus, the Teacher of Righteousness was not regarded as the subject of OT prophecies, nor was he regarded as the Messiah. Although no connection can be established, the striking parallel between this Teacher and Jesus the Teacher, who came to impart righteousness, cannot pass unnoticed. It shows that there were elements in Judaism that were reaching out toward greater purity.

The men of Qumran were deeply conscious of forces opposing the truth, as is seen particularly in the references to the Wicked Priest. It is also apparent in the strong antitheses that are found in the modes of thought. The community members are sons of light engaging in battle with the sons of darkness. Truth is in conflict with error. This is of special importance as a background against which to place the Johannine portrait of Jesus. No longer can the antitheses that are so characteristic of John's gospel be ascribed to Hellenism, without taking fully into account the syncretism which before the time of Jesus had already taken place within the Essene branch of Judaism (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF).

(d) The Zealots. These belonged to a religious political movement that opposed payment of tribute to a heathen emperor on the grounds that allegiance was due only to God. The movement began as a revolt in A.D. 6 under Judas the Galilean and continued its activities until after the siege of Jerusalem. It played an important part in resistance against the Roman occupation. Its last stronghold, MASADA, fell in A.D. 73. One of the twelve apostles is named Simon the Zealot; whether the adjective was added simply to describe his zeal or as an indication of his association with the political party is not known. The theory that Jesus himself was associated with the Zealots (so S. G. F. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity [1967]) may be discounted, not only because it lacks evidence, but also because it is impossible to interpret the words of Jesus as the words of a political enthusiast. Jesus left Rome severely alone. His mission was spiritual, not national.

III. Various approaches to the life of Christ

A. The traditional approach. Although the available sources are insufficient to construct a biography of Jesus in the modern sense of the term, the traditional approach to the sources has always maintained that the historical reports in the Gospels are essentially trustworthy. It had always been assumed, until the rise of 18th-cent. rationalism challenged it. The large amount of space devoted to the passion and resurrection narratives was no problem for those who saw no discrepancy between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith. Primitive Christian belief fastened on the importance of Christ's death and resurrection, abundantly proved by Acts and the Epistles within the NT. The apparently lopsided arrangement of material in both the Synoptic Gospels and in John bears witness to the major content of the early Christian faith. It was not unreasonable to suppose that if so important an element of faith was accurately reflected in the evangelist's arrangement, the rest of the material should be regarded as equally historical.

Certain difficulties were nonetheless recognized. Some explanation had to be given of the instances where apparent disagreements occurred within the Synoptic Gospels or between them and John. The traditional approach to such problems was harmonistic. Since it was maintained that there could be no discrepancy within the inspired records, it must be possible to reconcile apparent contradictions. Many of these harmonistic attempts were more ingenious than convincing. When, for instance, it was maintained (e.g., by the 16th-cent. theologian Andreas Osiander) that JAIRUS'S daughter must have been resurrected more than once because the incident is placed in a different sequence within the Synoptic Gospels, the improbability of such a solution becomes at once apparent. It was the weakness of much of the traditional approach to the Gospels that it tended to overstress some feature, such as the order of events, without sufficient examination of the validity of the basic assumptions. Dogmatic considerations were more important than historical, with the consequence that the older traditionalists exposed themselves to rationalistic attacks. Until that time there had been no question about the validity of the miraculous. The Christ of faith was so deeply entrenched in the religious concepts that it was perfectly reasonable to suppose that he had power over the natural world to such a degree that in his hands the abnormal became normal.

The advantage of such an approach is obvious. All the Gospels may without question be treated as historical sources, and the main preoccupation of any scholar producing an outline of the life of Jesus is to discover the best method of harmonizing the accounts. Since John's account presupposes a longer period of ministry than the synoptics, it has been the usual procedure of traditionalists to fit the synoptic outlines as far as possible into the Johannine structure. This traditional approach to the sources has been attacked on several fronts during the last two centuries of BIBLICAL CRITICISM. It is essential to have some insight into the grounds for these attacks to appreciate the position of modern criticism in its approach to the historical Jesus.

B. The rationalistic approach. Rationalism showed its attack upon the gospel material in the deistic renunciation of MIRACLES as support for Jesus' claims to messiahship. This antipathy toward the miraculous has been characteristic of rationalism ever since and has affected many schools of thought that have otherwise had little in common with the basic tenets of deism. It was an attack on the supernatural element, and once the miraculous was pronounced either impossible or suspect, it was essential to view with suspicion other elements in any sources which treated the miraculous as normal. This was the starting point for German critical appraisals of the historical Jesus. Whatever in the Gospels did not square with the assumption that the supernatural interpretation of the life of Jesus was impossible must be excised from the records as later interpolations. Such was the rationalistic impact on the sources of the life of Jesus. It was not surprising, therefore, that the 19th cent. was to see a whole crop of unhistorical "histories" of Jesus, many of them almost wholly fictitious.

Before the dawn of the 19th cent., H. Reimarus had produced a book in which he regarded the resurrection of Jesus as an invention of the apostles, who themselves inaugurated a community to await the return of Christ. To avoid possible exposure they stole the body of Jesus. See RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST V. This kind of approach won no support in Reimarus's own time, but was a precursor of the eschatological theory of A. Schweitzer more than a century later. Reimarus made no attempt to come to grips with the Johannine problem. He preferred the Synoptic Gospels and imposed his fraud theory on them. During the 19th cent., many others were either to reject or to ignore the Johannine account.

Attempts were next made to write historical accounts of Jesus from the standpoint of the contemporary climate of opinion. There was no hesitation in making Jesus speak as nearly as possible in rationalistic forms. Modifications of both sayings and events were unrestrained. Representatives of this tendency were J. J. Hess and F. V. Reinhard. Another who illustrates the awakening of the critical faculties in relation to the sources of the life of Jesus is J. G. Herder, who considered it to be impossible to harmonize the Synoptic Gospels with John, and who treated the latter as something of a protest against the former.

It was H. E. G. Paulus who presented the most thoroughgoing rationalistic approach to the Gospels, for he regarded the miracles as due to the eyewitnesses' ignorance of the laws of nature. This left him free to explain away the miraculous. Such incidents as the raisings of the dead were described as "deliverances from primitive burial." This is even alleged of the resurrection of Jesus. His basic skepticism has often since been reflected in other theories.

A rather modified view of the gospel miracles is seen in the life of Jesus written by K. Hase, who had a higher regard for the Johannine miracles than for those of the synoptics. Again the impossibility of accepting both accounts is assumed. A similar position was taken by F. E. D. Schleiermacher. Although less avowedly rationalistic than Paulus, he nevertheless shows the influence of the latter in his explanation of the resurrection as recovery from a state of suspended animation. None of the Synoptic Gospels, in his opinion, presents historical facts. There is no doubt that his view of these Gospels was governed by his preconceived idea of Christ.

C. *The mythological approach. It was the radical criticism of David Strauss which marked a turning point in German approaches to the life of Jesus. He followed Hegel's philosophy and this governed his attitude to the sources. He was not hesitant to interpret the events mythologically. Anything inexplicable to Strauss was treated as MYTH. It is not surprising that the result was radical. Many of the mythical elements he traced to OT motives. John's gospel he regarded as apologetic and therefore inferior to the others. But the latter contained much composite material due to the influence of the church upon the tradition. Although his opinions were too radical for his own age, they set the pattern for later developments, both in the views of liberal critics and in the ideas of the later form critics.

Strauss's skepticism bore some fruit in the radical opinions of Bruno Bauer, who treated John's gospel as an artistic product, and then transferred similar principles of criticism to the synoptics. His conclusion was that the records were the conceptions of evangelists woven around the historical personality of Jesus. After an interval Bauer reached the logical conclusion of denying the historicity of Jesus.

D. *The sentimental approach. Ernest Renan's life of Jesus may be described as imaginative rather than skeptical. It was certainly not historical, for Renan appealed to aesthetic taste rather than to fact. He treated the whole story as a dramatist would a play. The Jesus he produced was a Jesus of his own creation.

E. *The liberal lives of Jesus. The heyday of liberal criticism produced its crop of interpretations, the purpose of which was to discover and present the historical Jesus apart from the dogmatic presentations of Christ. A typical example of this point of view may be found in H. Holtzmann's book on the Synoptic Gospels. In this he propounded a theory for the life of Jesus based on Mark in which he drew a distinction between the earlier period of success and the later period of decline. This idea exercised a strong influence on the liberal lives of Jesus during this period. Holtzmann was not adverse to drawing from both the synoptic and the Johannine traditions.

Adolf Harnack's interpretation of Christianity was governed by his acceptance of the so-called historical figure of Jesus of Nazareth, whose main function was to found the kingdom of God on earth, and whose death did no more than set the seal on this mission. The result was that the portrait of Jesus was conformed to the contemporary pattern of 19th-cent. life. In spite of the attempt to arrive at a historical presentation, the principles of criticism which these liberal scholars followed did not enable them to produce an objective account. It must be recognized that these principles were affected by the earlier rationalism, which attempted to pass all the gospel material through the sieve of what is intelligible to reason. Yet, there can be no doubt that these liberal interpreters of Jesus were convinced of the historicity of their account. Christianity became a matter of conformity to the ethics of Jesus, and by that fact it had ceased to be a gospel.

F. *Nineteenth-century British approaches. Some British scholars followed closely in the wake of German criticism, of whom the most notable was perhaps F. W. Farrar, The Life of Christ (1886). There was no tendency to discriminate between the synoptics and John, as among the Germans, although the emphasis was essentially upon the Jesus of history. Among the more conservative works may be mentioned the valuable study by A. Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (1883), which provided many insights into the Jewish background and was the ablest attempt to integrate the synoptic and Johannine traditions. He made no attempt to differentiate between the Christ of faith and the Jesus of history. In much the same vein may be mentioned W. Sanday's article on Jesus Christ in Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible. These British representatives at the close of the 19th cent. show how little the German movements had affected the mainstream of opinion relating to the historical Jesus, but the 20th cent. tells a rather different story.

G. Twentieth-century viewpoints

1. The eschatological movement. The book Von Reimarus zu Wrede (1906), by Albert Schweitzer, translated into English under the title of The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1910), created a sensation. It gave a penetrating analysis of the inadequacies of the rationalistic and liberal approaches and then presented the theory that only from an eschatological point of view could a true history of Jesus be written. Schweitzer's eschatology was of his own making. He conceived that the dominating factor in the history of Jesus was his firm belief in the imminent establishment of the kingdom. He rejected Wilhelm Wrede's idea of the messianic secret (Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien [1901]), and maintained that Jesus' hopes were frustrated. The cross was the failure of the mission of Jesus. All that remained of the Jesus of history was the example of his noble purpose, which never came to anything. Even the ETHICS OF JESUS was only an interim measure and therefore possessed no abiding validity.

Schweitzer's counterblast to the liberal Jesus was no less unhistorical. His strange eschatological blunderer was not the Jesus who lived and taught in Palestine. The difference between Schweitzer and the liberals was that whereas the latter sought to dress Jesus in modern garb, the former sought to put him back into a 1st-cent. wholly APOCALYPTIC milieu. Neither viewpoint came to grips with the real problem of how their interpretation of Jesus contributed to an understanding of what came to be the place of Jesus in the historic Christian faith. There is no doubt that Schweitzer's hypothesis gained more support than it would have done because of the aridity of the previous liberal theories. As Hugh Anderson has said, "By his tremendous stress on the non-advent of the Parousia, for the inauguration of which and for nothing else Jesus died in vain, Schweitzer helped to pave the way for recent versions of the primitive Church's Christology which left no place therein for faith in the historical Jesus as the decisive revelation of God for the past as well as for the present" (Jesus and Christian Origins [1964], 21–22).

2. The dialectical approach. Another major 20th-cent. trend is seen in Karl Barth's dialectical theology. This movement was contemporary with that of Rudolf Bultmann in its origin. Both men were reared in the same theological climate, both being taught by the same liberal teachers. They both belonged to the Religionsgeschichte (history of religions) school, which believed in the broadest basis for the study of the life of Jesus in the context of an examination of comparative religions. Those who exercised most influence upon both Barth and Bultmann were determined to eliminate from the sources of the life of Jesus whatever belonged to the dogmatic theology of the Christian Church. These liberal scholars concentrated on the immanence of God in Jesus in a way which saw in Jesus only the exaltation to the highest possible degree of what is potential in every man. There was an absence of all thought of the divine transcendence of Jesus, and it was this that challenged Barth.

In one sense, Barth did not enter into the literary problems surrounding the sources of the life of Jesus, but he strongly reacted against the liberal idea of the historical Jesus. By concentrating on the NT texts and rejecting the possibility of going behind them, Barth went some way toward counteracting the approach to the texts which characterized the earlier critics. Barth's doctrine of the Word within Scripture allowed him freedom in his treatment of the biblical text. What he insists upon is a theological rather than a historical exegesis. Any attempt to reconstitute the historical Jesus as the liberals had done is no part of the Christian faith as Barth understands it. Yet he does not dispute that the object of the church's faith must be related to the past. Jesus was distinctive as compared with other men "in his inescapability, in his critical function, in his unforgettable lordliness, in his irrevocability which bursts and transcends all the limits of his life and time" (Church Dogmatics [1964–81] 4/2:156ff.). This is not the place to expand on the theology of Barth. It suffices to show that Barth differs from his contemporary Bultmann in by-passing the problems of literary origins, with which the latter has been so closely concerned in his reaction to the same liberalism in which both were reared. Bultmann has retained more of the essential spirit of liberalism than Barth.

3. The form-critical approach. Bultmann's position must be considered within the context of an examination of the whole form-critical movement, of which he is representative of that section which attaches least historical validity to the sources. FORM CRITICISM is a movement which derived its main impulse from the failure of a rigid application of source criticism to solve the problems of the Gospels. It was a method which had previously been developed to get behind the sources proposed for OT criticism.

H. Gunkel's attempt to reduce the preliterate oral material to some sort of classification by means of different forms in which the material was preserved provided a method that appeared serviceable for NT criticism. The most that source criticism could do was to posit sources which were no earlier than thirty years after the events related, and it was naturally considered important to attempt to fill in the gap. The main objectives were still within the field of scientific historical inquiry. Form criticism as a literary discipline belongs essentially to the period of liberal approaches to the life of Jesus, although in some of its developments, most notably in the hands of Bultmann, it became a tool to be used against the concept of the historical Jesus. This was possible because Bultmann went beyond the purely literary idea of form criticism and developed from it the form-historical method. To make clear this important distinction, the two main schools of form criticism will be considered, irrespective of the chronological development, classification being dependent on whether it is used to support historical evaluation or not.

The real focus of attention was upon Mark's gospel. It had been assumed by the Jesus-of-history school that Mark's account was basically historical and that whatever material could be fitted in from the other synoptics was acceptable. The liberal representation of Jesus was therefore very much tied up with Mark's gospel. When Wrede challenged the historicity of Mark by his theory of the messianic secret, the whole hypothesis of the historical Jesus was also challenged. Wrede maintained that Mark had preserved no chronological sequence and that the material of the gospel had originally existed as unconnected units. Whatever unity there was in the record had been imposed upon it by Mark, who had made it appear that Jesus claimed to be the Messiah and was recognized as such by the disciples, although in Wrede's view this did not happen until after the resurrection of Jesus. The stage was therefore set for a more radical reinterpretation of the gospel narratives in the light of editorial processes that were conditioned by the Easter event. This particular trend was to play an important part in Bultmann's theory of form criticism.

The unitary view of the Markan material was further stressed by such scholars as J. Wellhausen (Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien [1905]) and K. L. Schmidt (Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu [1919]). The former contended that Mark's gospel was overlaid by editorial additions, which it was necessary to excise if the historical material was to be laid bare. The latter maintained the unreliability of Mark's chronological and geographical data and consequently challenged the possibility of producing a connected account of the life of Jesus.

In 1919 Martin Dibelius published a book entitled Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums, in which he analyzed various forms of gospel material according to the use to which it had been put in the period of oral transmission. Since these forms developed in what was essentially a missionary period, Dibelius found their Sitz im Leben (the situation in the life of the church) in the needs faced by the different types of church workers—preachers, teachers, and narrators. Such forms as paradigms—short narratives concluding with an important saying—would be valuable for preachers, while teachers concerned with the catechizing of new converts would use sayings that were unattached to narratives and varied in subject matter, which would be matched to the practical needs of the communities. Narrators would relate tales, often of a supernatural character, which were either created by or at least embellished by the narrators. Other categories of forms proposed by Dibelius were legends and myths, the first being material about holy people paralleled in secular writings; and the second, material in which some mythological interchange took place (e.g., the TEMPTATION OF CHRIST and the TRANSFIGURATION). It will at once be seen that the sources for the life of Jesus have therefore been subjected to influences which have introduced many nonhistorical elements. Nevertheless, Dibelius did not, as Bultmann did, deny the possibility of a historical account of Jesus. At the same time, his postulation of different classes of people using different forms of material is highly unlikely and accordingly weakens his theory. Moreover, it is clear that he has done more than classify the forms; he has evaluated them and in so doing has used his own criteria. The miraculous element is not attributed to the supernatural but to the composition of the storytellers, who wished to heighten the appeal of the tales they were telling.

A more moderate approach may be seen in the work of M. Albertz, B. S. Easton, and Vincent Taylor. Albertz (Die synoptischen Streitgespräche: Ein Beitrag zur Formgeschichte des Urchristentums [1921]) admitted that the church had adapted the original traditions, but nevertheless strongly maintained the possibility of arriving at a concept of the historical Jesus. It is important to note that German criticism had other voices contemporary with Bultmann that did not agree with his approach toward history in the Gospels.

B. S. Easton (The Gospel before the Gospels [1928]) treated form criticism essentially as a literary discipline. Although he admitted that the traditions had been influenced by ecclesiastical and apologetic motives, he declined to use the classification of forms in the assessment of the historicity of the material.

Vincent Taylor (The Formation of the Gospel Tradition [1935]) is a representative of that school of form criticism which sees a limited value in the discipline, but is strongly opposed to the skepticism so characteristic of Bultmann's theories. He rightly calls attention to the existence of eyewitnesses, which must have exerted a powerful restraining influence upon the creation of nonhistorical elements in the tradition and provided some guarantee of the historicity of the material that has been preserved. It is significant that Vincent Taylor declines to accept the right of form critics, on the basis of their method of criticism, to deny the miraculous. The determination of the validity or otherwise of the miracle stories belongs not to the literary but to the historical critic. Compared with the exponents of radical form criticism, Vincent Taylor is moderate, for he believes in the actuality of the historical Jesus. In fact, his trilogy on Christ (The Names of Jesus [1953], The Life and Ministry of Jesus [1954], and The Person of Christ in New Testament Teachings [1958]) shows an approach that seeks to combine the Jesus of history with the Christ of faith. Such moderate use of form criticism clearly puts him in a different camp from Dibelius and Bultmann.

The same may be said of some other British scholars who have partially used form-critical methods, while at the same time rejecting some of its assumptions. C. H. Dodd (New Testament Studies [1953]), for instance, staunchly maintains the reliability of the chronological structure of Mark on the grounds of the evidence of Acts, which counteracts the notion of Mark as a collection of disconnected units. When using form criticism, his main interest is to discover how far the different forms can be employed in verifying the historicity of the material. Although he does not conclude for the historicity of all the material, he sees beneath the interpretive elements a substantial basis of historical fact. He seems to stand midway between the older liberalism and the newer Christ-of-faith school.

Another in the same tradition, but even more insistent on the historicity of the Markan account, was T. W. Manson (Studies in the Gospels and Epistles [1962]). He not only maintained the reliability of the Markan outline, but vigorously resisted the skepticism of the radical form critics. He correctly pointed out that there was less credibility in the form-critical suppositions than in the gospel accounts. He believed that it was possible to arrive at the facts of the life of Jesus from the gospel sources and to make some kind of chronological reconstruction. He did not, however, cling to a purely historical quest, for he recognized that a historical reconstruction would be meaningless apart from the early Christian belief in Jesus as the object of faith. He was reluctant to create an antithesis between history and faith.

4. The existential approach. It was quite different with Rudolf Bultmann, whose dissatisfaction with the liberal attempts to produce a history of Jesus turned his attention toward the Christ of faith. It will be necessary to consider his point of view in more detail, since it has had a profound influence over European thought regarding Jesus Christ and has not lacked support in British and American circles. Bultmann's approach to the records is via the KERYGMA, that is, the proclamation of the resurrected Christ. It would not be true to say that Bultmann denies the historicity of Jesus, although he comes nearer to this at times than he himself is prepared specifically to admit. He considers that all that can be asserted without question is the "thatness," the bare fact, of the cross of Christ. It is difficult to think intelligently of a bare "thatness" which is unrelated to a historical personality of whom at least something can be historically known. In any case, this is a different kind of kerygma from what the early Christians proclaimed.

Nevertheless, Bultmann has performed a valuable service in drawing attention to the problem of the connection between the historical Jesus and the Christ of faith, even if his own solution proves to be totally unacceptable. The Jesus of history can become a living factor in each era of the Christian church only if it is possible to establish the connection between him and the faith of each era. Bultmann's probing goes deeper than that, for he maintains that since no connection is possible, there is no point in pursuing the historical Jesus at all. (For Bultmann's views, see his Jesus and the Word [1926] and Form Criticism [1934].)

(a) Influences upon Bultmann. To understand Bultmann's methods it is necessary to be aware of influences that have had a share in the molding of them. The liberal background to which he belonged was dominated by R. Reitzenstein's theory that primitive Christianity drew much from the MYSTERY RELIGIONS (Die hellenistischen Myste-rienreligionen [1927]), and by W. Bousset (Kyrios Christos, 3rd. ed. [1926]), who maintained that Jesus was Lord, not Messiah, to Gentile Christians. While these theories had more effect on Bultmann's approach to PAULINE THEOLOGY, they are not unimportant for his theory of gospel origins, since, if true, they must find a place in his idea of the kerygma among Gentile Christians.

Acceptance of the view that mystery religions and Gnostic myths were a molding factor in early Christian doctrine disposes the exegete to search for pagan parallels to account for the form, if not the content, of some of the gospel materials. Careful examination, however, shows that most of the parallels are tenuous. Can it be accepted as a legitimate method of exegesis to attribute anything remotely resembling a pagan parallel to such a source? Reitzenstein's evidence is drawn from a much later period, which makes it difficult to place any reliance upon it. As far as GNOSTICISM is concerned, when this became a powerful 2nd-cent. movement, it met with strong resistance from the Christian church. Had there been a close kinship between it and Christianity, it is impossible to see why this kinship was unrecognized.

Any presupposition of a distinction so radical between Palestinian and Hellenistic Christianity must inevitably affect assessment of historical data. The presupposition is unsupported by adequate evidence. The most damaging objection is the failure to recognize the uniqueness, not only of Christ himself, but also of the church, whose faith was based in him. This was the ineradicable weakness of the whole religionsgeschichtliche Schule.

Another important influence upon Bultmann affecting his approach to the history of Jesus was the philosophy of Martin Heidegger. It was Bultmann's conviction that an existential encounter with Christ is of paramount importance in Christian faith, and this led him to play down the historical Jesus. Even though little of the true history of Jesus is available, this existential encounter can take place. Such a presupposition naturally conditioned Bultmann in his estimation of the gospel material. There is no doubt that his purpose was to make that material relevant to his contemporaries, and this led him to exclude anything that to his mind belonged to the 1st cent., but was irrelevant or unacceptable to modern culture.

(b) Some basic assumptions. Bultmann, in the treatment of his sources, proceeded on the assumption that there are definite laws governing popular narrative and tradition. He first supposed that narratives in the course of oral transmission tend to become more explicit and to acquire details lacking in the most primitive form. For example, Luke's comment, "And one of them struck the servant of the high priest, cutting off his right ear" (Lk. 22:50), is said to show a development from Mark's account, which does not say it was the right ear (Mk. 14:47). Moreover, he appeals to apocryphal tradition for the tendency to attach names to people who were unnamed in earlier tradition. Hence Bultmann begins by being skeptical about the names used in the records (cf. Lk. 22:8, where the disciples referred to in Mk. 14:13 are named as Peter and John). Furthermore, there is said to be a tendency for indirect discourse to become direct discourse (cf. Mk. 8:32; Matt. 16:22). That in some cases the material is preserved in both forms cannot be denied, but to deduce from this a general law of tradition may be considerably wide of the mark. An alternative explanation might be that the more direct form was nevertheless from an authentic source.

(c) Classification of materials for the life of Jesus. A brief reference to Bultmann's classifications will not be amiss (for full details see his foundational work, The History of the Synoptic Tradition [1962], first published in German in 1921). The miracle stories are at once suspect. Sufficient parallels can be cited from pagan sources to show, in Bultmann's opinion, that the gospel miracles conform to a similar pattern. Parallels of forms do not prove similarity of origin. The uniqueness of the gospel stories rests not in their form but in the uniqueness of the miracle worker. Another of Bultmann's forms are apothegms, important sayings of Jesus for which short scenes serve as a framework. He takes the view that the saying may be authentic, while the setting is the creation of the community, although in some cases both are nonauthentic.

His criterion of differentiation seems to be that what can be conceived as a community product must have been a community product. Clearly, this does not follow. The probability of communities creating narratives and sayings is open to most serious challenge. The assumption appears to be that Christian groups would wish to attribute sayings to Jesus that had no basis in fact, because they were the kind of words the Christ of faith might be expected to say. Of the biographical apothegms (e.g., the calling of the disciples in Mk. 1:16–20), Bultmann maintains that they give expression to what Christians had experienced of their Master or what he had experienced at the hands of his people. They become therefore symbols instead of historical events (History of the Synoptic Tradition, 56).

A 15th-cent. illuminated manuscript from the monastery of Iveron on Mount Athos depicting Jesus washing the feet of his disciples.

It is difficult to believe that any Christian author would have written what purports to be a historical narrative if his intentions were purely symbolical. Nor is it much easier to conceive that the evangelists genuinely thought that the materials used were historical, even if much of it was the symbolic creation of some community or other. Where can parallels be found for such a procedure? The apocryphal literature, which abounds in narratives regarding Jesus and the apostles that are manifestly the creations of the apocryphal authors, cannot furnish an adequate parallel, for these are stamped so evidently with fantasy that no contemporary ever placed them on the same footing as the canonical Gospels. Moreover, the majority of these productions were written in the interests of some aberration from Christian doctrine. They are too late to provide any guide to the probable procedure of the primitive church. See APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT.

When Bultmann deals with the sayings of Jesus, he assumes, to begin with, that some are authentic and some are not. This leads him to seek some method of distinguishing between them. He first maintains that different evangelists have placed the same saying in different contexts, which means that one cannot know what the original context was. Since the context affects the interpretation, he concludes that one cannot now know the meaning as it was originally intended. For example, the sayings about salt and light (Matt. 5:13–15; Mk. 4:21; 9:50; Lk. 11:33; 14:34–35) are compared, and the conclusion is reached that each evangelist is experimenting with his interpretations. This principle is then applied generally even to sayings that occur in only one gospel, for example, many of the parables. In the case of the parables, Bultmann also appeals to rabbinic parallels. An example of his method in reconstructing the words of Jesus is seen in his treatment of the SON OF MAN saying in Matt. 10:32–33; Mk. 8:38; Lk. 12:8–9. Since he considers that it was axiomatic for the Christian community that Jesus was the Son of Man, he maintains that this belief has affected the original saying, which allegedly drew a distinction between the two individuals. Bultmann does not explain how it became axiomatic for the church if it was not derived from Jesus himself.

Bultmann is not content to suggest modification of Jesus' words. He considers that frequently words spoken by other Jewish teachers or words first used in the Christian community were put into the mouth of Christ. As examples he cites some of the wisdom words of Jesus that can be paralleled from Jewish sources (cf. Lk. 12:16–20 and Sir. 11:18–19). His basic assumption is that parallels point to nonauthenticity. When dealing with the prophetic apocalyptic sayings, he is rather more inclined to find some authentic sayings, since the eschatological enthusiasm of the early Christians was probably derived from the prophetic appearance of Jesus.

Another of Bultmann's categories is law sayings. Of these he says, "Even though many of the sayings may have originated in the community, the spirit that lives in them goes back to the work of Jesus" (Form Criticism [1934], 58). The reason for this greater willingness to accept these law sayings is their fundamental disagreement with contemporary Judaism. Sayings supported by OT citations and those containing rules of discipline are suspect as community products. Sometimes Bultmann expresses his views as possibilities, but more often he makes statements dogmatically, as when he maintains that the passion predictions in Mark (Mk. 8:31; 9:31; 10:33–34) "were first created by the Christian community" (ibid., 59).

From the above it might be supposed that Bultmann is skeptical about all the sayings of Jesus, but he does attach historical credence to some, as the following extract shows: "Though one may admit the fact that for no single word of Jesus is it possible to produce positive evidence of its authenticity, still one may point to a whole series of words found in the oldest stratum of tradition which do give a consistent representation of the historical message of Jesus" (ibid., 61). Included here would be sayings that echo the prophetic calls to repentance, that announce salvation, or that express the consciousness of the prophet. Bultmann lays great stress on the prophetic role of Jesus.

Another category to which he appeals is legend, which, in his view, became attached to the narratives through cultic influences. Such legends would serve the needs of the worshipping community. This applies to the passion narrative (e.g., the death of Judas and the watch at the tomb), the resurrection narrative ("composed in the interests of faith and under the influence of devout imagination"), the Last Supper (which was referred back to the last meal of Jesus and was transformed into a cult legend), the baptismal narrative, the transfiguration, the temptation, the entry into Jerusalem, and many other narratives. When all the overgrowth of legend which Bultmann finds in the sources is removed, it will be seen that there is little life that can be considered historical. This is why he disputes the possibility of knowledge of the historical Jesus. All he will allow is some knowledge of his message, which he sums up as twofold: eschatological and ethical, both understood existentially.

From this survey of Bultmann's position it will be apparent that his view of the sources of the life of Jesus is radically different from the traditional view of the Christian church. Although it may be a matter of indifference to Bultmann whether or not the historical Jesus can be traced and known, such indifference is not characteristic of NT scholars generally, and even among Bultmann's closest disciples it was questioned to some extent. The emergence of a reaction within the Bultmann school was significant because it reflected dissatisfaction with his outright skepticism.

5. The new quest. The reaction has become known as "The New Quest of the Historical Jesus." This description must be understood against the background of the older liberal quest, although its advocates vigorously reject the liberal Jesus. What they are concerned to do is in some measure to fill the gap between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith. E. Kasemann (cf. his Essays on New Testament Themes [1960]) has done this by fastening attention on the preaching of Jesus. By this means he hoped to avoid the risk of DOCETISM (which drew a distinction between the human Jesus and the divine Christ and which concentrated on the latter at the expense of the former) and to bridge the gap between the earthly Jesus and the church's proclamation of faith. Kasemann recognized, as Bultmann did not, the authority of Jesus as a preacher and as an exorciser of demons.

G. Bornkamm (Jesus of Nazareth [1960]) went further by including aspects of Jesus' attitude toward people (as, for instance, his readiness to forgive sins). In this case the records have preserved certain aspects of the historical Jesus. E. Fuchs (Studies of the Historical Jesus [1960]) focused on Jesus' determination to minister to social outcasts, like tax collectors and sinners. This was his mission and by it he revealed God's will. His attitude to his death was influenced by the death of John the Baptist. E. Fuchs departs from the Bultmann position by asserting some continuity between the proclamation of Jesus and the kerygma, and by focusing on some psychological aspects which Bultmann neglected.

J. M. Robinson (The Problem of History in Mark [1957]) maintained a closer relationship between the historical Jesus in the Gospels and the kerygmatic Christ, to such an extent that he was charged with reversion to the liberal quest, but he defended his position by claiming that his quest is centered on the existential selfhood and not the personality of Jesus (A New Quest of the Historical Jesus [1959]). The difference in terminology may be noted, but Robinson's critics were not convinced that he meant anything different. Throughout the debate that developed among his own supporters, Bultmann consistently denied any essential relationship between the historic Jesus and the kerygmatic Christ. His point was not so much the impossibility as the irrelevance of such a connection.

Before any effective use can be made of the gospel records in a presentation of the events in the life of Jesus, the interpreter must make clear his own position in regard to the influence of the kerygma. It cannot be assumed that the apostolic kerygma bore no relation to the proclamation of

Jesus himself. There is no proof for this, and in the absence of proof the interpreter has every right to assume that the evangelists have presented material which they believe to be historical. Since the church accepted the records without question, Christians must have believed in the historicity of the events recorded. In the presence of a considerable number of eyewitnesses, it is inconceivable that material which had no foundation in fact would have been created by communities. The Christ of faith becomes unintelligible apart from continuity with the historical Jesus.

6. Redaction criticism. The redaktionsgeschichte-like movement has arisen out of form criticism and concentrates on the edited forms of the material: it treats the whole of each gospel book rather than the units, although the units are presupposed. The evangelists are viewed as theologians who have imparted something of their own ideas to the material. In some respects this movement is derived from Wrede's approach to Mark's gospel. The difference is that whereas Wrede began with presuppositions regarding the messianic secret, modern interpreters are more inclined to begin with the gospel material and work back to the writer's theology. There is no doubt that concentration upon the importance of the evangelists is all to the good, for during the period of form criticism this had been largely overlooked. The question arises whether accounts written by authors with a specific theological approach could be considered valid sources for the life of Jesus. None of the evangelists was free from theological influences. They were all personally involved with the Christian faith. They were conscious that the Jesus they were describing in their gospels was more to them at the time of writing than he was to his contemporaries at the time of the events recorded. But it is not true to say that Mark has theologized the history. His record gives the impression of a deep interest in the facts (cf. C. F. D. Moule, "The Intention of the Evangelists," in New Testament Essays, ed. A.J. B. Higgins [1959]).

It is Bornkamm who has especially drawn attention to Matthew's theological interests. He deals with Matthew's Christology, ecclesiology, and eschatology (in Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew [1963]). Under the first, Jesus is presented as Israel's humiliated king and then, after the resurrection, as a world-wide teacher; under the second, the focus is upon the application of the Mosaic law to the new community; and under the third, upon the period of the mission of the community. A similar position is taken by G. Barth and H. Held (in the same volume). It is assumed that tradition and interpretation have been interwoven.

The Gospel of Luke presents a different phenomenon. Hans Conzelmann (The Theology of Luke [1960], translation of Die Mitte der Zeit [1954]) attributes a great deal to Luke's theological interests and correspondingly discounts him as an historian. He approaches the gospel from the standpoint of Luke's threefold time scheme—the time of Israel, the time of Jesus, and the time of the church. The gospel is concerned, therefore, with “the middle of time.” In addition to gearing his interpretation to this point of view, Conzelmann sees much more importance in Luke's geographical references than had previously been the case, attaching to them a symbolic significance, particularly Jerusalem. Clearly the challenge of these various theories must be faced. If the evangelists were primarily theologians, could they have produced history? There seems to be no reason why not, although their purpose was at no time a bare recital of facts, but an endeavor to present the object of their faith in an enduring light.

7. Heilsgeschichte. This term, meaning “salvation history,” characterizes a trend that places emphasis upon the acts of God in history. The historical Jesus becomes a vital part of the REVELATION of God. Some who follow this movement are nearer to a conservative position than others. The nearest is perhaps Oscar Cullmann, who insists that no true Christian faith can exist apart from a belief that Jesus conceived himself to be the Messiah (Chris-tology of the New Testament, 2nd. ed. [1963]). To Cullmann, revelation resides not only in the interpretation but in the event itself. Because of this he attaches importance to eyewitnesses. In these aspects he is diametrically opposed to the views of the more radical form critics. He has done much to redress the balance in showing the importance of history in the kerygma.

8. The third quest. The last decades of the 20th cent. saw the emergence of various approaches and perspectives. Interest in historical questions led, for example, to the development of the Jesus Seminar, a research project seeking to determine the authenticity of the gospel material. Its publications take a rather skeptical approach (see esp. R. W. Funk et al., The Five Gospels: The Search for the Authentic Words of Jesus [1993]). One of the more radical members of this seminar, J. D. Crossan (The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant [1991]), argues that Jesus was not concerned with eschatological issues but rather proclaimed the need for an egalitarian society.

On the other hand, many scholars take a more positive approach, and their work is often characterized as a “third quest” for the historical Jesus. This movement highlights, among other things, the significance of Jewish eschatology for understanding Jesus' teaching. Particularly influential has been J. P. Meier (A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 3 vols. [1991–2001]), who seeks to provide a moderately critical synthesis and goes so far as to propose a likely chronology of Jesus' life. (For a valuable review of the literature, including sharp criticisms of the Jesus Seminar, see N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God [1996], chs. 2–3.)

IV. Literary sources for the life of Christ. In any historical reconstruction, sources of information are indispensable, and these have never been more important than in the account of the historical Jesus. All the available sources will now be collated.

A. The Synoptic Gospels

1. The synoptic problem. The reason Matthew, Mark, and Luke are known as synoptic is that they follow a common pattern in describing the ministry of Jesus. What is known as the synoptic problem arises when these three Gospels are compared with one another. Both the similarities and the differences are significant. Sometimes there are three witnesses to the same incident, sometimes two, and not infrequently only one. In many cases the witnesses agree verbally, in other cases they do not. Two major questions arise: in what order did the Gospels originate, and what is their precise relationship to each other?

It will not be necessary here to go into detail over the various solutions of this problem, but some indication must be given, since the approach to the literary sources will inevitably influence the approach to the historical Jesus. The traditional view of gospel origins was that Matthew was the prior gospel and that Mark was no more than an extract from Matthew. This was AUGUSTINE'S view and held sway until well into the 19th cent. Of the three Gospels, Matthew was the most used. This view tended to cause Mark to fall into neglect as a source of data for the historical Jesus. In modern times, it has still been maintained by some Roman Catholic scholars (e.g., C. Butler, L. Vaganay, and L. Cerfaux) that Matthew is prior, but with considerable modifications of the older traditional form of the theory.

2. The priority of Mark. Both the other Synoptic Gospels have been regarded as prior by various scholars. Whereas few have supported the priority of Luke, most modern scholars have concluded for the priority of Mark as offering the best solution to this difficult problem. It cannot even now be considered as an unchallengeable hypothesis, nor must its hypothetical character be forgotten. Acceptance of the Markan hypothesis draws attention to one important aspect of the historical data. It was strongly attested in the ancient tradition that Mark was Peter's interpreter, and if the tradition is true it has obvious bearing on the relation of Mark's gospel to the events recorded. If an eyewitness is behind a writing, it is at once invested with greater importance as a historical source. This would be particularly true of Mark's gospel, as Peter could have been present at most of the events which Mark describes.

Such traditional ascription has been severely challenged by form-critical schools of thought, which deny eyewitness control of the transmitted material. The strength of the external evidence for this tradition cannot be denied and full weight must be given to it. The most important witness is PAPIAS, who claimed that Mark wrote down what he learned from Peter's preaching and that he aimed for accuracy, but was not concerned about order. This means that Papias, while unprepared to attach too much importance to Mark's chronology, did not dispute the historical veracity of his account. Since later patristic writers accept this opinion of Papias regarding Mark's relation to Peter, it must have been considered reliable tradition.

3. The sayings source (Q). If this theory of Markan priority is accepted as a beginning point in surveying the materials for a life of Christ, it leads to the problem of the source of the non-Markan material in Matthew and Luke. Mark has a limited scope, consisting mainly of events, and including little teaching material. What then is the main source for the teaching material in Matthew and Luke? The answer generally given is that they were indebted to a common source called “Q” (apparently from the German word for “source,” Quelle). For the present purpose, “Q” whether it be treated as a written source or as a symbol for common teaching material, will be restricted to that material which is shared by Matthew and Luke but is not found in Mark. Since this consists almost wholly of sayings of Jesus, it is clearly a most valuable additional source of information about the Jesus of history.

Had Mark been the sole source, there would have been little idea of the wide range and variety of the teaching of Jesus, with a consequent lessening of the concept of him as a teacher. Many source critics therefore place the sayings source on a level with Mark as an important witness to the life of Jesus, but there is an important difference. The existence of Mark as a source is beyond doubt, but the same cannot be said for Q. There is no external evidence, as there is for Mark, concerning the one who produced it, nor is there any indication of the source of the material contained in it. Did it have apostolic sanction? Was it based on witnesses? Can it be assumed that care was taken to preserve the sayings of Jesus without corruption? Since Q is generally considered to be the major source for this teaching material, answers to these questions are clearly of basic importance.

Some have supposed that Matthew was its author, on the strength of what Papias said about Matthew writing the “oracles” (of Jesus). If this is a true deduction from Papias, it would supply apostolic authority for the sayings collection. Matthew must have heard Jesus teach many times and may well have been present on most of the occasions when discourses or connected sayings are attributed to him. But this interpretation of Papias’s words was probably not shared by IRENAEUS, for he repeated similar wording but made Matthew the author of an Aramaic gospel. This was the common conviction of the ancients. If Matthew was not the author of Q, who was? There is no satisfactory answer. If such a source existed, all that can be asserted is that it was clearly highly regarded by both Matthew and Luke for them both to incorporate it in their gospels.

While the possibility of a sayings collection cannot be denied, its hypothetical character has caused some scholars to look elsewhere for a solution. The view that Matthew used Luke, although not without difficulties, would at once dispense with Q (as A. M. Farrer pointed out in Studies in the Gospels, ed. D. E. Nineham [1955]). This would enhance the value of Matthew as a source, for it would mean that the sayings material incorporated by him was the result of his own collection, if the apostolic authorship is maintained. Whoever is the author of the first gospel, the strong patristic connection of it with Matthew’s name shows the high esteem in which all the material, including the teaching portion, was held. To maintain a close contact between Matthew and the sayings material is, therefore, not only more in harmony with the external evidence, but is also more satisfactory than attributing Q to an anonymous author.

4. Material peculiar to Matthew and Luke. Following up the Q hypothesis, attention must be drawn to the material peculiar to Matthew and Luke. These two authors record considerably more material separately than is recorded by Mark alone. There has been a tendency among many scholars to prefer what appears in two or three witnesses as superior to what is testified to by only one. A single witness cannot for that reason alone be considered suspect. Such a principle of criticism would at once put Matthew’s and Luke’s special material at a discount, but this is not historically sound. The reliability of a witness depends on the reliability of his character and not on the existence or otherwise of other witnesses to corroborate what he says. Nonetheless, some of Matthew’s special material has been regarded as less authentic because it raises difficult apologetic problems. Such details as John the Baptist’s hesitation to baptize Jesus, the coin found in the fish’s mouth, and the opening of the graves during the crucifixion are considered secondary tradition because of the difficulties they raise.

That there is need for explanation is undeniable, but that the material must be considered secondary through ecclesiastical influence upon the tradition is not self-evident. The heightening of the miraculous is of such a character that it is difficult to imagine that it would have remained unchallenged had it been wholly fictitious. In any case, the proportion of material in this category is so small a part of the whole of Matthew's special material that it would be unjustifiable if it were allowed to dominate any evaluation of the whole.

Both Matthew and Luke include special sections dealing with the sayings of Jesus. Matthew generally combines his with the material assigned to Q, whereas Luke is more inclined to keep his separate. Both include parables of Jesus, but their differences are significant. Matthew's are generally kingdom parables whereas Luke's are not so specified. Moreover, Luke's parables tend to concentrate on a more personal interest than Matthew's. This difference reveals the individual approach of the two evangelists, and also points to the wide variety of the teaching material of Jesus. Comparison of the matter peculiar to each with that common to both reveals the additional insights which their individual choice of sayings provides.

For instance, the SERMON ON THE MOUNT in Matthew contains considerably more sayings than Luke's Sermon on the Plain, particularly about Jesus' attitude toward the law. Similarly, our knowledge of many incidents and sayings from the latter part of the Lord's ministry is wholly dependent upon Luke (e.g., Zacchaeus, the parables of the lost things). Some comment will be made later on the particular contribution of each evangelist toward a reconstruction of the historical Jesus, but now the purpose is to draw attention to the value of sources of information that are peculiar to any of them. Unless there is some adequate reason for regarding such sources as inferior, it is reasonable to receive them as data for a historical reconstruction.

5. The birth narratives. One special aspect of both Matthew and Luke is their inclusion of birth narratives that are without doubt drawn from entirely different sources. It has rightly been pointed out that Matthew shows more clearly Joseph's position, whereas Luke's narratives are more concerned with Mary's. Some scholars have contended that in both accounts the narratives have been influenced by OT motives, but there is a difference between narratives created from OT patterns and those influenced by OT thought. Matthew includes many instances in his birth narratives of fulfillments of OT prophecy, but any suggestion that he has created the narratives to fit in with the prediction is unworthy of the high spiritual tone of these narratives as a whole.

Some have seen in Luke's narratives something in the nature of a poetic idyll that was never intended to be regarded as historical, but if this is so, it is strange that Luke takes such pains to stress that his gospel was based on careful historical inquiry (Lk. 1:1 – 4). It is reasonable to suppose that Luke received the material for his birth narratives from a reliable source. There is, in fact, no reason why he should not have had communication with Mary, although this cannot be proved. Some prefer to maintain that Luke has incorporated into his gospel an earlier source that dealt with the birth story.

Some mention must be made of the theory that Matthew used a book of OT testimonies to Jesus, if only to point out the great importance of the idea of fulfillment in the gospel accounts. Matthew includes twelve citations introduced by a special formula apparently drawn from the Hebrew rather than the SEPTUAGINT, and this has given rise to the theory that he used a testimony book (see TESTIMONIA) containing OT citations which had a bearing on the events in the life of Jesus the Messiah. A modification of this theory is that the early church was more interested in passages that contained messianic predictions than in isolated OT texts bearing on the life of the Messiah (cf. C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures [1952]). Whether either of these theories, or alternatively the further suggestion that the collection is the work of the evangelist is true, is immaterial for the present purpose. What is important is that none of the Synoptic Gospels, or for that matter the fourth gospel either, treats the events and teaching of Jesus in isolation from the OT. His incarnation, ministry, death, and resurrection were all viewed by the early Christians as fulfillments of OT predictions. No approach to the life of Jesus is valid which does not give considerable weight to the OT background.

B. The fourth gospel

1. The problems of historicity. The use of this gospel as a source of data for the life of Jesus has been variously regarded throughout the period of NT criticism. Sometimes the synoptics have been considered superior, and sometimes John has held first place. Throughout the first half of the 20th cent., John's gospel was discounted as a historical source, but subsequently there was a greater readiness to reinstate it. This has been due in no small measure to the discovery of the DSS. It would be a mistake to maintain that the connection between these scrolls and John's gospel was close, but what parallels there are support the view that both may belong to a similar milieu of thought. This means that the gospel cannot be considered a wholly Hellenistic production in which the author attempts to present a Hellenistic portrait of Jesus, as earlier scholars had frequently maintained, but must be viewed against the background of a Jewish syncretistic milieu. If the men of Qumran could talk in abstract terms (e.g., the symbolic use of light and darkness), there is no reason why Jesus should not have done the same. It is against such a "new look" on the fourth gospel (to use Bishop J. A. T. Robinson's phrase; see his Twelve New Testament Studies [1962]) that the Johannine problem must be considered in its bearing on the historical Jesus.

The first consideration is to decide what relation the gospel has to the events it relates. Did the writer intend to write facts, or interpretation, or both? In what sense can the details of the narratives be considered historically valid? No answer to these questions can begin in a better place than with John's purpose, according to his own statement (Jn. 20:30 – 31). Whereas he makes clear his evangelistic purpose—to lead to faith in Jesus as the Christ and as Son of God—yet the faith is based on “signs” that have been performed in the presence of the disciples. The basic facts of the gospel were therefore verifiable by responsible witnesses. It cannot be denied that what John purports to write has a close connection with events that happened, although his own purpose is concerned with the Christ of faith. In view of John's stated purpose, the theological aspect of his gospel must be borne in mind throughout. He was not concerned to write bare history, but history with a specific aim in view.

The validity of the history will naturally depend on the trustworthiness of the author, and this raises the whole problem of authorship. It is not my intention to discuss the problem here, but rather to consider the effects of various suggestions on the problem of historicity. If the traditional view that the apostle John is the author be maintained, the validity of the data must be highly ranked, for the whole gospel would then be basically an eyewitness account. Much more importance would attach to the farewell discourses (Jn. 13 – 17) if the author was personally present. In spite of the external evidence, corroborated by several internal hints of an eyewitness, many have found difficulty with this view and have postulated another author—either a John the Elder or else some entirely unknown person. Many who dispute apostolic authorship, however, do concede some apostolic connection. Some regard the apostle John as the witness behind the gospel, if he is not the author.

The problem of authorship is less crucial than that of history. A few illustrations will show the force of this. In the realm of chronology John places a cleansing of the temple near the beginning of the ministry of Jesus, whereas the synoptists place it at the end. If John's narrative is taken symbolically of the cleansing of Judaism by Jesus, the chronological problem ceases to exist. But the record does not read like a symbolic account. Another problem is the form of teaching. The absence of parables and the presence of much discourse material, including rabbinic type dialogue, marks John off from the Synoptic Gospels. The problem is not insuperable, for some parabolic forms are included in John in addition to the allegories of the vine and shepherd, while some extended discourse material is found in the other Gospels, particularly Matthew. Moreover, it must be remembered that John's material almost wholly centers in Jerusalem, whereas the synoptists concentrate on Galilee. In spite of the historical difficulties, it is not impossible to integrate John as a historical source with the synoptics.

2. Relationship to the Synoptic Gospels. A comparison of John with the synoptics shows how much he has left out and also how much new material he has included. The question naturally arises whether John is independent of the synoptics or whether he used them as a source. In view of the small amount of material common to all the Gospels, there is much to be said for the theory that John did not use the others as literary sources. The largest amount of common material is in the passion narrative. It seems indisputable that John assumed the synoptic tradition even if he did not use them as sources. He speaks, for instance, of the Twelve without further definition. His omission of the institution of the LORD'S SUPPER would be unintelligible if he did not assume that details of this were already widely known. It is a reasonable hypothesis that John intended his gospel to be complementary to the synoptics. There was no question in his mind that his gospel would be used alongside the others. Patristic testimony shows that at a fairly early period this happened. John and the synoptics were the only Gospels found acceptable. It must not be overlooked that whatever incongruities modern scholars find between John and the synoptics, the ancients were not conscious of them (with the sole exception of a group known as the Alogi, who were opposed to John's doctrine).

The major problem facing the historian of the life of Jesus is to find some satisfactory way of dovetailing the separate accounts. The cleansing of the temple is an example. Some decision must be made about this issue, either the postulation of a double cleansing or else a choice between the Johannine and synoptic chronology. Most choose the synoptic dating, but the former suggestion is not impossible. The dating of the Last Supper is another well-known crux, since John appears to set it on the 13th of Nisan, while the synoptics prefer the 14th. Another problem is to fit into the Galilean account of the ministry in the synoptics the events recorded by John as happening at Jerusalem. Moreover, the length of the public ministry of Jesus poses a problem, for John suggests that the period must be at least two if not three years, whereas the synoptics give the impression of one year. The matter is not irresolvable, since a reference to a harvest in the midst of the synoptic ministry shows that more than one year must have been involved, although the events appear on the surface to have happened all within two Passovers. Clearly the synoptists were not as interested in the festival days as John, who for this very reason must be regarded as a better guide in such matters of chronology.

Attempts at harmonizing must at best be regarded as tentative and in some cases as purely arbitrary. In dealing with such sources, one must conclude that the chronological data in the Gospels is so sparse that it is impossible to reconstruct the order of events with any certainty (for a recent and valuable attempt, see D. L. Bock, Jesus according to Scripture: Restoring the Portrait from the Gospels [2002]). Unless the purpose is to trace some psychological development in the mind of Jesus, the order of events is of little importance. Of the major events there can be no question. The absence of chronological data makes a biography impossible, but the material is sufficient to show the reality of the Jesus of history. In the outline that follows some order had to be selected. In many points of detail the order chosen is admittedly arbitrary.

C. The fourfold presentation of Jesus. It is significant that in spite of an early attempt at producing a harmony of the Gospels (see DIATESSARON), it was always preferred to keep the Gospels separate. Each presents its own portrait and each is needed for the total picture. It will be valuable, therefore, to give some indication of the characteristic features of each evangelist's presentation of Jesus, for this approach is more valid than any attempt to reconstruct a continuous account from material in all four gospels.

1. Matthew's portrait. This gospel has many distinctive features, portraying Jesus as a royal figure. The line of descent in the genealogy is through David, who is named at the head of the second main section in Matthew's list. The expression "Son of David" occurs on various occasions in the gospel, to a greater extent than in the other synoptics. Matthew's birth narrative concentrates on homage fit for a king (Matt. 2), as compared with Luke's account of the worship of the lowly shepherds. In the narrative of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, both Matthew and Luke refer to the kingly scene, but only Matthew cites the OT passage, "See, your king comes to you" (21:5). While all the synoptics mention Jesus' teaching about the kingdom of God, it is Matthew in particular who concentrates upon it. His parables are kingdom parables. The message of Jesus is concerned with the proclamation of the kingdom.

Another characteristic of Matthew's gospel is the authoritative nature of Jesus as a teacher. In the great discourses that Matthew has sandwiched between blocks of narrative, he specially emphasizes the teaching ministry of Jesus. Yet, he does not portray Jesus as a Jewish rabbi. In fact, Jesus claims authority to supersede the law, which the rabbis considered their highest duty to uphold. In view of this fundamental difference, it is no wonder that Jesus so often was at variance with the religious leaders of his day. Matthew comments that "he taught as one who had authority, and not as their teachers of the law" (Matt. 7:29; cf. Mk. 1:22; Lk. 4:32, where similar comment is made about Jesus' visit to the synagogue). Matthew's gospel is dominated by his five great discourse sections—Matt. 5 – 7; 10; 13; 18; 23 – 25—which illustrate various aspects of the teaching of Jesus about the kingdom.

Matthew shares with the other Gospels the picture of Jesus as Son of Man, a title that Jesus uses both redemptively and eschatologically. He also shares with them the belief in the messianic claims of Jesus. He alone records the words of Jesus about the coming church and gives some indication of its nature (cf. Matt. 16:18 – 19; 18:15 – 20). In this respect Matthew's work leads into the early church period, for it is Matthew who gives the Great Commission of Jesus to his disciples before his ascension and ends with the assurance of Jesus' continuing presence with them (see COMMISSION, GREAT). One cannot put aside this gospel without awareness of the future of the people of God because of the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

2. Mark's portrait. Mark's distinctive contribution is one of emphasis rather than unique material. The first feature is the constant activity of Jesus. The relative absence of teaching material contributes to this impression. Mark often says that the actions of Jesus were performed "immediately." One saying may fittingly be chosen as summing up Mark's portrait of Jesus (Mk. 10:45; cf. Matt. 20:28), namely, that the Son of Man came not to be served but to serve. His is essentially the gospel of Christ the servant, a gospel full of bustling activity that would make a great appeal to men of action. Jesus was no religious recluse, but a man deeply aware of the needs of those around him.

This gospel is also remarkable for the large proportion of space devoted to the passion and resurrection narratives. There is little specific teaching about the meaning of Christ's death (except Mk. 10:45), but the arrangement of the whole book gives the impression that for Mark the real focus was upon the concluding events, and that the opening two-thirds of the gospel was only a preparation for this. Mark obviously did not attempt to write a biography. Indeed, it is he alone of all the evangelists who describes his book as "the gospel of Jesus Christ" (Mk. 1:1). Undoubtedly for him the major part of that gospel was the redemptive work accomplished by Jesus on the cross.

It should be noted that Mark begins by identifying Jesus as Son of God (according to the most probable textual reading) and yet proceeds to include, more than any of the other gospels, a presentation of Jesus as a human being. Since Mark seems more drawn by actions than by words, it is most natural to see the evidence for the deity and humanity of Jesus in what he did rather than what he said. The humanity of Jesus may be seen in his acts of compassion, and his divine power in the fact that so many of these acts of compassion are portrayed as miracles.

Mention has already been made of those who have claimed that Mark has imposed his own theory of a messianic secret upon his material, but since the theory is not demanded by the evidence, it may be said that Mark's portrait of Jesus implies the awareness of his own messianic mission. The earthly life of Jesus was not the appointed time for this to be made known. The Messiah must first be recognized in the risen Christ.

3. Luke's portrait. There is a warm human touch in Luke's account. The birth stories are more intimate. The contacts of Jesus with the people of his day are more varied, with special emphasis upon his concern for women and children. The parables more frequently have a human touch about them, as is specially illustrated in the parables of Lk. 15. Luke records more of the theme of joy in Jesus' teaching than the other evangelists. The ministry of Jesus was not intended to give a somber impression. Even in his passion references, Luke dwells less on the tragic aspects, although no description of the crucifixion scene can avoid such an aspect. In Luke's account of the transfiguration, the conversation concerned the "exodus" or departure of Jesus rather than his death (Lk. 9:31). When he describes the crucifixion scene, he does not include Jesus' cry of separation, "Why have you forsaken me?" (found in Matt. 27:46; Mk. 15:34). In Luke the last words of Jesus are a prayer of committal to the Father (Lk. 23:46). Nevertheless, if the starkness of the cross is somewhat toned down, its centrality is as clear in Luke as in the others. It is in Luke that the risen Christ is recorded as expounding from the Scriptures the necessity for his sufferings (24:26 – 27). He ends his gospel on a note of great joy, which was now no longer dependent upon the earthly presence of Jesus. In no clearer way could Luke have indicated the continuity of the historical Jesus with the Christ of faith.

4. John's portrait. The Johannine portrait is different, although many common features with the other Gospels enable the depiction to be identified as the same person. He is introduced in a different way, in the concept of a divine intermediary, the divine Word who nevertheless became flesh (see LOGOS). There is nothing comparable in the synoptics. Had John proceeded in the same vein throughout his gospel, the difference in approach would have been insuperable. As soon as John has spoken of the incarnation, his narrative proceeds to illustrate in human terms what it meant for the Word to become flesh.

The most marked characteristic of his portrait is the filial relationship between Jesus and the Father. This is essentially the gospel of Jesus the Son. Its purpose was that men might believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and the author took care that much of the gospel testifies to this fact. Scattered throughout the book are statements that show the consciousness of Jesus and of his dependence on the Father. He is the Sent One. It is the Father's will that he has done. He calls men and women to the Father's purpose for them. The climax of this aspect of Jesus is seen in the prayer in Jn. 17, which has not inappropriately been called the high priestly prayer, but which is really a filial supplication on behalf of his disciples.

Another feature of John's portrait is the miraculous signs included as an attestation of Jesus.

These signs are intended to be authenticating and are said to redound to God's glory. The signs are themselves in agreement with the portrait of the divine Son. They are the deeds the Son might be expected to perform. They were further intended to be aids to faith, for Jesus himself appealed to his works if men would not believe him for his own sake.

Linked with these characteristics is the remarkable fact that John records more evidence of the perfect humanity of Jesus than any of the other evangelists. Jesus is described as thirsty and tired. At the tomb of LAZARUS he is moved with indignation. He does the most menial service in the upper room. There is no doubt about the fact that the Word had become flesh. This Johannine portrait was wholly different from the Docetic representation of Jesus, according to which his humanity was more apparent than real.

There is a certain unhurried atmosphere about this gospel, in strong contrast to Mark's. Jesus has time to discuss and converse. The action is slowmoving and sometimes nonexistent. There is more sense of inevitability about this portrait than about the others. The idea of the "hour" of destiny runs through the whole gospel. At first it is said that it has not yet come, and this prepares the reader to look for its dawning and draws the narrative to a climax, when eventually it does come in the passion narrative. There is nothing accidental about the cross; it is seen as part of the purpose of God.

When these four portraits are compared, they present four different aspects of Jesus, none of which can be dispensed with without loss. Any attempt at recognizing the historical Jesus cannot proceed without recognizing the many-sided character of the person of Jesus as the four evangelists saw him.

D. Other NT evidence for the life of Jesus.

An important question arises over the relation of Acts and the Epistles to the testimony of the Gospels to the historical Jesus. The letters of PAUL are of particular interest. One needs to inquire what knowledge these writings reveal of the apostle's acquaintance with the events and the teaching of Jesus. First impressions might suggest that Paul was either ignorant of or else uninterested in the historical Jesus. Such impressions would not be entirely justified, for there are passing allusions in his epistles that bear testimony to his knowledge of certain historical facts.

When Paul is contending with the JUDAIZERS at GALATIA, he asserts that "God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law" (Gal. 4:4), by which it is clear that he regarded him as a true man who lived in an environment of Jewish law. According to human reckoning he was of the seed of David (Rom. 1:3). Whether this latter reference is regarded as part of the primitive kerygma (as C. H. Dodd believes, The Apostolic Preaching and its Developments, 2nd ed. [1944]), or as Paul's own thought, is of small consequence. It shows, however, Paul's acquaintance with the lineage of Jesus through the Davidic line.

Some glimpses of his knowledge of the character of Jesus are seen from the references to the meekness and gentleness of Christ (2 Cor. 10:1), to his compassion (Phil. 1:8), and to his willingness to bear reproaches (Rom. 15:3). Some background knowledge of the historical Jesus would appear to be indispensable if these expressions are to have intelligible meaning for Paul and his readers. The apostle is certainly aware of the external circumstances of the life of Jesus, for he refers to the poverty of Christ in 2 Cor. 8:9. Moreover, there are references to him as an example, and this must presuppose some detailed knowledge of his actions.

It is concerning the passion and resurrection of Jesus that there is the greatest clarity in the testimony of Paul. He knows about the betrayal (1 Cor. 11:23). Those who crucified him are said to be "the rulers of this age" (2:8), although he includes the Jews as partners in the offense (1 Thess. 2:14 – 15). His knowledge of Jesus' resurrection is detailed (1 Cor. 15:3 – 8). This passage merits careful attention, for it supplies information additional to the gospel accounts. The death and burial of Jesus are mentioned before the resurrection appearances to show the connection of these appearances with the historical events. Since Paul states explicitly that he had "received" this information, it is evident that no small importance was attached in the primitive period to the fact of the burial. Of special interest is the mention of the appearances. To begin with, some of the gospel appearances are omitted, such as the appearance to the women and to the two on the EMMAUS road. Whether the 500 are the same people Luke refers to on the occasion when Jesus ascended (Lk. 24:50) is not clear, but only Paul mentions the number. Moreover, it is he alone who refers to an appearance to JAMES. It is not easy to fit in Paul's data with those mentioned in the Gospels, but for that reason the evidence must be regarded as independent. The primitive kerygma clearly emphasized the need for historical verification of the central factor of the Christian faith. The resurrection was certainly more than a subjective experience.

Paul is specific about the details of the institution of the Last Supper, but his account supplements the gospel records by preserving the Lord's words, "do this, whenever you drink it, in remembrance of me" (1 Cor. 11:25). This section is of particular interest, as Paul maintains that he received the tradition from the Lord, by which he must mean that the tradition carried with it the divine sanction.

There are various occasions when Paul appears to be referring to the teaching of Jesus in a way that shows his acquaintance with it. It is possible that his reference to love as a fulfillment of the law (Rom. 13:10; Gal. 5:14) is an echo of the teaching of Jesus. More specific is the occasion when Paul, on the issue of marriage, distinguishes between his own opinion and the express teaching of Jesus, although he clearly believed that his opinion was in harmony with that teaching (1 Cor. 7:10 – 12, 25). In the PASTORAL EPISTLES two references may be noted. Timothy is advised that true teachers must conform their teaching to “the sound instruction of our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Tim. 6:3), which could be a reference to words taught by him. The other reference is linked with a scriptural citation that is clearly a saying of Jesus, and possibly a quotation, to the effect that the laborer deserves his wages (1 Tim. 5:18; Lk. 10:7).

Some have found difficulty in the fact that Paul does not show more acquaintance with the historic facts of the life of Jesus. This is not altogether unexpected. The apostle’s letters are incidental correspondence dealing with practical and theological problems that arose in the church. The fact is that there are few occasions within these epistles where recording of events and sayings of Jesus would have been appropriate. But it may be said that the epistles are written against such a basic understanding of the historical Jesus that they would not have been intelligible without it. (Cf. R.J. Knowling, The Witness of the Epistles: A Study in Modern Criticism [1892], and The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ Viewed in some of Its Aspects [1905].)

The witness of the book of Acts shows everywhere an emphasis on the death and resurrection of Jesus as the major content of the early preaching. What information does it supply about the life of Jesus? The most obvious is the brief résumé in PETER’S address to CORNELIUS and his household (Acts 10:36 – 43). Peter speaks of Jesus of Nazareth as one anointed by God with the Holy Spirit. His deeds are referred to as doing good and healing (esp. exorcisms). Death by hanging on a tree is also mentioned. This testifies to the place of historical details about Jesus in the earlier proclamations. In the earlier speeches there is recognition that the responsibility for the crucifixion must rest upon the Jews (cf. 2:23, 36; 7:52) and of the choice of a murderer in place of Jesus (3:14). Both Peter (3:14) and Stephen (7:52) describe Jesus as the Righteous One, thus bearing witness to their knowledge of his holy character.

In the other epistles the data is sparse. In the epistle to the HEBREWS there is a knowledge of Jesus’ temptation (Heb. 2:18; 4:15). The powerful intercessions of Jesus with strong crying and tears in the days of his flesh are mentioned in 5:7, and this seems to be a specific reference to the agony in GETHSEMANE. There is also a passing allusion to the hostility that Jesus endured (12:3), which is regarded as an example for the readers. It is clear, therefore, that the writer is conscious of much of the background of the historical Jesus.

In the epistle of James the main feature of interest is the manner in which the author so frequently reflects knowledge of the sayings of Jesus, particularly from the Sermon on the Mount (cf. Jas. 1:2 and Matt. 5:10 – 12; Jas. 1:22 and Matt. 7:24 – 27; Jas. 5:2 – 3 and Matt. 6:19, to cite only a few examples). This is of particular importance because James reflects more of the sayings of Jesus than any other NT author. But his epistle is the most practical of any, and the ethical teaching of Jesus was for him of greatest relevance.

The Petrine letters provide a few allusions to the historical Jesus. The suffering of Christ is referred to as an example (1 Pet. 2:21) and his sufferings are described (cf. Isa. 53). The statement in 1 Pet. 2:12 about men seeing one’s good deeds seems to be an echo of the saying of Jesus in Matt. 5:16. This epistle also preserves the enigmatic statement about Christ preaching to the spirits in prison (1 Pet. 3:19), which is nowhere hinted at in the Gospels. There is a reference to the transfiguration of Jesus and to the fact that there were eyewitnesses of this event (2 Pet. 1:17 – 18). John speaks of what eyes have seen and hands handled (1 Jn. 1:1), but gives no historical details. The book of Revelation is centered so much on the heavenly Christ that no reference is made to events in the life of Jesus, but the Lamb is referred to as slain. One saying that recurs—he who has an ear, let him hear—may well be an echo of the words of Jesus.

To sum up, it will be seen that specific data regarding the historic Jesus outside the Gospels in the NT is frugal, but that everywhere they are assumed. It is no wonder that the early church placed such store on its gospel sources.

E. Extracanonical material for the life of Jesus. There is little information about the history of Jesus from outside the NT, and most of what has survived is unlikely to be authentic; yet every avenue must be explored.

The Execution of John the Baptist (Renaissance painting by Bernardino Luini).

1. Non-Christian evidences. Under this, two subdivisions will be considered, pagan and Jewish. The pagan evidence may be dealt with quickly, since it is practically nonexistent. TACITUS reports about the Christians in the time of NERO's persecutions (A.D. 64) and mentions that Christ was executed in the reign of TIBERIUS by the procurator Pontius Pilate. PLINY the Younger, in his letter to the Emperor TRAJAN concerning the superstition of Christianity, refers to Christ, but only as an object of reviling by those persuaded to apostatize. Another historian, SUETONIUS, mentions the expulsion from Rome of the Jews who had caused a great tumult under the influence of "Chrestus" (who may well be identified with Christ), but he gives no further evidence about this person. These are the major pagan witnesses to the historical Jesus. In spite of the rapid spread of the Christian church, the pagan world approached no nearer to it than to call the whole movement a superstition which was accompanied by vile practices. Against such a background the progress of the Christian church is remarkable.

When one turns to Jewish evidences the situation is not too different. Three passages in JOSEPHUS's Antiquities may be noted. One gives an account of Herod's action in killing JOHN THE BAPTIST, which is of value in support of the validity of the gospel records, although there are different motives stated. Another passage makes specific statements about Jesus, although many have disputed the authenticity of the passage because no writer before EUSEBIUS (4th cent.) mentions it. It may be genuine, and will accordingly be cited in full: "Now about this time arose Jesus, a wise man, if indeed he should be called a man. For he was a doer of marvellous deeds, a teacher of men who receive the truth with pleasure; and he won over to himself many Jews and many also of the Greek (nation). He was the Christ. And when on the indictment of the principal men among us Pilate had sentenced him to the cross, those who had loved him at the first did not cease; for he appeared to them on the third day alive again, the divine prophets having foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him. And even now the tribe of Christians named after him is not extinct.”

This statement certainly seems rather too sympathetic toward Christianity for Josephus, particularly the reference to the resurrection. If it be considered authentic, it shows the extent to which knowledge of the historical Jesus had penetrated into the circle in which this Jewish historian moved. What details are given are in full agreement with the gospel narratives. The third passage in the Antiquities mentions Jesus but only insofar as referring to his connection with James, the brother of Jesus, whose murder by the Sanhedrin Josephus describes (Ant. 20.9.1 §200). Space will not allow discussion of the passages in the Slavonic version of Josephus’s Jewish War, for there is considerable doubt about their genuineness as a 1st-cent. testimony. If any historical value may be attached to them, they witness to the view that Jesus was concerned about armed political agitation.

In addition to the witness of Josephus, Jewish testimony must include references in the TALMUD. These are not numerous and may be restricted to eight that can be considered of any value. One refers to the hanging of Jeshu of Nazareth and mentions his practice of sorcery. This appears to be a Jewish attempt to explain away the responsibility of the Jews for the crucifixion. The second refers to five disciples of Jesus by name, but none of the names coincide with those mentioned in the Gospels. The third describes a proselyte calling up the spirit of Jesus by spells; while the fourth refers to a man “born of a woman” who was to arise and “make himself God,” against whom people are warned. There is also a reference to him departing and coming again. Another feature is the recognition that this man will lead the whole world astray, showing the universal appeal of Christianity. In two sayings there is a description of Jesus (under a pseudonym) reflecting Jewish ridicule of the VIRGIN BIRTH. The seventh reference is a saying attributed to Jesus concerning the hire of a harlot, which is almost certainly spurious; the eighth contains a story involving a Christian philosopher in which reference is made to the gospel, but the first supposed citation, “Son and daughter shall inherit together,” does not occur in the NT, neither does the second citation, although it looks like a modified version of Matt. 5:17. (For a concise account of these sayings, cf. R. Dunkerly, Beyond the Gospels [1957].) What value is to be placed on these Jewish comments on Jesus must remain doubtful, but the references demonstrate some knowledge of Jesus as a historical figure and give some indication of the scorn with which the rabbis regarded him.

2. Christian evidences. During the earliest period of church history extracanonical evidence is sparse. The present concern will be with two lines of evidence, archaeological and patristic. In the archaeological field almost the only evidence comes from the catacomb inscriptions. These supply information concerning what the early Christians thought about Jesus rather than information of a historical character. There is an early painting of him as a youthful and beardless person, but there is no knowing whether it was based on anyone other than in the imagination of the artist.

There might be some slight contribution from the SATOR-ROTAS, a word square that was widely used in early Christian circles. There is considerable dispute over its significance, but it has been suggested that the center word TENET in both directions forms the symbol of a cross, thus reminding the Christians of the basic belief in their faith. Others have seen the square as an indirect reference to the Lord’s Prayer in Latin, since the letters in the square make up PATER-NOSTER twice with two A’s and two O’s surplus, representing Christ as Alpha and Omega. Such evidence is so tenuous that it can contribute nothing to the understanding of the history of Jesus. (The square is prob. pre-Christian, and some argue that it has its origins in MITHRAISM.) The famous fish symbol more clearly testifies to early Christian faith in Christ as Savior (see FISH IV), but it too fails to contribute to the historical knowledge of Jesus.

Among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS there are various sayings attributed to Jesus, though the majority of these are variants of canonical sayings, which may well be accounted for by loose reminiscences of the teaching. Clement of Rome (see CLEMENT, EPISTLES OF) has passages of this kind, but it seems best to regard these as evidence of his knowledge of the canonical sources, rather than as independent evidence. In the DIDACHE there are a number of statements that echo the teaching of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount, without attributing the words to Jesus. Some think that a genuine saying is recorded by the Epistle of Barnabas (see BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF) in the following words, "So he says, Those who wish to see me and lay hold of my kingdom must receive me through tribulation and suffering." While this might be conceived as a genuine saying, it might equally well be no more than a general summary of the gist of Jesus' teaching about those who seek the kingdom. Many canonical sayings mention the tribulation which followers of Jesus must endure.

In the epistles of IGNATIUS there occurs a resurrection account which differs from the canonical accounts. The Shepherd of Hermas (see HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF) is interesting because it includes authoritative parables that are quite different from the canonical Gospels, but these are not directly attributed to Jesus. It is extraordinary how little material from the Apostolic Fathers preserves what might conceivably be regarded as genuine noncanonical sayings. It must be noted that not a great many canonical sayings were cited either, but if a large number of AGRAPHA (unwritten sayings) were circulating in the oral tradition, it might have been supposed that far more would have been preserved by the earliest writers had they considered them genuine. This kind of argument has obvious limitations, since the purpose of these patristic writers was not focused on showing their acquaintance with the sayings of Jesus.

There is little evidence in the writings of the apologists, although two testimonies may be mentioned. The Apology of Aristides (see ARISTIDES, APOLOGY OF) contains passages that show affinity with the Gospels, although introducing variations. It is clear that the author is echoing their language without making direct reference to the sayings of Jesus. There is certainly no evidence here of noncanonical sayings of Jesus. The other witness is JUSTIN MARTYR, who mentions the birth of Jesus as having taken place in a "cave" rather than in a "stable." Both terms might in this case be correct since stables in caves were not unknown in the ANE. There are sundry sayings of Jesus that are reminiscent of the gospel sayings. Bearing in mind that Justin often does not quote accurately, it may reasonably be supposed that he himself is responsible for the variations and is not citing some independent traditions. For instance, when Justin records the saying, "I came not to call the righteous to repentance but sinners, for the Heavenly Father desires the sinner's repentance rather than his punishment" (Apology 15), this looks like a Justinian enlargement of Lk. 5:32. One of the best attested agrapha in Justin is, "In whatsoever things I apprehend you, in these I shall judge you" (Dialogue with Trypho 47), which is reminiscent of various statements of Jesus on judgment in the gospels, but it may be an independent saying.

3. Apocryphal gospels. A large number of these appeared from the 2nd cent. onward, and in them are included many incidents that relate either to the birth and childhood of Jesus or to his passion. None of the material has any claim to be genuine. The additional data—such as the story of Jesus making clay birds that flew away—are generally fantastic. Moreover, these gospels were generally, if not always, heretical in purpose. The Gospel of Peter, for instance, is known to have been published in the interests of the Docetic heresy, for Serapion testified to this fact. It was not difficult for those gripped by a dogmatic purpose of a heretical kind to give vent to imagination in an attempt to strengthen their unorthodox position. The evidence from this source therefore lacks historical validity, but it does, by way of contrast, bring out vividly the remarkably restrained nature of the canonical testimony to Christ.

Some fragmentary evidence has been preserved of a "Hebrew Gospel" (see HEBREWS, GOSPEL OF THE), which cannot be classed as heretical and which may preserve some genuine material not found in the canonical Gospels. An examination of the most likely passages (see Dunkerly, Beyond the Gospels, 102ff.) shows some interesting deviations. For instance, Jesus' mother and brethren urge him to be baptized with them by John the Baptist, but Jesus hesitates because of his sinlessness. Some dogmatic consideration seems to have entered. Most of the other sayings possess a secondary-looking character which suggests the need for caution in accepting them as genuine.

4. Gnostic works. Little need be said about Gnostic sources as a possible quarry for authentic sayings of Jesus. The most notable books which preserve sayings of a similar kind to those in the canonical Gospels are the Gospel of Thomas and the Gospel of Philip. The parallels in the former alone warrant serious attention. There are many which echo the thought of the Synoptic Gospels, and in these cases it is almost certain that the author has used them, although there have been various other theories to account for the parallels (cf. the discussion of R. M. Wilson, Studies in the Gospel of Thomas [1960]). The possibility of some independently authentic material being preserved in Gnostic circles cannot be entirely ruled out. But probability is strongly against it, for in this work some of the known sayings of Jesus have been adapted for Gnostic purposes and this tendency may well have led to the creation of other sayings. Gnostics are not a safe source for authentic teaching. The early church fathers constantly charged them with distorting the Scriptures. Would any genuine oral tradition have escaped? See PHILIP, GOSPEL OF; THOMAS, GOSPEL OF.

V. The early life and ministry of Jesus Christ

A. Summary of method. It is impossible to produce a biography of Jesus as understood by the modern use of that term. Since Christianity is a historic religion, however, it is essential to provide at least an outline of the main events which went to make up his earthly life. It will be valuable by way of introduction to give a summary of the main stages of the story as it can be reconstructed from the Gospels.

The thirty years in Nazareth. In spite of the length of this period, the material preserved is confined to the birth stories and one brief incident when Jesus was twelve.

The period of preparation. This covers the ministry of John the Baptist in heralding the coming of Christ.

The Judean ministry. This includes the earliest period of the Lord's work until the commencement of the Galilean ministry.

The Galilean ministry. This section may be divided for convenience into three periods. The first ends with the choosing of the Twelve, the second with the withdrawal of Jesus from northern Galilee, and the third with his departure for Jerusalem on his last journey.

The closing period of the ministry. This is a convenient heading for the material fitted into the journey to the time when Jesus enters Jerusalem mainly centered beyond Jordan.

The passion and resurrection narratives. Under this caption are included all the events from the entry into Jerusalem until the resurrection and the various postresurrection appearances of Jesus to his disciples, culminating with the ascension.

The following outline of events and teaching will fill out in considerable detail these main stages to bring into focus the major purpose of Jesus. It is important to recognize that the theology of Jesus is seen both in his acts and in his teaching. An overconcentration on one or the other would be a mistake. They are inextricably linked. The many deeds of compassion, the demonstrations of power, the human interest, are all part of the total picture and form the background of the teaching. At the same time the teaching throws light upon the true nature and interpretation of the acts. Nevertheless, in the outline itself the emphasis will be on the events, since a separate section will deal with the teaching, both in method and content.

B. The thirty years in Nazareth. The most important part of this preliminary section of the life of Jesus is his advent into human life. It is for this reason that Matthew and Luke begin with narratives relating to the birth of Jesus, while John goes back and reflects upon his eternal preexistence. One would not expect the story of Jesus to begin where John begins, for he sets the scene beyond the realm of history. Nevertheless, by reason of what the evangelists believed Jesus to be, his is the most logical beginning.

1. John's prologue (Jn. 1:1 – 18). At first glance it seems strange that John should introduce his book with statements about the Word, especially as he does not identify the Word as Jesus Christ until toward the end of the prologue. Evidently the first readers of the gospel must have known what John was describing, otherwise his opening would have been more mystifying than elucidating. One cannot now be certain of its source for John. PHILO JUDAEUS of Alexandria has much to say about the LOGOS, which in his system was an intermediary principle between God and man, but he denied the possibility of the Logos becoming flesh. When John says that the Logos did become flesh he is clearly presenting a different kind of Logos from Philo. For all his great erudition, Philo could not present a Logos capable of dwelling among human beings, who could move them into action and give them power to become sons of God. This was a new element in the contemporary Greek world. Jewish thought had also prepared for the coming of Jesus, not only with the messianic hope, but by its concept of the intermediary Memra, God's agent in the world of creation.

Far more important than the origin of the idea of the Word are the statements concerning him which John makes in his prologue. Not only does he stress his preexistence, but also his divine nature. His power is evidence of his creative energy and of his re-creative activity. The Word is identified as Light shining in an atmosphere of darkness, which describes the moral environment into which Jesus came. The Word becoming flesh is pivotal to John's introduction to his gospel. The whole account is basically a human and historic story, because the becoming flesh had taken place among men and the glory of the incarnate Word had been seen. There is an unquestionable connection between the prologue and the events that follow. The same Jesus Christ whose actions and words are recorded is the means whereby grace and truth come to human beings, and through whom God makes known his revelation. Unless the records of all the Gospels are seen in the light of this mission, there can be no proper evaluation of the life of Jesus.

One significant feature about John's introduction is the mention of John (the Baptist) by name, the witness to the Light, before the Light had himself been identified. This shows, in agreement with the Synoptic Gospels, the importance of the ministry of John the Baptist.

2. The birth narratives (Matt. 1:1—2:23; Lk. 1:1—2:38). John's statement that the Word became flesh at once raises the question in what circumstances it happened. Matthew and Luke supply the answer. The narratives, although brief, are nevertheless sufficient to establish the historical reality of the incarnation. There is a restraint about them that immediately impresses. Matthew approaches the subject from a different point of view than Luke, and yet their narratives are complementary to each other. Both stress the supernatural character of the advent of Jesus. In Matthew this is brought out by the narration of several dreams that reveal various stages of development, from the announcement of Joseph's reaction when he learns of Mary's pregnancy until the return from Egypt. In Luke's account a similar impression is created by the angel's announcement to Mary. It is at once clear that this is no ordinary birth. It is not surprising therefore that Matthew records a citation that a virgin would conceive (Matt. 1:23). It is true that Isaiah's statement need not refer to a virgin, but to a young woman, but it is equally evident that Matthew intended the readers to understand that the advent of Jesus was effected in a miraculous way by conception taking place in a virgin. Luke's account supports this in the promise to Mary that the Holy Spirit should come upon her (Lk. 1:35).

View from Mount Tabor looking NW over the Nazareth Ridge and the modern city of Nazareth. Despite Jesus' extended stay in : Nazareth during his early years, the Gospels say very little about this time in his earthly life.

It is never suggested in these narratives or anywhere else in the Gospels that people generally regarded Jesus as any other than the son of Joseph (cf. Jn. 6:4; Matt. 13:55; Lk. 2:27, 41, 43). Popular opinion is no sure guide to truth, and both Matthew and Luke have set out to stress the uniqueness of the birth of Jesus as a necessary prelude to their accounts of his life and ministry. Whatever modern attempts may be made to approach the life of Jesus from a purely human point of view, it is beyond dispute that the evangelists made no such attempt.

In Matthew's gospel the ANNUNCIATION is made to Joseph, and the most characteristic feature of the revelation made to him is the clear statement of the purpose of the advent. Jesus was coming to save his people from their sins (Matt. 1:21). At the beginning of the gospel a theological note is introduced. The subsequent doings of Jesus are all geared to this purpose, which provides their motive force.

In Luke's gospel the annunciation is to Mary and is accompanied by an account of the promise of the birth of John the Baptist and its fulfillment. The most significant feature of this account is the inclusion of the hymns known as the MAGNIFICAT and BENEDICTUS, both of which are formed on the pattern of the OT Psalms. They create an atmosphere of rejoicing over the coming of Jesus that is frequently reflected in the subsequent narrative, for Luke's account has more references to joy than any of the others.

The story of the angel's announcement to the shepherds draws attention to the same feature. The day of the advent of Jesus was a day of good tidings of great joy. At the same time, the announcement was made of peace on earth to all men of (God's) good will, which gives a distinctly universal aspect to the purpose of Jesus. The mission of Jesus could never be understood against a background of narrow nationalistic aspirations. It needed a broader canvas. The homage of humble shepherds signifies something of the receptivity of the common people, a feature which was to be abundantly illustrated in the subsequent ministry of Jesus.

Matthew's account of the homage of the MAGI presents a rather different aspect. These were Gentile inquirers for the coming Christ. They believed themselves to have been divinely led, and indeed through being supernaturally warned of Herod's devices were able to frustrate his intention to take adverse action against the child Jesus. This homage of Gentiles is specially noteworthy at the beginning of a gospel that is primarily written with Jewish interests in mind. The Messiah was not so Jewish that Gentiles had no desire to worship him, and in harmony with this is the conclusion of this same gospel, in which the commission of Jesus to his disciples is worldwide.

It is not possible to be certain when the wise men arrived at the place where Jesus was. Some think it was a considerable time after his birth, a view based mainly on the evidence that Herod sought to kill all the children under two years old. Herod did not know how long ago the child had been born. He knew only when the star appeared. The flight into Egypt, recorded only in Matt. 2:13 – 14, is seen as a direct fulfillment of prophecy. This therefore plays an important part in Matthew's purpose, that is, to show that the course of the life of Jesus was no accidental happening, but a designed fulfillment of what God had foretold.

In the meantime, Jesus was present at the temple for the ritual of consecration, according to Jewish custom (Lk. 2:22 – 24). On this occasion SIMEON and ANNA both bore witness to Jesus. Simeon's song (the NUNC DIMITTIS) again conveys a universal viewpoint, for Jesus was to become a light for Gentile illumination (2:32) as well as Israel's glory. At the same time, Simeon foresaw hostility toward Jesus, for some would speak evil against him (2:34). Both Simeon and Anna typify the realization of the fulfillment in Jesus of long-awaited messianic hopes. The story of the ministry of Jesus is intended to be read against such a background.

Both Matthew and Luke include genealogies. Matthew uses one to introduce his gospel, tracing the list from Abraham to Jesus. Luke, who does not refer to the genealogy until after recording the ministry of John the Baptist (Lk. 3), begins with Jesus and traces his ancestry back to Adam. Although some of the names in these two genealogical lists are the same, most of them are not. A partial explanation may be found in the schematic arrangement adopted by Matthew, having three groups of fourteen names (Matt. 1:17). This is made possible only by various omissions. It has been suggested that whereas Matthew follows the lineage of Joseph, Luke follows Mary's, but this supposition seems to run counter to what Luke himself states, since he does not even mention Mary. It is impossible to tell either the sources of these genealogies or the extent to which either author depended upon his own investigations. The major contribution of both lists for the life of Jesus is clear enough—both trace the ancestry through David and Abraham. He came of a royal line which gave rise to the title Son of David, which was used by various people in the course of the narrative. See GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

Of all the evangelists it is only Luke who makes any attempt to set the record of Jesus on the stage of secular history. Even he concentrates on the timing of the appearance of John the Baptist rather than on the appearance of Jesus, although he shows the two events to be inseparable. The dating is sixfold (Lk. 3:1 – 2) and points to the major political figures in the Jewish world. This note by Luke is of great importance in establishing the historical setting of Christianity.

One other contact with secular history mentioned by Luke is the CENSUS of QUIRINIUS, governor of SYRIA (Lk. 2:2), which is said to be the occasion for Mary and Joseph to travel to Bethlehem just prior to the birth of Jesus. There is known to have been a census held under this official in A.D. 6, but this would be too late for the birth of Jesus. There is some reason to think that an earlier census was held in Syria more approximate to Luke's chronology, but the difficulty of Quirinius still remains, unless, as Sir William Ramsay supposed, this official held an extraordinary command at the same time as the governorship of Varus. See CHRONOLOGY (NT) I.B.

3. Home life at Nazareth (Lk. 2:39 – 52). Contrary to the modern idea of biographical studies that seeks traces from the early years of influences that may have contributed to the later development of a character, none of the evangelists shows the slightest interest in early environmental factors. Luke alone mentions an incident during the thirty years that Jesus spent in Nazareth. The visit to the temple when Jesus was twelve was no doubt included to draw attention to the fact that in the home of Jesus the usual Jewish practices were observed. Twelve was the age at which Jewish boys attended the Passover feast. For Luke it had more significance than this because of the opportunity it afforded to illustrate Jesus' first contact with the temple teachers.

The incident not only reveals their amazement at the wisdom of Jesus, but also his own consciousness of a divine mission, which his family did not understand. They evidently were incapable of appreciating his fullness of wisdom and his possession of special divine grace (Lk. 2:40). Mary appears to have understood most, but she kept her reflections to herself (2:51). She must have wondered often at the grace with which he was subject to her. The restraint of the canonical account of the childhood of Jesus contrasts vividly with the spate of childish stories that were later current in the apocryphal gospels. The processes of thought by which Jesus arrived at his messianic consciousness may claim the interest of some modern theologians, but were never considered important by the evangelists.

In the body of the Gospels there are a few hints given of the attitude of the inhabitants of Nazareth toward Jesus. He was known as the carpenter or the carpenter's son (Mk. 6:3; Matt. 13:55). Moreover, there were other children in the family—James, Joses, Simon, Judas, and some sisters (Matt. 13:55 – 56). None of the Nazareth inhabitants apparently expected Jesus to show much wisdom or to do mighty works, for they were astonished when his ministry was in progress. The mystery of the hidden years is deepened by the obvious hardness of the people who knew him best.

C. The period of preparation. Before the actual commencement of the ministry of Jesus, there were several significant events—the preaching of John the Baptist, Jesus' baptism, and the temptation. All three of these events are of basic importance for the records of the public ministry of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels, although Mark makes only a passing reference to the temptation.

1. John the Baptist (Matt. 3:1 – 12; Mk. 1:1 – 8; Lk. 3:1 – 17). The ministry of JOHN THE BAPTIST must be considered in the light of contemporary Judaism. There were certainly messianic hopes and the expectation of the dawning of a new age. There was belief in the approach of the KINGDOM OF GOD, although popular ideas were mostly materialistic, but John did not follow the normal pattern. In his methods and teaching he was like one of the ancient PROPHETS. In many respects he was the last of an era. He was this only because he was able to point to the Inaugurator of another era and the dawn of a new kingdom. All three synoptic writers mention the testimony of Isaiah to the coming of John the Baptist. The link with the past is thus established and a divine authority is given to the work of the herald of Jesus. All the writers record the preparatory ministry of the Baptist, but it is Luke in particular who carries on the quotation from Isaiah to include the promise that all flesh should see God's salvation. The records clearly bring out John the Baptist's call to repent, and his prediction of the Coming One who would be greater than he, and would baptize with the HOLY SPIRIT (see BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT). Both Matthew and Luke further call attention to the judgment that would follow the arrival of the One to come.

When John preached a baptism of REPENTANCE, there was immediate criticism of the Pharisees and Sadducees, who were described as a generation of vipers, a particularly strong expression of adverse opinion that was intended to bring them to a state of true repentance. There is a forthrightness and sternness about John's message that showed the serious character of his preparatory work. With such a herald as he, whose clothing of camel's hair drew attention to the sternness of his character, the coming of Jesus was set against a morally challenging situation. Men were being prepared by the serious call to repentance. Moreover, the challenge to moral reformation was made specific by the Baptist, as Luke brings out clearly by samples of the advice given to tax collectors and soldiers.

The rite of baptism was not new with John. The Jews practiced proselyte baptism, and some groups, such as the Essenes, appear to have practiced ritual cleansing, which was closely akin to initiatory baptism. The group at Qumran placed some importance on the rite, and it is interesting to conjecture whether John had had personal contact with the community. If he did, he had certainly departed from their pattern, for they were essentially inward-looking and their rites were exclusively for initiates; John was essentially outward-looking, directing his call for repentance to the multitudes. According to Matthew's account, he announced the imminence of the kingdom of heaven in the same terms that Jesus began to preach. This is clearly intended to show the continuity between the preaching of both, although the fundamental difference between them is that Jesus is himself the Inaugurator of the kingdom, whereas John was only the herald.

2. The baptism of Jesus (Matt. 3:13 – 17; Mk. 1:9 – 11; Lk. 3:21 – 22). The baptism of Jesus is the climax of John's work. When the king arrived, the herald's work was done. John was expecting to announce Jesus, but he never expected that Jesus would present himself for baptism. The one he was expecting was surely beyond the need for repentance. His greatness was such that John felt himself unworthy to unloose his sandals. Why did he request a baptism of repentance? Matthew alone records John's hesitation, and for this reason some scholars have regarded the detail as a later addition, prompted by motives of reverence, but in view of John's overwhelming conviction that Jesus was infinitely greater than he, it would have been much more surprising if no hesitation had been recorded. At the same time the reason for Jesus' action must be considered. According to Matthew, it was to fulfill all righteousness (Matt. 3:15), by which Jesus made clear to John that it was the right and proper thing for him to be baptized.

The Judean Desert, which was the setting of Jesus' temptation. (View to the N.)

The problem arises concerning Jesus' submission to a rite that was specifically described as a baptism of repentance for the remission of sins. None of the synoptic evangelists gives the explanation, but all record the attestation of the heavenly voice bearing witness to the beloved Son in whom the Father is well pleased. The identification of Jesus with those needing repentance was clearly part of the divine plan. For the multitudes the baptismal rite symbolized their desire to forsake their sins, but for Jesus it meant a call to identify himself with a sinful people. Neither John nor any of the witnesses could recognize the theological implications of this symbolic act. It was part of the process in which Christ, as Paul later recognized, was made sin for mankind (2 Cor. 5:21).

Undoubtedly all the evangelists see the baptism as the commencement of the public ministry of Jesus. This is marked especially by the descent of the Spirit upon him (in the form of a dove) and by the heavenly attestation. This differentiated Jesus from all others who attended John's baptism. It is improbable that these supernatural signs were seen by any apart from John and Jesus, but for the evangelists their importance lay in their revelation of the nature of the mission of Jesus. John's gospel is most specific of all in recording the remarkable pronouncement of John the Baptist that Jesus was the Lamb of God who takes away the world's sin (Jn. 1:29). The writer of the gospel gives no indication of the extent of the Baptist's own understanding of his statement, although he clearly sees its importance in distinguishing the Baptist's work from that of Jesus. The fact that later doubts gripped the mind of the Baptist regarding the claims of Jesus does not vitiate his confident prediction at the commencement of the ministry.

3. The temptation of Jesus (Matt. 4:1 – 11; Mk. 1:12 – 13; Lk. 4:1 – 13). This was perhaps the most revealing event in the preparatory period. The fact that it followed immediately from the baptism is regarded as significant by all the synoptic evangelists. As Jesus had identified himself with sinners in John's baptism, so he exposed himself to the temptings of SATAN. It would be better to speak of testings rather than temptations, since the latter word has too often become associated with an element of yielding that was certainly not present in the case of Jesus. Details of the characteristics of the testings that came to him are given only by Matthew and Luke, although Mark mentions some important features, such as the presence of wild beasts and the ministration of angels.

In all the accounts the idea of a supernatural conflict is inescapable and clearly forms a basic introduction to the later passion narratives, in which the climax of the conflict is enacted. The three temptations mentioned by Matthew and Luke are to be regarded not as exhaustive but as exemplary. They are typical of the avenues along which testings continually come. They are, moreover, not to be restricted to the period of forty days, as Luke makes clear when he mentions that the devil's withdrawal was until a convenient season. The course of the ministry frequently presented occasions in which the testings would be repeated.

To understand the temptations, account must be taken of the messianic consciousness of Jesus. He was deeply aware of his mission and his power to accomplish it. The testings concerned the methods he would use to accomplish it. The use of miraculous power for his own preservation (to turn stone to bread) was rejected as totally unworthy of his mission. It would amount to a failure to maintain true priorities. Moreover, the urge to use the same miraculous powers to impress upon the world at large his messianic claims was equally alien to his true purpose. It would appeal to the spectacular, but would be diametrically opposed to the divine methods.

The other recorded testing concerned the character of the kingdom that Jesus had come to inaugurate. Was it to be comparable to the kingdoms of this world? Was it to share its glory with theirs? Such a possibility was unthinkable, and would amount to conceding allegiance to the devil, in whose hands, as Jesus acknowledged, were the imperial ambitions of the present age. His kingdom was of a totally different order. In all three of the temptations recorded, the Lord overcomes the tempting of the devil by means of the Scriptures, as the most appropriate medium for establishing the principles of divine action.

The difference in the order of the temptations in Matthew and Luke is more significant for the respective purpose of each than for the consciousness of Jesus himself. Matthew places the temptation to an earthly imperial status last, probably because of his design to show the true kingly status of Jesus, while Luke places last the urge to self-display because of his desire to show Jesus as essentially a man among men. Whether either knew the precise order or whether either attached any special importance to it is impossible to say.

The record of these temptations is generally appealed to as evidence that Jesus was in all respects tempted as we are (cf. Heb. 4:15), but this is true in only a limited respect. Since Jesus alone possessed messianic consciousness and power, the testings that came to him were unique. But it cannot be denied that they are allied to those which afflict all human beings. It must be recognized that Jesus was exposed to many more temptations than those recorded. Clearly, the public ministry of Jesus opened against a background of tremendous struggle and a resolute rejection of all methods of achieving his mission that were opposed to the real purpose for which he came. See TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

D. The Judean ministry of Jesus. It is in John's gospel alone that any information is given about the early Judean ministry, a fact that raises some problems but need not lead to historical skepticism regarding this period. It may, in fact, be stated that the accounts in the other Gospels would be unintelligible apart from John's account of the initial introduction of the disciples to Jesus. This event followed immediately upon the impact that the statements of John the Baptist had upon them (beginning at Jn. 1:19). They may not have understood the full importance of the pronouncement about the Lamb of God, if they had any insight at all, which is certainly questionable. They were drawn as by a magnet to the Person about whom the words were spoken.

It is significant that John does not record a mass following, but rather the response of individuals. Discipleship was at this stage loose and needed confirmation by a further specific call later on, as the synoptics record. There is no doubt about the deep impression made by Jesus. He was acclaimed as Messiah by his first two followers. He was acknowledged as Son of God and King of Israel by NATHANAEL. He was winning men by means utterly different from those suggested by Satan at the time of the temptation.

During this period of personal contact with future apostles, Jesus made a visit to GALILEE, and while there he was involved in a wedding at CANA, which is noted by the evangelist as being the place of the first of Jesus' signs (Jn. 2:1 – 11). The purpose of the signs was to reveal the glory of Christ, and it is not without meaning that the first sample should be in a purely domestic setting. It throws light upon the humanity of Jesus.

Two other incidents in Jerusalem preceded the opening of the public ministry in Galilee. The first was a public act, the second a private conversation. The cleansing of the temple by the expulsion of money changers (Jn. 2:13 – 17) was a daring commencement to public work, and for this reason many prefer to regard this incident as misplaced by John, especially in view of the similar incident recorded by the synoptics at the end of the ministry. A double cleansing cannot be dismissed as impossible, although many regard it as improbable. Some consider it to be symbolic of the purifying purpose of Jesus in the citadel of contemporary Judaism. John clearly regarded the historical details as important, for he mentions the Passover feast. The incident itself reveals the great authority that the presence of Jesus must have conveyed. It also illuminates one aspect of the mission of Jesus, for he alludes to his coming resurrection (as Jn. 2:18 – 22 shows).

The conversation with NICODEMUS (Jn. 3) is of a different order, although akin insofar as Nicodemus was himself associated with official Judaism. His quest was typical of those who were dissatisfied with their religion, and yet who were mystified by the spiritual emphasis of Jesus. The dialogue John relates is important as showing the place of REGENERATION in the thought of Jesus and the inability of Nicodemus to grasp its true meaning. This was to be symbolic of the reaction of people generally to the spiritual message of Jesus.

John's account brings out clearly the connection between the work of Jesus and John the Baptist. Both practiced baptism in the Jordan. This similarity caused difficulties among John's disciples (Jn. 3:25), who were unable to grasp the preparatory character of John's work, and necessitated a repetition of John's denial that he was the Messiah. He was only a witness, and his testimony agreed with the self-testimony of Jesus himself.

When Jesus left Judea for Galilee to commence his ministry there, he passed through SAMARIA, and his experiences, recorded only by John, are a significant introduction to the synoptic account of the ministry (Jn. 4:1 – 45). Samaria had little in common with Jerusalem except for possessing its own central worship and maintaining some kind of messianic hope. The Jews and Samaritans had no personal dealings with each other, as John makes clear. All the more remarkable, therefore, was the Lord's interview with a Samaritan woman. It proves beyond doubt that he had no intention of being restricted by narrow Jewish nationalism. It shows furthermore that his approach to women differed from that of his Jewish contemporaries. His conversation with this woman revealed his extraordinary insight into human nature, and it has since become a pattern for personal evangelism. The most striking feature about the whole incident is the self-revelation of Jesus. He acknowledged himself to be the Messiah (Jn. 4:26), in spite of the fact that he later showed a consistent refusal to permit his disciples to make this known. It appears that he took a different line with the Samaritans because their messianic hope differed from that of the Jews. It was not so closely tied to nationalistic aspirations and was therefore less open to serious misapprehensions. Moreover, the sequel to the conversation shows the spiritual character of the Lord's mission in the manifest joy that he had when people believed on him. The dialogue itself supports this view, since Jesus soon turns the conversation away from material to spiritual concerns, especially the spiritual nature of God.

E. The Galilean ministry. After the events in Samaria, Jesus returns to the place where water was turned into wine and, while there, performs another miracle: the healing of a royal official's son, who was in a different city, CAPERNAUM (Jn. 4:46 – 53). Although a similar incident is recorded in the synoptics later on in the ministry, several differences in detail suggest that the miracle related by John is distinct. Moreover, John points out specifically that this was the second of Jesus' signs in Galilee, as if he were attaching some importance to this fact. The healing of the official's son serves as a fitting prelude to the whole Galilean ministry, for Jesus had not yet become well known in Galilee for his miraculous works, and this fact heightens all the more the father's faith, which is specifically mentioned as a factor in the healing.

It has already been noted that the Galilean ministry may be divided into three periods, and these will be separately described. It should be observed, however, that although the general heading relates to Galilee, there must have been some activity in Jerusalem, if John's record is to be taken into account. Most of the time, however, Jesus worked and taught in Galilee.

1. The period up to the choosing of the Twelve. (a) The initial call of disciples. The choosing of the Twelve began in the specific calling of four men from their fishing, PETER and ANDREW, JAMES and JOHN (Matt. 4:18 – 22; Mk. 1:16 – 20; Lk. 5:1 – 11). From John's account one can see that these men had earlier contact with Jesus, but now they are called to devote themselves more wholeheartedly to his work. In the process of time others were added, but it was not until the number had reached twelve that Jesus appointed them as an officially constituted body of apostles, which did not occur until the end of this period. Connected with the call of the first disciples is the incident of the miraculous catch of fish (Lk. 5:1 – 11), which is intended to emphasize the superior achievement of catching men. The spiritual is more excellent than the material.

It is impossible to be certain about the exact order of events in this period, and it is consequently better to group the main incidents into similar categories. With this in mind, the call of Levi will be mentioned first, although not occurring until later on in the period (Matt. 9:9 – 13; Mk. 2:13 – 17; Lk. 5:27 – 32). Levi, who became known as MATTHEW, is representative of a class of people greatly despised in the contemporary Jewish world. He was a TAX COLLECTOR, and since taxes were a sore point with the Jews, those who collected them became the targets for social contempt. No information is given about the grounds on which Jesus based his choice of men, but many of them seem to have been unlikely characters. It is one of the most illuminating studies to consider how he molded such people for his purpose.

b. The Sermon on the Mount. Another important aspect of the early ministry of Jesus was his preaching, and it is mainly Matthew who gives samples, particularly in the long discourse known as the SERMON ON THE MOUNT (Matt. 5 – 7). In view of the fact that Luke records much of this discourse material in isolated passages, many scholars dispute whether Matthew's material was delivered on one occasion. It is possible that Matthew is responsible for the collection of the material into a discourse, but this is by no means certain. He undoubtedly leads his readers to assume that one particular occasion was in mind. Moreover, it is reasonable to maintain that the Lord frequently repeated the same teaching, as was customary among Jewish rabbis, and in this case there is no basis for disputing the unity of the Sermon on the Mount. The content is more important, however, than this historical question. Since a separate section is devoted to a general summary of the teaching of Jesus, it will be necessary only to indicate the special characteristics of this important discourse.

The main emphasis is ethical. Jesus had in mind the establishment of his kingdom and the consequent need of new patterns of behavior. His own teaching is set forth as an advance on the teaching of MOSES. A wide variety of themes is covered, mostly of a social character, such as murder, divorce, retaliation, and attitudes toward one's enemies. There are, however, many sayings that deal with personal religious motives, such as prayer and fasting, self-deception, and varying reactions to the hearing of the Word. The BEATITUDES at the beginning of the discourse similarly encourage spiritual and moral values. Matthew records what the hearers thought of the sermon. They were astonished, and this may be regarded as typical during the early ministry. It was the authoritative nature of the teaching that so deeply impressed the hearers.

(c) Healings and other miracles. There were during this period many acts of healing, of which various samples are recorded. Matthew, particularly, groups the healing miracles (Matt. 8:1—9:8; cf. Mk. 1:40—2:12; Lk. 5:12—26). He places the following incidents in a sequence: the healing of the leper (Matt. 8:1—4), the centurion's servant (8:5—13), Peter's mother-in-law (8:14—15), the sick in the evening (8:16—17), the Gadarene demoniac (8:28—34), the palsied man (9:1—8), Jairus's daughter and the woman with a hemorrhage (9:18—26), two blind men (9:27—31), and the demoniac who was mute (9:32—34). Most of these healings appear also in Mark and Luke, but in a different order. Matthew's arrangement vividly emphasizes the nature of the healing ministry. Although not mentioned in every case, there is frequent reference to the FAITH of the people healed. In the case of the paralytic, the power of Jesus to forgive sins is linked with his power to heal (Matt. 9:2). This is a reminder that the spiritual ministry was of more concern to Jesus than the healing work. None of the Gospels presents him as a wonder-worker. The miracles of healing are related to bring out the element of compassion. The attention is focused on the human aspects and not on the extraordinary nature of the cure. There is no suggestion of magic, nor are there any incantations or formulas. Jesus is always master of the situation (see below the section on the miracles of Jesus).

Of special importance is the power of Jesus over evil spirits, for this is a marked feature of all stages of the ministry. The work of Jesus was set in an atmosphere of spiritual conflict. The examples quoted showing his power over demoniacs are to be regarded as illustrations of spiritual victories. See EXORCISM.

During this earlier period of the ministry, one miracle is recorded that affected the world of nature, namely, the stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:23—27; cf. Mk. 4:35—41; Lk. 8:22—25). It is placed earlier in Matthew than in the other synoptics. The focus of attention is once again not so much on the marvelous power of Jesus as on the lack of faith on the part of the disciples. Nonetheless, the element of marvel is not absent, as the miracle caused the disciples to discuss what kind of man he was that the wind and sea obeyed him (Matt. 8:27; Mk. 4:41; Lk. 8:25). Throughout the gospel story there is an element of mystery about the person of Jesus.

(d) Popularity and criticism. The evangelists are deeply interested in the impact Jesus made on various types of people. This is most marked in their comments on the early popularity of Jesus. The summary in Matt. 4:23—25 makes this clear—his fame spread throughout all Syria (cf. Mk. 1:28). This enthusiasm over his healing work was undoubtedly superficial. The real meaning of his message and the self-effacing spiritual character of his mission had not yet dawned upon the multitudes, nor were they capable of comprehending it. By way of contrast with this superficial popularity, the criticism of the Pharisees is brought out in equally clear fashion. Mark, in fact, preserves a sequence of incidents designed to show the increasing hostility of the scribes and Pharisees (Mk. 2:1—3:6). The culmination of this sequence shows the intensity of the hostility since the Pharisees joined forces with the Herodians, an association that rarely formed.

At a later stage of the ministry, Jesus makes some pointed criticisms of the Pharisees, mainly on the grounds of their hypocrisy (cf. Matt. 23). At this early stage, however, he presents them with a reasoned approach to provide them with the opportunity to respond. The stumbling-stone for them was the unorthodoxy of Jesus. In their eyes he was a lawbreaker in his attitude toward the SABBATH, while his social fellowship with tax collectors and sinners could only invite Pharisaic contempt. No doubt the Pharisees soon reacted to the popular opinion that Jesus taught and acted with authority, in contrast to the scribes (Matt. 7:29). They could not fail to see a very dangerous threat to their own grip upon the common people.

(e) The choosing of the Twelve. The naming of twelve specially chosen disciples and the description of their first mission is of such importance that all the Synoptic Gospels mention it. In both Matthew and Mark the commissioning is linked with authority over unclean spirits (Matt. 10:1; Mk. 3:13 – 19). In addition, Matthew mentions the power to heal, and Mark the command to preach. Luke separates the story of the choosing of the Twelve from the special purpose of the office of apostle (cf. Lk. 6:12 – 16; 9:1 – 2). The men whom Jesus chose were a representative group. They were not all drawn from the poorer classes, for the father of James and John possessed his own boat and employed servants (Mk. 1:20). Matthew as a tax collector would be well-to-do, although hated by his compatriots. Simon may have been an erstwhile revolutionary.

Such importance did Jesus attach to the mission of the Twelve that he gave them specific instructions that served not only for their immediate benefit on their first preaching tour, but also as a pattern for the subsequent missions of the Christian church. The charge to the Twelve is more fully recorded in Matthew than in the other Gospels (Matt. 10:5 – 42; cf. Lk. 9:1 – 6; and Mk. 6:7 – 13). Special emphasis is placed on material provisions, for Jesus advises that nothing unnecessary should be taken. The disciples are instructed how to proceed if any town or village receives them, and what to do if it does not. The advice is essentially practical. The message they are to proclaim is confined to an announcement of the nearness of the kingdom. They were not to imagine that all would warm to this message, for much hostility and persecution would await them.

The advice is obviously to prepare Jesus' disciples for future rather than immediate opposition and is well illustrated from the story of the early church. To fortify them they are reminded of the certainty of their heavenly Father's care over them. The most startling prediction given to the Twelve was the certainty that the message of Jesus would result in serious division within households. He who had himself experienced the hostility of the Pharisees, even during this initial period, was in no doubt concerning the difficulties that would confront his disciples. Victory would not come except through enduring much for Christ's sake.

Some comment has already been made on the relationship between Jesus and John the Baptist, but Matthew and Luke include further sayings of Jesus on the subject, and these deserve notice. It has been seen that Jesus began by preaching what John had preached, but he soon went on to proclaim his unique message. John had already recognized and publicly announced Jesus to be greater than he, but it is not surprising that he became perplexed by later developments. When doubts arose, he sent messengers from his prison, where he had been incarcerated by Herod, to ascertain whether Jesus was prepared to confirm his messiahship (Matt. 11:2 – 6). Jesus not only sent an encouraging word back to John, but also commended him for his greatness in the hearing of the crowds.

2. The period up to the withdrawal of Jesus from northern Galilee. (a) Sabbath controversies and healings. It is convenient at this point to include the incident recorded only by John, when an impotent man was healed at the pool of BETHESDA. It is impossible to identify the feast during which the healing occurred (Jn. 5:1, though many assume it was the Passover) and equally impossible to know precisely where to place this incident within the synoptic framework. Its main significance is in the fact that the man's own attitude of faith is not specifically stated, although it is clearly implied by his ready response to the command from Jesus to take up his bed and walk. Since the miracle was performed on the Sabbath, the action again aroused the antagonism of the Jews, although in this case was added the further charge that Jesus made himself equal with God.

Another Sabbath controversy occurred when the disciples plucked ears of grain from a grainfield on the Sabbath (Matt. 12:1 – 8; Mk. 2:23 – 28; Lk. 6:1 – 5), an action which Pharisaic casuistry regarded as work and was therefore forbidden. This led to a specific claim by Jesus to be "Lord of the Sabbath" (Matt. 12:8), which placed him in a superior position to the scribes in the interpretation of the Law. Again the plot of the Pharisees to destroy Jesus is mentioned (12:14), after another healing on the Sabbath day.

During the course of his accounts of healing miracles, Matthew refers to the fulfillment of prophecy, citing a passage from the SERVANT OF THE LORD songs of ISAIAH (Matt. 12:15 – 21). This is an important aspect of his record of Jesus' ministry, but it is also seen to a lesser extent in all the Gospels. Luke records two outstanding miracles that occurred during this period, the healing of the centurion's servant at Capernaum (Lk. 7:1 – 10) and the raising of the widow's son at Nain (7:11 – 17). The first is remarkable for the faith of a non-Jew who was prepared to believe the authoritative word of Jesus, and the second for the effect it had upon the crowds, who glorified God (7:16).

An incident that shows the deep human understanding of Jesus is the anointing of his feet by a woman, well-known for her sinful character, in the house of a Pharisee (Lk. 7:36 – 50). Luke vividly tells the story of the woman's devotion and of the Pharisee's carping criticisms. By means of a parable Jesus shows Simon the Pharisee that the woman, in spite of her known character, had nevertheless outshone him in devotion. Such an incident is an acted parable of the effect of Jesus on the two representative groups, the religious and the nonreligious. Those who should have set an example in devotion dismally failed, while the underprivileged responded.

(b) Division and attack Controversies were never far away in the ministry of Jesus, but one of the most pointed of these followed the exorcism of a devil (Matt. 12:22 – 19; Mk. 3:20 – 27; Lk. 11:14 – 22). The Pharisees attributed it to BEELZEBUB, prince of the devils, but Jesus points out how ludicrous it is to think of Satan casting out Satan. The power to cast out demons is by the Spirit of God. Never more vividly than this did the spiritual character of the conflict come to the fore. The tragedy was that the Pharisees with all their religious scrupulosity were near to committing the UNPARDONABLE SIN. Some of the scribes and Pharisees then pursued a different line against Jesus—the demand for a sign, which he emphatically rejected. He was so essentially different from the messianic concept of the Jews that it is not surprising that they required a sign to resolve their perplexity. But they were too blind to take notice of earlier signs, such as Jonah and Solomon. It was necessary now for Jesus to make clear his true relationship to his family, and he shows the development of a relationship which far transcends family ties (Matt. 12:46 – 50).

(c) Samples of the teaching of Jesus. The teaching of Jesus remained much the same as in the earlier period. Luke records many sayings parallel to those in the Sermon on the Mount, although in a different context. There is no doubt that Jesus frequently repeated the same sayings, and there is no need therefore to identify Luke's sermon with Matthew's. The common people who gladly listened to Jesus needed constant repetition of the teaching. Luke records some material common with Matthew, but his sermon is brief, and even in the common material shows a fair amount of variation in the wording. Acknowledgment of the fact that much of the teaching material was given on a number of occasions supports the contention that in some respects the teaching methods of the rabbis influenced the method of Jesus (cf. B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript [1961]). The uniqueness of Jesus' teaching material and method must, nevertheless, be fully acknowledged. He understood better than the rabbis the psychology of teaching.

Luke gives an interesting insight into one aspect of Jesus' life at this period. Not only was he accompanied by the Twelve, but also by a group of women, some of whom were wealthy enough to supply means of support for the company (Lk. 8:1 – 3).

Several parables of the kingdom were taught by Jesus in the course of his preaching tours. It is Matthew who shows a special interest in these and collects them into a group (Matt. 13). Since a discussion of the parabolic teaching of Jesus will be included below, it will be sufficient here to point out the significance of this method of teaching in this particular period of the ministry. Crowds were still flocking to hear Jesus, but the basic receptivity was varied. The parable of the sower (or more accurately the parable of the soils) was intended to show Jesus' recognition of this fact in his own ministry, and also illustrates what the disciples might expect. The choice of the parabolic method was itself intended to show that Jesus had a selective purpose in his teaching. Vivid stories would be most readily stored in the mind, but their significance would become plain only to those with a serious intention to discover their meaning. No doubt the disciples who received an interpretation of both the parable of the sower and the parable of the tares were puzzled by the thought that the teaching of Jesus would neither appeal to nor persuade all who heard it. There were many adverse influences to combat it. At the conclusion of the special parable section, Matthew includes a saying of Jesus that well illustrates his own approach to his hearers. A scribe “instructed about the kingdom of heaven is like the owner of a house who brings out of his storeroom new treasures as well as old” (13:52). Although there is much that is not new in the teaching of Jesus, there is much that is unique and this takes precedence over the old.

(d) Unbelief at Nazareth. Another incident in his own town of Nazareth occurred at this time. Although the synagogue congregation was astonished at the wisdom with which he taught, especially in view of his humble family connections, yet they were offended because of him and they disbelieved in him (Matt. 13:53 – 58; Mk. 6:1 – 6; cf. Lk. 4:16 – 30). Matthew records that because of this he could not perform many miracles, while Mark mentions that he healed only a “few sick people” (Mk. 6:5). Jesus’ own comment on this sad state of affairs was to cite a proverb about a prophet never having honor in his own country. He was clearly not surprised at the limitations imposed on his activity through human unbelief.

(e) The death of John the Baptist. So far there has been little indication of the attitude of the civil authorities toward Jesus, but all the synoptics mention that Jesus’ fame reached the ears of Herod Antipas (see HEROD V). It troubled Herod because rumors were spreading that John the Baptist, whom he had beheaded, was risen from the dead. It was for this reason that he desired to see Jesus. Both Matthew and Mark relate the circumstances of the beheading (Matt. 14:3 – 12; Mk. 6:17 – 29). It happened in response to a malicious request by Herod’s wife (and former sister-in-law) named HERODIAS, at a drunken festival at which Herodias’s own daughter danced. Both evangelists refer to Herod’s dismay at the request for John the Baptist’s head on a platter, but he had made his rash promise under oath and would not break the oath for fear of losing face with the courtiers. The whole sordid incident throws into stark relief the ignominious end of the noble forerunner of Jesus.

(f) The feeding of the multitude. When the apostles returned from their preaching mission, Jesus invited them to come apart from the crowds for a time. No doubt they had much to report and some solitary place would be more conducive for this than the midst of a bustling multitude. On this occasion solitude eluded Jesus and his disciples, who were seen crossing the Sea of Galilee by boat. As a result, a multitude gathered to welcome Jesus when his boat arrived at the shore, and this provided an opportunity for further extensive teaching and for a miraculous feeding of the multitude. This latter event was so remarkable that all four evangelists record it (Matt. 14:13 – 21; Mk. 6:30 – 44; Lk. 9:10 – 17; Jn. 6:1 – 15). Two of the evangelists (Matthew and Mark) mention the compassion of Jesus, which must be considered the prime motive for the miracle. Another feature of the incident is the way in which the disciples were challenged to provide food for all to eat, which they were clearly incapable of doing. All the evangelists draw attention to the smallness of the food supply available (five small loaves and two fishes) and all refer to the twelve basketsful that were left over. Mark's account is the most vivid, for he not only mentions the greenness of the grass, but also the size and arrangement of the companies into which the multitude was divided (Mk. 6:39 – 40). It is John, however, who brings out the significance of the event. The people who saw the miracle wanted to make Jesus king (Jn. 6:15), but their motives were wholly materialistic and political. So alien was this to the purpose of Jesus that he was obliged to withdraw from the crowds.

A more important aspect of the incident, which John alone reveals, is the discourse of Jesus on the theme of the true bread from heaven (Jn. 6:26 – 58). The first part of the discourse probably was given immediately after the incident of Jesus walking on the water (see next section), in the open air, but the second part clearly was delivered in the synagogue (6:59). The dividing line may be the point at which John introduces the murmuring Jews into his narrative (6:41).

The type of discussion that John relates must have been typical of many dialogues. It shows Jesus always taking the initiative in turning attention to spiritual issues. The Jews wanted to satisfy their curiosity as to when Jesus had arrived on the far side of the sea; then they wanted to know what work they must do to accomplish God's work; and they requested a sign as a basis of belief, citing God's gift of manna in the wilderness. To each question Jesus gives a spiritual answer: to the first, an exhortation to seek food that endures; to the second, an exhortation to believe in God's messenger, Jesus; to the third, a reminder that the bread of God is sent from heaven, not by Moses but by God himself. This bread is then identified with Jesus himself. This latter theme is developed in the second part of the discourse, which shows the spiritual importance of the work Jesus came to do—to give his flesh for the life of the world (Jn. 6:51). Many of the disciples who followed Jesus found this type of teaching so perplexing and unpalatable that they withdrew from the company of Jesus. This prompted him to challenge the Twelve. He elicited an enthusiastic expression of faith from Peter and made a prediction of Judas's betrayal (6:66 – 71).

(g) The walking on the water. Reference must be made to the incident of Jesus' walking on the sea of Galilee, which is recorded by all the evangelists except Luke, immediately after the feeding of the multitudes (Matt. 14:22 – 33; Mk. 6:45 – 52; Jn. 6:16 – 21). Conditions at sea were adverse, but Jesus took command of the situation. The linking of these two miracles is not accidental, for both demonstrate power over the natural creation. In the midst of the storm Jesus brought a message of peace. The attempt of Peter to emulate Jesus by walking on the sea is related only by Matthew. It is wholly in character, as far as Peter was concerned. His impulsive action and inadequate faith are seen against the background of the Lord's mild rebuke of him. This was part of the training of the man who was to be so greatly used in the early history of the church.

(h) The tradition of the elders. The encounter between Jesus and some Jerusalem scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 15:1) shows the sharp dispute that arose between them over matters of TRADITION.

The tradition of the elders was of paramount importance to the Jews. Since it ranked equal or even superior to the written law, it was invested with great authority. Over a long period of time its demands had increased in quantity and burdensomeness, so as to become oppressive for the serious adherents of Judaism. The system was open to abuse, and Matthew later records some severe criticism of it on the part of Jesus. It should be recognized that the intention of these traditions was to safeguard the law for the benefit of the populace. In the present case the Pharisees were bothered about the disciples' neglect of the ritual handwashing before meals, but Jesus points out their own failure to comply with a far more fundamental demand—the Mosaic commandment to honor parents, which was nullified by Pharisaic casuistry (Matt. 15:5). He tells the people in the presence of the Pharisees that defilement is a matter of thought and not of ritual.

3. The period up to the departure of Jesus for Jerusalem on his last journey. (a) In a Gentile district. After this criticism of current traditions, Jesus proceeded to the predominantly Gentile district around TYRE and SIDON. This visit is notable because of his treatment of the SYROPHOENICIAN woman, who came to him on behalf of her demon-possessed daughter (Matt. 15:21 – 28; Mk. 7:24 – 30). The disciples believed that a non-Jew had no right to make any demands upon Jesus, and the statement of Jesus himself that he was sent only to “the lost sheep of Israel” (Matt. 15:24) seemed to support this view. The saying is important for it shows the limits of the main field of his mission and the reason he did not go further afield. His response to the remarkable faith of this Gentile woman, who was prepared to beg for a dog's share if she did not qualify among the children, shows that the limits of the mission could be liberally interpreted where the need existed.

Matthew reports in summary form other healings after Jesus' return from Tyre and Sidon (Matt. 15:29 – 31), and records that the crowd glorified God. Mark tells of Jesus healing a man who was deaf and mute, and says that the people were astonished beyond measure (Mk. 7:31 – 37). His account includes a specific charge to silence for those who had witnessed the miracle, although the charge went unheeded (7:36). The question arises why Jesus issued such a command. Some have seen here evidence of the messianic secret theory that has already been noted, but there is no need to embrace that theory to find an explanation of the present charge. It was never the intention of Jesus to set himself up as a wonder-worker, and it was therefore essential that it should be known that he did not accept such a role.

(b) The second feeding of a multitude. It is at this point that Matthew and Mark relate the feeding of the 4,000 (Matt. 15:32 – 38; Mk. 8:1 – 9). There are many similarities with the former incident, and these have led some scholars to treat the passages as duplicate accounts of the same event. Yet there are significant differences that were obviously regarded by the evangelists as sufficient to demonstrate that there were two accounts, not one. There was a different number of people and a different supply of available food. There were also fewer baskets of fragments left over.

If it be maintained that the details became enhanced in process of transmission, it would be necessary to regard this account as more primitive than the account of the feeding of the 5,000. It is difficult to see why another 1,000 people were added and why two fewer loaves and less fish were introduced, and yet five more baskets of fragments were added. Moreover, both evangelists used a different word for “basket” in the present account as compared with the former story. Nevertheless, if two such events actually took place, some reason must be found for the inclusion of both of them in Matthew and Mark. They both must have considered the repetition of similar incidents of some importance. Both record the specific reference by Jesus to the two events (Matt. 16:9 – 10; Mk. 8:19 – 20). Even with the repetition the disciples had not learned their lesson, while the Pharisees were still seeking a sign from heaven. The two recorded incidents therefore emphasize not only the constantly remarkable power of Jesus, but also the obduracy of the observers who failed to interpret its message. As for the Pharisees' request for a heavenly sign, it is no wonder that this brought from Jesus a deep sigh (Mk. 8:12) and a flat rejection of any other sign than that of Jonah (Matt. 16:4). It was no doubt this incident which caused Jesus to warn the disciples about the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, by which he meant their teaching (Matt. 16:5 – 12; Mk. 8:14 – 21).

This mosaic, on the floor of the Church of Loaves and Fishes, in Tabgha, Galilee, alludes to Jesus' feeding of the 5,000.

(c) Caesarea Philippi. One may pass by the healing of the blind man at BETHSAIDA, which is notable mainly because it was performed in two stages (Mk. 8:22 – 26), and come to the highly important discussions at CAESAREA PHILIPPI (Matt. 16:13 – 28; Mk. 8:27 – 38; Lk. 9:18 – 27). Jesus posed the question, "Who do people say that I am?" Four general replies were given: John the Baptist, Elijah, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. Peter's own conception, however, went much further. Matthew gives his testimony in its fullest form: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:16). Since it was from this point onward that Jesus began to concentrate on the training of the Twelve, this confession must have possessed special significance for him. All the synoptists say that Jesus charged his disciples to tell no one about this, which reveals his awareness of the difficulties people would have in recognizing his true character.

No reasons are given why Peter and, presumably, others were led to identify Jesus so confidently with the long-awaited Messiah. They had seen evidences of his power, but many others had witnessed the miracles and yet had not believed. Jesus himself reminded Peter that he had not come to this conclusion through any human agency, but by revelation from God the Father.

It is impossible to ascertain what content was conveyed by the title "Son of the living God," but Peter was clearly recognizing some claims to deity. What such a confession meant to Jesus may be inferred from the blessing that he immediately pronounced on Peter, and from his prediction about him. When Jesus said to Peter, "on this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:18), it was one of the only two recorded occasions when he used the word CHURCH (ekklesiā G1711; cf. 18:17).

It is impossible to discuss here the problems that have been raised concerning this statement, but the crux of the matter is the interpretation of the word rock. Is Peter himself intended, or is it his confession? In favor of the former is the play on Peter's name, and in favor of the latter is the teaching of other Scriptures that speak of Christ as the church's foundation. If the former is correct, it could only draw attention to the important place Peter would occupy in the coming church, and one may recall that it was through his preaching that both the first Jews and the first Gentiles became Christians (Acts 2 and 10). Nevertheless, a church that was to withstand the gates of hell, as Jesus predicted, would need a surer foundation than the unstable Peter. He was further given the promise of the keys of the kingdom, which carried with it the power to bind and loose. This statement must be understood in conjunction with the similar injunction in Matt. 18:18, which is addressed to all the disciples. It is fitting that when Jesus turned to the training of the Twelve he first concentrated on Peter, for it was this man who immediately afterward tried to rebuke him for predicting his death.

That Caesarea Philippi marks a turning point in the ministry of Jesus is clear from the fact that he at once began to share with his disciples something of the dreaded events which he knew lay ahead. It is significant that this first prediction of the passion was inseparably linked to the resurrection, as were the subsequent predictions. It was not easy for the disciples to grasp the need for Jesus to suffer, and it was still harder for them to understand the place of suffering in their own lives. Self-denial is no easy lesson to learn, and it was necessary for Jesus to begin the conditioning process at this stage of the ministry to allow opportunities for much more teaching in the same vein.

(d) The Transfiguration. The immediate sequence of events at this period is not in doubt, for all three synoptists agree on the order of events. The TRANSFIGURATION of Jesus follows the Caesarea confession, and this is followed by the healing of the epileptic boy, the second prediction of the passion, and the dispute about greatness (cf. Matt. 17; Mk. 9; Lk. 9:28 – 48). In any account of the life of Jesus the transfiguration must assume an important place because of its revelation of the glory of Jesus in a unique manner. The fact that even this revelation was seen by only three of the disciples is also significant, for it shows the existence of an inner group within the Twelve. It is not at once apparent why Jesus did not invite others to accompany him, but the failure of the three to appreciate the meaning of the event is a significant indication of what would probably have been the reaction of the rest. In any case, Jesus was not to be transfigured before people as a public spectacle. Only enough witnesses were to be present to vouch for the reality of the experience.

The vision itself consisted of three stages. First, Jesus was changed so that not only his face but also his clothes radiated an extraordinary light, and there appeared with him MOSES and ELIJAH. Second, Peter makes his perfectly understandable, but thoroughly inappropriate, suggestion that some kind of dwelling booths should be constructed for the transfigured Christ and his two heavenly companions. Third, a voice from the cloud urged them to concentrate on hearing Jesus because he is the beloved Son in whom God delights. The reaction of awe on the part of the disciples marks the climax of the occasion, after which Jesus resumes his normal appearance.

In assessing the place of this event in the mission of Jesus various factors must be borne in mind. It showed the true nature of Jesus, and by way of contrast helps mankind to understand more fully the meaning of his humiliation through the incarnation and subsequent passion. This was no ordinary man. He was truly the Son of the living God, as Peter had just previously confessed. The confession, if but dimly understood when made, assumed a glorious realization for Peter as he gazed at the transfigured Christ. Neither for Peter nor for the other two did that transient glimpse of the glories of Jesus allay the appalling doubts, and, in the case of Peter, prevent the emphatic denials that were to mark their reactions to the passion of Jesus. Their abiding grasp of the glories of Jesus was not to come this way, but by the hard experiences of his suffering leading to his resurrection.

Another factor of this event to bear in mind is the part played in it by Moses and Elijah. It is generally supposed that they represent the Law and the Prophets, to which Jesus is seen to be superior. Luke tells that they talked about the coming death of Jesus at Jerusalem, and this must have been designed to add supernatural sanction to the prediction of his death that Jesus had made to his disciples just prior to the transfiguration. It was not intended to be generally understood until after the resurrection, for Jesus forbids the three disciples to tell any others until then (Matt. 17:9).

The sight of Elijah in the vision raised a problem in their minds. They recalled the scribal teaching about Elijah as the forerunner of the Messiah. Perhaps they wondered why they had not seen him before, since it had now dawned upon them that Jesus was the Messiah. This opened the way for Jesus to make clear to them that John the Baptist had fulfilled the role of Elijah.

(e) More miracles. At the foot of the mountain another problem confronted the rest of the disciples (Matt. 17:14 – 20; Mk. 9:14 – 29; Lk. 9:37 – 43). In the absence of the Master they were clearly impotent to deal with an abnormality such as an epileptic demoniac. Jesus was deeply affected by their lack of faith. The incident showed something of the caliber of the men whom Jesus was training for the future ministry of the church. They had yet to learn how to deal with the impossible (Matt. 17:21; cf. Mk. 9:23). This was a lesson that had to be repeated on other occasions (cf. Matt. 21:21; Mk. 11:22; Lk. 17:6). The present incident gives an example of a direct confrontation between the power of Jesus and the power of the devil, an illustration of Christ's constant struggle, which had earlier found its classic expression in the temptation in the wilderness.

The second prediction by Jesus of his passion and resurrection is a natural sequel to his transfiguration (Matt. 17:22 – 23; Mk. 9:30 – 32; Lk. 9:43 – 45). All the synoptic writers mention the disciples' reactions. Matthew says they were distressed (Matt. 17:23), while Mark and Luke mention their lack of understanding and their hesitancy to ask Jesus for an explanation (Mk. 9:32; Lk. 9:45). He found no support for his coming trials, even from his closest disciples. This was the temper of mind that caused them all finally to forsake him during the passion.

There are two more events that throw light on the approach of Jesus during this period. Matthew records the occasion when Peter was asked whether his master paid the temple tax, and he answered in the affirmative. The incident led Jesus to point out to him that only subjects of kings, not sons, are obliged to pay taxes (Matt. 17:24 – 27). Even in the matter of the temple tax Jesus desired that no offense should be given, and he instructed Peter to pay the tax for himself and for Jesus from a shekel to be found in the mouth of a fish. Many have found difficulties about this story on the grounds of the strange character of the miracle and the fact that it was performed for Jesus' own needs. Some seek a solution by attributing the story to less reliable tradition and claim it as an example of embellishment.

Collection of ancient fish hooks. When questioned about the temple tax, Jesus directed Peter to go fishing, and Peter paid the tax with a coin taken from the mouth of a fish.

of the miraculous that took place in the tradition. The evidence does not require such a theory. The miracle is essentially of supernatural knowledge rather than a suspension of the laws of nature. It is certainly strange and indeed unexpected, but these are not sufficient factors to disprove its authenticity.

(f) More sayings of Jesus. Of the sayings of this period the most notable is Jesus' answer to the disciples when they were disputing about who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven. He used a small child as an object lesson and taught by this means that HUMILITY is of the greatest importance in his kingdom (Matt. 18:1 – 4). In the process of training the Twelve, Jesus imparted to them a totally new code of values. They needed to learn that greatness lies along the path of service. The incident provided an occasion for Jesus to warn the disciples about causing offense to others and to give some drastic advice for dealing with the source of the offense (Matt. 18:6 – 9; Mk. 9:42 – 48).

Matthew includes a striking parable to illustrate the need for FORGIVENESS (Matt. 18:23 – 35). It concerned two servants of a king. One owed him a very large sum that he was unable to pay. He received full remission of the debt because of the king's mercy. The same servant was himself a creditor to the other servant who owed him a paltry sum compared with his own debt, but he treated him without mercy. The king's wrath was turned against the servant whom he had forgiven. From this story Jesus brings out the need for all to exercise forgiveness. It was told in answer to Peter's query concerning how many times a brother should be forgiven. In the kingdom of heaven there is no limit either to the number of times or to the size of the offense involved. Such forgiveness demands largesse of heart.

F. The closing period of the ministry. This is the most difficult period in which to arrange the narrative in any certain sequence either chronologically or geographically. Matthew and Mark are very brief, while Luke collects into a journey narrative a great deal of material which appears to be loosely linked.

1. Moving toward Jerusalem. For Luke there is a sense of an inevitable movement of Jesus toward Jerusalem, subsequent to the two specific predictions of the passion. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the impression of movement is slight. In one section (Lk. 9:51—18:31), the references to Jerusalem are perplexing: 9:51 indicates that Jesus set his face toward Jerusalem; 10:38 shows him in the village of Mary and Martha (Bethany); 17:11 shows him passing along between Samaria and Galilee on his way to Jerusalem; 18:31 records his declared intention to go up to Jerusalem; 18:35 and 19:1 shows him in the region of Jericho; finally, 19:28 tells of his final movement toward Jerusalem and leads to the record of his entry into the city.

It is difficult to fit all these references to Jerusalem into the same visit. Indeed, it is simpler to find suitable occasions for the Johannine material (Jn. 7 – 10) if at least two distinct visits to Jerusalem are postulated. Even then no satisfactory chronological arrangement can be made. It may be questioned whether any advantage would accrue from such an arrangement. It is better to retain as far as possible the impressions given by Luke and to deal separately with the additional material belonging to the Jerusalem ministry related by John. For convenience, therefore, the travel narrative of Luke will be divided at the end of Lk. 13 (the lament over Jerusalem) in order to record the events and discourses of Jn. 7 – 10. It should be noted that whereas the greater part of the material in this section of Luke is peculiar to him, there is much that is paralleled in other contexts in Matthew and there are a few sections that are shared by all three synoptists. In the following brief survey emphasis will fall on Luke's special contribution.

(a) From Galilee to Bethany. In none of the other Gospels is Jesus' own dramatic awareness of the nearness of the climax brought out as vividly as it is in Luke's brief comment on the commencement of the final journey (Lk. 9:51). The resoluteness with which Jesus faces Jerusalem is specifically marked. The first event on the journey occurred when he was about to pass through a Samaritan village (9:51 – 56). The direction of his travel roused the opposition of the inhabitants. The desire of James and John to wreak vengeance by means of heavenly fire is remarkable for its naive incongruity. It was not in their power to do what they suggested, and it was utterly alien to the spirit of Jesus. His path to Jerusalem was not to be strewn with burned villages as emblems of anger, but with many instances of patient forbearance toward those who had little understanding of the burden of his mission. His rebuke of the suggestion could hardly have been otherwise.

Some mission activity must nonetheless be organized. First, the disciples needed instruction about what type of people were suitable to be followers of Christ, and Luke records Jesus' dealing with three typical examples (Lk. 9:57 – 62). The main characteristics are a willingness to bear hardship and a persistence that would never look back. Even the apostles forsook him during the passion and would certainly not have been fit for the kingdom apart from the restoring grace of God. These rigorous demands form the prelude to the sending out of the SEVENTY DISCIPLES (10:1 – 16 KJV; NIV, "seventy-two"). There are strong similarities between the mission charge to the Seventy and the one given to the Twelve. Luke makes clear that the main purpose of the mission of the Seventy was to prepare the way in the places where Jesus was intending to visit. They were to proclaim the nearness of the kingdom (10:9). They were in fact ambassadors for Jesus himself (cf. 10:16). In his commission Jesus adds a special denunciation of Korazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum, in all of which towns the spiritual significance of his mighty works had been utterly lost. No doubt this reflection of his own experience was intended to prepare the disciples for similar negative responses to their ministry.

The mission of the Seventy was presumably of short duration, for Luke tells of their return with joy soon afterward. It was their power over demons that especially elated them, but Jesus has to warn them to get their priorities right: God's estimate of them is of greater moment than their authority over demons (Lk. 10:17 – 20). The immaturity and yet the genuineness of these men must have particularly struck Jesus at this time, for he offered a prayer of thanksgiving that revelation comes not through a person's own understanding, but by the sovereign act of God (10:21 – 22). As compared with others, the disciples were in a particularly privileged position (10:23 – 24).

Unlike the Matthean parables, the Lukan parables are not generally collected into groups, but they have as their setting some incident that gives them their immediate purpose. The parable of the good Samaritan is an admirable illustration of this feature (Lk. 10:25 – 37). A Jewish lawyer's dialogue with Jesus concerning eternal life draws out the parable that is intended to show the practical application of what the lawyer already knew theoretically. It was one thing to pronounce love to one's neighbor as part of the divine requirement for the inheriting of eternal life; it was quite another to recognize that the term neighbor was so extensive that it even included Samaritans. In view of the constant animosity that existed between the Jews and Samaritans, the lawyer's astonishment at Jesus' interpretation of what being a good neighbor is can well be imagined. Moreover, the parable itself conveys more than an example. It illustrates vividly the basic principle of compassion, which was one of the most characteristic features in the life of Jesus.

By this time Jesus had arrived at Bethany, near Jerusalem (Lk. 10:38 – 42). There is no way of knowing whether this was the first time that Jesus had visited the home of MARY and MARTHA. Luke's interest in the story is to show the quite different reactions of the two sisters, one revealing her devotion to Jesus by practical domestic chores, the other listening to his teaching. His commendation of the latter emphasizes the aspect of his mission that was uppermost in his mind at the time.

(b) Some teaching on prayer. The disciples must often have watched Jesus praying, and on one occasion they asked him to teach them to pray. He gave them a pattern prayer similar to the one in the Sermon on the Mount, only more brief (Lk. 11:2 – 4). To give them further guidance he told a parable about a persistent man who begged food from his friend at midnight and who, because of his persistence, received what he needed (11:5 – 8). This story led to Jesus' comprehensive assurances regarding PRAYER. The heavenly Father may be relied upon to be infinitely more considerate than human fathers, who with all their limitations would not mock their own children's earnest requests. Again, Jesus was himself the finest example of his own teaching, for he lived in constant dependence on his Father.

(c) More teaching by parables. In the remaining section of Luke, where much of the material is peculiar to him, the sequence appears to be governed by alternating passages dealing with the disciples and the Pharisees. It is evidently Luke's purpose to illustrate by this means the different approach of Jesus to the two groups. It will be convenient to split Luke's material at Lk. 13:35.

In response to a question about inheritance from one of the crowd surrounding Jesus at the time, he told the parable of the rich fool (Lk. 12:13 – 21). The inheritance this rich man had stored up so laboriously was never enjoyed because of his death. This led Jesus to add a general application of the parable to warn all who have a wrong concept of riches. Following this, Luke includes a collection of sayings reminiscent of the teaching in the Sermon on the Mount. Next he relates the incident in which Pilate killed some Galileans and mixed their blood with sacrifices, and after that the calamity of the people killed by the fall of the tower of Siloam upon them (13:1 – 5). Such disasters obviously raise problems, but it is significant that Jesus does not give a theological or philosophical discussion of the problems involved. He used the incidents as a challenge to his hearers to repent. This challenge is strengthened by means of a parable about a fig tree that was producing no fruit and for which the vinedresser pleads that it be given one more chance with adequate watering and fertilizing (13:6 – 9). The parable is not applied by Jesus, but its application is clear enough. A real change of life should be evident by the fruit produced, but without such fruit the tree itself is useless.

(d) Encounters with Pharisees. In the next section Pharisees are mainly involved, although not exclusively. It was the ruler of a synagogue who took exception to Jesus' action when, on the Sabbath day, he healed an infirm woman whose illness was of long standing (Lk. 13:10 – 17). Jesus' answer was strongly worded. He condemned the hypocrisy of his opponents, who would not hesitate to care for their domestic animals on the Sabbath. It is with some relish that Luke records that his adversaries were put to shame, while the people generally rejoiced.

While Jesus was again on his way toward Jerusalem, he was accosted by some Pharisees who advised him to flee from Herod Antipas (Lk. 13:31 – 33). These Pharisees had reckoned without taking into account the fixed purpose of Jesus, which was not to be thwarted by a man like Herod, whom Jesus described as "that fox." His destiny was, in fact, in the hands of God, not Herod. It is directly subsequent to this that Luke includes the lament over Jerusalem which Matthew gives later (cf. Matt. 23:37 – 39). Jesus reveals both tenderness and rebuke in this lament, as he uses the vivid imagery of a hen gathering her chickens under her wings. Since he said, "How often would I have gathered your children," it seems to point to more visits to Jerusalem than the synoptists record.

(e) Jesus at two Jewish feasts. Luke's story will be left at this point to consider John's account of the events that took place at the Feasts of Tabernacles and Dedication, both held at Jerusalem. John recounts that Jesus was in Galilee just before the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn. 7:2). His family urged him to go to the feast for its prestige value, but they did not believe in him and clearly misunderstood the real nature of his mission. Jesus made clear that his time had not yet come and any open demonstration to the world would have been contrary to God's timing. Throughout, Jesus was deeply conscious of working according to a divine timetable. Although he specifically avoided any public demonstration, he nevertheless went to the feast privately after his brothers had gone on ahead.

Many were looking for him at the feast. People were privately expressing diverse opinions about him. When he finally did show himself, it was without ostentation, in the role of a teacher. Indeed, his skill in that role caused the Jews to marvel. This led Jesus to make some comments about the theme of authority (Jn. 7:14 – 29). His own authority was from the One who sent him, in contrast to Moses whose teaching they did not keep. The Jews raised the question of origins and dismissed any possibility of Jesus being the Messiah on the grounds that his parentage and origin were known. Jesus repeated that he came from the One who sent him.

Teaching of this sort among the people prompted the Pharisees to take action to arrest Jesus. Officers were commissioned to do this (Jn. 7:32). They overheard Jesus having a discussion with the Jews over his future destiny, which completely baffled his audience (7:33 – 36). They thought he might be referring to the dispersion. Still the officers took no action when on the last day of the feast Jesus made a public announcement about the gift of the Spirit which he would give to his disciples (7:37 – 39). He took advantage of the water ceremonial performed at the feast to illustrate a spiritual truth. John records more specific teaching about the HOLY SPIRIT than any of the other evangelists. The statement in the present context is important because it makes clear that the gift of the Spirit depends on and consequently follows the glorifying of Jesus.

Such teaching as this only further baffled the hearers and caused a dispute as to whether or not Jesus could possibly be the Christ. His Galilean connections caused difficulties (Jn. 7:41). The same problem was raised again, when the Pharisees discussed the matter at the highest level following the return of their officers without arresting Jesus. They had been deeply impressed by his teaching (7:46). At the council the attitude of Nicodemus is interesting in the light of his earlier interview with Jesus. He issues a mild rebuke to those who wish to condemn him without a hearing. In this incident the attitude of the Pharisees fully agrees with that recorded in the synoptics.

There followed further discussions with the Jews, mainly about the testimony of Jesus to himself (Jn. 8:12 – 18). When he claimed to be the light of the world, the Pharisees asserted that self-testimony of this kind cannot be true. The whole dispute focuses attention on the difficulties that confronted Jesus in expressing concepts which were foreign to the way of thinking of the religious leaders of his day. It was unintelligible to them when Jesus claimed the testimony of the Father in support of him. To them the Father was known only through the law, not through Jesus. He had to remind them that the nature of his authority would be understood only when the Son of Man had been lifted up (8:28).

The conversation next turns to ABRAHAM and the relation of the Pharisees to him (Jn. 8:39 – 40). When Jesus spoke of freedom, even the Jews who had believed in him protested. The promise of freedom implies the absence of it and no son of Abraham could ever conceive of himself as a slave. It is not surprising that the discussion became rather bitter, with the Jews actually maintaining that Jesus was demon-possessed (8:48). This incident shows Jesus confronted with the national pride of the Jewish people in their connection with Abraham, but he points out that racial connections need to be supported by deeds worthy of Abraham. The inconsistency of the position of his accusers led Jesus to the astonishing charge that they were of their father the devil (8:44).

The strength of the conflict in which Jesus was engaged is vividly seen. The accusers still cannot get away from the Abraham theme, for they challenge Jesus to say whether he is greater than Abraham

(Jn. 8:53), and again he appeals to the testimony of the Father. He even maintains that Abraham rejoiced to see his day (8:56), and that he was in existence before Abraham. The immediate reaction of the Jews is not left to imagination. John concisely reports that they took up stones to stone him, but that Jesus hid himself from them.

John's account of the healing by Jesus of a man born blind and the subsequent encounter of the man with the Pharisees is dramatically told (Jn. 9). There are several features in this incident that call for special comment. The disciples were bothered about the explanation of the blind man's calamity, but Jesus does not offer any assistance in answering the theological problem. He is concerned about what will bring most glory to God. Moreover, he makes clear that his proposed action is inextricably bound up with his mission as the light of the world. The application of the mission is twofold, for not only was the man's physical sight restored by Jesus, but through this event his spiritual perception was also sharpened.

John traces the growth of the man's faith as he disputes with the Pharisees. Every conceivable reason was advanced for disbelieving the reality of the miracle, but the man himself asserted his own personal experience, which could not be disputed. As a result of his bold testimony, he was cast out of the synagogue. Knowledge of his expulsion having come to Jesus, he sought out the man in order to challenge him regarding his faith. The confession this drew from the man forms the climax of the story. With restored physical sight and awakened spiritual insight, he contrasts strongly with the Pharisees who constantly demonstrated their blindness, although they were not aware of it.

Following this incident, John records further teaching of Jesus concerning himself, this time under the imagery of a shepherd (Jn. 10). The illustration from the sheepfold would have been Shepherd walking up a hill in Palestine, leading a flock of sheep grazing on the hillside. Jesus describes the relationship between himself and his followers by using the metaphor of the shepherd and his sheep.

familiar to his hearers. The shepherd's care to protect the sheep, the sharp distinction between the real shepherd and the man hired to do the job who had no interest in the welfare of the sheep, the intimate relationship between the shepherd and each individual sheep, and the picture of the shepherd leading out his flock to pasture would all have been well-known features of the contemporary pastoral scene. But they did not understand the implications of what Jesus was illustrating (10:6). Because of this, Jesus adds some further comments, the most important of which is that the good Shepherd lays down his life for the sheep (10:11, 15). The voluntary character of this act is particularly stressed (10:18). Another important factor is that Jesus distinguishes between folds and flocks. Not all belong to the same fold or sheep pen, but all belong to the same flock (10:16). This seems to be a pointed reminder that the Jews were not the only group of people with a claim upon the good Shepherd's care. Once again the teaching of Jesus evoked the charge of demon possession from some of the Jews, but others were not convinced of this in view of the character of the sayings and the miraculous healing of the blind man.

Similar teaching was given by Jesus at the Feast of Dedication held in winter time. Some of the Jews wanted Jesus to state plainly whether or not he was the Messiah, and Jesus rebuked them for not believing. The reason for their unbelief, he said, was that they were not part of his sheep (Jn. 10:26). The security of Christ's sheep is nothing less than the security of the good Shepherd's hand. On this occasion the opposition to him was more violent. They took up stones to kill him. In spite of the ugliness of the situation, Jesus shows himself in command by attempting to reason with the Jews. His appeal to them was based on Scripture, which, he says, cannot be broken (10:35). Significantly, Jesus urges them to believe his works if they cannot believe his words. Once again they tried without success to arrest him (10:39).

At this point Jesus goes again to TRANSJORDAN (Jn. 10:40); this will be a convenient place to return to Luke's travel narrative, which is also much concerned with Jesus' clash with Pharisees.

(f) Jesus dines with Pharisees. It must often have happened that Jesus was offered hospitality in a home, though no doubt infrequently at the home of a Pharisee. We may be grateful to Luke for recording a sequence of events and discussions that occurred during one such meal (Lk. 14:1 – 24). Lawyers and Pharisees were on the watch to see what Jesus would do, since it was the Sabbath. They were anticipating that he might contravene the Jewish law. He knew what was in their minds, for before healing a man with dropsy he addressed his observers with a question about the lawfulness of healing on the Sabbath day. No answer was given—a silent testimony to their embarrassment.

Luke next records a parable especially designed for the guests of the dinner (Lk. 14:7 – 14). Jesus had noted their eagerness to choose the chief seats and reminded them that it was humble people who would be exalted. This led to an exhortation urging hospitality for poor and unfortunate people, which reflects the social attitude of Jesus. His deep compassion was in marked contrast to the Pharisaic quibbles over Sabbath procedure, to the detriment of individual welfare.

One of the Pharisees ventured to draw attention to the blessedness of eating bread in the kingdom (Lk. 14:15), but again Jesus detected a misunderstanding. He told another parable, one about some people who made excuses when invited to a banquet. The excuses appeared legitimate enough, but they showed a discourteous attitude to the hosts. The point of the story is seen in the sequel. The social outcasts were to be invited instead, a fact that adds further emphasis to the social consciousness of Jesus. In this he differed strongly from most of the Pharisees.

(g) Address to the multitudes. Jesus was once more followed by great multitudes and turned to address them on the subject of the cost of discipleship (Lk. 14:25 – 35). This in itself was not a new theme, for it had been mentioned before, just after the confession at Caesarea Philippi (cf. 9:23). Here, however, it is elaborated. Discipleship involves some testing of priorities. Jesus speaks of the need for hating one's own family connections, but the idea of hating in this context must be regarded as relative. It is a question of wholehearted committal to the cause of Christ. Jesus illustrates his meaning by saying that no one puts in a foundation without estimating the cost of the whole house, or goes to war against a well-organized and powerful enemy without weighing the possibilities of carrying the campaign through to success. That is simple human prudence.

The same principle of forethought should apply to Christian discipleship. It demands wholehearted renunciation, and those not willing for so great a cost would be well advised to make no start. Disciples who begin and then lose their effectiveness are like salt that has lost its taste and hence becomes good for nothing. In this simile Jesus was using a Jewish proverb.

(h) Further parables for the Pharisees. Pharisaism had no message for sinners and little sympathy for those who were concerned about them. In their eyes sinners and tax collectors were outcasts of society. No wonder, therefore, that they regarded with contempt anyone who actually sat down to a meal with them. It was common knowledge that Jesus shared their hospitality, and when the Pharisees and scribes saw that Jesus had so large a following among these outcasts, they murmured against him in his hearing.

This response brought from Jesus a sequence of three parables to illustrate God's attitude toward those who were being officially treated as lost and for whom Pharisaism held out no hope (Lk. 15). These parables are essentially parables of restoration. A shepherd restores his lost sheep to the fold, a woman restores a lost coin to her treasure store, and a father restores a wayward son to the family circle. In all of the parables the element of JOY is emphasized; in the first two, there is joy in heaven over restored sinners; in the third, joy is an expression of the father's feelings when his son returns.

The application of the parables to the Pharisees is clear enough. They did not even desire the restoration of sinners, let alone show any inclination to rejoice over the possibility. There is no doubt that their murmuring formed the setting for the parables and that it finds a distinctive echo in the attitude of the elder brother in the third parable, who objected to the father's rejoicing because his brother had lived so utterly irresponsibly. In a way reminiscent of some Pharisees, this elder brother was more concerned about his own loyal achievements than about the miserable state of his brother, and more anxious to condemn than to forgive.

The vividness of the parables in their portrayal of human sentiments throws further light on the human insight and sympathy of Jesus. He was ever more concerned with the uplifting of human lives than with those who considered themselves superior.

(i) Teaching for the disciples. The next brief section (Lk. 16:1 – 13) is addressed to the disciples (understood in the widest sense of a group of generally interested people), and takes the form of a parable with comments upon it. It was a story about an unjust steward who had wasted his master's possessions and had been informed that as a consequence he would lose his job. He makes provision for the emergency by giving considerable discounts to those who owed money to his master; his purpose was to win their friendship, which would stand him in good stead for the future. The action itself appears dishonest, but the master recognized the man's prudence. Presumably the steward, until actually dismissed, had powers to remit portions of debts, and the master did not condemn him on this account. The parable, therefore, illustrates prudence for selfish ends, without regard for moral principles.

Jesus recommends the disciples to make friends by means of unrighteous MAMMON. Does this mean that Jesus is condoning an unprincipled approach? It may at first sight appear so, but it must be kept in mind that the details of the parable should not be pressed. The major purpose is to urge greater wisdom on the part of disciples than was evident among unprincipled men. On purely materialistic principles, unrighteous mammon is a person's only means of security.

Jesus proceeded to contrast true riches with this unrighteous mammon. Faithfulness in using the one is the test for the using of the other. Unrighteous mammon is therefore to be regarded as no more than a means to an end. No one can serve both mammon and God. This section of the teaching of Jesus illuminates his own attitude toward materialistic things. He did not ignore their usefulness, but demanded their subservience to God.

(j) Another clash with the Pharisees. The preceding parable fell on some Pharisaic ears and caused scoffing at Jesus' attitude to money (Lk. 16:14). Jesus not only insisted that God's judgments are based on knowledge of the heart, and not on outward appearances, but also told a parable to show how unreliable a guide material wealth can be (16:19 – 31). A contrast is made between a poor man who was afflicted with disease and a rich man at whose gate the poor man had sat and begged (see LAZARUS AND DIVES). The rich man went to HADES, and the poor man to ABRAHAM'S BOSOM, with a fixed chasm between them. There follows a dialogue between the rich man and Abraham, with whom he pleads in vain for some relief. Abraham says that even if it were possible for Lazarus to return to earth to warn the rich man's relatives, he would not be believed any more than Moses, whose teaching they already possessed but did not heed. The Pharisees, with their love of money (v. 14), would see the point of the challenge. The rich man's plight was not because he was rich, but because of his failure to use his riches to alleviate the needs of others, while indulging in luxuries for himself.

(k) The apostles receive teaching about service. Jesus now appeals to common procedure in the employment of servants (Lk. 17:5 – 11). If a servant's job is to do both agricultural and domestic work, he would not expect to be thanked if his master called him in from the field and asked him to serve him at table. He would only be performing his duty. In the same way, no one can ever say that he has done more than his duty to God, for even after doing all that is commanded of him, he has done only what is his duty. If this teaching was overheard by the Pharisees, they must have been astonished at such a statement. The idea of reward loomed large in their system and they believed that merit could be stored up in heaven. Jesus' teaching was diametrically opposed to theirs.

(1) The healing of the lepers. Luke again draws attention to the fact that Jesus was approaching Jerusalem and then introduces an event that happened in the vicinity of Samaria (Lk. 17:11 – 19). Ten lepers begging for mercy met Jesus, who commanded them to show themselves to the priests; and as they went they were healed. They must have acted in faith that healing would be given. This was not the main feature of the incident, for when they discovered that they were healed, only one returned to give thanks to Jesus, and he was a Samaritan. Jesus particularly pointed out the fact that only a foreigner had returned (17:18). The whole incident shows not only the compassion of Jesus but also the universal scope of his mission. The story is probably intended to illustrate the ingratitude that was characteristic of the Jewish nation in response to the merciful acts of God.

(m) Sayings about the kingdom and about the future. A question put by the Pharisees about the kingdom drew from Jesus a statement that the kingdom was in their midst or was within them (17:20 – 21). This would directly counteract any materialistic concept of the kingdom as it was currently held among the Jews. Luke then records some teaching of Jesus addressed to the disciples (17:22 – 37) on the subject of the days of the Son of Man. There would be false claims that these days were near, and of these they must beware. To give them indication of the timing of those days would be as impossible as tracking lightning across the sky. Before they can come, however, the Son of Man must first be rejected. The consciousness of the nearness of that event must have been strong in the mind of Jesus. There are, moreover, certain OT events from the times of NOAH and LOT that serve as a pattern of the times preceding the coming of the Messiah. In both cases the masses of people were totally unprepared for the divine judgment that came to them. In view of this, Jesus warns about the sharp division among men which the coming of the Son of Man will create.

(n) Two parables about prayer. Luke includes two parables, presumably addressed to the disciples, which possess certain features in common and which deal with different aspects of prayer (Lk. 18:1 – 18). The first, the parable of the unjust judge, commends constancy in prayer, and the second, the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector, commends humility. The first provides an example of unrighteousness, the second of self-righteousness. In the first parable the judge is portrayed in the worst possible light, as a man who had no thought of God and no respect for man. The impression is at once created that justice is impossible from such a man, and this impression is deepened by the description of the plaintiff as a poor widow who had no one to protect her against an adversary. The judge gave in, not because he cared for justice, but because of the continual requests of the widow: to have refused would have caused him more embarrassment than to yield. The focus of the parable is on the power of constant petition, not on the character of the judge. When Jesus applies the parable he argues from the lesser to the greater. What a rascally unrighteous man will do is nothing compared with what may be expected from a righteous God. Jesus leads up to an exhortation to his hearers that such constancy of faith, as was exemplified by the persistent widow, might be found when he returns.

The other parable presents in strong contrast the attitude of a self-righteous Pharisee and the attitude of a man whom the Pharisees despised—a tax collector. Both are represented as praying in the temple, but the Pharisee is more conscious of himself and of his own superiority over others than he is of God. Consequently, his prayer is regarded as ineffective. The tax collector, overwhelmed with a deep sense of his own need, can do no more than cry to God for mercy. The egotism of the Pharisee may have been heightened to emphasize the contrast between these two men, but there is evidence to prove that a sense of self-achievement was an accepted characteristic among some Pharisees. No Pharisee would readily have admitted that his achievements were useless in his approach to God, for his whole religious life centered around what he himself could do in the pursuit of piety. How very distasteful such attitudes must have been to Jesus is suggested by his warm commendation of the opposite quality, humility.

At this point Luke returns to material that is shared by the other Synoptic Gospels, and these two parables may be said to terminate his special travel narrative. Before considering the final journey to Jerusalem, it will be necessary to include the account of the raising of LAZARUS and to consider the consequences.

(o) The raising of Lazarus. This is unquestionably the most astonishing of all the miracles performed by Jesus. It is the climax of John's "book of signs" and sets out the humanity as well as the deity of Jesus (Jn. 11). The bare details may be stated in few words. Lazarus dies in Bethany. Jesus is in Transjordan, but although he knows about the illness of Lazarus, he delays his visit to Bethany until it is too late to find him alive. His sisters, Mary and Martha, who have already been introduced earlier through Luke's account, are convinced that had Jesus arrived soon enough he would have prevented their brother's death, but they do not show faith enough to believe that he could or would raise Lazarus from the dead. Jesus was deeply moved at the scene and wept, but he coupled with this human emotion the tremendous power of divine authority as he commanded Lazarus to come out of the grave.

What distinguishes this story from a narrative of sheer wonder-working power are the deep personal reactions that are faithfully reported. These are: the fear of the disciples to go to Judea, followed by their rash resolve to die with Jesus; the different reactions of Martha and Mary, the former more outspoken than the latter; the comment of the Jews when they saw Jesus weeping; and the reaction of the Pharisees and the chief priests in renewing their plans to kill Jesus.

When John records this stupendous miracle, he does so with a spiritual objective. It is part of his testimony to lead people to believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. If this incident is true, then Jesus immediately is seen to have unique power. However conceivable it might be to explain away some of the other miracles, it is impossible in this case. It is a foreshadowing of the far greater event of the resurrection of Christ.

Throughout the incident Jesus took advantage of the opportunity to impart teaching so that the significance of the miracle might be understood. He told the disciples that Lazarus' illness was for God's glory (Jn. 11:4). When he made known to them that Lazarus was dead, he explained that the delay in his coming to Bethany was to assist them to believe (11:5). When Martha discussed the resurrection with Jesus, he declared, "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25), connecting the whole matter of life and death with his person. This led to a definite affirmation of faith on her part, expressed in the same terms as John stated the purpose of his entire gospel (11:27). Just prior to the miracle, Martha was assured that she was about to see the glory of God if she believed.

John pays special attention to the Pharisees' reaction. They were worried about the probable impact of the signs upon the common people, particularly if it led to any action by the occupying Roman forces. It was Caiaphas the Sadducee who gave the official opinion of the hierarchy (Jn. 11:49). John states that he was the high priest during that fateful year, in commenting on Caiaphas's statement that it was more fitting for one person to die for the nation than that the whole nation should perish. The statement was more prophetic than Caiaphas realized, as John points out. Moreover, its application was also more universal than he realized, for Jesus was to die to gather many people into one family of God. Because of the decision of the Sanhedrin to seek his death, Jesus withdrew for a time to Ephraim (11:54) and remained there until the approach of the Passover season, at which point the synoptic and Johannine narratives coalesce.

2. The journey into Jerusalem. Jesus was now in the region of PEREA, from where he proceeded toward Jerusalem by way of Jericho and Bethany. Various incidents took place, and discourses were given before he arrived in Jericho.

(a) Conclusion of the ministry in Perea. The Pharisees were still pursuing Jesus, trying to trap him with difficult questions. This must have happened frequently during this period, but both Matthew and Mark record a particular question that Jesus was asked about DIVORCE (Matt. 19:1 – 12; Mk. 10:1 – 12). The subject had already been touched upon in the Sermon on the Mount. Here it was a question based on the teaching of the law. Jesus shows that Moses allowed divorce only because of the hardness of people's hearts, although the creation ordinances presupposed a permanent union between husband and wife. By appealing to the basic principles of the law, Jesus silenced his critics. The whole question of divorce was currently a disputed issue within the Pharisaic party itself. (See above, section II.) One school under Hillel took a much more liberal attitude toward it than the other under Shammai. It is clear that the approach of Jesus is nearer the latter than the former. Some of the disciples objected to the stringency of the teaching of Jesus, but he reminded them that not all could receive such teaching.

Next comes a charming interlude that shows Jesus in another role (Matt. 19:13 – 15; Mk. 10:13 – 16; Lk. 18:15 – 17). Little children were brought to him for his blessing, but the disciples rebuked those who brought them. Jesus, in turn, rebuked the disciples, telling them that children were not to be hindered from coming to him, and he used them as an example of true discipleship. The kingdom of God, he said, must be received as a little child, a principle that would not have been readily appreciated in the 1st-cent. world. Humility was not a virtue admired by either Jews or Greeks, the latter, in fact, despising it.

A rich young ruler now comes to Jesus and asks him about eternal life (Matt. 19:16 – 30; Mk. 10:17 – 31; Lk. 18:18 – 30). The questioner is a pious man, for he claims to have kept the commandments from his youth. There is no necessity to question his sincerity, for Jesus does not challenge him on this account. Jesus recognized that riches were his stumbling block, which led to the suggestion that he should sell his possessions to give to the poor. The young man refused and went away sorrowful. Since riches could be such an obstacle, Jesus makes some general comments on the danger of riches and goes on to tell a parable that had a bearing on this theme. He acknowledges that the wealthy would find it more difficult than the poor to enter the kingdom, but he makes it clear that it was not impossible for them to do so with the help of God. One of the requirements of the kingdom is to put the interests of Christ before everything else, even before one's closest family connections.

The parable of the workers in the vineyard, which is related only in Matthew (Matt. 20:1 – 16), is intended to illustrate the justice of God. Those who worked for only a small part of the day received the same pay as those who had done a full day's work. When the latter complained, they were reminded that the terms of their contract had been fulfilled. It was not that they had received less, but that the others had received proportionately more. The parable is not a pattern for industrial relationships, but an illustration of the right of the owner of the vineyard to do what he chooses. So Jesus taught the sovereignty of God.

At this point, as they drew nearer to Jerusalem, Jesus addressed himself to the Twelve. He reminded them for the third time that he was going up to Jerusalem to be killed, even to be crucified (Matt. 20:17 – 19; Mk. 10:32 – 34; Lk. 18:31 – 34). This brief mention of his death highlights the severe loneliness of Jesus in his mission, for Luke comments that the disciples had no understanding of what he said (Lk. 18:34). His mind must have been disturbed by the knowledge that there was rivalry among the disciples over who was to be the greatest in the coming kingdom, and especially over the request of James and John for preferential treatment. When Jesus challenged the two about their ability to drink his cup, he alone knew the bitter experiences that were involved. The other ten were just as bad, for they could not refrain from anger at the audacity of the two. In spite of what Jesus had already said about humility, they had not learned the lesson that the greatest in the kingdom is he who serves most. Matthew attributes the ambition of James and John to their mother, who makes the request, but Mark shows that the responsibility rested equally upon them (cf. Matt. 20:20; Mk. 10:35).

The most significant feature of this incident is the statement of Jesus' own purpose in terms of service—to give his life a ransom for many (Matt. 20:28; Mk. 10:45). During this period his thoughts must often have been on the essential meaning of his mission. Among those whose thoughts were so dominated by ambition to lord it over others, his own principle of sacrificial service stood out in strong contrast.

(b) In Jericho. It is not without some point that all the synoptists relate a healing of blind eyes at this stage in the ministry (Matt. 20:29 – 34; Mk. 10:46 – 52; Lk. 18:35 – 43). The result of this miracle brought rejoicing to the multitudes. It was a welcome contrast to the quibbling of the disciples. Matthew refers to two blind men, while Mark and Luke to one; moreover, Matthew and Luke differ in their placing of the incident. It seems clear that there were two men healed, of whom Mark and Luke select only one, and it seems equally clear that the incident happened on the outskirts of JERICHO, somewhere between the old and the new Jericho.

Luke alone recounts the meeting of Jesus with ZACCHAEUS in Jericho (Lk. 19:1 – 10). This incident again throws into bold relief the purpose of Jesus—to seek out and to save the lost (19:10). The Savior’s consciousness of his immediate task thus finds opportunity to bring a challenge to a despised class of men, tax collectors. The social effects of the gospel are vividly seen in the immediate restitution Zacchaeus made to those whom he had wronged. Something of the tremendous achievements of the mission of Jesus is therefore visible in token form immediately prior to the final entry into Jerusalem.

Zacchaeus, the tax collector, was sitting in the branches of a sycamore tree when Jesus called out to him.

A parable recorded in Luke’s gospel is especially fitting as a prelude to the entry into Jerusalem (Lk. 19:11 – 27). It was told to correct the mistaken impression that the establishing of the kingdom was imminent. A nobleman about to go away to receive a kingdom commits money to his servants with the command that they trade with it. While he is away the citizens reject the nobleman as king, and when he returns he requires each servant to give account of his trading. Responsibility is apportioned according to the results obtained. The parable ends with a statement that the nobleman’s enemies were to be destroyed. It must have been in the mind of Jesus as he approached Jerusalem that its people would reject him as king, and he knew that this would be a shock to the disciples. The recognition of faithful service during this period of rejection was essential for them to realize at this time, although they did not then fully appreciate its significance. The destruction of the enemies (if Jerusalem was in mind) took place some forty years later under the Roman siege.

(c) Jesus at Bethany. It was six days before the Passover. The mind of Jesus was more than ever on his approaching passion, and he sought retreat at Bethany with Mary, Martha, and Lazarus. While seated at supper, Jesus was anointed by Mary with precious ointment (Jn. 12:1 – 8). The act was viewed differently by different people. The attitude of Jesus is strongly contrasted with that of Judas, to whom it was sheer waste. To Jesus it was an act that showed some understanding of his spiritual mission and its involvement. Mary had seized what Jesus knew was to be her last opportunity to show her identification with him. In Jesus’ mind she had prepared for his burial, and no cost was too great for that. The sense of inevitability of the coming events cannot be erased from the record. Both Matthew and Mark preserve the promise of Jesus that the woman’s act would be remembered wherever the gospel was preached.

As if to prepare still further for the doom awaiting Jesus in Jerusalem, John mentions that the Jews now proceeded to add the further intention of killing Lazarus to the earlier decision to kill Jesus (Jn. 12:10). Nothing could bring out more vividly the appalling spiritual blindness of the Jewish national leaders.

3. The ministry in Jerusalem. The preceding events have all prepared for the concluding week in Jerusalem. The hour of the Messiah has come. He had arrived only to be rejected by the leaders of his people. The point of entry is therefore the beginning of the end. But the real significance of it came to the disciples only later when they were more able to see these closing events as a whole.

(a) The entry into Jerusalem and the cleansing of the temple. The fact that all four Gospels relate the TRIUMPHAL ENTRY of Jesus into Jerusalem shows the importance that must be attached to it (Matt. 21:1 – 9; Mk. 11:1 – 10; Lk. 19:28 – 38; Jn. 12:12 – 16). In view of the forebodings Jesus had revealed from time to time, the manner of his entry is unexpected. From the acclamation of the multitude it would not have appeared evident that Jesus was riding into the city to be crucified within a few days. All the Gospels have prepared the reader to consider more fully the attitude of Jesus than the attitude of the multitude. Matthew and John mention the fulfillment of a prophecy as if to account for the strange paradox (Matt. 21:5; Jn. 12:15). In this way both draw attention to an important element in the consciousness of Jesus at this time—the testimony of Scripture. The royal nature of the entry is stressed in all the accounts and is clearly meant to provide a backdrop against which the somber events of the passion might be described. As in the preceding parable (Lk. 19:11 – 27), Jesus had come to take up his kingdom, but not in the manner of earthly kings. The impression of triumph created by the entry is introduced only to be quickly dispelled. As Jesus drew near, he wept over the city and predicted its doom (19:41).

According to Matthew, the first action of Jesus in Jerusalem was to cleanse the temple (Matt. 21:12 – 13), but Mark's more detailed narrative requires the prior cursing of the fig tree (Mk. 11:12 – 18). The two events are not unrelated in their significance; both have a symbolic meaning for the Jewish nation. The fig tree was impressive because of its leaves, which that year must have appeared earlier than usual. It caught the eyes of Jesus, who supposed that the first figs, which normally appear before the leaves, should have been on the tree. On finding none, Jesus cursed the tree. According to Mark, it was not until the next day that the disciples noticed that the tree had suddenly withered (11:20 – 21). They drew the attention of Jesus to this fact, revealing in doing so that to them it was no more than a marvel, although he, no doubt, intended it to be symbolic of Israel. The nation had all the external appearance of flourishing religiously, but had not produced the fruits of righteousness. The destruction of the tree was an illustration of God's judgment on Israel. Jesus knew, as the disciples did not, that that judgment was not far distant, as far as Jerusalem was concerned.

The drastic action of Jesus in casting out the money-changers from the temple is also symbolic. It was the practice for these people to exchange other currencies for the temple currency, in which money alone the temple tax could be paid. This enabled the unscrupulous to charge more than was due, and the same applied to the sellers of pigeons. It was no wonder that Jesus' wrath was kindled against them. His act of righteous indignation was representative of the revulsion of perfect goodness at the sight of all injustice, especially in the name of, and in the central place of, the worship of God. All the synoptics record the quotation from the Scriptures made by Jesus in justification of his action. What was intended as a house of prayer had become a den of thieves. It was a symbol of what had happened to Israel as a whole. Judgment would come to it as surely as it had come to the temple. The evangelists report various reactions to what Jesus had done. Children cried out in the temple, “Hosanna to the Son of David” (Matt. 21:15); the multitude was astonished; at the same time the chief priests and scribes intensified their determination to kill Jesus. Such a cross section of reactions was also representative of the nation as a whole.

(b) Days of controversy. During the closing days in Jerusalem, one of the marked features was the number of conflicts Jesus had with religious leaders and others. The priests, scribes, and elders debated with him the question of authority, but he countered with a challenge on the problem of the authority of John the Baptist (Matt. 21:23 – 27; Mk. 11:27 – 33; Lk. 20:1 – 8). This led to the relating of the parable about the wicked husbandmen (Matt. 21:33 – 46; Mk. 12:1 – 12; Lk. 20:9 – 19), which again focuses upon divine judgment on those who have wrongly used their office in the vineyard of Israel, particularly in the killing of the heir. Nevertheless, Jesus assures his hearers that the stone the builders rejected (i.e., himself) would become the cornerstone of God’s building.

The next controversy concerned tribute money to Caesar (Matt. 22:15 – 22; Mk. 12:13 – 17; Lk. 20:20 – 26). In this case the Pharisees joined with the Herodians, whom they usually avoided through dislike of their politics, to attempt to ensnare Jesus. By using a simple coin with the image of CAESAR on it, he appealed to the testimony of the currency that the Jews were a subservient people, which was intensely unpalatable to the Pharisees, but nevertheless true. All the synoptists note that the opponents marveled at the answer of Jesus. Were they truly challenged to render to God what belonged to him?

Following this, the Sadducees asked a question about the resurrection, but they fared no better (Matt. 22:23 – 33; Mk. 12:18 – 27; Lk. 20:27 – 40). Jesus showed that their problem about marriage in heaven displayed a misunderstanding of the spiritual nature of the resurrection. Matthew reports astonishment from the multitude; and Luke commendation from certain scribes. The masterly wisdom of Jesus made the “catch” questions put to him look foolish, but the various hostile parties came back for more exposure from him. A Pharisaic lawyer tried out the problem of the greatest commandment (Matt. 22:34 – 40; Mk. 12:28 – 34). This was a stock question that Jesus had earlier illustrated by the parable of the good Samaritan.

Jesus himself now put a question to the Pharisees about the lineage of the Messiah and the interpretation of Ps. 110:1. He confounded them on a matter of exegesis, over which they especially prided themselves (Matt. 22:41 – 46; Mk. 12:35 – 37; Lk. 20:41 – 44). If the Messiah was the Son of David, how could David also call him Lord? Although all the synoptists record the question, it is Matthew alone who comments that no one was able to answer him. This is not surprising, for the hearers had no concept of the two natures of the Messiah, that is, human and divine.

All the quibbling of the Jewish religious leaders led Jesus to denounce in strong terms the abuses of the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 23). He does not condemn their allegiance to the law, but rather their abuse of their position as teachers. Some have thought that his criticisms of these religious leaders was undeserved. It must be said, however, that although there was undoubtedly much good in Judaism, the burdens imposed on the common people had become intolerable, and much supposed piety was marred by inconsistency and HYPOCRISY.

The language of denunciation as reported in Matt. 23 is strongly expressed. Jesus first points out the love of ostentation among the Pharisees. Their good deeds are done in public to be seen of men. They love places of honor. They delight in receiving titles of respect from others. This kind of attitude is foreign to that of Jesus, who maintains again that those who humble themselves will be exalted and those who exalt themselves will be humbled. There was need for a reversal of current Pharisaic values. Several times in the course of the denunciation Jesus calls them hypocrites, which is a word having the force of play-acting. They were not what they appeared to be. Even their great proselytizing activity did no more than add others who were no better than themselves. Moreover, they are described as blind guides, incapable of discernment. Their petty rules about oaths illustrate the point. They cannot differentiate between important and unimportant matters: they strain out gnats and swallow camels (Matt. 23:24).

Jesus said to the teachers of the law and the Pharisees, “You blind guides! You strain out a gnat but swallow a camel” (Matt. 23:24).

Other features that came in for heavy criticism from Jesus were their burdensome ritual requirements and their opposition to God’s true messengers. In connection with the first, an example is cited from their interpretation of ritual cleansing. The outside of the cup is to be cleansed at all costs, but the inside is neglected, said Jesus, by which he meant that external adherence to cleansing regulations was useless unless it was accompanied by spiritual renewal. Another illustration Jesus turned against them was their practice of whitewashing sepulchres so that people might see them and avoid defiling themselves by walking over them. He likened the sepulchres to their hearts, and the whitewashing to their outward show of piety. He further criticized them for outwardly honoring the prophets and yet inwardly being of the same spiritual outlook as their fathers who murdered the prophets. All through the comments of Jesus upon the scribes and Pharisees runs the same theme—they professed one thing and did another. It is not to be supposed that every Pharisee was guilty of all the abuses that Jesus mentioned, nor may it even be supposed that these abuses were generally typical. Jesus saw the logical results of the tendencies which a legalistic system must produce, and by exposing these results he aimed to warn people against them.

It is fitting that after such denunciation of the scribes and Pharisees Jesus should once again lament over Jerusalem. Moreover, an incident he observed at the temple treasury served by way of contrast to illustrate his own concept of true piety. It was not the many rich men giving their large sums, but a poor widow giving a humble gift who was commended by him (Mk. 12:41 – 44; Lk. 21:1 – 14).

There were, however, some sincere inquirers who came to him, for John records the quest of some Greeks who sought him (Jn. 12:20 – 22), which led Jesus to speak to them about his hour of glorification. Once again attention is drawn to the thoughts uppermost in the mind of Jesus on the eve of his passion. He thinks of himself as a grain of wheat that must die to reproduce itself, and prays that God's name may be glorified through him. To mark the critical character of this occasion, the Father's voice is heard from heaven, saying that he had glorified it and would glorify it again, but the crowd did not understand. John, indeed, mentions that those who had seen many signs did not believe in him (Jn. 12:37). At the same time Jesus states that their disbelief is not merely in him but in the Father.

(c) Words about the future. As his own hour draws near, Jesus instructs his disciples about future happenings. All the synoptists record parts of this eschatological teaching (Matt. 24 – 25; Mk. 13; Lk. 21:5 – 38). The discourse was occasioned by the disciples' admiration for the temple buildings, causing Jesus to predict its destruction. When this raised curiosity among them, Jesus unfolded some of the events that must happen in the future—false Christs, wars among the nations, and natural calamities. Then he predicted persecutions in store for the disciples, desolations in Judea, the rise of false teachers, celestial signs, and the coming of the Son of Man. No one could know the date of this coming, but a description of it is included, couched in APOCALYPTIC terms. Of more importance than the details of the coming is the present attitude of the disciples. The exhortation to watch and pray is essentially practical. A definite moral challenge is provided by the thought that life must be lived in the light of that coming. In the teaching of Jesus eschatology is never removed from ethical implications.

More will be said about the future aspects of the kingdom when the teaching of Jesus is separately considered, but it is worth noting here that he did not hesitate to use apocalyptic language to express his meaning. This does not require us to think that he shared much in common with the apocalyptists. Their approach was largely pessimistic. They were visionaries whose hopes were based on insecure foundations. They testify, however, to earnest aspirations which the Christian gospel was able to fulfill in an infinitely better way than they were able to conceive. The eschatological teaching of Jesus centers upon the coming triumph of the Son of Man.

In Matthew's account of the discourse, three parables are included—the ten virgins, the talents, and the sheep and the goats—all of which also contain practical implications. The wise virgins who took oil in their lamps while they waited for the bridegroom to come are commended for their preparedness, but the sorry outcome for those who did not take oil and who were not ready for the bridegroom is intended as a solemn warning. In the parable of the talents, the men who used their resources to gain other talents for their master are commended for their faithfulness, whether their gains were large or small. It was the man who did nothing, and was therefore unfaithful, who was condemned. In the third parable, it is the need of others which is the focus of attention. The sheep are those who cared for others, the goats those who did not. The former are commended, but the latter are condemned. All three parables bring out the sharp distinctions that arise in connection with the kingdom.

G. The passion and resurrection of Jesus

1. From the plot to the arrest. The amount of space devoted by all four evangelists to the account of the passion of Jesus is strong testimony to its paramount importance. The previous outline of events and teaching gains its significance only in the light of the climax. If Jesus was an enigma to the religious leaders and to the common people of his day, it was because he had come to fulfill a unique mission that found its fulfillment in an act of crucifixion. The sense of coming doom is unmistakable in the progressive stages of the story. At various times previously the intentions of the leaders to kill

Jesus have been mentioned, but a definite plan is decided on with the treacherous cooperation of JUDAS ISCARIOT (Matt. 26:1 – 16; Mk. 14:1 – 16; Lk. 22:1—22:6). This betrayal was already arranged before the last meeting of Jesus with the Twelve.

Even the details of the closing events have an air of destiny about them (Matt. 26:17 – 19; Mk. 14:12 – 16; Lk. 22:7 – 13). Someone with an upper room offers its use to Jesus for the purpose of the feast. It was arranged for a man with a pitcher to guide the disciples to it, where the meal could be prepared. Before sitting down to the meal, Jesus washed his disciples' feet as an example in humility (Jn. 13:1 – 20). Peter's objection that the Master should not perform for him so humble a task is overruled. As Jesus performed this service, his mind was centered on the tragedy of the betrayer, for almost immediately after resuming his seat he quoted Scripture alluding to the coming treachery (13:18). With deep disturbance of spirit he announced that the betrayer was in the room with them. Jesus shows his feelings by offering to Judas the portion of honor. At length Judas withdrew, but it is not certain at what stage in the proceedings this happened, except that it took place before the farewell discourses.

The institution of the LORD'S SUPPER is described in all the synoptics, but not in John. Its purpose was to provide a memorial feast to draw attention to the main mission of Jesus, namely, to shed his blood for the remission of sins. In this way he was insuring that the memory of his work should not cease, but more than that, he was providing an interpretation of it that was to become central in the Christian church. Bread symbolized his broken body, and wine his poured-out blood, though none but he knew the significance of the feast that night. His was a lonely path to Calvary, in spite of the fact that Peter had offered to lay down his life for him (Jn. 13:37). Peter was reminded that he would deny Jesus three times before cockcrow next morning (Matt. 26:30 – 35; Mk. 14:26 – 31; Lk. 22:31 – 34; Jn. 13:36 – 38).

It is not possible in an outline of this nature to detail the contents of the farewell discourses. Part took place in the upper room (Jn. 14), but the following parts (chs. 15 – 16) form an essential unity with it. The most characteristic feature throughout is the atmosphere of calm assurance that the words of Jesus convey. There is no sense of distress on his part. Instead, he talks of his joy and peace, which the disciples will later share. There is a confidence in the perfect planning of the Father which would make anxiety incongruous. A main feature is the repeated promises regarding the Holy Spirit, who would continue the work of Jesus after he had departed.

It was possibly immediately after leaving the upper room that Jesus gave the allegory of the vine and the branches to show how important it was for the disciples to abide in him. Their future life was to be inextricably bound up with him. Apart from this inseparable connection, they would not be able to accomplish anything. Throughout the discourses there is much that was calculated to encourage the disciples, especially when they were to pass through tribulation. It is characteristic of the whole approach of Jesus that he shows greater concern about the disciples than about himself in the hour of his crisis.

John records a prayer of Jesus for himself, for the disciples, and for believers generally (Jn. 17). It is deep in its revelation of the mind of Jesus. It reveals him in close fellowship with the Father only a few hours before the cry of desolation from the cross. In that part of the prayer which concerns himself, he prays for the Father's glory to be seen. Most of his prayer is a supplication for others—above all that they might possess the same kind of unity as he possessed with the Father.

When GETHSEMANE was reached, Jesus was troubled (Matt. 26:36 – 46; Mk. 14:32 – 42; Lk. 22:40 – 46). Was there no other way? Yet, the Father knew best. Although Jesus passed through agony in doing the Father's will, he accepted it uncomplainingly. While the bitter inner struggle went on, the three disciples specially chosen to share his sorrow fell asleep, while another was leading a band of soldiers and officers to arrest him. It was greater sadness for Jesus to see the indifference of the three than to receive a kiss from the betrayer. Peter at least had protested his loyalty.

The arrest of Jesus set him in noble contrast to his captors (Matt. 26:47 – 56; Mk. 14:43 – 52; Lk. 22:47 – 53; Jn. 18:1 – 12). John says that some of them fell back in amazement. Peter cut off the ear of the high priest's servant. Jesus rebuked Peter and chided the multitude for bringing their swords and clubs. He offered no resistance. This was the Father's will; his hour had come, but all the disciples fled.

2. The passion. There were several stages in the process that took Jesus to the cross. He was first examined in the house of the (former) high priest, ANNAS, during which time Peter denied him three times before cockcrow (Jn. 18:12 – 17). It was therefore early morning. No specific charge was brought at this stage, but mockery was heaped upon him.

It was later that Jesus was brought before the SANHEDRIN (Matt. 26:57 – 68; Mk. 14:53 – 65; Lk. 22:54), but previously there had been much activity on the part of the officials to find false witnesses to testify against him. It was finally agreed to proceed on the charge of threatened destruction of the temple, linked with the charge of blasphemy. Throughout this trial the dignity of Jesus remained unimpaired in the face of degrading mockery, which would have been a disgrace at any trial.

Next, Jesus was sent to PILATE because the Sanhedrin had no power to execute its own decision to have him put to death without the governor's consent. (At this stage in Matthew's account the remorse and death of Judas is narrated to form a tragic background to the callous attitude of the religious leaders [Matt. 27:3 – 10].) Pilate's examination convinced him that Jesus was innocent of the charges brought against him. In view of this, Pilate tried to avoid having to make a decision by sending him to Herod Antipas when he learned that Jesus was a Galilean.

Herod could do nothing but mock Jesus, and Pilate was again faced with the necessity of deciding on some course of action. He decided to offer the multitude a choice between Jesus and BARABBAS as the one to be released according to custom at the feast, but the multitude cried for Barab-bas. In spite of a warning from his wife and his own conviction of the innocence of Jesus, Pilate at length capitulated. No more sorry figure than this Roman governor has ever disgraced the name of justice. Yet, Jesus had known beforehand that he had come to Jerusalem to be scourged and crucified. After the governor's decision to hand Jesus over to be crucified, further mockery took place with the arraying of Jesus by the soldiers in a scarlet robe and a crown of thorns (Matt. 27:27 – 30; Mk. 15:16 – 19).

Two noteworthy events occurred on the route to CALVARY, where Jesus was crucified. Simon from Cyrene was forced to carry his cross (Lk. 23:26) and a group of women lamented over Jesus (23:27 – 31). All the evangelists describe in detail the various stages of the CRUCIFIXION, the most cruel form of death, but none includes all the data (Matt. 27:33 – 56; Mk. 15:33 – 47; Lk. 23:33 – 49; Jn. 19:17 – 37). The focal points are the dispute of Pilate with the Jews about the superscription on the cross, the reaction of the two political insurrectionists who were crucified with Jesus, the attitude of the soldiers, the jibes of the passers-by and of the chief priests and scribes, the physical signs accompanying the crucifixion, including the unnatural darkness, the sudden rending of the veil, but most of all the seven sayings of Jesus from the cross. Apart from the momentary cry of dereliction, the suffering Jesus dies triumphantly, his work fully accomplished.

The mass of detail which the evangelists have preserved about the crucifixion reflects the great importance of the event in the minds of the early Christians. There was no attempt to gloss over the shame of it. The glory of the cross was real beyond the appalling physical sufferings that the Messiah endured. The actuality of the sufferings was indispensable to the glory. When Jesus said, "It is finished," he was not thinking of his mortal life, but of his mission of redemption.

When the body of Jesus was removed from the cross, it was placed in a rich man's tomb (Matt. 27:57 – 60; Mk. 15:42 – 46; Lk. 23:50 – 54; Jn. 19:38 – 42). Joseph of Arimathaea was bold enough to make special application to the governor. Matthew relates the request of the chief priests and Pharisees for the sealing of the tomb and the appointment of a guard to insure that the body was not stolen. That the fact of the burial had some importance for the early Christians is seen from a special mention of it by Paul (1 Cor. 15:4).

3. The resurrection. The Gospels relate the fact of the RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST on the third day. That the tomb was empty is established by all the witnesses. There were a number of appearances of Jesus during the period between the resurrection and the ASCENSION.

The appearances may be given as follows: (1) the appearance to Mary Magdalene (Jn. 20:11 – 18); (2) to the other women (Matt. 28:9 – 10); (3) to Peter (Lk. 24:33 – 35; 1 Cor. 15:5); (4) to two people on the way to Emmaus (Lk. 24:13 – 32); (5) to the ten apostles and others (Lk. 24:36 – 43; Jn. 20:19 – 25). All these occurred on one day, Easter Sunday.

The other five occurred on different days: (6) to the eleven (Jn. 20:26 – 31; 1 Cor. 15:5); (7) to seven disciples in Galilee (Jn. 21:1 – 25); (8) to the apostles and over 500 disciples in Galilee (Matt. 28:16 – 20; 1 Cor. 15:6); (9) to James, the Lord's brother (1 Cor. 15:7); (10) the concluding appearance to the apostles (Lk. 24:44 – 53; Acts 1:1 – 12). In the book of Acts, Luke states in his introduction that Jesus presented himself alive to his apostles: "After his suffering, he showed himself to these men and gave many convincing proofs that he was alive. He appeared to them over a period of forty days and spoke about the kingdom of God" (1:3). These appearances therefore were regarded by the early church as sufficient proofs of the reality of the resurrection.

Several observations are necessary concerning the character of the evidence. Paul's list (1 Cor. 15) is clearly selective, but the principle of selection is not at once evident. It has been suggested, not improbably, ably, that this list is confined to those whose evidence had been used in preaching. This may account for the omission of specific reference to women witnesses or to the two on the Emmaus road. Whatever the reason for the selection, the evidence is invaluable, for Paul's testimony is in all probability prior to the writing of the Gospels. The evidence he cites is based on traditions he had received.

Painting of the ascension of Jesus (from the dome of the Church of the Ascension on the Mount of Olives).

The remaining evidence is spread throughout the Gospels, although that from Mark is somewhat uncertain due to doubts about the original ending of his book. Nevertheless the existing ending (Mk. 16:9 – 20) can certainly lay claim to antiquity and may well preserve an authentic tradition distinct from the rest of Mark. It appears to support the evidence for four of the appearances mentioned above

(nos. 1, 4, 8, 10), all of which also occur in either Luke or John. The difficulty of unraveling the sequence of the appearances is in itself a testimony to the authenticity of the various streams of tradition. There was no collusion between the evangelists to insure an account without difficulties, nor was there the use of a common source.

One of the major problems is the difference in location of the various appearances. Those of Mark and Matthew are set in Galilee, those of Luke in Jerusalem, and those of John in Jerusalem and Galilee. Paul gives no hint of location, which suggests that in the early tradition it was not regarded as important. It should be noted, however, that Luke shows a special interest in Jerusalem in his gospel, which may account for his exclusive selection of Jerusalem-based appearances. Those who see two conflicting traditions are driven to choose one and reject the other. There is no insuperable obstacle to both being correct, as is suggested by John's account. The journey to Galilee and back would naturally take time, but is not impossible. It is undeniable that the fact of the resurrection of Jesus is one of the best attested facts of history.

A change of attitude toward the resurrection has occurred in the realm of criticism. Earlier critics attempted to explain away the fact of the resurrection on the basis of a swoon theory, a vision theory, or a hallucination theory, but these attempts failed to square with the evidence. Since that time, there has been a tendency (e.g., in the Bultmannian position) not so much to explain away the resurrection but to reinterpret it. According to this view, the fact of a raised body ceases to have relevance because its crucial importance is as a factor in faith rather than history. Such an emphasis tends to nullify the objective reality of the resurrection and makes it difficult to see how any common experience could be shared in the faith of all believers. The NT witnesses are not only varied in type, but also in the number who experienced the visitations at the same time.

Accepting therefore the fact of the resurrection as a historical event, it is next necessary to inquire what details the narratives supply about the risen Lord. (a) He was in human form and yet his resurrection body possessed properties beyond those of normal bodies. He could pass into rooms without visible entry and could appear and disappear at will. (b) He had features that were not readily identifiable with the Jesus they had known. More than one of the stories of the appearances refer to the fact that he was not recognized. The nail prints and the familiar voice were the marks of identification. (c) There was a definite continuity with the historical Jesus, as when he conversed with and challenged Peter in a threefold way (Jn. 21). (d) The realization of the risen Lord on the part of the disciples was the occasion of remarkable joy and transformation. That Jesus was not dead but risen changed the despair of the disciples into incredible hope. (e) The resurrection appearances were occasions for specific instruction. Acts 1:3 mentions the kingdom and Lk. 24:44 – 45 refers to the Scriptures and relates his present to his past teaching. It is reasonable to suppose that Jesus explained the significance of his own death and resurrection during these appearances.

The major significance of the resurrection for Christian faith was left to the early Christians to think through under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Two factors may be mentioned. It became the firstfruits for the believer's own experience. As Christ was raised from the dead, so shall the believer be. The resurrection is, therefore, the surety for the ultimate triumph of faith over the grave. Second, it is by the resurrection that the divine approval is shown for the work of Christ upon the cross. The resurrection is the coping stone of the whole ministry of Jesus.

4. The ascension. It is only Luke among the evangelists who records this event. It took place at Bethany when, after lifting up his hands to bless the disciples, Jesus vanished from sight (Lk. 24:50 – 51). Acts 1:1 – 11 fills in the picture with more details, the most noteworthy of which are the discussion between Jesus and the disciples regarding the restoration of the kingdom to Israel—an evidence of the disciples' current immature understanding—and the announcement of his future return by two men in white. The disciples were not left with mere memories, but with a deep conviction that the same Lord who had companied with them in a historical sense had returned to his former glory, exalted by God and ever living to perform a high priestly function on their behalf (Acts 2:36; Phil. 2:9 – 10; Heb. 2:17; 4:14 – 15 passim).

VI. The teaching of Jesus. So large a proportion of the Gospels is taken up with the teaching of Jesus that the importance of what he said is at once seen to be as great as what he did. He was regarded by many as a RABBI and was pleased to accept this title for himself. Yet, the question immediately arises to what extent his teaching methods and content can be considered typical of Jewish teachers of the 1st cent. The populace at least were discerning enough to note one important distinction: contrasted with the SCRIBES, Jesus taught with authority. He did not, as they continually did, appeal to older Jewish authority. Even when he cited the law, he claimed authority to go beyond it. Approaching his teaching, therefore, one is conscious of his uniqueness as well as his indebtedness to contemporary thought. These two aspects will be brought out in the following survey of his teaching.

A. His teaching methods. It will be valuable to note the major characteristics of the teaching methods of Jesus as a prelude to the study of the content, because this will help to place the teaching in its life-situation (Sitz im Leben).

1. Its adaptability. In the Gospels the first feature that strikes the reader is the way in which Jesus adapted his teaching to the type of hearer with whom he was dealing. There are many kinds of audiences mentioned. The common people gathered in crowds to hear him and to them he spoke in parables, drawing from a wide range of everyday illustrations. He did not generally address discourses to multitudes, although a notable exception is the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, if this is to be regarded as a continuous discourse. There is a marked difference in the style of his teaching to the Galilean crowds and to the intelligentsia in Jerusalem. Further, the Synoptic Gospels draw a distinction between his teaching to the multitudes and his teaching to the Twelve, for the latter portion of the ministry of Jesus is devoted to the disciples.

There is no doubt that for Jesus the teaching ministry was a means to an end. As far as the Twelve were concerned, it was part of the process of training, although without question Jesus also had in mind the future ministry of the church and the incomparable value that his teaching was then to have. This factor of adaptability is particularly seen in his readiness to use every opportunity to impart some spiritual truth, whether it was an ordinary incident such as a rich young ruler's request to him, or some festival occasion as the Feast of Tabernacles. It is not surprising that the high priests' officers sent to arrest Jesus returned without him, but with a deep impression of his incomparable teaching. A further illustration of his adaptability was the readiness of Jesus to impart teaching to an audience of one if occasion demanded.

2. Use of rhetoric. Jesus is never portrayed in the role of an orator, although he used certain rhetorical devices (but always in a natural way). This may be illustrated with examples. He used the dialogue method, sometimes posing questions himself and sometimes responding to the questions of others. The collection of controversies recorded as taking place in the temple area, prior to the passion, is a marked illustration. The attempts of PHARISEES and SADDUCEES to trick him with difficult questions were simply regarded by him as opportunities to express principles, a process that invariably silenced his questioners. When Jesus was asked about his own authority, he posed a counterquestion about the authority of John the Baptist and put his questioners on the horns of a dilemma, which effectively made them withdraw their challenge.

In John's gospel are preserved, moreover, instances where Jesus engaged in extended dialogue with various Jewish groups (e.g., Jn. 6), in which cases he not infrequently used rabbinical methods of argument, which would have been appreciated by his contemporaries, although their force may not always be apparent in modern times. An example from the synoptics is the statement regarding the resurrection (Matt. 22:32). It must be recognized that even when Jesus used rabbinical methods, he was doing so to express a deeper spiritual truth than appears on the surface. The truth does not depend on the form in which it is expressed, but on the validity it possesses.

3. Logical devices. On occasions Jesus used various logical devices that are worth noting. An example of a fortiori type of argument (corresponding to the rabbinic hermeneutical rule of qal wāḥôomer, "light and heavy") may be seen in the Sermon on the Mount, where Jesus proceeds from the lesser example of the heavenly Father's care for the birds to the greater example of his care for men: "Are you not much more valuable they?" (Matt. 6:26). Another method is reductio ad absurdum, a classic example of which is the controversy with the Pharisees over BEELZEBUB: their charge that Jesus was casting out devils by the prince of the devils would make the devil war against himself, which is unthinkable. The type of argument known as ad hominem (in its valid form, i.e., when based on an opponent's premises) was often used when Jesus appealed to the teaching of the law (e.g., Jn. 10:34). Many times Jesus left his hearers to apply his illustrations on the strength of an analogy between the physical and spiritual worlds; thus to demonstrate the Father's willingness to give, he appeals to what might be expected from earthly fathers (Matt. 7:9).

4. The use of repetition. One important aspect of the teaching method of Jesus was his practice of repeating his sayings. Many source theories have been based on the assumption that this did not happen, and consequently similar sayings were regarded as variant duplicates in the tradition. This method of dealing with the teaching of Jesus is open to criticism on the ground that it does not sufficiently take account of the usual practice of repetition among Jewish teachers (see B. Gerhardsson's Memory and Manuscript [1961], which cites evidence for this prevalent procedure). Moreover, this is a basic educational method. It cannot be expected that profound truths will be grasped at one hearing, and it must be accepted that this principle was recognized by Jesus. This may well account for a considerable amount of the variation in the synoptics when they report the sayings of Jesus.

Examples of repetition may be found both in content and in verbal form. Some themes, such as the kingdom or the law, frequently recur. The repetition is always purposive. In the Sermon on the Mount, there is a sequence of instances introduced by the formula, "You have heard that it was said... But I tell you" (Matt. 5:21 – 22 et al.), which heightens the effect of the distinctive teaching given. There were other techniques Jesus used to aid the memory of his hearers. Of special interest is similarity of form, as, for instance, the BEATITUDES, which would be easier to retain in the mind than a collection of dissimilar sayings.

5. Illustrations. No one can read the Gospels without being impressed by the colorful character of Jesus' teaching. He made frequent use of metaphors, often of the most striking kind. His self-description as light, door, vine, shepherd, are drawn from common illustrations that were all the more effective because of their simplicity. He promised that his disciples would be "fishers of men" and "the salt of the earth." The contemporary Jewish teachers were "a brood of vipers." Other examples abound in the Gospels. It is sufficient, however, to note that the teaching of Jesus was never dull. It was intended to be recalled. Similarly, he made constant use of similes, of which the best examples are in the parables, but by no means exclusively so. For instance, the disciples are as "sheep among wolves," and they are to be "as shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves" (Matt. 10:16).

Mosaic on the altar of the church Dominus Fleuit ("The Lord Wept"). It includes the Latin text of Jesus' words to Jerusalem: "...how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, but you were not willing" (Matt. 23:37). Jesus often used metaphors in his teaching.

There can be no doubt that as a teacher Jesus possessed a sense of humor, as is seen by the extraordinary exaggerations he sometimes mentioned. The reference to "the plank in your own eye" (Matt. 7:3 – 5) was intended to heighten the contrast with the speck, but would be wholly inappropriate as a possible obstruction in the eye. Similarly, a camel in a needle's eye (Mk. 10:25) was surely not to be taken literally. With the same purpose of arresting attention is the use of paradoxical sayings (e.g., those who would be great must become slaves, Matt. 20:27), or of apparently contradictory sayings, which speak of the purpose of Jesus to divide households (Lk. 12:51 – 53).

6. Poetic forms. Some of the sayings of Jesus were expressed in poetic form, no doubt to help the hearer in retaining them. C. F. Burney, in his book The Poetry of our Lord (1925), has given detailed attention to the formal poetic elements in the discourses of Jesus. He draws special attention to the methods of parallelism and rhythm, which were characteristic of HEBREW POETRY, and he is convinced that the teaching of Jesus could provide many instances of these features. Only a few examples will be given to illustrate the poetic skill of Jesus.

Parallelism had two main forms: synonymous and antithetic (a third, synthetic, is not parallelism in the strict sense). In synonymous parallelism a statement is made in two successive lines, the second of which rewords (and usually enhances) the first. Take, for example, Mk. 4:30, where Jesus asks, "What shall we say the kingdom of God is like, or what parable shall we use to describe it?" This method effectively emphasizes the thought and often moves it forward as well. The second type, antithetic parallelism, is a statement in which the second line denies the opposite of the first, or merely states the opposite of the first by way of contrast. An example is the well-known saying, “So the last will be first, and the first will be last” (Matt. 20:16; cf. also Mk. 4:25 and Jn. 3:6). Throughout the teaching of Jesus antithesis was powerfully used, especially in John’s gospel, not only in the themes used, such as light and darkness, truth and falseness, “my disciples” and “the world,” but also in the actual forms of the sayings. Note, for instance 5:29, where doers of good are contrasted with doers of evil; 11:9 – 10, walking in the day contrasted with walking in the night; and 15:2, bearing fruit with not bearing fruit. (In so-called synthetic parallelism the thought is actually developed through a sequence of sayings, as in Matt. 23:5 – 7.)

Some comment needs to be made on the subject of rhythm, since this element would focus even greater attention on the artistic methods Jesus employed. The form of the statement, “Do not give dogs what is sacred; do not throw your pearls to pigs” (Matt. 7:6), has an unmistakable rhythmic quality, which could be illustrated in many other sayings (see esp. J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology. Part One: The Proclamation of Jesus [1971], 20 – 27). This demonstrates again that Jesus was not unmindful of the form of his teaching. In addition, when an attempt is made to translate the sayings of Jesus back to their probable Aramaic form, they reflect the use of assonance of various kinds (see M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 3rd ed. [1967], 160 – 85).

7. The influence of the OT. The teaching of Jesus was without doubt influenced by the OT. He was constantly making use of allusions to OT incidents in such a way as to appeal to the knowledge of the hearers. The reference to Lot’s wife, for instance, is not enlarged upon, but knowledge of the details of the story is assumed (Lk. 17:29). Similarly, the allusions to Solomon’s magnificence (Matt. 6:29) or to the Queen of the South’s persistence (12:42) are remarkably concise and incidental. This emphasizes an important feature about the teaching of Jesus. It was addressed to people who were versed in OT ideas and who were able to understand the allusions. Any attempt therefore to interpret the teaching of Jesus apart from its OT background would be to wrench it out of its proper context.

This factor is further borne out by the fact that Jesus’ work of teaching was a direct continuation of the preaching of John the Baptist, who is portrayed in terms which suggest that he is the last of the OT type prophets. It is not without significance that Jesus began proclaiming the same message as John about the need for REPENTANCE owing to the imminence of the kingdom (cf. Mk. 1:4, 14). At the same time, the teaching of Jesus soon went beyond that of John, whose task was essentially preparatory.

8. Parabolic forms. The most characteristic form in the teaching of Jesus is the PARABLE, which was particularly used in the latter part of his ministry. The purpose of the parabolic form often has been debated, especially in view of the reason Jesus gives for using this form: “Though seeing, they do not see; though hearing, they do not hear or understand” (Matt. 13:13; cf. Mk. 4:11 – 12; Lk. 8:9 – 10). The point is not that Jesus used parables to obscure the message. Parables are simple and relatively easy to remember, and for that reason they caused people to think. Those spurred on by no more than idle curiosity or by a rebellious heart would gain nothing, and in this sense would be unable to see or understand.

Many problems have surrounded the interpretation of the parables, which cannot be discussed here. It must be noted, however, that it is this form of the teaching of Jesus that has led to many misunderstandings. Some schools of interpretation have considered that spiritual importance must attach to every detail of the story (e.g., the allegorical school). Others have gone to the opposite extreme and restricted the point of the parable to one generally applicable principle of a moral kind (moralizing school). Still others have considered the eschatological relevance to be uppermost (eschatological school). No interpretation that does not relate the parable to the historical situation of Jesus is likely to be correct. Joachim Jeremias (The Parables of Jesus [1962]) has attempted to read the parables against the historical background, but he excises many supposed influences which he considers to have obscured their original form. The interpreter may make good sense of the life situation of these parables without resorting to editorial methods.

One or two of the parables recorded (the sower, the tares) are more in the nature of an ALLEGORY.

PARABLES OF JESUS IN THE GOSPELS

Recorded only in Matthew

The tares	Matt. 13:24 – 30
The hidden treasure	Matt. 13:44
The pearl of great price	Matt. 13:45 – 46
The fishing net	Matt. 13:47 – 48
The unmerciful servant	Matt. 18:23 – 34
Laborers in the vineyard	Matt. 20:1 – 16
The man with two sons	Matt. 21:28 – 32
The marriage feast (given by the King's son)	Matt. 22:1 – 14
The ten virgins	Matt. 25:1 – 13
The talents	Matt. 25:14 – 30
The sheep and the goats	Matt. 25:31 – 46

Recorded only in Mark

The blade, the ear, the full grain	Mk. 4:26 – 29
Watch for His coming!	Mk. 13:34 – 36

Recorded only in Luke

The two debtors	Lk. 7:36 – 50
The good Samaritan	Lk. 10:25 – 37
The friend at midnight	Lk. 11:5 – 8
The rich fool	Lk. 12:16 – 21
The watchful servants	Lk. 12:35 – 40
The wise steward	Lk. 12:42 – 48
The barren fig tree	Lk. 13:6 – 9
The great banquet	Lk. 14:16 – 24
The tower and counting its cost	Lk. 14:28 – 33
The lost sheep	Lk. 15:3 – 7

The lost coin	Lk. 15:8 – 10
The prodigal son	Lk. 15:11 – 32
The unjust steward	Lk. 16:1 – 13
The rich man and Lazarus	Lk. 16:19 – 31
The master and servant	Lk. 17:7 – 10
The importunate widow	Lk. 18:1 – 8
The Pharisee and the publican	Lk. 18:9 – 14
The pounds	Lk. 19:12 – 27

Recorded in Matthew and Luke

House built on the rock	Matt. 7:24 – 27; Lk. 6:48 – 49
The leaven	Matt. 13:33; Lk. 13:20 – 21
The lost sheep	Matt. 18:12 – 14; Lk. 15:3 – 7

Recorded in Matthew, Mark, and Luke

The candle under a bushel	Matt. 5:14 – 16; Mk. 4:21 – 22; Lk. 8:16 – 17
The new cloth on old garment	Matt. 9:16; Mk. 2:21; Lk. 5:36
New wine and old bottles	Matt. 9:17; Mk. 2:22; Lk. 5:37 – 38
The sower	Matt. 13:3 – 9, 18 – 23; Mk. 4:3 – 20; Lk. 8:4 – 15
The mustard seed	Matt. 13:31 – 32; Mk. 4:31 – 32; Lk. 13:18 – 19
The vineyard and husbandmen	Matt. 21:33 – 41; Mk. 12:1 – 9; Lk. 20:9 – 16
Young leaves of the fig tree	Matt. 24:32 – 35; Mk. 13:28 – 31; Lk. 21:29

These come nearest to the allegorical forms found in the fourth gospel (cf. the shepherd and vine). There are also many sayings in John that are parabolic in style although not in form; but too rigid a distinction must not be drawn between the Synoptic Gospels and the Johannine tradition in this field (cf. C. H. Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel [1963]).

B. The content of the teaching of Jesus. When an attempt is made to produce a summary of the teaching of Jesus, the difficulties of classifying it in a concise manner are at once apparent, for different scholars select different aspects as being of most importance. Nevertheless, a useful summary may be produced, provided it is borne in mind throughout that Jesus was not a dogmatic theologian. What he taught had an essentially practical value, and it is necessary to examine the teaching as a whole to obtain a satisfactory concept of it. Some effort has therefore been made to classify the teaching under major themes.

1. Teaching about God. There are three main aspects in the teaching of Jesus about God—as Creator, Father, and King. (See GOD, BIBLICAL DOCTRINE OF.) It will be noted that these aspects are expressed in terms of activities rather than as attributes, but the latter are not excluded. The creatorship of God is seen especially in teaching on his providential care for his creatures. That God was Creator of the world is assumed rather than explicitly stated. The clearest statement is in Mk. 13:19 (NRSV), “the creation that God created.” That Jesus taught a special providential care is seen particularly in his statements regarding the heavenly Father’s care for and knowledge of such creatures as sparrows (Matt. 10:31). It was basic to the teaching of Jesus that God watched over the whole creation.

It is in the realm of God’s fatherhood that the uniqueness of Jesus’ teaching becomes most evident. Israel had learned to conceive of God as Father, because Israel as a corporate whole was viewed as God’s son. (See FATHERHOOD OF GOD.) Sonship in this sense, however, was primarily national rather than individual. It was not until Jesus taught it that the possibility of a truly filial relationship with God came to the fore. Certainly his Jewish contemporaries, with their transcendental view of God, did not typically think of God in terms of intimate fellowship. As a mode of address in Jewish prayers, “Our Father” is not unknown (cf. G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim, 3 vols. [1927–30], 2:202ff.). The use by Jesus of such expressions as “Your heavenly Father knows,” however, or the whole approach to God seen in the Lord’s Prayer strikes a new note. People accustomed to approach God with holy fear would find strange the insistence on the father-son relationship in the teaching of Jesus. This was the unique feature in his approach.

It should be remembered that the idea of human beings as sons of God is based on the fact that God is the Father of Jesus. At the same time Jesus drew a distinction between our sonship and his own sonship. The most striking illustration of this distinction is found in Jn. 20:17, when Jesus said to Mary that she was to report to the disciples, “I am returning to my Father and your Father, to my God and to your God.” Our sonship cannot, of course, be considered apart from the divine Son, but the distinction must be maintained.

At the baptism of Jesus a heavenly voice attested his divine sonship, and this concept may be regarded as normative for his whole ministry. He was not called as the prophets were to a specific task, but was attested as possessing a specific status. It was in the consciousness of this status that he executed his ministry in obedience to the Father’s will. Nowhere is this brought out more forcefully than in John’s gospel, where Father and Son are seen in such close relationship. It is on the strength of his consciousness of his own special relationship with God that Jesus brings to human beings the concept of God as their own Father. Even though they had had the word on their lips previous to his teaching, they had never entered into the spirit of it. God had never before become such a living reality as the heavenly Father. This was no mere accepted formula, but adoption into a new family relationship.

It was maintained by T. W. Manson (The Teachings of Jesus [1945], 113ff.) that the LORD’S PRAYER contains a concise summary of the main aspects of Jesus’ teaching on the fatherhood of God. He sees two main divisions, the Father as sovereign arbiter of world history and the Father who cares for and ministers to each child. Under the first division the focus is upon God as a person to be glorified (cf. Matt. 5:16). The prayer for the coming of the kingdom is in accordance with the Father’s pleasure (Lk. 12:32). It is the Father’s appointment that his people should possess a kingdom (Lk. 22:29). The necessity for God’s will to be done is an integral part of Jesus’ own relation to the Father, as is seen in the prayer at Gethsemane (Mk. 14:36).

Under the second main division there are three requests in the Lord’s Prayer that draw attention to different facets of the Father’s care for his children. Daily bread is indispensable, and Jesus therefore assured his disciples, “Your Father knows that you have need of these things” (i.e., food and clothing, Matt. 6:32; Lk. 12:30). Next, forgiveness of sins is requested, and again the request may be echoed from the sayings of Jesus elsewhere (cf. Matt. 6:14 – 15; Mk. 11:25). The third request is for protection and deliverance, and this draws further attention to that providential care that was noted under the creatorship of God.

No one can consider these aspects of the teaching of Jesus about God without being impressed by the closeness of the relationship between him and the Father and between the Father and his earthly children. Whatever parallels in terminology may be found in the rabbinical writings, there is nothing in them to compare with the sense of filial obedience and affection toward God inculcated by Jesus, of which he himself was the best example.

The third aspect of God—as King—will be more fully dealt with under the heading of the kingdom. But no true approach can be made to the kingdom without recognizing that its basis is the character of God as King. This involves not only the concept of majesty, but also of SOVEREIGNTY. It is assumed that what God has purposed he is competent to bring to fruition. It is, therefore, taken for granted throughout that his designs cannot ultimately be thwarted. The teaching of Jesus regarding the kingdom, which will be considered in the next section, is supported by the absolute certainty of the final triumph of God in his world.

2. Teaching about the kingdom. (a) Various schools of thought. Undoubtedly, the teaching of Jesus regarding the KINGDOM OF GOD must be ranked among the most important themes. Much debate has been occasioned by it, and it will, therefore, be necessary to give a careful definition of the concept to avoid confusion. The notion of a kingdom in the sense of a community over which a king reigns is not the dominant concept. It is, rather, the rule of God which is uppermost. This, however, needs further definition in the light of the various uses of the term by Jesus. These uses may conveniently be grouped under two categories: those statements announcing a future kingdom and those announcing a present kingdom. The existence of these two aspects has created a real problem in interpretation. Many have considered them to be mutually exclusive and have, therefore, rejected one or the other of them.

The view that for Jesus the concept of the kingdom was wholly eschatological was strongly maintained by Johannes Weiss (Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, 2nd. ed. [1900]) and Albert Schweitzer (The Quest of the Historical Jesus [1910]), whose approach has come to be known as “consistent [i.e., thoroughgoing] eschatology.” (See ESCHATOLOGY.) According to this view, the APOCALYPTIC elements in the teaching of Jesus are the most important elements, and his mission is to be understood as wholly eschatological. Moreover, it is said that Jesus expected this eschatological event to take place in his lifetime. There have been many modifications of this eschatological view since Schweitzer’s interpretation, but there is still support for the basic presuppositions behind it. Thus for Rudolf Bultmann, Jesus is seen as an apocalyptic prophet who expected the imminent arrival of the kingdom (Theology of the New Testament, 2 vols. [1952], 1:22). A similar position is adopted by M. Werner (Formation of Christian Dogma [1957], 9–27) and R. H. Fuller (The Mission and Achievement of Jesus [1954], 25ff), who both maintain that Jesus’ teaching on the kingdom was eschatological.

A strong movement in reaction to this school of thought may be termed the noneschatological interpretation of the kingdom. This was the view taken by T. W. Manson (The Teachings of Jesus [1945]), who regarded the kingdom as coming in the experience of individuals. The kingdom is not eschatological, but present. It is God’s will being done here and now, supremely in the obedience of Jesus. The mission of Jesus was to lead others into a similar experience, and the mission of the church is to win the world for Christ. Since, when this is done, there will be no need for an eschatological consummation, the eschatological interpretation can be dispensed with.

Many others have taken up a similar view, such as F. C. Grant (The Gospel of the Kingdom [1946]) and J. W. Bowman (Prophetic Realism and the Gospel [1955]). The former of these considers that Jesus' kingdom teaching was a social gospel, while the latter propounds a theory of prophetic realism that conceives of the kingdom in terms of present personal relationships between God and human beings. But it is C. H. Dodd who has suggested the most thoroughgoing noneschatological view by his theory of "realized eschatology," by which he means that in Jesus' original teaching the kingdom had already arrived (cf. The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments, 2nd ed. [1944]). He finds his support for his theory in Paul's eschatology and in that of the fourth gospel. The apocalyptic language of Jesus is regarded as symbolic. Another advocate of noneschatological kingdom teaching was William Manson (Jesus the Messiah [1946]), who confined the kingdom to an inner consciousness in men and women.

Since both of these opposing views were obliged to explain away the alternative elements, they were equally unsatisfactory, and it is not surprising that various attempts have been made to find a synthesis between the present and future aspects of the kingdom. Such a synthesis has gained considerable support and would seem to be the most reasonable deduction from the evidence. The disparity between different interpreters is due to different ideas of how the kingdom is a present reality: (i) some maintain that the kingdom is present only in the person and acts of Jesus; (ii) others, that it is timeless and can therefore be present and future at the same time; (iii) still others, that the kingdom is essentially the powerful activity of God and is immediate, although the fullest consummation is future; (iv) still others, that the kingdom is essentially future, but is so near that its effects have spilled over into the present; (v) and yet others, that the kingdom must be understood existentially, in which case time ceases to have relevance for it.

It is impossible here to discuss these various views, but enough has been said to demonstrate the complexity of understanding precisely what Jesus meant when he spoke of the kingdom. At the same time, we shall not be amiss if we recognize that the teaching of Jesus cannot be understood unless room is made for both present and future aspects. Some attempt will now be made to summarize the main facets of this kingdom teaching.

(b) The kingdom as present. The more important sayings that set forth the present reality of the kingdom will first be enumerated. Luke records the saying, “the kingdom of God is in the midst of you” (Lk. 17:21 RSV; cf. NRSV, “among you”), which might alternatively be rendered “within [Gk. entos G1955] you” (cf. KJV, NIV). This statement appears to demand some present realization, whichever interpretation is followed. Another saying is one found in both Matt. 12:28 and Lk. 11:20, where Jesus refers to the EXORCISM of demons and adds, “If I drive out demons by the Spirit [Luke has ‘finger’] of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you.” Here the present reality of the kingdom is again unmistakable.

The nature of the present realization is seen as a triumph over evil agencies. When Jesus referred to violent or forceful people entering the kingdom (Matt. 11:11 – 12; Lk. 7:28), he was relating his statement to John the Baptist, and the words seem to mean that those who are now in the kingdom are greater than John, because he was before the kingdom. The enigmatic reference to people of violence taking the kingdom by force also draws attention to a present activity. Much discussion has surrounded the meaning of this verse. Some take the verb passively as meaning “to suffer violence,” while others regard it as middle voice and as meaning “to act violently.” The latter of these renderings is more probably correct and gives a more dynamic force to the statement. A fourth important passage testifying to the present reality of the kingdom is Matt. 21:31 (cf. Lk. 11:52), where Jesus states that tax collectors and prostitutes enter the kingdom before the chief priests and scribes.

(c) Aspects of the kingdom. Sufficient has been said to show that Jesus himself taught a present experience of the kingdom. But it is necessary to outline briefly in what that experience consists. G. E. Ladd (Jesus and the Kingdom [1964]) has focused attention on three aspects of this question, which will serve admirably as a summary of the teaching. The first is the kingdom as dynamic power. The concept here is of a spiritual conquest over spiritual forces. The many instances of exorcism in the Gospels are evidence of the dynamic power of Jesus over the spiritual adversaries. The binding of the strong man armed, in one of the parables of Jesus (Lk. 11:21 – 22), is symbolic of his ministry and of the present realization of the kingdom. In this connection the remark of Jesus when the Seventy returned from their mission of announcing the kingdom is significant, “I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven” (Lk. 10:18). The whole concept of the ministry is dynamic, consisting not only in words but also in healing deeds. The authority of Jesus in his teaching bears the mark of the present reality of his kingdom and differentiates it from the hopes of the scribes.

Second, it is important to note that in all his teaching Jesus made it clear that the kingdom is God’s, not man’s. The mission of Jesus was the mission of God in redemptive activity. Ladd brings into his considerations here the fact that God is a seeking, inviting, fatherly, and judging God. In other words, he deduces the nature of the kingdom from the nature of God. But as it is God’s kingdom, it differs from all other kingdom concepts. It is supernatural in character.

Third, the whole concept of salvation must be related to the present character of the kingdom. Ladd speaks here of the aspect of salvation which is present and links with this the gift God now gives to the members of the kingdom, namely, SALVATION and RIGHTEOUSNESS. This is an attempt to integrate the salvation teaching of Jesus with the kingdom concept. If the kingdom is central in Jesus’ teaching, then all other aspects of his teaching must be related to it.

Membership in the kingdom is, therefore, for those who receive God’s gift of salvation. This feature distinguishes it at once from any notions of a materialistic or nationalistic kingdom. It makes clear, moreover, that the kingdom will not be established by the converting of the world to the Christian faith. Jesus never foresaw a universal acceptance of the gospel, as the parable of the sower and the seeds shows. It is nevertheless a kingdom that could be the subject of prayer for its establishment, as is seen by the petition, “Your kingdom come,” in the Lord’s Prayer. The uttering of such a prayer expresses a desire for a fuller realization of what is already taking place. The constant emphasis on repentance and faith as prerequisites for approach to God demonstrates the essentially spiritual nature of the kingdom. More will be said later about the ethics of the kingdom.

(d) The eschatological event. This aspect of the kingdom is equally important and must be given full weight. It is undeniable that, in addition to viewing the kingdom as present, Jesus also looked toward a future event. These two aspects are complementary. In the eschatological discourse (Matt. 24; Mk. 13; Lk. 21), Jesus used apocalyptic imagery in such a way that some kind of catastrophic event in the future, in the eschaton, must be understood. The best way to incorporate both present and future aspects of the kingdom is by maintaining that the same kingdom, which at present exists in a dynamic form in the activity of God among men, will receive its consummation in an event at the end of history. These two aspects are brought into close proximity in the kingdom parables, which must next be considered.

(e) The parables of the kingdom. First, they illustrate the growth of the kingdom. It will not be established by irresistible power, but by action akin to the growth of seed. The most evident feature here is the fact that only one of the four types of soil mentioned in the parable of the sower is productive. There is a considerable element of mystery about the kingdom, a mystery given only to some to understand. The unexpected character of the kingdom is illustrated by the parable of the tares, where the distinction between the true and the false was not at once apparent. Indeed, separation will not take place until the eschaton. The kingdom in its present state cannot, therefore, be considered as an identifiable entity.

The same quality of unexpectedness is seen in the parable of the mustard seed. Smallness is difficult to reconcile with the divine kingdom, but there is a marked contrast between its beginnings and its end state. This is the main point of the parable. The present is related to the future as the mustard seed to the tree. Jesus' contemporaries could see only the seed, but he looked beyond to the further demonstration of the kingdom.

A similar truth is taught in the parable of the leaven, where the imperceptibility of the operation of the kingdom is in mind. Some problem exists over the fact that the whole lump of dough is leavened, which has sometimes been regarded as illustrating the permeation of evil within the church and sometimes of the permeation of good in the world through the church. But neither interpretation is as probable as that which sees the ultimate triumph of the kingdom at the consummation of the existing world order.

Two parables, the treasure and the pearl, draw attention to the value of the kingdom. It does not appear worthwhile to all, but those who are discerning will recognize its inestimable worth, exceeding all other values. On the other hand, the parable of the net reminds the hearer that, for the time being, some who are not fit for it will share in the benefits of the kingdom until its final establishment.

That the kingdom of God is not to be restricted to Jews is clear from the parable of the vineyard, which was addressed to the Jewish leaders and which concluded with the statement, "the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people that will produce its fruit" (Matt. 21:43). This aspect of universality of the kingdom is also found elsewhere (Matt. 8:11 – 12). In both these passages the Jews receive the offer of the kingdom before the Gentiles. The kingdom applies not only to all nationalities, but to all classes within nations (cf. Matt. 12:31). This latter thought comes in the application of the parable of the two sons, which stresses the need for repentance and faith. The parable of the marriage feast in Matt. 22 shows the fate of those who scorn or ignore the summons of the kingdom. This passage once again seems to point to the rejection of the kingdom by the Jewish people and differentiates the kingdom of God from their nationalistic concepts.

It remains to note the relationship of the kingdom to the CHURCH. Many exegetes have identified the two, but this is difficult for several reasons. Nowhere does Jesus describe his disciples exclusively as members of the kingdom. Moreover, the church appears to have arisen out of the kingdom. It is the church's task to witness to the kingdom, and the church is the instrument and custodian of the kingdom. Ladd maintains that they are separate concepts, one taking its point of departure from God, the other from his people (Jesus and the Kingdom, 258–73).

(f) The ethics of the kingdom. The problem of the ETHICS OF JESUS is important in this context. No survey of the teaching of Jesus can in fact ignore the predominant place that ethical injunctions have in the total sayings of Jesus. Yet it is the ethical teaching that has been most paralleled in Jewish ethical sayings and instructions, and this raises the problem of the extent to which the ethics of Jesus can be considered unique. Even though many of the individual sayings of Jesus may be paralleled, the overall impression of the Jewish ethical teaching is “legalistic,” whereas the teaching of Jesus breathes a different atmosphere. It is no longer conformity to law, whether written or oral, but the pursuance of the will of God understood as the norm for the kingdom of God.

Our purpose is only to draw attention to the salient features of the ethics of Jesus in relation to the kingdom teaching. The first characteristic is that the authority for the ethics rests in the authority of Jesus who rejected several scribal interpretations of the law and modified the whole approach to ceremonial observances. The basis of Jesus' own authority for ethics was his claim to fulfill perfectly the will of God. Second, it is noted that the ethical teaching is an essential feature of both the present and future aspects of the kingdom. Where God's rule is active, that rule must find expression in behavior that befits the character of God. This is essentially the religious sanction in Christian ethics. It is not the sole sanction, for the eschatological aspect is equally important. There is no support for excluding either, and such a one-sided view as Schweitzer's Interimsethik (the ethic of Jesus was intended to be only temporary) must be rejected.

What Jesus taught was of more than passing significance. It possessed eternal validity and is as relevant to the present age as to the future. This does not mean that there are no difficulties in fulfilling the ethical demands. To love one's neighbor as oneself and, even more, to love one's enemies makes absolute demands upon any person. There can be no denying that these demands are an expression of divine love.

One special facet of the ethics of Jesus is the emphasis on inner motives. Such things as anger, hatred, restraint, humility, cannot be judged by external law. They belong not to adherence to a code of rules, but to the manifestation of character (cf. Lk. 6:45). The demands of Jesus are exacting—even careless words will have to be accounted for (Matt. 12:36). Moreover, the claims of the kingdom are such that they must at times take precedence over family ties (cf. Matt. 10:34 – 39; Lk. 9:60 – 61). Indeed the ethic of Jesus involves self-denial (Matt. 16:24), which means that the claims of the kingdom must take precedence even over the claims of self. There is no other ethical system that demands the negation of the existing order to such an extent as to require the hating of one's own life (Lk. 14:26). Self ceases to matter. The affairs of the kingdom are of paramount importance.

It is extraordinary how much is said about rewards in the teaching of Jesus (cf. Matt. 5:12, 46; 6:4, 18; 18:1 – 4). The idea of return for merit was conspicuous in the theology of the Jews, but Jesus' teaching goes beyond it. The parable about the laborers in the vineyard admirably illustrates this point (20:1 – 10). The first group of laborers worked a whole day for a day's pay; that was merit. The last group worked only an hour for a day's pay; that was an act of grace. The basis of rewards in the ethics of Jesus is wholly different from normal human reckoning. The citizens of his kingdom must be prepared for new standards.

3. Jesus' testimony concerning himself. The evidence from the teaching of Jesus regarding his own person may be conveniently summarized under two main classifications: the names he applied to himself and the specific references to his person. Under the first heading it is important to distinguish those names he applied to himself from those applied to him by others. See also CHRISTOLOGY.

(a) The names that Jesus used of himself. The most widely used was SON OF MAN and it will be well to begin with this title, especially as in the Gospels it is found only on the lips of Jesus. A considerable amount of literature has gathered around his use of the term in an endeavor to discover what he meant by it, but it will be possible here to give only a brief survey of the major considerations. The different interpreters may be classified in two groups, those who hold that Jesus himself used the title and those who reject such a view. Clearly if the latter group is correct, the Son of Man passages do not belong to the teaching of Jesus and should not be further considered for our immediate purpose. It is necessary, therefore, to comment on this point of view before proceeding to outline the self-testimony of Jesus.

On what grounds are the Son of Man sayings regarded either as inauthentic or else interpreted of someone other than Jesus himself? First, to take the view that most of the sayings are not authentic, mention may be made of P. Vielhauer, who rejects those sayings about the Son of Man's earthly work and those about his sufferings, and deals only with those referring to his glory. But even these he denies to Jesus because of the lack of connection between the kingdom of God and the Son of Man sayings. His deduction is that since one of these (the kingdom) is authentic, the other cannot be, but apart from the fact that this appears to be a non sequitur, the preservation of both lines of tradition in the Gospels, without any apparent incongruity, militates against his view (H. E. Todt fully discusses it in Der Menschensohn in der synoptischen Überlieferung [1959], 298 – 316). Bultmann (Theology of the New Testament, 1:29) considered the Son of Man passion sayings as vaticinia ex eventu (i.e., prophecies fabricated by the church based on past events) but without adequate basis. A comparison of the three passion predictions (cf. Matt. 16:21; 17:22 – 23; 20:18 – 19) shows that the evangelists had no doubt that Jesus intended the Son of Man to be understood as himself. It will not do to regard these sayings as community creations, for in that case the use of the title becomes doubly unintelligible.

There are many advocates for the view that Jesus used the term Son of Man, but that it was the church which identified him with the title (cf. Todt, Der Menschensohn, and A.J. B. Higgins, Jesus and the Son of Man [1964]). It is impossible for our present purpose to discuss the detailed evidence on the grounds of which it is maintained that Jesus did not use the title of himself, but the following survey will proceed on the assumption that Jesus meant to call himself Son of Man (cf. O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament [1959]).

It will be convenient to group the sayings according to the classification already mentioned. First to be considered are the sayings connected with the earthly work of Jesus. Mark records two such sayings (Mk. 2:10 on the authority to forgive sins; 2:27 on the lordship of the Sabbath). Matthew and Luke share four such sayings (Matt. 5:11; 8:20; 11:19; 12:32; Lk. 6:22; 7:34; 9:58; 12:10). Luke alone has one (Lk. 19:10) and Matthew alone has two (Matt. 13:37; 16:13). On the most straightforward understanding of these passages it is inescapable that Jesus intends himself to be understood as the Son of Man. Two of them (Mk. 2:10, 27) attribute to him special authority. It is God who is generally spoken of as forgiving sins and it is God who ordained the Sabbath. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Jesus was making a high claim for himself, unless these passages are regarded as not originating in Jesus (Higgins, for instance, sees them as community products).

In the four shared by Matthew and Luke it appears equally clear that Jesus is referring to himself. Men will hate the disciples on account of Jesus. The Son of Man is contrasted with John the Baptist in such a way that the title must be understood of Jesus himself. Moreover, the Son of Man is described as having nowhere to lay his head, which fact relates to Jesus' own itinerant ministry. And while blasphemy against the Holy Spirit cannot be forgiven, blasphemy against the Son of Man can be. All of these instances are intelligible if Jesus is describing himself, although it still needs to be examined why he chose to use this title rather than the simple "I." A comparison of Matt. 16:13 with Mk. 8:27 shows how both forms have been preserved for the same question. Matthew has, "Who do people say the Son of Man is?" whereas Mark has, "Who do people say that I am?" Since in both narratives Peter confesses Christ in the same form of words, "You are the Christ," the conclusion is inescapable that the disciples understood Jesus to mean himself.

Of the sayings connected with the sufferings of Jesus most are in Mark and are shared by the other synoptists (cf. Mk. 8:31; 9:12, 31; 10:33 – 34, 45; 14:21, 41; cf. also Lk. 17:25; 22:48; 24:7; and Matt. 26:2). These statements show that as Jesus anticipated his passion, he made increasing use of the title. Its meaning for him was inextricably bound up with his work of redemption.

The third group of sayings all have an eschatological emphasis and in this case there are more in Matthew than in Mark (cf. Mk. 8:38; 9:9; 13:26; 14:62; in Luke, with parallels in Matthew, Lk. 1:30; 12:8, 40; 17:24, 26; in Luke alone, 17:22, 30; 18:8b; 21:36; in Matthew alone, Matt. 10:23; 13:41; 16:27, 28; 19:28; 24:30, 39b; 25:31). There is clearly a strong tradition behind these sayings and some are inclined to accept an authenticity for them which they deny for the other groups. But it is difficult to maintain that Jesus reserved the title for his part in eschatological events and for no other purpose. This would have meaning only if the title had an accepted eschatological significance. But the sayings themselves gain in meaning if Jesus used the title in connection with his earthly work as well as for his future heavenly functions.

The two main aspects in the use of the title are therefore suffering and glory, and there is much to be said for the view that the title is a synthesis of the suffering servant of Isaiah and of the "son of man" in Dan. 7:13 – 14. This view led T.W. Manson (The Teaching of Jesus [1931], 211ff., and The Servant Messiah [1953], 72 – 74) to regard the title as corporate, supposing that Jesus was including his disciples in it. But it is difficult to believe that the disciples or any others would have understood it in this sense. It makes little difference what the antecedents of the title were unless they were recognized by Jesus' contemporaries. A distinction must, however, be made between what Jesus himself meant by it and what the disciples and others understood by it. It may be regarded as an Aramaic expression meaning either man in general or man in particular. The latter seems the only reasonable proposition of the two. It may be that at least to the disciples Jesus was The Man par excellence. But for himself the title no doubt carried far deeper significance. He probably chose it as the most suitable alternative to the title "Messiah," which he avoided for political reasons.

The titles Son of David, Son of God, and Messiah, although used of him by others, were not used specifically by Jesus himself. They do not therefore enter into the present discussion. Yet attention must be drawn to the fact that Jesus did implicitly accept them. In the case of his Sonship, his teaching in John's gospel is full of references to his filial relationship with God. The title Son of God is therefore seen to be highly applicable to express that relationship.

(b) Other indications. What other evidence is there in the Gospels regarding Jesus' view of himself? There is more to assist here in John's gospel than in the synoptics. Jesus frequently speaks of himself as being sent. He is deeply conscious of his mission to do the Father's will (e.g., Jn. 5:17).

He knows that he is sent for a specific purpose that no one else can fulfill. His testimony to himself comes out vividly in the great “I am” statements in this gospel. “I am the way and the truth and the life” (14:6) is a unique claim. The same may be said of “I am the resurrection and the life” (11:25). No less far-reaching is his claim to be the light of the world (8:12), which could hardly be more comprehensive and universal.

It is difficult to escape the conclusion that in the mind of Jesus there was a connection with the great I AM as the name of Yahweh in the OT (see GOD, NAMES OF), particularly in view of the statement of Jn. 8:58, “Before Abraham was born, I am!” In the Synoptic Gospels, the saying of Jesus nearest to the Johannine evidence is found in Matt. 11:27, which is a clear claim to uniqueness of filial relationship (but see also the accounts of Jesus’ baptism). Yet there are also hints in all the Gospels, but especially in John, that Jesus was conscious of human limitations. He knew hunger and thirst and the need for sleep and rest. He could express human anger and show compassion. He needed prayer to sustain him. But the human side, as we should expect, comes out more clearly in his actions than in his teaching.

4. The teaching about the work of Christ. The mission of Jesus was many-sided, but his special work was concerned with the significance of the passion. This forms the focal point of the gospel narratives, and all that precedes it must be interpreted in the light of it. The kingdom teaching, for instance, is seen in its true perspective only in the light of the cross.

Before examining the statements of Jesus relating to his own work, there are some preliminary observations that must be made. There is no doubt, to begin with, that Jesus regarded his mission as a direct fulfillment of Scripture. He stated his purpose to be the fulfillment of the law (Matt. 5:17). In the upper room, after the reference to the betrayal, Jesus added, “The Son of Man will go just as it is written of him” (Matt. 26:24), a clear allusion to the coming passion. After the transfiguration, Mark records a question of Jesus, “Why then is it written that the Son of Man must suffer much and be rejected?” (Mk. 9:12). Other references add support to the view that Jesus was deeply aware that his own experience was the subject of prophecy (cf. Matt. 26:56; Lk. 18:31; 24:25 – 27, 44 – 45).

It has sometimes been supposed that in John’s gospel a different account of the work of Jesus is found as compared with the synoptics. One such view is that it is the incarnation rather than the passion which is the basis of redemption. This interpretation is supported from Jn. 6:53, where Jesus says, “unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you” (cf. also 6:56). But if this text is intended to relate to the incarnation it would need to be understood in a quasi-physical way. It is more in harmony with the general tenor of the teaching in the passage to understand it in a spiritual manner. Another view is that redemption is by illumination, and for this an appeal is made to such passages as 8:12 (“I am the light of the world”), 17:17 (“Sanctify them by the truth: your word is truth”), 14:9 (“Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father”). It is undeniable that there has been an effective illumination of the mind as a result of the coming of Jesus, but it would rob the mission of Jesus of its primary purpose if it were restricted to an educative process. As an examination of the evidence will show, the death of Christ is plainly presented in the fourth gospel as the object of the incarnation.

(a) His death as a sacrificial offering. There is much evidence for this aspect of the passion of Christ. In addition to the statement in Jn. 6 cited above, which makes it clear that Jesus conceived of his flesh and blood as having been given for the life of the world, the most important evidence comes from the words used in the institution of the LORD’S SUPPER. The institution must be seen against an OT background. Jesus describes his blood as connected with the new covenant and as being “poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins” (Matt. 26:28; see COVENANT, THE NEW). There can be no doubt that Jesus intended his disciples to understand that his death would result in remission of sins. The connection of this act with the sacrificial system of the old covenant seems impossible to deny. Some have treated this evidence with reserve, because the words “for the forgiveness of sins” occur only in Matthew, but they are so fully in harmony with the whole teaching of Jesus that they cannot reasonably be disputed on those grounds. Two of the sayings of Jesus in John’s gospel emphasize the finality of his work (Jn. 17:4; 19:30). The latter of these statements, coming as it does direct from the cross, shows that the death itself was viewed as an accomplishment.

(b) His death was voluntary. Jesus not only states that the good shepherd gives his life for his sheep (Jn. 10:11), but that he himself lays down his life of his own accord (10:18). He maintained that Pilate had no power over him except as it was granted from above (19:10 – 11). He made clear that no love is greater than that which sacrifices life for the sake of friends (15:13). In his gospel, John seems to be particularly concerned to show this aspect of the voluntary self-giving of Jesus.

(c) His death was a divine necessity. In the fourth gospel there is a developing sense of the inevitable character of the passion, described as the “hour” (NIV, “time”). Several times John mentions that his hour is not yet, until Jesus himself says, “Father, the time has come” (Jn. 17:1). This sense of divine necessity is seen in the first prediction of the passion in Matt. 16:21, “From that time on Jesus began to explain to his disciples that he must [Gk. dei] go to Jerusalem...be killed and on the third day be raised to life.” Compare also the angel’s reminder of Jesus’ words to the women at the tomb (Lk. 24:7). The same idea is found in Jn. 3:14, “the Son of Man must be lifted up.” In all the Gospels the death of Christ is seen as the climax to the mission of Jesus. There is no indication that it happened by accident. It was all part of a divine plan.

(d) His death was substitutionary. When Jesus identified himself with those who attended the baptism of John and when John hesitated at the thought of baptizing Jesus (according to Matt. 3:14), Jesus said that he requested baptism because it was fitting for him to fulfill all righteousness. Although he needed no repentance, he became one with those who did. In Lk. 22:37 (“he was numbered with the transgressors”), Jesus appeals to Isa. 53:12 as fulfilled in himself, which suggests that he regarded himself in the role of the suffering servant.

There is one statement of Jesus that suggests the idea of substitution, for it uses the Greek word anti G505, which can often be rendered “in the place of.” It occurs in Mk. 10:45 (cf. Matt. 20:28), where Jesus says that the Son of Man came “to give his life as a ransom for [anti] many.” The word ransom (lytron G3389) means “an equivalent exchange price,” and while the imagery used cannot be pressed, the idea that the Son of Man did something in the stead of others is inescapable. There are, in addition, passages where a different preposition is used, but where the context suggests substitution. For instance, in the words of institution of the Lord’s Supper (Matt. 26:28, “poured out for many”), the preposition is peri G4309; while in the statement by Jesus that the good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep (Jn. 10:15), hyper G5642 is used. Some scholars (e.g., Vincent Taylor) interpret these prepositions as expressing representation rather than substitution, but neither of these ideas does full justice to the meaning.

(e) His death was a triumph over the devil. When the conflict of the passion became imminent and Judas had already betrayed his Master with a kiss, Jesus conceded to those who arrested him, “this is your hour—when darkness reigns” (Lk. 22:53). Moreover, when Jesus referred to his death in the figure of a grain of wheat falling to the ground (Jn. 12:23), he went on to announce, “Now is the time for judgment on this world; now the prince of this world will be driven out” (12:31). He must have had something of this intense spiritual conflict in mind in his parable of the strong man who needed first to be bound before his goods could be seized (Matt. 12:29). In a strong denunciation of Herod, Jesus told the Pharisees, “Go tell that fox, ‘I will drive out demons and heal people today and tomorrow, and on the third day I will reach my goal’” (Lk. 13:32).

(f) His death is applicable only through repentance and faith. At the commencement of his ministry, Jesus preached the imminence of the kingdom and exhorted his hearers to repent and believe the gospel (Mk. 1:14, 15). That gospel involved the whole of his mission, which centered on his death. His mission was never designed for righteous people, but for sinners willing to repent (Matt. 9:12 – 13; Mk. 2:17; Lk. 5:31 – 32). There are many allusions to faith in the teaching of Jesus, and it is clear that he conceived of no other means by which the benefits of his work might be appropriated (cf. Jn. 3:16; 5:24; 6:29). One of the immediate results for those who come to Jesus in response to his invitation and join themselves to his mission is that they find spiritual rest (Matt. 11:28). There can be no doubt that Jesus desired a radical change to be effected in the lives of those who followed him on the basis of his mission.

5. The teaching about the Holy Spirit. The Synoptic Gospels have considerably less teaching about the HOLY SPIRIT than John’s gospel, but there are nevertheless some significant statements. Jesus makes clear his own consciousness of the Spirit’s part in his mission. In Matt. 12:28 he says, “But if I drive out demons by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God has come upon you.” It is true that in the parallel passage in Luke, “the Spirit of God” is replaced by “the finger of God,” but there can be no doubt that this alternative must be interpreted in the light of Matthew’s text. Particularly is this necessary since the statement comes within the context of the Beelzebub controversy (see below). Here then is the claim that Jesus’ activity in the spiritual realm is by the Spirit of God. When at the commencement of his ministry Jesus applied the prophecy of Isa. 61:1 – 2 to himself (Lk. 4:17 – 21), it was evidence of his own specific claim to the Spirit’s power. This was no doubt closely linked in the mind of Jesus with the descent of the Spirit on the occasion of his baptism and also his consciousness of being led by the Spirit to the place of temptation.

The blasphemy saying, which occurs in all three Synoptic Gospels, is an important evidence of Jesus’ teaching about the Holy Spirit. The occasion was the charge that Jesus cast out demons by Beelzebub, the prince of the demons. Jesus in reply not only shows the impossibility of Satan casting out Satan, but also shows the true nature of the charge as a blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. This is unforgivable, although blasphemy against Jesus himself as Son of Man (according to Matthew and Luke) may be forgiven. In no more striking way could he have brought out the sovereign character of the Spirit’s work. Jesus recognized that the kind of obduracy that could attribute such beneficial results of the Spirit’s work to evil agencies was beyond forgiveness. See UNPARDONABLE SIN.

Another aspect of the teaching of Jesus regarding the Spirit is the promise of the Spirit’s guidance when the disciples have to answer for their faith (Matt. 10:19 – 20; Mk. 13:11). In Mark’s account it occurs in the eschatological discourse, whereas in Matthew’s it is in the instruction given prior to the mission of the Twelve, but it is the kind of assurance that may well have been repeated several times. Luke has a similar statement placed in yet a different context (Lk. 12:11 – 12). In Lk. 11:13 the Spirit is promised to those who ask the heavenly Father, and it is significant that Matthew records a parallel statement in which the promise is for “good things.” Luke’s account may be interpretive, but Jesus’ meaning may certainly have included this aspect of the gift of the Spirit. It seems a fair interpretation that by the gift of the Spirit is to be understood the source of all “good things” which the Father is willing to bestow. Yet another comment of Jesus that illuminates the work of the Spirit is found in Mk. 12:36, where Jesus attributes to the INSPIRATION of the Spirit the statement of David in Ps. 110:1. In this Jesus shows himself to be in line with contemporary Jewish views of inspiration.

The evidence from the fourth gospel falls naturally into two parts, the sayings before the passion narratives and the sayings within these narratives. In the discourse with Nicodemus the Spirit is shown as the agent of REGENERATION (Jn. 3:5 – 6). Without his activity there can be no rebirth. Whether or not there is in this chapter a reference to Christian baptism is a matter of debate, but it does not affect the essential work of the Spirit in spiritual renewal. In the same discourse in Jn. 3, Jesus makes it clear that God does not give the Spirit by measure (v. 34), which suggests an unlimited gift. In the conversation with the Samaritan woman, Jesus speaks of the spiritual nature of God and the need for his worshipers to worship in spirit and in truth (4:24), and there must be seen here an allusion to the work of the Holy Spirit.

At the Feast of Tabernacles Jesus promised that rivers of living waters should flow from those who come to him, and John adds the comment that Jesus was referring to the Spirit. Although this is an editorial note, it is valuable as an interpretation of the imagery that Jesus used (cf. Jn. 7:37 – 39).

It is in the farewell discourses in the upper room that the teaching about the Spirit becomes more explicit. There are several sayings in which the Spirit is described as the PARACLETE, which is better rendered Counselor, since the latter involves the functions of both advocate and helper (though the intercessory function, which might be suggested by “advocate,” is lacking). The passages are Jn. 14:16 – 17, 25 – 26; 15:26; 16:7 – 11, 13 – 15. In three of these passages (14:16; 15:26; 16:13) the Spirit is named as the Spirit of truth; in the first two of them, in conjunction with the word Paraclete. A summary of the function of the Holy Spirit must include the following: (a) in relation to the church, he calls to remembrance and acts as guide into the truth; (b) in relation to the world, he convicts of sin and brings recognition of the Tightness of judgment. From these functions it may be deduced that the Paraclete was to continue the work of Jesus on earth. He was to be the alter ego of Christ. The witness of the Spirit was to be essentially the same as the witness of Christ, with the obvious further development that the Spirit would testify to the risen Christ.

The other mention of the Spirit in the teaching of Jesus occurs when he breathes upon the disciples and says, “Receive the Holy Spirit” (Jn. 20:22). Here it is the risen Christ who speaks and shows again the close connection between the Spirit's work and his own. The gift of the Spirit was to be given at PENTECOST, but here Jesus gives his own sanction to what may be regarded as a foretaste of that event. The power to forgive and to retain sins is granted at the same time (20:23) and cannot be divorced from the activity of the Spirit. It is not incongruous with the fact that God alone forgives sins, for Jesus himself did not hesitate to pronounce forgiveness, and the same sovereign power is vested in the Spirit and then mediately through those possessing the Spirit.

VII. The miracles of Jesus. Separate consideration is here given to the MIRACLES of Jesus because of their importance for a right understanding of his mission. The approach of many toward the gospel narratives is governed by their prior approach to the miracles. It is essential therefore to discuss something of their validity and character before examining their purpose.

A. The validity of miracles

1. Various approaches to Jesus' miracles. No one looking at the life of Jesus Christ can proceed far without being required to come to terms with his miracles. There are philosophical and scientific problems that at once arise, as a result of which many conclude for the impossibility of miracles. It is not in place here to debate this issue, but no serious investigation of the life of Jesus can pass it by. It naturally follows that those who adopt the position that miracles do not happen are obliged to explain away the miraculous elements in the gospel narratives. During the period of 19th-cent. criticism, as pointed out earlier, either the miracles were rationalized and retained in the narrative or else they were discounted and consequently ignored. There is no denying that the presence of these miraculous elements was a considerable embarrassment.

During the 20th cent. however, there was much recession of scientific skepticism regarding the possibility of miracles, although the discounting of the miracles as data for a reconstruction of the historical Jesus is still a powerful movement. Those of the Bultmann school of thought who challenge the Jesus of history find no difficulty over the miracles, for the miracle stories are considered to be creations of the primitive communities. But it should be noted that the dispensing with the miraculous in this case is part of the essentially a priori position of this school and does not follow from a detailed consideration of the evidence. Some who have passionately believed in the historical Jesus, as the classical liberal schools did (late 1800s and early 1900s), have attempted to produce lives of Jesus that lack the miraculous element, but these have more the appearance of what their authors wanted to see as the historical Jesus rather than what corresponds to historical facts. The miracles of Jesus are too baffling for those who wish to reduce everything to the level of their own experience.

The fact is that miracles are deeply imprinted on the records of the Gospels, and it seems reasonable to consider them as an essential part of the overall presentation of Jesus. The problem whether they may be regarded as actual happenings or whether they have been modified or even created in course of the transmission of the traditions is a relevant one and will be considered in the course of the general comments below.

2. The classification of miracles. The various miracles that are attributed to Jesus may be placed into one of two categories, healing miracles and nature miracles. The distinction is important because less difficulty is thought to attach to many of the healing miracles than to the nature miracles, mainly because they are more open to medical explanation.

Among the healing miracles a further classification has been suggested between cases of nervous disorders and other cases, because for the former modern science has methods of bringing relief that were unknown to the time of Jesus. Some conditions related in the Gospels may certainly be cases where mind has dominated over matter and where the greater mind of Jesus brought physical relief. Such an explanation may be the right one in some instances, but Jesus in his miracles was infinitely more than a great psychologist or psychiatrist. Those cases in which he concerned himself with the sin of those who were healed shows that his main concern was spiritual. At the same time, what power the modern psychologist has is but a pale reflection of the competence Jesus showed when dealing with nervous disorders.

Moreover, Jesus certainly performed some healing miracles that cannot be regarded as cases with which modern medical science could deal to bring about a similar result. A withered hand cannot be restored, nor can dead people be brought back to life after an interval of time. There is a considerable element of the inexplicable in the miracles attributed to Jesus, which in the end must either be accepted or rejected. The issue really rests on the question, "Was Jesus the kind of person who might reasonably be expected to do the inexplicable?" An attempt will be made below to give adequate reasons for an affirmative answer to this question, but before doing so some comments are necessary on the nature miracles.

Among these miracles the most notable are the draught of fishes (Lk. 5:1 – 11; cf. Jn. 21:1 – 11), the stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:26; Mk. 4:37 – 39; Lk. 8:22 – 24), and the feeding of the 5,000 (Matt. 14:15 – 21; Mk. 6:35 – 44; Lk. 9:12 – 17; Jn. 6:5 – 13). The last miracle is the only one that appears in all four Gospels, a fact which fixes special attention upon it. This miracle appears to involve the operation of forces that are quite different from natural processes, while the other two are instances of control over such processes. Leaving aside for the moment the question of the purpose of these miracles in the mind of Jesus, the impact of them on the observers is beyond doubt. As a result of the draught of fishes Peter becomes overwhelmed with a sense of sinfulness, while all were afraid after the storm had abated at Jesus' command.

3. The characteristics of the gospel miracles. Form critics have pointed out that the healing miracle stories conform to a pattern, since they contain a description of the condition, followed generally by some indication that the person desired to be healed, with some evidence of faith on the part of the healed, and this is then followed by an account of the healing, usually with some comment on the result. It is not surprising that most healing stories follow a similar pattern. But it is significant that the part played by faith is often stressed in the synoptics, although it is not mentioned in every case. The ten lepers' cry for mercy was evidently regarded as evidence of a sufficient faith-relationship (Lk. 17:11 – 19), for Jesus at once proceeded to heal them. The faith element marks out Jesus as distinct from a mere wonder-worker whose actions are directed toward drawing attention to himself. That the healing miracles depended on a relationship of trust is evident from the Gospels, and in this respect the miracles themselves are valuable evidence that Jesus was the kind of person who elicited trust from others.

The faith-element is not brought to the fore to the same extent in the fourth gospel, but it is by no means absent. The characteristic feature in this gospel is the use of the word SIGN, which draws attention to the spiritual significance behind the event. More will be said on this when the purpose of the miracles is discussed, but it is again clear that none of these miracles was performed for its own sake. Throughout the accounts there is a marked restraint, and indeed on many occasions, silence regarding a healing is specifically enjoined.

4. Principles of verification. Due to the various source theories that have been propounded, there has been a tendency to differentiate between the miracle stories on the basis of the number of witnesses attesting to any individual incident. Thus those in three or four of the Gospels are regarded as superior to those which appear in only one or two. In this way such miracles as the coin in the fish's mouth (Matt. 17:24 – 25) or the mass raisings from the tombs (27:52 – 53) are regarded as inferior. But the criterion used is not a good one, for a single witness may be as reliable as two or three. If the testimony of one witness becomes suspect in comparison with others this is a different matter, but in the instances cited this is not proved. Matthew does not heighten the miraculous when relating events also recorded by others, and in view of this there is no reason to expect that he will do so when recording unique material.

It must be assumed that all the miracles that have been preserved in the gospel tradition were evidently regarded as equally authentic. All that the modern scholar can do is to examine each individually with a view to ascertaining its probability, but this quest may be futile, since probability will depend on a prior concept of the power of Jesus. Thus this whole question of probability deserves further examination.

5. The probability of the miracles. As mentioned at the commencement of this section on miracles, probability may be decided on philosophical or scientific grounds. If this results in a negative conclusion, no specific discussion of the miracles of Jesus will be valid. But another and more satisfactory method, which does not in itself exclude philosophical and scientific considerations, is to view the whole matter historically and theologically. The first stage is the gospel accounts, for these testify to the strong belief on the part of the evangelists, and presumably also on the part of the early church as a whole, that Jesus performed such miracles. This fact raises the question of the origin of such a firm faith. If Jesus had performed no works of this character, it is difficult to believe that in such a comparatively short period so many remarkable works would have been attributed to him. Some argue that the early Christians created stories out of the impetus of their new-found faith in Jesus Christ, but it is incredible that they would have created them ex nihilo. The fact that they found nothing incongruous between the gospel account of the miracles and their view of Jesus suggests that their high regard for him had some basis in historical fact. The church's Easter faith presupposed that the historical Jesus was capable of performing miracles.

This leads to what is probably the most important consideration in any approach to miracles: the relevance of the RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST for the inquiry. Christianity itself rests on a stupendous miracle—the raising of Christ from the dead—and it may reasonably be maintained that, if God raised Christ from the dead, the other miracles present no difficulty. The force of this position is naturally lost on those who regard the resurrection not as historical but as having taken place in the experience of believers (as Bultmann). If the remarkable emergence of the Christian faith in the form of a personal faith in the risen Christ is to be explained at all, it demands some explanation that adequately accounts for the totally unexpected transformation in the first Christian disciples. The actual resurrection of Christ as an objective and verifiable reality, testified to by innumerable eyewitnesses, is alone sufficient. Moreover, the evidences for the appearances of the risen Christ are so well attested that they cannot be explained away without doing injustice to the witnesses' testimony.

Granted, therefore, that the resurrection of Jesus must be regarded as an integral part of the Christian faith, it is difficult to see how lesser miracles could be treated as incongruous, unless they were out of keeping with what the Gospels record about the risen Christ. But this is not true. It may be safely claimed that there is not one of the miracles which could not be conceived of as the work of Jesus. There is a complete absence of the tendency, seen all too vividly in the later church, to embellish miracle stories with fantastic details.

A further consideration is the evidence from the temptation of Jesus, which shows his general approach to the miraculous. It is clear that self-interest was at once rejected as an unworthy motive for the performing of miracles. This is clear from the refusal to provide bread from stones, although there is an implicit assumption that Jesus had power to do so; otherwise the temptation would have been entirely unreal. Moreover, the suggestion that Jesus should throw himself from the pinnacle of the temple was equally refused because he did not accept the principle that miraculous power should be used for self-display. If the miracle stories are approached through the temptation narrative, the motives behind them will not be misconstrued.

Following this reference to the temptation, some mention must be made of the various instances of exorcisms in the Gospels, for they show the close connection between many of the healing miracles and the spirit world. Some of the conditions described in the Gospels may now be described in psychiatric terminology, but this does not explain away the spiritual conflict involved. Exorcism forms an important aspect of the ministry of the church, and it is inconceivable that Jesus regarded his own exorcisms as anything other than evidence of his power over the enemy. It should be noted, however, that the cases of demon possession which are recorded are not cases of excessive wickedness in the individual possessed.

The characteristic features of the condition of those possessed must have presented Jesus with a constant challenge. A primitive church, which believed that Jesus in his death and resurrection had vanquished the power of evil, would find no difficulty in the cases of exorcisms in the Gospels. It would have been more surprising if such cases had been lacking.

B. The purpose of the miracles. It is to the Gospel of John that we must turn for a statement of the evangelist's purpose in including the "signs" of Jesus. He says it is that his readers might "believe that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God" (Jn. 20:30 – 31), but it is relevant to inquire whether Jesus himself had a similar view. It is at once noticeable that he does not describe his own works as signs, but he does, according to John, urge his hearers to believe his works if they cannot believe his words (10:38). Did he then regard his miracles as didactic, as designed to impart some spiritual truth? Some scholars have argued this point to such an extent as to suggest that some of the stories were first parables, which in course of transmission have been transformed into miracles. The withering of the fig tree has been cited as an example. But even if a miracle performs the function of a parable, one need not infer that this function accounts for its origin. In many of the events recorded some spiritual lessons are discernible, and it seems reasonable to suppose that this was part of the purpose of Jesus. The stilling of the storm, for instance, drew attention to the poverty of the disciples' faith.

Do the miracles have any bearing upon the messianic claims of Jesus? Whatever the general expectancy that the coming Messiah would perform signs, the Gospels do not give the impression that Jesus intended observers to deduce from his miracles evidence of his messianic office. Indeed, the temptation narrative would seem to be against any display. Miracles may be regarded as corroborating evidence for Christians who had already come to identify the risen Christ with the long-awaited Jewish Messiah, but this factor does not appear to be a main motive for the miracles. One motive that is much stressed in the synoptics is compassion. The healing miracles were often performed when a person's need awoke compassion in the Healer, and this element draws attention to the intensely human aspect of many of the miracles. That Jesus was frequently most concerned with this aspect is seen from the fact that silence was sometimes immediately enjoined. A few acts of compassion could otherwise easily have grown into a mass ministry of healing, which Jesus clearly avoided, because it would deflect him from his main redemptive purpose.

The most important thing about the miracles is what one learns from them about Jesus himself. The element of restraint is self-evident. The miracles are samples of a power that belonged to the nature of Jesus, and his refraining from using that power is on occasions more eloquent than its use. He could have commanded more than twelve legions of angels to come to his aid (Matt. 26:53), but this exercise of power would have run counter to the purpose of his mission. Indeed, it is here that the key to an understanding of the miracles is to be found, for Jesus had one dominating purpose—to fulfill the Father's will. This is brought out more clearly in John's gospel than elsewhere, but it is of utmost importance. He did not regard any of his works as his own. They were the Father's works. They are evidences, therefore, of the Father's pleasure in the Son, and are accordingly a witness to his divine claims.

The miracles may be incredible as works of a man, however perfect, but new possibilities are opened up when the man concerned not only claimed to be Son of God, but was acknowledged to be so by the early Christians.

VIII. Jesus Christ in early Christian thought. It does not lie within the scope of this book to give a full discussion of Christological problems, but no account of Jesus Christ would be complete that failed to consider the place he gained in the theology of the developing church. For this reason a brief survey will be given of the different though complementary lines of approach found in the various NT books.

A. Primitive thought. First to be considered must be the view of Jesus found in the primitive kerygma (the content of preaching), the sources for which are the early speeches in Acts and some earlier traditional material taken over by Paul. To this must be added any data that can be deduced from the manner in which the evangelists commented on their materials. That Jesus Christ immediately became the center of the church's proclamation is not only an undeniable fact, but in the nature of the case could not have been otherwise. It was his resurrection which transformed the tragedy of the cross into a triumph. The church was founded on the fact that Jesus was not dead, but alive.

Various titles used of Jesus in the speeches in Acts reveal what the early Christians understood of the nature of his mission. He is certainly identified as the Messiah (Christ), as is clear from Peter's first sermon (Acts 2:36), where the messiahship is linked with lordship. This shows a remarkable penetration into the real nature of Jesus of Nazareth, which was basic to all primitive Christian theology. The human Jesus is now the exalted Lord. For a further clear identification of Jesus as the Christ, see Acts 3:20; 4:10; 5:42; 8:5.

More distinctive of the Acts speeches is the description "servant," which connects Jesus with the SERVANT OF THE LORD passages of Isaiah. It seems reasonable to suggest that the early Christians made this identification on the strength of the marked similarity between Isa. 53 and the death of Jesus. Some have disputed this identification as an element in primitive theology (e.g., M. D. Hooker, Jesus and the Servant [1959]), but it cannot be excised from all the streams of early Christian thought where it appears. It occurs in Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27. In the first two occurrences it is God who takes the part of the Servant and exalts him. This Servant concept played an important part in the primitive interpretation of the death of Christ, and also supplied a powerful example for Christians under trial (cf. 1 Pet. 2:21 – 25).

Another designation distinctive of the book of Acts is “author of life” (Acts 3:15; KJV, “Prince of life”), indicating that Jesus is for the Christians the dispenser of life, but life understood in a new way, namely, life dominated by the power of the risen Christ. Stephen, in his defense before the Sanhedrin, introduces Jesus under the name of the “Righteous One” (7:52), which must be understood as a confession of the sinless character of Jesus. It is noteworthy that in neither of the mission speeches of Paul recorded in Acts does the apostle use any specific title for Jesus other than “Savior” (13:23).

Although interest in the historical life of Jesus is overshadowed by the dominant focus upon his resurrection, such references are not entirely lacking. Peter’s speech to CORNELIUS is of the greatest importance (Acts 10:34 – 43). This passage shows interest in Jesus’ preaching ministry in Galilee and Judea, in his endowment with the Spirit (understood as a divine anointing—evidently at his baptism by John), in his works of healing and exorcism, and in his death and resurrection. The exalted Lord was none other than Jesus of Nazareth, whose doings and words could be recalled by those who saw and heard them.

From the speeches in Acts may be deduced not only the exalted concept of Jesus Christ that was held by the early believers, but also the fact that on the basis of his death and resurrection, salvation could now be offered to all who would repent and believe in him (cf. Acts 2:38 – 39; 3:19, 25 – 26;

4:12; 5:14). Jesus Christ had become the key to the divine offer of forgiveness. Moreover, the Holy Spirit's activity is inseparably connected with the continuing activity of Jesus in his church (cf. 2:33; 5:32).

In the editorial sections of the Gospels, a similar exalted concept of Jesus is seen. Matthew and Luke, for instance, in their different ways include supernatural elements in the birth story. Mark begins his gospel with a description of Jesus as Son of God (Mk. 1:1). In Matthew and to a lesser extent in Mark and Luke the coming of Jesus is set against the background of OT prophecy. The evangelists never thought of Jesus except as the One foreshadowed by the prophets. Both Matthew and Mark made it clear that the dynamic works of Jesus were restricted through unbelief (Matt. 13:58; Mk. 6:5), showing how the incarnation was in some ways conditioned by human response.

The kerygma is seen in the works of Paul in those sections where he is indebted to others for the tradition. The most notable passage is 1 Cor. 15:3 – 9, in which certain facts about Christ are said to have been received. These include the fact of his death and its interpretation as “for our sins,” the fact of his burial, the fact of his resurrection on the third day, and the fact of his appearances to various people, many of them named witnesses. It is clear, therefore, that while Paul is not unmindful of the importance of the facts, he is more interested in their significance, and this becomes most evident in his own distinctive CHRISTOLOGY.

Before considering this aspect, reference must be made to two other Scripture sections singled out by Dodd as belonging to the primitive kerygma. Paul in Rom. 10:9 presents a primitive confession of faith, “Jesus is Lord,” which is said to be sufficient for salvation. Dodd also sees Rom. 1:1 – 4 as a possible early Christian creedal statement; if this is true, it shows the recognition of his Davidic descent, of his Sonship, of the powerful effects of the Lordship. All these features are fully developed by the apostle in his doctrinal teaching.

B. Pauline thought

1. Preliminary observations. The history of criticism shows that Paul has often been accused of imposing upon the primitive gospel his own concepts of Jesus Christ. For this reason it is essential to recognize the unity of Paul's view of Jesus Christ with that of the primitive community and, indeed, with that taught by Jesus concerning himself. Some of the earlier critics, such as F. C. Baur, maintained that Paul's concept of Christ was due directly to his logical processes of mind. This theory failed because it did not take into account sufficiently the objective reality of Paul's Damascus road experience.

Later interpreters of Paul have regarded his Christology as representing Hellenistic Christianity, a process also claimed for Johannine Christology. Again, the thoroughly Jewish character of some of Paul's fundamental concepts (e.g., his concept of righteousness) cannot be so explained. The same goes for supposed pagan influences upon Paul's mind (as in Bultmann's theory of the redeemer myth and the heavenly man). Quite apart from the fact that supporting evidence is much too late to be valid for the period of Paul's ministry, the claim that Christianity was mixed in Paul's mind with such pagan myths would require indubitable evidence to substantiate it (see Gnosticism). Probability is heavily weighted against it. It is more credible to see Paul's view of Christ as a development of what was inherently present in the primitive ideas.

Attention has already been drawn to the apostle's knowledge of the earthly life of Jesus. This must presuppose that he accepted some connection between the historic Jesus and the Jesus who met him on the Damascus road. His experience at that time confirmed the activity of the risen Lord in the experience of his people. It was essentially Christ, not the Christians, who was the object of Paul's persecuting zeal, a realization that may well have caused him to ponder the indwelling of Christ in his people through the Spirit, which became a cardinal feature of his Christology. There can be no doubt that in Paul's case he did not begin with detailed knowledge of the historical Jesus and then work up toward an exalted Christology. It was the risen Christ who arrested him in his religious quest and it was the risen Christ who dominated his theology. There is no evidence in his epistles that it was immaterial to him whether the Jesus of the Damascus road was the same Jesus who lived in Palestine and died on a cross. His Christology makes sense only if such an identification is assumed.

2. Summary of Paul's Christology. A brief summary of the main elements in Paul's own special understanding of Christ is needed to set the historical Jesus firmly in the faith of the Christian church.

(a) The new Adam. Paul is deeply conscious of the human need, summarized in the failure of the first ADAM with its consequent disastrous effects on the whole race (Rom. 5:12 – 19). He sees, however, in Christ the head of a new race as Adam was of the old. The contrast is striking, for whereas Adam is believed to be "natural" and "earthly," Christ is seen as "spiritual" and "of heaven" (1 Cor. 15:45 – 48), and whereas Adam could only bring death, Christ brings life. There is no need to look to non-Jewish ideas of a heavenly man, although some parallels may exist. It is sufficient to see in this concept of the apostle a development from the comparison of the old order with the new.

(b) The preexistent Christ. There are certain indications that Paul accepted the preexistence of Christ. It was in the fullness of time that God sent forth his Son (Gal. 4:4). It is possible that when Paul identified the rock which followed the children of Israel as being Christ (1 Cor. 10:4), he was thinking of the existence of Christ in the period of the wilderness wanderings. When the apostle refers in 2 Cor. 8:9 to the fact that though Christ was rich yet he became poor for our sakes, there may be the suggestion of a voluntary act. There is no denying this element in the great Christological passage of Phil. 2:5 – 11, where the concept of Christ's humbling himself to the death of the cross, rather than grasping at equality with God, shows the profound understanding the apostle had of the incarnation. Even if it be maintained that Paul is using an existing hymn to Christ, his use of it shows his own endorsement of this conception of Christ. The idea of Christ's preexistence does not, however, depend on a few passages, but is basic to Paul's Christology. It is directly connected with his idea of the cosmic significance of Christ.

(c) Cosmic significance. The major statement concerning this concept is found in Col. 1:15 – 20, where Paul shows Christ as (i) instrument in creation, (ii) sustainer of all, and (iii) goal of all. These ideas show that Paul's understanding of the death and resurrection of Christ in the spiritual and moral realm extend also to the cosmic realm. His superiority in the one implies his superiority in the other. He who is head of the church is head of the created order. It is important to note that the creatorship of Christ is not dwelt upon for its own sake, but for its essential part in the whole scheme of redemption. The one in whom men and women have forgiveness of sins is the same one in whom the fullness of God dwells. Such a Christology seems far removed from the historical Jesus, but there is nothing in the developed Christology of Paul that could not have come from the essential character of Jesus as seen in the Gospels. An earlier passage adumbrates something of the same thought (1 Cor. 8:6). While there are certain parallels of language between Paul's cosmic view of Christ and Greek speculative thought, his concept is unique, for Christ as agent in creation is also redeemer and head of his people. Again, the idea of WISDOM personified in Jewish wisdom literature (e.g., Prov. 8:22 – 23, 29 – 30; Wisd. 9:2) supplies certain parallels, but Paul's concept is not a personification but a person. In viewing the created world he sees all things summed up in one person, Christ as the perfect expression of the mind of God (Eph. 1:10).

(d) Relationship with the Father. Some passages in Paul's epistles suggest the subordination of Christ to the Father, but these must be understood by a direct comparison with the statements of Jesus. The Son is sent by God (Gal. 4:4). It is God who highly exalted him (Phil. 2:9). He will deliver up the kingdom to the Father (1 Cor. 15:28). The idea that God spared not his own Son (Rom. 8:32) may also suggest the same idea. There is much that is akin to the teaching of Jesus about himself in the fourth gospel, especially the constantly reiterated theme of his being sent to do the will of the Father. Jesus was speaking in a historical context, and it is equally clear that Paul is thinking of him in such a context rather than stating an absolute truth.

(e) Relationship with the Spirit. According to Paul, there is an indissoluble union between Christ and the Spirit, as there is between Christ and the Father. So close is it that some, on the strength of 2 Cor. 3:17, have suggested the idea of identity, but when Paul speaks of the Spirit of the Lord, a distinction is in mind. There is a close affinity between his concept here and that found in Acts, where the work of the Spirit and the continuing work of Jesus in his church are essentially related.

It will be seen that Paul's view of Christ is inseparably linked with the historical Jesus, who is everywhere assumed, and reaches out toward a full-orbed concept of him in harmony with the revelation of the Easter event. The resurrection of Jesus did not make him what he was not before in his essence, but it did reveal his true nature and released divine power for salvation.

C. Johannine thought. The teaching of Jesus about himself in the fourth gospel has already been mentioned, but there are features in the presentation of Jesus by John in this gospel that throw light on early Christology. The most significant is the LOGOS doctrine in the prologue (Jn. 1:1 – 18). The choice of such an opening is illuminating by way of comparison with the synoptics. It at once draws attention to the preexistence of Christ, to his creatorship, and to his Godhead. What the origin is of the term Logos, used in this sense, is not of vital importance for our present purpose, for it is the characteristic, rather than the origin, of the Logos that reveals John's concept of Christ. Unlike Philo's Logos, John's Logos reaches his fulfillment in incarnation (1:14). Since, after mentioning it here, John does not again refer to the Logos, it cannot be regarded as the key for the understanding of his gospel. Nevertheless, in his account of the historical Jesus, he does not intend the reader to be unaware that this Jesus possessed a divine nature. He never thought of his narrative as the record of a man, however perfect, but as the record of the eternal Son of God in human form.

Jesus on his throne flanked by John and Mary. From the Church of Hagia Sophia in Istanbul.

The stated purpose of the Gospel in Jn. 20:30 – 31 must be noted, for it shows not only John's evangelical purpose, but also his essential view of Christ. "That you may believe that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God" reveals a double aspect of his person. His messiahship and his divine Sonship are reckoned to shine through his words and works. To John, Jesus is nothing less than "God the One and Only, who is at the Father's side" (1:18). That John's account is primarily theological in purpose rather than historical cannot be denied, but this does not mean that the history was unimportant. John's whole purpose is, in fact, to show the entry of the divine into history. It has earlier been mentioned that John records more specific examples of the real humanity of Jesus than the synoptics do. He is wearied with travel, suffers thirst (ch. 4), expresses strong indignation (cf. 11:33, 38), and weeps (11:35).

The Johannine epistles share the same exalted view of Christ as does the fourth gospel. His Sonship is frequently stressed. He is called our ADVOCATE (1 Jn. 2:1 NRSV; NIV, "one who speaks... in our defense") and is named as Jesus the righteous. His messiahship is insisted upon (2:22; 4:2; 5:1) in such a way as to exclude any Docetic notion of drawing a distinction between Jesus and the Christ. He is moreover named as Savior of the world (4:14). Indeed, there is much in 1 John that echoes the language and ideas of John's gospel and shows that both books share the same Christological viewpoint. Second John reflects the same position (cf. 2 Jn. 7, 9).

In the Apocalypse, a further aspect of Christology is seen. The central figure is the Lamb, who is a slain yet triumphant figure. The link with the historical Jesus is unmistakable, but the Lamb's exaltation shows his commanding position in the cosmic drama. Although many setbacks come to God's people, there is never any doubt about the ultimate result. The most dominant factor is that the Lamb has become the Judge to execute judgment upon those opposed to the divine will. This aspect is seen in the writer's vision of the one like the Son of Man in the midst of the candlesticks (Rev. 1:12 – 16). From his mouth there issued a sword, in his hand were securely held the stars that represented his people. It is important to note that the name he bears at the moment of judgment is "the Word of God" (19:13), which provides a direct link with the prologue of John's gospel. He is, moreover, King of kings and Lord of lords, the ALPHA AND OMEGA, all titles that suggest the sovereignty of the Lamb.

D. Other aspects of Christ. In the epistle to the Hebrews, the most characteristic concept of Jesus is that of High Priest, which controls the development of the argument of the whole epistle. The new revelation that has come in Christ marks him out as superior to the prophets (Heb. 1:1), to Moses (3:1 – 6), and to Aaron (5:1 – 6). He belongs to a new order, that of MELCHIZEDEK, which nevertheless is essentially a priestly order. The writer sets the tone for his letter in 1:2 – 3, where he reveals his exalted concept of Christ as heir and creator of all things, and bearing the very stamp of God's nature. He could not have expressed more vividly the absolute sovereignty of Christ, and yet he links with this the fact that he has purged our sins. The inseparable connection between the historical act of redemption and the present exalted position of Christ is inescapable. This is borne out by the references in the epistle to aspects of the earthly experience of Jesus: his temporarily inferior position to the angels, his condescension to suffering and death (2:9), his subjection to temptation (2:18), his faithfulness (3:6), his agonizing prayers (5:7), the specific reference to "the days of his flesh" (5:7 NRSV), and his determination to do God's will (10:5 – 7).

The mission of Jesus historically is viewed in sacrificial terms. The difference between the offering of Jesus and the offerings of the Aaronic order rested in the character of both offering and offerer. The perfection of Christ insured the complete adequacy of his offering. This interpretation of the work of Christ shows the exalted concept of his character which the writer held. His exposition is also valuable because it draws attention to the present mission of Jesus in his exalted position. It is a ministry of intercession (Heb. 4:15; 7:25). There is a constant representative of man at the right hand of God, who, in spite of the fact that he is a consuming fire (12:29), is nevertheless a God of mercy (4:16).

Another view of Christ brought to the fore in Hebrews is that of ratifier of the new covenant (Heb. 8:6—9:28). Because of the inadequacy of the old covenant, the inauguration of the new was of vital concern to mankind. What Jesus himself foreshadowed at the institution of the Lord's Supper, the writer to the Hebrews develops. Here is seen the fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy (Jer. 31:31 – 34, cf. Heb. 8:8), which emphasizes the essential inwardness of the new as contrasted with the old. In this is shown once again the superiority of Christ over Moses, and, ipso facto, the superiority of Christianity over Judaism.

In 1 Peter the Christology conforms to a pattern similar to the other streams of thought already mentioned. There is awareness, on the one hand, of the human aspect of the character of Jesus Christ, for he is said to have left us an example to follow in his steps. This must mean a concentration on the historical Jesus, whose sufferings in order to form an example for believers must be of the same kind as theirs. The uniqueness of his sufferings lies in the fact that he bore our sins (1 Pet. 2:24; 4:18). He is called "Shepherd and Overseer" (2:25; cf. 5:4), both of which titles stress his special care for his people. The Lordship of Christ is assumed (cf. 1 Pet. 1:3; 3:15, 21 – 22). His role as Redeemer of his people is particularly brought out by means of the Servant passage in 2:21 – 24, by the allusions to the exodus in 1:15 – 16, and by the frequent reference to his sufferings.

There are undoubtedly affinities between the Christology of 1 Peter and that of Paul. It is quite unnecessary to suppose that in all these relationships Peter is dependent on Paul, for most are basic to the primitive kerygma. Both Peter and Paul develop these basic concepts in their own way. It is possible that the affinities between 1 Peter and Romans and Ephesians may be due to literary influences. But it is certain, whatever the decision on that matter may be, that both apostles held the same exalted view of Christ and the same conviction about the continuity between this concept and the historic Jesus. The most individualistic feature in Peter's Christology is his reference to the descent of Christ into HADES, presumably in the interval between his death and resurrection (1 Pet. 3:18 – 19). Whatever the precise explanation of this difficult statement, it is evident that Peter conceived of an extension of the preaching ministry of Jesus even after his death.

In 2 Peter Jesus Christ is named as Savior (2 Pet. 1:1) and as Lord (1:2; cf. also 1:8, 11; 2:20; 3:2, 18). His majesty is specially mentioned and leads to a specific reference to the transfiguration (1:16 – 17). Another allusion is to the Master who bought them (2:1), a clear reference to the redemptive activity of Christ as in 1 Pet. 1. Although far less developed in its Christology as compared with 1 Peter, this epistle is nonetheless in line with the general primitive position.

James is remarkably sparse in its references to Christ, the only specific instances being in Jas. 1:1 and 2:1. In both of these he is called the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the latter also the Lord of glory. Yet this is not the extent of the witness of this epistle to Christ. There are more echoes of the sayings of Jesus in this epistle than in any other NT book, particularly from the Sermon on the Mount. It may be inferred that James knew much of the historical Jesus, but he nonetheless conceived him to be the Lord of glory. If his interests are mainly ethical in this epistle, this is no criterion for supposing that the two references to Christ are the total extent of his Christological understanding.

The brief epistle of Jude shares a Christology similar to 2 Peter. Christ is Master and Lord (Jude

4), and the same title Lord Jesus Christ is used three times (vv. 17, 21, 25).

E. Conclusion. However many-sided the views of the early Christians regarding Jesus, there is a basic oneness throughout. Jesus is more than a figure of history, although he is that. He is the exalted Lord whose power ranges over the whole created order, but he holds a special relationship to his church.

Appears in the midst of the disciples, when Thomas is absent (Mk. 16:14 – 18; Lk. 24:36 – 49; Jn. 20:19 – 23); when Thomas is present (Jn. 20:26 – 29); at the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 28:16; Jn. 21:1 – 14); to the apostles and upwards of 500 brethren on a mountain in Galilee (Matt. 28:16 – 20, with Acts 10:40 – 42; see also Acts 13:31; 1 Cor. 15:6 – 7).

Appears to James and also to all the apostles (Acts 1:3 – 8; 1 Cor 15:7).

Ascends to heaven (Mk. 16:19 – 20; Lk. 24:50 – 53; Acts 1:9 – 12).

Jesus Justus. See JUSTUS.

Jether jee'thuhr (יֶתֶר H3858, “abundance”; cf. ITHRA, ITHRAN, JETHRO). (1) Eldest son of GIDEON. Because of his youth, he was afraid to slay the prisoners ZEBAH AND ZALMUNNA, kings of MIDIAN, and so Gideon killed them himself (Jdg. 8:2 – 21).

(2) Father of AMASA, an Israelite commander who was killed by JOAB (1 Ki. 2:5, 32). Jether is identified as an Ishmaelite in 1 Chr. 2:17, but he is called “Ithra the Israelite” in 2 Sam. 17:25 MT. See ITHRA for a discussion of this problem.

(3) Son of Jada, great-grandson of JERAHMEEL, and descendant of JUDAH; he is said to have died without children (1 Chr. 2:32; cf. vv. 27 – 28).

(4) Son of Ezrah and descendant of Judah (1 Chr. 4:17). His precise place in the genealogy is unclear, and the verse contains some textual problems (see discussion in G. N. Knoppers, I Chronicles 1 – 9, AB 12 [2004], 341, 352 – 56).

(5) Descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:38); apparently the same as ITHRAN son of Zophah (v. 37).

S. BARABAS

Jetheth jee'theth (יֶתֶת H3867, derivation uncertain). Descendant of ESAU, listed among the clan chiefs of EDOM (Gen. 36:40; 1 Chr. 1:51). The name was probably applied to a territory as well.

Jethlah jeth'luh. KJV form of ITHLAH.

Jethro jeth'roh (יֶתְרוֹ H3861, “abundance”; cf. JETHER). Priest of MIDIAN and father-in-law of MOSES (Exod. 3:1; 4:18; 18:1 – 12, 27). Jethro is called REUEL in two places (Exod. 2:18; Num. 10:29). In addition, Moses' father-in-law appears to be called HOBAB in Jdg. 4:11 (NRSV), but Hobab was the son of Jethro/Reuel (Num. 10:29), and it is possible that the Hebrew term ḥōtēn H3162 in the Judges passage should be rendered “brother-in-law” (so NIV).

When Moses fled from Egypt (Exod. 2:15), he came to the land of Midian. Stopping at a watering place, he had occasion to champion the cause of seven shepherdesses, and thus gain the favor and protection of their father Jethro, a priest. Moses was content to dwell with Jethro and tend his sheep. In time he married ZIPPORAH, one of Jethro’s daughters. We are not told in what religion Jethro served as priest, nor the name of its deity. We are told, however, that Moses received God’s call while tending Jethro’s sheep (3:1; see BURNING BUSH). In this divine-human encounter he was commissioned to deliver the enslaved Israelites. In due time Moses took his wife and children and set out for Egypt (4:20), but he must have sent them back to Midian soon after that, for they joined the camp of Israel, apparently for the first time, when Jethro made his visit there (18:1 – 6).

In addition to reuniting Moses and his family, the visit of Jethro was important for at least two reasons: (1) at this time he acknowledged—or perhaps reaffirmed—his faith in the supremacy of Israel’s God; and (2) he assisted Moses in setting up an administrative and judicial system for Israel. On Jethro’s arrival in camp, Moses seemed eager to tell his father-in-law of God’s marvelous deliverance of Israel at the Red Sea, and of God’s continued protection and guidance in the wilderness. When he had finished, Jethro was so deeply impressed that he began to bless the God of Israel, saying, “Now I know that the LORD [Yahweh] is greater than all other gods” (Exod. 18:11). He then witnessed his faith in Israel’s God by conducting a sacrificial meal to which, along with Moses, AARON and the elders of Israel were invited. Had Jethro been previously acquainted with the God of the Hebrews? Some scholars think he was.

Jethro’s next contribution came when he observed Moses trying to serve as judge and moderator for the vast multitude of ex-slaves (Exod. 18:13). He immediately saw that it was too much for one man. He advised Moses to set up a system that would organize the Israelites into a respectable nation of people, and at the same time relieve their leader of an unmanageable amount of responsibility. He outlined his method of organization (18:17 – 23): the multitude should be separated into units, with a leader over each unit to whom authority for settling minor problems is delegated. In this way only the more difficult problems would come to Moses. Moses quickly saw that his father-in-law was correct in his evaluation of the situation, and accepted his advice.

In the past some scholars have sought to credit Jethro for originating Mosaic religion. Involved in the problem is the name for God used in the OT. See GOD, NAMES OF. Basing their views on Exod. 6:3, these scholars claim that God was not known to Israel as Yahweh (the LORD) until the time of Moses. They insist that Moses learned all he knew about Yahweh from Jethro, who was allegedly a Yahwistic priest among the Midianites. Moses, in turn, introduced this tribal god of the KENITES to Israel, perhaps changing things a bit to suit his needs.

Although much at this point is hidden from our view, it is evident from the Scriptures that God was known by his name Yahweh in the Palestinian area long before the time of Moses (see Gen. 4:26; 6:3, 5; 12:1,4; et al.). To say that Moses and the children of Israel had never heard of Yahweh before meeting Jethro is inaccurate. He was none other than “the God of your fathers” (Exod. 3:13). On the other hand, it is true that Moses took an old and familiar name and deepened and enriched its meaning from his own experience with God at the burning bush, at the Red Sea, and on Mount Sinai—and in doing so he became the founder of Hebrew religion.

Because the divine name Yahweh was evidently known among the tribes of the ANE, it is altogether possible that Jethro knew and worshiped God as Yahweh before visiting Moses’ camp. When one remembers that the Midianites were descendants of ABRAHAM by KETURAH (Gen. 25:2, 4;

1 Chr. 1:32 – 33), it is not unlikely that at least some of the Midianite tribes, such as the Kenites (Jdg. 1:16; 4:11), may have continued to worship God as Yahweh until the time of Moses. (See F. James, Personalities of the Old Testament [1939], 24 – 25; N. Glueck, Rivers in the Desert [1959], 132 – 34; W. Harrelson, Interpreting the Old Testament [1964], 77 – 80; G. L. C.P. GRAY

Jetur jee'tuhr (יֶטוּר H3515, possibly related to צוּר H7446, “rock” [see ABD, 3:822]). Son of ISHMAEL and eponymous ancestor of an ISHMAELITE tribe (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chr. 1:31). The two and a half Israelite tribes in TRANSJORDAN warred with the tribe of Jetur (1 Chr. 5:19). It is possible that the inhabitants of ITUREA in NT times were descended from it (see F. V. Winnett, “The Arabian Genealogies in Genesis,” in Translating and Understanding the Old Testament, ed. H. T. Frank and W. L. Reed [1970], 171 – 96, esp. 193 – 96).

Jeuel ji-yoo'uhl (יְעוּאֵל H3590, possibly “God is strong” or “God cures”; see also JEIEL). (1) Head of the Zerahite clan and one of the descendants of JUDAH listed among those who settled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:6).

(2) A Levite, descendant of ELIZAPHAN, who served during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:13 NRSV; the NIV has “Jeiel,” following the Qere and the LXX).

(3) Descendant of Adonikam and a family head who returned with EZRA from Babylon (Ezra 8:13 [KJV, “Jeiel”]; 1 Esd. 8:39 [KJV, “Jewel”]).

Jeush jee'ush (יְעוּשׁ H3593, “[God] helps”; the name  $y(\text{š})$  occurs in the Samaria OSTRACA, see R. Lawton in Bib 65 [1984]: 330-46, esp. 340). (1) Son of ESAU by OHOLIBAMAH; an Edomite chief (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. 1:35).

(2) Son of Bilhan and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:10); he was a head of family in the clan of JEDIAEL (v. 11).

(3) Son of Eshek and descendant of King SAUL (1 Chr. 8:39; KJV, “Jehus”).

(4) Son of Shimei and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON (1 Chr. 23:10); because Jeush and his brother Beriah had few sons, their two families were reckoned as one (v. 11).

(5) Son of King REHOBAM by Mahalath (2 Chr. 11:19).

S. BARABAS

Jeuz jee'uhz (יְעוּז H3591, possibly “he counsels”). Son of SHAHARAIM and descendant of BENJAMIN; a family head (1 Chr. 8:10). Jeuz was one of seven children that were born to Shaharaim in MOAB by his wife HODESH after he had divorced Hushim and Baara (vv. 8-9).

Jew joo (יְהוּדִי H3374, “of Judah, Judahite, Judean”; Aram. יְהוּדִי H10316; Gk. Ἰουδαῖος G2681 [the English form comes from Old French giu, an alteration of Lat. lūdaeus]). A descendant of the tribe of JUDAH and more specifically an inhabitant of the land of JUDEA; hence the OT distinction between Judeans and other nations (2 Ki. 25:25; Jer. 38:19; Neh. 5:8). Following the disruption of the Solomonic kingdom (cf. 1 Ki. 12:16), those in the S became separated from the northern tribes. After 722 B.C., Judah (which included at least parts of SIMEON, LEVI, and BENJAMIN) became the only claimant to the COVENANT (cf. Rom. 9:4-5). The prophet ZECHARIAH looked forward to the time when “ten men from all languages and nations will take firm hold of one Jew by the hem of his robe and say, ‘Let us go with you, because we have heard that God is with you’” (Zech. 8:23).

Because Hebrew remained the language of all Israelites, it was natural to identify the terms yěhûdî H3374, “Judahite,” and ‘ibrî H6303, “Hebrew” (Jer. 34:9; see HEBREW PEOPLE). Similarly, the term yěhûdît H3376, “the language of Judah/Judea,” came to mean the HEBREW LANGUAGE (cf. 2 Ki. 18:26; Neh. 13:24; Isa. 36:11, 13). The name yěhûdî acquires special prominence in postexilic literature, especially in Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther.

In the Greek and Roman world, Ioudaioi was the accepted name for the Hebrews. Judas MACCABEE in a letter to Rome described his people as to ethnos tōn Ioudaiōn, “the nation of the Jews/Judeans” (1 Macc. 8:23-27). JOSEPHUS, who seems to reserve the name Hebrews for Israel’s more ancient history, uses Jews/Judeans throughout, and the same applies to the NT. The DIASPORA made it possible to give to the name Jew a purely religious sense detached from geography. PAUL was a Jew born in TARSUS (Acts 21:39). According to Josephus (Ant. 14.10.1-2), the large Jewish community of ALEXANDRIA enjoyed full citizenship granted by Julius CAESAR. They were Jews because they professed JUDAISM (cf. Gal. 1:13 – 14; 2:14). In the Gospel of John, the term Ioudaioi, though translated “Jews” consistently in most versions, often refers not to Jews in general but to prominent religious leaders from Judea (Jerusalem), particularly those who belonged to the Pharisaic party (for further discussion, see Anti-Judaism and the Fourth Gospel, ed. R. Bieringer et al. [2001]).

Paul pressed for a redefinition of the meaning of this term. Physical descent was not enough to define a Jew. CIRCUMCISION of the heart (Rom. 2:29; cf. Phil. 3:3; Col. 3:11 – 12; Deut. 10:16; Jer. 4:4) is what makes a person a true Jew. For this reason, the apostle claimed that not all who are descended from Israel belong to Israel (Rom. 9:6; cf. Rev. 2:9). To live “Jewishly” (Ioudaikōs) was the Jew’s special obligation (Gal. 2:14), and for this reason there was an advantage in being a Jew (Rom. 3:1 – 2; cf. Gal. 1:15). This was not a matter of privilege but responsibility. It is on this basis that those who believe in Christ, though originally non-Jews, become Abraham’s offspring and heirs according to promise (Gal. 3:29).

Since the creation of the modern State of Israel, the question who is a Jew has assumed new significance. In the past, Judaism was the characteristic mark of the Jew. In secularized society, religion is only a matter of private preference. Even Reformed Judaism, which initially denied Jewish nationhood, is now tending toward a more particularistic interpretation of Jewish existence. Peoplehood in terms of Jewish ethnicity and culture is the present trend in Jewry. “Reconstructionism” that puts the emphasis upon Jewish culture rather than religion is increasingly gaining ground. (See further M. M. Kaplan, Judaism as a Civilization [1934]; R. Gordis, Judaism for the Modern Age [1955]; S. Zeitlin, “Who is a Jew?” JQR 49 [1959]: 241 – 70; J. Jocz, “The Advantage’ of the Jew,” in Jews and Christians, ed. G. A. F. Knight [1965], 78 – 93; B. Chilton, “Jews in the NT,” in ABD, 3:845 – 48.)

jewels and precious stones. Jewels are objects worn for adornment, a practice as old as the history of mankind. Much jewelry consists largely of precious or semiprecious stones (gemstones). However, various METALS, particularly GOLD and SILVER, are commonly used, and some jewelry consists of elaborately designed metalwork as a setting for gemstones, which are mostly naturally occurring inorganic compounds called MINERALS. Organic materials such as amber, shell, and coral also have been used, not solely because of their inherent beauty, but also because they could be engraved to produce objects of beauty. In the upper Palaeolithic era (25,000 to 16,000 B.C.), organic materials such as teeth, claws, and bones were the main objects fashioned as jewelry.

The use of gems for adornment has commonly gone side by side with their use for symbolic purposes, for most gems have had supernatural characteristics and virtues associated with them. AMULETS or charms were used to keep away evil spirits or disease, or to bring good luck, with particular gems having particular significance attached to them. The wearing of AMETHYST was considered to prevent drunkenness, while the DIAMOND was considered to give its wearer strength in battle. The traditional symbol of heavenly bliss has been SAPPHIRE and its wearing considered to be a protection against betrayal and poverty. In the same way, the RUBY was associated with love and happiness. These and many other beliefs concerning the significance of the various precious stones used as gems would have been known to those responsible for ecclesiastical vestments and regalia (e.g., Exod. 28) as well as to the author of Revelation, in which gemstones figure prominently in the portrayal of things to be (e.g., Rev. 21:18 – 20).

Because of their value, gemstones have been used as a medium of exchange and trade (cf. Job 28:15 – 19) and as gifts, particularly by monarchs on important occasions (1 Ki. 10:2). Abundance of jewelry and precious stones has been taken as indicative of personal prosperity and of national prosperity in the case of a monarch (1 Ki. 10:14 – 23). It has also gone hand in hand with many established religions (1 Chr. 29:2), although the existence of things of more value than jewels has often been pointed out (Prov. 3:15 NRSV; NIV, “rubies”). Because of their small size, and thus ease of transport in the event of catastrophic happenings, gems and jewelry have been a much favored form of wealth. Their value, however, has made them objects of plunder (Exod. 3:22; 12:35 – 36; 2 Chr. 20:25). With their virtual indestructibility and the consistent human desire to possess them, many gems of ancient times have been bought and sold by generation after generation and some preserved to the present day.

Gems have certain characters that set them apart from the common varieties of minerals. Of these, beauty is the most important; among the qualities of color, brilliance, and luster, which give beauty to gems, color is the most important. The only mineral that is of great value when colorless is diamond. This is because of its outstanding brilliance, luster, and hardness, but even in the case of diamond, colored varieties are generally more valuable.

Because many of the precious stones of ancient times came from INDIA—with Burma a source of rubies, and Ceylon a source of sapphire, rubies, and other gemstones for at least 2,500 years—it was thought at one time that beautifully colored gemstones were produced only by tropical climates. However, it is now known that the production of the characteristic color of most gemstones is the result of the presence of a small proportion of impurities. For example, ruby and sapphire are both varieties of corundum (aluminum oxide), their red and blue colors respectively being thought to be due to the presence of traces of chromium in the former and titanium in the latter. Other gem varieties of the same mineral (corundum) include oriental emerald (green), oriental amethyst (purple), and oriental topaz (yellow), in each case small impurities producing the colors (respectively, beryllium aluminum silicate, silicon dioxide, and aluminum fluosilicate).

The making of fine jewelry in the ANE began in the 4th millennium B.C., particularly in Iraq and northern Syria, with the engraving of relatively hard stones, which required a wheel technique. By the 3rd millennium the amount of jewelry being made was considerable, with the work of the Sumerian smiths centered at UR on the lower EUPHRATES River being outstanding (see SUMER). Much of their jewelry was manufactured for the adornment of those taking part in the elaborate religious ceremonies of the time and region (cf. Gen. 11:2 – 11). Around the year 2000, jewelry was manufactured in considerable amounts in Anatolia (ASIA MINOR) and on the coast of PHOENICIA, with the Phoenicians traveling as far as Scandinavia to obtain amber for making engraved jewelry.

In EGYPT some of the jewelry made was of fragile, glazed material, and this was used to decorate the mummy of a dead person. The jewelry made for adorning the living was mainly of semiprecious stones set in gold; varieties of chalcedonic silica, including CARNELIAN and JASPER, available locally, were used. Also used was TURQUOISE, a blue-colored mineral that was considered to prevent accidents, particularly falls from horses. From before 3000 this mineral was mined on the Sinai Peninsula, and it probably was the first gemstone to be mined extensively (see MINES, MINING), although the ancient Egyptians also sank hundreds of shafts in the search for emeralds on the coast of the RED SEA. LAPIS LAZULI, which is soft and could be carved, was used by the Egyptians, particularly for amulets but also with other semiprecious stones set in elaborate designs. In the case of amethyst, it was generally used by itself, as its color did not blend with the other semiprecious stones also being used at the time.

Jewry joo’ree. This English term is used by the KJV on three occasions where it stands for JUDAH or JUDEA (Dan. 5:13; Lk. 23:5; Jn. 7:1). In the course of time the name changed from a geographical to an ethnic description. It now connotes: (1) the Jewish quarters in a town or city (e.g., Old Jewry in London); (2) the religion of the Jewish people, i.e., Judaism (this however is not common); (3) the Jewish people in the ethnic and cultural sense as a distinct community. See also JEW.

J.JOCZ

Jezebel jez'uh-ni"uh (יְהִיָּה H3470, "Yahweh listens"). (1) Variant of JAAZANIAH (Jer. 40:8).

(2) Son of HOSHAIAH; he was an army officer who, with JOHANAN son of Kareah and the survivors from an attack at MIZPAH, asked JEREMIAH to pray for them (Jer. 42:1). Some scholars, on the basis of 43:2 and the SEPTUAGINT, emend the text to "Azariah" (cf. NRSV).

Jezebel jez'uh-bel (יִזְבֵּל H374, possibly from Phoen. זבל + א, "where is the prince?" [i.e., Baal; cf. ANET, 141a], perhaps understood by the Hebrews as א H364 + זבל H2292, "not exalted" [with later modification of the second element; cf. postbiblical זבל "manure," and 2 Ki. 9:37, where however דָּבָן H1961 is used]; Gk. Ἰεζάβελ G2630). Daughter of ETHBAAL king of SIDON (in PHOENICIA), wife of AHAB king of Israel, and mother of ATHALIAH queen of Judah (1 Ki. 16:31; 18:4, 13; 19:1 – 2; 21:5 – 25; 2 Ki. 9:7 – 37; Rev. 2:20).

This remarkable evil woman was derived from a Phoenician clan which she truly represented. Her family happens to constitute one of the earliest confluences of biblical history with the written classical history of Greece—if one may suppose that such were the sources of JOSEPHUS. Though called "king of the Sidonians," Ethbaal (1 Ki. 16:31) her father was king of all Phoenicia. By assassination of his predecessor he had established his reign at the age of thirty-six. His reign lasted thirty-two years. His dynasty included a great-grandson, Pygmalion, who, at the time of his death ninety-four years after Ethbaal's accession, brought the reign of the dynasty to an end.

Although marriage of Hebrews with the Canaanite peoples of the Levant was strictly forbidden by the Mosaic law, it was precisely her unlawful conjugal union with Ahab (1 Ki. 16:31) that rescued her name from the oblivion of most other ancients and secured for her a perpetual infamy wherever the Holy Scriptures are known. The Bible traces her husband's apostasy to her influence (16:30 – 34). His evils, said to be more than those of any of his predecessors in office, are laid at her door. These were chiefly giving himself to BAAL worship, with all its vile accompaniments, establishing a Baal cult center at SAMARIA, the national capital, and thereby leading the whole nation into apostasy. At her instigation (Ahab consenting), a systematic program aimed at extermination of all leadership of Yahweh worship in Israel was begun. Evidently the Lord's prophets were slaughtered by the hundreds (18:1 – 4). At the same time Baal prophets were given national prominence, a number even being housed and fed in precincts of the royal palace (18:17 – 19).

It was in this climate of national tension that the prophet ELIJAH appeared as single public advocate of the ancestral faith. The striking events of Elijah's career recorded in 2 Ki. 17 – 19—the prophesied drought, his period of hiding and divine sustenance, the contest with the 850 prophets of Baal, the breaking of the drought, the flight to Horeb—are all features of Elijah's personal contest with Jezebel. The murder of NABOTH (1 Ki. 21:5 – 15; cf. 2 Ki. 9:26), an incident that displays the worst side of Ahab's weak character, shows his wife as a true daughter of a pagan court—involved in intrigue, treason, and deception, with public displays of legality and virtue to cover unrighteousness. The scrupulosity of apparent observance of legal details (in Mosaic law, for it was still the official constitution), while perpetrating murder and theft, is a lesson in betrayal of public trust by official persons. Because of this act, Elijah was sent to prophesy the destruction of Ahab's family (1 Ki. 21:17 – 24), with specific reference to his wife: "Dogs will devour Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel” (v. 23; cf. the fulfillment of this horrible prophecy in 2 Ki. 9).

Scripture says that Ahab “sold himself to do evil in the eyes of the LORD, urged on by Jezebel his wife” (1 Ki. 21:25). Through him, Jezebel corrupted the kingdom of Israel. And through her offspring, Athaliah (who was married to JEHOAM, the leading scion of the house of DAVID), Jezebel came near to bringing the Davidic dynasty to extinction (see 2 Ki. 8:25 – 27; 11:1 – 3; 2 Chr. 21:5 – 7; 22:10—23:21). Jezebel’s name became symbolic of APOSTASY and is used in the book of Revelation with reference to a false prophetess (prob. representing a larger group) in THYATIRA: “By her teaching she misleads my servants into sexual immorality and the eating of food sacrificed to idols. I have given her time to repent of her immorality, but she is unwilling. So I will cast her on a bed of suffering, and I will make those who commit adultery with her suffer intensely, unless they repent of her ways” (Rev. 2:20 – 22). (See P. R. Ackroyd, “Goddesses, Women and Jezebel,” in Images of Women in Antiquity, ed. A. Cameron and A. Kuhrt [1983], 245 – 59; P. Dutcher-Walls, Jezebel: Portraits of a Queen [2004]; D. Jezelus jez’uh-luhs. KJV Apoc. form of JAHAZIEL (1 Esd. 8:32) and JEHIEL (8:35).

Jezer jee’zuhr (צֶרֹה H3672, possibly “[Yahweh] has formed”; gentilic צֶרִי H3673, “Jezerite”; see IZRI). Son of NAPHTALI, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Jezerite clan (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:49; 1 Chr. 7:13).

JeZIAH ji-zi’uh. KJV form of IZZIAH.

Jeziel jee’zee-uhl (זִיזְיָאֵל H3465, possibly “sprinkled by God”; cf. IZZIAH and see J. D. Fowler, Theophoric Personal Names in Ancient Hebrew [1988], 137). Son of Azmaveth; he and his brother Pelet are listed among the warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined with DAVID when the latter took refuge at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:3).

Jezliah jez-lz’uh. KJV form of IZLIAH.

Jezoar ji-zoh’ahr. KJV form of IZHAR#2.

Jezrahiah jez’ruh-hi’uh (יִזְרְחִיָּה H3474, “Yahweh goes forth [or shines]”; see IZRAHIAH). Director of the choirs who took part in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:42).

Jezreel (person) jez’ree-uhl (יִזְרְעֵאל H3475, “God sows”). (1) Son of Etam and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3, NIV and other versions, following LXX). The MT is unintelligible; see discussion under ETAM.

(2) A symbolic name of one of the sons of HOSEA. God commanded the prophet to give his first child this name and then promptly interpreted the significance of it. “Call him Jezreel, because I will soon punish the house of Jehu for the massacre at Jezreel, and I will put an end to the kingdom of Israel. In that day I will break Israel’s bow in the Valley of Jezreel” (Hos. 1:4 – 5). There is first an allusion to JEHU’s slaughter of the house of AHAB—a slaughter that went far beyond God’s intention

(2 Ki. 10:11). Second, there is a play on words between Jezreel (yizrēʿel 'i) and Israel (yiśʿsrāʿēl). The reference to Jezreel in Hos. 1:11 and 2:22 has a significance opposite to that in 1:5. The scene of the breaking of the bow of Israel will become the scene of mending and reunification. The place of thorough disruption and scattering will become the place that God makes fertile (as implied by the meaning of the name). See JEZREEL (PLACE).

Jezreel (place) jezʹree-uhl (𐤒𐤍𐤕𐤌 H3476, “God sows”). (1) A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:56). Jezreel is listed as part of Jezreel.

Jezreel.

Aerial view of Tel Yizre'el (biblical Jezreel in Issachar) looking N across the Jezreel (Esdraelon) Valley.

a group of towns 4 – 10 mi. S and SE of HEBRON, but its precise location is unknown. AHINOAM, one of DAVID's wives, may have been from this town (1 Sam. 25:43; 27:3; 30:5; 2 Sam. 2:2; 3:2); some think she came from Jezreel of Issachar (see below, #2).

(2) A town within the tribal territory of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:18). At the time when the army of the PHILISTINES gathered at APHEK and DAVID was dismissed by them, the Israelites were camped "by the spring in Jezreel" (1 Sam. 29:1). After SAUL's death, his general set up Saul's son ISH-BOSHETH as king over Jezreel, other cities, and even "all Israel" (2 Sam. 2:8 – 9; cf. 4:4). During the administration of SOLOMON, one of the twelve court officials was at TAANACH, MEGIDDO, and BETH SHAN, the latter being described as being "below Jezreel" (1 Ki.4:12).

Apparently Jezreel had been made a royal residence by King AHAB of Israel, for it was there that ELIJAH met him after the episode at Mount Carmel and the ending of the drought (1 Ki. 18:45 – 46; see CARMEL, MOUNT). Elijah must have been given superhuman strength that day to run ahead of Ahab's chariot for those 20 mi. between Carmel and Jezreel. Ahab, whose capital was SAMARIA, had a palace at Jezreel (21:1), adjacent to NABOTH's vineyard. The ruthless scheming Queen JEZEBEL, through false accusation and subsequent murder of Naboth, got the land for a garden for Ahab. For this wicked deed, Elijah pronounced doom on both Ahab and Jezebel (21:17 – 24). The king, who had been more passive in the matter, repented (21:27), but Jezebel was eventually eaten by dogs within the bounds of Jezreel (1 Ki. 21:23; 2 Ki. 9:10, 30 – 37).

Ahab's son Joram (JEHORAM), who reigned in Israel after his father's death, went to war against SYRIA (ARAM) in coalition with AHAZIAH king of Judah (2 Ki. 8:28). There is no account of victory for the Hebrews, only that King Joram returned to Jezreel to recuperate from wounds that the Syrians had inflicted (2 Ki. 8:29; 2 Chr. 22:6). According to 2 Ki. 9, Elijah anointed JEHU as king over Israel when Joram was still alive. This event occurred in TRANSJORDAN at RAMOTH GILEAD. The city of Jezreel must have been situated so as to afford a view of the Valley of Jezreel and the Jordan Valley. The watchmen saw Jehu come near, driving "like a madman," and take away the messengers with him (2 Ki. 9:20).

Then Joram and Ahaziah, who had been visiting his wounded neighbor, met Jehu in the garden that had been the vineyard of Naboth (2 Ki. 9:21) Jehu shot Joram with his bow and arrow, and Ahaziah, wounded at the hands of Jehu's men, died after fleeing to Megiddo (9:27). Jehu entered the city of Jezreel and ordered the attendants to throw the painted and adorned Jezebel out the window (9:30 – 33). And so she died without burial, covered with disgrace as Elijah the prophet had said (1 Ki. 21:23). Jehu ordered the heads of Ahab's surviving sons to be sent to him at Jezreel from Samaria. When this was done, Jehu also "killed everyone in Jezreel who remained of the house of Ahab, as well as all his chief men, his close friends and his priests, leaving him no survivor" (2 Ki. 10:11).

Jezreel is identified with the modern village of Zer'in at the foot of Mount GILBOA, approximately halfway between Megiddo and Beth Shan.

Jibsam jib'sam. KJV form of IBSAM.

Jidlaph jid'laph (ידלף H3358, possibly "he weeps or "he is sleepless"). Son of NAHOR by his wife MILCAH; nephew of ABRAHAM (Gen. 22:22).

Jimna, Jimnah jim'nuh. KJV forms OF IMNAH.

Joabjoh'ab (יואב H3405, "Yahweh is [my] father"). (1) Son of Seraiah, nephew of OTHNIEL, descendant of JUDAH through the line of KENAZ, and father (founder) of GE HARASHIM, a town inhabited by craftsmen (1 Chr. 4:14).

(2) Ancestor of a group (connected with the families of Pahath-Moab and Jeshua) that returned to Jerusalem under ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:6; Neh. 7:11; 1 Esd. 5:11 [KJV omits]); apparently, some of his descendants returned later with EZRA (Ezra 8:9; 1 Esd. 8:35).

(3) Son of ZERUIAH (King DAVID's sister), brother of valiant warriors ABISHAI and ASAHIEL, and commander-in-chief under DAVID (2 Sam. 2:13 – 32 et al.). His father's name is unknown. The rest of this article deals with Joab son of Zeruiah. (For the phrase "the house of Joab" in 1 Chr. 2:54 KJV, see ATROTH BETH JOAB.)

I. Early military career. Although Joab was a nephew of David, the two men were probably near the same age, for Zeruiah appears to have been one of the older children of JESSE, whereas David was his youngest son. (It is interesting to note that AMASA, who replaced Joab as commander of the Israelite armies on two occasions, was a cousin of Joab and also a nephew of David; see 2 Sam. 17:25; 19:13; 1 Chr. 2:17.) Joab presumably joined David's guerrilla band in the wilderness, but he is first mentioned in the Bible in connection with a battle at the pool of GIBEON (2 Sam. 2:13 – 32). David had sent him with an army against ABNER and the followers of the house of SAUL. When the two armies met, Abner suggested that twelve young warriors from each side should settle the matter by a test of skill. Joab readily agreed.

The young warriors arose and took their positions, but the contest was so evenly matched that all twenty-four men fell together with each man's sword in the heart of his opponent. This precipitated a battle between the two armies, with Joab's men routing the soldiers of the house of Saul. As Abner and his men fled, Asahel, brother of Joab, fleet of foot and impetuous, sought to overtake Abner and engage that seasoned veteran in combat. Twice Abner pled with the youth to turn aside. Each time Asahel refused, whereupon Abner, with a backward thrust, drove the butt of his spear through the overconfident warrior so that he died (2 Sam. 2:23).

With the law of blood revenge operating in ancient Israel (Num. 35:19; see AVENGER OF BLOOD), it was inevitable that Joab would seek to avenge his brother's death, and the opportunity arose a short time later. Abner, as commander-in-chief of Saul's armies, had enabled I SH-BOSHETH to retain the throne of his father (2 Sam. 2:8 – 9). His task was not an easy one, for the house of Saul was growing constantly weaker. The turning point came when the miserable Ish-Bosheth accused him of illicit relations with one of the concubines of his dead father (3:6 – 7). Angered deeply, Abner opened negotiations with David for the purpose of uniting all Israel under David's leadership (3:12 – 13). David responded favorably. Abner and a diplomatic corps visited David in HEBRON, where final arrangements were carefully worked out. After sealing the bargain with a feast, Abner and his men left for home.

Shortly after their departure, Joab returned from a frontier skirmish and was informed of what had happened (2 Sam. 3:22 – 23). Joab's anger blazed hot and strong. He saw all too clearly that the man who had slain his brother might well become his commanding officer. He moved quickly. Messengers were sent in the name of David to overtake Abner and bring him back to Hebron (3:26 – 27). The king was not aware of Joab's sinister plot. The unsuspecting Abner returned and foolishly agreed to speak privately with Joab, who drawing him aside, slew him in the gate of the city. When David heard the sad news, his grief was spontaneous and profuse. He immediately declared himself and his kingdom free of the guilt of so dastardly a deed. Furthermore, he pronounced a curse upon the house of Joab, and became the chief mourner at the funeral of Abner (3:28,31).

II. Field marshal. With all his ruthlessness, Joab was a brave and ingenious military leader and was completely loyal to David and the emerging Israelite kingdom. No better example of his military prowess can be found than the part he played in the capture of the city of JERUSALEM (2 Sam. 5:6 – 10; 1 Chr. 11:4 – 9). David wanted this excellently fortified city for his capital, and sought to dislodge the Jebusites who had long occupied the fortress (see JEBUS). The Jebusites were so overconfident and insulting in their resistance, that David promised the job of field commander to the man who would lead a successful attack against the city. The redoubtable Joab met the king's challenge. His clever mind devised a scheme that involved the city's water supply. His ruse was imminently successful and the city was taken. Joab was made field marshal and remained in that position for many years (cf. 2 Sam. 8:16; 20:23; 1 Chr. 18:15; 27:34).

David often led his own armies to battle, but Joab was his strong right arm. It was Joab who executed David's plan to destroy the Edomites, cutting off every male in the population (2 Sam. 8:13 – 14; 1 Ki. 11:15 – 16). It was Joab who masterminded the defeat of the Syro-Ammonite coalition (2 Sam. 10:6 – 14; 1 Chr. 19:6 – 15). A shrewd tactician, he threw the Syrians (Arameans) into hopeless confusion, while Abishai routed the Ammonites. On a later occasion, Joab directed the armies of Israel against the rebellious sons of AMMON. He ravaged their country and laid siege to RABBAH, their capital (2 Sam. 11:1; 1 Chr. 20:1). During the siege of Rabbah, Joab was drawn into David's nefarious scheme to kill URIAH the Hittite. Joab seems to have had no compunction of conscience in putting Uriah at the front of the battle and then withdrawing his support (2 Sam. 11:14 – 25). Later on, when Joab knew that the city was ready to capitulate, he magnanimously asked David to come and take the credit for its surrender (12:26 – 31). Without doubt, Joab must have also played an outstanding part in the success of the wars that David fought against the PHILISTINES (5:17 – 18; 8:1), MOAB (8:2), ZOBAH (2 Sam. 8:3 – 4; 1 Chr. 18:3 – 4), and the Arameans (2 Sam. 8:5 – 6). There is no record where Joab ever lost a battle.

III. The irrepressible strategist. Joab was a tough realist. His mind was not only quick and incisive, but also calculating and logical. This is evident in his military accomplishments and in his involvement in the problems of the king's household.

By clever strategy, Joab secured the return of ABSALOM from the land of GESHUR, where the king's son had fled after slaying AMNON for the rape of his sister TAMAR (2 Sam. 14:1). He convinced David through the use of the wise woman of TEKOA of the inconsistency of his attitude toward Absalom. As a result David permitted Absalom to return to Jerusalem, but he was not allowed to return to the king's court. After two years of living in Jerusalem without seeing his father's face, Absalom decided to do something about the situation (14:28 – 29). He sent for Joab, but the latter, apparently suspecting the purpose of the summons, delayed his response. Absalom sent for Joab a second time, and still he did not come. Finally, Absalom commanded his servants to set fire to Joab's barley fields, which lay next to his own. This time his efforts proved successful. The matter ended with Joab intervening with David for Absalom. A reconciliation was effected between the king and his son.

In the insurrection of Absalom (2 Sam. 15:7), Joab seems to have been caught off guard. Absalom was able to carry a large segment of the king's standing army with him, but since he did not trust Joab, he made AMASA commander-in-chief in his place (17:25). The next mention of Joab is in David's camp, but he is not in full command (1 Sam. 18:2 – 3). In deploying his forces against Absalom, David divided them into three groups and placed Joab at the head of only one section, with Abishai and Ittai over the other two. As his men marched away to fight, David gave explicit instruction to his three lieutenants in the hearing of all the people to spare the life of Absalom.

Looking down into Warren's Shaft (Jerusalem). According to some, this shaft was the way Joab used to enter the city of Jebus.

In the heat of the battle, however, Joab took over and directed the outcome of the encounter.

Although knowing David's orders, the hardheaded old realist knew that the quickest way to victory was to destroy the treacherous Absalom. The times were harsh, and he did not hesitate to use harsh methods. When the fortunes of war delivered Absalom into his hand, he thrust him through with three darts as he hung by his hair in an oak tree (2 Sam. 18:9 – 10). With Absalom dead, the insurrection ended. Later in the day when David, due to his grief at the death of Absalom, did not so much as thank his splendid fighting men for the victory they had given that day, the unrelenting Joab withstood the king to his face (19:1 – 8). Fortunately, the king gave heed to the words of Joab and the situation was saved.

Although Joab brought the insurrection of Absalom to a quick, and perhaps merciful, end, he was not restored to his command. David appointed Amasa as field marshal in his place (2 Sam. 19:13). The move was apparently designed to ease political tensions and heal the wounds of a divided nation. It also served to punish Joab for his insubordination in the recent battle. The irrepressible old strategist seemed to accept his demotion without a word, but subsequent events amply indicate that Joab was soon scheming to regain his former position. His opportunity was not long in coming. David was no sooner restored to the throne when a certain SHEBA from the tribe of Ephraim raised the cry of revolt against him (2 Sam. 20:1 – 2). The unity of the kingdom was again threatened. David promptly commanded Amasa to organize and equip an army to pursue Sheba. For some reason Amasa delayed beyond the appointed time. David, knowing that time was of the essence, placed some of his battle-tested warriors under Abishai and sent them on after the rebel leader. Joab was among the soldiers who went with Abishai. At Gibeon, Amasa sought to rejoin his troops. The crafty Joab, feigning friendship by taking hold of his beard as though to kiss him, disemboweled the unsuspecting Amasa with one stroke of his sword (20:8 – 9). Joab then assumed command of the expedition and finally overtook Sheba and destroyed him. Joab thus regained his former position as commander-in-chief of David's troops (20:23).

At least on one occasion Joab seems to have had a keen sense of what was religiously appropriate. He objected strenuously to David's plan to take a national census (2 Sam. 24:1 – 2; 1 Chr. 21:3). At this point he seems to have had more religious insight than David. In spite of his protests, the king insisted on carrying out his plan, and Joab was commissioned to supervise the project. He spent more than nine months in completing the task. Subsequent events proved him right in his original objections.

IV. Decline and death. In the end, Joab was fatally caught up in the intrigue that swirled around the household of David. When it became evident to all that the day of David's death could not be far away, ADONIJAH, one of his older sons, sought to claim his father's throne (1 Ki. 1:5 – 6). Convinced that he was worthy of being king, Joab and ABIATHAR the high priest threw the weight of their influence behind him. With the support of the commander-in-chief of the king's troops, and the head of the nation's religious order, the young prince seemed to have excellent prospects for achieving his objective. All their hopes, however, were doomed to failure. At the supposed coronation of Adonijah, the news came that David had already placed SOLOMON on the throne of Israel (1:38 – 39), and his kingship had been confirmed by the people. Adonijah's attempt had failed, and his followers were marked for destruction by the new king. Joab's subsequent flight to the horns of the altar of the Tent of Meeting was of no avail (2:28 – 29). Solomon dispatched BENAIAH to execute the old warrior, whose deeds of violence, according to the law of blood revenge (Num. 35:33), must be visited on his own head before the kingdom could have peace.

This period of history was harsh and primitive, and Joab was a product of his age. He was a decisive, fearless, and intrepid fighter, and a brilliant military strategist. He served his king and his country devotedly. He was generous and loyal to his friends, but utterly ruthless and vindictive toward his foes. He was not completely devoid of religious sentiment, but it played no decisive part in his conduct. He died as he had lived—by the sword. (See D. G. Schley, “Joab and David: Ties of Blood and Power,” in History and Interpretation: Essays in Honour of John H. Hayes, ed. M. P. Graham et al. Joah joh’uh (𐤍𐤔𐤁 H3406, “Yahweh is [my] brother”). (1) Son of a certain Asaph; he was “recorder” (mazkîr H4654, possibly the royal spokesperson) under HEZEKIAH, and member of a delegation sent by the king to deal with the Assyrian envoys during the siege of Jerusalem (2 Ki. 18:18, 26; Isa. 36:3, 11, 22).

(2) Son of Zimnah and descendant of LEVI through the line of GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:21; 2 Chr. 29:12).

(3) Third son of OBED-EDOM, included in the list of divisions of the Korahite doorkeepers in the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:4).

(4) Son of a certain Joahaz (see JEHOAHAZ #4); he was recorder (cf. #1 above) under JOSIAH, and part of a group sent to repair the temple (2 Chr. 34:8).

Joahaz joh’uh-haz. Alternate form of JEHOAHAZ (2 Chr. 34:8; cf. also the MT at 2 Ki. 14:1 [here followed by NRSV and other versions]; 2 Chr. 36:2, 4).

Joakim joh’uh-kim (𐤍𐤊𐤍𐤏𐤍). KJV Joacim. (1) Son of ZERUBBABEL (1 Esd. 5:5; no son by that name is mentioned in 1 Chr. 3:19 – 20).

(2) A high priest in Jerusalem who exercised considerable authority in the days of JUDITH (Jdt. 4:6 – 8, 14; 15:8). Attempts to identify this figure have not been successful (see C. A. Moore, Judith, AB 40 [1985], 53 – 54); many scholars doubt the historicity of such a priest.

Joanan joh-ay’nuhn (𐤍𐤊𐤍𐤏𐤍𐤏𐤍 G2720, from Heb. 𐤍𐤊𐤍𐤏𐤍 H3419, “Yahweh has been gracious” [cf.

HANANIAH, JOHANAN, JOHN]; the form occurs in the LXX [2 Chr. 17:15 et al.; see also BDF §53.2]). KJV Joanna. Son of Rhesa and grandson of ZERUBBABEL, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:27; v.l. Iōannas). Some scholars speculate that Joanan is the same as Hananiah (with the components of the name transposed) son of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. 3:19, 21) and that Rhesa is not a proper name but a transliteration of Aramaic res, "head, prince," thus a description of Zerubbabel (but see D. L. Bock, Luke, BECNT [1994 – 96], 1:354).

Joanna joh-an'uh (Ἰωάννα G2721 [on the doubling of the consonant, see BDF §40], probably from Heb. יִוְחָנָה, "Yahweh has been gracious"; cf. HANNAH and see G. Dalman, Grammatik des jüdisch-palästinischen Aramäisch, 2nd ed. [1905], 179 n. 5). The wife of CUZA, who managed the household of Herod Antipas (see HEROD V); she was one of several women who had been healed by Jesus and who helped to support him and his disciples in their travels (Lk. 8:3). She was probably among those who witnessed the crucifixion and then returned to the city to prepare spices and ointment for the anointing of the body (23:55 – 56). Joanna is specifically mentioned with Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James (see MARY ##4 – 5) as one of the women who returned to the tomb, found it empty, and brought the news to the apostles (24:10). (See B. Witherington, Women in the Ministry of Jesus [1984], 116 – 18; for the view that Lk. 8:1 – 3 is an unhistorical redaction of Mk. 15:40 – 41, see K. E. Corley, Women and the Historical Jesus: Feminist Myths of Christian Origins [2002], 29 – 31.)

C.J.BARBER

Joarib joh'uh-rib (יֹאֲרִיב from Heb. יֹאֲרִיב H3424, "Yahweh contends [for me]"; see JOIARIB). MATTATHIAS the priest, who instigated the Maccabean Revolt (see MACCABEE), is described as belonging to "the sons of Joarib" (1 Macc. 2:1; 14:29 [KJV, "Jarib"]). The reference is no doubt to JEHOIARIB, who received the first lot of the twenty-four priestly divisions in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 24:7).

Joash, Jehoash joh'ash, ji-hoh'ash (יֹאֲשָׁא H3409, short form of יְהוֹאָשׁ H3371, prob. "Yahweh has granted"). The short Hebrew form of this name is used for all eight individuals listed below. The longer form, which occurs only in 2 Kings (seventeen times), is used sometimes for both the son of AHAZIAH, king of Judah, and the son of JEHOAHAZ, king of Israel (note esp. 2 Ki. 14:13), but the NIV, in the interests of clarity, uses it only when referring to the king of Israel. M. Noth (IPN, 106, 171) points out that both forms are found on seal inscriptions, and that the longer form was usual at ELEPHANTINE.

(1) Father of GIDEON and descendant of MANASSEH through ABIEZER (Jdg. 6:11, 29 – 31; 7:14; 8:13, 29, 32). Joash lived in OPHRAH, where both he and Gideon were buried. The angel of the Lord appeared to Gideon by an oak tree that belonged to Joash. Later, when the men of the town wanted to kill Gideon for breaking down the altar of BAAL and the ASHERAH pole, his father came to his defense.

(2) Son of SHELA and grandson of JUDAH; he and one (or more) of his brothers are said to have "ruled in" (or "married into") MOAB and JASHUBI LEHEM (1 Chr. 4:22; the Heb. verb is Māal H1249, which means either "to rule over" or, more frequently, "to marry"). Some scholars believe that the words "and Jashubi Lehem" should be emended to either "but returned to Lehem" (so NRSV) or "and they resided in Bethlehem" (cf. G. N. Knoppers, I Chronicles 1 – 9, AB 12 [2004], 342 – 43).

(3) Son of BEKER and grandson of BENJAMIN (2 Chr. 7:8).

(4) Son of Shemaah of GIBEAH; he and his brother AHIEZER are listed among the warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined with DAVID when the latter took refuge at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:3; cf. v. 1).

(5) An official under David who was in charge of the supplies of olive oil (1 Chr. 27:28).

(6) Son of AHAB king of Israel; he and the governor of SAMARIA were charged with the custody of the prophet MICAIAH (1 Ki. 22:26; 2 Chr. 18:25); it is however likely that the phrase “the king’s son” refers to a minor royal official with police duties (see R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel [1961], 119 – 20).

(7) Son of AHAZIAH and ninth king of Judah (2 Ki. 11:1—12:21; 2 Chr. 22:10—24:27). As an infant, Joash was saved from the massacre of the royal family, which ATHALIAH perpetrated on the death of her son Ahaziah. He owed his life to the courage and devotion of his aunt JEHO SHEBA, the wife of the priest JEHOIADA, who conveyed him away, concealed him, and brought him up in their own home (2 Ki. 11:1 – 3). When Joash was seven years old, Jehoiada took him to the temple court and crowned him before a congregation of Levites, temple guards, and elders and people from the country towns. As he was acclaimed king, his grandmother Athaliah appeared in the court and was swiftly removed to her death. With due ceremony Jehoiada inaugurated a fresh covenant of kingship, acknowledging the Lord’s dominion; and the temple of BAAL was destroyed by the crowd (11:4 – 20). (See P. Dutcher-Walls, Narrative Art, Political Rhetoric: The Case of Athaliah and Joash [1996].)

The definition of the “people of the land” (2 Ki. 4:18) as a political force is not so clear in this context as in the closing years of the monarchy (see JEHOAHAZ). The view that they were “tempering for the remainder of the history of Judah the power of the monarchy” (J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Kings, ICC [1951], 417) may be an overstatement, for whereas the people elevated UZZIAH to the kingship, they seem to have had relatively little to do with making policy in the ensuing hundred years. Neither is it clear how “the people” could have maintained control from the accession of their chosen king until his majority. The “conservative circles of country nobility” postulated by G. von Rad appear largely hypothetical, and it is doubtful whether they can be equated with the “princes of Judah” who seem to have gravitated to Jerusalem. See AM HA-AREZ.

The concept of “the people,” however, comes to the fore at the coronation of Joash, and von Rad is undoubtedly right in drawing attention to the related phrases “people of the land” and “people of the Lord.” They were a free people who had almost been enslaved, and a covenant people who had neglected the covenant; for conservatism had not kept them from petty idolatry. This situation sufficiently explains the twin covenants made by Jehoiada, to the first of which (the one related in Chronicles) the king and the people stood as one party (2 Chr. 23:16; cf. Gen. 17:7). In the second covenant, there was a return to the traditional concept of the kingship; it is probable that the testimony (perhaps an inscribed stone or tablet; see JBL 67 [1938]: 181) was related to this notion. So Joash was enthroned, with Jehoiada as his tutor and regent.

The reign of Joash lasted forty years from 835 to 796 B.C. (so E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], 104; others puts the death of Joash in the year 800). See CHRONOLOGY (OT). The reign was not very distinguished, and it ended miserably; for after Jehoiada’s death, Joash was persuaded to allow the revival of pagan worship, which led to much opposition from the prophets. In the end, he was responsible for the martyrdom of ZECHARIAH son of Jehoiada; and at the end of the year, after a disastrous raid by HAZAEL of ARAM in which Joash was badly wounded and lost many of his leading men, he was assassinated by two of his servants—

JOZACAR (or Zabad) and JEHOZABAD, sons of an Ammonite woman and a Moabite woman respectively (2 Ki. 12:20 – 21; 2 Chr. 24:17 – 27).

The circumstances of Joash's death are not altogether clear. The text of 2 Ki. 12:21 (lit., the officials "smote Joash [in] the house of Millo going down to Silla") is obscure and some scholars emend it. The Chronicler, working evidently from another source, connects the assassination directly with the raid and may be taken to mean that he was deserted by his guards on the field of battle, or in his palace afterward. In this case the words "going down" (Kings) would hardly be appropriate unless Joash was being carried. "The house of Millo" is also obscure; the phrase is elsewhere used only of what was apparently an enclosed quarter of SHECHEM (Jdg. 9). The MILLO of Jerusalem (always with the article) is well known as a made-up part of the fortified city (the NIV renders BETH MILLO). According to Chronicles, Joash was not buried in the existing royal tombs; the phrase in Kings "with his fathers" is capable of a wider meaning than "in their tombs"; and Chronicles agrees on his burial in the city, as befitted a king (see S. Yeivin in JNES 7 [1948]: 32, 36).

The Aramean attack (2 Ki. 12:17 – 18) appears to have taken place some fifteen years before the death of Joash, at the beginning of Hazael's domination of the coastal plain; his interest at that time was in the trade route to Egypt. This was probably before the rebuilding of the temple, which was the main achievement of Joash, and which began in the twenty-third year of his reign. After years of neglect, and of spoliation by the Baalists, the temple—well past its century when Joash came to the throne—was in need of structural repairs. It was first arranged that these should be financed, as particular defects were observed, from the taxes that the priests were to collect and from the general fund of freewill offerings; but by 813 B.C. it was evident that nothing effective had been done, and it may be inferred from 2 Ki. 12:13 that any available money had been spent on furniture and utensils.

The fault lay in the system in the first place, though it might be regretted that the temple fabric was always left as the last call on the priests' income, so that in practice nothing was ever begun. Perhaps it seemed too big a problem for ad hoc treatment, and so was always put off. The king imposed a reform by which the priests were relieved of responsibility for maintenance, and in return gave up their right to collect and dispose of the taxes, retaining only the dues or contributions directly relating to the service of the sanctuary. A special fund was launched, controlled jointly by the king and high priest, and the people responded with enthusiasm; indeed, when work on the building had been completed, there was a surplus available for equipment.

(In 2003 an inscription was discovered in which “[the son of] Ahaziah” claims to have acquired materials for the restoration of the temple. The inscription ends with the words: “and this day will be for a statute because the work prospered. May YHWH ordain blessing for his people.” The Examining Committees of the Israeli Antiquities Authority concluded that this so-called Yehoash Inscription is a forgery, but some scholars dispute these findings. See the discussion by S. Norin in VT 55[2005]:61 – 74.)

(8) Son of JEHOAHAZ and twelfth (thirteenth, if TIBNI is counted) king of Israel (2 Ki. 13:10 – 25; 14:8 – 16; 2 Chr. 25:17 – 24). To distinguish him from Joash son of Ahaziah, king of Judah, this king of Israel is often referred to by his alternate name, Jehoash (cf. NIV); that practice will be followed in this article. Jehoash was the third king in the line of JEHU; he reigned sixteen years, from the thirty-seventh of Joash of Judah to the fifteenth of AMAZIAH (2 Ki. 13:10; 14:23). The cross references (particularly 14:1; Amaziah’s reign began in the second year of Joash) corroborate Thiele’s hypothesis of a return to postdating by this time in the source chronicles of both kingdoms (Mysterious Numbers, 111 – 12). The second year of Jehoash of Israel was the thirty-ninth and last of Joash of Judah, conformably with the statement (12:1) that he reigned forty years (by the traditional method of inclusive reckoning). The sixteen years of Jehoash, the first reign in the northern kingdom to be postdated, are reckoned exclusive of the accession year and run from 798 to 782 (for an earlier dating, see J. H. Hayes and P. K. Hooker, A New Chronology for the Kings of Israel and Judah [1988], 47 – 48). Thiele (Mysterious Numbers, 108 – 11) further argues that JEROBOAM II was coregent from 793/792; for when Amaziah died, fifteen years after Jehoash, his son Azariah (UZZIAH) succeeded him in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam (2 Ki. 15:1).

For the situation at the beginning of the reign of Jehoash, see JEHOAHAZ. Adadnirari III of Assyria (810 – 782) had already forced the Arameans to submit and pay heavy tribute (ANET, 281 – 82). HAZAEL died, and his son BEN-HADAD III was not in the same class as a military leader. Jehoash inflicted three defeats on him that marked the beginning of Israel’s political revival. The story is preserved of how this event was prophesied by ELISHA as he lay dying (2 Ki. 13:14 – 25). Jehoash obviously had a great regard for Elisha, although he retained allegiance to the cult of Bethel; he showed more concern at losing Elisha than faith in Elisha’s God. Consequently, his response to the prophet’s demand for symbolic action was halfhearted. With Elisha’s hands on his, in token of the power of God in a human instrument, he shot an arrow; and Elisha assured him of victory. Then the prophet told him to take arrows and pitch them into the ground. Jehoash was not entering into the spirit of the thing; he pitched three and waited. Very disappointed, Elisha foresaw that the answer to prayer would be limited by the king’s uncertainty, which betrayed his lack of earnestness and faith (cf. Jas. 1:7 – 8).

It is interesting that at least one battle was fought in APHEK, almost certainly in the valley running eastward from Lake KINNERETH toward BASHAN (the other sites of this name, SE of Samaria and N of Carmel, are unlikely). This detail shows that Syria (Aram) was still very much concerned with the TRANSJORDAN trade route, and that Israel had not abandoned the GILEAD area either. Defeat of the Arameans relieved pressure on Galilee.

In 2 Ki. 14:8 – 14 is recorded the defeat of Amaziah by Jehoash at BETH SHEMESH, which may well have occasioned the start of Uzziah's coregency (791/790 B.C.). Some background to this affair is given in 2 Chr. 25; Amaziah had hired men from Israel to join him against EDOM and had sent them home before the campaign, at the behest of a prophet. They got their pay, but no booty; and they vented their resentment on the border towns. It may have been for this reason that Amaziah, confident in the flush of victory, challenged Jehoash to defend his border at the western end; but the Israelites won the battle and sacked Jerusalem. Jehoash took hostages; it is not clear whether these were in addition to, or in exchange for, Amaziah himself. C. F. Keil (KD, Kings, 382 – 83) is probably right that Jehoash was more concerned with political security than with plunder—hence also his destruction of a length of wall not adjoining the temple, so that the breach was not defensible from the flank.

These events may be dated to 791 or perhaps a little earlier; but it is not at all certain that Jehoash made his son coregent as a precaution against his own death in the battle, as C. Schedl suggests (in VT 12 [1962]: 97); the regency began not later than 792, and it does not appear that the campaign was planned far ahead. The immediate reason for making Jeroboam coregent so early in the reign is thus obscure, though the general aim of securing the dynasty is not in doubt.

8. A special problem

I. Archaeological and linguistic background. The uniqueness of the book of Job derives from the depth and thoroughness with which it treats the subjects of human SUFFERING and THEODICY. Numerous documents from the ancient biblical world touch upon these matters but none so eloquently and so fully as Job. There was “The First Job” (S. N. Kramer, History Begins at Sumer [1956], 114 – 18), a man who in his affliction complained to his “personal” god in the course of his wailing for mercy: “My companion says not a true word to me, / My friend gives the lie to my righteous word... / My God...how long will you neglect me, leave me unprotected?” This “Job,” like his biblical counterpart, was restored: “His god harkened to his bitter tears and weeping,” which “soothed the heart of his god.”

Another poetic monologue also written in the 2nd millennium B.C. is commonly called, “I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom” (ANET, 434 – 37). This Babylonian “Job” is not unlike the Sumerian, for as a righteous sufferer he reckons with the thought that MARDUK his god rules the world and allows him to suffer, but that by means of ritual piety he will obtain mercy. He had his doubts: “Oh that I only knew that these things are well pleasing to a god” (2.33). But he too is restored and ends with a thanksgiving hymn and offerings which “make happy the mood” of the gods and “gladden their hearts” (4.40).

These documents deal with suffering, but in a very simple way. Others more remote touch on some aspects of the book of Job but are hardly to be compared. For example, in “A Dispute over Suicide” (ANET, 405 – 7), a man of Egypt debates with his “KA” (soul?) over suicide because times are so bad (between the Old and Middle Kingdoms) and there is no justice or love anymore. He finally decides death is better because men then become like gods in the nether world. As Job longed for an advocate (Job 9:33; 16:19,21; 19:25 – 27), so this man pleads for the advocacy of the gods and feels he is presenting his case before a divine tribunal (ANET, 405 n. 2). A somewhat superficial but striking likeness to the book of Job is the A-B-A literary format in this document, which begins, as does Job, with a short prose prologue, then follows a long poetic section and finally an epilogue in prose. This pattern finds expression in other ANE documents.

The only document dealing with the subject of theodicy is “A Dialogue about Human Misery” (ANET, 438). This is more like Job, being a dialogue involving a friend who accuses the sufferer of imbecility and evil thoughts and suggests he put aside such thoughts and seek the gracious favor of a god. The sufferer complains that animals do not have to make offerings, and even men who get rich quickly do so without paying attention to the gods while he who has done all this from his youth suffers. The friend warns him that “The mind of the god, like the center of the heavens, is remote; his knowledge is difficult, men cannot understand it” (lines 256 – 57). The friend’s view seems to be that the gods have made men perverse and there is nothing that can be done about it. “Falsehood and untruth, they (the gods) conferred upon them forever” (line 280). The sufferer finally appeals to the gods for mercy and here the dialogue ends on a fatalistic note. The text comes from not earlier than about 1000 B.C.

Hence, we see that while the literary genre and overall format of the Job literature comes from the world of which it was a part, there is really nothing extant that compares with the biblical book in its philosophical and theological profundity. Moreover, the book of Job cannot be forced into any single classification as to its literary form. It is generally called WISDOM Literature, which was common in the biblical world, but it has other elements, such as drama and epic. Because the book is largely HEBREW POETRY (the dialogues) and poetry is the most difficult and the most archaic form of a language, Job abounds in hapax legomena (see HAPAX LEGOMENON). The syntax and orthography tend to represent a dialect other than the substratum of Judaic Hebrew found in most other parts of the OT (see HEBREW LANGUAGE). One must therefore turn to cognate languages that have an extensive literature, such as Arabic and ARAMAIC, for help in vocabulary and elements of grammar (see LANGUAGES OF THE ANE II).

Job has a strong Aramaic flavor, leading some to the view that the book was originally written in that language and later translated into Hebrew (cf. N. H. Tur-Sinai, The Book of Job: A New Commentary [1957]), but few agree. The mythological texts from UGARIT, a large corpus being poetry, have shed a great amount of light on both the language and text of Job. There are those who feel the book is possibly some form of Edomite (see EDOM), Job being regarded as one of “the people of the East” (Job 1:3); but there are no Edomite literary documents to test this view.

II. Authorship and literary unity. Is the book of single or composite authorship? The typical higher-critical approach would make it a gradual aggregation of materials on an original base. Among the dialogues, the Wisdom Poem of Job 28, the Elihu speeches in chs. 32 – 37, and the divine discourses in chs. 38 – 41 are said to be additions. Much has been made of the supposed incongruities between the prologue, epilogue, and dialogues of the book. In the prologue Job is presented as a saint of God who will not curse God and die, but in the discourses his complaints are bitter to the point of being shocking, while his friends seem to be saying all the right things. Then comes the unexpected rebuke of the friends and the commendation of Job in the epilogue.

These features are said to destroy the unity of the book, and when added to the different literary form (prose vs. poetry) and such things as Job’s ritual piety in the prologue-epilogue, some have concluded the latter came from a different source. Ordinarily the claim is made that the prologue-epilogue represents an old epic tale that was used as a framework by the author of the dialogues. This tale about a legendary figure whose name was Job (cf. Ezek. 14:14, 20) was used to give more advanced concepts about theodicy a proper feel of antiquity. Heinrich Ewald, who advances this view (Commentary on the Book of Job [1882], 17—21), says that it is not fully legitimate to ask “whether the work of the poet as we possess it contains history or fiction, as if a third thing were not possible” (p. 20). The idea here is that the book is an artistic masterpiece put together skillfully by a great poet who used materials available to him. While it is true that the book does not claim to be written by Job (the prologue-epilogue is about him), nevertheless the discourses do claim to be from the lips of the same sufferer, and the integrity of the book is impaired if this is not so.

Returning to the problem of the apparent incongruities mentioned above, the Israeli scholar Y. Kaufmann (The Religion of Israel [1960], 335) explains God’s rebuking the friends and not Job by suggesting that they were guilty of conventional clichés and empty phrases, while Job had challenged God out of a moral duty to speak only the truth before him. This is much more satisfactory than assuming, as some do, that the book has lost a large portion in which the friends, like his wife, told Job to curse God and die. Job himself accused his friends of saying things they did not believe to curry favor with God (Job 13:7 – 8). Without assuming there are no deletions or interpolations at all in Job, a fair mind must see the singular organic unity of this sizable piece of literature from OT times. The brevity of Bildad’s speech and the omission of Zophar in chs. 24 – 27, added to Job’s suddenly taking up his friend’s argument, may indicate such a deletion and interpolation; but the complaints of some scholars against the first divine speech (ch. 38), on the basis that God seems indifferent to man’s predicament, is simply a modern rejection of one of the book’s most profound teachings regarding the sovereignty of God.

III. Date and canonicity. It is possible that the book of Job existed outside Israel for some time in oral form or even that it was partially written until an unknown Israelite author under divine inspiration put it into its present literary form. This would account for the non-Israelite flavor of the book, but also for its unquestioned place in the Hebrew CANON. It seems likely that Job himself lived in the 2nd millennium B.C. (2000 – 1000) and shared a tradition not far removed from the patriarchs. Job’s longevity of 140 years, his position as a man whose wealth was measured in cattle possessions, and the picture of roving Sabeian and Chaldean tribesmen fit the 2nd millennium better than a later period. The book, however, may not have reached its final form until the 1st millennium, perhaps in the Solomonic Age or somewhat later, when Hebrew Wisdom Literature was at its height. Attempts to put the authorship of Job in postexilic times, or even down to as late as the 2nd cent. B.C., have been dealt a decisive blow by the discovery of fragments of Job written in paleo-Hebrew script among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

It is most amazing that a book with nothing distinctively Israelite about it should find a place as part of the Hebrew canon and never be seriously challenged. This proves that the Hebrews recognized the superior spiritual message of this book from the earliest times. Since INSPIRATION was the test for canonicity, and a major test for inspiration was the acceptance of the book by the community of God's people, the Hebrews included Job in their canon of holy inspired books, placing it in the third section, called KETUBIM, "Writings" (also known as the HAGIOGRAPHIA). The place of the book with relationship to PSALMS and PROVERBS has varied. Our English Bible follows the tradition reflected in the SEPTUAGINT, while printed editions of the Hebrew Bible follow the order Psalms, Proverbs, Job.

IV. Place of origin. Although Job is called "the greatest man among all the people of the east" (Job 1:3), the exact place of origin cannot be determined, just as the exact date is uncertain. The strong Aramaic flavor may mean that Job and his friends lived near the centers of Aramaic influence. During the 2nd millennium, that would have been ARAM NAHARAIM (Aram of the Two Rivers) or northern MESOPOTAMIA. At the end of the millennium Aramean tribes moved S, settling on the borders of Babylonia and Palestine, but continued to control the caravan route through the Khabur area, and at this time ALEPPO and DAMASCUS became Aramean centers. This was also the time when the Chaldean tribes invaded Babylonia (CAH 3 [1925], 4). If Job 1:17 means that Chaldean tribes were still roving, the event could reflect a time before they settled at about 1000 B.C. See ARAM (COUNTRY); CHALDEA.

According to Gen. 36:15, a certain ELIPHAZ was the firstborn of ESAU, and TEMAN was one of the chiefs. Esau was considered the progenitor of Edom, and geographically Teman was an Edomite city. Edom was apparently noted for its centers of wisdom (Jer. 49:7). Job, therefore, may have called in his counselors because of their fame for wisdom. Job himself lived in the land of Uz (Job 1:1), an area associated with the Arameans (Gen. 10:23; 22:20 – 22). The latter passage (22:22) also ties in KESED (the Chaldeans) with the Arameans and the Uzites but does not make them identical. These passages refer to nations or tribes that were related sometimes only by their proximity. The land of Uz was E of Palestine but its precise location cannot be determined. Job had great influence in some town (Job 29:7) the name of which is not given. Edom was closely associated with the land of Uz (Lam. 4:21). It seems then that Uz might have been the name of a wide region encompassing many tribes E of Palestine from Edom to Aram.

V. Text. Studies in the SEPTUAGINT of Job have shown that the oldest Greek text is shorter than the MT. This ancient Greek version omitted difficult lines, and subsequently ORIGEN filled in the missing material from Theodotion's translation. The Greek text is also somewhat of a paraphrase showing according to some a theological bias in places (M. H. Pope, Job, AB 15, 3rd ed. [1973], xlv).

Among other versions, the most helpful is the Syriac, through which the meaning of rare Hebrew words can sometimes be detected. A Latin translation comes directly from the Hebrew by JEROME in the 4th cent. A.D. Jerome was strongly influenced by the rabbis who taught him Hebrew but also by Origen's recension of the SEPTUAGINT. See VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE, ANCIENT. The MT is still the best source for the text of Job. Several pieces of a lost Targum of Job were found among the DSS (see JOB, TARGUM OF).

VI. Purpose and teaching. The author of the book of Job purposes to show how the theological position of Job's friends represents a shallow and only partial observation of life, namely, that human suffering is always proportionate to a person's sins. There is no studied attempt to justify God with regard to the innocent suffering, but the author does show God has higher purposes, and far from abandoning the sufferer communicates with him at the proper time. A subsidiary purpose is to show that though people are often sinful, weak, and ignorant, they can, like Job, be relatively pure and upright even when in the midst of emotional turmoil and spiritual testing. SATAN was permitted to test Job sorely through the instrumentality of would-be helpers who used the language of traditional piety.

Job's problem was the vexing question of theodicy, that is, the justice of God in relation to the suffering of the innocent. The book pursues a middle way between fatalism—where divine power originates evil, as in the Babylonian Theodicy—and a view of human freedom that would ignore the SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD. There is no attempt to give a rational or philosophical solution to the problem of evil. The picture is the same as that given in Genesis, where the accuser (Satan), as a creature of God, subject to his will yet in rebellion, bears the responsibility for Job's trouble, although, indeed, he is permitted to do so by God. The problem of theodicy is left on the note that God is a sovereign Deity who made and sustains all that is, who in his OMNIPOTENCE and OMNISCIENCE can and does use secondary means to bring about his higher and perfect purposes. One of these higher purposes in Job's suffering is to prove to Satan that Job did not live righteously only that he might prosper. Satan challenges God to prove that Job's devotion is pure not only by removing his wealth but also by destroying his health.

Initially Job stands the test even when his wife says, "Curse God and die!" (Job 2:9). But as his troubles multiply, Job has second thoughts and in his dialogues with his counselors he wrestles with God, challenges God, sinks into depths of despair, and rises to peaks of trust and confidence in God. Throughout the book, Job defends his own essential innocence (not sinlessness) in rejecting the view of his friends, which rarely moves from the single theme that suffering is the immediate corollary of sin, and that because Job has grievously sinned God has become his enemy. Their view Job emphatically rejects, but his own view seems to be in a state of flux, for he says many unfortunate things. Yet, in it all, he does not do what Satan said he would; he does not curse God to his face (2:5).

While the counselors make no progress in their arguments, Job grows more and more serene as he approaches his eventual confrontation with God for which he has been asking. Job wants to argue his case before almighty God and also calls for an advocate to plead his cause at the divine tribunal. He is confident he will be vindicated, if not in this life, then later; but he is certain it will be in the flesh (Job 19:26). The counselors said many good things, but they could not seem to move from the fallacious idea that the righteous always prosper and sinners always suffer, and conversely, that suffering always implies sin and prosperity always implies righteousness. Their view was not always put so crassly. Eliphaz implies that since all have sinned, suffering is to some extent due to all and therefore the righteous might suffer a little and the unrighteous prosper a little, but that the righteous never come to an untimely end (4:7; 18:16 – 19); and the wicked when they prosper are in dread of the calamity ahead that they deserve (15:20 – 35).

Another feature of their monotonous arguments is that even if an unrighteous person prospers all his life his children will eventually pay the penalty (Job 5:4; 20:10). Their idea that suffering is chastisement to purify the character (5:17 – 27) is quite in keeping with the rest of Scripture. Much of their argument is thus orthodox expression, true in the abstract, but it did not necessarily apply to Job. It is not so much what they say that offends Job, but what they leave out, which makes what they say only a part of the truth. They finally reach the conclusion that since Job seems so obstinate and refuses even the idea of the disciplinary purpose of his suffering, he must have committed sins of great enormity. The position of the friends was normative Mesopotamian thought, but the OT also has in it the stories of such innocent sufferers as ABEL, URIA, and NABOTH. Jesus, of course, taught his disciples that individual retribution in this life simply does not follow. “Neither this man nor his parents sinned...but this happened so that the work of God might be displayed in his life” (Jn.9:3).

Some have suggested the OT sometimes shares in this erroneous view. For example, Ps. 1:3 says of the righteous, “Whatever he does prospers,” and Ps. 37:25 says, “I was young and now I am old, yet I have never seen the righteous forsaken or their children begging bread.” This discrepancy is superficial because the Psalms are not making specific applications, as were the counselors of Job, but are expressing general principles. Perhaps the point where Job was agonizing the most was how to integrate those valid parts of what the friends said with his own experience. Job had no answer because God has not seen fit to give mortals a reason for everything he does. So Job blows hot and cold. Sometimes he blames the Lord for tormenting him and wishes God would leave him alone (Job 7:17 – 21; 10:20; 19:22). At other times he yearns for God to communicate with him (14:15) and wishes that he might see God. This emotional instability of Job in all likelihood arose from an internal conflict based on his intellectual acceptance of this false view of suffering (so much for so much sin), which conflicted with his experience.

The question arises as to whether the purpose of the book is to formulate an exact rational answer to the problem of theodicy, the justice of God in innocent suffering. In all Job’s dialogues he nowhere calls for such, nor does the Lord give such an answer when he appears to speak to Job and his friends. What Job does call for is a vindication of the fact that he has not committed heinous sins for which he is being punished. When God does rebuke Job, it is for his ignorance (Job 38:2, 13) and presumption (42:2), not for a profligate life. God is apparently telling Job in chs. 38 – 41 that neither he nor his friends know enough about his ways to make judgments concerning the Tightness of his dealings with men. This impugns especially the strictness of the friends and their whole theory of suffering, which implicitly laid claim to complete knowledge of God’s ways.

Even though in his appearance God does not deal with the problem of theodicy and gives no rational explanation or excuse for Job’s suffering, nevertheless Job is not crushed, only rebuked, and even that not as severely as his friends (Job 42:7). Job now realizes God does not need human advice to control the world and that no extreme of suffering gives one the right to question God’s wisdom or justice, and for this failure he repents (42:2 – 6). On seeing the power and glory of God, Job's rebellious attitude dissolves and his resentment disappears. Job now gets at least part of what he sought for: his friends do not see him pronounced guilty and therefore the idea that suffering is proof of sin is refuted.

Nowhere does God impugn the basic integrity of Job's character; hence Satan has failed and Job's testing has come to an end. He has not demanded restoration, only vindication of his character; but God, having achieved his higher purpose through Job, now restores him who in his suffering, despite moments of weakness, surpassed in righteousness those who had not suffered as he had. After all his doubts and bitterness, Job arrived at that point of spiritual maturity where he could pray for those who abused him (Job 42:10; cf. Lk. 6:28). The issues raised in this book are indeed among the most profound and difficult of human existence. The answer was already on Job's lips in the prologue when he said, "The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away; may the name of the LORD be praised" (1:21b); and later, "Shall we accept good from God, and not trouble?" (2:10). The truth Job knew was that God must be God, and that of all values and all existence only God and his glory must ultimately prevail.

  2. Job restored (42:10 – 17)

The following summary of contents builds on the outline above.

A. The prologue (1:1—2:13). The prologue presents Job as a man of singular character and very prosperous. For reasons about which the reader is informed but which Job does not know, Job's wealth and health are taken from him while his character remains intact. The writer uses great restraint in the choice of details, giving no extraneous information; but in typical Semitic style he uses repetition skillfully for emphasis and effect (1:1, 8; 2:3 and 1:22; 2:10 and 1:14 – 19).

1. Job's felicity (1:1 – 5). Job was a man from the land of Uz, located somewhere E of Palestine on the edge of the desert (1:19). Here farming was carried on (1:14), and there was a town nearby (29:7). Job's wealth is given in terms similar to those used of the patriarchs, that is, animal possessions, sons and servants. Job is said to be "blameless and upright" (1:1; tām wěyāšār, lit., "complete and straight" in character).

2. Job tested (1:6—2:13). There are two scenes in heaven (1:6 – 11 and 2:1 – 5), each followed by a series of happenings that result from these encounters between the Lord and SATAN. In the first scene, Satan questions Job's motives in his religious devotion. "Does Job fear God for nothing?" (1:9). If God were to remove the hedge about Job and his house and let Satan smite him, Job would curse God to his face. After Job's children and wealth are taken away under the permissive will of God, still Job maintains his integrity toward God. Satan then calls on the Almighty to permit him to smite Job's body, for "a man will give all he has for his own life" (2:4). Satan then proceeds to afflict Job with a horrible disease. At this point even Job's wife advises, "Curse God and die!" (2:9); yet in spite of all these troubles, "Job did not sin in what he said" (v. 10).

It is at this point that Job's would-be comforters arrive. They sit with him seven days and nights mourning his affliction, and finally Job breaks the silence with the opening words of the so-called dialogues.

B. The dialogues (3:1—42:6)

1. Job curses the day of his birth (3:1 – 26). Job, now in a state of despondency, damns his own life. The theme continues throughout the chapter. He wishes that the day of his birth had never dawned

(vv. 4, 9) or that there might have been an eclipse of the sun (v. 5) or that it never would have been numbered among the days of the year (v. 6). He yearns that the diviners might have put a curse on it so that the rays of that dawn never would have come up. Would that he had been a stillbirth, for then Job imagines he might now be at rest or even in the company of the illustrious dead (v. 14) rather than a blighted man lying in squalor.

Job questions the wisdom of God in prolonging life for those who are in misery (v. 20) and who long for death (v. 21). He ends his sad soliloquy on the mournful thought that the thing he feared most has happened to him; that is, he is in a state of complete torment physically and emotionally and there is no deliverance, no end in sight. The state of mind Job displays in this chapter marks his lowest ebb, the nearest he ever came to fulfilling Satan's prediction that he would curse God to his face. This attitude resulted from the repeated question, why? (3:11, 20). Although not cursing God, he is certainly questioning God's sovereignty and wisdom, and for this he eventually repented (40:1 – 2; 42:1 – 6).

2. The first cycle of speeches (4:1—14:22)

(a) Eliphaz (4:1—5:27). ELIPHAZ the Temanite (see TEMAN), the oldest of the counselors, is the first to speak. He expresses both in words and in spirit the viewpoint that the friends will repeat over and over to Job. He begins modestly (4:2) and even a bit complimentary toward Job, but before his second statement is finished he is rebuking the sufferer (4:5) and telling Job that his only hope lies in a life of purity and fear of God (4:6). He gives expression to the traditional view of suffering in all its simplicity, the thought that the innocent do not perish but the plowers of iniquity reap the same (4:7 – 9). As an ultimate principle this idea is not invalid, but Eliphaz obviously is implicating Job and therefore applying the ultimate principle to a specific time and person which he did not know enough to do. The following verses (4:10 – 11) might be taken as a warning to Job, described as the old lion who does not die but just wastes away.

Eliphaz employs an age-old means for impressing others with one's religious authority. He tells of an occult experience, a vision in the night so frightening that his hair stood up (4:15): he heard a spirit announce in a hushed voice the otherness of God as One so far removed from his creatures of clay that they are like fragile moths whose lives meaninglessly pass away forever (4:17 – 21).

Eliphaz continues in ch. 5 to describe the lot of foolish sinners who never prosper and who always have trouble (vv. 1 – 7), but he presents himself as one who commits his way to God (vv. 8 – 16). By implication Eliphaz admonishes Job not to “despise the discipline of the Almighty” (vv. 17 – 27). If Job will only heed this discipline, he will soon find that he is prospering again (vv. 19, 24 – 26, et al.). Eliphaz finishes with the admonition that his great wisdom has come from his own research and therefore deserves close attention (v. 27).

(b) Job's reply (6:1—7:21). Job does not bother to answer Eliphaz specifically but continues to give vent to his anguish. How great his distress is! If weighed against his words, his vexation would be heavier than the sand of the sea. That is why he complains so vehemently, for he has ample unsalted food; worse, it is putrid. Job pleads again for death (6:8 – 13). He complains that his flesh is not made of stone or bronze; it would be a comfort for him to die. Job chides his friends for their lack of pity. A sick man should have the pity of his friends even if he renounced the fear of God, but his friends have betrayed him. They have seen him in this awful condition and have panicked even when he asked for nothing but honest words. This, he says, is exactly what they have failed to speak (v. 25). Job challenges them to prove their contention that he has grievously sinned. They are callous enough to cast lots over an orphan or barter over a friend (v. 27). He pleads that they soften up and see that what he says is right.

Job's reply continues in ch. 7. Addressing God, Job laments man's plight and hardship on earth (7:1 – 2). He describes in detail his own sad condition. "My flesh is clothed with worms and scabs, my skin is broken and festering" (v. 5). He laments the human predicament in death, when people seem simply to evaporate and vanish: "he who goes down to the grave does not return" (v. 9). At this Job says he will not restrain his tongue any longer (v. 11) but will complain with all the bitterness of his soul. He then begins to accuse God of tormenting him with dreams and nightmares, of being like a watchman over his soul, inspecting him every morning and testing him every moment. He asks God to leave him alone, forgive him, and let him lie down and die (vv. 12 – 21).

(c) Bildad (8:1-22). BILDAD the Shuhite (see SHUAH) now speaks. He charges Job with producing nothing but a big wind. If Job's children have sinned they have been punished for it and Job himself could be delivered if only he were pure and upright. Surely Job should study what the ancients have said and find out what happens to people who forget God. The wicked wither as plants do when they are deprived of water (vv. 11 – 13), and their confidence is like a spider's web (v. 14) that can be brushed away in a second (v. 18), but Job should realize God never rejects the upright (v. 20).

(d) Job's reply (9:1—10:22). Perhaps with sarcasm, Job agrees with what Bildad has said, but he does not see how one ever can be justified before God. He goes on to tell what he means by this statement: in argumentation God always wins, because he is too wise and powerful for us, no matter how clever or mighty we may be. Beginning in 9:5, Job describes God as the great controller of all the universe. "How then can I dispute with him? / How can I find words to argue with him?" (v. 14). Here Job seems to accuse God of being callous, as one who destroys both the guiltless and wicked (v. 22), and who laughs at the calamity of the innocent. Job continues to complain that God allows the earth to be controlled by the wicked: there is no justice on earth, and God is to blame (v. 24). Job's days are fleeing by and he has no hope because he feels God holds him guilty (v. 28). Even if he were clean (v. 30), God would plunge him in the muck so that his own clothes would abhor him. Moreover, the sufferer cannot even challenge God because the latter is so great. Job wishes for an arbiter who could equalize the situation (v. 33). He calls on God to put aside his club so that Job can speak to him without fear (v. 35).

But now Job says he is sick of life (10:1) and he is going to continue to give vent to his bitterness. He addresses God by asking if it is right that he should oppress and despise the creatures of his own hands while he favors the wicked (10:3). Job questions whether God can really sympathize with man's predicament (10:4 – 7). God will not let him alone even though he made man out of clay. Now he seeks to destroy him (10:8 – 9). Even though God fashioned his flesh and bones in the womb and granted him a time of happiness (10:10 – 12), yet God did it while planning to let him come to this horrible situation. Job sees himself as a victim whom God is oppressing as a lion stalks its prey (10:10). Why then did God allow him to be born? It would be better if God would let him alone for the few days he has left before he goes down to the land of darkness and gloom (10:20 – 22).

Despite Job's feeling of abandonment and his failure to see the love of God, it is obvious he is still wrestling spiritually and is by no means ready to curse God to his face.

(e) Zophar (11:1 – 20). ZOPHAR the Naamathite (see NAAMAH (PLACE)) takes up the challenge of Job lest it go unanswered. He will not allow Job's babbling to silence him. If God were to speak he would tell Job how guilty he is. God is greater than all; he sees and knows all the evil of humanity. If only Job will reach out a hand toward God and put away his evildoing, God would lift him up and he would be restored and soon forget all his troubles (vv. 13 – 19). Let Job keep in mind that the wicked have no refuge and no hope (v. 20).

(f) Job (12:1—14:22). Job addresses to his friends the first half of this reply (12:1—13:19); the second half he addresses to God (13:20—14:22). He starts by making sarcastic reference to the wisdom of his friends (vv. 1 – 2). Everything they have said he already knows (v. 3) but they understand very little of Job's troubles (vv. 4 – 5). They understand his problem about as well as do the beasts and creeping things (vv. 7 – 9). True, God is sovereign, controlling all things, but he seems to be capricious in the way he does it (vv. 20 – 25). Job claims he understands that God is almighty in wisdom and power (12:1 – 2), but he still wants to argue his case with God (v. 3). He accuses his "friends" of being dishonest, whitewashers, and worthless healers, because they overlook the real problem, namely, God's use of his might. They speak deceitfully in God's behalf (v. 7), piously contending for God in hope of currying favor with him (vv. 8 – 9). When God searches them out, they are going to be rebuked (vv. 9 – 12).

Job requests they keep quiet while he boldly speaks. Taking his life in his hand, he bravely declares that even if God slays him he has the confidence that he will yet (after death) maintain the basic integrity of his ways before God (vv. 13 – 16). He pleads with God to let him set out his case and is confident he will be justified (vv. 17 – 19). Two things Job requests of God: to withdraw his hand and cease terrifying him and to communicate with him (vv. 20–22). Then Job confesses his sins and pleads that God hide not his face nor become his enemy (vv.23 – 28).

In ch. 14 Job laments the human predicament, "few days and full of trouble" (14:1). God knows how pathetically short Job's days are. Why will he not forbear and let man enjoy his day (vv. 1–6)? Job compares man to a tree which though cut down can be revived by "the scent of water" (v. 9). Poor creature, who dies and does not rise for ages on end. Again Job yearns for death, but this time he suggests that he may live again. In a moment of supreme tranquility, Job confesses he will gladly suffer "all the days of [his] hard service" and wait patiently for his release to come when he will hear God call and have a happy relationship with him again (vv. 14–15). But Job sinks back again into despondency. He feels at the end of this discourse that God will not forgive him (v. 16), that he has no hope (v. 19) and must look for more pain (v. 22) and final death (v. 20).

3. The second cycle of speeches (15:1—21:34)

(a) Eliphaz (15:1–35). This time Eliphaz is not courteous toward Job. He frankly labels Job's speech as hot air and charges him as guilty of the worst kind of impiety because he talks as if he were the first man who ever lived, who has a monopoly on wisdom, especially the counsels of God. Does Job not know that his counselors are older than Job's father? Does he not know how unrighteous man is? For even the angels and heaven itself are impure in God's sight (vv. 11–16). In vv. 17–35 Eliphaz gives a lengthy harangue about the troubles that come on the wicked (meaning Job, of course), who stretch out their hands against God (v. 25).

(b) Job's reply (16:1—17:16). Job is sick of their prattle. If the tables were turned and they were suffering he could harangue them with words and shake his head at them (16:1–5). At this Job begins to use figures of speech to describe what he thinks are God's actions against him. God is as one gnashing upon him with his teeth. God has set him up like a target for the archers, and warriors breach him like the wall of a city is breached (vv. 9–14). His miserable condition is such that his face is red with weeping and his eyelids are covered with darkness (v. 16). There is no justification for this because there has been no violence in his hands and his prayers have not been hypocritical. Moreover, Job claims to have an advocate in heaven, one who pleads his cause before God, as a man pleads for his friend. This is the umpire of 9:33 and the vindicator of 19:25.

These advocate passages in the book of Job are an amazing insight into our deep need of a mediator between us and God. Job, with all his complaining, reached an understanding of the mystery of godliness which the counselors did not even approach. Theirs was an ad nauseam repetition of a defective view of suffering. When Job called for an advocate who could put his hand on God and on the creature, he was touching in a prophetic way on the need for a reconciler who would be both human and divine. The forensic aspect of the mediatorial work of Christ (Rom. 5:1–5) fulfilled the great need of the sinner, who stands in the presence of the Almighty overwhelmed and condemned. As a believer Job felt this need. How much he understood is open to question.

After this moment of hope Job sinks back into despair. His spirit is broken, his days are spent, he looks only for the grave (17:1–3). He has no plans, no desires, no hope (17:11–16).

(c) Bildad (18:1–21). Bildad has no patience with Job's speeches, and he cannot understand why Job thinks his friends are stupid as beasts. Does Job expect the world to stop for him (v. 4)? From v. 5 on he dwells on the horrible fate of the wicked people, obviously meaning Job. Such people may expect to have terrors on every side and to be afflicted with fatal disease and plucked from their home to face the king of terrors, death itself. Nor may they expect to have any posterity or remembrance in the earth.

(d) Job's reply (19:1–29). How long are Job's friends going to vex his soul with their accusing words? Cannot they see how violently God has dealt with him (vv. 6–7)? Certainly it is not right that he should be treated as an adversary of God (v. 11), an enemy that needs to be destroyed. God has caused his family and acquaintances to reject him (vv. 13–20). Will the friends join God in persecuting him, will they not have pity on him (vv. 21–22)? Job wishes that his protestation of integrity might be eternally recorded (vv. 23–24); perhaps implying that someday, then, they would see he is right. For Job knows that his Vindicator (Kinsman Redeemer; see GOEL; REDEMPTION) lives and will someday stand upon the earth and witness in his behalf (vv. 25–26). Job longs for that day when he himself will behold God (v. 27); on that day his friends will be judged for their false accusations.

(e) Zophar (20:1–29). Job's foolish words have made Zophar angry. Does Job not know one of the oldest facts of history (v. 4), that the wicked prosper only for a moment and then always perish forever like dung never to be seen again (vv. 7–9)? Even their children are reduced to poverty (v. 10) and the evil that seemed sweet becomes venom within the wicked (vv. 11–16). They never get to enjoy the riches gained by oppression and robbery (vv. 12–22) because God always punishes the wicked with his wrath (vv. 23–26). Even the heavens and the earth testify against the wicked, and the loss of everything is their portion from God (vv. 27–29).

(f) Job's reply (21:1–34). They have it all wrong, says Job, for the wicked often live to old age enjoying all kinds of prosperity (v. 7). Why is it that far from punishing them God appears to bless them even when they openly defy him (vv. 8–15)? Occasionally calamity comes to them, but how often (v. 17)? True, sometimes the children of the wicked suffer for their fathers' sins, but the wicked themselves escape (vv. 18–21). Those who enjoy prosperity and those who never taste the good things of life both end up in the dust (vv. 22–26). Job accuses his friends of being hostile toward him, even plotting against him (v. 27). But their ideas are no comfort at all and are sheer falsehood (v. 34). Any traveler can tell them how many wicked people prosper (vv. 29–30). The logic that says, "all the wicked suffer, Job suffers, and therefore Job is wicked," is simply not true to the facts.

4. The third cycle of speeches (22:1—31:40)

(a) Eliphaz (22:1–30). Man cannot benefit God by being righteous. On the other hand, does Job think God is reproving him for his righteousness? Indeed not, it is because his wickedness is great (vv. 1–5). Eliphaz now gives a detailed catalogue of the kinds of sin Job has probably committed. He accuses Job of oppressing the poor, the widow, and the orphan (vv. 5–9). God may be far away in heaven, but he sees and he will surely punish (vv. 12–20). So why does not Job yield to him and repent and take delight in the Almighty, who will surely hear and restore Job and even enable him to intercede for others (vv. 21–30)?

(b) Job's reply (23:1—24:25). God's hand is heavy on Job but still he cannot find God so that he might lay his case before him (23:1–7). Yes, God eludes him (vv. 8–9) perhaps because God knows Job's cause is just (v. 10) and that he is an upright man who has not neglected the Lord's commandments (vv. 11–12); and yet God continues to terrify him (vv. 13–17). Job then questions why God has not set times to judge the ungodly (24:1–2) when there is so much violence and oppression in the earth (vv. 3–17).

Some believe that beginning at 24:18 Job takes up the argument of his counselors, that is, that the wicked do not prosper. The RSV, for example, adds the words, "You say" (not found in the Heb. text), so that vv. 18–20 appear as a quotation of their argument. Others think this is a misplaced portion and belongs to one of the counselors (Pope, Job, xviii).

(c) Bildad (25:1–6). Bildad now gives a short speech in which he dwells on the majesty of God, who rules with awesome power (vv. 2–3) and before whom man, a mere maggot or worm, cannot possibly be pure (vv. 4–6). Some believe that Bildad's argument is brief because the dialogue has broken down, the arguments are exhausted. Others (cf. Pope, Job, xviii) maintain that something has happened to the text in chs. 24–27 and that 26:5–14, where Job deals with God's power, should be appended to 25:1–6. Also suggested is the insertion of the words "Zophar the Naamathite answered" before 27:8, since Zophar's third speech, which completes the cycle, is otherwise missing (the subject matter of 27:8–23 is said to be the counselors' argument about God's punishment of the wicked). That Zophar had a third speech is questionable. In 27:11–12, Job seems to be rebuking his friends. It is entirely possible that Job, finally realizing he was overstating the case about the wicked's prosperity, now balances his argument with a firm statement of God's punishment of the wicked.

(d) Job's reply (26:1—27:23). Once again Job with irony rebukes his friends for giving no help (26:2–4). In contrast to their powerlessness and lack of wisdom, Job extols the power and wisdom of God in a magnificent soliloquy (vv. 5–14). It is God who hung the earth on nothing (v. 7), who binds up the waters in thick clouds (v. 8), who set the limit to the circle of the horizon (v. 10), who makes the pillars of the heavens (the mountains) tremble (v. 11), who by his strength can stir up or make calm the elements, whether in the boisterous sea or in the heavens (vv. 12–13). All this is but a small whisper of the thunder of his power (v. 14). Although Job uses terms common in Canaanite mythology—Yam (the SEA), RAHAB (MONSTER), and the fleeing serpent (cf. Isa. 27:1)—his reference is to natural phenomena with which these names were identified.

Those who claim Zophar had a third speech usually begin it at about 27:8 and assume that an introductory line was lost or taken out by an overzealous scribe who wanted to tone down Job's argument. But it is just as likely that Job awaited Zophar's reply and, when none came, he then took up again the discourse (27:1); here for the first time he uses a solemn oath (v. 2) to declare his integrity and their deceit in accusing him (v. 5).

(e) Job's poem on wisdom (28:1–28). It is said that either Job himself or the Israelite writer who composed the book at this point inserted a poem on the inscrutable wisdom of God. If this is Job speaking, how do his words fit into the rest of his argument? And how could a man having such a disturbed state of mind give a poem so full of meditative tranquility? On the latter point it is well known that people who are disturbed sometimes produce poems or hymns in unexplained moments of extreme serenity. Nor dare one ignore the influence of the Spirit of God on Job. Many of the things he has said were his own fallible reasoning. Now, near the end of his rope, and still without a satisfactory answer to the conflict raging within him of how to reconcile his sufferings with his own integrity of life, he turns his mind to the wisdom of God. The human ability to find and extract precious metals and gems from the earth is amazing, but people cannot find wisdom so easily (v. 12). After a grand comparison of these human achievements (vv. 1–11) with the wisdom of the Almighty (vv. 12–27), Job asserts that true wisdom is to fear the Lord and obey him.

(f) Job's closing soliloquy and oath (29:1—31:40). Job begins his final remarks by recalling his former happy and prosperous condition, when everyone poor and rich, young and old respected him (29:1–10). Those were the days when he was a champion of the poor, the orphan, and the widow. He was "eyes to the blind and feet to the lame," and he resisted the wicked (29:11–17). Surely, he thought, he would continue a strong man into ripe old age (29:18–20). Instead boys whose fathers were beneath him are now deriding him (30:1–7), and even worse he has become a gibe to vile hoodlums (30:15–23). Job laments that he who once wept for the needy and the poor now finds himself forsaken, lonesome, diseased, and dying (30:24–31).

In ch. 31 Job employs a form associated with ANE oaths of COVENANT allegiance to emphasize his final protestation of innocence. A vassal would use a formulation in which he called down curses on himself as proof that he was free from violating any of the stipulations laid down by his Sovereign. Such an oath was believed to have great efficacy and therefore was the ultimate test of honesty (cf. Exod. 22:10–11; Num. 5:20–22; Deut. 27:11–26; 28:18, 31, 35; 1 Ki. 8:31–32; note also the Hittite Soldiers' Oath, ANET, 353–54). Job's protestation of innocence is likened also to the negative confession in the Egyptian Book of the Dead, where the deceased at the final judgment lists the sins he has not done (ANET, 34). It is difficult for modern Westerners to realize the importance of the steps Job is taking: in his culture these were more meaningful than swearing before a judge and jury, where perjury has far less terrifying sanctions. By taking such oaths and affixing his signature (ANET, 35), Job closed the argument; there was nothing more the counselors could say, for Job must either suffer the sanctions or be acquitted.

The list of sins Job denies are largely social sins; he has not committed adultery (31:9–12) nor mistreated slaves, recognizing the unity of the human race as creatures of God (vv. 13–15). Nor has he ever oppressed the poor, the widowed, or the orphan; on the contrary, he has raised orphans from infancy (vv. 16–20). He has never trusted in gold or gloated over his wealth (vv. 24–25), nor has he ever worshiped, even secretly, the heavenly bodies (vv. 26–27), an act that would be a betrayal of God (v. 28). He has never rejoiced at the misfortune of his enemy nor even cursed his foe (vv. 29–30), nor even abused the tenants on his land (vv. 38–40). Job has kept his household pure and his door always has been open to the traveler (vv. 31–32). Therefore, far from hiding from God as did Adam, Job challenges God to write an indictment against him; rather than run from God he wants to confront God like a prince (vv. 35–37). While most of what Job says about himself may be true, one detects the smell of self-righteousness. The next speaker, Elihu, evidently was appointed by God to rebuke Job for this.

5. Elihu's speeches (32:1—37:24)

(a) First speech (32:1—33:33). The first six verses, written in prose, introduce a new character, Elihu son of Barakel the Buzite (see Buz), who was standing on the side listening to the debate. When the three failed to answer Job's oaths, an arrogant spirit of self-righteousness made the anger of this young man flare up. He injects himself into the discourse apologizing for his presumption while pointing out that wisdom is a gift of God and does not come automatically with age (32:7–9). He will speak without flattery nor be partial to any (vv. 21–22).

Elihu then assures Job, who has complained that God is too much for man (cf. 9:34), that he can dispute with Job on equal terms, for he is a fellow creature of clay (33:1–7). He then reminds Job of his own words (vv. 9–11) as spoken in 13:24b and 13:27a, where the patriarch in protesting his own innocence accuses God of making himself Job's enemy. He flatly tells Job he is wrong in this (33:12) and challenges Job's accusation that God ignores him (v. 13; cf. 19:7; 30:20).

On the contrary, God reveals himself in various ways to human beings. Sometimes by dream he seeks to deter them from evil, to spare them of sin's consequences (33:15–18); or it may be at the last minute on the bed of mortal illness, when an angel intervenes and pleads the cause of the sufferer, that God in grace accepts a ransom for his life and restores the sinner (vv. 23–26). Sinners should sing hymns in praise of God's grace. The words of such a hymn Elihu includes in the text (vv. 27–28). This evidence of grace God displays not once but often twice and thrice with a sinner (v. 29). Elihu has shown the chastening aspect of suffering and how it is a work of God's grace. Job has no reply (vv. 31–33).

(b) Second speech (34:1–37). Elihu's second speech follows the same pattern as the first. He calls for a hearing (vv. 2–4), quotes Job's words (vv. 5–9), then attempts to answer Job (vv. 10–28), ending with a challenge to Job to give an answer if he can (vv. 33). The young man attacks Job at a vulnerable spot, Job's denial of divine justice (v. 9). He defends God as one who does only goodness and justice (vv. 10–12, 21–28). Indeed it is only because of the goodness of God that people continue their lives on earth (vv. 13–15). How could God govern the universe if he were not just? Job blasphemes the almighty Sovereign, so he is guilty of rebellion and has spoken without wisdom (v. 35). Job ought to be tried for his rebellion (vv. 36–37).

(c) Third speech (35:1–16). The exact meaning of Elihu is somewhat elusive at the beginning of this chapter, but it becomes clear from v. 3 that he opposes Job in his idea that righteousness does not pay. This would mean that God is not just. Elihu uses an argument already used by Eliphaz (22:2–4), that man cannot add or detract from God by his righteousness or evil (35:5–7), and therefore God's administration of justice is always fair. If it appears to sinners that God is indifferent to human virtue or wickedness, it is only because of the pride of their heart, because they do not seek God aright, to praise him as God (vv. 9–13). Job should not be so impatient, for in God's own time he will administer justice (vv. 14–16).

(d) Fourth speech (36:1—37:24). Elihu expresses his complete dedication to upholding the righteousness of the Creator (36:2–3), but it is difficult to tell whether he is ascribing perfect knowledge to himself or God (36:4b). God is also all powerful and he does punish the wicked and reward the righteous (vv. 5–9). One of his major purposes in sending affliction is discipline (vv. 10–12). When sinners learn their lessons God delivers them (v. 11). The godless in heart react in rage to God's warnings (vv. 13–14), but to the godly affliction becomes the means by which they are delivered (vv. 15–16). Job must be careful that he receive God's chastening in the right spirit (vv. 17–21). Rather, Job should magnify God for his great works (v. 22) and never blame God (v. 23) but join those who sing his doxologies (v. 24).

From here on Elihu extols the Lord in hymnic stanzas as the Maker and Controller of all earth's meteorological forces: the rain and evaporation cycle (vv. 26–28), the thunderstorm (36:29—37:4), the snow (37:6), the tornado (v. 9), the winter's cold blast (v. 9b), the ice (v. 10), and the lightning (vv. 11–13). Job is challenged to tell how the lightning is caused (v. 15), how the clouds form (v. 16), how the hot south wind comes (v. 17), etc. Can Job understand—much less do—any of this? If Job cannot understand God's power over the physical creation why does he think he knows so much about God's moral rule? This God of great power is also the God who will never violate his own righteous character (v. 23). Job should therefore be humbled and fear him (v. 24).

Elihu's ministry, far from being an interpolation, forms a unique transition between the speeches and the THEOPHANY of chs. 38–42. Since there is no rebuke of Elihu by God in ch. 42, one may safely assume that his words do not partake of the hypocritical spirit common to the three counselors. He has concentrated on the disciplinary nature of suffering and has checked Job where he sometimes lost sight of divine majesty and fell into accusing God of acts contrary to his nature. Elihu has prepared the way for the appearance of the Lord in the whirlwind, especially by his lengthy description of God's creation and control over the forces of nature.

6. The theophany (38:1—41:34)

(a) God's first discourse (38:1—40:2). The Lord speaks to Job out of a whirlwind, rebuking him for words spoken without knowledge and challenging the patriarch to brace himself like a man because God is now about to deliver a final blow in this struggle of a creature with his Maker (38:1–

3). The final word is designed to convince Job that he lacks both the strength and wisdom to tell God how to rule the world. Where was Job when God founded the earth (vv. 4–7) and subdued the sea (vv. 8–11)? Can Job control the coming of dawn (vv. 12–15)? Does he know anything about the depths beneath the earth or the expanse above it (vv. 16–18)? Where do light and darkness come from (vv. 19–21)? What does Job know about storehouses of snow and hail, which God uses to accomplish his purposes on earth (vv. 22–24) or the production of rain and ice (vv. 28–30)? Can Job do anything about the movement of the constellations (vv. 31–33)?

Can Job command the clouds to give water or the lightning to strike (38:34–38)? Can he even control the wild animals of the plain, provide food for the lion or raven (vv. 39–41), watch the calving of the hinds (39:1–4) or domesticate the wild ox Powerful Greek chariot horse depicted in marble (c. 350 B.C.). “Do you give the horse his strength or clothe his neck with a flowing mane?” (Job 39:19).

(vv. 9–12)? Even animals scorn human might, whether the dumb ostrich (vv. 13–18) or the snorting war horse (vv. 19–25). The animate creation’s scorning of sophisticated man is a theme repeated throughout this chapter (vv. 7, 18, 22). As a final note of man’s humiliation, God pictures the hawk and eagle triumphing over human beings when their young ones suck up the blood of those slain in battle (vv. 26–30). The Lord concludes this first discourse by calling on Job to give up his contention with the Almighty (40:2) and let God be God.

(b) Job humbled (40:3–5). Job had uttered some proud words, he had desired to approach God like a prince (31:37), but now he sees how far from wisdom his attitude was. “I am unworthy—how can I reply to you? / I put my hand over my mouth” (40:4). He will be silent and listen to his Creator (40:5).

(c) God’s second discourse (40:6—41:34). Applying the figure of the ancient belt-wrestler (2 Sam. 2:14–16), God calls on Job to gird his loins like a hero and prepare again to grapple with the words of the Lord. Can Job deck himself with majesty and glory and put to nought his proud adversaries? If so, God will not fail to acknowledge his superiority (40:6–14). But rather let Job consider BEHEMOTH, the great bovine (?) monster whose bones are like tubes of bronze and limbs like bars of iron (vv. 15–18). As one of God’s primeval works, his habitat and prowess are described. The surging river cannot overcome him nor can man capture him (vv. 19–24).

As for the sea monster, LEVIATHAN, man cannot snare nor tame him either, nor even lay his hands on him. The very sight of him instills fear. If this is true of God’s creatures, who then can stand before God himself who made and owns all that is (41:1–11)? There might be an unannounced transition in the middle of this chapter, where due to a strong resemblance between two subjects there is movement toward the cosmological symbolism of LEVIATHAN, a creature who belches forth flame and smoke from his mouth and nostrils. He makes the sea boil, leaving behind him a great shining wake. He is a dragon who is king over all the sons of pride (vv. 12–34). If the passage is not so taken, then at least vv. 19–21 are pure hyperbole. In Ps. 104:26 Leviathan refers to a real monster of the sea, possibly the whale. But Job 3:8 is most clearly a reference to the well-known mythological serpent Lotan, known from extrabiblical literature, who has seven heads (C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Literature [1949], 38). Similarly, Ps. 74:13–14 makes use of mythological terminology to describe the evil power of the Egyptian army that pursued Moses and the children of Israel. Isaiah applies the name symbolically to the evil dragon in the last day (Isa. 27:1; cf. the dragon symbol of Revelation).

With this background, it is easy to see in Job 41, if not a transition, then a double meaning where the dragon-like crocodile is in view. But God also intends to remind Job of the super-terrestrial forces that Leviathan also symbolizes. God says he made this creature (or creatures) as he had made Job (40:15b). If Job cannot vanquish the creatures of God, how can he win the contest with God himself (41:10b)? In his verbal wrestling with the Almighty, Job is made to realize that God is God, not only in his omnipotence, but in all aspects of his deity. Dare Job attribute injustice to him? Dare he condemn the One who has all knowledge and all power in order to justify himself (40:8)?

(d) Job repents (42:1–6). Earlier Job was humbled and silenced (40:3–5), now he has reached the place of REPENTANCE as a direct result of the convicting power of the Word of God. Job quotes God’s words (38:2–3; 40:7) and abhors his own false words. No purpose of God can be thwarted, and Job has spoken as if it were within his power to do that very thing. He has talked glibly about things too wonderful for his finite mind to comprehend. He had heard about God, but now after a direct confrontation with him Job despises himself and repents in dust and ashes. His questions have not been answered, but he is assured God cares and does only right.

C. The epilogue (42:7–17)

1. Job vindicated (42:7–9). The Lord calls Job “my servant” whose prayer “I will accept.” No dearer words could have reached the patriarch’s ears, for this is full proof of his vindication and of Satan’s defeat (1:8; 2:3). The friends, on the other hand, are clearly rebuked. “You have not spoken of me what is right” (42:7). God refers here to the gradual growth in understanding seen in Job’s discourses—as contrasted to the clod-hopping repetition of the friends—and especially the final repentant words of the sufferer. The friends, in inventing charges against Job, had told lies to uphold their false view of God’s relationship to human suffering. Job had spoken right, that is truthfully, even though he had been an impatient protester.

Job who had grown spiritually was asked to prove his newly found strength by praying for his adversaries (cf. Matt. 5:44), and they who needed to repent are warned to do so and to solemnize it with the proper blood offerings. They brought the sacrifices to Job, and the ceremony taught the truth of God’s redemptive provision for sin.

2. Job restored (42:10–17). Some critics have questioned whether Job’s restoration does not prove Satan’s point when he asked, “Does Job fear God for nothing?” (1:9), or the friends’ point when they maintained that the righteous only suffer briefly and must ultimately prosper (cf. S. R. Driver and G. B. Gray, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Job, ICC [1921], lxii). Job had not demanded nor even asked for restoration, only vindication of his character. Restoration came after the test was over and Job had received his vindication. His repentance was for an attitude acquired during his suffering, not for sins that caused his suffering. It would have been meaningless for Job to continue suffering after God’s purpose had been accomplished.

Despite the friends’ misinterpretations and misapplications, there is a righteousness-prosperity and sin-suffering relationship under the sovereign purposes of God. The righteous shall ultimately inherit the earth; the claim “I have never seen the righteous forsaken” (Ps. 37:25) is not contrary to the teaching of the book of Job. When Job had demonstrated faithful obedience in praying for those who abused him, the Lord restored Job’s property double for all he had lost, and he begat a new family with three very beautiful daughters whose names mean, in the order given, Turtledove, Cinnamon, and Jar of Eyepaint. Their unique treatment in receiving inheritance along with their brothers reflects the high status of women in this patriarchal society (cf. C. H. Gordon in HUCA 26 [1955]: 76–82). Job’s 140 years reflect patriarchal longevity, and if he was 70 when afflicted this would fit the pattern of double restitution of his fortunes. So Job died full of days, having experienced “the purpose of the Lord, how the Lord is compassionate and merciful” (Jas. 5:11 NRSV).

VIII. A special problem: mythology and the book of Job. How do the mythological allusions in Job fit with an evangelical view of the origin of the book as the Word of God? (See MYTH.) There is a rather limited number of categories or subjects where mythological terminology is employed. The most frequent usage is when the speaker deals with the forces of nature, the storm, fire, the sea, etc. A second category has to do with creatures, cosmic or otherwise; a third with cosmography; and a fourth with heathen cultic practices. Only one passage has the latter, which may be dealt with summarily.

In his initial monologue, Job calls for the enchanters who rouse Leviathan to curse the day of his birth (Job 3:8). This is usually taken as the rousing of the sea monster, who according to primitive notions was supposed to swallow the sun or moon and bring about an eclipse. Such a notion would fit the context, for Job has wished the day of his birth were indeed blotted out or made dark. He also seems to make a reference to the eclipse (v. 5b). This presents no special problem, since Job’s whole mood here is erroneous: he is using a common forceful expression as he yields to his anguish of soul, even though he undoubtedly knew that the use of enchanters was forbidden by the Lord. His real sin, for which he can scarcely be excused, was in damning the day of his birth, questioning the sovereign purpose of God.

Job and his friends were theologically confused, especially in the matter of theodicy. In some places, therefore, they could be mouthing contemporaneous notions. However, one would not expect such a use in the words of God, as in the theophany of chs. 38–41. We thus need to ask whether there are any clear-cut mythological assumptions here.

The tendency of the naturalistic critic to see mythology everywhere results in more misinterpretation than is the case with the well-meant but misdirected attempt to rule out all mythological expression. Reading primitive meaning into a piece of monotheistic literature where the idiom can be viewed as a result of simple observation or the use of quaint expressions is poor methodology. On the other hand, one must be cautioned against the rejection of all mythological usage in a strained attempt to remove the writers of Scripture from such contamination.

There are references where the language of mythology appears as borrowed metaphors, use of names, etc. This is like the NT use of the heathen deity name BEELZEBUB for Satan. In a time of religious vitality and verbal fluency, such an idiom was used without necessarily a thought given to polytheistic usage. The Canaanite linguistic substratum was a readily available vehicle through which the prophets and poets could communicate the truth.

Job 26 is said to present a primitive cosmography, as in vv. 9–10: “He covers the face of the full moon, / and spreads over it his cloud. / He has described a circle on the face of the waters, / at the boundary between light and darkness” (NRSV). The statement in v. 10, however, may mean that when one is on the water out of the sight of land, everywhere he turns one sees only horizon (cf. NIV). Some argue that v. 9 pictures God seated on a throne (MT, kissē<sup>l</sup> H4058) above a solid firmament, conceived as a dome sitting on the pillars of heaven (cf. v. 11). The word, however, should probably be vocalized kese<sup>l</sup> H4057, “the full moon” (as in NIV and NRSV; cf. Ps. 81:3; Prov. 7:20).

No one has ever satisfactorily explained how the statement in Job 26:3 that God “hangs the earth upon nothing” (NRSV) fits into any primitive cosmography. M. Bittenwieser (The Book of Job [1922], 281) has commented that it is not surprising to meet with such a view in the book of Job in the light of advanced ideas of ASTRONOMY in Babylonia, Egypt, and Greece; such a notion cannot be summarily dismissed when those who do so make no attempt to interpret this verse. Nor does Job 38:4–6 necessarily contradict this conclusion. God may be questioning Job as to whether the earth was indeed built like a house with foundations.

Bittenwieser also contends that in 26:7a “the north” (RSV; Heb. šāpôn H7600) is the celestial pole formed by the seven stars of Ursa Minor, from which the movement of the universe was believed to proceed. One cannot ignore that Mount ZAPHON (actually Mons Casius, Jebel el-(Aqra) is treated in Ugaritic literature as a kind of Canaanite Olympus, where it was thought BAAL built his marvelous palace. This concept explains why Zaphon means “north” in Hebrew. It is to be understood here as the celestial place where God dwells, using the available Canaanite expression just as Isaiah does (Isa. 14:13–14). Furthermore, the verb nāṭā<sup>l</sup> H5742 in Job 26:7a can be used for the stretching out or arching of the heavens (Ps. 104:2), and this concept parallels antithetically the other side of the bicolon. Thus the NIV renders, “He spreads out the northern skies over empty space; / he suspends the earth over nothing.”

In Job 26:12–13 the terms used are again mythological, but the meaning is of God’s powerful control over the raging force of the sea. N. H. Tur-Sinai (The Book of Job: A New Commentary, rev. ed. [1967], 382) translates as follows: “He drove back the sea with his power, / and by his cunning smote Rahab. / By his wind he put the sea into a net; / his hand slew the stretching dragon.” Note that the first line parallels the third, and the second line parallels the fourth. Job says such dominion over the sea is only a bit of God’s power, only a whisper (v. 14). Who can understand the real thunder of his mighty acts? Similarly, in 9:13 the cohorts of Rahab are mentioned as those who grovel beneath the Almighty, who shakes the earth and removes mountains. See RAHAB (MONSTER). God stretched out the heavens alone and made the constellations and treads on the back of Yam (the SEA). The Ugaritic phrase “treading on the back” is a well-known ANE symbol of overcoming one’s foes (Isa. 63:6). The metaphor pictures God’s complete control of the sea.

Likewise in Job 7:12, Job complains of imagined harassment by God when he says “Am I the sea [yām H3542], or the monster of the deep [tannîn H9490, / that you put me under guard?” According to Hebrew monotheism, God created and controls the tannînîm (Gen. 1:21; Ps. 148:7), while in NW Semitic mythology the uncreated monsters of chaos were slain by hero gods, and only then creation begins as the land and sea are made from pieces of the slain monster. There is none of this when one might expect to see it in Job 38, where the sea is again personified and its birth pictured (vv. 8–11). Shutting the sea within doors is what the Babylonian god MARDUK did after slaying TIAMAT and creating the sea from her. Both here and there it merely refers to the limitations of the seas' boundaries. There appears also the use of "swaddling band" (v. 9), as in the birth of the Ugaritic bovine monsters called Eaters and Devourers (Pope, Job, 293), but both figures are borrowed from events of human birth, and the biblical account is tied closely to natural phenomena: "I made the clouds its garment and wrapped it in thick darkness" (NIV).

In Job 38:12b "morning" and "dawn" are personified, just as Dawn and Dusk were a divine pair in Ugaritic literature; but in v. 13 "earth" is personified, with coming of day likened to the snatching off of her skirts and shaking the wicked out of it. Apart from personification no other mythological distinctive is employed in these verses.

Just as Zaphon was a word originally meaning the abode of the gods, but in Hebrew it was used for the habitation of the only true God, so the terms Yam and Rahab are derived from the Canaanite Sea God and his monstrous cohort and is used for the sea as part of God's creation. It cannot be demonstrated that in a strong monotheistic context like the book of Job these personifications were more than rich linguistic expressions of the powers of nature. Even when viewed as Canaanite gods, part of their function was to describe and explain natural phenomena. Even if Job and his friends did know the mythology, this in itself would not prove they believed the myth anymore than my reference to Greek deities proves I believe them. This view is strengthened by Job 31:26–27, where the patriarch by oath with sanctions denies ever being tempted to participate in heathen worship of sun or moon.

Turning to Job 5:7, one reads: "Yet man is born to trouble / as surely as sparks fly upward." Pope (Job, 40) renders: "Man, indeed, is born for trouble / And Resheph's sons wing high." Here is another clear case where the name of a NW Semitic deity is used to refer to forces in nature with which the particular deity was identified in mythology. In the Ugaritic pantheon, RESHEPH is equated with NERGAL, the Mesopotamian god of pestilence and the netherworld. In the OT the word rešep H8404 is used of pestilence (Deut. 32:25; Hab. 3:5); the plural can be used of lightning (Ps. 78:48). In Ps. 76:3, however, it refers to "flashing arrows," where the context also speaks of shields and swords. In Ugaritic, the god Resheph is called "Lord of the arrow." Just as in Job 18:13 death is said to have a firstborn who devours wicked men's bodies, so here in 5:7 the "sons of Resheph" may be various forms of trouble or pestilence or flames which soar aloft.

What of BEHEMOTH and LEVIATHAN in Job 40 and 41? There is something to be said for simply taking them as a great bovine creature (or hippopotamus) and crocodile respectively. Both are used in other OT contexts without mythological or symbolic implication (Pss. 8:8; 50:10; 74:14; 104:26; Joel 1:20; 2:22; Hab. 2:17). The word bēhēmôt H990 seems to be an intensive plural of bēhēmā H989, "beast, cattle," hence the beast par excellence. Behemoth is called in Job 40:19a "first among the ways of God." Pope (Job, 317) translates this "a primordial production of God," but M. Dahood (quoted by Pope on p. 324) says "he is the finest manifestation of God's power." In Ugaritic the goddess Anat conquered the seven-headed Leviathan along with a bovine creature called "the monstrous, ferocious bullock" (ibid., 321).

OT passages do speak of great evil powers, whether cosmic or political, in terms of monstrous creatures. In the day the Lord punishes the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity he also will slay Leviathan, the swift, crooked serpent (Isa. 27:1; cf. 51:9–10). Rahab is Egypt, and in Ps. 74:12–13 the many-headed Leviathan is again Egypt. But in Job 40 and 41 the description of Leviathan becomes highly symbolic. One must assume a considerable amount of hyperbole to make of this description simply a crocodile. It is likely that after a reference to the crocodile an unannounced transition occurs because God intends to remind Job of those cosmic forces which Leviathan symbolizes, and against which no human strength can prevail.

I suggest the following translation of 41:9–12: “Behold his expectation is false, / (Though) the angels are hurled down at his appearance / (And) he is fierce when one arouses him. / (Yet) who can stand before me (God)? / Who can confront me and survive? / For everything under the heavens is mine. / Will not I silence his boastings / his proud (high) talk and his fair array of words?” And vv. 18–21: “His sneezings flash forth light, / his eyes are like the glow (eyelids) of dawn. / Out of his mouth go torches / And sparks of fire leap forth. / His nostrils smoke, / Out of a seething pot and burning brushwood. / His breath kindles coals / And a flame pours out of his mouth.” And vv. 33–34: “Upon earth there is not his like, / A creature without fear. / He beholds everything that is high; / he is king over all the sons of pride.” The studied conclusion is that this is not a mere crocodile, but is to be understood in the light of Isa. 27:1 et al. (cf. the dragon symbol of Rev. 12).

The prologue of Job pictures the heavenly council before God, and in Job 5:1 Eliphaz says to Job, “Call if you will, but who will answer you? / To which of the holy ones will you turn?” Eliphaz is taunting Job that it is hopeless for him to appeal to the “holy ones.” Critics take them to be the lesser divine beings who according to Mesopotamian concept were available as personal intercessors in the divine assembly. It should be noted that whether here or in the prologue or in Ps. 89:5, “the assembly of the holy ones” is most assuredly made up of created beings. Even in Mesopotamian concepts, the lesser divine beings were created. Whether in the progress of revelation Eliphaz had made the clear-cut monotheistic distinction we cannot tell, but one can be certain that neither the author of the book of Job nor the Psalms attribute to these “holy ones” any of the pagan concepts of deity.

In Job 15:8 Eliphaz, condemning Job for self-exaltation, questions his ability to sit in and eavesdrop on the divine council. And in 33:23–24 Elihu speaks of mediation by an angel. The Mesopotamian belief in a personal god who looked after the interest of his mortal client in the divine assembly may be a related concept, but it could represent a retrogression rather than a stage in the development of Hebrew religion. These “holy ones” among whom a man might find a defender should be tied to Job’s appeal for an arbiter to argue his case (9:33) or a witness to testify of his integrity (16:19–21) or a vindicator or redeemer to stand in his behalf (19:25–27). In a most prophetic way, Job is touching on that mystery of godliness which says there must be one who can stand between God and man who must share in the nature of each. As Job says in 9:33, someone “to lay his hand upon us both.” This concept finds further expression in the OT teaching regarding the suffering vicarious expiator.

Job 38:31a provides an example of how the KJV was influenced by the earlier Jewish interpretation taken over by Christian exegetes. The Jewish scholar Nachmanides and others understood the verse in an astrological sense, the “sweet influences” of Pleiades being the astrological forces that produce pleasure, flowers, and fruits in the spring. It is likely that the key word should be rendered “fettters,” in parallel with the “bands” of Orion following (cf. 1 Sam. 15:32; see ASTROLOGY and ASTRONOMY).

Nor should Job 38:33 (“Do you know the laws of the heavens? / Can you set up God’s dominion over the earth?) be taken astrologically. Some take these words to be pre-Newtonian allusions to the forces of gravity. The word for “laws” is parallel with mišṭār H5428, usually rendered “rule, dominion,” but related to a Semitic verb meaning “to write.” The stars in Akkadian are called šitir samē, “heavenly writing.” Tur-Sinai (in Archiv orientální 17 [1949]: 11) has come closest to understanding the verse by connecting it with Ps. 19, where the heavens write a message of God’s glory.

An example of a forced attempt to read mythology into the text is found in this rendering of Job 38:36: “Who put wisdom in Thoth / Who gave Sekwi understanding?” (Pope, Job, 290, 302, following Dhorme). The RSV, with some philological support, takes the word ṭuḥôt H3219 as “clouds” and šekwi H8498 as “mist.” The verses before and after are dealing with clouds, rain, and lightning, so the renderings by Thoth and Sekwi are completely out of context, since they are gods of wisdom and writing. More recent translations understand the terms as references to the heart and the mind.

On this general subject, W. F. Albright has said some cogent things in his History, Archaeology and Christian Humanism (1964). Remarking how the OT is a masterpiece of empirical logic not expressed in formal categories, Albright claims the OT has demythologized the poems on which some Hebrew literature is based. I would prefer to say that the OT writers demythologized not the literature but only the language. “Old words are kept but with new meanings, divested of all clear mythological connotations” (ibid., 94). Albright notes how the Puritan John Milton drew heavily on Greek mythology to enrich his poetic imagery even in his picture of creation.

For example, the use of plural terms for God, namely ELOHIM (see ELOAH) and ADONAI, may have come from polytheistic usage, but in Hebrew came to mean the totality of all the manifestations and attributes of deity, which polytheism broke down into single elements. In some documents a high god is referred to with the plural ending, the so-called plural of majesty. Nothing sounds more polytheistic to some ears than the words used by the Chronicler, “our God is greater than all other gods” (2 Chr. 2:5). Albright observes that “much of the onslaught on early Israelite monotheism comes from scholars who represent certain theological points of view with reference to monotheism; i.e., who deny that orthodox trinitarian Christianity...or orthodox Judaism or orthodox Islam are monotheistic. I do not need to stress the fact that neither of the last two religions can be called monotheistic by a theologian who insists that this term applies only to Unitarian Christianity or liberal Judaism. But no dictionary definition of monotheism was ever intended to exclude orthodox Christianity” (ibid., 155).

In conclusion, the distinguishing mark of a mythology is not reference to gods or the use of ANTHROPOMORPHISM and various descriptive metaphors that describe deity in concrete terminology, but rather the narration of the actions of numerous gods who have the same limitations and sins common to human beings, including especially sexual relations. Neither the book of Job nor any of the OT has the slightest hint of belief in any such mythology. (See further E. Smick in WTJ 40 [1977–78]: 213–28.)

Job, Targum of. In addition to the ARAMAIC version of JOB found in the standard rabbinical TARGUM, an earlier translation was found among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (11QtgJob). This fragmentary document, which preserves approximately one fifth of the book (beginning with the middle of ch. 17), is of major significance for both Targumic and Aramaic studies. The translation from the Hebrew is quite literal, in contrast with the Palestinian Targumic tradition generally. The language provides an important link between the so-called Official Aramaic of Daniel and Ezra and the later Jewish Palestinian form. Two other small fragments of an Aramaic version of Job were found in a different cave (4Q<sub>tg</sub>Job), but it is not clear whether these contain the same or a different translation. (See M. Sokoloff, The Targum to Job from Qumran Cave XI [1974]; D. M. Stec, The Text of the Targum of Job: An Introduction and Critical Edition [1994]; D. Shepherd, Targum and Translation: A Reconsideration of the Qumran Aramaic Version of Job [2004].)

Job, Testament of. A Jewish pseudepigraphic work, probably written in Greek in Egypt, maybe as early as the 1st cent. B.C. Following the pattern of the TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS and similar works, it purports to give JOB'S own account of his sickness and events related to it. The primary purpose of the work is clearly to commend the virtue of patience or endurance, but various other motifs (such as angels, women, and eschatological concerns) add interest to it. The Testament of Job has been preserved primarily in four medieval MSS, which appear to have undergone some Christian editing. (English trans., with introduction and notes, in OTP, 1:829–68. See also R. A. Kraft et al., The Testament of Job according to the SV Text [1974].)

Jobab joh'bab (יֹבָב H3412 [H3411 for #1 below], derivation uncertain). (1) Son of JOKTAN and grandson of EBER, listed in the Table of NATIONS (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chr. 1:23). It may be the name of an ancient South Arabian tribe, and some scholars have noted the similarity between Jobab and Yuhaybab, a tribe in central Yemen (see ABD, 3:871).

(2) Son of Zerah and second king of EDOM; he came from BOZRAH (Gen. 36:33–34; 1 Chr. 1:44–45).

(3) King of MADON who joined the unsuccessful coalition formed by JABIN king of HAZOR against the Israelites (Josh. 11:1); the city of Madon is listed among those conquered by JOSHUA (12:19).

(4) Son of SHAHARAIM and descendant of BENJAMIN; a family head (1 Chr. 8:9). Jobab was one of seven children that were born to Shaharaim in MOAB by his wife HODESH after he had divorced Hushim and Baara (v. 8).

(5) Son of ELPAAL, grandson of Shaharaim (see above, #4), and descendant of Benjamin (1 Chr. 8:18); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (cf. v. 28).

Jochebed jok'uh-bed (יֹכֶבֶד H3425, “Yahweh is weighty [or honorable, glorious]”). Descendant of LEVI, wife (and aunt) of AMRAM, and mother of AARON, MOSES, and MIRIAM (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59). If the expression “daughter of Levi” (Num. 26:59) is understood literally, then she was the sister of KOHATH (Amram's father), and only a distant ancestor of Aaron, Moses, and Miriam. The expression “father's sister” (Exod. 6:20) renders Hebrew dôdâ H1860, which in its other two occurrences means “wife of father's brother” (cf. Lev. 18:14; 20:20). In either case, the marriage between Amram and Jochebed involved a union prohibited by the laws of Lev. 18; probably for that reason, the SEPTUAGINT renders Exod. 6:20 with “the daughter of his father's brother,” which makes Jochebed the cousin of Amram.

jod johd. See YOD.

Joda joh'duh (Ἰωδά G2726). (1) Son of Iliadun and head of a family of Levites who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Esd. 5:58; apparently called HODAVIAH in Ezra 2:40; 3:9 [MT, "Judah"]; Neh. 7:43 [MT, "Hodevah"]; cf. also "Sudias" in 1 Esd. 5:26).

(2) Son of Joanan, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:26). He is apparently not mentioned in the OT, although some have identified him with a postexilic descendant of SOLOMON named Hodaviah (1 Chr. 3:24).

Jodan joh'duhn (Ἰωδανός). A descendant of JESHUA son of Jozadak, listed among the priests in Ezra's time who agreed to put away their foreign wives (1 Esd. 9:19 [KJV, "Joadanus"]; called "Gedaliah" in Ezra 10:18).

Joed joh'ed (יִעֵד H3444, "Yahweh is witness"). Son of Pedaiah, descendant of BENJAMIN, and grandfather of Sallu; the latter is listed among those who resettled in Jerusalem under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 11:7; the name is not found in the parallel list, 1 Chr. 9:7).

Joel joh'uhl (יִשְׁעֵל H3408, "Yahweh is God"; Ἰωήλ G2727). A common name widely distributed among the Hebrew tribes; its meaning attests to the fact that faith in Yahweh as the only God was alive throughout the nation.

(1) Joel the prophet. See JOEL, BOOK OF.

(2) Firstborn son of SAMUEL and father of the musician HEMAN (1 Sam. 8:2; 1 Chr. 6:28 [NIV and other versions, following some Gk. MSS and Syr.; see VASHNI], 33; 15:17). Joel and his brother ABIJAH served as judges in BEERSHEBA, but they were found guilty of misconduct in office (1 Sam. 8:3–5).

(3) Son of Azariah, descendant of LEVI through KOHATH, and ancestor of Samuel and the musician Heman (1 Chr. 6:36).

(4) A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:35). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38–41).

(5) A clan chief of the tribe of REUBEN whose descendant Beerah was taken captive by TIGLATH-PILESER (1 Chr. 5:4). He may be the same Joel listed later as father of Shema and ancestor of Jeiel (vv. 7–8). His genealogical connection as well as the period in which he lived are unclear.

(6) A leader of the Gadites (see GAD, TRIBE OF) in BASHAN, listed as first in importance (1 Chr. 5:12).

(7) Son of Izrahiah and descendant of ISSACHAR; a military chief (1 Chr. 7:3).

(8) One of DAVID'S mighty warriors, identified as the brother of a certain Nathan (1 Chr. 11:38). This passage appears to have suffered textual corruption, for the parallel list has IGAL son of Nathan (2 Sam. 23:36).

(9) Head of a Levitical family descended from GERSHON, listed among those who helped to bring the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem in the reign of David (1 Chr. 15:7, 11). He may be the same as #10 below.

(10) Son of Jehieli (see JEHIEL) and descendant of Gershon; he and his brother Zetham were temple treasurers (1 Chr. 26:22). The Hebrew text is difficult, and elsewhere Jehiel, Zetham, and Joel are identified as sons (descendants?) of Ladan (23:8). This Joel may be the same as #9 above.

(11) Son of Pedaiah and a chief officer over the half-tribe of MANASSEH during David's reign (1 Chr. 27:20).

(12) Son of Azariah and descendant of LEVI through KOHATH; listed among the Levites who purified the temple in the reform under HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:12).

(13) One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (1 Esd. 9:34; this name does not occur in the parallel passage, Ezra 10:38).

(14) One of the descendants of Nebo who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43; 1 Esd. 9:35).

(15) Son of Zicri and chief officer over the postexilic community in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9). He held an office perhaps similar to that of mayor, and was assisted by Judah son of Hassenuah (the latter was either second in command [NRSV] or in charge of the "Second District" [NIV]). It is not clear whether these two men were Benjamites (v. 7) or Judahites (v. 4).

Joel, Book of joh'uhl (𐤒𐤓𐤁 H3408, "Yahweh is God"; Ἰωήλ G2727). Second book of the Minor Prophets (in the LXX it takes fourth place). In the MT the book consists of four chapters, but the English versions (following the LXX and Vulg.) combine Joel 2–3 MT into one chapter; thus ch. 4 MT corresponds to ch. 3 in the English Bible.

I. Historical background. There can be no doubt as to the factual nature of the successive insect plagues that formed one of the principal themes of Joel, although the absence of the customary dating formula in the superscription, as well as the timeless nature of the contents of the book, makes the question of the date of composition, and therefore the whole matter of the historical background, one of great difficulty. Critical estimates of the date of Joel have ranged all the way from the 9th cent. B.C. to the Maccabean period (2nd cent. B.C.), and it must be admitted from the start that there are strong arguments in favor of both a preexilic and a postexilic date for the work. Certain verses of the prophecy can be taken as implying that the enemies of the nation were preexilic peoples such as EGYPT, EDOM (Joel 3:19), the PHILISTINES, and PHOENICIA (3:4), whereas other passages seem to indicate that the divided kingdom had ceased to exist, with the names of Judah and Israel being used synonymously (2:27; 3:2, 16, 20).

From a theological point of view, as the prophet used the familiar 8th-cent. eschatological term DAY OF THE LORD, he did so in a manner that differed significantly from its usage in the book of AMOS, and this fact might suggest an era other than that of the 8th or 7th centuries. Any description of the historical background of Joel is therefore dependent to a larger extent than in most other OT prophecies upon the date of composition that the individual scholar is prepared to assign to the work.

LOCUST plagues, like some other natural phenomena, have been frequent occurrences in the Near E for millennia, and almost any visitation of that kind could provide at any time a proper and immediate background for the composition.

II. Unity and special problems. The main critical issue regarding the prophecy of Joel concerns its integrity as a literary composition. In particular, questions have been raised why a work from a single hand should have historical and APOCALYPTIC sections placed side by side. The chief objection to this procedure has been that, if the narrative material is to be understood literally, which seems most reasonable under the circumstances, it is not easy to see why an author should then intermingle such a different theme as an apocalyptic section of prophecy and still furnish what has all appearances of being a unified work.

Arguments for the unity of authorship of Joel have in some cases regarded the locusts as symbolic and in others as real, without apparently impairing the validity of the conclusions. Some conservative scholars have seen in the prophetic description of the plagues an accurate picture of a historical event, with the behavior of the insects indicating nothing more than an idealized description of the ruin and havoc wrought by a marauding enemy. Following the pattern of apocalyptic thought in EZEKIEL, DANIEL, or REVELATION, this disaster would suggest to the prophet something of the nature of the coming judgment. If these concepts were actually associated in this manner in the mind of the prophet, it would be easy to account for the eschatological references in the historical section of the prophecy (see ESCHATOLOGY).

Scholars who have postulated duality of authorship have generally argued that the apocalyptic passages, as well as the eschatological allusions in Joel 2:1—11, were added to the original oracle concerning the devastating plagues by a later, unknown editor. If this hypothesis is adduced for chs. 3—4 of Joel in the belief that this material was a later apocalypse supplementing the story of a locust plague, it also would seem reasonable to regard as interpolations by a later hand all eschatological applications of this event to the day of the Lord that are found in the first two chapters of the prophecy. Unfortunately for such a view, these sections give no indication whatever of being later insertions, since they fit with obvious smoothness into the work as a whole from the standpoint of both style and subject matter, thus pointing further to the unity of the prophecy. The view that the narrative portion of Joel was the work of a prophet and the eschatological section that of an apocalypticist, who used the prophetic oracle to substantiate his teachings about the coming day of the Lord, seems unnecessarily complicated and forced in view of the fact that a great many prophetic passages intermingled the contemporary with the eschatological without undue difficulty.

III. Authorship and compilation. Apart from the name Joel ben Pethuel, found in the title of the prophecy, nothing is known of the life or circumstances of the attributive author. In the SEPTUAGINT, his cognomen is rendered Bathouēl, “Bethuel,” the name of ABRAHAM’S nephew, who was also REBEKAH’S father (Gen. 22:22–23 et al.; it is also close in form to the Canaanite personal name Battiilu, found in the TELL EL-AMARNA tablets). It may, however, simply constitute a variant that arose following a transcriptional error in the Hebrew. The name JOEL was in common usage in Israel over a number of centuries, and over a dozen persons were designated in this fashion in the canonical writings. As observed above, nothing is known about the background of the author, although he himself made it abundantly clear that he was not to be regarded as a member of the priesthood, a fact evident from the objective manner in which he referred to it (Joel 1:13; 2:17). In consequence of this attitude, certain European scholars (notably A. S. Kapelrud, Joel Studies [1948]) have thought of him as being a “temple prophet,” although an assertion of this kind presents numerous difficulties.

As observed previously, the prophecy can be divided into two distinct units comprising (a) Joel 1:1—2:27, a section that contained a description of a calamitous plague of locusts and the urging of public repentance to bring about deliverance from the infestation and relief from the ensuing famine; and (b) Joel 2:28—3:21 (MT 3:1—4:21), which spoke of the future day of the Lord, the outpouring of the divine Spirit upon the nations, the judgment of the heathen, and the coming of a blessed age.

Questions of authorship and compilation are closely related to those of the interpretation and integrity of the work. The first section (Joel 1:1—2:27) seems to deal with a historical event of recent incidence, namely, a locust plague. These insects were described as a “northern army” (2:20), and although locust infestations in Palestine do not usually come from the N, invasions of these insects from that direction are by no means unknown. The devastation caused by these marauders was so severe that the prophet took the incident to be an indication of divine displeasure, and accordingly called the people to repentance. Evidently, the view of the prophet was also held by the populace generally, for they responded quickly to the call, and as a result Joel was able to foretell the destruction of the locusts and the renewal of agricultural prosperity for the land.

From the vividness and accuracy of the description, there is every reason to suppose that the locust plague was an actual historical fact. For purposes of interpretation, it is important to notice that the locust plague is described in terms of a human army. The insects are said to be like soldiers (Joel 2:7) and like horses and chariots (2:4–5). Once the figures of speech are understood for what they are, the description of a locust invasion and consequent devastation is of an extremely vivid nature, and is entirely in keeping with the normal usage of OT figurative language.

Whereas the first section was recognized by many scholars as having a predominantly historical basis, the second portion (Joel 2:28—3:21 [MT 3:1—4:21]) seemed to be mainly eschatological in character, dealing with a future period in which a supernatural visitation of the divine Spirit would confer gifts of prophecy upon Israel (2:28). Equally important was the description in apocalyptic terms of the final battle between the forces of Yahweh and those of the pagan armies, a conflict that would conclude with the annihilation of the latter and the exaltation of Israel.

It is misleading to regard the prophecy as rigidly divisible into predominantly historical and apocalyptic sections of a rather independent nature. For one thing, the eschatological concept of the day of the Lord occurs in both suggested divisions (cf. Joel 1:15; 2:1–2; 2:31; 3:14), indicating a certain continuity of thought. For another, there are aspects of the narratives dealing with the marauding locusts which seem to have elements in common with the supernatural character of the incidents contained in the second portion of the prophecy (e.g., 2:2–11, 20).

Some scholars have held that whenever the calamity described by the phrase “the day of the Lord” occurs, the meaning is uniformly of an eschatological nature, having reference either to the future disturbances that would preface the coming of the messianic day or to the actual day itself. On this interpretation, the locust plague described by Joel would depict the day of the Lord quite accurately. Other scholars have pointed out that, whereas the phrase is generally eschatological in usage, there is no ground for supposing that it must always be so. In this instance, therefore, it might possibly be that Joel was referring to the locust visitation as being a particular example of divine judgment and destruction. If such a devastating insect invasion that had reduced the land to a desert within a very short period of time was “a day of the Lord,” it would be easy for the prophet to indicate how much more dreadful would be the situation when God punished a sinful world in the final day of the Lord.

Again, the interpretation of the locusts presents important considerations in the matter of compilation and integrity. If the locusts are to be regarded as symbolic of those heathen forces whose judgment is narrated in Joel 3:1–17, they could either represent specific onslaughts by pagan nations at particular times in Israelite history, or they could be wholly apocalyptic in character, as with the “children of darkness” in the Qumran community writings (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), or the locusts in Rev. 9:1—11. A major objection to the locusts in Joel being interpreted in terms of armed warriors is that they simply cannot be said to be like themselves (cf. Joel 2:4–7), and it seems clear that the locust plague was an actual historical incident and not symbolic of something else.

Looking E across the Arabah into Edom. Joel prophesied that Edom would become “a desert waste because of the violence done to the people of Judah” (Joel 3:19).

Consequently it would not be difficult for one prophet to use such a happening as the basis for an utterance dealing with the nature of future judgment and produce a unified composition in which the association of the locust plague with a larger disaster would account for the juxtaposition of historical and eschatological material in one prophetic work. The presence of apocalyptic elements in the first two chapters is surely a sufficient warrant for the apocalyptic expositions of the remaining portion of the prophecy, which is seen to constitute an expanded form of the futuristic theme implied in the first section. It is a commonplace observation that a great many of the Hebrew prophets interwove the contemporary with the eschatological in their utterances, and in view of this fact the arguments for divisive authorship of the book lose much of their force. That the prophecy was deliberately composed as one entity may be indicated by the elaborate correspondences between the section dealing with the locust visitation and that concerning the pagan enemies of the Israelites, which serve to knit the book together as a symmetrical unit.

Other features that support the integrity of the composition are to be found in the literary style of the author, and not least in the way he repeated important phrases and used expressions borrowed from other prophets. A final testimony to the unity of authorship is found in the uniform historical background that is clearly apparent throughout the work. From the foregoing arguments, therefore, it is difficult to find a valid reason for assuming that the whole prophecy was not written at one time by the attributive author Joel. As noted earlier, however, some scholars have suggested that the original prophecy comprised only Joel 1:1—2:27, with the remainder coming from the hand of a later apocalypticist. This attempt to disprove the integrity of the work and its unity of authorship has to face the serious problem of the references to the day of the Lord in the “original prophecy.” Such passages (Joel 1:15; 2:1–2, 10–11), however, give no indication of being late apocalyptic insertions, for if they are removed from the text arbitrarily, the sense and smoothness of the narrative suffer seriously, thus indicating that the material as a whole was a unity from the beginning.

Perhaps more worthy of serious consideration is the theory that Joel 1:1—2:27 contains portions of liturgical poems that were used in conjunction with a supposed New Year festival ritual in Israel, to which certain apocalyptic fragments were added later. Unfortunately for this view, it yet remains to be shown satisfactorily that the Israelites ever engaged in a New Year fertility worship of the kind commonly found in ANE cultic rituals. If there are, in fact, isolated elements of “prophetic liturgies” in the first chapter of the book, it is more probable that they are citations of earlier prophetic teaching and not material formulated with a view to use in cultic worship. Furthermore, on the view outlined above, the presence of apocalyptic additions would disrupt the cultic nature of the original, and in effect would transform it from a popular vehicle of joyful celebration into one of private prophetic foreboding and doom, a procedure for which there is not the slightest evidence. Furthermore, if the apocalyptic elements were really as fragmentary as the theory supposes, it would be difficult to demonstrate their unity of theme, to say nothing of the way in which the latter is elaborated upon in the remainder of the prophecy. No studies in the history of the form of Joel have yet shown conclusively that the two principal sections come from different dates, and there is no firm evidence to demonstrate that the book was anything other than a unity and the product of its attributive author.

IV. Date. Although a great many scholars have viewed Joel as the work of one author, there has been much argument with regard to the date of composition of the prophecy, the divergent views expressed ranging over half a millennium. Since any specific historical references that would enable a firm assessment of the date of composition to be made are notably lacking, the period of authorship has to be considered on the basis of internal evidence alone. Particularly important in this connection are the implied political, social, and religious conditions existing in the nation, parallels in the matter of the distinctive ideas of the prophet to those that can be dated with reasonable assurance, the literary relationships between the book and other similar compositions, and questions of diction and style.

Political and social allusions present certain difficulties, for whereas there are clear references to peoples and places, such as Tyre, Sidon, Philistia, and the Greeks, they are too vague to furnish a reliable date for the composition of the prophecy. Although the monarchy had disappeared and many of the people were scattered in exile (Joel 3:2–3), the temple was still standing and was in full operation (1:13–14; 2:15–17), and the walls of Jerusalem were intact (2:9)—a situation that might indicate a date between 597 and 587 B.C. for the prophecy. Although it would appear that Israel and Judah had ceased to exist as separate entities, with the names being used synonymously (2:27; 3:2), the enemies of Judah that were mentioned were not those of the exilic age, such as the Babylonians, but rather the Philistines, Egyptians, and Phoenicians, most of whom came into conflict with Judah in some manner in preexilic days.

TYRE was denounced by Amos (Amos 1:9–10) in the 8th cent. B.C., apparently for slave trading, and it was also castigated by Ezekiel (Ezek. 27:13) for much the same reason, a situation which, however, is inconclusive for dating. The reference to the “captivity” that God would “bring again” had a futuristic situation in view, and again can hardly be used decisively for dating. The threat of desolation in Egypt and Edom (Joel 3:19) might possibly suggest an exilic date; but the much cited allusion to the Greeks (3:16) need not necessarily demand a postexilic date, since Ionians are referred to in Assyrian literary records as early as the 8th cent. B.C.

The idea that God would gather all nations to Jerusalem to battle and destruction occurs also in other prophets (Isa. 66:16; Ezek. 38:1—39:29; Zech. 12:1; 14:1), and in two of them is found the motif of a fountain proceeding from the temple and nourishing the locality (Ezek. 47:1; Zech. 14:8). A further question arises whether these concepts originated in the time of, say, Ezekiel or Zechariah, or whether they went much further back to a common prophetic eschatological motif, arising possibly in the 8th cent. If Joel was not actually living when Amos spoke about the day of the Lord (Amos 5:16), he was certainly familiar with such teaching, which might suggest that he was propagating 8th-cent. eschatology.

The parallels in phraseology with other prophetic writings are numerous, and indicate either that Joel was early and influenced subsequent writers greatly by his prophecy, or that, being later, he cited earlier prophets frequently or at least quoted from a common prophetic theology reaching back to the preexilic period. Although the majority of scholars have concluded that Joel is postexilic and that he quoted from earlier sources, it is still true that no single element of his thought is incompatible with a preexilic date for the prophecy. The difficulties of dating are not simplified by the literary style of the author, which is marked by striking rhythms, acutely descriptive figures of speech, the use of repetition to heighten expressions of contrast or succession, and the drawing of parallels between similar situations. Some writers have seen evidences of postexilic terminology in the work, including some Aramaic forms, but others have contested these assertions, making the whole matter inconclusive. In view of the prolonged history of the ARAMAIC LANGUAGE and its usage in preexilic Israel, the mere presence of Aramaisms in any canonical writing cannot be used as incontrovertible evidence for a late date of composition. The dating of Joel is a matter of great difficulty, and the prophecy has been assigned in consequence to dates that vary between the 9th cent. B.C. and the Maccabean period. From internal evidence it would appear that an earlier rather than a later date of composition is preferable. The most reasonable estimate appears to place the book during the childhood of King JOASH, about 830 B.C., at a time when JEHOIADA the high priest was regent in Judah.

V. Place of origin and destination. Just as nothing is known about the author, so there is no certain information about the place where the prophecy arose. The references to the temple and the official priesthood would suggest some area of Judah, perhaps even Jerusalem, which may also have been the recipient of the utterances, since their essential message involved the active participation of the priesthood. It is unlikely that the prophetic oracles originated in the northern kingdom, particularly if a comparatively late date of authorship is upheld.

VI. Occasion and purpose. The immediate occasion of the oracles was the incidence of a severe locust plague, and this natural calamity was used by Joel as the means of illustrating the nature and scope of an even more significant occurrence of an eschatological nature, the day of the Lord. It was the purpose of the author to call his people to repentance in order that divine punishment might be averted and the Spirit of God poured out upon Israel in blessing.

VII. Textual considerations. The Hebrew text has been transmitted very well, aside from a few minor corruptions. Some small additions occur in the SEPTUAGINT, but they do not seem to represent a better Hebrew text form. Similarly, the Syriac Peshitta and Vulgate diverge only slightly from the MT and from each other (see VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE, ANCIENT, II.B and III.C).

VIII. Contents

1. The locust plague and its removal (Joel 1:1 – 2:27)
  1. The plague (1:1 – 2:1)
  2. A call to repentance (2:1 – 17)
  3. Divine pity and promised relief (2:18 – 27)
2. The future day of the Lord (2:28 – 3:21)
  1. Outpouring of the divine Spirit (2:28 – 32)
  2. Judgment of the nations (3:1 – 17)
  3. Blessings upon Israel (3:18 – 21)

IX. Theology. The book reflects that attitude of religious particularism that deemed the Israelites to be the sole recipients of divine favor, a view that had both prophetic and priestly advocates. Joel, however, pointed out the responsibility that such an elevated position carried, and demanded to see in Israel those moral and spiritual qualities that merited divine blessing. He particularly stressed that only the remnant that was faithful to God would be saved, not the entire house of Israel (Joel 2:32). Pagan nations would be punished in the day of the Lord, not because of their non-Israelite character, but because of their inhuman acts toward their fellowmen.

In the final conflict, when divine judgment would be manifested, the heathen would be cut down like vegetation by a cataclysm, whereas the elect of God would be kept safe until the restoration of Jerusalem. Joel had a remarkable vision of the relationship of divine purpose to human history, even though a single messianic figure is lacking in his book. His abiding contribution to Christian thought is in his teaching about the outpouring of the divine Spirit on “all flesh” (Joel 2:28 NRSV), a prophecy quoted by Peter in his PENTECOST sermon (Acts 2:14–21). From that time on the personal possession of the HOLY SPIRIT was to be normative in Christian spiritual experience. Although in OT days the Holy Spirit came upon God’s people and enabled them to serve God acceptably (Jdg. 6:34; 1 Sam. 16:13), the new age of grace begun at Pentecost was to be one of the Spirit (Isa. 32:15; Zech. 12:10; Jn. 7:39). Henceforth all God’s people would be priests and prophets, thus fulfilling the ideal implicit in the Torah but never actually achieved.

Joelah joh-ee’luh (יִעֲלָה <sup>יִעֲלָה</sup> H3443, perhaps “may [God] avail, help” [cf. BDB, 418b]). Son of Jeroham from GEDOR; he and his brother Zebadiah were among the ambidextrous warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:7).

Joezer joh-ee'zühr (יֹעֶזֶר H3445, "Yahweh is help"). One of several Korahite warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:6; cf. vv. 1–2). These soldiers may have been Levites from the family of KORAH, but some argue that the reference is to a different Korah or even to a locality in the tribe of BENJAMIN.

Jogbehah jog'buh-hah (יִגְבֵּהָהָ H3322, "height"). A city in GILEAD fortified by the Gadites near the tribe's eastern border (Num. 32:35). See GAD, TRIBE OF. GIDEON made a circuit around Jogbehah in order to attack the Midianites from the rear (Jdg. 8:11). The town is generally identified with el-Jubeihat (about 7 mi. NW of RABBAH, modern Amman), where an Ammonite military tower has been found; another possibility is nearby Tell Şafut (cf. the discussion in Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 296–97, esp. n. 34; see also NOBAH).

Jogli jog'li (יֹגְלִי H3332, possibly "Yahweh reveals"). Father of Bukki; the latter was a leader from the tribe of DAN chosen to help in the distribution of Canaan W of the Jordan among the Israelites (Num. 34:22).

Joha joh'huh (יֹחָהָה H3418, short form of יְהוֹחָנָן H3380, "Yahweh is [or has been] gracious"; cf. JEHOHANAN, JOHANAN, JOHN). (1) Son of Beriah and descendant of BENJAMIN, listed among the heads of families living in postexilic Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:16; cf. v. 28). His father and uncle, however, are described as "heads of families of those living in Aijalon" and as having driven out the inhabitants of GATH (v. 13).

(2) Son of Shimri; described as "the TIZITE," he and his brother Jediahel are listed among DAVID'S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:45).

Johanan joh-hay'nuhn (יְהוֹנָתָן H3419, short form of יְהוֹחָנָן H3380, "Yahweh is [or has been] gracious"; cf. JEHOHANAN, JOHA, JOHN). (1) Son of Kareah; he was one of the captains of Jewish forces in the open country during the conquest of Judah by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (2 Ki. 25:23). After the appointment of GEDALIAH as governor of the land, Johanan came with other captains to Gedaliah at MIZPAH (Jer. 40:8, 13). He warned Gedaliah of ISHMAEL'S plan to assassinate him (40:14) and asked permission to slay Ishmael (40:15). Permission was refused (40:16).

After Gedaliah's murder, Johanan led the forces against Ishmael (Jer. 41:11), overtook him at the great pool of Gibeon (41:12), and rescued everyone whom Ishmael had taken away by force (41:14). Ishmael and eight men escaped (41:15), but the rest of the people were brought back to Geruth Kimham, a place near BETHLEHEM (41:16–17), from where they intended to go to Egypt because they feared a Babylonian reprisal (41:17–18). Johanan and others approached JEREMIAH to ask his advice (42:1–6), promising they would listen to the voice of God. When he admonished them to stay in the land and not go to Egypt, they claimed he lied (43:2–3). Johanan took all the people, including Jeremiah and BARUCH, to Egypt (43:5–7). According to the MT at Jer. 40:8, Johanan had a brother named Jonathan, but this information is missing in the SEPTUAGINT (as well as in the parallel, 2 Ki. 25:23).

(2) Firstborn son of King JOSIAH (1 Chr. 3:15). Nothing else is known about him. Because he did not succeed his father on the throne, some speculate that he died at an early age.

(3) Son of Elioenai and postexilic descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:24).

(4) Son of Azariah, included in a genealogy of high priests (1 Chr. 6:9–10). See AZARIAH #7.

(5) One of David's ambidextrous warriors from the tribe of BENJAMIN who joined him at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4; cf. vv. 1–2).

(6) A Gadite warrior (see GAD, TRIBE OF) who joined David in the wilderness; listed eighth in rank among the officers (1 Chr. 12:12). These Gadites are described as “brave warriors, ready for battle and able to handle the shield and spear. Their faces were the faces of lions, and they were as swift as gazelles in the mountains” (v. 8).

Ancient Mizpah should probably be identified with this hill (Tell en-Naşbeh). Johanan son of Kareah came to Mizpah and warned Gedaliah of an assassination attempt being plotted against him (Jer. 40:13–16).

(7) Son of Hakkatan; he was family head of the descendants of Azgad who returned to Jerusalem with EZRA (Ezra 8:12; 1 Esd. 8:38). According to some, the phrase yôḥānān ben-haqqāṭān should be rendered “Johanan the younger.”

(8) “Son” (i.e., grandson) of ELIASHIB the high priest, and high priest himself during the reign of DARIUS II (Neh. 12:22–23; cf. vv. 10–11, where “Jonathan” perhaps should be read as “Johanan”). The identification of this individual has a bearing on the dispute regarding the date of Ezra's mission. Some argue that he is the same individual mentioned in a letter from ELEPHANTINE (see ANET, 492a) and/or in JOSEPHUS (Ant. 11.7.1 §§297–301; but see E. M. Yamauchi in EBC, 4:581–82, and H. G. M. Williamson, Ezra-Nehemiah, WBC 16 [1985], 151–54; detailed discussion in J. C. VanderKam, From Joshua to Caiaphas: High Priests after the Exile [2004], 54–63).

(9) Alternate form of JEHOHANAN (2 Chr. 28:12 [KJV, NRSV]; Neh. 6:18 [KJV]).

Johannine theology joh-han'in. The teaching of JOHN THE APOSTLE as given in the NT books attributed to him. See JOHN, GOSPEL OF; JOHN, EPISTLES OF; REVELATION.

It is generally supposed that Johannine theology has its own distinctive features sufficient to mark it out from other streams of theological thought current in the APOSTOLIC AGE. Because of the usual dating of the Johannine literature at a time nearing the end of the 1st cent., the Johannine theology is seen usually as the latest development in the NT. Yet a strong warning is necessary against the too ready assumption that this theology has no roots in the earliest Christian traditions. It is wrong to suppose that John is a development from PAULINE THEOLOGY, for instance, without giving full consideration to the possibility that both preserve an early stream of thought that developed collaterally and not dependently.

The following survey will consider the contribution of the Johannine literature to the major aspects of Christian doctrine. In doing so, most attention will be paid to the Gospel of John, although some relevant data may be drawn from the epistles attributed to him. The Apocalypse, which may or may not have been written by the same author, will be included where applicable because it shares certain common theological features with the other literature.

I. Doctrine of God. Basic to any approach to early Christian theology is the doctrine of God, for all other aspects of doctrine are affected by it. It was a marked feature of all the various streams of Christian thought that they shared a strong view of God. This is particularly evident in the Johannine literature. In the fourth gospel, both the recorded teaching of Jesus and the evangelist's own comments bear testimony to this.

A. *The Hebrew basis for the doctrine. It is almost an axiom of primitive Christian theology that the doctrine of God was basically taken from JUDAISM. The OT had presented a high ethical concept that was superior to the inadequate and often capricious deities of the Gentile world. Judaism, by the time of Jesus, had exalted God to such high transcendence that intermediaries were necessary for him to maintain contact with men. This exalted notion of God made unique the revelation in Christ of a God who is at once unapproachably holy, yet condescendingly merciful. In the Johannine theology the more intimate aspect of God's relationship with human beings is brought vividly to the forefront. The various ways in which this feature compares and contrasts with the Hebrew background of thought will be brought out in the course of the following discussion.

B. *Aspects of God

1. God as Creator. Although John does not use the term create in the prologue to his gospel, he definitely assumes the creative activity of God. His purpose in drawing attention to the part played by the LOGOS in CREATION is to show that creation is a divine activity. For this there is ample support from the OT, not only from the creation account in Genesis, but also in many other books. At the same time there is no suggestion that the creative activity of God has ceased. The statement of Jesus in Jn. 5:17 that the Father still works is basic to his whole teaching that God is active, especially in his own mission. This concept of the continuing work of God is more dynamic than the rabbinic understanding of the SABBATH rest of God; according to the rabbis, God's work related to judgment, not creation, for the latter was regarded by them as completed. The distinction, therefore, is made between the physical and the ethical activity of God. Whereas in the teaching of Jesus the ethical is decidedly dominant, the physical activity of God is not absent.

In connection with the activity of God, John's gospel draws attention to the works of Jesus as being works of God. So NICODEMUS is recorded as saying, "Rabbi, we know you are a teacher who has come from God. For no one could perform the miraculous signs you are doing if God were not with him" (Jn. 3:2). It is taken for granted that supernatural signs are directly attributable to the action of God. A man who does what is true shows that his works are wrought in God (3:21). Similar stress on the works of God is found in the answer Jesus gives to the disciples' query about the blind man (9:3). The unfortunate man was to be the means for the manifestation of the works of God, and the later deduction of the man himself that no one could do what Jesus did unless God were with him (9:33) shows how clearly he had come to appreciate the continuous activity of God. To this may be added the challenge of Jesus when his Jewish opponents took up stones to stone him, "I have shown you many great miracles [lit., good works] from the Father. For which of these do you stone me?" (10:32). Good works are the direct result of the Father's activity.

2. God as Father. No other book of the NT lays such emphasis on the FATHERHOOD OF GOD as John's gospel, and special attention needs to be given to its contribution to this aspect of the doctrine. The idea of fatherhood was not new. There was some appreciation of the personal fatherhood of God in Hebrew thought, although the more dominant idea was corporate. God was father to his people Israel. There is certainly nothing to compare with the depth of personal relationship that is seen so clearly in the filial status of Jesus, which was divine fatherhood on a new plane.

It is in John's account of the cleansing of the temple that Jesus refers to the temple as "my Father's house" (Jn. 2:16). One reason the Jews sought to kill him was that he called God "Father," which in their eyes was tantamount to claiming equality with God (5:18). Therefore, they construed the Lord's references to the Father in a different way from traditional Hebrew thought. This comment by John on Jewish opposition leads into an extended discourse about the Lord's relationship with the Father. Since the Son is seen to be not only dependent upon but also wholly in harmony with the Father, the Jewish claim that he was making himself equal with God is seen to be justified. What the Jews regarded as blasphemy, the Christians recognized as revelation. The Father's life-giving work and judging activity are closely reflected in the Son (5:21). The Son, in fact, is endowed with all the authority of the Father in judgment (5:27).

Another extensive Johannine passage reveals the fatherhood of God prominently (Jn. 8:18–59), when a comment by Jesus prompted the question, "Where is your father?" (8:19). The dullness of understanding in the hearers is vividly brought out. In spite of Jesus' specific reference to the Father, John records, "They did not understand that he was telling them about his [lit., the] Father" (8:27). Such teaching was unprecedented; nevertheless, the Jews themselves claimed to regard God as Father (8:41), although Jesus proceeded to disillusion them (cf. 8:44).

Another passage also reveals the fatherhood of God (Jn. 10:31–32). Again, there was a clash with Jews, whose intention to give vent to violence was challenged by Jesus with comments about the Father. Most significant about this incident is that it was prompted by the claim of Jesus to be one with the Father (10:30), and was followed by the equally astonishing statement that "the Father is in me, and I in the Father" (10:38). There is no denying that John desired to bring to the fore in his gospel the predominant part played by the filial consciousness of Jesus in the pursuance of his mission. After describing the incident in the upper room when Jesus arose to wash the disciples' feet, John comments that Jesus knew that the Father had given all things into his hands (13:3). In the subsequent discourse, PHILIP made the request, "Lord, show us the Father" (14:8), to which Jesus answered with a further question that presupposed that anyone who had seen him had seen the Father. The Father desired to communicate knowledge of himself in the person of Jesus. The whole farewell discourse contains constant references to the Father. Most illuminating in this respect is Jn. 17, which records the prayer of Jesus to the Father. In this section alone Jesus used descriptive adjectives with the title. God is addressed as both "Holy Father" (17:11) and "Righteous Father" (17:25). Nowhere else is the close relationship between Jesus and the Father seen as in these petitions, offered mainly on the behalf of others.

The major difference between the gospel and 1 John in references to God is that the idea of fatherhood is much more prominent in the gospel (119 times) than in the epistle (12 times), although God is mentioned 64 times in the epistle. The difference is due to the difference of purpose, but the fundamental concept of the divine fatherhood is common to both. There are few references to this theme in the Apocalypse, although those that do occur (all but one in the letters to the churches) are consonant with the usage in the gospel and epistles.

3. God as Spirit. The spiritual nature of God is specifically asserted in Jesus' discussion with the Samaritan woman (Jn. 4:24). It is not introduced as a new revelation; it is rather the deduction from it that appears to be new. WORSHIP must take place in accordance with the nature of the object of worship, which entails spiritual worship in view of the nature of God. It is important to note, as W. F. Howard points out, that “the initiative is with God, who seeks such worshipers, and himself bestows the Spirit of truth” (Christianity according to St. John [1943], 61). The teaching of Jesus on the subject of man’s approach to God assumes this spiritual nature of God.

4. God as Light. In the prologue to the gospel the metaphorical use of LIGHT is introduced and is also used as a self-description of Jesus later in the gospel (cf. Jn. 1:4–9; 8:12–13). It is more specifically applied to God in 1 Jn. 1:5, and a similar idea is found in Rev. 21:23 (cf. 22:5). The idea is not unique to Christian thought. C. H. Dodd claims parallels with the HERMETIC WRITINGS and PHILO JUDAEUS (see BJRL 21 [1937]: 149; cf. also Dodd’s important monograph, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel [1953], 201–2). If the imagery used may be paralleled, there is not the same depth of insight in the Hermetica and Philo as is found in 1 John, where the whole concept is brought into the sphere of human relationships as the readers are exhorted to walk in the light. Fellowship is possible only if some agreement exists between the natures of those communing.

5. God as Love. There is much on this theme in both the gospel and the epistle, but it is in the latter that the definite assertion is made that “God is love” (1 Jn. 4:16). A marked distinction must be drawn between this Christian concept of LOVE and the contemporary Greek concept, which often failed to distinguish between love and lust (cf. A. Nygren, Agape and Eros [1953], 1:118ff.; E. Stauffer in TDNT, 1:35–38; C. Spicq, Agape in the New Testament I [1963]). Moreover, in view of the inferior character of their notion of love, the pagans could not conceive of God loving human beings, for as E. K. Lee points out, “Such love would imply a downward movement, from the level of divine perfection to a lower level” (The Religious Thought of St. John [1950], 54). The statement in Jn. 3:16 that “God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son” concisely sums up the uniqueness of the Christian approach. The spring of divine action in salvation was love. Such love is poured out toward us (cf. 1 Jn. 4:7–12).

6. Other aspects of God. In the prologue, the invisible nature of God is brought into focus (Jn. 1:18) to be modified by the knowledge that he has become revealed in Christ. This God who is so revealed is true (3:33), which means both true or real in contrast to no gods, and true in contrast with false. The former is nearer to the Hebrew idea of truth, the latter to the Greek idea. God is not only faithful but is eternally real. In the concluding statement of the epistle (1 Jn. 5:20), this characteristic of being true is applied to God who has been revealed in Christ.

God is seen not only in his redemptive activities, but also in his work of judgment. John does not hesitate to speak of the wrath of God abiding on those who disobey the Son (Jn. 3:36). His work in judgment already has been mentioned. The Johannine presentation of God may be summed up as exalted and yet loving, as holy and yet merciful, as Father and yet Judge. The other aspects of doctrine must be considered against this background.

II. Jesus Christ. In examining the CHRISTOLOGY of John, the obvious point of departure must be the prologue, although some discussion will be necessary concerning the extent to which this section can be regarded as normative for the whole gospel. It may be regarded as detached from the main body of the gospel, as it is by those who see it, essentially, as a Hellenistically orientated introduction. If, as others maintain, its basis is Semitic, it may more readily be treated as an integral part of the gospel (cf. the discussion in W. F. Howard's The Fourth Gospel in Recent Criticism, 2nd ed. [1955], 57). Others regard the major part of the prologue as originally a hymn on the Logos that has been adapted for the purpose. Whatever the origin of the Logos material, this prologue bears witness to an early Christology and is of great importance in any estimate of Johannine theology.

A. The Logos. There are various theories regarding the LOGOS that can only be touched upon here. The STOICS spoke of the logos spermatikos, which was the divine Reason that made nature function. It was what Howard called “theoretical pantheism” (Christianity according to St. John, 35). The term is used some 1,300 times in Philo, and the suggestion that there are points of contact between him and John is natural enough, but the distinctive features of the Johannine use of the term are lacking in Philo. There can be no denial that John implies the distinct personality of the Logos, as is clear from his identification of the Logos with Christ. In this respect he differed radically from Philo, who, although he used various terms to describe the part played by Logos in creation, never rises to the concept of a personal agent. Moreover, Philo never suggests what John asserts regarding the preexistence of the Logos. The most far-reaching contrast is in the absence from Philo of any idea of the INCARNATION of the Logos, whereas this is the key thought in John's presentation. It is as if John were saying that all this theorizing about the Logos is finished now that the Logos himself has come to dwell among men. It would be a fitting introduction to Christ for those accustomed to these Hellenistic modes of thought.

Other strands of Greek thinking can be seen in the Hermetica, where the term is also used; but in this case communion with God is attained through nature rather than through Christ. The parallel in usage is only superficial. In addition, some have seen a correspondence with the Jewish concept of the intermediary Memra (Aram. mêmar or mêmrā’, “word, command”) that spanned the gap between the transcendental God and the created order. Although the notion undoubtedly throws light on what might have been the Jewish understanding of John's Logos—an important consideration if John's gospel comes from a Jewish source—yet this would not exhaust the meaning.

B. The “I am” sayings. Throughout this gospel are sayings of Jesus beginning with “I am,” which present a wide variety of facets of his character and mission. “I am the bread of life,” which forms the main theme of the discourse in Jn. 6, shows that the true spiritual nourishment that Jesus brings is nothing less than himself. The key statement in the whole interpretation is in 6:51—“the bread...is my flesh.” Jesus declared himself to be the light of the world, as the source of all true illumination (Jn.

8:12; cf. 9:5). The shepherd discourse (ch. 10) contains two such statements—"I am the door" (10:7) and "I am the good shepherd" (10:11). Both draw attention to the uniqueness of Jesus in relation to his sheep. In the incident of the raising of LAZARUS, Jesus said to MARTHA, "I am the resurrection and the life" (11:25), which is tantamount to claiming that all life finds its basis in Jesus Christ, a thought supported by the further statement, "I am the way and the truth and the life" (14:6). The concluding saying is, "I am the true vine" (15:1).

In all these sayings, Jesus made claims for himself that would sound presumptuous if made by any other. It requires the exalted viewpoint of the prologue to make them intelligible. Some interpreters have further appealed to the OT name for Yahweh, I AM (WHO I AM) (Exod. 3:14), as a basis for the fullest understanding of Jesus' sayings. When used in the absolute, "I am" (Gk. egō eimi) would carry a weightier connotation than when used with a predicate. Nonetheless, there may well have been a significant connection in the mind of Jesus. The most extraordinary statement of Jesus involving an unqualified "I am" is Jn. 8:58, "Before Abraham was, I am" (NRSV), which cannot be otherwise interpreted than as a claim to preexistence. It is highly probable, therefore, that this usage bears relation to the exalted name for Yahweh. See GOD, NAMES OF.

C. The filial sayings. It has been pointed out already how frequently in the discourses in John's gospel Jesus speaks of God as Father and of himself as Son. This filial relationship is based on human analogy, but goes far beyond it, for the sonship of Jesus is unique. It is for this reason that the adjective monogenēs G3666 ("only" or "only-begotten") is applied to Jesus in John's gospel four times (Jn. 1:14, 18; 3:16, 18) and once in the first epistle (1 Jn. 4:9). The word focuses attention upon uniqueness. Jesus is Son in such a sense that he alone is the means whereby the Father reveals himself. Throughout the gospel, the awareness of Jesus of his unique relation with the Father is self-evident. He frequently refers to himself as one sent from God. He makes clear that he speaks on the basis of the Father's authority and conceives all his actions as conforming to the divine will. The charge brought by his enemies (Jn. 5:18) that he made himself equal with God may be understood in the rabbinic sense of acting independently of God, a charge that Jesus refutes (so H. Odeberg, The Fourth Gospel [1929], 203.)

This frequent use of the title "Son" in John's gospel compares and contrasts in some respects with the synoptic title of SON OF MAN. The latter title is not absent from John, but is infrequent when compared with the widespread and unqualified use of Son. Nevertheless, there are nearly as many occurrences of it in John as in Mark. In all of these there is an eschatological emphasis (see A. Correll, Consummation Est [1958], 103–4). This draws attention to a change of emphasis in John from the identification of Jesus with man to his filial relationship with God. The two emphases are not mutually exclusive but are complementary. It should be noted that John's purpose was to lead the readers to faith in Jesus as the Christ and as Son of God (Jn. 20:30–31). An echo of this is found in Martha's confession (11:27). To John, nothing was more important than that the readers should recognize the divine nature of Jesus. He had no intention of portraying him as anyone less than Son of God.

D. Indications of the true humanity of Jesus. Although so much stress in John falls on Jesus' divine aspect, it is significant that nowhere else is the true humanity of Jesus more clearly brought out. At the scene by the well at SYCHAR, Jesus was both weary and thirsty. At the grave of Lazarus he was deeply moved with indignation and wept. In the account of the crucifixion John records the saying "I thirst" (Jn. 19:28). In addition, he notes his essentially human condescension in washing the disciples' feet (13:1–2).

The Jesus portrayed in John's gospel is not remote; he is interested in people. He takes time to talk with the two disciples of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Jn. 1:35–42). He concerns himself with the domestic arrangements at a village wedding (2:1–2). He accepts an intrusion from NICODEMUS at night time (3:1–2). He does the unconventional by talking with a Samaritan woman at midday (4:7). He seeks out the impotent man who had been healed to give him some moral instruction (5:14). A similar action follows the healing of the blind man (cf. 9:35). Such incidents bring out clearly the essential character of Jesus in his warm concern for people. Whereas this is not John's major interest, it is indispensable to his total picture of Jesus Christ.

E. Messianic considerations. In John's gospel the recognition of the messianic status of Jesus occurs much earlier than in the Synoptic Gospels, and this has given rise to problems regarding the veracity of John's references. The first of these comes when ANDREW tells his brother PETER that he has found the MESSIAH (Jn. 1:41). The second evidence comes in Jesus' conversation with the Samaritan woman when he acknowledges the title Messiah (4:25). In the synoptics, however, and particularly in Mark, there is reticence in allowing observers to publish any recognition of the messianic signs. This led Wilhelm Wrede to propose his theory of a "messianic secret," by which he meant that Mark has imposed these messianic hints upon his narrative (see MARK, GOSPEL OF). Such a theory has been resuscitated with modifications by T. A. Burkill. It requires, however, considerable reinterpretation of the evidence to excise from the Gospels the messianic consciousness of Jesus.

Certainly John presents a distinctive account of messianic claims, as is stated in his purpose statement (Jn. 20:31). There is no need to suppose that his account shows any fundamental difference from the synoptists. There were many stages in the development of the disciples' full understanding of Jesus as Messiah, and John does not imply that this had already happened in the earliest part of the ministry of Jesus. He shows occasions in his subsequent narrative when the disciples did not understand (cf. 2:22; 12:16; 13:36; 20:25). What John implies is that two of the disciples at least had an early flash of insight. The admission by Jesus of his messianic office to the Samaritan woman is in marked contrast to the synoptic restraint, but for Samaritans the messianic concept was not, as with the Jews, inextricably bound up with nationalistic aspirations.

Since John sets out his gospel in such a way that his readers might be led to believe in Jesus as Messiah, it is relevant to inquire how he achieved this purpose. The nationalistic motive is specifically rejected in Jn. 6:15. In this case Jesus himself takes the initiative in avoiding the crowds. On more than one occasion he avoids mere popular acclaim. The messianism seen in John's gospel is, on the contrary, essentially spiritual. Jesus is conscious of being the Sent One—that is, sent to do the will of God—and it is in this sense that the title Messiah must be understood. This explains why the Jewish nationalists found events unintelligible that for Jesus were fulfillment of a mission. The cross would be more than an enigma—a positive stumbling block—if the messianism of Jesus was understood in any other sense than spiritual.

The total Johannine Christology has many distinctive features, but there is a common basis with other streams of early thought about Jesus Christ. There are no grounds for the view that John's Christology is a special and independent development of his own.

III. Teaching about the Spirit. It is in the sphere of teaching about the HOLY SPIRIT that John's contribution is especially noteworthy, for there is more about the activity of the Spirit in this gospel than in any other. It will be best to consider the references to the Spirit in order of mention and then to construct some summary of the whole teaching.

A. At the baptism of Jesus. The descent of the Spirit upon Jesus when he was baptized by John the Baptist closely follows the pattern of the synoptic accounts. John the Baptist's testimony that he saw the Spirit descend as a dove from heaven and that it rested on Jesus (Jn. 1:32) was strengthened by his (John the Baptist's) inner God-given conviction that whoever received the Spirit in this way would baptize with the Spirit (1:33). All the synoptics mention the dove-like appearance of the Spirit, but John alone records the prior message given to the Baptist concerning its significance.

The BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT is clearly a major characteristic of the mission of Jesus, but the question arises as to when this activity happened. Does this refer to the baptism of the Spirit seen at PENTECOST and thereafter, or is there any evidence of such baptism during the earthly ministry of Jesus? There can be no doubt that in the fullest sense the baptism of the Spirit did not take place until after the glorification of Jesus. This is specifically supported by the statement in Jn. 7:39 (see discussion below). The close connection between the mission of Jesus and the work of the Spirit is basic to all the records. It suggests that the mission of Jesus could not be adequately applied apart from the activity of the Spirit, a conviction that is amply supported from the evidence in Acts.

B. The Nicodemus incident. The next allusion to the Spirit is in Jn. 3:5, where Jesus in conversing with NICODEMUS links the Spirit with water in emphasizing the necessity for new birth. Whereas there is dispute over the interpretation of "water," whether or not it refers to baptism, there can be no dispute about the essential role of the Spirit in the process of REGENERATION. The fact that Jesus proceeded to contrast natural and spiritual birth (3:6) shows that the work of the Spirit cannot be conceived in any other than spiritual terms. A human analogy is in mind. Whatever comes from human parents shares the nature of the parents, and John uses this basic principle to maintain the spiritual nature of those born of God. It is as if Jesus knew how likely people would be to desire to track with precision the activity of the Spirit, for he shows how impossible this is by using the analogy of the wind (3:8). The statement emphasizes the absolute sovereignty of the Spirit in the processes of regeneration. There is no set pattern, no mechanization. The whole process is on an essentially personal basis.

In the same chapter, John records another significant statement about the Spirit. "For the one whom God has sent speaks the words of God, for God gives the Spirit without limit" (Jn. 3:34). Although there are other ways in which the sentence can be construed—e.g., with the Spirit as the subject rather than the object of the giving—the above rendering is the most probable. The words of God need the Spirit of God to interpret them, and the assurance is given that there will be no stinting in the supply of the Spirit. Again, the close connection between the mission of Jesus and the work of the Spirit is brought to the fore.

A parallel contrast between the Spirit and flesh is recorded later (Jn. 6:63), where once again Jesus connects his words with the Spirit, if pneuma G4460 is here understood as the Holy Spirit. Even if it be regarded as the human spirit set in contrast to the flesh, it may still be treated as evidence of the essentially spiritual character of the teaching of Jesus.

C. At the Feast of Tabernacles. The important declaration of Jesus made at the Feast of Tabernacles concerned anyone who believed in him—"streams of living water will flow from within him," followed by the comment, "By this he meant the Spirit, whom those who believed in him were later to receive. Up to that time the Spirit had not been given, since Jesus had not yet been glorified" (Jn.

7:38–39). The interpretation comes from the evangelist and shows his own understanding, and presumably that of the early church, regarding the connection between the glorification of Jesus and the gift of the Spirit. The analogy of running water as a symbol of the Spirit is suggestive, for it represents both what is essential to life and what possesses cleansing power, which are prominent aspects of the Spirit’s work. One important feature of the present statement is that the Spirit is in some way communicated through the agency of believers. The book of Acts contains instances of the gift of the Spirit coming by means of the apostles, which serves as an illustration of this aspect.

D. The Paraclete sayings. The major passages about the Spirit in John’s gospel are all found in the discourses in the upper room. There are five sayings in which the Spirit is referred to as the PARACLETE (a transliteration of the Greek paraklēetos G4156). The passages are Jn. 14:15–17; 14:25–26; 15:26–27; 16:5–11, 12–15. Hans Windisch (The Spirit-Paraclete in the Fourth Gospel [1968, orig. 1927], 2–3) treated these passages as separate from the rest of the discourses, but it is valuable to regard them as forming a group that supplies much information regarding the Spirit. First the meaning of the Greek word should be noted. It is a legal term, but not exclusively so. Where it bears this significance it may be rendered “advocate,” but it should not be confined to one who pleads another’s cause in a legal sense, for the help to be given is more general. The rendering “counselor” conveys this more general sense. The sayings in John are sufficiently explicit to show in what ways the Spirit counsels.

The first passage (Jn. 14:15–17) identifies the Counselor as the Spirit of truth (cf. 15:26; 16:13). The idea of truth here is probably twofold—reality and veracity. Since God himself is truth, it is to be expected that truth will be a characteristic of his Spirit. The main activity of the Spirit is his continual presence with his people: “he lives with you and will be in you” (14:17). This statement focuses upon the Spirit’s function to continue the presence of Jesus among his people. It is in this sense that he is another Counselor. The second passage (14:25–26) draws attention to his teaching ministry. When the Spirit comes, sent by the Father in the Son’s name, he “will teach you all things and will remind you of everything I have said to you” (14:26). The close connection between the Spirit and the teaching of Jesus is to be observed, and the most significant feature is the Spirit's part in restoring that teaching to the disciples' mind. Jesus did not leave the transmission of his teaching to the faulty memories of men. The Spirit's activity had fundamental importance in the establishment of true Christian traditions.

The third passage (Jn. 15:26–27) lends support to the view that the major objective of the Spirit is the glorification of Christ. He who is said to proceed from the Father “will testify about me” (15:26). Because the disciples were called to do the same, their possession of the Spirit is at once seen to be indispensable. There was never any question of the disciples witnessing in their own strength. The fourth passage (16:5–11) is introduced as an assurance to the disciples in view of the coming departure of Jesus. It shows again that the coming of the Spirit depends upon the cessation of the earthly ministry of Jesus. The Spirit's ministry will follow the ministry of Jesus. It would consist in bringing conviction to the world. It concerns sin, righteousness, and judgment—the two former on the ground of Christ's position, the latter on the ground of the already pronounced judgment upon the prince of this world. Placed as they were in a hostile world, the disciples discovered later the reality of this promise.

The final passage (Jn. 16:12–15) is the promise that the revelation of truth given thus far would be developed through the agency of the Spirit. The Spirit's function in this was to glorify Christ. His authority was not his own. He was to declare not only things yet to come, but all that belongs to Christ. This ministry of the Spirit was therefore entirely Christ-centered. One remaining reference, “Receive the Holy Spirit” (20:22), contains the words of Jesus as he breathed on the disciples in the upper room after the resurrection. This seems to be a foreshadowing of Pentecost. It is accompanied by a promise regarding forgiving or retaining of sins, which is clearly connected with the authority of the Spirit.

E. Summary of Johannine teaching about the Spirit. To sum up the Johannine evidence concerning the Holy Spirit, it may be said that the essential ministry of the Spirit is assumed throughout. His activity is an integral part of the Johannine presentation of Christianity. Indeed, the writer must have been conscious of the fact that his own knowledge of the teaching of Jesus was derived from the Spirit's leading. Christianity was a dynamic faith and the power was that of the Spirit. At the outset of Christian experience, the Spirit's activity is dominant in the process of regeneration; so it is in the realm of faith. The believer is assured of the indwelling presence of the Spirit. The work of conviction cannot be achieved without his aid.

There is sufficient evidence in this gospel to show an exalted view of the Spirit. He proceeds from God, and he is sent by God. He is the gift accompanying the glorification of Jesus. His whole work depends upon what is essentially a continuation of the work of Jesus Christ. In a sense he is the other self of Jesus and called another Counselor. The personality of the Spirit in this gospel cannot be denied, for although some passages can be understood in a nonpersonal sense, others cannot, and these latter must be determinative. The basic idea of the Paraclete is personal. As a teacher he cannot be an impersonal influence or principle. If the Spirit is a fitting example of witnessing, his personality must be assumed. Indeed he cannot take the place of Christ unless he is a person. Moreover, the masculine personal pronoun is used in spite of the neuter gender of the word pneuma (cf. Jn. 14:26; 15:26; 16:7–8, 14). There is no doubt that the evangelist intentionally brought out the personal characteristics of the Spirit.

The question arises whether John presents any doctrine of the TRINITY. If by doctrine one understands a formal dogma, the answer must be in the negative. There is enough evidence, however, to show that the doctrine is here in embryo. The respective emphases on the different persons of the Trinity by John supply some of the data on which the Trinity came to be assumed.

In 1 John, the references to the Spirit of God are few, but what there are conform to the usage in the gospel. Knowledge of the indwelling Christ comes through the Spirit (1 Jn. 3:24). It is the Spirit of God who enables people to confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh, as contrasted with false spirits who deny this truth (4:2–3). The Spirit is a gift (4:13) and a witness (5:7–8). In the Apocalypse, John writes of being in the Spirit (Rev. 1:10; 4:2; 17:3; 21:10). There are various references to the seven spirits (1:4; 4:5; 5:6), probably referring to seven aspects of the Spirit or to his perfection. A heavenly voice (14:13) is identified as the Spirit, while the Spirit is linked with the Bride in the closing exhortation (22:17).

IV. Facets of salvation. The Johannine literature presents a picture of a world in need and then shows the means used to meet that need. It will be helpful therefore to discuss the Johannine doctrine of SALVATION under four sections: sin and judgment, atonement, faith, and eternal life.

A. Sin and judgment. Both in the specific teaching of Jesus and in the evangelist's own comments is a distinctive presentation of the WORLD, which is described as in direct contrast to the divine order. In John's writings, the term kosmos G3180 refers not to the world of the created order, but rather to the world of men and women in rebellion against God; it carries a moral connotation. For this reason Jesus spoke of the hatred of the world (Jn. 15:18). There is a dualism in this approach; yet it is not a theoretical or speculative dualism, but an essentially practical dualism. It arises from the indisputable clash between truth and error, and between God and the world. Into such a world Jesus came, a world already alienated from God. Indeed, John makes this clear in the prologue, which presents a fundamental antithesis between light and darkness (1:5). The world is opposed to the Word (1:9–10). It is in fact under the dominion of the devil (12:31; 16:11; cf. 1 Jn. 5:19). In 1 John the world is the domain of false prophets (4:1), is full of lust and pride (2:16), and is the object of the Christian's warfare to overcome it (5:4–5).

This basically evil background sets in right perspective the Johannine teaching on SIN. It is important to observe how sin is to be understood. Some of the evidence suggests that it is to be confined to the rejection of Jesus. He himself states, "If I had not come and spoken to them, they would not be guilty of sin," and, "If I had not done among them what no one else did, they would not be guilty of sin" (Jn. 15:22, 24). The work of the Spirit is to convince the world of sin "because men do not believe in me" (16:9). This is not the only view of sin found in the Johannine literature. The concept of sin is applicable to believers, but provision is made for forgiveness of recurring sin (1 Jn. 1:9). Moreover, sin is specifically defined as lawlessness (3:4).

Are there then two irreconcilable concepts? Clearly the people addressed will affect the definition of the term. In the passages cited from the gospel, Jesus is dealing not with the basic concept of sin, but with unbelief, and to make clear the serious character of the latter he includes it in the category of sin. But, to make sin equivalent to unbelief would restrict too strongly the category of sin. The Johannine view of the "world" demands a view of sin as distinctive, that is, as a rebellion against God. Closely linked with this is the view of JUDGMENT. Salvation is contrasted with condemnation (Jn. 3:17). In fact, it can be rightly understood only against the background of its antithesis. Sin had incurred condemnation, and because sinners could do nothing of themselves to alter the position, the plan of redemption was necessary. The same antithesis is seen in the contrast between eternal life and judgment (5:24). Rejection of Christ will incur judgment (12:48). To this must be linked the reference to the WRATH of God (3:36), which is directed against those who disobey the Son.

B. Atonement. Like all the evangelists, John sees the major mission of Jesus as dealing with human need. There are, however, many distinctive features in John's presentation of that mission. Only the more important of these can be mentioned.

(1) John the Baptist announced Jesus as the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world (Jn. 1:29), which at once linked the mission of Baby lamb flanked by two sheep. John the Baptist declared regarding Jesus, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world!" (Jn. 1:29).

Jesus with the removal of sin. But, in what sense? The figure of the lamb is suggestive of a sacrificial interpretation, and the imagery used is reminiscent of Isa. 53. The Greek word for lamb used by John differs from the SEPTUAGINT of Isa. 53, but this does not materially affect the sacrificial significance. The universal character of this sacrificial mission is clearly brought out. The lamb imagery is continued in the Apocalypse, where the whole sequence of visions is dominated by the figure of the lamb slain before the foundation of the world, but now exalted in heaven. It need not be supposed that John the Baptist understood the significance of his own statement, for it is only in the light of the cross that its relevance to the mission of Jesus is fully appreciated.

(2) An important statement was made by Jesus following the cleansing of the temple: "Destroy this temple, and I will raise it again in three days" (Jn. 2:19). John comments that the temple was his body (2:21). The statement reveals the consciousness of Jesus that his mission would end in death at the hands of men, but that it would be crowned with the resurrection.

(3) The promise that the Son of man must be lifted up as Moses raised the serpent (Jn. 3:14–15) is suggestive of the mode of his death. Faith is in some way related to this uplifted person, and eternal life depends on such faith.

(4) The statement regarding God's love (Jn. 3:16) is important because it grounds the divine giving in the divine love. There is more emphasis on love in the mission of Jesus in John's gospel than in the synoptics. To this may be linked the saying of Jesus, "Greater love has no one than this, that he lay down his life for his friends" (15:13). The connection between love and sacrifice is a key concept in the Johannine presentation of the passion.

(5) In the discourse on the bread of life, Jesus spoke of people as eating his flesh and drinking his blood (Jn. 6:51, 53). Some see a direct reference to the sacraments and suppose that this was John's attempt to counteract an excessive sacramentalism. Regarded as a statement of Jesus well before the institution of the Last Supper, the words may be understood in a preparatory sense. They provide the basic teaching that is essential for a right understanding of the words of institution. The giving of flesh and blood must again bear a sacrificial significance.

(6) The voluntary character of the death of Jesus is seen in the statement regarding the good shepherd who lays down his life for the sheep (Jn. 10:11). This principle is more specifically stated by Jesus in relation to himself—"No one takes it from me, but I lay it down of my own accord" (10:18). In the same context Jesus revealed the necessity for his mission when referring to the other sheep that he must bring into the flock (10:16). This idea of necessity may be supported also from the serpent passage (3:14).

(7) When CAIAPHAS commented that it was more fitting for one to die rather than that the whole people perish (Jn. 11:50), referring to the need to plot against Jesus, John recognized a prophetic voice, but understood it in an entirely different sense from Caiaphas's own meaning. To him it possessed significance that the words were uttered by the high priest; but the most important aspect was the spiritual expediency of the death of Jesus for many. The idea of substitution is unmistakable. The purpose was to gather into one the scattered children of God (11:52).

(8) In answer to a quest from some Greeks, Jesus spoke of the necessity for a grain of wheat to fall into the ground and die if it is to produce fruit (Jn. 12:24). He was clearly referring to his own death, and once again the major emphasis is upon the necessity for that death. The future success of the entire mission of Jesus depended upon it.

(9) Throughout the Gospel of John, the approach of the hour in which Jesus was to be glorified is specially marked. Its delay is noted earlier (as in Jn. 2:4), but in 12:23 this hour has come, and since this was the commencement of the passion week there can be no doubt that the hour was the hour of the passion. There is a sense of inevitability; the death of Jesus fitted into a divine program. Nowhere is this so vividly revealed as in John's gospel. This idea is echoed in the prayer of Jesus, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (17:4). The whole prayer in this chapter shows that the mission of Jesus was directed toward the welfare of his people.

(10) The insistence by Jesus that even Pilate would have no power over him unless that power were granted by God (Jn. 19:11) again shows the divine pattern in the events of the passion.

(11) The completeness of the work of Christ is strikingly brought out by his declaration on the cross, "It is finished" (Jn. 19:30). This was more than the end of his earthly life; this was the completion of his redemptive mission.

Although no systematic doctrine of the ATONEMENT may be found, John's gospel provides much data toward the formulation of such a doctrine. The first epistle also provides useful data. The cleansing of sins is specifically attributed to the blood of Christ (1 Jn. 1:7). Christ is said to be an EXPIATION (or more accurately PROPITIATION) for our sins (2:2). The purpose of the incarnation was to destroy the works of the devil (3:8). The divine initiative in sending Jesus Christ for his work of expiation is made clear in 4:9-10 (cf. also 4:14). In the Apocalypse, doctrine is not prominent, but where reference is made to the cleansing of sin (Rev. 1:5; 7:14), this is through the blood of the Lamb. The anthem of adoration chanted by the twenty-four elders (5:9-10) centers upon the redeeming activities of the Lamb. It is important to note these features in a book so largely devoted to the theme of judgment and retribution. The new people of God are a redeemed people who stand out in vivid contrast to the agencies of evil that are finally to be overcome.

C. Faith. The provision of atonement is not enough without some knowledge of how its benefits may be appropriated, and the Johannine literature is specially rich in drawing attention to the function of FAITH. It is the verb rather than the noun that constantly recurs, vividly emphasizing the active aspect.

The gospel is written to inculcate faith. First John was written to bring knowledge to that faith. The teaching of Jesus is full of exhortations to believe and full of promises to believers. It is by faith that men enter into a living relationship with Jesus Christ. Faith leads to life, and unbelief issues in condemnation (cf. Jn. 3:16–18). Of special significance is the often recurring preposition eis G1650 (lit., “into”) after the verb “believe” when Jesus is the object of faith; for this introduces the idea of personal trust that goes beyond the simple idea of belief (cf. J. H. Moulton, Grammar of New Testament Greek. Vol. I: Prolegomena, 3rd ed. [1908], 68).

The close connection between knowing and believing is important in view of the Gnostic overemphasis on the former at the expense of the latter (see GNOSTICISM). Although the teaching of Jesus and the comments of John never propose that faith can exist without understanding, it is basic to Johannine Christianity that Jesus Christ came to do something more than merely to reveal truth.

D. Eternal life. The concept of ETERNAL life is not unique to the Johannine literature, but it is specially characteristic of it. It is seen as the end result of the process of redemption. In some respects it takes the place of the synoptic emphasis upon the KINGDOM OF GOD, but the two ideas are complementary. R. H. Charles (Eschatology [1899], 315), regarded eternal life in relation to the individual and the kingdom in relation to the community. Eternal life is essentially a present possession (Jn. 3:16; 5:24; 6:47; 1 Jn. 3:14; 5:11–12). This corresponds with the present aspect of the kingdom in the synoptics. It also involves fullness of life in the future. Eternal life is inseparable from the person of Jesus Christ, who declared himself to be the true LIFE.

V. Eschatology. Much debate has surrounded the problem of ESCHATOLOGY in this gospel. Many scholars have set its teaching in antithesis to the apocalyptic type of eschatology found in the synoptics. This has been mainly due to the belief that John is indebted to Hellenistic modes of thought, whereas the synoptics have been more influenced by Jewish concepts. (See HELLENISM.) The stress on the Hellenistic background for this gospel has somewhat lessened following the discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS because of their testimony to the existence of similar concepts in nonconformist Judaism. Clearly a right assessment of background is essential for a true appreciation of Johannine eschatology. It is certain that no true appraisal can come along the way of strong antithesis. There is enough evidence to demonstrate that teaching akin to the synoptic eschatology is not absent from John, as the following survey will show.

Before considering the evidence, it would be well to indicate the various schools of interpretation. Some concentrate on “realized eschatology” and dismiss the futurist elements entirely, either by resorting to a thesis of editorial additions (e.g., R. Bultmann) or by explaining away the futuristic texts (e.g., C. H. Dodd). Although interpreting rather differently what they mean by realized eschatology, both agree that eschatology has to do with the present rather than the future. The reverse position has been adopted by others who insist that present eschatology has no meaning unless it is inseparably linked with a future emphasis (so W. Stählin, A. Corell). There can be no doubt that the latter approach takes more account of all the data in the gospel. Within this general position there is, of course, room for much difference of opinion regarding the relationship between John and the synoptics over eschatology.

A. Relation to the OT. The firm belief of the early church that the life and teaching of Jesus are a fulfillment of OT prediction gives an eschatological emphasis. In a sense the hopes and promises of the past are now “realized.” They have ceased to be future. That this is implicit in John’s approach is seen in the prologue, where the benefits received through Christ, that is, grace and truth, are compared with the law given through MOSES (Jn. 1:17). There is considerable emphasis in the teaching of Jesus on ABRAHAM, and the superiority of Jesus to Abraham is specifically implied (8:53–54). A similar superiority to JACOB is evident (4:5, 12; cf. 1:50–51). As far as the OT patterns are concerned, the advent of Jesus was the eschaton (neut. of eschatos G2274, “end”); however, since he himself gave further predictions regarding his parousia G4242 (“return”), the final consummation is still in the future.

B. The use of the title “Son of Man.” The main feature of the occurrence of SON OF MAN in John is the context in which it occurs. It is almost as frequent as in the synoptics; in the latter it is used sometimes generally, sometimes in relation to the passion of Jesus, and sometimes eschatologically, whereas in John it is uniformly used in the eschatological sense. It concerns the “lifting up” of Jesus, which refers in the first place to the event of the PASSION, but goes beyond that in conveying the idea of EXALTATION (Jn. 3:14; 8:28; 12:34; cf. 12:23; 13:31). The Son of Man was to be glorified. This is the climax of his mission. In this is a rather different emphasis from that found in the synoptic usage, where apocalyptic imagery is used; but the difference is not a contradiction. John concentrates more on the state than the event. For him eschatology has a spiritual importance.

C. References to resurrection and to the last day. Statements of Jesus are recorded that have a future reference (Jn. 5:25–29). The dead are to hear the voice of the Son of God. The Son has received from the Father authority to execute judgment. The time will come for a RESURRECTION to life for some and a resurrection to judgment for others. These references are in the style of Jewish apocalyptic literature (see J. H. Bernard, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to St. John, ICC, 2 vols. [1928], 1:clvi) and cannot be explained in terms of realized eschatology. There is a finality about these concepts that is wholly out of keeping with the present. Similarly, the theme of the last day is essentially futuristic (ch. 6). In the discourse in which these references occur Jesus clearly assumed that his hearers would have some understanding of the “last day.”

D. Time references in the gospel. The terms “hour,” “now,” “not yet,” “yet a little while,” and similar expressions are frequent in John’s gospel and must be regarded as characteristic. One deduction from them is that the eschatological event is not entirely future. There is a strong present element. In Christ, and particularly in his death, the hour “has now come.” This sense of completeness is present where Jesus announced that his hour had come (Jn. 12:23), and where he related the dawning of the hour to the accomplishment of the mission received from the Father (17:1). The major feature of these references, however, is not chronological but theological. The “hour” of Jesus was decisive for world history. Any future consummation must in some way be related to it.

E. The approaching judgment. Mention has already been made of the future judgment (Jn. 5:25–28). Other references have given rise to a different idea. Some passages (3:19; 12:31) seem to refer to a judgment that has already taken place; the ruler of this world has been deposed through Jesus. According to C. H. Dodd, this concept shows a conclusive reinterpretation of the eschatological idea of judgment. Although the action of Jesus in his passion shows the effectiveness of the overthrow of the evil agencies, this element does not exhaust the Johannine teaching about judgment. The gospel is not primarily concerned with this theme. Jesus makes clear that he came to save, not to judge, the world (12:47). Although the major emphasis is on the present, judgment is an indispensable part of the consummation of the present age.

F. References to the parousia. In the farewell discourse, Jesus refers to his SECOND COMING in such terms that a future PAROUSIA must be meant (Jn. 14:18, “I will come to you”; 16:16, “after a little while you will see me”). These statements are not understood in the sense of a future eschatology by advocates of the realized eschatology school, who regard them as “realized” in the coming of the Paraclete (so Dodd). This is not the most obvious meaning of passages like 14:2–3, where a closer connection between the going and coming again seems required (however, see R. H. Gundry in ZNW 58 [1967]: 68–72). It may be said, therefore, that whereas it is possible to interpret the words in the sense of a spiritual coming it is more natural to interpret them as referring to a future personal return.

G. Use of the term “eternal life.” Mention already has been made of this concept when dealing with the effects of the work of Christ, but it is necessary to note its special eschatological significance. As noted, it may be considered as roughly equivalent to the concept of the kingdom of God, for it implies both a present and a future experience and is appropriated by faith. According to Howard (Christianity according to St. John, 181) “eternal life” is life in the age to come as contrasted with life in the present age and thus has a qualitative connotation. It is therefore essentially future, but Dodd regards it as realized in the present experience of believers. It is important to recognize its present appropriation (cf. Jn. 3:16), but the term cannot be emptied of its abiding significance.

H. Summary of eschatology. Taking the evidence as a whole, it is impossible to deny that a double aspect is involved. The outlook is both present and future. Salvation includes a present experience and in this sense it is realized, or, more accurately, is a continuous process of realization. Such specific future events as the parousia, resurrection, and judgment point to a coming consummation that will introduce features beyond present experience.

So far nothing has been said about the eschatology of the Johannine epistles or of the Apocalypse. One notable feature of this literature is the occurrences of the ANTICHRIST theme. The epistles have but little data apart from the name (cf. 1 Jn. 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 Jn. 7). In one passage the plural antichrists is used (1 Jn. 2:18), which suggests that no particular individual is in mind. Other references are more specific (cf. 2 Jn. 7). Nothing in John’s epistles is as informative as Paul’s statement on this theme (2 Thess. 2). It should also be noted that the apocalyptic element is absent in the Johannine epistles.

In the Apocalypse are various descriptions of evil powers, and the reader is made vividly aware that the burden of the book is the spiritual conflict and the final overthrow of the evil powers. Such figures as the beast, the great red dragon, another beast, and similar descriptions are intended to convey the impression of highly organized hostility. One may dismiss the theory that some of these could be references to NERO, for the concept of spiritual conflict is characteristic of Johannine literature and the theory is totally unnecessary. Since the whole world lies in the lap of the wicked one, an intense clash between the deliverer and the usurper is to be expected, but the Lamb will obtain the final victory. The vision of the NEW JERUSALEM is intended to illustrate the age of blessing that will result from the final overthrow of evil. In contrast to the gospel and epistles, Revelation does not directly speak about “eternal life.”

VI. The church. No direct reference is made in John’s gospel to the church, and yet there are a number of indirect indications that Jesus conceived of a community of people who would continue his work. It is the cumulative effect that is important rather than any specific statements. The evidence will be divided into three main divisions: the concept of the Christian community; the ministry; and the ordinances.

A. *The Christian community. That the mission of Jesus was outward-looking goes without saying, but in John's presentation of his teaching, this feature is brought into sharp focus. One of the key sayings is, "But I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself" (Jn. 12:32). This at once links the idea of an emerging community with the passion. There can be no CHURCH that is not based on the death and resurrection of Jesus.

1. The shepherd allegory. The use of the SHEPHERD image to express the relationship between God and his people is not original. Many traces of it occur in the OT (e.g., Ps. 23; Isa. 40:11; Jer. 23:1; Ezek. 34:11). Jesus developed the idea to illustrate the special relationship between himself and the church. The word flock is used (Jn. 10:16) to describe the community of those who are said to be possessed by Jesus Christ. The distinction between the flock and different folds within the flock is important in the context of the Jewish and Gentile controversy that developed within the early church. The major significance of the shepherd allegory is the centrality of Christ. He laid down his life for his sheep. He knows his sheep and is known by them. He possesses his sheep and has a deep sense of urgency in bringing all his sheep into the flock. This accords well with the commission of Jesus as recorded in the synoptics (Matt. 28:18–20).

2. The vine allegory. The essential oneness of the VINE with its branches serves as an admirable illustration of the corporate nature of the church. The basis of the unity of the branches rests in the common dependence of each upon the vine, that is, Christ. The figure of speech draws attention to the church as an organism rather than as an organization. In the teaching of Jesus the relationship of each member to the vine is of more importance than their relationship to one another. The idea of abiding in the vine is the essential qualification for membership in the Christian community.

3. Mission teaching. The prayer of Jesus in Jn. 17 (often known as the high priestly prayer) is significant for several reasons, but for none more important than the close identification of the mission of the disciples with the mission of Jesus ("As you sent me into the world, I have sent them into the world," 17:18). The implications are far-reaching, for the disciples' work is described as a continuation of the mission of Jesus. Frequently John makes reference to the fact that God sent Jesus, and if the disciples are to be commissioned with the same burning sense of purpose, they are linked together in a corporate aim (see APOSTLE). The mission of both Jesus and the disciples is aimed to gather into one the children of God that are scattered abroad (Jn. 11:51–52). This emphasis on oneness is brought to focus in 17:20. Such oneness can exist only in an integrated community devoted to a common purpose.

Several features of the evidence from Jn. 17 may be noted. The disciples are to be a means for the glorification of Christ (vv. 6, 10). They have kept his word and they believe in him (vv. 6, 8). They will be kept from the evil in the world, although their mission is in the world (vv. 11, 14–15). They are to make known the word that they have received (vv. 20–21). Their consecration to their mission is consequent upon Christ's consecration of himself to his mission (v. 19). The entire prayer of Jesus shows his deep concern for his people.

4. The Paraclete sayings in relation to the church. A clear distinction exists between the world and the church in the fact that the latter (represented by the disciples addressed) alone possesses the Spirit (cf. Jn. 14:16–17; 15:26–27). What the Spirit teaches will be taught only to those in whom the Spirit abides. There is therefore to be a community consisting of people of the Spirit. This marks out the Christian church from all other communities.

B. The Christian ministry. Several passages in John bear upon the MINISTRY. It is seen as an integral part of the concept of the church. The teaching does not make reference to any church offices; it is rather a matter of functions.

1. The allegory of the door and shepherd. Although the primary reference is to Christ as the door and shepherd of his sheep, there is a derived sense in which the true shepherd, contrasted with the hireling, is an illustration of the pastoral office. The Christian ministry is concerned with a tender caring for the sheep.

2. The commission to Peter. The threefold commission to Peter also presents loving care for the sheep (Jn. 21). The metaphor of sheep is continued with Peter exhorted to feed both lambs and sheep. The pastoral office is directly concerned with those belonging to Jesus (my sheep, my lambs). The different terms used show the variety of functions of the true pastor.

3. The footwashing. Because Jesus specifically stated that his action in washing the disciples' feet was intended to be an example (Jn. 13:5, 14–15), the incident throws light on the attitude required in the servants of the church (see FOOTWASHING). The major demand is for HUMILITY; the emphasis is on service, however lowly. The sent one is essentially a SERVANT. It was on this occasion that Jesus made clear that those who receive his servants receive him (13:20), so demonstrating the inseparable character of Christ and his ministers.

4. The insufflation. Some difficulty has been found over the interpretation of Jn. 20:21–23, particularly the prediction regarding forgiving and retaining of sins as a future function of the disciples. The context shows that the words can be understood only in the light of the commission addressed to the disciples (v. 21). Moreover, they are applicable only through the agency of the Holy Spirit, for it is after the breathing of the Spirit upon them that the statement is made. The church consists essentially of those who possess the Spirit. Was the statement intended for all who possess the Spirit or restricted to those only who were the original recipients? In the latter case it would be restricted to apostles. Since the Holy Spirit descended on the whole church at Pentecost, a wider interpretation seems implied. It is the Spirit's task to bring FORGIVENESS into human experience, and those addressed possess that power only by virtue of the Holy Spirit. There can be no doubt that the ministry in John is an activity of the Spirit.

C. The ordinances. There is no specific mention of the institution of either BAPTISM or the LORD'S SUPPER in John's gospel, and this has given rise to various theories in an attempt to explain it. If there was a tendency to overstress the external features of the ordinances, this might supply a sufficient reason for John's intention not to mention them directly. If, as many hold, Jn. 3 and 6 allude to the ordinances indirectly, John may be bringing out their true spiritual significance. It must not be overlooked that when John wrote, the ordinances were well established in the churches, and it may well be that he omits reference to the institution because of the prior existence of the synoptic records.

1. Baptism. O. Cullmann (Baptism in the New Testament [1950], 15n.) finds references to baptism in many parts of this gospel, but most would restrict the mention of baptism to Jn. 3:3–5. This reference to baptism is not certain, for the expression “born of water” could be otherwise interpreted as being synonymous with physical birth. More likely, the phrase should be understood in the light of Ezek. 36:25–27, which speaks of spiritual cleansing in connection with spiritual renewal. If the reference is to baptism, its close connection with spiritual rebirth is the essential teaching. It has no value apart from the regenerating activity of the Spirit in the individual. This spiritual interpretation of an ordinance like baptism shows the Lord's perspective in regard to ritual requirements.

2. The Lord's Supper. The bread discourse in Jn. 6 shows such close connections with the institution of the Lord's Supper in the Synoptic Gospels that many scholars regard it as a substitution, or rather reinterpretation, of the ordinance. In this case it is claimed to have sacramental significance. Another view, however, is possible and much more probable. It cannot be supposed that Jesus gave no preparation for the ordinance that was to play so important a part in the worship of the church. The bread discourse furnished such an opportunity to bring out the spiritual principles. Yet, it may be objected that the setting of the discourse shows it to have been delivered to a Jewish audience who revealed no understanding of it (cf. 6:60). This has led some scholars (e.g., W. F. Howard) to regard the setting as unhistorical. But if the Jewish audience was baffled by the statements of Jesus, as the passage clearly indicates, this is no reason to suppose it to be unhistorical. Even the disciples who were present at the first supper understood the spiritual meaning only after the death and resurrection of Jesus. There was however nothing secret about the teaching. It was simply unintelligible to the unspiritually minded.

Christ identified the living bread from heaven as “my flesh” (Jn. 6:51). The spiritual MANNA, which is infinitely superior to the manna provided for the Israelites in the wilderness, is therefore meaningful only in the context of Jesus' self-giving for the “world.” The further statement about eating the flesh and drinking the blood of the Son of Man (6:53) is even more obviously linked with the ideas that found expression in the Last Supper. One feature is particularly worth noting, namely, the reference in this context to the last day (v. 54). In the synoptics the Last Supper has a forward look; so have these adumbrations of it in John. (For additional discussion and bibliography, see JOHN, GOSPEL OF; NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY.)

John jon (‘Ιωάννης G2722, from Heb. יְהוֹנָן H3419, short form of יְהוֹנָתָן H3380, “Yahweh is [or has been] gracious”; see JEHOHANAN, JOHA, JOHANAN).

(2) JOHN THE BAPTIST. See separate article.

(3) John Mark. See MARK, JOHN.

(4) Father of ANDREW and PETER (Jn. 1:42; 21:15–17; the KJV has “Jona” and “Jonas” respectively, following TR Iōnas G2731 [gen. Iōna]); also called JONAS (Matt. 16:17, where the Gk. text reads Bariōna G980, from Aram. bar yōnâ, “son of Jonas”). Most scholars believe, on the basis of the earliest MSS, that the original text of the fourth gospel had “John,” and that later scribes, influenced by the Matthean text, changed it to “Jonas.” Some speculate that these were alternate forms of his name; others posit divergent traditions in the early church.

(5) A relative of the high priests ANNAS and CAIAPHAS who participated in the cross-examination of the apostles Peter and John following the healing of the lame beggar at the temple (Acts 4:6). He is otherwise unknown.

In addition, several men mentioned in the APOCRYPHA bore the name John, as follows:

(6) Son of Simeon and father of MATTATHIAS, members of a priestly line; the latter led the Maccabean revolt in the 2nd. cent. B.C. (1 Macc. 2:1).

(7) Son of Mattathias; surnamed GADDI (1 Macc. 2:2; KJV, “Joannan, called Caddis”). With his brothers, John Gaddi took part in the Maccabean revolt, but was later captured by the family of Jambri from Medeba and executed (9:35–38).

(8) Son of SIMON MACCABEE and grandson of Mattathias; he was made a captain by his father, was victorious against a superior force W of Jerusalem, and eventually succeeded his father as high priest and leader of the nation (1 Macc. 16:1–11, 19–24). JOSEPHUS reports that John’s surname was Hyrcanus (Ant. 13.7.4 §228) and gives us much detailed information about his rule. See HASMONEAN II.A.

(9) Son of Accos and father of Eupolemus; the latter and Jason son of Eleazar were sent by Judas MACCABEE to solicit Roman aid against the Syrians, 161 B.C. (1 Macc. 8:17).

(10) A certain John and an individual named Absalom (both otherwise unknown) were sent by Judas Maccabee to the Syrian commander LYSIAS in 164 B.C. to arrange a treaty of peace (2 Macc. 11:17).

John, Acts of. Two different apocryphal works bear this title. The earlier one, first attested before the end of the 3rd cent. as part of a MANICHEAN collection, is preserved in fragmentary fashion in various languages. It purports to give an account of the travels, missionary work, and death of the apostle John. Two sections of gnostic character (see Gnosticism), the “Hymn of Christ” (§§94–96) and the “Mystery of the Cross” (§§97–102), appear to be separate compositions incorporated into the narrative. This Acts of John, along with other similar works, was attributed to a certain Leucius by later Christian writers. (Introduction and English trans. in NTAp, 2:152–209.) A second Acts of John, which claims to have been written by Prochorus (PROCORUS, Acts 6:5), is a 5th-cent. Greek novelistic account, with emphasis on supernatural events that allegedly took place on the island of PATMOS. (See description in NTAp, 2:429–35; no English trans. has been published.)

John, Apocryphon of. A Gnostic treatise, also known as the Secret Book of John, that purports to preserve a revelation from the risen Christ to the apostle John. Originally written in Greek (prob. in the 2nd cent. A.D.), it has survived in four Coptic MSS. One of them (BG 8502, 2) was discovered in 1896; the other three are part of the NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY (NHC II, 1; III, 1; IV, 1; tractates II, 1 and IV, 1 represent a longer recension). This work is generally regarded as the most important source for our understanding of the mythology adopted by Christian GNOSTICISM. (English trans. in NHL, 104–23. See also K. L. King, The Secret Revelation of John [2006].)

John, Epistles of. Three anonymous books from among the CATHOLIC EPISTLES in the NT that traditionally have been ascribed to JOHN THE APOSTLE.

I. Nature of the epistles. Many distinctives set these three epistles apart from the other letters of the NT, and at the same time draw them together.

A. Historical setting

1. Earliest Gnostic tendencies. Many writers have concluded that incipient GNOSTICISM (which developed into a well-defined movement in the 2nd cent. A.D.) was in the background of several NT books, such as COLOSSIANS, EPHESIANS, and the PASTORAL EPISTLES, but especially 1 John. Gnosticism, a popular form of Greco-Roman philosophy, had no doubt pervaded the thought world of the Roman empire and, confronting Christianity in the latter decades of the 1st cent., had produced serious conflict and confusion within the churches.

Gnosticism was the philosophical result of the blending of the cosmogony of Greek thought with the theology of oriental religions, especially Judaism (see GREEK RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY; MYSTERY RELIGIONS; ROMAN RELIGION). The first epistle of John reveals rather sharply three characteristics of Gnosticism that had serious implications for Christianity. (1) DUALISM. Gnosticism held that matter was essentially evil and spirit was essentially good. Thus the human body and spirit had no effective contact with each other. Gnostics held that a redeemed soul in a sinful body was therefore not responsible for the deeds of that body. Such dualism led either to ANTINOMIANISM—the breakdown of morals and spiritual compromise on the part of some who professed Christ—or to ASCETICISM (“harsh treatment of the body,” Col. 3:20–23). (2) Illumination. The name Gnostic came from the Greek word for “knowledge.” Salvation according to the Gnostics came from knowing secrets rather than from faith in a Savior. Only the initiated who knew the Gnostic mysteries were in the light. (3) Rejection of the INCARNATION. Christ’s earthly life posed a major problem for the Gnostics. God’s spirit and human flesh could not have had any essential unity of personality in Jesus. A separation was made between Christ’s deity and Jesus’ humanity in one of two ways. Docetic Gnosticism taught that Christ was not really a divine person in human flesh; he was only a phantom playing the human role (see DOCETISM). Christ’s humanity only appeared to be real. Cerinthian Gnosticism (CERINTHUS of Alexandria was linked by ancient tradition with John at Ephesus) taught that the human Jesus was an ordinary man upon whom the LOGOS of God came at his baptism, departing from him before the crucifixion. Only the human Jesus died upon the cross. The LOGOS was a kind of cape that the human Jesus wore during the period of the public ministry. John wrote against all of these heresies in his first epistle.

2. The pastoral scene. The homiletical tone of 1 John is probably due to the author’s consciousness that his message was to be read to an assembled congregation (or congregations). It seems obvious from all three of these documents that the writer was a Christian leader of wide and prominent influence. An unmistakable air of authority and a noticeable desire to build up the readers in their faith are at the heart of the writer’s effort. The danger of false teachers and teaching provoked the distinctive emphases on faith and love in 1 John (the clearest combination of those two virtues in the NT). The conduct of the readers had become a concern of the writer, who urged them not to love the world (his language suggests that there was a condition of worldliness among them).

Painting from within the Greek Orthodox portion of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem. Docetic Gnosticism taught that Jesus was not fully human and thus that he only seemed to have died on the cross.

First John may have been intended for a circle of churches. The term elder used in the other two letters has been thought to indicate the author’s pastoral relationship to a community of faith. Because 2 John seems to be a miniature of 1 John, having scarcely a single phrase that had not already been employed in the longer letter, it has been thought that the elder mentioned in 2 John was a venerable church leader (perhaps bishop) who had previously written 1 John as a pastoral letter to deal with the danger of a spreading, false doctrine. B. H. Streeter advanced the idea that this elder was in fact a BISHOP with a responsibility for a circle of smaller churches, making him almost an archbishop. All three letters deal with real life and not with abstractions. The intense personal feelings of the author are everywhere evident. He was bound to his readers as they were to him. He made an appeal to them that reveals an acquaintance with both their needs and history.

3. The Johannine community. During the last decades of the 20th cent., much attention has been devoted to the Christian community that presumably was associated with the work of John the apostle in ASIA MINOR. According to some scholars, it was this community that was responsible for producing the writings attributed to the apostle. One theory suggests that the fourth gospel was written at a time when this group of believers (perhaps comprising several churches) formed a united front, but that subsequently a smaller group (perhaps one specific church) within that community developed views about Christ and Christian conduct that created a schism. The larger community (perhaps the parent church) produced 1 John to counteract what they perceived to be a heretical movement. Other speculative proposals along similar lines have been set forth by various scholars.

B. Literary characteristics. First John does not conform to the general characteristics of contemporary personal letters. It has no introduction, identification of author, thanksgiving, or author's greetings. Neither does it have a concluding salutation. There is a complete absence of any personal name. On the other hand, this may show the distinctive form of an encyclical that was intended for more than one congregation, being sent by messengers from church to church and being read in the general assembly by a leading elder.

The two shorter Johannine letters (the shortest books in the NT) were written in the more typical epistolary character of 1st-cent. correspondence. They are so brief (each has fewer than 1,200 Gk. letters) that they probably were written on one sheet of PAPYRUS each. They were written for local and personal situations.

1. Unity. Rudolf Bultmann has attacked the unity of 1 John (The Johannine Epistles, Hermeneia [1973], 2). He believes that the original letter ended at 1 Jn. 5:13 and that vv. 14–21 of that chapter were added by a later ecclesiastical editor. He suggests also that the author of 1 John worked over a previously existing document. He contends that 1:6–10 is stylistically different from 2:1–2. The latter section was believed to have been the author's own commentary upon the former passage. Generally, however, modern scholarship has insisted upon the unity of 1 John, because the style and ideas of the suspected sections have been found to be those of the letter as a whole.

2. Structure. Many scholars have felt that 1 John was plan-less. The author does not present his themes one by one, developing his message and then drawing his conclusions; as a result, it is almost impossible to outline the letter. Perhaps the best internal evidence as to any organization of thought in the mind of the author is found in connection with the ideas about God that he advanced: (1) God is light (1 Jn. 1:5); (2) God is life (2:25); (3) God is love (4:8). The subject discussed in connection with each idea is hortatory in nature: (1) walk in the light, (2) live God's life, (3) dwell in love.

Without doubt there is justification for the frequent observation that 1 John is spiral in form. The ideas introduced return for additional treatment and application. For example, "light" and "darkness" are introduced and then reintroduced and applied. The forgiveness of sins is treated in the same fashion, returning several times to the discussion. "Liar" is a recurring theme, as also “commandment.” Perhaps the most important word of all is “love,” which is also treated in this fashion. The foundation of the developing thoughts is laid in 1 Jn. 1:1–4—and from this foundation the message begins, ever broadening and expanding, each thought growing out of the other and ever circling to encompass and apply the previously introduced material.

3. Style. First John often has been compared to the WISDOM material in the NT, especially James (see JAMES, EPISTLE OF). The message is given in little pearls of wisdom. Simple words are used, and statements are brief and pithy. John did not argue as PAUL did; therefore his style was intuitional rather than logical. He was primarily a witness, depending not so much on logical deduction as upon spiritual insight. Another stylistic characteristic is the use of contrast, making opposites set against each other to underscore the teaching. Light is contrasted with darkness, truth with error, God with devil, righteousness with sin, love with hate, and life with death.

Repetition also was important to John. His ideas are relatively few, but they are repeated over and over again. Twice in 1 John it is said that “God is love,” and several times love is offered as the evidence that a person has been born of God. Parallelism is another device used by this author. For example, 1 Jn. 1:8–10 contains three repetitions in parallel statements: “We deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us” (v. 8); “he is faithful and just and will forgive us our sins and purify us from all unrighteousness” (v. 9); “we make him out to be a liar and his word has no place in our lives” (v. 10). The letter is characterized by a comparatively limited vocabulary that is nontechnical, having nothing of instruction about churches, their offerings, ordinances, or activities. It has been judged a simple, nontechnical document, generally lacking in literary polish but strangely powerful for perhaps those very reasons. The rhythmic quality of this work has been thought to have been due both to the catechetical method of teaching converts to Christianity and to the method of teaching commonly employed in Judaism, which made much use of such repetitions and antithetical parallels.

C. Relation to John’s gospel. Until the end of the 19th cent., almost all scholars held to a common authorship for the fourth gospel and the epistles of John. Tradition, moreover, has connected the name of John the son of Zebedee with all of these documents from the earliest times. The acceptance of a common authorship was furthered by the obvious similarity of idioms and phrases, common themes, and a shared theological viewpoint that was distinctive in the NT. In the 20th cent., a challenge to this commonly held view was raised by H. J. Holtzmann, and later by C. H. Dodd. Dodd (The Johannine Epistles, MNTC [1946]) concluded that a distinct theological divergence pointed in the direction of a disciple of John as the probable author of the epistle. He expressed the view that the theological distinctives are three principally: (1) the eschatology is more primitive in the gospel; (2) so also is the interpretation of the death of Christ; and (3) the doctrine of the Spirit is not as elevated in the epistles as it is in the gospel.

1. The question of priority. The chronological order of the epistles of John and the fourth gospel is so complicated that it has not been possible to determine their relationship with any degree of certainty. Some have believed that the epistles were written in the reverse order from their occurrence in the NT (i.e., 3 John first and 1 John last). In this scheme of writing the gospel has been put between 2 John and 1 John. It also has been conjectured that 1 John was written as a postscript to the gospel, the latter having been written to explain how we might have eternal life (Jn. 20:31), and the epistle to give assurance that they had it (1 Jn. 5:13). Still other commentators have believed that the epistles were written probably a year or two after the gospel, because it has been thought that such a passage as 1 Jn. 2:3–8 assumes that the readers were familiar with the fuller exposition of the themes of the gospel. This epistle has, therefore, been termed the first commentary on the Gospel of John. For example, 1 Jn. 1:3, 5, which deals with the theme that “God is light,” has been considered a development of the same subject in the gospel. Furthermore, some scholars interpret the thrice-repeated phrase “I write [egrapsa, aor.] to you” (1 Jn. 2:13c-14) not as epistolary aorists but as historical aorists (thus, “I have written to you”), referring to the former communication contained in the gospel.

2. Similarities to John’s gospel. The scholarly consensus is that 1 John and the gospel share the same theological approach and, generally speaking, treat the same subjects. Although narration is missing from the epistle, it does include subjects prominent in the gospel: eternal life, believers as God’s children, love for God and brethren, and the indwelling of God in believers. Beyond that, there are interests shared by the two documents that relate them. “Witness” is a common emphasis in both (the term is used nine times in the epistle). The importance of the incarnation overshadows every other consideration in both of them. Structurally it seems that there must have been a connection between the prologues of the epistle and gospel that caused them to unfold in a similar fashion. B. F. Westcott (The Epistles of John: The Greek Text with Notes, 3rd ed. [1892], xli–xliii) set out the following list of notable parallels in the texts:

1 John 1:2–3 with John 3:11
1 John 1:4 with John 16:24
1 John 2:11 with John 12:35
1 John 2:14 with John 5:38
1 John 3:5 with John 8:46
1 John 3:8 with John 8:14
1 John 3:13 with John 15:18
1 John 3:14 with John 5:24
1 John 3:16 with John 10:15
1 John 3:22 with John 8:29
1 John 3:23 with John 13:34
1 John 4:6 with John 8:47
1 John 4:16 with John 6:69
1 John 5:9 with John 5:32
1 John 5:20 with John 17:3

3. Differences from John’s gospel. In spite of the striking similarities between 1 John and the fourth gospel, some differences are apparent. The doctrine of the incarnation, though important to both, is centered in the epistle in the true humanity of Jesus, whereas in the gospel it centers in the divine glory of Jesus. C. H. Dodd professed to find an eschatological difference, in that the ESCHATOLOGY of the epistle was judged more primitive than that of the gospel, because of an absence of the reinterpretation of that doctrine, which Dodd called “realized eschatology.” The interpretation of the death of Christ in the epistle’s use of “expiation” (1 Jn. 2:2; 4:10) and the absence of specific reference to the Spirit in the new birth discussion (as the gospel makes much of the Spirit in the same context) are examples of other acknowledged differences.

Linguistically there are differences also. Rhetorical questions characterize the epistle but are entirely neglected in the gospel. There is a tendency toward conditional sentences in the epistle that is not a trait of the gospel. The vocabulary of the gospel is naturally larger than that of the epistle, yet there are nearly forty words used by the writer of the epistle not found in the gospel, and there are also common words in the gospel that failed to make the epistle at all. In addition, the gospel makes much use of the OT, but the epistles contain no quotation from the OT, and perhaps only one reference. There is in the gospel an interest in Judaism as a living religion that is absent from the epistle and that suggests an earlier date.

II. Authorship. Traditionally, John the son of Zebedee was considered the author of the epistles. When tradition is combined with reasonable possibilities, it seems that he went to EPHESUS in the province of ASIA about A.D. 65–70. He remained there laboring among the churches until about 95, when he was exiled to the island of PATMOS during the persecution under DOMITIAN. Having returned to Ephesus about the year 97, this last of the apostles died there around the turn of the century.

A. Arguments for John the apostle. IRENAEUS, Bishop of Lyons in the latter part of the 2nd cent., quoted from both 1 John and 2 John, attributing both writings to John, the disciple of the Lord, to whom he also attributed the fourth gospel. His contemporary CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, head of the catechetical school in that city, frequently quoted 1 John and attributed it to the apostle John. The MURATORIAN CANON, the first known ecclesiastical list of NT books, acknowledged two epistles of John, one of which was identified by quotation as 1 John. After the time of EUSEBIUS (c. A.D. 305), general consent was attained regarding the apostolic authorship of these epistles.

B. Arguments against John the apostle. IGNATIUS wrote to the church at Ephesus within twenty years of the time that John was supposed to have been there. He mentioned Paul's ministry, but was silent regarding John. Some have thought that an early martyrdom of John was prophesied by Jesus (Mk. 10:39; Matt. 20:23). George Hamartolos, a 9th-cent. writer, said that PAPIAS wrote that John was murdered by the Jews along with his brother. The calendar of the Syriac church, which dates from the 4th cent., observed the martyrdom of James and John in Jerusalem on December 27.

The possible confusion of John the apostle with an alleged "John the elder" has been cited against apostolic authorship. The latter has been suggested as the author of the epistles, both from the reference to "the elder" in 2 and 3 John, and from a reference by Papias to a John the elder who perhaps was a different person from the apostle John. The elder may have been a disciple of the apostle according to most of those who distinguish between the two. (See further JOHN THE APOSTLE.)

III. Locale

A. Origin. Traditionally, the epistles of John have been associated with EPHESUS and the Roman province of Asia. It has been supposed that 1 John was written only for congregations in that province, but in 1 Peter the address includes all those in PONTUS, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, ASIA, and BITHYNIA. If 1 John was written twenty-five or thirty years later than 1 Peter, it might well be that an even larger territory than Asia was addressed. Because tradition has pointed toward Ephesus as the residence of John, it is likely that all three epistles were written there. Unless 1 Jn. 5:21, which admonishes abstinence from idol worship, is taken literally, there is no indication of whether these Christians were Jews or Gentiles.

Roman forum and theater at Ephesus (view to the NE). Tradition says that the apostle John wrote his epistles from this city.

B. Destination. About the 4th cent., it was thought by some that 1 John, and perhaps the other Johannine epistles, were addressed to PARTHIANS, and the title “To the Parthians” actually occurs in a few MSS. AUGUSTINE later supported this theory. An explanation has been found in a statement in the Adumbriationes (a work attributed to Clement of Alexandria) that 2 John was addressed to a Babylonian lady. Since Babylon was in the Parthian empire, the entire theory may have come from this single statement.

The question as to whether 2 John was addressed to an individual or a congregation awaits the discussion of the text, but 3 John undoubtedly was addressed to a trusted friend of “the elder.” This trusted friend seems to have been a prosperous layman in a church within the radius of Ephesian influence.

IV. Date. The situation of the churches in the background of 1 John, especially with reference to the anti-Gnostic material, would suggest a later date than Colossians or the Pastoral Epistles, where the same tendencies seem to have been met in a less developed form. In all likelihood, the epistles of John were written toward the close of the 1st cent. The absence of any reference to persecution probably indicates a date before the time of the emperor TRAJAN (A.D. 98–117), and possibly even prior to the last years of DOMITIAN, who reigned until 96.

The relationship of the epistles to the gospel also includes the establishing of a date. The Gospel of John may have been written as late as 95–100. Many scholars are now inclined to date it about 85. If the epistles were written after the gospel and at least 1 John and 2 John at about the same time, a likely date would then be about 87 for the epistles. The apostle John would at that time have been a man in his late seventies, able still to travel and work (as suggested in 3 John). Christianity at that time was in difficulty in Asia but had not come under the intense persecution as occurred under Domitian. The Gnostic situation had the time to develop into a movement of some considerable importance and to spread over a wide area. In all likelihood, the epistles of John were written about the end of the 80s or the beginning of the 90s in the 1st cent.

V. Contents of the epistles of John

A. 1 John

1. The prologue (1 Jn. 1:1—4). Dionysius of Alexandria may have been the first to note the parallel structure between the prologue of the epistle and that of the gospel: (1) the main subject is described first; (2) then the historical manifestation of that subject; (3) last, the personal apprehension of it. The prologue of the epistle (also of the gospel) serves as the foundation upon which the remainder of the letter rests.

The main subject is declared to be the eternal Word, or better still “the living Logos.” In Greek logos G3364 did not mean mere speech or utterance; it meant rational and articulate utterance of thought. It was the author’s declared intention to speak of Christ as the eternal Logos who is in himself life, who is in union with God the Father before all time, and who became incarnate in time as the object of sensible experience among men and women. In a court of law in ancient times, the testimonies of two senses were required to make a witness authentic. Perhaps this is in the background of John's emphasis that the proof of the humanity of Jesus had been attested by three senses: hearing, seeing, and touching. The neuter reference "that which" may be explained as a reference to the gospel, but in light of the declaration, "That which was from the beginning," it is more likely that the author was thinking of Christ as a life—a fact of history. This stressed the truth that Jesus was not an optical illusion, as the Docetic Gnostics had claimed, but that he had an actual human body that was seen and heard.

The long and somewhat tangled sentence that makes up the prologue is also an emphasis upon the personal and collective apprehension of the eternal, divine life in Christ. There had been a shared experience of the historical Jesus by his people. The repeated "we" indicates not only the apostolic witness and testimony but also the collective witness of the people of Christ, the "salvation" people who had come to find life in Jesus. Fellowship was the common tie of such a community; their fellowship was a fellowship of witness that rested upon the fellowship of a shared experience (see Dodd, The Johannine Epistles, 13–16; B. F. Westcott, The Epistles of St. John [1883], 174–75). The textual problem in 1 Jn. 1:4 as to whether "our joy" or "your joy" should be read is incapable of a hard and fast decision, but most likely it was "our joy," in the apostolic sense.

2. Fellowship with God (1 Jn. 1:5—2:2). The first expansion of thought based upon the basic statement of 1:1–4 is in terms of "fellowship with God." The real meaning of all religious experience is caught up in this phrase for the writer. There were heretics in John's day who claimed to have a vital experience with God, but they denied that Jesus was truly the Son of God—God in human flesh. John insisted in this opening statement that no one has fellowship with God who does not acknowledge Jesus, for it is his blood alone that places sinners into fellowship with God and maintains them in such fellowship. John stated the facts of Christian experience that were related to the establishment and maintenance of such fellowship with the intended purpose that his readers might know that they truly possessed this fellowship and that they might readily recognize those who did not.

The statement "God is light" has nothing to do with a mysterious or esoteric nature of God. John was merely emphasizing that, in spite of what the Gnostics taught, God had no secret knowledge that was withheld from the entire body of believers, hidden just to give to a select few. The source of this information was Jesus himself. It did not come from rabbinic instruction in the synagogue nor from the dialectical reasonings of Greek philosophy. It was the message of REVELATION received directly through the historical Jesus. Beyond this fact LIGHT represents the perfect holiness of the unveiled nature of God as seen in Jesus Christ. DARKNESS is not simply a symbol of ignorance; it is also a symbol of moral evil. Anyone who rightly claims a personal knowledge of God in fellowship must measure his life against the character of God. It was B. F. Westcott who pointed out the trilogy: (1) God is light so those who fellowship with him must walk in the light; (2) God is spirit so those who fellowship with him must worship in the spirit; (3) God is love so those who fellowship with him must manifest love.

The repeated statement, "if we say," would indicate that the apostle was not tilting against men of straw but was combating the errors of his day. He had heard people say these things again and again. Entrance into fellowship with God did not come by denying sin, but by confessing it and being cleansed of it. The cross stands at the heart of any vital experience of a sinful person with the holy God. The blood of Jesus (real blood and not a phantom) is absolutely necessary to the establishment of fellowship between sinners and God. In the NT, the word FELLOWSHIP is used only in a good and sacred sense. It is never used to describe those who walked in darkness and did not do the truth.

According to some scholars, it is important in this passage to recognize the relation between the Greek present tense and aorist tense. To understand properly 1 Jn. 1:8 and relate it to 2:1 and 3:6, it is necessary to translate the present tense in these verses as “continue to sin,” that is, “live a sinful life.” The aorist tense should be translated “to commit a sin,” that is, “do a sin.” If so, in 1:8–10 John is saying that when people say that they have not committed a sin, they make God a liar. In the present tense John is speaking of living a life of sin, so that he can say that whoever abides in God does not continue living a sinful life. In the view of other scholars, however, tense distinctions (or more properly, distinctions in verbal aspect) are rather subtle and cannot bear so much theological weight (see further below on 3:9).

In any case, two erroneous conclusions might have been drawn from 1 Jn. 1:8–10 against which the author guarded in 2:1–2. The acknowledgement of the persistent malady of sin might lead a Christian to accept sin as inevitable in life, causing him to ease his struggle against sin. Also, the readily available forgiveness of sin might lead a Christian to presume on God as the God of forgiveness. The author hastened to assure his readers that everything that he was writing was written that they might not sin. His readers were encouraged to remember the facts that are inseparable from fellowship with God.

3. Keep the commandments (1 Jn. 2:3–11). The author begins this section by a reference to KNOWLEDGE, or ASSURANCE, of a personal relation to God. The word “know” (ginōskō G1182) is derived from the same root from which the Gnostics took their name. They claimed a monopoly on religious knowledge, which John denied with his bold assertion “we know him.” The basis of this assurance is the keeping of his commandments.

The author uses the term commandment(s) six times in these verses. In fact, as is characteristic of 1 John (the repetition of previously introduced ideas), this term is used in the following sections also (1 Jn. 3:23–24; 4:21; 5:2–3). It is evidently a key thought in the author’s expanding discussion. The relationship of this new term commandment to the previously dominant term fellowship is that the Christian’s fellowship with God depends upon, and is assured by, keeping the commandments.

The phrase “his word” in 1 Jn. 2:5 is a synonym for “commandment.” The idea of keeping the commandments is previously suggested in 1:6 by the emphasis upon the truth as something that the Christian lives. John probably took this term from Jesus himself (see Jn. 14:15, 21, 23–24; 15:10). It was Jesus himself who identified these commandments with his word. There is an objective basis behind all Christian experience that made it impossible for people to brand it a sham or an illusion. That objective basis is keeping the commandments.

The importance and meaning of keeping the commandments is developed by two illustrations: (1) love for the believing brother (1 Jn. 2:9–11), and (2) avoiding love for the world (vv. 12–17). It is probably better to treat the second of these as a separate subject because vv. 12–17 are most difficult to connect to the context. Some have judged it a parenthesis in which the writer definitely turned aside for a word of personal appeal. The commandment of LOVE is as old as God’s revelation. In the Christian context, the readers may have heard it preached by Paul and John. Perhaps they read it in John’s gospel also. Some who had professed the light had given the lie to that profession by the darkness of their hatred for their brethren. John was saying that the new commandment is to put the old commandment into practice; in that sense it is not a new commandment at all but the old one applied.

4. Don't love the world (1 Jn. 2:12–17). As previously noted, this passage is a personal appeal in the first instance. These tender words of personal exhortation are in sharp contrast with the rather severe words that follow. Here is primarily a warning against that which would destroy the believer's fellowship with God, and also his fellowship with his brethren—the love of the world. The basis upon which John wrote to them was that their sins had been forgiven them. Since this was true, he was able to write these things to them because they were in the fellowship.

John divides his readers into the young and the old, for apparently his common way of referring to all of his readers is with the word “children.” In all probability, these words refer to natural age and are not spiritualizations of mature and immature Christians. The Gnostics claimed an exclusive knowledge of God and condemned John's readers as having no knowledge of God. He reassured his readers of their real knowledge of the Father. Their abiding knowledge of God was attested by their fellowship with him.

In John's writings, “to love the world” always means to replace love for God in one's life with love for wrong objects. The WORLD here means the realm of evil that excludes God. The word John chose for love (agapaō G26) denotes direction of the will and purposeful choice. There are two reasons that arise from the essential nature of the world that labels love of the world as unspiritual: (1) such love is fixed upon that which is in essential opposition to God; (2) such love is fixed upon that which is unable to stand the test of time.

5. Beware the antichrist (1 Jn. 2:18–28). In early Christianity the belief that an ANTICHRIST would come who would be the direct opponent of Christ was widespread and significant. Usually the thought centered on one antichrist, but here John considers anyone as an antichrist who taught the false doctrines that he had thus far considered. They have withdrawn from the fellowship, and this itself branded them as those who had never shared in the real life and fellowship of the brethren. They had not loved the brethren because they had not loved God. In a sense, their departure from the fellowship provided a key word to John at this point, the term remain. Seven times in these verses John uses some form of this verb (menō G3531), just as he previously emphasized commandment. Their withdrawal was beneficial. The cause of Christ had been in much greater danger before these false teachers were revealed for what they really were, that is, unbelievers.

The special heresy against which John warned his readers was related to the person of Christ. To deny that Jesus was at one and the same time the perfect man and the true God, was the supreme lie. Such a liar was antichrist. A denial such as this is also a denial of the Father, for it is only through the Son that the Father had been manifested in the flesh. Whereas previously it was affirmed that love of the world was proof that one did not love God, in this passage it is affirmed that the denial of the truth concerning Christ is evidence that there is no fellowship with God. Faith in Christ tests fellowship with God.

Loyalty to the truth of God in Christ is declared to have its rewards. The two advantages that result from such loyalty conclude the section. They are an eternal relationship with God through Christ and a secure knowledge of spiritual realities. It is the Holy Spirit's function to bring both of these to the knowledge of the believer. The Holy Spirit was John's answer to the Gnostic. It was not the proud human “knower” who brought secret, mystic knowledge that men needed, but the Holy Spirit's guidance.

6. Do right (1 Jn. 2:29—3:10). The Gnostics taught that restraint of sin was unnecessary. John confidently asserted that the real proof that someone has been born of God is right conduct in God's sight. John especially considered two matters in connection with the new faith: the privileges and the character of God's children. Though years of Christian experience had accumulated for John, he was still amazed that sinners should be accorded the privilege of being called God's children (1 Jn. 3:1); but perhaps fearing that someone might misunderstand the word called, he added more amazingly, "And that is what we are!" The reason the world did not recognize these Christians as children of God was that that world did not know God. Beyond all this, there awaits these believers a wonderful destiny more marvelous than anything yet experienced. This glorious destiny is not known in detail, but in essence it is that the Lord's people will be like him. John declared that to be like Christ is the Christian's destiny.

In 1 Jn. 3:4–8, John places the Christian's life of righteousness against a life of sin, by way of contrast. These two lives come from two personal sources—Christ and the devil. A new life principle has been imparted to the Christian, a life principle that could not possibly be the seed of sin because it comes from God. The children of God may be expected to resemble their Father, God, in righteousness. Conversely, the same thing is true of the devil's offspring, for he was from the beginning a sinner. The expression "from the beginning" as here related to the devil has been subject to three interpretations: (1) that it refers to eternity, thus the devil is associated with sin from all eternity; (2) that it has in view the beginning of the human race, thus in all of human experience the devil is the source of sin; (3) that it means "from the beginning of sin," thus the devil is the original sinner.

The most difficult verse in the epistle is 1 Jn. 3:9, where the author uses absolute and unqualified terms: "No one born of God commits sin; for God's nature abides in him, and he cannot sin because he is born of God" (RSV). A common interpretation focuses on the present tense (or aspect) of the verbs as indicating progressive action; thus the NIV renders, "No one who is born of God will continue to sin, because God's seed remains in him; he cannot go on sinning, because he has been born of God." Other scholars argue that if John wanted to express the idea in present (rather than past or future) time, he had no option but to use this tense, and that in any case Greek writers would probably not depend heavily on subtle aspectual distinctions to make important points. Even without stressing the grammatical detail, however, it may still be possible to understand John's statement as indicating characteristic behavior. A second interpretation views these absolute statements as moral imperatives (e.g., "teenagers cannot drink alcohol" really means "are not allowed to" or "must not"). Still others argue that John has a specific sin in mind, such as the ultimate act of APOSTASY (cf. 1 Jn. 2:19; 5:16–17).

7. Love the brethren (1 Jn. 3:11–18). A family member in the divine circle, one of God's children, is expected to love the other family members of the divine circle. Proud Gnosticism, boasting its intellectual superiority, produced a spirit of arrogance and self-assertiveness on the part of its followers. There was no place in it for the uninitiated who did not accept the Gnostic interpretation. Jealousy, contempt, and hatred characterized this heretical movement. John declared that love is fundamental to the Christian message, being "from the beginning." In contrast with CAIN, the first murderer and embodiment of hatred, stands Christ, the very revelation of love. Christ's death was offered as the supreme proof of his love and the ultimate requirement of love from his people. Love is thus declared to be the manifestation of this new life from God in human beings. It is not enough to profess this love; it is required that Christ's people practice this transforming love in their daily lives.

8. Be confident (1 Jn. 3:19–24). When Christians judge themselves by the high standard of Christian love, it is easy to become discouraged. The first verses of this paragraph are difficult to interpret (for the difficulties of the Greek constructions see Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, ad loc.). John apparently meant by HEART the entire conscious, moral nature of man. The declaration is that the refuge from a guilty CONSCIENCE is the greatness of God's forgiveness. God's greatness is not to be found in his justice that brings condemnation upon sinners, but in his mercy that brings salvation from sin. Prayer would have no foundation if it were not for the greatness of God. By keeping God's commandments, prayer becomes effective, which means that because his people are one with God's purpose, they can expect his help. The keeping of God's commandments is summarized by John as a true belief in Jesus and a real love for the brethren. This keeping of God's commandments is both the condition and result of true fellowship with God. The Spirit's presence in the Christian's life is adduced as the proof of such vital fellowship with God.

9. Test the spirits (1 Jn. 4:1 – 6). At the end of the previous paragraph (3:24), John had written that Christians can know that God is abiding in them because of the Holy Spirit's presence in their heart. Before he continued with his message, the author paused to warn his readers about the false doctrine of SPIRIT as held by the Gnostics. The Gnostics talked much about spirit. Matter, they said, was evil, but the spirit was the divine part of man because it was nonmaterial. They claimed that their knowledge of God was a spiritual knowledge. John urged his readers to be rigidly discriminating concerning the "spirit" that moved a teacher in the church. The fundamental test to apply to a teacher was his attitude toward Christ. If such a teacher denied the reality of the incarnation, he then based his message upon the wisdom of human reason rather than on revelation from God.

10. Abide in God (1 Jn. 4:7–12). Twice already John has affirmed that LOVE is the test of the Christian life. In this passage, the letter reaches its climax, for it is intended not only to give tests by which the readers could measure their lives, but more importantly, to secure for them a deeper experience with God. Love is the supreme test both of the new life and the abiding fellowship of God. Love is the natural fruit of the saved life. John related this love to the reality of the incarnation of Jesus Christ in the flesh. If Jesus was not truly the Son of God, then the love of God for a lost world was a figment of the imagination. A true incarnation was necessary for God's love to be revealed in the world. When love is associated with faith and devotion toward Jesus Christ, it then becomes a valid evidence of life everlasting. God, because he is love, is the one source of love. This means that people have no love for God until they discover God's love for them. Love that is genuine, according to John, has to have its source in God.

11. Have faith (1 Jn. 5:1–12). Throughout 1 John we find a constant interplay of love, righteousness, and belief. The author insists upon the relation of belief and love. The readers must remember to identify love with keeping the commandments. Because they are children of God, it should not be burdensome for them. Also, those born of God will gain the victory over the world through FAITH. John commonly uses the verb "believe," and 5:4 is the only place where he uses the noun "faith." Faith is the victory. This was not the Gnostic victory of spirit over matter, but the Christian victory of righteousness over evil. Faith brings victory. Faith comes from love. Love results from being born again. These are the familiar Johannine themes brought again into combination and new emphasis.

The statement in 1 Jn. 5:6 may have been a direct thrust at the Gnostic leader CERINTHUS, who taught that the DEITY OF CHRIST came upon the human Jesus at his baptism in the form of the dove that descended from heaven, but left him in GETHSEMANE. The author acknowledges that the messianic ministry of Jesus began at his baptism, but the fulfillment of that ministry was in the sacrifice of the cross “in the blood.” In the Jewish legal system a testimony was regarded as conclusive when supported by two or three witnesses. It was, therefore, important to John that he discerned three witnesses to the real incarnation of God in the historical Jesus: “the Spirit, the water and the blood” (v. 8). These witnesses combined to support the declaration that it was Jesus, God’s Son, who died on the cross and thereby worked redemption for humanity. There is the record of Jesus’ earthly ministry, the fact of his atoning death, and the subsequent witness of the Spirit in the life of the believer (as well as the witness of the Spirit to Jesus in the days of his flesh). So intense is the rejection of the Gnostic heresies, which taught that salvation was secured through a speculative gnosis, that John made the strong declaration that those who taught such heresy made God a liar. The true witness of Christian experience, given through the Spirit, is that salvation is accepted by faith in Jesus as the Son of God.

12. Ask God (1 Jn. 5:13–17). The word ask is interrelated with the word know throughout this passage. Knowledge not only brought the certainty of salvation but also boldness and confidence in PRAYER. There are, however, three important qualifications introduced in connection with effective prayer: (1) the Christian must ask in accordance with God’s will (v. 14), (2) the Christian must ask with faith (v. 15), (3) the Christian must consign some things to the wisdom of God alone (vv. 16–17). The reference to mortal sin, and the fact that John did not encourage prayer for such, has created much bewilderment for Christian interpreters through the centuries. It must be remembered that confidence is expressed in the effectiveness of prayer for “a brother.” The point of contrast is that the “mortal sin” raises the crucial question of salvation. A Christian cannot pray with complete confidence where the genuine experience of grace is questionable. No doubt, in John’s mind, the Gnostic heresy of denying the redemptive work of God’s Son was such a situation, perhaps the primary indication of it to him. He could not encourage hopeful prayer that such a one would be dealt with by God as he deals with his children. Rather, such teachers as the Gnostics who professed God but were infidels with reference to Jesus had put themselves beyond the pale of prayer that intercedes for a brother or sister. They were not brethren. See UNPARDONABLE SIN.

13. Know these (1 Jn. 5:18–21). As the previous section reveals an interplay of know and ask, here the word know dominates the scene. It becomes more than a declaration from the author; it is also an outreach to establish his readers. Including the larger section (beginning in v. 13), the word know occurs seven times. In the first six occurrences, the Greek verb used is oida G3857, which possibly refers to knowledge that comes from Christian instruction. In the last occurrence (v. 20b), the verb is ginōskō G1182, and some argue that this term signifies knowledge that is based upon experience. The entire sum of Christian teaching is imparted to the end that people may know in their own experience the reality of the gospel. The Gnostics made great use of what they called “knowledge”; but the Christian has real knowledge. Christians know security in the provision of God; they know the reality of an escape from the bondage of sin; they know the truth and not error; they know the reality of eternal life.

B. 2 John. This briefest of books may be analyzed as follows:

1. Greeting (2Jn. 1–3). The concept of salvation in 2 John is similar to that of 3 John. The term

elder may have referred to the office the author held in the Christian community, or it may have referred to his advanced age. See ELDER (NT). In all probability, it referred to his office (though for John at this time it would have been equally true as a reference to his age). This title had wide use in the Asiatic churches, and apparently the author felt it was sufficient identification of himself.

The ELECT LADY may have been a woman with a family, and her sister (2 Jn. 13) may have been the elder's hostess at the time of writing. Some have even thought that the word for "lady" (kyria G3257) should be translated "Cyria," the personal name of a woman (even as Gaius's name appears in 3 John). It is more likely that the reference is a figure of speech referring to the church to which the letter was addressed, and the closing reference to "sister" would be understood as a sister congregation.

The familiar Johannine theme of "love in the truth" is quickly introduced. The author assured those to whom he wrote that he loved them in the truth. His love was not sweet sentimentality. It was a love that was rationally and morally conditioned by the gospel. It was the spiritual knowledge of God in Christ that produced this love in his heart. The society of the faithful was established by, and has its very existence from, its relationship to this truth. The typical blessing, as Westcott has noted, begins with the activity of God in behalf of men and women, and continues to the final human satisfaction: "Grace, mercy, and peace."

2. Follow the truth (2 Jn. 4–6). The opening words of this passage have been held to indicate that only some of the people involved were following the truth; others among the "children" were not. This may have been true, but it seems better to understand the words simply as a positive comment. He has had contact with some of the children, and he found those to be following the truth. The phrase "walking in the truth" means that the gospel of Christ was manifested in their living.

John practiced love in his dealing with the recipients of the letter, as indicated by his tender appeal that they love one another. John appears to have reasoned in a circle. Love, he said, is to follow the truth, and to keep the commandments. On the other hand, he said the command is that they should love one another. It may be important to note that in v. 6 he shifts from the plural "commands" to the singular "command." The life of love seeks to obey God in all that he commanded; at the same time, all the commandments can be summarized in one—love!

3. Watch for deceivers (2 Jn. 7–11). The love of which John wrote never goes contrary to the interest of truth. It is not to be extended indiscriminately. Those who were perverters of the truth and enemies of Christ could not in the very nature of things be Traditional House of Mary at Ephesus. John wrote, "If anyone comes to you and does not bring this teaching, do not made the object of brotherly love. Of compassion and care they should be objects, but of Christian fellowship and service they could not be in the nature of the situation. There were roving teachers of Gnosticism that propagated heresy in denying the reality of the incarnation of God in Christ. These antichrists did not abide in "the doctrine of Christ," which probably meant the teaching of the apostles about Christ. They felt they knew God but took a small view of Jesus. The readers were warned against such men. To such teachers they were not to give aid or offer Christian hospitality.

4. Future plans (2 Jn. 12–13). John found writing to his readers in this instance to be less than satisfactory for the communication of his message. He anxiously awaited an opportunity when he could visit them and speak to them "face to face." he anticipated such a meeting with joy. The reference to children of the sister may have been to nieces and nephews, or more likely was a greeting from the members of a sister church.

C. 3 John

1. Greeting (3 Jn. 1). This letter was addressed by "the elder" to GAIUS. The name Gaius was very common in the 1st cent., and the individual in this instance cannot be positively identified. Three men of this name have been suggested from the NT. Gaius of Corinth (Rom. 16:23) was noted for his hospitality. Gaius of Macedonia (Acts 19:29) was a missionary companion of Paul. Gaius of Derbe (20:4) accompanied Paul on a missionary journey (possibly the same as the Gaius of Acts 19:29). The tie that bound the author to this man, whoever he was, was the love of a Christian brother in the context of the Gospel.

2. Follow the truth (3 Jn. 2–4). The author prayed that Gaius would prosper physically and materially in the same way that he had prospered spiritually. This interest in Gaius's prosperity was related in the first instance to the generosity that he had shown to the visiting missionaries with whom he had shared his material possessions. These missionaries had reported his devotion to the truth, his faithful stewardship that was manifested in his works. "Walking in the truth" is peculiarly Johannine terminology. It means that the man lived the life of the gospel, was shaped in character by it, and was dominated and controlled by his instruction in Christ.

3. Render service (3 Jn. 5–8). The act that particularly drew the author's praise had been Gaius's hospitality to the itinerant missionaries who ministered to the church of which he was a member. Apparently Gaius's kindness subjected him to criticism from his fellow members. Gaius was commended by the elder for doing wisely that which the "elect lady" was warned against doing unwisely (2 John). The expression "send them on their way," as found in the NT, means to provide expenses for a missionary undertaking (Acts 15:3; 21:5; et al.). These missionaries deserved such help because they were representatives of Christ, for this is the meaning of the statement that they went out "for the sake of the Name" (3 Jn. 7). These missionaries also refrained from accepting help from the heathen to whom they ministered so as not to open up their work to suspicion of unworthy motives. Gaius was reminded that as he supported these workers for Christ, he shared in their labor.

4. Warning against Diotrephes (3 Jn. 9–10). Here is found the explanation of John’s writing to Gaius individually. He had tried the approach of writing to the church, but with no results. This letter to the church had possibly been sent by a faithful Christian missionary named DEMETRIUS (see below), but among the elders of the church was an arrogant, domineering, and conceited man named DIOTREPHEs, who had assumed the leadership of the church. Diotrephes had barred from the church some brothers (perhaps including Demetrius) and had suppressed the elder’s letter. Apparently this selfish man was fearful that the church would acknowledge an authority other than his own, so he forbade the reading of the elder’s letter or the entertaining of any messenger from him. The elder promised to confront this man shortly if he was able to come himself.

5. Commendation of Demetrius (3 Jn. 11–12). Demetrius was likely the bearer of 3 John. Gaius not only was warned against being like Diotrephes, but he also was encouraged to be like Demetrius. Demetrius was given a threefold commendation: (1) he was widely known in the church as a man of good character; (2) his life revealed his Christianity through his loyalty to the truth; (3) John himself testified to the kind of man he was.

6. Conclusion (3 Jn. 13–15). This conclusion is strikingly similar to that of 2 John, which may suggest that the two letters were written close to the same time. The elder stated his definite plan to visit Gaius shortly. The closing greeting, typically Christian, reveals the writer’s extensive personal acquaintance in the church of which Gaius was a part.

John, Gospel of. The “fourth gospel,” as it is often called, probably influenced Christian thought during the first centuries of the church more decisively than any other book of the NT. It was accorded a place of apostolic authority from the first, as witnessed by several patristic writers. After AUGUSTINE, however, Pauline writings made the major contribution to Christian theology. In recent times it often has been the center of controversy, occasioned more often by dogmatic considerations than historical or literary data. A major factor in the discussion is the relationship of this gospel to the other three. In this article consideration is given first to the data on which conclusions must be based, reserving for later consideration matters of interpretation. In this procedure a greater objectivity is sought.

I. Structure. No two students of John's gospel will agree as to the best way to exhibit the train of thought conveyed therein. The following detailed outline is presented as the result of careful study, but not necessarily as the original author himself would have displayed it.

1. Introduction (Jn. 1:1–51)
  1. Prologue (1:1–18)
    1. The relation of the Son to God (1:1–2)
    2. The relation of the Son to the cosmos (1:3–5)
    3. The relation of the Son to John the Baptist (1:6–8)
    4. The relation of the Son to the world (1:9–16)
    5. The relation of the Son to Moses (1:17–18)
  2. Jesus presented (1:19–51)
    1. By John the Baptist as the Lamb of God (1:19–36)
    2. To the disciples as the Messiah (1:37–51)
2. Public ministry—the book of signs (2:1—12:50)
  1. Initial encounter (2:1—4:54)
    1. The first sign (2:1–12)
      1. The occasion (2:1–5)
      2. The sign accomplished (2:6–8)
      3. The result—belief (2:9–11)
      4. In Capernaum (2:12)
    2. First Passover—the new temple (2:13–25)
      1. The temple cleansed (2:13–17)

2. Reactions to the cleansing (2:18–25)

- (1) The Jews challenge it (2:18–20)
- (2) The disciples believe (2:21–22)
- (3) Many believe in Jesus (2:23–25)

3. The new birth (3:1–17)

1. Demanded (3:1–3)
2. Explained (3:4–8)
3. The condition of its reception (3:9–12)
4. The ascent of the Son of Man (3:13–15)
5. The descent of the Son of God (3:16–17)

4. Responsible response to the light (3:18–21)

5. The new Master (3:22–36)

1. John and Jesus make disciples (3:22–26)
2. The subordination of John (3:27–30)
3. The supremacy of Jesus (3:31–36)

6. Water of life for the Samaritans (4:1–42)

1. Jesus tired and hungry (4:1–6)
2. The Samaritan woman's awakening (4:7–15)
3. The woman's conversion (4:16–26)
4. The woman's witness (4:27–30)
5. The disciples challenged (4:31–38)
6. The Samaritans believe (4:39–42)

7. The second sign: a son healed (4:43–54)

1. Galileans believe (4:43–45)
2. A king's officer believes (4:46–54)

(1) The petition for healing (4:46–47)

(2) Faith tested (4:48–50)

(3) Faith confirmed (4:51–54)

2. Mounting hostility (5:1—12:50)

1. The third sign (5:1–47)

1. The cripple healed (5:1–9)
2. Jesus accused (5:10–18)

(1) Of Sabbath desecration (5:10–16)

(2) Of blasphemy (5:17–18)

3. c. Jesus' defense (5:19–47)

(1) Father and Son are coworkers (5:19–30)

(2) Witnesses summoned (5:31–47)

2. The fourth sign: the second Passover (6:1–71)

1. Five thousand fed (6:1–15)
2. Jesus, master of the storm (6:16–21)
3. Works or faith? (6:22–29)
4. Bread of Life (6:30–59)
5. Words of Life (6:60–71)
3. Feast of Tabernacles (7:1–52)
  1. Jesus' brothers skeptical (7:1–5)
  2. Jesus' delay in departure (7:6–9)
  3. Jesus' whereabouts questioned (7:10–13)
  4. Jesus' teaching in the temple (7:14–24)
  5. Jesus' origin and destination disputed (7:25–36)
  6. The advent of the Spirit (7:37–43)
  7. Nicodemus calls for justice (7:44–52)
4. Woman taken in adultery (7:53—8:11)
  1. The test question (7:53—8:6)
  2. Jesus' answer (8:7–11)
5. The fifth sign: the Light of the World (8:12—9:41)
  1. Its source in the Father (8:12–20)
  2. Its judgment (8:21–30)
  3. Its mission: freedom through truth (8:31–38)
  4. Its lineage (8:39–59)
  5. Its remedy for physical blindness (9:1–34)
  6. Its exposure of spiritual blindness (9:35–41)
6. True and false shepherds (10:1–39)
  1. The parable of the good shepherd (10:1–6)
  2. The parable explained (10:7–18)
  3. True and false sheep (10:19–30)
  4. Jesus nearly stoned (10:31–39)
7. Retirement to Judea and Bethany (10:40—12:11)
  1. Beyond Jordan: many believe (10:40–42)
  2. The sixth sign: resurrection (11:1–53)

(1) Recalled to Bethany (11:1–16)

(2) Lazarus lives again (11:17–53)

3. Retirement near Ephraim (11:54–57)

4. Anointing at Bethany (12:1–11)

8. Jesus' last public appearance (12:12–50)

1. His triumphal entry (12:12–19)

2. Request of the Greeks (12:20–26)

3. Rationale of Jesus' death (12:27–36)

4. Unbelief explained (12:37–43)

5. Jesus' last public statement (12:44–50)

3. Private conference with disciples (13:1—17:26)

1. The third Passover: Last Supper (13:1–38)

1. The footwashing (13:1–11)
2. The washing explained (13:12–20)
3. Betrayal predicted (13:21–30)
4. The new commandment (13:31–35)
5. Denial predicted (13:36–38)
2. Preparation for Jesus' departure (14:1—17:26)
  1. The true way (14:1–7)
  2. Father and Son together (14:7–11)
  3. Discipleship means obedience (14:12–17)
  4. Christian unity (14:18—15:11)
    1. Of Father, Son, believer (14:18–24)
    2. Of Son, Spirit, believer (14:25–31)
    3. Of vine and branches (15:1–8)
  5. Christian love (15:9–17)
  6. World's hatred (15:18–25)
  7. The Paraclete (15:26—16:15)
  8. Jesus' departure and return (16:16–33)
  9. Jesus' pastoral prayer (17:1–26)
    1. Petition for himself (17:1–5)
    2. Petition for disciples (17:6–11)
    3. Petition for future disciples (17:12–26)
4. Jesus is glorified (18:1—21:25)
  1. In suffering and death (18:1—19:42)
    1. The arrest (18:1–14)
    2. Peter's denial (18:15–18,25–27)
    3. The trial by the Jews (18:19–28)
    4. The trial before Pilate (18:29—19:16)
    5. The crucifixion scene (19:17–30)
    6. Jesus' death (19:31–37)
    7. Jesus' burial (19:38–42)
  2. In resurrection and life (20:1—21:25)
    1. The appearances in Jerusalem (20:1–31)
      1. To Mary (20:1–18)
      2. To ten disciples (20:19–23)
      3. To Thomas (20:24–31)
    2. Appearance in Galilee (21:1–23)
      1. Futile fishing (21:1–8)
      2. Jesus at breakfast (21:9–14)
      3. Jesus interviews Peter (21:15–23)
    3. Final attestation of authorship (21:24–25)

In structure, the fourth gospel differs from the other three in several respects: (1) there is no mention of Jesus' birth and youth; (2) relatively little is said about Jesus' early Galilean ministry, the stress being on his Jerusalem ministry; (3) in this account Jesus visits Jerusalem for the Passover three times, in the synoptics once; (4) in this gospel much more attention is given to Jesus' last words with his disciples; and (5) the book is introduced by what is often called a prologue (Jn. 1:1—18) and closes with an epilogue (ch. 21).

II. Content

A. Text. The earliest extant portion of the NT comes from the Gospel of John: Rylands Papyrus 457 (P<sup>52</sup>) on Jn. 18:31–33, 37–38, dated c. A.D. 130. In addition, BODMER PAPYRI II (P<sup>66</sup>, a nearly complete copy of the fourth gospel) and XV (P<sup>75</sup>, which preserves most of the first 15 chapters) date from the first part of the 3rd cent. or earlier. Scholars have noted the high degree of correlation between these Bodmer texts (esp. P<sup>75</sup>) and CODEX VATICANUS; in them, several passages of dubious authenticity are missing, including Jn. 5:4 and 7:59—8:11. In addition, they confirm the reading “only God” rather than “only Son” in 1:18. These findings tend to justify the labors of NT textual criticism, since they lend support to the general reliability of the Alexandrian text-type. See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (NT) V. Many scholars consider 20:31 the original terminus of the gospel and ch. 21 an appendix added later. The stylistic differences, however, are slight, and all extant MSS include this chapter (the concluding postscript, 21:24–25, prob. is an attestation of apostolic authorship by the final editor).

B. Vocabulary. The characteristic Johannine vocabulary is an important clue to the meaning of the fourth gospel. Even the casual reader will be impressed by the remarkable paradox of simple diction and profound thought. The most characteristic terms in the Johannine vocabulary are common. Many of them, to the English reader, are monosyllabic. These include word, world, light, life, know, love, hate, and truth. Also prominent are glory, darkness, belief, and evil. Although the words are very commonplace, they carry an enormous weight of theology. Who can fathom the depth and breadth of such concepts in this gospel as life, light, glory, love, and truth? It is characteristic also of this author to use bold contrasts, such as between God and the devil, the believer and the world, light and darkness, truth and error, life and death. Probably the most important single term in this gospel is the word life. This is the central theme of the book. Although love is prominent here also, before there is love there must be life. However, in light of the Johannine prologue and its antecedents in the Genesis account of creation, it may well be that in a cosmological sense light comes before life. The basic theme of this gospel is that in Christ is life and “that life was the light of men” (Jn. 1:4) The purpose of the gospel is also summed up in terms of life. The end in view is eternal life and the means to that end is belief in the Son of God (20:31).

C. Major events

1. Events included. Most of the events reported in the Gospel of John are found nowhere else. Only one miracle, the feeding of the 5,000, is common to all four Gospels. John alone records the initial encounter between Jesus and the disciples of John in Judea. This is followed by the wedding in CANA, which John calls the first miracle, or SIGN. The cleansing of the temple in Jerusalem is reported in connection with the first PASSOVER visit, creating the problem of whether there were two cleansings or one; if the latter, then John’s account places the event at the beginning of Jesus’ public ministry, whereas the synoptics state that it comes at the close. The interview with Nicodemus in Jerusalem is reported at length, followed by a discourse concerning John and his relation to Jesus.

The scene then shifts to Samaria with a lengthy report of Jesus' interview with the woman of SYCHAR. In Jn. 5 Jesus is again in Jerusalem, where the third of his major signs, or miracles, occurred—the healing at the pool of BETHESDA. This event leads to a lengthy dialogue with hostile Jewish leaders about keeping the SABBATH and Jesus' relation to the Father.

At the second Passover, Jesus is in Galilee, and the discourse on the bread of life follows the feeding of 5,000, who are pilgrims (Jn. 6). The next chapter reports his presence again in Jerusalem for the Feast of Tabernacles, where he delivered a major speech on the coming of the Holy Spirit. Extensive discourses follow concerning his relation with God the Father. The theme of light is introduced again in ch. 8 and continued in ch. 9. Here Jesus cures a blind man at the pool of SILOAM and states that the people who are most truly blind are those whose blindness is spiritual and self-imposed, whereas those afflicted with physical blindness, through no fault of their own, are led to the light (9:39–41). Thus the miracle, like many others in this gospel, is also a parable. Still in Jerusalem, the discourse concerning the good shepherd is at the same time a condemnation of false shepherds and ends with added hostility so keen that Jesus retires from public view (10:40). The sickness and death of LAZARUS brings Jesus again from retirement into Bethany, where Lazarus is brought back to life. This, in turn, leads to a greater determination on the part of the Jewish leaders to do away with him (11:53–57).

The third Passover brought Jesus again to Jerusalem, or rather to his Bethany headquarters at the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus (see MARY #3). At a supper honoring Lazarus, Mary anointed Jesus with costly ointment, much to the disgust of JUDAS ISCARIOT. The Passover feast, meanwhile, had brought many hundreds of people to the Holy City, and it was then that the triumphal entry occurred with three groups of people centering on Jesus: a group who had witnessed the resurrection of Lazarus, another group of pilgrims from the N, and a third group residing in Jerusalem (Jn. 12:12–18). An inquiry by several Greeks led Jesus to make an important prediction concerning the significance of his death, using the analogy of grain that must be buried in the earth before it can bring forth new life, an obvious prediction of his own immediate future.

Greek Orthodox priest standing beside the traditional well of Jacob (Church of Jacob's Well at Sychar). Jesus spoke with a Samaritan woman at this well (Jn. 4).

John devotes more attention to the last days of Jesus' ministry in Jerusalem than any of the other writers. Following the triumphal entry was the feast with the disciples and the announcement of the betrayal by Judas, the departure of Judas for this purpose, the washing of the feet of the Twelve by the Master. and the extended discourse concerning the future, followed by the high priestly intercessory prayer of Christ (Jn. 17).

In the events that follow, John's account parallels closely that of the synoptists. This includes the arrest in the garden, the trial before the Jewish authorities, then the trial before Pilate, the sentence to death, the crucifixion, and burial. In reporting the resurrection, John's account supplements that of the others and presents events otherwise unknown. These include the appearance to Mary Magdalene (see MARY #5), to THOMAS, and to seven disciples in Galilee, ending with Jesus' dialogue with Peter.

2. Events omitted. One of the problems of the fourth gospel is the large number of important events mentioned in the synoptics but ignored in John. These include the nativity stories and the parables. There is no mention in this gospel of the EXORCISM of devils, even though Jesus is thrice accused of being demon possessed. In this gospel no attention is paid to publicans, lepers, or children, as is characteristic of the other three. No mention is made of the naming of the twelve apostles. There is no SERMON ON THE MOUNT or on the Plain, such as Matthew and Luke report. The calling of sinners to repentance is notably absent in this account. The APOCALYPTIC features of the synoptists, including eschatological themes and the warnings against the judgment of hell, are not specified in this gospel. Many of Jesus' characteristic apothegms and proverbs, such as "you are the salt of the earth," are not included in this account. No mention is made of the institution of the EUCHARIST, although it is implied in Jn. 6. John also omits Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane. There is no description of the trial before Caiaphas, though it is alluded to in the account. Jesus' ascension on Mount Olivet is omitted, although the theme of ascent/descent is rather characteristic of the gospel. The major aspect of the Johannine problem is that of explaining the points at which this gospel differs so radically from the first three, and why.

D. Major ideas

1. Life. As noted previously, John's major concern is with divine LIFE, the life that is in God and which under certain conditions can be shared by men and women. The basic condition to this sharing is belief in Jesus as the Son of God. This overarching concern dominates the gospel from beginning to end. Unlike Luke, this author is not primarily concerned to set down an orderly account of the actual events. Instead, he is very selective, his choice being dictated by a didactic purpose; for John is interested not only in the events, but also in their significance.

2. Witness. One of the most distinctive features of the fourth gospel is the emphasis upon witness. The term witness occurs thirty-four times as a verb form and thirteen times as a noun, a total of forty-seven occurrences as compared with sixteen in all of the synoptics. The author classifies himself primarily as a witness (Jn. 1:14, 16; 19:35; 21:24; cf. 5:30–47). His method is not only that of marshaling evidence to convince the readers, but of making a personal declaration of what he has experienced. The point is that faith is based on evidence, either firsthand or secondhand, and whereas belief based on evidence is good, belief that is not dependent on sensory evidence is better (20:29).

3. Belief. Witnessing is designed to induce belief, that is, FAITH in Jesus' claim to be the Son of God and the only source of spiritual life. The noun pistis G4411 does not occur, but the verb pisteuō G4409 is used more than eighty times. Belief, or faith, is for John not primarily confidence in the final outcome, as in Hebrews, but rather committal to the person of Jesus Christ (Jn. 6:29; cf. 10:32; 17:3). It goes beyond the acceptance of testimony concerning the validity of the proposition; it is an existential decision between light and darkness, God and the world, truth and error. Hindrances to faith are not lack of evidence, but the subjective factors of pride, self-esteem, a desire for worldly honor, and stubbornness (5:44; 8:43; 9:22; 12:39).

4. Glory. Unlike the first epistle of Peter and the letters of Paul, GLORY (doxa G1518) is not that which follows humiliation in time; it is linked with humiliation and transforms it. Glory is basically a revelation of God's presence. This glory is resident in Jesus, and its radiance is in contrast to that of the OT (Jn. 1:14–18). Instead of the SHEKINAH glory dwelling in the Jerusalem temple, it dwells in Jesus, who is the true temple (2:19). The distinctive feature in this gospel is that glory emerges from the ignominy of death (11:4; 12:33; 21:19). Jesus' suffering, death, resurrection, and ascension are seen as one event (7:39; 12:28–33). John was convinced that the glory is essentially akin to that witnessed by Isaiah (Jn. 12:41).

5. Regeneration. A metaphor that John develops with an emphasis not found in the other Gospels is that of the “new birth,” that is, REGENERATION. This underlying current surfaces at Jn. 1:12, 13; 3:1–10; 8:39–45. Whereas Paul speaks of the new life in Christ under the caption of JUSTIFICATION and employs legal terms, John uses the biological concept of birth. Thus the entrance into the Christian life is envisioned as being “born of God” in addition to being born in the natural manner (1:12). In the interview with NICODEMUS, Jesus stated emphatically that the condition of participating in the KINGDOM OF GOD is being “born of water and the Spirit” (3:5). Here the contrast is made between physical life and spiritual life, a theme that is characteristic of this gospel. Just as physical life comes from one's human parents, so spiritual life comes from God through the Son and Holy Spirit. This matter of spiritual generation is explained at some length in ch. 8, where Jesus accused the Jews of having as their father the devil and asserted that a true Jew is not one who can trace his ancestry to Abraham, but rather one who is in the spiritual lineage of Abraham (8:39–58). This lineage can be identified by obedience to divine revelation. In this case, God's revelation is through his Son. The idea is not new, but the way John expresses it is unique. The concept of spiritual birth is found elsewhere in the NT (note esp. 1 Pet. 1:3, 23; 2:2). The concept has had a powerful influence on consequent Christian theology.

6. The world. This gospel contains strong emphasis upon a moral dualism—between light and darkness, good and evil, God and the evil one, the believer and the WORLD. This theme runs throughout the gospel but is especially prominent in the prologue (Jn. 1:5, 10–12). It occurs again in one of the key verses of the gospel: “This is the verdict: Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil” (3:19). It appears again in Jesus' discourse with his brothers, where the basic hostility between the redeemer and the world is stated: “The world cannot hate you, but it hates me because I testify that what it does is evil” (7:7). This hostility between light and darkness is again expressed after the healing of the blind man (9:38–41). The theme is especially prominent in the extended discourse with the disciples prior to Jesus' arrest. The hatred of the world is a basic fact of life that they must face (15:18–16:33). In the ensuing confrontation they are assured of the help of the Holy Spirit as their advocate (16:7–11; cf. Lk. 12:12).

7. Love. Although the theme of LOVE is prominent in all Christian writing, it is especially conspicuous in the Johannine writings. The relation of God to the hostile world is basically that of love (Jn. 3:16). Also, the quality that distinguishes Jesus' disciples from all others is love (13:34–35). The climax of Jesus' intercessory prayer is the request for the love that unites the Father, the Son, and the believers (17:26). In Jesus' dialogue with Peter, the quality prized in the relationship is love (21:15–19). This theme is emphasized even more in the companion volume to the gospel, the first epistle of John (see JOHN, EPISTLES OF).

8. Truth. The appeal of this gospel to the world dominated by Greek culture is perhaps reflected by the emphasis on TRUTH. God's revelation is equated with truth. The prologue points out that whereas the law was mediated through MOSES, Jesus Christ mediated a twofold blessing—the Hebraic benefit of grace and the Greek benefit of truth (though John prob. means “truth” primarily in the OT sense of “reliability” rather than in a philosophical sense). Both the Hebraic and Hellenistic spiritual blessings converge in Jesus, the Son of God. Later, Jesus assured his disciples that obedience to his word would assure them of the truth that emancipates (Jn. 8:31–32). Jesus is the embodiment of truth (14:6). This truth is projected into a skeptical and perplexed world represented by PILATE'S unanswered query, “What is truth?” (18:38). The world itself is divided into those who are of the truth and those who are in sin and error (18:37). Finally, the gospel itself claims to be the expression of truth. The written record is that which conforms to the facts; such is the solemn affirmation that closes the volume (21:24).

These are some of the main ideas that constitute the fabric of this gospel. John is not content simply to record historical events; he is selective in the events he chooses to illustrate some of these themes. The themes are like the themes of great symphonies, many of them introduced in the prologue, or prelude, and woven throughout the fabric, one coming to prominence now, another later. John's thought is often described as cyclic. It is something like a circular staircase or a spiral, in which a theme will appear and then recede to appear later at a higher level. John does not treat one topic in one place and then go on to another topic, but keeps them in suspension through his narrative. The author, for example, takes care to point out hindrances to belief, such as an attitude of undue appreciation for the esteem of one's fellow men (Jn. 5:44) or the fear of community pressure to conform, for example, that which inhibited the parents of the man born blind (9:22). See further JOHANNINE THEOLOGY.

III. Distinctive features

A. *Data peculiar to John. The relationship between John and the Synoptic Gospels is seen not only in what John omits, but also in what he includes and the others omit. The prologue is found nowhere else in the Scriptures, and the distinctive contribution is John's use of the term LOGOS and its application to Christ. The great affirmation is that the eternal word became flesh in time. This is John's way of referring to the INCARNATION, which parallels Paul's description of the KENOSIS (Phil. 2:5–11). Only John mentions the calling of the disciples of JOHN THE BAPTIST in the Jordan valley, specifically Peter, Andrew, Philip, Nathanael, and presumably, the author himself. The synoptic accounts place the formal enlisting of these men in the apostolic circle at the shores of the Sea of Galilee. To harmonize the two accounts, it is necessary to assume that the latter was the confirmation of an earlier acquaintance reported by John. Also peculiar to John is the reference to Jesus as the Lamb of God, from the lips of John the Baptist (Jn. 1:29, 36). The emphasis upon the SON OF MAN in this context is also quite distinctive, including the allusion to Jacob's ladder (1:51).

Only John reports the episode at CANA, the significance of which is that it strengthened the disciples' belief in the adequacy of their master (Jn. 2:11). The important interview with NICODEMUS, which is one expression of the heart of the gospel, is reported only in John, together with the allusion to the serpent in the wilderness (3:14). A portrayal of John the Baptist as friend of the bridegroom (3:29) is found nowhere else in the NT, although in Ephesians and in Revelation Christ is mentioned as the husband of the church (Eph. 5:25; Rev. 21:2). The interview with the woman at Samaria is the occasion of the introduction of Jesus as the giver of the water of life, a theme that reappears in Jesus' statement at the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn. 7:37).

In addition to the healing of the man at the pool of BETHESDA, John alone reports the dialogue between Jesus and his critics on the issue of belief and the witnesses (Jn. 5:32–47). Here, as elsewhere in the gospel, the author stresses the intimate relationship between Jesus Christ and God the Father. The problem is to state the closest conceivable relationship and yet maintain a distinction. It is compressed in a statement, “I and the Father are one” (10:30). The discourse on the bread of life following the feeding of the multitude is found only in John (ch. 6). This is the closest John comes to a teaching concerning the Eucharist. The visit to Jerusalem referred to in John (chs. 7–9) has no parallel in the synoptic accounts. This visit was characterized by an acrimonious dialogue between Jesus and his friends who registered an increasing degree of skepticism (7:5). The people speculate concerning Jesus’ identity. The growing conviction on the part of the populace that he is what he claims to be is matched by a contrasting degree of hostility to the claim that he is the expected MESSIAH. This conflict is dramatically portrayed following the healing of the blind man at the Pool of SILOAM. The reader is enabled to see the issues laid bare. Effective use of contrast is made as the author delineates the reactions of the man himself, his parents, the Pharisees, and Jesus.

John is the only evangelist who employs the analogy of sheepfold and shepherd, although the image of “lost sheep” is found elsewhere (Lk. 15:3–7). The concept of SHEPHERD was a familiar one to users of the OT (Ps. 23; 80; Ezek. 34). It proved to be the church’s favorite portrayal of its Lord and Savior (1 Pet. 2:25; 5:1–5). The miracles, or signs, that John singles out for special treatment include the wedding feast at Cana, the nobleman’s son, the lame man at Bethesda, the blind man at Siloam, the walking on the sea (ch. 6), and the culminating sign, that of bringing LAZARUS back to life.

John alone records the healing of an invalid by the pool of Bethesda and the subsequent words of Jesus regarding belief and witness (Jn. 5). This model of 1st-cent. Jerusalem (looking SW) shows the twin pools that are probably referred to in this passage.

The raising of Lazarus is presented as a historical event, but the account leaves the reader wondering why it was not mentioned in the synoptics. Whereas the latter view the cleansing of the temple as the immediate cause of the steps to kill Jesus, in John’s account it is the raising of Lazarus that brings events to a head (Jn. 12:10–11). Only John reports the interpretation voiced by CAIAPHAS concerning the necessity of putting Jesus to death (11:49–51). Only John reports Jesus’ interview with the Greeks and the ensuing theme of life out of death after the analogy of the sowing of the seed and the resulting harvest (12:20–26). Only John reports the washing of the disciples’ feet and the lesson in humble service that it teaches (13:1–20).

Especially prized by readers of the gospel are chs. 14–17, which reflect the intimate conversation between Jesus and the worried disciples. The role of the PARACLETE—Comforter, Counselor, or Advocate—is found nowhere else in the Scriptures except in the first epistle of John (1 Jn. 2:1). The HOLY SPIRIT is equated with the Advocate and the Spirit of truth (Jn. 14:16, 17; 15:26; an interesting parallel to the latter designation is seen in the Qumran literature, where the spirit of truth is in contrast to the spirit of error and of darkness, 1QS, III, 13—IV, 26). This is climaxed by the Lord's intercessory prayer, which only John records.

Altogether, John reports fourteen dialogues that are characterized by (1) a question from the hearers, (2) the Master's answer in enigmatic form, (3) the misunderstanding of his answer, and (4) Jesus' clarification of the issue. The conversation with Nicodemus well illustrates this sequence. Nicodemus asks, "How can a man be born when he is old?" (Jn. 3:4). Jesus replied, "Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit" (3:6). The response was, "How can this be?" (3:9), leading to further explanation.

In this gospel, NATHANAEAL and THOMAS are given special attention. The relation of the BELOVED DISCIPLE and Peter is given prominence, with the beloved disciple being, on at least three occasions, the first to perceive the spiritual significance of words and events, and then sharing it with Peter (Jn. 13:24–26; 2:8; 21:7). John alone reports the committal of Jesus' mother to the beloved disciple and the emergence of blood from the side of Jesus (19:25–27, 34–37). In John's account of the burial and resurrection, Mary Magdalene receives special prominence, as does Nicodemus. Nicodemus is mentioned three times in John and nowhere else in the NT. He appears first as a seeker, then as a defender of justice and of Jesus, and finally as one of the last to place him in the tomb (3:1; 7:50; 19:39).

These indicate that the fourth gospel presents an independent report from that of the other three. Although some scholars view this as a protest or a correction to the synoptics, others argue that it is designed to supplement rather than to alter the report of the other Gospels. Luke and John appear to have the most in common, but both show independence in presentation. All four evangelists drew on a common oral tradition.

B. Comparison with the synoptics and Acts. The fourth gospel is designed for the world at large, to convince the uncommitted (Jn. 20:31). The others are written with a somewhat different purpose. Luke, for example, writes to believers to confirm their faith (Lk. 1:1–4). It has been suggested that Matthew had in mind people of the Jewish nation because of his emphasis on fulfillment of prophecy. It has been suggested that Mark was concerned primarily with the Roman world, hence his emphasis upon action rather than upon discussion.

The eschatological element is not stressed in John. In the synoptics, John the Baptist predicts a coming judgment with the Messiah serving as judge, gathering the wheat and burning the chaff. This eschatological motif of judgment is lacking in the fourth gospel. In the synoptics, many of the parables deal with the last judgment, such as the parables of the tares and of the fish; John has nothing comparable. The warning against hell fire, where the worm dies not and the fire is not quenched, prominent in the synoptics, is completely lacking in John. The synoptists, especially Luke, have parables that stress repentance (Lk. 15) and God's willingness to accept the sinner, whereas in John's gospel, stress is placed on the obstacles the sinner encounters in his quest for saving faith. In this gospel, therefore, the stress is upon evidence, witness to the evidence, belief and hindrances thereto. Demonology, so prominent in the synoptics, has no parallel in John, although three times Jesus is accused of being demon possessed (Jn. 7:20; 8:48; 10:20; cf. Mk. 3:21).

The other evangelists stress that the HOLY SPIRIT will come to the defense of the disciples when they are persecuted for their faith (Matt. 10:20). A similar role is mentioned in the fourth gospel, where the Holy Spirit is the Paraclete, or the Advocate, who will defend persecuted disciples (Jn. 15:18—16:15). The same idea is common to all four evangelists, namely, that the Spirit will serve the believer as defense attorney. Formidable problems present themselves in an attempt to closely correlate the fourth gospel and the Acts with reference to the Holy Spirit. In Jn. 7:37, it is said that the Spirit is not to be given until after the glorification of Jesus. After his resurrection and before his ascension, Jesus breathed on the disciples and they received the Holy Spirit (20:22). Many scholars think of this inbreathing of the Spirit by the Master as prophetic of the fuller outpouring of the Holy Spirit at PENTECOST. According to E. F. Scott, C. H. Dodd, and others, however, the emphasis in this gospel is not upon the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost, nor on the second physical advent of the Lord, but rather upon the Spirit fulfilling the numerous predictions of Jesus' return, as set forth in Jn. 20. This hardly seems valid, inasmuch as Jesus was still with them when the inbreathing occurred. There seems to be, therefore, no essential contradiction between the doctrine of the Spirit in John and that in Luke—Acts.

There is, however, a difference of emphasis. In John, the ministry of the Spirit is to reveal Christ, to illuminate, to teach, and to console, whereas in Acts, the function of the Spirit is more activist and dynamic. In Acts, it is the Spirit who inspired the witnesses and thrust them out to the world at large; the Spirit bestowed the gift of tongues and other charismata (see SPIRITUAL GIFTS), and even transported a person bodily, as in the case of Philip (Acts 8:39). In John, however, the primary function of the Spirit is to provide guidance “into all truth” (Jn. 16:13). In Acts it is to empower, and in Paul's writings it is to cleanse (Gal. 5:15–16; cf. Acts 15:9). As E. F. Scott has noted, the doctrine of the Spirit in John is one of the most distinctive and important contributions this gospel makes to NT theology.

In John is no specific mention of the ascension into heaven as is true of the synoptics and Acts. The nearest approach to this is Jesus' statement to Mary that he had not yet ascended to his Father (Jn. 20:17). The theme of ascension, however, does appear in the gospel (chs. 3, 8, and 20). This has led some scholars, with C. H. Dodd, to see in John a “realized eschatology.” In substance, this is the belief that when the gospel was written, the church had given up the expectation of the Lord's early bodily return and instead substituted a renewed emphasis upon the ministry of the Holy Spirit in whom Jesus actually returned. Thus John “demythologized” Jewish apocalyptic ESCHATOLOGY according to this viewpoint. (Others use the term “realized eschatology” as a notion complementary, not antithetical, to future eschatology.)

C. Comparison with the Epistles

1. Pauline. Paul shows concern with the sins that especially characterized the Gentiles (Rom. 1:18–32; 3:1–20; Gal. 5:15–21). When Paul speaks of the sins of the Jews, it is in the areas of unbelief, hypocrisy, and legalism (Rom. 2; 10). John is concerned less with the catalogue of the various types of sins that characterized the pagans of the day from whom Paul's converts came. John, rather, is concerned with the sinner's chronic preference for darkness rather than light (Jn. 3:19). He is concerned chiefly with the problem of unbelief and the things that hinder a person's coming to faith, hence to life (5:44). He does not catalogue the vices of Jesus' enemies, as is seen in Matthew (e.g., Matt. 23:2–39), but deals rather with the underlying principle that leads to rejection of the light and the light bearer (Jn. 3:19).

The concept of RIGHTEOUSNESS is less prominent in John than in Paul. Whereas Paul speaks of the righteousness of God as the dominant factor with which we must reckon, John stresses such attributes of God as LOVE and LIGHT. Both stress God's love to us (Jn. 3:16; cf. Rom. 5:6–11). Paul is more concerned with Mount Sinai and its application to the Christian gospel (Gal. 4); John dwells more in the wilderness with its symbolism of water and manna (Jn. 3:5; 6:31–35). Whereas Paul stresses Jesus' death and resurrection, John emphasizes Jesus' incarnation and ascension. By the ascension, John includes his death upon the cross that in itself is an ascension (3:14; 8:37; 12:25).

Because Paul thought in terms of law, his nomenclature is that of a court of law; hence his terms are adoption, justification, propitiation, and reconciliation. John preferred the biological analogy of birth (Jn. 1:12; 3:6; cf. 8:41, 44). Both, however, are in agreement with reference to the basic tenets of the Christian faith: upon the substitutionary nature of Christ's death, his vicarious atonement, bodily resurrection, appearances, and ascension. In eschatology, Paul gives much greater prominence to the return of Christ, the last judgment, and the restoration of all things to the jurisdiction of Christ. John seems less influenced by Jewish APOCALYPTIC thought.

2. Petrine. Both the Gospel of John and the first epistle of Peter stress the concept of persecution and suffering for the sake of the gospel. According to 1 Peter, the suffering is caused by external pressures, reflecting a period of persecution, presumably by the leaders of the Roman world. In the fourth gospel, however, the persecution is anticipated in the future, and its similarity to the persecution of Jesus by the Jews is pointed out. In John, the chief antagonists of the gospel light are the Jewish leaders, whereas in Peter, the opposition is not pinpointed, but presumably it is the pagan world. In John, the hostility is portrayed more in general principles, as the conflict between light and darkness, the two being mutually antagonistic. This is especially prominent in Jn. 8, though it is anticipated in the prologue.

Common to 1 Peter and the fourth gospel is the concept of the new birth. In John, the birth is by water and spirit (Jn. 3:5); in 1 Peter we read, "For you have been born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God" (1 Pet. 1:23). In both, the contrast between the physically born and the spiritually born is striking. In John, the two genealogies, or family trees, are conspicuous, especially in Jn. 8, where the children of the devil are in contrast to the children of light. The same parallel is seen in the Qumran writings, especially the Manual of Discipline and the War Rule. In Peter, the birth is through the word of God. It is the word that brings to birth and the word that nourishes the newborn (1 Pet. 1:3, 23; 2:2).

Another concept common to both John and Peter is that of SHEPHERD. In John, the good shepherd gives his life for the sheep; likewise in Peter, "the Shepherd and Overseer of your souls" is he who "bore our sins in his body on the tree" (1 Pet. 2:24–25). The concept of feeding the sheep is found only in the fourth gospel and 1 Peter. As Peter was urged to feed the sheep (Jn. 21:17), so Peter urges the elders to be "shepherds of God's flock" so that they can render a good account to the "Chief Shepherd," who will bestow "the crown of glory that will never fade away" (1 Pet. 5:2–4).

In John, the prime virtue is spiritual insight that leads to belief and hence to life and witnessing. In Peter, the virtues most urgently needed are those of constancy, of patience under test, of submission to authority, and of quiet continuing witness in a hostile world (Jn. 3:16–19; cf. 1 Pet. 4:1–19).

The eschatological emphasis in 2 Peter is not paralleled in the fourth gospel, nor does the gospel give a great deal of attention to the matter of growth in grace of the believer as is true of 2 Peter (cf. 2 Pet. 1:3–11). This epistle is a stirring summons to holy living in view of the imminent return of the Lord. In John, the emphasis is more upon embracing Christ as Lord and Savior and walking henceforth in his way of love.

3. Johannine. Although C. H. Dodd and others doubt whether the same person wrote both the Gospel of John and 1 John, the preponderance of evidence favors a common authorship of both. Even a superficial examination indicates the prominence in both of such elemental concepts as witness, light, love, truth. Common to both is the simplicity of diction linked with profundity of thought. Common also to both is the concept of the believer's relation to God in biological terms. Thus in the epistle, the children of the devil and the children of God are in marked contrast not only with reference to their source of life, but in their relation to sin (Jn. 8:44; 1 Jn. 3:8–10). He that is born of God does not commit sin, whereas he that does sin is of the devil (1 Jn. 3:8–10). In both, the hostility of the world is stressed.

The central theme of both is spiritual life: it is not merely something temporal, or a continuation of the present life; it is rather a life that is different in nature. Because it is essentially spiritual rather than mental or physical, eternal life begins in the believer when he receives Christ (Jn. 1:12). It is a qualitatively superior type of life that begins with belief and lasts into eternity. Brotherly love is stressed in both, especially in ch. 13, and is found throughout the first epistle. Love is equated with God, and the “sons of God” possess this love as a bestowal of grace, not something inherited. The epistle is more concerned than is the gospel with expressing love in deeds, thus the epistle is the more practical of the two (1 Jn. 3:14–18). Both these writings contain the term Paraclete, which is found nowhere else in the NT (Jn. 14–16; 1 Jn. 2:1).

Among the differences is the fact that in the epistle there is no expressed concern for the apostasy of the nation of Israel. The CHRISTOLOGY is different as well. In the gospel, the stress is on Jesus’

The Desert of Zin (view to the S from Avdat, with monastery in center of image). Both John and the epistle to the Hebrews stress the importance of Israel's experience in the wilderness.

deity; in the epistle, the stress is on his humanity—to refute the heresy of DOCETISM, the doctrine that Jesus’ humanity was not real.

4. Hebrews. Although the form and nomenclature is strikingly different, the basic theology of both the epistle to the HEBREWS and the fourth gospel is the same. In both there is stress upon Jesus as the Son of God; in both there is stress upon his condescension in taking human nature. The incarnation is spelled out more in detail in Hebrews, noting that incarnation involves sharing death with the rest of mankind (Heb. 2:5–18).

Both John and Hebrews lay stress upon the experience of the Israelites in the wilderness. This appears in Hebrews, where the readers are urged to follow their Joshua into the Promised Land lest they meet with the tragedy resulting from unbelief, as did their ancestors in Sinai (Heb. 3–4). In John's treatment, the book of Exodus appears in the background (esp. Jn. 3 and 6) as offering a precedent for faith.

However, whereas John stresses belief as that which leads to life—a belief centering in Jesus as the Son of God—in Hebrews faith is paradoxical in nature in that it is a conviction of realities visible only to spiritual eyes. It is this that enabled the heroes and heroines of old to survive obstacles and inherit life. Thus the readers of this epistle are taught that faith involves confidence in God's availability and in his capability of seeing things through to a successful conclusion.

The humanity of Jesus is stressed perhaps more in Hebrews than in John. In Hebrews, the stress is upon his work as mediator, thus stressing the incarnation and Jesus' experience as a real person, "he learned obedience from what he suffered" (Heb. 5:8; cf. vv. 1–7; 2:5–18). In Hebrews, the OT priesthood is held up as God's provision for sins, which had a temporary effectiveness. In John, there is little concern for the priesthood as such, either past or present. The purposes of the two books are in contrast, as is easily apparent. John was written primarily to win the adherence of the masses to Jesus as Savior and Lord, whereas in Hebrews, the problem is to help the believers to be stabilized and not to abandon their faith in Jesus as their Lord. The danger confronting the recipients of Hebrews was a relapse into Judaism or indifference to the claims of the gospel. The danger in John was conformity to the spirit of the age that had a basic hostility to divine revelation because it cherished its own ways, its pride, and its prejudices, and did not wish to be disturbed.

The thought of the writers is quite distinct. In John, several ideas are kept in abeyance and wait to urge themselves upon the readers' attention; in the epistle to the Hebrews, however, the author has his argument well organized and moves from one thought to the other in steady sequence, rather than in a spiral, or cyclic, fashion. In Hebrews, there is greater concern with the subjective effects of the atonement in cleansing the conscience from dead works to serve the living and true God. In John, relatively less concern is placed upon personal sanctity of the believer and more upon calling his attention to Christ. In Hebrews, Jesus is the leader, the author, and perfecter of faith; in the fourth gospel, he is the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world and the One who is worthy of being king, but who deliberately rejected this role.

5. James and Jude. Parallels between the fourth gospel and the epistle of James are rare. Whereas John speaks of being born of the Spirit, James speaks of being brought forth by the word of truth—a different metaphor, but the same idea (Jas. 1:18). In James, relatively little attention is placed on the person and teachings of Christ and much upon the believers' conduct and attitude. To John, the crucial issue is entering by faith into the Christian fellowship, whereas in James there is an attempt to get Christians to be more than nominal adherents, to become sincere exemplars of the pure faith and of the wisdom that comes from above (Jas. 3:13–18).

Jude, like 2 Peter, is preoccupied with heresy and the SECOND COMING. The need for sound doctrine is stressed more prominently than in the Gospel of John.

IV. Background. The fourth gospel contains phrases and ideas that make an understanding of its background very important for adequate appreciation of its message.

A. OT. In the first half of the 20th cent., the prevailing view among critical scholars was that Greek thought was the dominant influence on the Gospel of John. Since then, however, there has been a growing recognition that the prevailing influence was Hebraic. This position has been vastly strengthened by the discovery of literature from the QUMRAN area that has many words and ideas paralleling that of John and that provides evidence that many of the assumed Hellenistic phrases and ideas were already in Palestine during the 1st cent. (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS).

The influence of the OT is very pronounced from the opening words of this gospel. The prologue is evocative of the Genesis account of CREATION with its description of the origin of light and life. Both Genesis and this gospel speak of all things originating with God through his word. The link between Genesis and John is doubtless Ps. 33, which states, “By the word of the LORD were the heavens made, / their starry host by the breath of his mouth” (v. 6). The psalmist continues, “For he spoke, and it came to be; / he commanded, and it stood firm” (v. 9). In John’s prologue, likewise, the word is the agent in creation. Also included in the first chapter of this gospel is the contrast between law and grace, Moses and Christ (Jn. 1:17–18).

Elijah and Isaiah are alluded to in John the Baptist’s conversation with the priests and Levites (Jn. 1:19–23). The LAMB OF GOD to which Jesus is compared by the Baptist (amnos G303, 1:29) probably refers to the sacrificial lamb of the PASSOVER, although C. H. Dodd thinks it has greater affinity to the warlike lamb of the Apocalypse (arnion G768, Rev. 5:6 et al.). The key to the answer is that the lamb is described as taking away the sins of the world. Doubtless, it is an allusion to the Suffering Servant of Isaiah (Isa. 53:7–12; cf. 1 Pet. 2:21–25 and see SERVANT OF THE LORD).

The influence of Jacob’s vision of the ladder reaching to heaven is reflected in Jesus’ prediction of a similar vision by his followers (Gen. 28:12; cf. Jn. 1:51). In this one chapter, Jesus is said to be greater than Moses, greater than Elijah, greater than the patriarch Jacob, and believed by Nathanael to be the Son of God and king of Israel (Jn. 1:49). He also is believed to be greater than the temple. The same idea is found in the synoptics but in a completely different context (Matt. 12:6; cf. Jn. 2:19).

Reminders of the Passover occur frequently in John, where it is explicitly stated that he attended this feast thrice during his public ministry. The discourse in Jn. 6, with its insistence that believers must eat the flesh of the son of God to have life, is based upon eating the paschal lamb on this occasion. The background of Genesis and Exodus is especially conspicuous in Jn. 3–6. Nicodemus is reminded of the serpent in the wilderness (3:14). The episode at the well near Sychar evokes memories of the patriarch Jacob and his purchase of the land near Shechem. The reference to the living water is a poignant reminder of their ancestors’ desperate need of water during their Sinai sojourn when water was sometimes miraculously provided, thus sustaining life. Chapter 5 introduces the Sabbath controversy and its background of the institution of the Sabbath in the Pentateuch. Even greater emphasis is placed upon the MANNA of the wilderness sojourn and its vastly superior counterpart in Jesus Christ (ch. 6). Thus Jesus tells his hearers that they are witnesses to a greater miracle than even were their fathers who ate the manna.

Water from the rock is recalled on the occasion of the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn. 7:38–39; cf. Lev. 23:34–36; Num. 20:10–13). The reference to the Spirit here and in Jn. 3:8 has striking affinity with Ezek. 36:25–27, where the outpouring of the Spirit and the bestowal of a “new heart” are predicted. The striking analogy of Jesus as the good shepherd recalls several OT passages (Ps. 23; Isa. 40:11; Jer. 23:1–4; Ezek. 34). The analogy of the vine and branches, descriptive of the relation between Jesus and his followers, is meaningful because of extensive use of this analogy in the OT (Ps. 80:8–13; Isa. 5:1–7; Ezek. 15).

The influence of Isaiah is perhaps slightly less in this gospel as compared with the synoptics, especially Mark, though John does allude to Isaiah's vision in summing up the nation's response to Jesus (Jn. 12:38–41). One misses, however, the connection between Isaiah's role of the Messiah and its fulfillment in Jesus' ministry (cf. Isa. 61:1–6; Lk. 4:18–20). There is less overt attention to prophecy and its fulfillment in this gospel as compared with Matthew. This author is not so much concerned with direct quotations as with allusions. OT influence is more implicit than explicit, but its influence is deep and pervasive. It is remarkable, however, that this author stresses Jesus' career, not so much as an explicit fulfillment of certain OT predictions, but as an event in which the OT is overshadowed by the glory incarnate in Jesus through whom came grace and truth, light and life. In Jesus, the glory of God is seen in human form in a manner that transforms all of life that responds to him.

In the epistle to the Hebrews, the "Christ-event" excels the OT by its greater amplitude and efficacy. In Paul, the gospel replaces the Torah both in time and in splendor. In John, the OT themes of glory, light, water, and manna are simply eclipsed by the splendor of the incarnate Son. Whereas Matthew goes from the OT to its fulfillment in Christ, John goes from the incarnation back to its antecedents in the old covenant.

B. Jewish literature

1. Rabbinic influence. The difficulty in ascertaining the extent of rabbinic influence on the fourth gospel arises from the fact that the teachings of the rabbis were not put in written form until the codification of the MISHNAH about A.D. 200. There is reason to believe, however, that the oral tradition behind this document extended, essentially in its extant form, back to the time of Jesus. The evidences that indicate a knowledge of Jewish exegesis on the part of the author of this gospel are quite impressive. His sentence structure is at times reminiscent of Jewish literature. This may be explained as due to the influence of the ARAMAIC LANGUAGE or to the influence of the OT. In any case, the Semitic influence can be seen clearly in the style of this gospel. In this respect, the evangelist stands closer to rabbinic usage than does either Paul or James. For example, in the use of the term law, John treats it much the same as tôrâ H9368 is treated in rabbinic writings of the rabbis. The evangelist, however, states that the incarnate Logos fulfills the functions of the Torah, but does it more effectively (Jn. 1:14, 17). Also, whereas the rabbis likened the Torah to water, wine, bread, and light, the evangelist links these concepts with Jesus.

The author's acquaintance with rabbinic exegesis is reflected also, for example, when Jesus was criticized for healing on the Sabbath (Jn. 5:16). A similar defense of circumcising a child on the Sabbath was used by Rabbi Eliezer ben Azariah. The rabbis maintained that if one of the 248 members of the body was healed on the Sabbath following circumcision, how much more is the healing of the whole body commendable. In the light of this, Jesus wondered why they were indignant at him for giving help on the Sabbath to the whole man (7:23). Moreover, the rabbis agreed that in his capacity as judge, God did not rest on the Sabbath day; God maintains his judicial activities continuously. In a similar fashion, Jesus said, "My Father is always at work to this very day, and I, too, am working," indicating that it was in his role as judge that he worked on the Sabbath (5:17, 30).

The rabbis taught that at the coming of the Messiah he would be hidden during his childhood and suddenly appear as a mature man ready to take control. Some thought he would be hidden in Rome, others, the N, or Paradise, or in the sea. Familiarity with this doctrine is reflected in the rabbinic statement, "When the Christ comes, no one will know where he is from" (Jn. 7:27). The necessity for two witnesses and the accused's right to be heard in his own defense also reflect a knowledge of Jewish law (7:51; 8:17). The author of this gospel must have heard these themes discussed in the synagogues.

2. Philo. Scholars have been particularly intrigued by numerous parallels of thought and word between PHILO JUDAEUS and the fourth gospel, especially the use of the term logos (word). Philo of Alexandria, who flourished during the time of Paul, reflects an intimate knowledge of Hellenistic literature and also of the OT. His concern was to combine the two by means of allegorization of the OT. The factors that have led many to conclude that the fourth gospel derived many of its ideas from Philo includes several considerations.

Both the evangelist and Philo emphasize light as symbolic of God. In Philo, the light of God is said to be the archetype of every other light (Dreams 1.75) reminiscent of the logos as the true light (Jn. 1:9). The conflict between light and darkness is also common to both. Philo observes that the Creator was aware of the essential conflict between light and darkness and parted them one from another by a wall of separation, evening and dawn being the boundary lines (Creation 9.33–34). Although both could have received the emphasis upon light from the OT, the conflict between light and darkness is less prominent in the OT than it is in either John or Philo. Both John and Philo spoke of water as symbolic of life. Both emphasized the role of God as Shepherd and King, perhaps because both were influenced by the OT. Many of the parallels can best be explained as both authors drawing from a common source, rather than the evangelist borrowing from Philo.

The differences are far more extensive than the similarities. The logos in Philo is impersonal; in John, personal. There is nothing in Philo comparable to the concept of the logos becoming flesh. Whereas John is interested in symbolism, he did not allegorize as did the Alexandrian philosopher. After weighing the evidence, it seems clear that the significance of Philo is not that of a source for the thought of the fourth gospel, but rather as an evidence of an audience to which the fourth gospel sought to appeal. John, therefore, was a witness not of Greek ideas but to Greek ideas.

3. Qumran literature. The discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS bears particularly upon the background of the fourth gospel, as they are contemporary. Particularly significant is the fact that the Qumran literature was written prior to A.D. 70, when the community was destroyed, presumably by the Romans. The numerous similarities between these people and their literature with that of the ESSENES, described by JOSEPHUS and others, has led a majority to conclude that the producers of the scrolls were in reality Essenes, the third of three sects mentioned by Josephus.

The Essenes at Qumran believed themselves to be children of light and members of the new covenant who were preparing in the desert for the coming of the Lord as urged by Isaiah (Isa. 40:1–5). The scrolls speak of the spirit of truth, as does the fourth gospel, and also stress in common with John the eternal conflict between light and darkness, truth and error. Like John, their dualism was a modified moral dualism, a conflict between the good and evil rather than a metaphysical dualism between matter and spirit. In both, the spirit is truth and is the vehicle of divine revelation (1QH XIV, 27; cf. Jn. 14:26; 16:13–15). The verbal similarities between the fourth gospel and the Qumran literature is greater by far than the parallels between John and the other books of the NT. This fact virtually compels one to conclude that the dominant influence on the fourth gospel is Hebraic rather than Hellenistic.

C. Pagan literature

1. Gnosticism. It has been the contention of Rudolph Bultmann that the chief external factor in the fourth gospel is Gnosticism of the early 2nd cent. Gnosticism was a complex eclectic system of religious thought. It was widespread throughout the ANE, especially during the 2nd cent. A.D. Previously, our knowledge of Gnosticism was dependent almost entirely upon the Christian apologists who looked upon it very negatively. Recent discoveries in Egypt, especially near NAG HAMMADI, have yielded Coptic papyri written by the Gnostics themselves. There are many verbal similarities, but few ideological similarities, between the Gospel of Truth, discovered in 1945, and the Gospel of John. One similarity is in the concept of the logos who, in John, enables the believer to know the Father and who is called the Savior because his work is that of redemption. The logos of the Gnostic writings, however, redeems not from sin but from error. The Secret Book of John (see JOHN, APOCRYPHON OF) states that foreknowledge gazed intensely into the pure light and gave birth to the spark of light, the only-begotten who revealed himself to the Father, the self-born. This work may have been produced before the end of the 1st cent. and provides additional evidence that the fourth gospel could easily have been produced within that century. In both cases, creation by way of the logos is affirmed.

Common to both John and the Gnostics is the emphasis upon KNOWLEDGE. Synonyms for knowledge appear frequently both in the first epistle of John and in the gospel. Divine life is said to come through the knowledge of God (Jn. 17:3). The Gnostics also stressed that knowledge is that which gives life. Like the classical Greeks, the Gnostics named knowledge as the supreme virtue, placing it above obedience or love. SALVATION was deliverance from ignorance rather than deliverance from sin. Those who were saved were those who professed knowledge or divine illumination. Salvation was not by faith but by insight. In John, however, the emphasis is upon belief, and knowledge was not regarded as an end in itself. Moreover, knowledge in the fourth gospel, like wisdom of the OT, is the knowledge of God, and it is something to which everyone may come by faith. It is not limited to a few.

There are, of course, interesting parallels between Gnosticism and modern Christian Science: in both, the emphasis is upon salvation from matter rather than salvation from sin—the main interest in religion centering in the realm of knowledge rather than in grace and faith. The same may be said for many facets of contemporary philosophical theology with its emphasis upon sophistication rather than on faith, love, and hope. In John, the emphasis is upon life—divine life clothed in humanity yet transcending it; not contaminated by proximity to the world and the flesh but transforming and redeeming it. It is a qualitatively different type of life, which may begin now by acceptance of the light and extends in unbroken sequence into eternity, into the life of God.

2. The Mandeans. This obscure Mesopotamian sect came to the attention of German scholars about 1920. The MANDEANS professed to be disciples of John the Baptist. Walter Bauer and Rudolph Bultmann compared statements in the three extant books attributed to them—the Book of John, the Ginza, and the Qulasta—with the fourth gospel, and concluded that John had borrowed from the Mandeans the concept of a Redeemer who descends and ascends for the salvation of mankind. Other parallels include that of the unity of Father and Son, the concept of the divine Shepherd, and the role of Son in bringing light. The parallels are rather impressive until one considers the contexts. Bultmann assumes that the Mandeans came from Palestine and that their writings antedate Christianity. F. C. Burkitt, C. H. Dodd, and others, however, have shown that neither of these assumptions is true. The evidence demonstrates that this literature came into existence after the rise of Islam (the spelling of John the Baptist follows the Koran rather than the NT). It is best viewed as an eclectic Gnosticism that borrowed elements from both Christianity and Islam, and therefore could not have influenced John's gospel.

V. Purpose, date, and author

A. Purpose. In modern discussion of the Johannine problem, interest has shifted from authorship to purpose. The ostensible purpose is clearly stated: it is to provide evidence upon which to base faith in Jesus Christ the Son of God with the view of obtaining life eternal (Jn. 20:31, although some interpret the statement to mean John wanted to strengthen the faith of believers). It is similar to the purpose announced in the first epistle of John, that of welcoming believers into the fellowship of the divine-human relationship (1 Jn. 1:3). John wrote his gospel with unbelievers in mind, in contrast with the author of Luke's gospel who wrote to instruct the believers (Lk. 1:4). It often has been observed that whereas Matthew had a Jewish audience in mind as he labored to show how OT prophecies were fulfilled in Jesus, and whereas Luke and Mark may have had the Gentile church especially in mind, the author of this gospel envisions a more universal audience, as seen in his emphasis upon such universals as light and life, bread and water, truth and error.

Beyond this explicitly stated purpose of the fourth gospel, modern scholarship has pressed further into the underlying purpose. Oscar Cullmann, for example, believes that the gospel was designed primarily for Palestinian Jews who were influenced by Greek culture. This argument is based upon the consideration that both the Hellenists and John's gospel had little enthusiasm for the temple and its worship (Acts 7:48; Jn. 2:13–22; 4:20–24). The visible evidence of God's presence in the temple, the SHEKINAH, becomes in John the glory resident in Jesus Christ (Jn. 1:14; 17:1, 24). In Cullmann's view, the synoptics reflect ideas held by Hebrew Christians, whereas the fourth gospel reflects those ideas prized by the Greek Christians. The fourth gospel, he believes, is designed to rehabilitate the latter. This intriguing hypothesis, however, rests upon rather scant evidence. W. C. Van Unnik, on the other hand, argues that the gospel is designed primarily for the Jews of the dispersion—a missionary book designed to convince Jews outside of Palestine that Jesus is the Messiah. He notes that the Johannine use of the term Messiah agrees with that of Paul, Apollos, and other evangelists as they labored among the DIASPORA (Acts 13:26; 17:2; 18:5, 25).

In the last decades of the 20th cent., scholars have focused attention on the historical context of the presumed Christian community associated with the apostle John at the end of the 1st cent. Some have argued, for example, that certain rabbinic decisions at the time excommunicated Jewish Christians from the synagogue, and that this event provides the real background to the story of the blind man in Jn. 9 (cf. J.L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth gospel [1968]). Others have proposed even more detailed reconstructions of the Johannine Christians and the groups with whom they supposedly were interacting, such as adherents of John the Baptist, Jewish Christians who would not break with the synagogue (cf. Nicodemus), and so on (cf. R. E. Brown, The Community of the Beloved Disciple [1979]).

However fascinating these theories may be, a sounder perspective is likely to be similar to that of Alan Richardson, who sees the author's purpose as that of supplementing the work of the synoptics rather than providing an alternative. The fourth gospel is a product of long reflection upon the synoptic tradition. John's purpose is not so much to present new evidence as it is to clarify the issues upon which the evidence will be either accepted or rejected. He writes not so much to inform the reader as to confront him with the necessity for a decision. He is concerned with the moral and spiritual relevance of gospel history to the issues of life for the reader and the world in general. John points up the issues on a “take it or leave it” basis, employing all his ardor and skill in the hope that the reader will accept the incarnate Son who lived among us and who now provides life for those who accept it.

B. Date. Christian tradition usually considered the gospel to have been written during the last decade of the 1st cent. This is based both upon internal evidence and patristic writings. The tradition (preserved, for example, by IRENAEUS) is that John the elder lived in EPHESUS until a very old age. The internal evidence is that the author had pondered for some time upon the mission and message of Jesus and then wrote an interpretive history based upon careful selection of Jesus’ deeds and words.

Critical scholarship at the end of the 19th cent. for the most part came to favor a later date for the gospel. This was a result of a new understanding of contemporary literature from the early centuries. Some scholars, after noting words and ideas that seem more congenial to Hellenistic ideas of the early 2nd cent., believed that the gospel was written by an unknown religious mystic and thinker who endeavored to present a hellenized version of early Christian tradition. The high percentage of theological material in this gospel, in contrast to the relative paucity of this in the Gospel of Mark, was explained as the result of the growth of tradition away from its historical source. Thus, in the words of F. C. Grant, the author “determined to make Jesus as un-Jewish, even as anti-Jewish, as possible” (The Gospel of John, 2 vols., Harper’s Annotated Bible 13–14 [1956], 1:7). A similar view is the basis for a revised edition of the gospel by D. D. Runes (The Gospel according to St. John [1967]).

A reaction to this extreme led to another extreme in which some scholars as early as 1922 thought of John as among the earliest of the Gospels because of its alleged Aramaic influence. Before the recent DSS discoveries, scholars like W. F. Howard (Christianity according to St. John [1946]) were pointing out the relative prominence of OT influence on this gospel. The Qumran literature proves that there is nothing in the fourth gospel that could not have been written in Palestine before A.D. 70 (R. M. Grant, Earliest Lives of Jesus [1961]). The independence of the fourth gospel is also indicated.

Another factor that argues strongly for an early date is the reflection in the gospel of the intense rivalry between church and synagogue. The hostility of the world that is luminous in every page is not the pagan world as such, nor is it the synagogue exclusively, but it is a basic hostility to the gospel which is seen first to stem from among the Jewish religious authorities, and which can be equally true of the Gentile world. It seems unlikely that the issues that are so prominent in this gospel, namely, the Jewish hierarchy and the temple, could be so prominent had the gospel been written after the fall of Jerusalem and the termination of temple worship. Prior to A.D. 70, these were the prime issues upon which the author of this gospel focused attention—in such a manner as to stress basic issues that have universal and perennial relevance.

C. Author. Among the authors that have been suggested from time to time are: Lazarus, whom Jesus raised from the dead; Nicodemus; the young man whom Mark reported as having fled naked from the scene of Jesus' arrest (Mk. 14:52); an unknown mystic of the 2nd cent.; JOHN THE APOSTLE; and John the presbyter of Ephesus. Evidence from early writers, specifically Papias and Irenaeus, favors the elder of Ephesus, who may well have been the apostle himself.

When both internal and external evidence is weighed, there seems no compelling reason to deny to John the son of Zebedee the honor of being its author. From internal evidence it is apparent that the author was intimately acquainted with the Palestine of the 1st cent., probably prior to the Jewish War of A.D. 66–70. This is confirmed by the Qumran literature. That the author was an eyewitness to the events reported is indicated by the inclusion of details that are not strictly relevant to the story. Psychologically, they can best be explained as reminiscences rather than the result of historical imagination. If he was an eyewitness, a process of elimination leaves the son of Zebedee as the most probable candidate. Another plausible theory is that a companion of the apostle wrote down his master's thought. This would help explain the writer's intimate acquaintance with Hellenistic thought forms. In any case, whether it represents the apostle's actual words, or the apostle's witness as recorded by a disciple, the fourth gospel does bear the evidences of apostolic authenticity.

However, its acceptance by the early church and its claim to credence rests on the "sheer power and attractiveness of its testimony to Christ" (Alan Richardson). In competition with it were many apocryphal gospels (see APOCRYPHAL NT I). In other words, it has won its way, not so much on the basis of its alleged apostolicity as upon its intrinsic worth.

D. John's gospel as history. To what extent is the portrait in the fourth gospel historically reliable? The older critics widely assumed that since John has more narrative, with less emphasis on activity, than the synoptics, especially Mark, it was more subjective and proportionately less valuable as history. More recently, existential hermeneutics has said that historicity is less important than the KERYGMA, or proclamation of faith. John, like other writers of the NT, demanded a faith based upon fact, upon observable and verifiable data (Jn. 20:27; 1 Jn. 1:3). Recent critical scholarship has swung to a less skeptical position with regard to the historical veracity of this account. At the same time it is apparent that this author was highly selective in his use of available material (Jn. 21:25). Whereas the synoptic writers were interested primarily in reporting the facts of Jesus' words and deeds, John's emphasis is upon interpretation of the events. He not only reports events, but also develops their significance. The author shows remarkable insight into the factors that help and hinder those who seek life eternal. The items selected for elaboration show the central importance of response in faith to Christ. The evidences of authenticity and apostolicity are so deeply ingrained in the gospel that the church generally agrees with the judgment of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA that this is preeminently the "spiritual gospel."

Scholars often have stressed the contrast between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith. See JESUS CHRIST III. As a reaction against existential hermeneutics, there was a renewed demand to ascertain the historical facts surrounding Jesus. Some currently argue that the important factor is the life of Jesus, bypassing the passion and resurrection; others emphasize that the "Easter faith" is not dependent upon the actual events of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. The Gospel according to John is careful to stress both the historical Jesus and the Christ-centered faith that emerges. This gospel is even more Christological than the other three. Whereas the synoptic accounts all agree as focusing upon Jesus' actual deeds and words, this one demands that the reader recognize the personality behind the deeds and words. For this reason attention is called not only to the idea of resurrection but to the fact that Jesus Christ is the resurrection and the life. Christianity is not only "the Way" (as in Acts) but here Jesus Christ is "the way and the truth and the life."

G.A. TURNER

John Mark. See MARK, JOHN.

John the apostle. Son of ZEBEDEE; after Simon PETER, second most prominent member of Jesus' twelve disciples. The amount of literature relating to John and his writings is very large in NT studies. More has been written about him and attributed to him than any of the other twelve apostles.

I. Sources. Most of the information about John the son of Zebedee comes from the NT itself. There is no mention of him in JOSEPHUS, but Christian literature of the 2nd cent. provides some additional and valuable data.

A. Sources that refer to John the apostle. The record of the first three Gospels states that John had a brother whose name was JAMES; his father Zebedee was a fisherman residing near CAPERNAUM on the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:21–22; Mk. 1:19–20; Lk 5:10). The mother of John is thought to be SALOME, for the third woman accompanying the two women to the tomb is called Salome in Mk. 16:1, while Matt. 27:56 describes her as “the mother of the sons of Zebedee.” In Jn. 19:25, the third woman at the cross is said to be the sister of Jesus' mother, hence Jesus and John would be first cousins.

The name of John appears on each of the lists of the names of the apostles in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 10:2; Mk. 3:17; Lk. 6:14). John and his brother James were termed Sons of Thunder by the Master (Mk. 3:17). John was among the three of the inner circle who were with Jesus at the raising of JAIRUS'S daughter (Mk. 5:37; Lk. 8:51), at the TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2; Lk. 9:28), and with Jesus in a portion of the Garden of GETHSEMANE (Matt. 26:37; Mk. 14:33). He was among the four who asked Jesus about the coming events (Mk. 13:3–4). The synoptic records present Peter as the leader of the apostles, with John and James as the next two influential ones. Only once is John mentioned alone in these sources, namely, when he asked whether they should forbid one who was casting out demons in the name of Jesus (Mk. 9:38; Lk. 9:49).

In Acts, James is in the background and John is ranked along with Peter as one of the two leaders in the apostolic circle. Peter was spokesman for the group (Acts 1–2). John was with Peter at the healing of the lame man (3:1–10), and was arrested and placed on trial with Peter (4:3–21); together they investigated the reception by the Samaritans of the word of God (8:14–25). The only reference to John in the epistles is in Gal. 2:9, where he, together with Peter and James (the Lord's brother), are referred to as “pillars” in the early church. The fact that John was alive during this period refutes a late tradition that he was martyred at the same time as his brother James (Acts 12:1–2).

Earliest patristic records make little mention of John, but he is very prominent in the records from the latter part of the 2nd cent. through the 4th. One of the earliest extracanonical sources was a Gnostic document titled the Acts of John (see JOHN, ACTS OF). This work contains a report of miracles and discourses attributed to the apostle John near EPHESUS. It tells of his return from PATMOS, a shipwreck, the healing of a certain Cleopatra and the raising of her husband to life, the destruction of the temple of Artemis, and many other tales. In it John tells of his early association with Jesus. It closes with an account of John's death, at which time he was thankful for his celibate life. The book is strongly Docetic in nature, quite at variance with the emphasis of the first epistle of John. No confidence can be placed in this document as a historical source for the apostle.

The earliest known exegesis of John's gospel is that of Ptolemaeus, of the school of Valentinus. Dated at approximately A.D. 150, it speaks of the fourth gospel as having been written by John, the Lord's disciple (Iren. Haer. 1.8.5). Another early commentator was a Gnostic named Heracleon who flourished in the latter half of the 2nd cent. In his commentary on Jn. 1:18, he implies that the author of this verse was a disciple of the Lord, namely, the apostle John. There is an indirect reference to John the apostle as the author of the fourth gospel in Tatian's DIATESSARON (c. 160). A writing sometimes referred to as the Secret Book of John is found in the Berlin Gnostic papyrus and in the recently discovered Gnostic library at NAG HAMMADI in Egypt (see JOHN, APOCRYPHON OF). It contains this interesting passage: "One day when John, the brother of James (these are the sons of Zebedee), went up to the temple, there a Pharisee...said to him 'This Nazarene deceived you'" (R. M. Grant, Gnosticism [1961], 69). Other Gnostic works, such as the Gospel of Philip, quote extensively from the fourth gospel but do not mention the author, the implication being that they believed John the apostle to be the author.

By far the most impressive of the early witnesses to John the apostle comes from IRENAEUS, who flourished in the last quarter of the 2nd cent. He testifies to a personal acquaintance with POLYCARP, bishop of SMYRNA, who had learned the gospel message directly from John and others who had seen the Lord. Irenaeus adds that after the three Synoptic Gospels had been written, "John, the disciple of the Lord who also had leaned upon his breast, did himself write a gospel during his residence at Ephesus in Asia" (Her. 3.1.1). He also states that, as reported by Polycarp, John saw CERINTHUS in the public bath and fled saying, "Let us flee, for Cerinthus, the enemy of the truth, is within." Irenaeus states that the church at Ephesus, founded by Paul, and the place where John remained until the time of TRAJAN (A.D. 98–117), is a true witness of the tradition of the church (Her. 3.3.4). Another witness is Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus (189–198), who states that "John, who also leaned on the Lord's breast, who was a priest wearing a mitre, and witness and teacher; he sleeps at Ephesus" (cited in Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 3.31.3). EUSEBIUS (c. 325) accepted and quoted this evidence as indicating John as author of the "undoubted writings of this apostle." He presents him as having lived to a very old age contemporary with the emperors Domitian, Nerva, and Trajan, and bishops Clement, Ignatius, and Simeon. This John, he concludes, wrote the fourth gospel, "read in all the churches under heaven," as an undoubted writing of the apostle. He adds that whereas the fourth gospel and the first epistle are undoubtedly the works of the apostle, the second and third epistles and the Apocalypse perhaps may be the works of others by the name of John (Eccl. Hist. 3.34.13).

B. Canonical books attributed to John the apostle. The date to be gleaned from the fourth gospel is dependent on whether or not references to the BELOVED DISCIPLE designate the apostle John. The identity of this individual has been widely debated, especially in recent times. Some say the Beloved Disciple was NICODEMUS; others that it was LAZARUS; while some believe it to be the MATTHIAS who was chosen by lot (Acts 1). Because the author of the gospel was evidently familiar with the inner circles of the apostolic twelve, the process of elimination reduces the possible candidates to only one, John the son of Zebedee.

This John is not mentioned by name in the fourth gospel, a phenomenon interpreted by many as another evidence that he is the author. He is named as one of the first two recruited by Jesus in the Jordan Valley where John the Baptist was ministering (Jn. 1:40). He is singled out at the Last Supper as the one reclining close to Jesus (13:23). The Beloved Disciple is mentioned at the Last Supper (13:23–26), at the cross where he was commanded to take Jesus' mother to his own home (19:26–27), at the empty tomb (20:2–10), and at the Sea of Tiberias, where he was the first to recognize the risen Jesus (21:7). The term again appears in connection with anxiety about the statement concerning his future (21:20–23). He is specifically stated to be the author of this gospel in the postscript (21:24).

The author of the first epistle likewise appears to have been an eyewitness (1 Jn. 1:1–3). If the apostle wrote the fourth gospel, it seems certain that he also wrote the first epistle. This is the easiest way to account for the high degree of similarity in language and ideas between the two documents. Common to both is the vocabulary of simple words, which include knowledge, world, witness, life, and truth. See JOHN, EPISTLES OF; JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

The author of the second and third epistles is said to be “the elder.” The evidence that this is written by the author of the gospel and the first epistle is somewhat less weighty than that for a common authorship of the gospel and the first epistle. On the basis of PAPIAS, quoted by Eusebius (Eccl. Hist. 3.34.13), the author of these two short letters as well as the Apocalypse could well have been another John.

The author of the Apocalypse describes himself simply as a fellow servant named John (see REVELATION, BOOK OF). He does not address his readers from the viewpoint of an apostle or even that of an elder, but rather that of a brother, a companion in tribulation. The style, likewise, is different from that of the epistle or gospel, as many from the time of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA on down have noticed. Those who reject the apostolic authorship of the gospel are more ready to admit it in reference to the Apocalypse, for the author of the Apocalypse seems to fit better the synoptic description of John as the “Son of Thunder” and as one who would like to command fire to come down to consume the noncommitted. Many think the same person could not have written books as diverse as the fourth gospel and the Apocalypse. But one cannot be sure that the difference of circumstances would in itself be sufficient reason for the change of style and imagery encountered in the Apocalypse. There are many other instances in history when widely diverse literary styles come from the same source, but under different circumstances. This may be seen, for example, in the works of Shakespeare, Milton, Luther, Kipling.

II. Life history. After sifting the sources and evaluating them, the life of John the son of Zebedee may be summarized in the following sequence. He was a convert of John the Baptist and spent some time with the proclaimer of the new covenant in the Jordan Valley. It was here that he met Jesus and transferred his allegiance from John to Jesus (Jn. 1:19–42). Some time after this, when John and his brother James had resumed fishing, they again encountered Jesus by the Sea of Galilee and at once decided to follow him (Matt. 4:21; Mk. 1:19–20; Lk. 5:10). The four partners, all fishermen, joined Jesus at the same time. They continued with Jesus through his Galilean ministry, witnessing the events reported chiefly in the Synoptic Gospels. He was chosen along with eleven others as one of the Twelve (Matt. 10:2; Mk. 3:17; Lk. 6:14). As indicated earlier, he was an eyewitness of the raising of Jairus's daughter along with James and Peter (Mk. 5:37; Lk. 8:51). He was one of the three with Jesus on the mountain when the transfiguration occurred (Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2; Lk. 9:28).

When enroute to Jerusalem, John became incensed at the hostility of a Samaritan village (Lk. 9:54). His mistaken zeal is indicated by his rebuke of the man who was casting out demons without Jesus' authorization (Mk. 9:38; Lk. 9:49). The two Sons of Thunder threatened their relationship with the other ten by seeking a favored position in the future kingdom (Matt. 20:20; Mk. 10:35; cf. Lk. 22:24). Just before the Passover, John and Peter were commissioned by Jesus to prepare a place for partaking of the Passover (Lk. 22:8). At the Last Supper, according to the Johannine account, it was the Beloved Disciple who, reclining close to Jesus, first learned the identity of the betrayer. However, he seems not to have passed this information on to Peter, who had requested the information (Jn. 13:21–26).

Later in Gethsemane, John, with Peter and James, went a little farther during the time of Jesus' agony (Matt. 26:37; Mk. 14:33). It is widely believed that the unnamed disciple who entered the court of the high priest with Peter was John the apostle (Jn. 18:15–18), because this disciple was known to the high priest. The Beloved Disciple again is seen as the only disciple who witnessed the crucifixion. In response to Jesus' request, this disciple took Jesus' mother into his own home (19:25–27).

This disciple is also mentioned as the first to recognize the significance of the empty tomb (Jn. 20:1–8). At the Sea of Tiberias he was the one who first identified Jesus on the shore and reported to Peter, "It is the Lord!" (21:4–7). The two are linked again in the episode following Jesus' remarks, "If I want him to remain alive until I return, what is that to you?"—which evoked much speculation as to its meaning (21:20–23). He is linked with Peter in several important episodes reported in Acts. He was a prominent member of the Jerusalem church when Paul visited it later. Nothing further is known about him until, according to church tradition (related chiefly through Irenaeus but with many corroborating witnesses), he was bishop at Ephesus. This literary evidence is supported by the remains of churches bearing his name at Ephesus. There he was remembered as a vigorous champion of orthodoxy, which fits the description of the first epistle. He is reported to have brought back to Christ an errant convert at the risk of his own life. His exile in Patmos during the last decade of the 1st cent. coincides with the persecution of DOMITIAN. A conflict between church and state reflected in the book of Revelation also seems consistent with this picture of John's latter days.

The apostle John, as seen in these sources, is one who maintained a high CHRISTOLOGY in stressing Jesus as the Son of God. He was thoroughly familiar with the OT and with Jewish culture in general, as seen in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts. His spiritual insight and maturity led to his inclusion in the inner circle on several occasions. This is consistent with the picture in the fourth gospel as one for whom Jesus had a special affection. On the negative side, John had an apparent ambition for preferential treatment. His reaction to the inhospitality of the Samaritans indicates a certain volatile nature, which could easily pass from righteous indignation to vindictiveness. As reflected in the fourth gospel, he is seen to be one who quickly acquired an acute understanding of the Hellenistic mind; his vocabulary demonstrates an ability to communicate to the sophisticated as well as to the simple. He tended to see things in simple terms of black and white, good and evil; there were few median shades of gray in his perspective. To him everyone was either for or against the Lord; either a child of God or a child of the devil; either a child of light or a child of darkness. Christian maturity brought a measure of gentility to his natural sanguine temperament so that he became preeminently the "apostle of love," as his first epistle bears witness.

These two elements in his nature continued apparently to the end. In the first epistle, perhaps the last thing he wrote, there is the emphasis upon love and life and a corresponding warning against heresy and sin. As reflected in the Apocalypse, he is the "Son of Thunder" living between two worlds, the world of the righteous who were overcome by their testimony, and the world of the wicked who persist in unbelief even under affliction. There is the same insistence on walking in the light and living according to the law of love. Thus he is seen to be a person with many facets, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, who was able to communicate his ideas in the medium of Hellenistic idiom to the intellectually elite of his day, yet who could speak to the simplest in such elemental terms as light, life, darkness, water, and bread. G.A. TURNER

John the Baptist (Βαπτὴς G969, called the "baptizer" [ptc. of βαπτίζω G966] in Mk. 6:14 and possibly in 1:4). Son of the priest ZECHARIAH and ELIZABETH; the latter was also of Aaronic descent and a relative of MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS (Lk. 1:5, 36). John was born approximately six months before the birth of Jesus (cf. v. 26). His youth was spent in obscurity until he received a divine call to the prophetic vocation (3:2) and entered upon a public ministry. After John placed his seal of approval upon Jesus (Jn. 1:24–36), their ministries overlapped for a short time. Soon after, John was arrested and put to death by Herod Antipas (Mk. 6:27; see HEROD V), leaving some disciples who had not joined Jesus' movement.

I. Importance. The NT places a very high estimate on John and his ministry. Jesus himself said of him, "I tell you, among those born of women there is no one greater than John" (Lk. 7:28). John was the forerunner of Christ (Mk. 1:2). His rite of BAPTISM became a central Christian ordinance (Acts 2:38). His imprisonment and death had a great effect upon Jesus (Mk. 1:14–15). The Master regarded him as the second ELIJAH sent by God in accord with ancient prophecy (Mal. 4:5; Mk. 9:13). He was the greatest figure yet produced under the old covenant (Matt. 11:11). He epitomized all the OT saints who stood at the threshold of the new order without entering in (Heb. 11:39b). He does not deserve the neglect the church often accords him.

His great importance lies in the fact that he bridged the old era and the new and was the link between the two. Neither Jesus nor John came preaching something absolutely new. Theirs was a word of fulfillment: “Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is near” (Matt. 3:2; 4:17). The long-awaited messianic day was about to dawn. The records of the birth of John make his role very clear (Lk. 1:5–25, 57–66, 67–80). He was to prepare a people for the Lord’s coming, and for that end would be filled with the HOLY SPIRIT. The whole narrative has a strong OT flavoring: the aged and childless couple, the angelic visits, the announcement of a child, the revealing of his name.

John was born into a pious Jewish home, grounded in the messianic promises of the Scriptures and looking for the hope of Israel. The parents were delighted with the baby John because he represented the rebirth of prophecy and the fulfillment of the eschatological hope. Psalms were sung to herald his birth. The theory that the BENEDICTUS (Lk. 1:67–79) was a hymn originally written to glorify Jesus but later applied to John is without foundation. Obviously, the first half of the hymn was directed to Jesus, of whose birth Zechariah was well aware (1:40), and the remainder of it exalted the preparatory role of John himself. The parents of John recognized from the outset the relative greatness of Jesus over John (1:41–45). And because Mary was related to Elizabeth, Jesus had not only a tie with the house of DAVID through Joseph (1:27; 2:4; possibly through Mary too—see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST), but also with the line of Aaron through both Zechariah and Elizabeth (1:5).

Radical criticism has sought to discredit the historical value of the birth narrative in Luke. The theory is widely held that the section was at first a document of the Baptist movement, embellished with legends, and exalting his position. The section is thought to have been interpolated by one or two Christian stories, but left largely intact. There is, however, a complete lack of any evidence for the hypothesis. The creation of a Baptist sect to which these hypothetical sources are credited is poor criticism. There is no indication in any but the latest MANDEAN sources, themselves valueless as history, that John regarded Jesus with hostility or envied his rising fame and honor. All the data suggests that both John and his followers welcomed the advent of Christ and readily gave way to his leadership. The argument is wholly circular, insofar as it discovers in the sect the alleged sources that are then attributed to it. This kind of criticism does not discredit Luke, but only the critics. The narrative in Luke bears all the marks of an authentic piece of historical tradition culled by the author in his research, which is generally credited with substantial accuracy. There was no motive in making John the son of an obscure priest if he was not. It is most unlikely that legends crept into the work of Luke, a first-rate historical source. Pessimism over his integrity is unwarranted and reflects an anti-supernaturalistic bias.

II. Ministry. Jesus held the ministry of John to be of the highest importance, because John was a part of the messianic complex of events that form the grand object of prophecy. He was called to be the great eschatological pioneer, the forerunner of the MESSIAH himself (see ESCHATOLOGY). Although he exercised his ministry just before Jesus did, and belonged to the time of promise, yet in another sense he belonged also to the time of fulfillment. John was the line of demarcation in the history of salvation. In him the future predictions of the OT began to find fulfillment (Matt. 11:10–15). Jesus strongly endorsed John’s ministry, indicating the close solidarity he felt with John’s calling. Although Jesus stated, “he who is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than [John]” (11:11), he did not intend to depreciate the greatness of John, who was foremost among the revered OT worthies, but rather to exalt the superb opportunities open to one who will partake of the messianic promises in Christ himself (cf. Matt. 13:17).

John entered dramatically onto the stage of history probably in A.D. 28 (possibly earlier; see CHRONOLOGY [NT]). Clothed in a cloak of camel’s hair and eating locusts and wild honey, he proclaimed to all who would hear the need for repentance and rectitude of life. He located in southern TRANSJORDAN, not far from JUDEA, in the uninhabited country bordering on PEREA, the realm of Herod Antipas. Everything about him recalled the prophet Elijah—his mantle, his living in the wilderness, his message—and people flocked to hear him. His food and clothing indicated his rejection of official Israel of the time and his conviction of a prophetic calling. Like the ESSENE community, John withdrew from society; but unlike them he sought to reform it by his preaching.

The wilderness represented more than a solitary place to John. It was the place to which Elijah had fled (1 Ki. 19:4), and the place where God led his people to the promised land. The wilderness was a place where the Lord revealed himself, and where some believed the Messiah would appear (Matt. 24:26). The setting only added to the excitement that John’s ministry stimulated among the expectant people of Judea. He did not go to the desert to hide from people. In fact he attracted large crowds (Lk. 3:10). The fourth gospel reveals that John’s ministry extended into Samaritan territory (Jn. 3:23). AENON near SALIM where John baptized people was probably near ancient SHECHEM (modern Nablus). Later, when Jesus spoke of entering into the labors of others (4:38), he was no doubt referring to the work of John. Both men were contemptuous of the “sons of Abraham” who rested so complacently upon their inherited election, and both made mission trips into foreign areas.

It is not easy to fit John into the pattern of Jewish sects and parties current at the time. With the discovery of the Qumran documents (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), a hypothesis has become popular that ties John in with the Essene community. Perhaps John, the son of aged parents, was left an orphan and adopted by the Essene community. The community was situated not far from John's home or from the place where he began to minister. By the time of his ministry, however, John clearly had broken any connection he might have had with them. Although it is true that similarities exist between John and the community, differences also exist, and the theory is entirely speculative. It would seem somewhat closer to reality to think that John made an attempt at following the profession of his father, being under a solemn obligation to do so as a son, but was so disgusted by the political machinations and corruption he encountered in the priesthood that he concluded Israel deserved the divine wrath. Whereupon he separated himself from official religion and called upon the Israelites to form a righteous remnant. John and Qumran practiced baptism, both saw their ministry in terms of the "voice" prophecy (Isa. 40:3), and both were ascetic, but the resemblance is superficial. On the other hand, the Qumran sect was a closed system in retreat from the world, and would have frowned upon John's efforts to convert sinners. The degree of anticipation was different. Qumran still waited for the Messiah to come; John knew he was already here. (See H. Stegemann, The Library of Qumran: On the Essenes, Qumran, John the Baptist, and Jesus [1998].)

The Jewish historian JOSEPHUS gives an interesting account of John the Baptist in his Antiquities (18.5.2):

But some of the Jews believed that Herod's army was destroyed by God, God punishing him very justly for John called the Baptist, whom Herod had put to death. For John was a pious man, and he was bidding the Jews who practiced virtue and exercised righteousness toward each other and piety toward God, to come together for baptism. For thus, it seemed to him, would baptismal ablution be acceptable, if it were not used to beg off from sins committed, but for the purification of the body when the soul had previously been cleansed by righteous conduct. And when everybody turned to John—for they were profoundly stirred by what he said—Herod feared that John's so extensive influence over the people might lead to an uprising (for the people seemed likely to do everything he might counsel). He thought it much better, under the circumstances, to get John out of the way in advance, before any insurrection might develop, than for himself to get into trouble and be sorry not to have acted, once an insurrection had begun. So because of Herod's suspicion, John was sent as a prisoner to Machaerus, the fortress already mentioned, and there put to death. But the Jews believed that the destruction which overtook the army came as a punishment for Herod, God wishing to do him harm.

There is no reason to doubt the authenticity of this passage in Josephus. It shows no mark of Christian invention or interpolation. Josephus presents John as a humanistic philosopher advocating virtue, but suppresses the messianic overtones to his ministry, just as one would expect from Josephus writing for Roman and Greek readers. Josephus merely supplements what is known already from the Gospels. His account brings out the political side to John's ministry as Herod saw it, whereas the Gospels emphasize the moral and religious side. Undoubtedly Herod feared the political consequences of John's popularity. His moral charges only added fuel to the flames. The testimony of Josephus reminds us that the memory of John lasted a long time after his death. (Another passage in the Slavonic version of Josephus is clearly a later Christian interpolation. See further E. Nodet, "Jésus et Jean-Baptiste selon Josèphe," in RB 92 [1985]: 321–48; 497–524.)

III. Message. John was a preacher who stood in the tradition of the PROPHETS, and he proclaimed the message God laid upon his heart. All of his preaching rings of OT imagery, content, and vividness. There is the winnowing fan, the threshing floor, the ax at the root of the trees, the brood of vipers, and a baptism with the Spirit. Prophecy was reborn in John's message, and people flocked to hear him. His message included ethical instruction, prophetic denunciation, and eschatological teaching. All of his recorded thought roots back to OT teaching. The novel aspect about his ministry was the urgency with which he announced the relevance of his theme. The KINGDOM OF GOD had drawn nigh (Matt. 3:2). The OT saints had longed for the advent of God's kingly rule over their nation for centuries; now its blessedness was about to be realized. The messianic claim is implicit in this announcement. John's prediction of a mightier one to come after him is repeated no less than seven times in one form or other in the NT (Matt. 3:11; Mk. 1:7; Lk. 3:16; Jn. 1:25, 27, 30; Acts 13:25). He was content to be the voice of one crying in the wilderness (Jn. 1:23). He pointed not to himself but to the One who would bear away sins and baptize with the Spirit (1:29, 33).

The good news was accompanied with severe denunciations of the status quo in Israel. Physical descent from ABRAHAM did not guarantee the favor of God. Spiritual kinship with God must be evidenced in daily life. Even as a Gentile needed to be baptized to become a proselyte to Judaism, so the Jews needed to be baptized to become a part of God's purified remnant of the latter days (Matt. 3:10; 21:31). It was the hour of universal judgment, beginning with the house of Israel and extending throughout the world. The imminence of judgment in John's preaching is plain. The work of judgment would belong to the ministry of the Messiah, whose purpose it was to destroy the wicked and purge the remnant of sin. When Jesus came preaching "the year of the Lord's favor" (Lk. 4:19), choosing to neglect the judgmental side of the prophecy in Isaiah (61:2), it gave John reason for pause. He hesitated for a time in his wholehearted support of Jesus' claims for himself because Jesus did not appear to be exactly the kind of Messiah he had expected. The explanation lies in Jesus' own understanding of his twofold coming. The kingdom was present in its mystery form (Matt. 13:11; Eph. 3:5) in advance of its APOCALYPTIC manifestation, which was still future. John shared the OT time perspective of prophecy, wherein the two comings of the Messiah were combined as one.

John followed his prophetic warnings about wrath with the appeal for REPENTANCE. A radical change of attitude resulting in a substantial alteration of life was demanded. His ethical instructions were exceedingly radical. When the multitude asked him what they ought to do to show their willingness to change, John gave some very harsh, practical steps to take. They ought to share their possessions with those who had none (Lk. 3:11). The tax collectors ought to keep their demands within just limits (v. 13)—a severe requirement because the job was not a pleasant one, and this policy could guarantee only the most meager earnings. The soldiers he asked to be content with their rations and to avoid all extortion and violence in the carrying out of their duties. He did not imply it was sinful to be a soldier. Forbidding pillaging of the local population could be a significant restriction at a time when the soldiers were extremely hard up and in need of money or food. John made no effort to make his ethical demands palatable. Clearly exhortation (parenesis) goes along with proclamation (kerygma). Repentance and FAITH is to be accompanied with a serious attempt to reform one's life. "Produce fruit in keeping with repentance" (Matt. 3:8). A genuine experience of grace must reveal itself in spiritual fruit.

IV. Baptism. The rite that John performed on penitent sinners was the outstanding feature of his whole ministry; yet he was by no means its originator. Its distinctiveness lay in the meaning John put into the act. Basically this had two facets: a messianic or eschatological orientation, and personal renewal in the life of the person baptized. John saw himself as a figure of the end times sent in accord with divine prophecy to set in motion the complex of events in which the Messiah would be revealed to Israel and the world. John's water baptism was a sign of a greater BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT that the Messiah would administer. At the same time, John was conscious of the unworthiness of Israel to receive her messianic King. He was no universalist—God would deal with his people, not some other—yet John rejected the notion that simply being a Jew was enough to insure divine favor. Repentance and reform of life were prerequisites to entering the Messiah's kingdom. Baptism was the first evidence of the sincere desire to alter one's way of behavior.

From what source did John derive inspiration for his practice and theology of baptism? Scholars such as M. Lidzbarski (Das Johannesbuch der Mandäer [1915]) have sought to relate John's baptism with that of the Mandeans, but there is a serious problem of chronology. The Mandaean sect arose centuries after the time of John and borrowed their rite from Nestorian Christians. Their esteem for John came in during the Islamic period. It is utterly impossible to detect any influence on John from such a source. Something of the same is true of Jewish PROSELYTE baptism. It is questionable whether the practice existed in the time of John. It may have had an influence upon later Christian practices, but cannot be used as a sure source for John's baptism. Differences also exist in essence. Proselyte baptism was politically and ritualistically oriented, whereas John's was eschatological and ethical. One needs to be very cautious in assuming that proselyte baptism gives a model for John's. The fact that it is not mentioned in the NT limits its usefulness. (See further D. Smith, "Jewish Proselyte Baptism and the Baptism of John," Restoration Quarterly 25 [1982]: 13–32.)

The most natural place to look for an antecedent is the OT itself. Ceremonial lustrations to effect PURITY are common in the ancient world and in the Bible. In Lev. 15, bathing in water is prescribed to cope with uncleanness. All forms of Jewish baptism sprang from such a source. It is unlikely that any real distinction was made between outward bodily cleanness and inward spiritual purity. The outer lustrations had deep spiritual significance. The believer ought to have “clean hands and a pure heart,” an inner purging with hyssop as well as outward ablutions (Pss. 24:4; 51:7). Ultimately, all baptism looks forward to the opening of a fountain that can cleanse from sin and uncleanness (Zech. 13:1).

The Qumran sect carried on their activities very near the place where John began his, which is often pointed out as the source of John’s rite and theology. The Qumran community practiced a kind of baptism or washing ritual for repentance. According to the Manual of Discipline (or Community Rule), such a ritual could have no effect unless accompanied with sincere repentance (1QS V, 13–14). There may be no distinction between inner and outer, but there is also no separation of the two. The practices at Qumran go a long way in providing a possible source for John’s baptism. The coincidence is striking, and a positive relationship may indeed have existed between them.

There are, however, important differences to note before assuming any substantial identity. John’s baptism was a once-and-for-all, final act of repentance, not to be repeated. There is no indication that the first baptism at Qumran was thought of as an initiatory rite. The whole tenor of John’s preaching was more urgent and eschatological than theirs. His message was offered to the whole nation, not to exclusive members of the sect. If he did borrow some of the ideas of Qumran, he altered them before use. More likely John saw his rite in terms of prophetic symbolism. The word of the Lord could be performed as well as preached. Adapting the practice of Jewish lustration to his purposes gave John the ideal instrument for putting his message before men. His baptism was a plenary cleansing from all sin and uncleanness, an eschatological act that united the penitent with the remnant Israel of the latter days.

V. John and Jesus. The earliest part of Jesus’ public ministry was spent in the circle of the Baptist. The fourth gospel makes this fact apparent. Theirs was one joint ministry. It is not simply that their work overlapped or that they worked in the same area, but rather that they shared a common outlook and concern. The cleansing of the temple (Jn. 2:13–22) shows Jesus putting into effect the terms of John’s prediction of purging and judgment. The first chapter in the ministry of Jesus is one of the closing chapters in the ministry of John, so closely related were they at this point. After his baptism, Jesus retired to the wilderness for fasting and prayer. Soon afterward, Jesus surrounded himself with a band of disciples and practiced baptism in Judea (1:35–51; 3:22). They carried on parallel ministries, both of them penetrating even into SAMARITAN territory. As Jesus’ fame grew, John’s diminished (3:30). While in association with John, however, Jesus remained in the background, concealing his identity from all but a few (2:24). At CANA only his mother knew the secret (2:3–4), but after Cana his disciples knew it also (2:11). Both Jesus and John claimed authority from heaven for themselves and for one another (Matt. 21:23–27). Soon after John was arrested and imprisoned in the fortress of MACHAERUS, Jesus began an open ministry in GALILEE (Mk. 1:14). John was able even in prison to keep in touch with the activities of Jesus through his followers (Matt. 11:2). He was concerned about the progress of the eschatological event he himself had announced.

A question arises as to the identity of John. When John was approached by the party from Jerusalem, and asked if he was the Christ or Elijah, he replied emphatically in the negative (Jn. 1:20–21). When Jesus ventured to reveal his evaluation of John, he affirmed unmistakably that John was Elijah (Matt. 11:14). Is it possible that Jesus regarded him as Elijah, whereas John did not? John certainly played the part of Elijah, both the historical and the eschatological figure. Could he have done so without modeling himself upon the pattern consciously? He knew himself to be the forerunner of the Messiah (Jn. 3:28). The answer must lie in the sense of the question posed to John. Although John lived in the spirit and power of Elijah (Lk. 1:17) and was called Elijah by Christ himself, he was not Elijah redivivus in a literal sense. Figuratively he was Elijah, and he carried out the functions of the forerunner, but he did not want to accept the Jewish interpretation of this figure. He preferred to designate himself simply as the “voice” (Jn. 1:23), because this title was not loaded with traditional misinterpretations.

VI. Death. The account of John’s death is the only major story in the Gospel of Mark that is not about Jesus (Mk. 6:17–29). It must have reached its place in the narrative after being preserved and told by the disciples of John who claimed his dead body (6:29). Many radical critics regard the story as legendary, containing merely a historical kernel. It is clear from both Mark and Josephus that Herod Antipas regarded John as a prime instigator in the messianic ferment that gripped Judea. When he heard about Jesus’ miracles, he thought John must have been raised from the dead (6:14). John constituted a political threat to Herod’s reign, and when John also criticized the morals of HERODIAS, his bride, Herod locked John in prison. There is nothing intrinsically unlikely in the story and nothing historically impossible. The death had an effect on Jesus himself. When he first heard of the arrest, he withdrew into Galilee, sensing danger to himself (Matt. 4:12); when he learned of John’s execution he went into a lonely place (14:13), doubtless to contemplate the dreadful meaning of this for his own future.

VII. Followers. As the prophets of old, John and Jesus both gathered a band of disciples (Isa. 8:14). Some of John’s disciples came to Jesus and joined his group (Jn. 1:35–42). In a short ministry of six months, John had gained great popularity. “The whole Judean countryside and all the people of Jerusalem went out to him” (Mk. 1:5). Loyalty to John’s memory was still strong several years later when Jesus played upon it to avoid answering a loaded question (Matt. 21:26). John trained his men in prayer (Lk. 11:1) and in fasting (Matt. 9:14). Although Jesus himself did not recommend fasting, he predicted that when he was taken away, his disciples would again fast (9:15). The Christian practice of fasting is found again in the DIDACHE (8.1).

Long after the death of Jesus, PRISCILLA AND AQUILA met a Jew named APOLLOS who was a disciple of John the Baptist and came from ALEXANDRIA (Acts 18:24–28), and soon after PAUL encountered a band of twelve of John’s disciples at EPHESUS (19:1–7). This indicates that John’s followers were fairly numerous and widespread long after his death. The two messianic communities were hardly in competition, because as soon as John’s disciples heard the gospel of Christ, they gladly accepted the message. The Gospels are plain in the conviction that Jesus had been under John’s ministry in the beginning and that he identified Jesus to be the One whose way he was called to prepare. Competition and rivalry are not the words to use in this context. The problem was one of complete correlation between the wide sections of support each man received separately.

There is no evidence of conflict between the two groups until much later, when the Clementine Recognitions were written (see CLEMENTINE LITERATURE). But it is not known whether this group could actually trace their roots back to John; it is possible that they simply adopt him as their patron saint because of their practice of baptism and their desire to outdo the Christian groups. Years later, Josephus could still write that many people in his day held to the theory that Herod suffered defeat because of his treatment of John, and this proves how deep a loyalty and impression John created in the minds of his contemporaries. Even today there exists a sect called the Mandeans that claims to perpetuate the movement begun by John the Baptist. Without doubt, John the Baptist was a profound influence upon the people of his day and upon the birth and growth of the church. His prophetic passion and burning zeal set the stage for the emergence of Jesus Christ.

Joiada joi’uh-duh (יֹדָדָה H3421, short form of יְהוֹיָדָה H3381, “Yahweh has known [i.e., has been concerned]”; see JEHOIADA). (1) Son of Paseah; he and Meshullam repaired the Jeshanah Gate (see OLD GATE) under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:6; KJV, “Jehoiada”). They are said to have “laid its beams and put its doors and bolts and bars in place.”

(2) Son of ELIASHIB and descendant of JESHUA the high priest (Neh. 12:10–11, 22). A son of his married the daughter of SANBALLAT the Horonite (Neh. 13:28; NRSV, “Jehoiada”). (See J. C. VanderKam, From Joshua to Caiaphas: High Priests after the Exile [2004], 53–54.)

Joiakim joi’uh-kim (יֹאֲכִים H3423, short form of יְהוֹיָכִים H3383, “Yahweh raises up”; see JEHOIAKIM, JOKIM). Son of JESHUA and father of ELIASHIB; all three held the office of high priest after the EXILE (Neh. 12:10, 12, 26). (See J. C. VanderKam, From Joshua to Caiaphas: High Priests after the Exile [2004], 45–49.)

Joiarib joi’uh-rib (יֹאֲרִיב H3424, short form of יְהוֹאֲרִיב H3384, “Yahweh contends [for me]”; see JEHOIARIB and JOARIB). (1) One of two “men of learning” who, with others, were sent by EZRA to search for Levites (Ezra 8:16). See discussion under ELNATHAN #3.

(2) Son of Zechariah and ancestor of Maaseiah; the latter was a prominent member of the tribe of JUDAH who lived in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:5).

(3) A man included among the “leaders of the priests and their associates in the days of Jeshua” (Neh. 12:6; cf. v. 7). He may be the same individual who is apparently described as the father of JEDAIAH (11:10 NRSV; the text may have suffered textual corruption, and the NIV dissociates the names of Jedaiah and Joiarib). Later, in the days of the high priest JOIAKIM, the head of Joiarib’s family was Mattenai (12:19; cf. v. 12). This Joiarib is probably the same as JEHOIARIB (1 Chr. 9:10). (See the discussion in ABD, 3:932.)

Jokdeam jok’dee-uhm (יֹקְדָם H3680, derivation uncertain). A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:56); it is usually identified with JORKEAM (1 Chr. 2:44). The precise location of Jokdeam is unknown, but it is listed with towns that lie approximately 4–10 mi. S and SE of HEBRON, so a few scholars have tentatively identified it with modern Khirbet er-Raq’ah, about one mile N of JUTTAH.

Jokim joh’kim (יֹכִים H3451, short form of יְהוֹיָכִים H3383, “Yahweh raises up,” i.e., “may Yahweh deliver”; see JEHOIAKIM, JOIAKIM). Son of SHELA and grandson of JUDAH; he and one (or more) of his brothers are said to have “ruled in” (or “married into”) MOAB and JASHUBI LEHEM (1 Chr. 4:22; the Heb. verb is bāʿal H1249, which means either “to rule over” or, more frequently, “to marry”). Some scholars believe that the words “and Jashubi Lehem” should be emended to either “but returned to Lehem” (so NRSV) or “and they resided in Bethlehem” (cf. G. N. Knoppers, 1 Chronicles 1–9, AB 12 [2004], 342–43).

Jokmeam jok’mee-uhm (יִקְמֵאם H3695 [also יִקְמֵאם], perhaps “the Kinsman [i.e., ancestral god] takes a stand [or establishes]”; see JEKAMEAM). A Levitical city within the tribal territory of EPHRAIM, allotted to the clan of KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:68; called KIBZAIM in the parallel list, Josh. 21:22); it is mentioned between GEZER and BETH HORON, which were in SW Ephraim, but its precise location is unknown. In addition, a town by the name of Jokmeam marked the border of SOLOMON’S fifth administrative district (1 Ki. 4:12; KJV, “Jokneam”); because it is listed after BETH SHAN and ABEL MEHOLAH, this town was probably in the JORDAN Valley, in E Ephraim, and it may be identified with modern Tell es-Samadi (some 12 mi. ESE of SHECHEM) or nearby Tell el-Mazar (but see Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 161, who thinks it possible that Tell el-Mazar is ATAROTH, in which case Jokmeam should perhaps be identified with Tell Sheikh edh-Dhiab).

Some scholars argue that both 1 Chronicles and 1 Kings refer to the eastern town (cf. Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 313); others believe that two distinct towns bore the name Jokmeam. Still others think that 1 Ki. 4:12 (which may have suffered transpositions) refers to a completely different town, JOKNEAM; if so, the spelling “Jokmeam” may be an alternate form or the result of scribal corruption (M. Cogan, 1 Kings, AB 10 [2001], 208, defends the textual integrity of the passage).

Jokneam jok’nee-uhm (יִקְנֵאם H3696, derivation uncertain). (1) A town in the tribal territory of ZEBULUN that served to mark its SW boundary (Josh. 19:11); it was assigned to the descendants of MERARI as a Levitical city (21:34; 1 Chr. 6:77). The king of this royal Canaanite city, said to be located in CARMEL, is included in the list of kings defeated by JOSHUA on the W of the Jordan (Josh. 12:22). This list probably includes the major cities that participated in the war as allies of HAZOR against Israel (see Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 223, 230–32). Jokneam is identified with Tell Qeimun, a mound located at the NW end of the plain of ESDRAELON, 7 mi. NW of MEGIDDO.

Jokneam was one of the fortresses that guarded the routes across Carmel. Although Jokneam was not on the main N-S trade route (VIA MARIS), it was on the branch of it that ran from Megiddo to the plain of Acco (Aharoni, The Land of the Bible, 52). It secured the only pass across Carmel which had access to the port of DOR, and it had the advantage of being the lowest of the passes in elevation. Jokneam appears as number 113 in a list of 119 towns captured by THUTMOSE III (written (n qn<sup>(m)</sup>). The route was considered by the officers of Thutmose as a possible alternate to the Megiddo route (Napoleon used the Jokneam route for his march against Acre/Acco). Intensive archaeological excavations, which began in 1977, have revealed destructions of the city both in the Late Bronze Age (late 13th cent. B.C.) and in the Iron Age (late 11th cent.), resulting from either military or natural disasters. Jokneam was subsequently resettled, and by the 9th cent. it was a well-fortified Israelite city. There is also evidence that it participated in international trade during the Persian period. (See A. Ben-Tor in ABD, 3:933–35; id. in NEAEHL, 3:805–11.)

(2) KJV form of JOKMEAM (only 1 Ki. 4:12).

Jokshan jok'shan (יֶשָׁן H3705, derivation uncertain). Son of ABRAHAM and KETURAH, and father of SHEBA and DEDAN (Gen. 25:2–3; 1 Chr. 1:32). Abraham sent the sons of Keturah to the E (Gen. 25:6), where they became the ancestors of Arabian tribes. Because the names Sheba and Dedan appear in the Table of NATIONS (10:7, 28), some identify Jokshan with JOKTAN (10:25–29), but etymological considerations speak against it (see F. V. Winnett, “The Arabian Genealogies in Genesis,” in Translating and Understanding the Old Testament, ed. H. T. Frank and W. L. Reed [1970], 171–96, esp. 189).

Joktan jok'tan (יֶשָׁן H3690, possibly from a root meaning “vigilant”). Son of EBER and descendant of SHEM, included in the Table of NATIONS (Gen. 10:25–29; 1 Chr. 1:19–23). His thirteen children are said to have lived from MESHA to SEPHAR (Gen. 10:30), probably referring to locations in SW ARABIA. Some see a connection between Joktan and Qaḥṭan, the latter reputed to be the ancestor of the S Arabian tribes (cf. J. Simons, The Geographical and Topographical Texts of the Old Testament [1959], 48–49). See also JOKSHAN.

Joktheel jok'thee-uhl (יֶשָׁאֵל H3706, possibly “God nourishes”; cf. JEKUTHIEL). (1) A town within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:38). Included in the S SHEPHELAH district, it was presumably near MIZPEH and LACHISH, but its precise location is unknown.

(2) Name given to the Edomite city of SELA by AMAZIAH, king of Judah, after he captured it (2 Ki. 14:7).

Jona joh'nuh. According to the KJV, the father of Simon PETER (Jn. 1:42). See JOHN #4.

Jonadab, Jehonadab joh'nuh-dab, ji-hoh'nuh-dab (יְהוֹנָדָב H3432, short form of יְהוֹנָדָב H3386 [2 Sam. 13:5; 1 Ki. 10:15, 23; Jer. 35:8, 14, 16, 18], “Yahweh is [or shows himself] willing [or noble or generous]”; cf. NEDABIAH). (1) Son of SHIMEAH (or SHAMMAH) and nephew of King DAVID (2 Sam. 13:3–5, 32–35). Scripture calls him “a very shrewd man,” and he used his craftiness to promote the incestuous lust of AMNON. The result was Amnon's rape of TAMAR, then ABSALOM's murder of Amnon, and ultimately civil war. The same Jonadab, however, at least for a time, evidently remained intimate with the royal household, for upon the death of Amnon, he reassured David that his other sons had not been killed. Some scholars identify Jonadab with Shimeah's son JONATHAN, who is credited with killing a giant (2 Sam. 21:21; 1 Chr. 20:7); others believe Jonadab and Jonathan were brothers.

(2) Son (or descendant) of Recab; he encouraged JEHU in the abolition of BAAL worship in SAMARIA (1 Ki. 10:15, 23 [“Jehonadab”]) and was the founder of a nomadic community (Jer. 35:6–19). For full discussion, see RECABITE.

Jonah joh'nuh (יֹנָתָן H3434, “dove”; Ἰωνᾶς G2731). (1) Son of Amittai; Israelite prophet. See JONAH, BOOK OF.

(2) One of the Levites who agreed to put away their foreign wives (1 Esd. 9:23; the parallel account has “Eliezer,” Ezra 10:23).

Jonah's ministry in Nineveh.

(3) Father of Simon PETER (Matt. 16:17). See JOHN #4.

Jonah, Book of. Fifth book of the Minor Prophets, attributed to Jonah son of Amittai, an 8th-cent. prophet of Israel. This little book of four chapters has been the subject of intense disagreement concerning its historicity and interpretation. The debate is occasioned primarily by the narrative's supernatural elements: the great fish, the repentance of NINEVEH, and the gourd and worm.

I. Background. Other than the mention of Nineveh and of Jonah, the contents offer little help in relating the book to its background. The events recorded in the book must have taken place prior to 612 B.C., when Nineveh was destroyed. Some evidence seems to support a date in the 8th cent., the period mentioned in 2 Ki. 14:25 in which Jonah the prophet lived. If this dating (to be discussed later) is accepted, then the historical situation would be that of the domination of the Assyrian empire over the ANE (see ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA) and the resurgence of the northern kingdom (Israel) during its golden age under JEROBOAM II. The supposed motif of the book—its implicit rebuke of narrow nationalism and its implicit appeal for the universality of God's love—would fit well into the historical era when the Assyrians were a feared and despised enemy. After Assyria had been vanquished, the book would not have carried as much weight to its own generation. In attempting to interpret its message, one can understand it perfectly by positing an 8th-cent. real life situation as the background.

II. Unity. Most modern scholars agree that the book is a unit, although some would prefer to think the psalm (Jon. 2:2–9) was written by someone other than the author of the narrative portions, and perhaps later as well. Since the psalm makes extensive use of the canonical psalms, some regard it as a “scissors and paste pot” composition. E. J. Young (Introduction to the Old Testament [1960], 281) points out that the chapter is essential to the book and that chs. 1–2 are balanced by chs. 3–4 (1:1–3a and 2:2 are paralleled respectively by 3:1–3a and 4:2). Some have objected that 2:1 is inconsistent with the content of the psalm, namely, thanksgiving. However, Ps. 86 is labelled “a prayer,” though it too contains thanksgiving. Others have objected to the thanksgiving psalm on the basis that being in the monster's belly would be no deliverance. However, the content of the psalm indicates that it gives thanks for deliverance from drowning, not for ultimate deposition on dry land. Otto Eissfeldt (The Old Testament: An Introduction [1965], 405) viewed Jonah as being composed of two legends: the first (Jon. 1–3) tells of Jonah's disobedience, while the second (ch. 4) tells of Jonah's controversy with God. More radical critics see three or more sources used in the composition of the book. This is a minority opinion not generally shared, even by those who reject the book's historicity.

III. Authorship. Traditionally, the book has been ascribed to Jonah son of Amittai, who lived during the 8th cent. B.C. He was born at GATH-HEPHER (cf. Josh. 19:13), in the territory of ZEBULUN, about 3 mi. NE of NAZARETH (cf. 2 Ki. 14:25). According to legend, he was the son of the widow of ZAREPHATH, and was the youth whom ELISHA sent to anoint JEHU to be the king of Israel.

Most modern scholars, other than conservative ones, reject the traditional belief that Jonah wrote the book. Among the arguments advanced against the thesis are the following: (1) The book itself does not claim he is the author. In rebuttal, one notes that the introductory formula (Jon. 1:1) is parallel to that used in Hosea, Joel, Micah, and Zephaniah, and close to that used in other prophetic books of whose authorship there is little or no debate. (2) The book refers to the prophet Jonah in the third person. Again, the introductory formula shows this to be common practice that can be seen in works attributed to Moses, Xenophon, and Julius Caesar. (3) The book is later than the 8th cent., therefore it cannot be by Jonah ben Amittai. The date of the book is discussed below. If objections to an early date are overcome, then there seems little reason to deny the authorship of the book to the prophet whose name it bears.

IV. Date. Acceptance of the book's authorship by Jonah would necessitate a date in the first half of the 8th cent. B.C. Events in Assyrian history, such as the trend toward monotheism in the reign of Adad-Nirari III (c. 810–783), or the great plague of the reign of Assurdan III (c. 771–754), would help explain the mass repentance. Gleason L. Archer (A Survey of Old Testament Introduction, rev. ed. [1994], 342) would date the book near the end of Jonah's career, c. 760.

A terminus ad quem for the book's composition would be 200 B.C., because Sir. 49:10 refers to "twelve minor prophets" and Tob. 14:4, 8 specifically refers to Jonah. Most critical scholars would date the book between 500 and 300 B.C. J. A. Bewer suggests a date in the Hellenistic period (300–200 B.C.), perhaps because he posits Joppa as the locale of the Perseus-Andromeda legend and sees reflections of that legend in Jonah (A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi and Jonah, ICC [1912], 403). The most frequently accepted late date is c. 450 B.C. (cf. S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament [1897], 322) although others opt for a date c. 350 B.C. (cf. W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, Introduction to the Books of the Old Testament [1958], 374).

Many arguments are advanced to support a late date. Among them should be mentioned the following: (1) Nineveh is spoken of as a city no longer in existence (Jon. 3:3). However, note the similar language in Lk. 24:13, though no one doubts that EMMAUS existed in the 1st cent. A.D. (2) The use of the phrase "king of Nineveh" would not be normal in the 8th cent., when "king of Assyria" would be the title employed. The OT, however, amply illustrates the former usage (cf. 1 Ki. 21:1 with 20:43; 2 Ki. 3:9, 12; 2 Chr. 24:23). (3) The general thought and ideas of Jonah presuppose that the author knew the great prophets. Examples cited include Jon. 3:10 (cf. Jer. 18:7–8); Jon. 3:5 (cf. Joel 1:13–14); Jon. 3:9 (cf. Joel 2:14); and Jon. 4:2 (cf. Joel 2:13). The evidence is far from overwhelming that Jonah borrowed from Jeremiah, and the comparison with Joel begs the question of whether or not Joel is late. (4) It is further argued that the ideas found in the book are late, designed to rebuke the exclusivism shown by such writers as Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The concept of missionary universalism (cf. Isa. 40–66) is said to be postexilic. Aside from the petitio principii error of the reference to Isaiah, this argument ignores the fact that universalism is found in the prophets prior to the EXILE (cf. Amos 9:7). (5) Since the psalm of thanksgiving of Jon. 2 reflects the canonical Psalms, it is inferred that this passage is not original and must be dated late. Modern linguistic discoveries, however, show how the canonical Psalms reflect earlier Canaanite literature, which contradicts any such late dating of Psalms as was popular in the first half of the 20th cent. (6) The use of Aramaisms in Jonah is said to prove its late date because ARAMAIC vocabulary and usage infiltrated the HEBREW LANGUAGE in the exilic and postexilic periods. Archer (Survey, 345, 348) has carefully refuted specific examples of Aramaisms sometimes given to support the late date.

The tendency to date the book late appears to be based on the theological bias that the book is a rebuke of postexilic exclusivism and hypernationalism. These traits are seldom completely missing in any nation in any period. The late date seems predicated upon a religionsgeschichtliche approach to the content of Jonah. It leaves the student with the haunting question, “If Jonah was not written by the 8th-century prophet, why was it admitted to the canon?”

V. Occasion and purpose. It would seem evident that the book was called forth by God’s concern for the spiritual welfare of the great city of Nineveh. Some would also see another factor at work, namely, God’s concern for his chosen people who needed teaching and admonition which the prophet accomplished through the events recorded in the book rather than by direct oracles or prophetic utterances.

Various scholars have seen different purposes for the book of Jonah. One suggestion (advocated by Eduard Riehm) has been that it was written as an apologetic: it explains that prophecy of doom is conditional (cf. Jer. 18:7–8). Some think the book is didactic: it was written to teach that God’s forgiveness is available to all upon the basis of individual fear of Yahweh and repentance; God’s mercy is not limited to Israel. Others view the book as a parable whose purpose is to drive home to Israel her sin in her national failure to fulfill God’s mission among the nations. Related to this view is the idea that the book is basically a missionary tractate, designed to break down Hebrew particularism and exclusiveness (cf. Jon. 3:10; 4:11), of which Jonah himself is an example; his spirit is akin to that of Nahum, who expects God to destroy Nineveh in the 7th cent. A serious objection to this view is that it leaves unexplained Jonah’s message of judgment. One brief clause (“Forty more days and Nineveh will be overturned,” Jon. 3:4) calls for unrelieved doom, not the offering of God’s grace to the Ninevites. Young (Introduction, 280) denies this universalistic purpose and stresses instead the element of predictive history in the book, but such a view deprives the book of meaning for its first readers. As in many literary works, so in Jonah, the purpose may be manifold, not limited to a single idea.

VI. Canonicity and text. Since the book is mentioned during the intertestamental period as one of the twelve prophets, there seems to have been an early acceptance of it as canonical. The Hebrew text of Jonah is well preserved. The language is clear, classical Hebrew, with a few Aramaisms that some consider late, but Aramaic influences are found in preexilic times. The SEPTUAGINT adds little to our understanding of the text. Some scholars think Jon. 4:5 is misplaced and belongs after 3:4.

VII. Literary form. Various students have placed Jonah in widely different literary genres. Traditionally, it has been listed as history (except Jon. 2). In the 19th cent. the tendency arose to view the book as allegory, parable, or pure legend. It is evident that the book does not follow the pattern of the other prophetic books that are collections of oracles. Rather, it is a story about a prophet, similar to the ELIJAH cycles in 1 Kings. There are partial parallels to personal history being embedded in prophecy in the experiences recorded by the prophets Hosea, Isaiah, and Ezekiel.

Those who view the book as ALLEGORY frequently identify the following elements: Jonah is disobedient Israel; the sea is the Gentile world (the dispersion); the great fish is Babylon (cf. Jer. 51:34, 44); the three days is the captivity; the gourd is Zerubbabel (cf. A. Bentzen, Introduction to the Old Testament, 2nd ed., 2 vols. [1952], 2:146). Archer (Survey, 343) criticizes this approach: "If the whale represented Babylon, what did Nineveh represent? As for the ship...it is hard to see what this would correspond to in the allegory; nor is it clear why three days should be selected to represent seventy years of captivity." Allegory, by definition, is supposed to be worked out in all details. It seems evident that Jonah does not fit the definition.

The view that the book is legend or myth was advocated by T. K. Cheyne. Oesterley refuted the mythological interpretation that the great fish was Tehom (the deep, i.e., the salt sea), pointing out that in Jonah the sea is not looked upon as evil. Others have viewed the monster as a reference to NEBUCHADNEZZAR. While there are supernatural elements in the Jonah story as there are in MYTH, these supernatural elements may be interpreted historically rather than mythically.

Those who look upon Jonah as a parable appeal to passages such as 2 Sam. 12:1–4; Isa. 5; Lk. 10:25 – 37. This approach interprets the book as parabolic of how God will yet act in history (cf. Matt. 24:32–33). Another view is that the book is part of a sermon in which certain events, either actual or fictitious, are narrated to impart a spiritual truth much as a modern minister may use anecdotes of actual or imaginary events to drive home his points. Thus Jonah would be an early example of a midrashic homily.

Finally, the view most commonly espoused by conservatives is that the book is history. Except for Jon. 2, the book is concerned exclusively with events that happened in the life of Jonah. Although there is some indication of the general tenor of the theology of the writer in the book, the only point of the story driven home is that suggested in 4:10–11. Since the historicity of the book has been the subject of extensive debate it deserves separate treatment.

VIII. Historicity. Many critics deny the historicity of Jonah. Usually this is done because of the supernatural elements in the story. These include the great fish that swallowed Jonah, the conversion of the whole city of Nineveh, the gourd prepared to shelter Jonah, and the worm that destroyed the gourd. For all these objections to the supernatural the response must be to ask whether God is limited by his creation or is free to supervene in the operation of so-called "natural laws."

The arguments for the late date of the book also are used to support the thesis that the book is not historical. These arguments include the use of the phrase "king of Nineveh" (Jon. 3:6), and the use of the past tense, "Nineveh was a great city" (3:2; Archer [Survey, 344] would translate the verb, "had become"). Other arguments against the historicity of Jonah have included the following:

(1) The enormous size of Nineveh. However, the text simply says Jonah took three days preaching on street corners, not that the city required three days walking to traverse it. The city, including its suburbs, may have had a population of about 600,000; the administrative district covered a much greater area. It has also been argued, however, that the text speaks of Nineveh's importance and that therefore the "three days" refers to the time needed for a proper diplomatic visit (cf. NIV).

(2) The sudden repentance of the people. As indicated above, there were at least two incidents in the 8th cent. that would provide a suitable background for wholesale repentance. Modern missionaries to Muslim peoples have experienced similar phenomena. Nor should any limit be put upon the working of God's Spirit. According to a different view (D. Stuart, Hosea-Jonah, WBC 31 [1987], 494), the repentance of the Ninevites did not involve spiritual conversion to Yahweh, but a mass movement of mourning and reform such as is otherwise attested among pagan nations generally.

(3) The great fish. This element has been the prime target of arguments against the historicity of the book. Accepting the supernatural—"the Lord provided a great fish" (Jon. 1:17)—removes this difficulty. Some have attempted to make the story more credible by references to modern seamen who have been rescued after spending hours in the stomachs of denizens of the oceans (e.g., cf. A. J. Wilson in PTR 25 [1927]: 630–42).

The historicity of the book has been upheld by some outstanding scholars in the 19th cent. as well as almost all conservative scholars of the 20th cent. In addition to refuting the arguments for the nonhistorical character of the book, most advocates of its historicity point out that from early times the Jews regarded it as historical (cf. 3 Macc. 6:8; Tob. 14:4, 8; Jos. Ant. 9.10.2 §§208ff.). These scholars also point out that Christ regarded the book as historical (cf. Matt. 12:39–40; 16:4; Lk. 11:29). In the first passage from Matthew, there is no MS evidence of interpolation in the text as some have claimed. A careful comparison of Jn. 3:14 and 1 Cor. 10:1–11 would indicate that the formula Christ used in referring to Jonah ("as...so") was used in referring to historical events.

IX. Content and outline. The chapter divisions of the English versions of Jonah follow the natural thought of the book. The first chapter tells of Jonah's call to go to Nineveh and declare the city's doom, but Jonah disobeyed and boarded a ship bound for TARSHISH (or "a refinery ship"). A violent storm arose at sea, and it abated only after the sailors threw Jonah overboard, having cast lots to determine the culprit. Jonah was then swallowed by a great fish and remained in its belly three days and three nights. The second chapter gives a psalm of deliverance uttered by the prophet within the belly of the fish, and concludes with his being deposited once more on dry land. The following section tells how Jonah was recommissioned to proclaim Nineveh's doom, went to the city, and preached in it for three days. The result was a wholesale repentance of the city, king and commoner alike, so that even the beasts were clad in garments signifying repentance. The last chapter tells how Jonah was angry because God had "changed his mind" (cf. Jon. 3:10 NRSV) about destroying Nineveh because it had repented, how a GOURD (prob. a ricinus, castor bean plant) was prepared to shelter Jonah from the intense near eastern sun, and how the worm was sent to destroy the plant so that Jonah might be taught the lesson of God's love for a city—even as Jonah mourned over the withering of the gourd.

Some have seen in the book of Jonah a detailed TYPOLOGY of Christ. In some items this typology has been positive, in some details it has been a typology of contrast. (1) Both Jonah and Christ have a special commission (cf. Jn. 3:17). (2) Jonah was disobedient, Christ was perfectly obedient. (3) Both are involved in a storm at sea. (4) Jonah sacrificed himself, so did Christ (but Jonah was not blameless). (5) The great fish was a figure of death: Christ suffered a literal death and burial. (6) The cry from the fish's belly is parallel to Christ's "My God, my God, why...?" (7) The deliverance from the fish's belly is paralleled by Christ's resurrection on the third day. (8) Jonah's mission to Nineveh after his metaphoric death and resurrection is typical of Christ's successful postresurrection preaching.

Jonah also has been taken by most premillennialists to be typical of Israel. (1) He was called to witness to Gentiles. (2) Jonah suffered a disaster in a great storm as Israel suffered disaster in rejecting Christ. (3) Jonah, like Israel, did not deny his people or his God. (4) Jonah's grave was the belly of a fish, while Israel's grave is among the nations. (5) Jonah cried out to God as Israel will do at the end of time. (6) As Jonah was delivered from the fish, so Israel will be given a national resurrection. (7) Jonah preached to Nineveh, so Israel will be God's witness (Rom. 11:12, 15).

The book of Jonah may be called biographic typology. Some view the book as predictive history. It is predictive of Christ, who was sent by the Father, suffered entombment, was resurrected, and preached salvation for "all the world." It is predictive of Israel, who was a trouble to the Gentiles (as Jonah was to the sailors), was a witness to them, but was cast out by Gentiles and miraculously preserved for twenty centuries to be God's missionaries at the end of time (Zech. 8:7–23).

The book may be outlined as follows:

1. God's commission: Jonah's disobedience (Jon. 1)
2. God's care: Jonah's deliverance (Jon. 2)
3. God's renewed commission: Jonah's obedience (Jon. 3)
4. God's concern: Jonah's petulance rebuked (Jon. 4)

X. Theology. The book of Jonah offers some insights into the theology of the writer. He viewed God as having universal rule (vs. the henotheism so prevalent in the ANE). God is in all places—the land of Zebulun, the sea, Nineveh. He is also among all nations—the Israelites, the sailors (Phoenicians?), the Assyrians. He offers mercy and forgiveness to all. The terms of forgiveness for Nineveh are the same as for Israel—repentance. One notes, too, that the book freely depicts the openness of GENTILES to the message of Yahweh. The sailors hearken to his command to cast Jonah overboard. The Ninevites (as the Samaritans in the Gospels) are open to God's message. A third major topic of the book's theology is the inference that Israel (and the church) is responsible for proclaiming God's message, and must leave the results to God. Some have inferred that Jonah's reluctance to go to Nineveh was rooted in his belief that the message would bring repentance (which as an ardent nationalist he did not want to see happen).

Jonam joh'nuhm (“יוֹנָם G2729). KJV Jonan. Son of Elikaim, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:30).

Jonan joh'nuhn. KJV form of JONAM.

Jonas joh'nuhs. (1) KJV Apoc. and NT form of JONAH.

(2) According to the KJV, the father of Simon PETER (Jn. 21:15–17). See JOHN #4.

Jonathan jon'uh-thun (יוֹנָתָן H3440, short form of יְהוֹנָתָן H3387, “Yahweh has given [a child]”; the longer form is almost twice as common, but is almost always rendered “Jonathan” in English Bibles; see also JEHONATHAN). A very common name among the Israelites in all periods.

(1) Firstborn son of King SAUL and heir apparent to the throne of Israel (however, cf. J. Morgenstern in JBL 78 [1959]: 322–25, who argues that Jonathan regarded David as the legitimate successor because the latter was both a hero and Saul's son-in-law). Jonathan is first mentioned as the commander of one-third of the forces of Israel (1 Sam. 13:2), so it may be assumed that he had earlier proved himself in his father's service (perhaps against the Ammonites at JABESH GILEAD, 11:1–11). His contingent of 1,000 troops was at GIBEAH of BENJAMIN, while Saul himself commanded a larger detachment of 2,000 troops in MICMASH (13:5). Jonathan had initiated action by striking the PHILISTINES at GEB A (13:3). He either killed the “prefect,” the officer of the Philistines, or destroyed a Philistine “garrison” by means of a surprise attack. Either event would have been sufficient to bring down wrath from the Philistines, who viewed the act as a revolt by the Israelites and thus mustered their forces to put down the uprising (13:5). Saul called for the mobilization of the militia (13:4), but most of the people either hid in caves, holes, cisterns, and tombs, or fled across the JORDAN to the E (13:6–7). Saul was forced to fall back from Micmash.

All the forces of Israel were at Geba when Jonathan and his armor-bearer decided to probe the Philistine defenses (1 Sam. 14:1). How much time had elapsed during the period of inactivity is indefinite, but Saul had waited at least seven days for the appearance of SAMUEL. The Philistines had sent out three raiding parties to the N, W, and E. This was probably intended to harass the tribes of Israel and to scatter Saul's forces before he was in a position for a decisive encounter. Jonathan crossed over the deep and precipitous Wadi es-Suweinit, which separates Geba from Micmash. Through a predetermined sign—the response of the Philistine sentries—Jonathan ascertained the will fell upon the Philistine camp, killing about twenty men (14:8–14).

The confusion in the camp alerted Saul and his remaining force of 600 men, and they, together with some of the Israelites who had been pressed into service by the Philistines (1 Sam. 14:21), and with others who came out of hiding (14:22), pursued the Philistines who fled via the BETH HORON pass. During the engagement, Saul laid an oath on the people that none should eat anything until evening, and until he was avenged on his enemies (14:24). Jonathan, ignorant of the oath, ate some honey he found along the way (14:27). His act prevented the function of the oracle, and his sin was discovered (14:27, 42). Saul would have killed his own son, but the people ransomed him (14:45).

Although Saul was engaged in constant warfare with MOAB, AMMON, EDOM, the kings of ZOBAB, and the Philistines, nothing more is said concerning the military exploits of Jonathan until he met death with his father and brothers (ABINADAB and MALKI-SHUA), on Mount GILBOA. His sterling character is manifest, however, in another warfare—the warfare for prestige and popularity between his father and DAVID. Jonathan met David soon after the latter’s successful encounter with GOLIATH, and he “became one in spirit with David, and he loved him as himself” (1 Sam. 18:1). No other friendship has surpassed that of his for David. He had nothing to gain by his unceasing devotion, but everything to lose.

At least three covenants between Jonathan and David are recorded. (a) At the first meeting, Jonathan made a covenant with David and sealed it by presenting his clothing and armor to David (1 Sam. 18:3–4). Later, when open hostility broke out between Saul and David because of David’s continued military success and his growing popularity, Jonathan intervened and brought about a temporary reconciliation (19:1–6).

(b) Eventually, however, Saul again decided to rid himself of his rival by direct means. Jonathan, apparently unaware of Saul’s intentions, was approached by David in an attempt to ascertain the reasoning behind Saul’s action. Jonathan’s guilelessness and naïveté are clearly evident when he confidently asserts, “Look, my father doesn’t do anything, great or small, without confiding in me” (1 Sam. 20:2). By means of a plan devised by David, Jonathan learned the real intent of his father and relayed this information to David. A second covenant arose out of this meeting that stressed David’s attitude toward Jonathan and his descendants. Jonathan acknowledged that David would be the next king, and he wished David to swear that he would have mercy on his house (20:14–17). David kept this covenant and proved himself true to his friend.

(c) The third covenant is mentioned only briefly (1 Sam. 23:18). David was an exile hiding in the wilderness of ZIPH at HORESH. Despite his father's known enmity toward David, Jonathan visited him there. He stated clearly that David would be the next king and claimed that his father Saul also realized this fact. The covenant was renewed and the friendship sealed again.

Though in a very difficult position, Jonathan remained true to David until that fateful day when he also proved his undying devotion to his father on Mount Gilboa. David summarized it well when he wrote, "In life and in death they were not divided" (2 Sam. 1:23 NRSV). The men of Jabesh Gilead rescued the bodies of Saul and his sons from the walls of BETH SHAN and gave them a burial worthy of heroes (1 Sam. 31:11–13). Later, David removed the bones of Saul and Jonathan from Jabesh Gilead and buried them in the tomb of KISH, in ZELA of Benjamin (2 Sam. 21:12–14). Jonathan was survived by only one son, MEPHIBOSHETH (4:4; originally, Meribbaal, 1 Chr. 8:34); two sisters, Merab and Michal (1 Sam. 14:49); and a brother, ISH-BOSHETH (2 Sam. 2:8; originally, Ishvi, 1 Sam. 14:49, or Eshbaal, 1 Chr. 8:33).

(2) Son of GERSHOM and grandson of MOSES (Jdg. 18:30; the MT inserts the letter n into the name mōšeh, "Moses," and vocalizes it mēnaššeh, "Manasseh," clearly an attempt to distance the descendants of Moses from idolatry). He is apparently to be identified with the Levite from BETHLEHEM of Judah who traveled to the hill country of Ephraim and was installed by MICAHA as his household priest (17:7–9). Jonathan was discovered by five spies from the tribe of DAN who recognized him and made use of his divinatory ability (18:2–6). Later, when some of the Danites migrated to the N, they stopped again at the house of Micah, stole the cultic equipment accumulated by Micah (including an EPHOD, TERAPHIM, and "an idol of cast metal" [NRSV; NIV, "a carved image and a cast idol"]), and talked the willing Jonathan into becoming priest for the entire tribe of Dan (18:14–20). A sanctuary was established at Dan, a site formerly called Laish; see DAN (PLACE). There Jonathan and his descendants served as priests until the fall of Israel to the Assyrians in the 8th cent. B.C. (18:29–31). Perhaps the intention of the author is to indicate how far removed this worship was from the established religion of the ancestor Moses.

(3) Son of ABIATHAR the priest (2 Sam. 15:27). With AHIMAAZ the son of ZADOK, he acted as a courier for DAVID during the revolt by ABSALOM. The young men waited at EN ROGEL (17:17) for word brought by a maidservant concerning events in Jerusalem, and this word they carried to David at the fords of the Jordan. Later, when ADONIJAH proclaimed himself successor to his father David, Jonathan carried word to the celebrants at En Rogel that King David had ordered SOLOMON anointed king at GIHON (1 Ki. 1:42–45).

(4) Son of Shimei (2 Sam. 21:21 NRSV; Shimea in 1 Chr. 20:7), David's brother. This Jonathan killed a giant from GATH who had six fingers on each hand and six toes on each foot. Some identify him with JONADAB son of Shimeah, but it is more likely that they were brothers. This Jonathan should not be confused with the son of Shammah (#5, below), since this latter was not a Bethlehemite, but perhaps he may be equated with the "uncle" of David (#8).

(5) Son of Shammah the HARARITE, included among the Thirty, David's elite force (2 Sam. 23:33 [the MT lacks the words "son of"]); identified as son of Shagee in 1 Chr. 11:34).

(6) Son of Jada and descendant of JERAHMEEL, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:32–33).

(7) Son of Uzziah and overseer of the provincial storehouses (treasuries) in the country, towns, villages, and watchtowers during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:25).

(8) Uncle of David, described as "a counselor, a man of insight and a scribe" (1 Chr. 27:32). According to the RSV and other translations, both he and Jehiel son of Hacmoni were in charge of the king's sons, but it is likely that the Hebrew attributes that responsibility only to Jehiel. Because the word for “uncle” (dôd H1856) can be used less specifically of kinship on the father’s side, some have proposed that here it means “brother’s son” and that therefore this Jonathan should be identified with #4 above, the son Shimei.

(9) Father of Ebed; the latter was head of the family of Adin and returned to Jerusalem from the EXILE with fifty of his clan and EZRA the scribe (Ezra 8:6; 1 Esd. 8:32).

(10) Son of Asahel; he and “Jahzeiah son of Tikvah, supported by Meshullam and Shabbethai the Levite,” apparently challenged Ezra’s instruction that those who had married foreign women should divorce them (Ezra 10:15; cf. 1 Esd. 9:14). The Hebrew text, however, can be understood differently. See discussion under JAHZEIAH.

(11) Son of Joiada, descendant of JESHUA, and father of JADDUA, all of them postexilic high priests (Neh. 12:11). Some believe that the text should read “Johanan” rather than “Jonathan” (cf. v. 22). See JOHANAN #8.

(12) Head of the priestly family of Malluch (KJV, “Melicu”; NRSV, “Malluchi”) during the high priesthood of Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

(13) Son of Shemaiah, descendant of ASAPH, and father of Zechariah; the latter was one of the Levitical musicians who took part in the procession celebrating the rebuilding of the wall (Neh. 12:35).

(14) A secretary during the reign of King ZEDEKIAH of Judah; Jonathan’s house was used as a prison in which JEREMIAH was confined for a time (Jer. 37:15, 20; 38:26).

(15) Son of Kareah; he and his brother JOHANAN were among those who joined GEDALIAH at MIZPAH (Jer. 40:8). The NRSV, following the SEPTUAGINT (as well as the parallel passage, 2 Ki. 25:23), omits the name of Jonathan.

(16) Son of MATTATHIAS and Maccabean leader. Surnamed Apphus (1 Macc. 2:5), Jonathan succeeded his brother Judas as head of the Judeans in 160 B.C. (9:28–31), became high priest in 152 (10:18–21), and was killed in 143 (12:48). According to one interpretation, Jonathan is the “Wicked Priest” mentioned in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. Full discussion under MACCABEE II.D. (See J. C. VanderKam, From Joshua to Caiaphas: High Priests after the Exile [2004], 251–70.)

(17) Son of Absalom; he was sent by SIMON MACCABEE to occupy the city of JOPPA (1 Macc. 13:11).

(18) A priest who led in prayer at a sacrifice organized by NEHEMIAH (2 Macc. 1:23).

Jonathas jon’uh-thus. KJV Apoc. variant of “Jathan” (Tob. 5:13; NRSV, v. 14).

Jonath-elem-rechokim joh’nuth-ee’luhm-ri-koh’kim (יְהוֹנָתָן אֱלֵמֶרְחֻקִּים). KJV transliteration of a Hebrew phrase that probably refers to a musical tune (Ps. 56 title; NIV, “To the tune of ‘A Dove on Distant Oaks’”). See MUSIC VI.

Joppa jop’uh (יָפוֹ H3639, יָפוֹ [Ezra 3:7], “beautiful [city]”; Ἰόππη G2673). KJV also Japho (Josh. 19:46). A coastal city c. 35 mi. NW of JERUSALEM; it served as the seaport for the Israelite capital. Joppa was the only natural harbor on the Mediterranean between Egypt and Acco (NT Ptolemais). A rocky cape projected into the sea and, since its elevation was about 125 ft. above the sea, it made an ideal military and commercial site. Reefs formed a rough semicircle c. 300 ft. to 400 ft. off the shore but boats could enter from the N. Nearby were sandy beaches where shallow craft could come ashore. Two good springs supplied the city with water. The land around the city was very fertile. The site today is known as Jaffa and is a suburb of Tel Aviv.

The first historic reference to Joppa is in the list of Palestinian cities captured by THUTMOSE III, 1472 B.C. Joppa remained one of the key Egyptian administrative cities in Palestine from that time until the Israelite invasion. It is mentioned twice in the TELL EL-AMARNA letters. It was then allied with Jerusalem. In the Papyrus Anastasi I of the 13th cent. B.C., Joppa was described as surrounded by beautiful gardens, and her craftsmen were specialists in working metals, wood, and leather. At the time of JOSHUA'S conquest, the city was assigned to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:46). The Danites were soon displaced by the invading PHILISTINES, who made Joppa their N seaport, but it was not one of their major political centers. After DAVID'S conquest of the Philistines, Joppa was restored to Israel. SOLOMON made it the port of reception for the cedar log rafts brought down from the LEBANON mountains for use in the new temple-palace complex he was building at Jerusalem (2 Chr. 2:16).

The next reference to Joppa is Jon. 1:3. The prophet JONAH was commanded to preach to NINEVEH, but he refused to obey. Instead, he went to Joppa and boarded a ship sailing to TARSHISH (prob. a city on the Atlantic coast of Spain near the mouth of the Guadalquivir River). This historic episode is best dated about the time of SHALMANESER III. In 743 B.C., TIGLATH-PILESER III invaded PHILISTIA, capturing GAZA and its major fortress. Joppa must have fallen to him in this campaign. In 701 SENNACHERIB came to S Palestine to put down a revolt against his Assyrian empire. HEZEKIAH of Judah was one of these rebels. According to Sennacherib's record of this campaign, Joppa is one of the cities he destroyed. It is not known when the city was rebuilt, but by the time of EZRA this commercial port was again in service, and the cedar logs from Lebanon needed for the new temple at Jerusalem were rafted to Joppa (Ezra 3:7). About the 4th cent. B.C., the Persian king gave Joppa and the adjacent farmland to Eshmunazar, king of SIDON. Later, Sidon revolted and was destroyed by Artaxerxes III; Joppa probably became a free city at that time.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT favored the city, for he changed its name from Hebrew Yapho to Greek Ioppē, a new name that honored the daughter of the Greek god of the Winds. Alexander also established a mint in Joppa. After his death, the city was fought over by his successors on several occasions. In 301 B.C., PTOLEMY took the city. Joppa remained Egyptian until 197, when it became a part of the Seleucid empire (see SELEUCUS). Joppa had a brief but complex military history in the Maccabean period. At Joppa, ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes landed his army with plans to enforce the hellenization of Jerusalem, where later he plundered the temple. Judas MACCABEE later burned the harbor, but the city was too strong to be captured. Jonathan, however, did capture it, although he soon lost it. Simon finally made it an all-Jewish city. After POMPEY captured Palestine in 63 B.C., he declared Joppa a free city. Julius CAESAR returned it to the Jews in 47, but ten years later HEROD the Great captured the city when he established his reign. Because of the city's continued hatred of him, Herod built a magnificent new port at CAESAREA, c. 40 mi. N of Joppa.

Old photograph (1905) of the coastal town of Joppa. (View to the S.)

Joppa was one of the earliest cities to have a Christian congregation. Its most famous member was Tabitha (DORCAS). She was the church's best social worker, and was raised from the dead by PETER (Acts 9:36–42). Later, Peter was again at Joppa visiting at the home of Simon the tanner where he was called to preach to the centurion CORNELIUS at the rival seaport of Caesarea (10:1–48).

Joppa was one of the centers of the first Jewish revolt, and it was destroyed in the early days of the war by the Syrian proconsul, Cestius Gallus. The citizens re fortified the site, but it was again destroyed. It was then replaced by a Roman army camp in A.D. 68. Some of the Roman coins struck in honor of the Romans' victory over the Jews portray the destruction of the Jewish fleet at Joppa. (See S. Tolkowsky, The Gateway of Palestine: A History of Jaffa [1925]; Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 25 and index; ABD, 3:946–49; NEAEHL, s.v. Jorah jo'hri (יֹרָה) H3454, "[born during] autumn rains"). Ancestor of a family of 112 members that returned from exile with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:18; called HARIPH in Neh. 7:24 and Arsiphurith in 1 Esd. 5:16).

Jorai jo'hri (יֹרִי) H3455, perhaps "[whom] Yahweh teaches" [cf. BDB, 436]). Son of Abihail; he was one of seven relatives from the tribe of GAD who occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:13; cf. vv. 10, 14).

Joram jor'uhm (יֹרָם) H3456, short form of יְהוֹרָם H3393, "Yahweh is exalted"; see JEHORAM). KJV also Jehoram (1 Ki. 22:50; 2 Ki. 3:1). (1) Son of Tou (Toi) king of HAMATH; he was sent by his father with presents to DAVID "to greet him and congratulate him on his victory in battle over Hadadezer, who had been at war with Tou" (2 Sam. 8:10). The name here is thought by some to be a corruption of HADORAM (found in the parallel passage, 1 Chr. 18:10), but Joram may be its Israelite equivalent (that is, using an abbreviated form of Yahweh rather than the pagan name HADAD; cf. A. Malamat in JNES 22 [1963]: 1–17, esp. 6–7).

(2) Son of AHAB and ninth king of the northern kingdom of Israel (2 Ki. 1:17 et al.). See JEHORAM #2.

(3) Son of JEHOSEPHAT and fifth king of the southern kingdom of Judah (2 Ki. 8:16–19; 2 Chr. 21). See JEHOSEPHAT #3.

(4) Son of Jeshaiiah; his descendant Shelomith was a Levite who shared the supervision of DAVID'S treasury (1 Chr. 26:25).

(5) According to the SEPTUAGINT, a brother of TIBNI (1 Ki. 16:22); this information is missing in the MT, but some scholars consider the Greek text to reflect the original.

(6) A captain over thousands in the time of King JOSIAH (1 Esd. 1:9; called "Jozabad" and described as a Levite leader in 2 Chr. 35:9).

Jordan jor'duhn (יַרְדֵּן H3720, derivation uncertain; Ἰορδάνης G2674). The major river of PALESTINE, which begins at Mount HERMON in the N, flows through the Sea of GALILEE and ends at the DEAD SEA in the S. The most popular etymology for the name is from the Hebrew verb yārad H3718 ("to go down"), thus, "The Descender." Other suggestions include: the HURRIAN word for "water" (iar); the Hebrew verb for "judge, bring justice" (dîn H1906, thus, "the river is the judge," reflecting an ancient practice of throwing a suspected criminal into the river—survival meant that the "judge" acquitted him); the city of Dan, which is near one of the river's sources (chronological considerations militate against this). See DAN (PLACE). In Arabic it is called esh-Sheri'a, "the watering place."

I. The river itself. The Jordan loses altitude rapidly. From the confluence of its major tributaries to Lake Huleh is a distance of 7 mi. and a drop of 140 ft.; from Huleh to Galilee is 10.5 mi. and a drop of 689 ft.; and from Galilee to the Dead Sea, 60 mi. to the S, it drops another 610 ft. to nearly 1,300 ft. below sea level.

A. The sources. There are four sources for the Jordan, all of which are near Mount Hermon. The easternmost of these is Nahr Banias. Banias is named after the pagan god Pan who was worshiped near where the water issues forth to form the river c. 1,200 ft. above sea level. It is the CAESAREA PHILIPPI of the Gospels (Matt. 16:13; Mk. 8:27). To this day, niches for the statues of the ancient pagan deity can be seen. This stream flows some 5 mi. before joining the waters of the Nahr el-Leddan. The Leddan begins at a spring called (Ain Leddan, near the ancient city of Dan (both names having the same element in them), known today as Tell el-Qadi. Dan and Mount Hermon were the northernmost points of the Promised Land (Jdg. 20:1; Deut. 4:48; et al.). The third source is the Nahr Hasbani. It begins 1,700 ft. above sea level from a spring in the western slopes of Mount Hermon and flows 24 mi. before joining the others about a half mile below their confluence. The fourth and westernmost source is the Nahr Bareighit, which joins the Hasbani just before it merges with the others. The Bareighit contains a spectacular waterfall, although it is not as large a river as the others.

B. *The upper Jordan. The Jordan River enters what has been called Lake Huleh, a large swampy area c. 4 mi. long. It is never more than 15 ft. deep. JOSEPHUS (War 3.10.7; 4.1.1) calls it Lake Semechonitis. In modern times the government of the State of Israel drained and reclaimed this malaria-infested area and made it a wildlife sanctuary. Some have associated this lake with the Waters of MEROM (Josh. 11:5), but that is probably erroneous.

The Jordan exits the Huleh basin from the S and flows rather quietly for 2 mi. At this point the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters, on the old highway to DAMASCUS, crosses the Jordan. Then the river enters a gorge that is steep and rugged and has many rapids. About one mile above the Sea of Galilee the river levels into the plain. Finally it empties into the lake, which is 690 ft. below sea level and a mere 10 mi. or so from Huleh. The Jordan carries with it a certain amount of silt, but it is a very fresh stream compared with what it becomes by the time it empties into the Sea of Salt, another 600 ft. below the Mediterranean.

C. *Galilee. Kinnereth, to use its OT name, is an amazing and beautiful lake (see GALILEE, SEA OF). The Jordan enters it as a small stream and leaves it a considerably more formidable river. There are no other major streams entering the lake; the additional water comes from underground springs. Swimmers in the lake learn this quickly as they discover hot and cold currents warming and then chilling them.

The lake is beautiful, first because it is so blue—a fact that can be explained by its great depth, which in one place is 150 ft. It is also beautiful because of its setting—a framework of brown hills dotted with green, especially on the W. It is amazing because of its altitude, 690 ft. below sea level; because of the storms that can quickly enrage it; and because of the variety and uniqueness of the fish that swim and are caught in it. The Sea of Galilee is c. 12.5 mi. long and 8 mi. wide at its widest point.

D. *Tributaries of the Jordan. After leaving Galilee, the Jordan encounters no more lakes until its absorption into the Dead Sea, 65 mi. to the S as the crow flies. There are, however, several notable tributaries or WADIS (from the Arab. term; in Heb., naḥal H5707). The northernmost of these and the largest is the YARMUK. This mighty river nearly doubles the volume of the Jordan when it joins it just 5 mi. S of Galilee. It was called by the Greeks Hieroumax, and it drains much of GILEAD and

The Jordan River.

BASHAN, modern Syria, and N TRANSJORDAN. The Jordanians have diverted much of the water into a hydro-electric plant and thence into an irrigation canal that parallels the Jordan. High above the S bank of the Yarmuk is the village of Umm Qeis, which contains the remains of the biblical GADARA, one of the DECAPOLIS cities.

About 4 mi. below the Yarmuk, the Wadi Bira (Naḥal Tavor) contributes its water to the Jordan. Waters running off Mount TABOR to the W and from the NAZARETH region make up this stream. At nearly the same latitude the Wadi Arab joins the Jordan from the E. It is the second of eleven perennial streams which flow into the Jordan from Transjordan. The Wadi Tayibeh is the next one down from the E, and the Naḥal Harod (Jalud) next from the W. The latter was made famous by GIDEON, who had his men drink from the stream to determine which men to dismiss from the army (Jdg. 7:5–8). The Naḥal Harod flows very near BETH SHAN and drains the N side of Mount GILBOA. Just below Harod is the Bridge of Sheik Hussein, still unused because the Jordan is the international boundary. The Wadi Jurm flows past PELLA into the Jordan from the E c. 5 mi. below the bridge.

In about 5 more mi. the Wadi Yabis empties its waters into the Jordan. Although the river is not mentioned in the Bible, it bears the same name as JABESH GILEAD, which one might expect to find near this stream. It drains the northern “dome” of Gilead. Five miles farther on, the Jordan welcomes the rather insignificant water of the Wadi Malih, flowing from the W. Two more smaller streams flow from the E, the Wadi Kufrinji and the Wadi Rajib; their mouths are c. 5 mi. apart.

About 40 mi. from the Sea of Galilee is the biblical JABBOK, called Wadi Zerqa in Arabic. It actually has its beginning near Amman, makes a huge bend N and then W to the Jordan, and thus it provided the E border for ancient AMMON. It flows through the valley that separates N and S Gilead. Near its mouth is the biblical Adam, modern Damiya (Josh. 3:16), where the waters stopped for JOSHUA. See ADAM (PLACE).

Near the biblical TIRZAH (1 Ki. 15:21 et al.) is an 'Ain Far'ah, which is the beginning of Wadi Far'ah, the next stream to contribute to the Jordan. It flows in from the W c. 7 mi. S of the Jabbok. The Jordan twists and turns for many miles before the waters of Wadi Mallaha join it from the W. Below that stream c. 5 mi. is the Wadi Nimrin, which is just above the Allenby Bridge. Neither the Nu'eima nor the Qelt, which run above and below JERICHO, can be called rivers; but when they contain water they release it into the Jordan near that ancient and modern city. Then from the E comes the southernmost tributary, the Wadi Abu Gharaba, which flows into "The Descender" just 3 mi. before it finally levels and loses itself in the Sea of Salt.

E. The Dead Sea. The Jordan River ends its 250 mi. journey in the depths of the DEAD SEA (120 mi. in a straight line). By then it has reached the lowest level of any river on earth—c. 1,290 ft. below the "face of the sea," as the expression is in Hebrew. This makes the Salt Sea the lowest body of water in the world. It is c. 1,300 ft. deep in places, thus making those points c. 2,600 ft. below sea level (by no means the deepest hole in the earth). In addition to the Jordan, two other rivers enter from the E—the ARNON (Wadi Mojib), about halfway down its 60-mi. length, and the ZERED at the S end. From the W are the little streams coming from EN GEDI and 'AIN FESHKAH, the latter being the water supply for the QUMRAN community (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS).

The Dead Sea has no outlet except by evaporation. Over the millennia, the mineral and organic content have risen to more than twenty percent. Nothing lives in the "Sea of Lot," as the Arabs call it. In Josephus's day the salts, tars, and other solids dissolved in the water gave it the name of Lake Asphalt.

II. The river valley. In several respects the Jordan River has no peers. It is the lowest river on this planet. It had some of civilization's earliest settlers on its banks. It is the central river in a land hallowed by three major world religions. For its size, it is one of the most overplayed, famous, and sentimental rivers in the world.

A. The Great Rift Valley and the structure of the Jordan Valley. Beginning in Lebanon to the N, a natural N-S cleft in the earth first separates the Lebanon from the Antilebanon mountains. Farther S, that cleft is filled by the Jordan River and the Dead Sea for c. 150 mi. It continues southward through the Wadi ARABAH, the Gulf of AQABAH of the RED SEA, and even into Africa as far S as Tanganyika. The Jordan Valley is the most spectacular section of the Great Rift Valley.

The mountain range in Palestine reaches a height of 3,000 ft. at HEBRON. On the Transjordanian side the plateau exceeds 4,000 ft. in several places. Separating these heights are the Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea, sinking to 1,290 ft. below sea level. The distance from the spine of Palestine to the heights of GILEAD or MOAB averages 25 mi. Within this greater rift is the Jordan Valley, called the GHOR by the Arabs. The Jordan Valley varies in width from nearly 15 mi. at its mouth to c. 5 mi. near Galilee. The upper Jordan flows through some even narrower canyon-like passages. Within the Ghor is the Zor, or flood plain. This half-mile wide inner valley is flooded at harvest time (Josh. 3:15) and is always luxuriant with heavy bushes. It was in these thickets, particularly in the southern part, that lions roamed in olden times (Jer. 49:19). Within the Zor, the river winds in a serpentine fashion. Air photographs clearly show the courses of abandoned channels and the many oxbow loops of the river.

The soil of the valley is generally inhospitable to growth. It seldom rains in the valley, which is dotted with shallow, chalky-gray marl hills. Remains of ancient aqueducts and other irrigation systems are visible up and down the valley. Today there is no extensive AGRICULTURE except in the N just below the Sea of Galilee.

The temperature of the southern Jordan Valley is torrid in the summer. It may not go below 100°F many nights. This same weather makes Jericho a resort town in the winter. Students of botany and biology find much of the plant and animal life of the valley related to African species.

B. Cities in the Jordan Valley. The names of most of the abandoned cities in the Jordan Valley are not known. There are native names for some of the tells, but these usually are based on some obvious feature of the site or some relatively modern happening or personage. The events of the Bible, ordinarily a major source of such information, took place when habitation of the valley was thin and inconsequential.

The oldest and best known valley cities are JERICHO in the S and BETH SHAN in the N. Both of these sites date to the Chalcolithic Period and older, and both played important roles in the OT. Jericho also was inhabited in NT times and is still a prominent city today. It is almost due E of Jerusalem and due W of Amman, and its location near the southernmost ford of the Jordan has contributed to its importance over the years. Beth Shan (Herodian Scythopolis and modern Beisan) is more removed from the river but lies in the basin of the Nahal Jalud toward the SE end of the valley of JEZREEL (see ESDRAELON).

A major excavation at Beth Yerah, near where the Jordan leaves the Sea of Galilee, produced Bronze Age artifacts. This town is not mentioned in the Bible. Two biblical towns of the Jordan Valley appear in Egyptian execration texts. They are REHOB just S of Beth Shan (Num. 13:21 et al.), and ZARETHAN (Josh. 3:16) N of Adam at the Jabbok's mouth. Pehel, or PELLA, is mentioned in the same Egyptian texts. Although Pella is not in the Bible, it played an important role in NT times and later, as a city of the Decapolis.

SUCCOTH receives early mention in the Bible. Genesis refers to this Jordan Valley town in connection with Jacob (Gen. 33:17). It was here that Solomon cast in clay the brass temple furnishings (1 Ki. 7:46; 2 Chr. 4:17). It is identified with the modern Tell Deir<sup>(Alla)</sup>. The ZAPHON of Josh. 13:27 also is mentioned in the TELL EL-AMARNA Letters. It is N of Zarethan.

The city of GILGAL, which served Joshua and the Israelites as a base of operations during the conquest of Canaan, is certainly to be considered as being in the Jordan Valley, since it is a suburb of Jericho (Josh. 4:19 et al.). JABESH GILEAD (2 Sam. 2:4 et al.) can possibly be identified with Tel el-Meqbreh near the mouth of the Wadi Yabis, or with Tell el-Maqlub, farther up the wadi. The BETH ARABAH of Joshua is probably the<sup>(Ain el-Gharabeh)</sup> near Jericho (Josh. 15:6, 61; 18:22). MEPHIBOSHETH, the surviving crippled son of JONATHAN, lived with MAKIR the Ammonite in the Jordan Valley city of Lo DEBAR. The latter has been tentatively identified with Umm ed-Dabar, S of Umm Qeis, on the E bank (2 Sam. 9:3–6).

Two or three cities in the Jordan Valley are mentioned in the NT. Two of these relate to John's baptizing activity: BETHANY (Jn. 1:28; KJV, "Bethabara") on the E of the Jordan, and AENON near SALIM (3:23). BETHSAIDA could also be considered in the Jordan Valley even though it is on the N shore of the Sea of Galilee; it is near the exit of the Jordan into that Sea.

C. Fords and bridges. Until Roman times there were no bridges across the Jordan; but it can be forded in dozens of places where it is only waist deep. For this reason the river itself did not create a definitive border. Abraham, for example, surely crossed the river above or below the Sea of Galilee, but there is no mention of it. Fords are mentioned several times in the Bible. The Jericho police searched for the Israelite spies all the way to the fords of the Jordan (Josh. 2:7), and the Ephraimites under EHUD defeated the Moabites at the fords of the Jordan (Jdg. 3:28). The best fords were near the mouths of the major tributaries. The silt from the tributary would create something like a sandbar and thus facilitate crossing. The Jordan River is not ordinarily navigable and there are no records of anyone shipping or sailing on it. It is very shallow in places and there are many rapids, even in the lower part.

The Romans built several bridges, remains of which can be seen at Damiya, at the mouth of the Yarmuk, and where the Jordan leaves the Sea of Galilee. In modern times the major bridges have been the Allenby Bridge, E of Jericho; the Damiya Bridge, below the Jabbok's mouth; the Sheik Hussein Bridge, E of Beth Shan; and the Bridge of Jacob's Daughters, N of the Sea of Galilee.

III. History. The Jordan serves as a natural N—S boundary dividing Palestine (Cisjordan) on the W from Transjordan on the E. Not only the water itself, which is not too formidable, but also the whole valley provides a difficult-to-cross barrier between the two halves of the Holy Land. As it was in ancient times, so it is today.

A. Prebiblical times. Anthropologists and archaeologists believe that the Jordan Valley was occupied in prehistoric times. As early as the Middle Stone Age, civilizations existed on the plains and in the valley of the river. The number of sites varies through the Early and Middle Bronze Periods, but the sites were generally on the decline when the Israelites appeared on the scene.

That this valley should have hosted some of humankind's earliest settlements is understandable.

Aerial photograph looking N up the Jordan Valley toward the Sea of Galilee.

The valley itself is nearly tropical; the water is abundant, and with some coaxing the land will produce food. Furthermore, the thick growth paralleling the river shelters many wild animals. In fact, skeletal remains of elephants and rhinoceroses were found near the Jordan S of Lake Huleh. At the S end, the excavations of Kathleen Kenyon at Jericho have shown that city to be one of the oldest in the world. A prepottery Neolithic city appeared at the bottom of the dig into Tell es-Sultan, which is the OT Jericho. Teleilat Ghassul, across the river from Jericho, has given its name to the Ghassulian Period within the Chalcolithic Age. In the N, at Shaar Ha-Golan in the Yarmuk valley, somewhat older artifacts have been discovered.

B. In the OT. The first mention of the Jordan in the Bible is in connection with LOT, who chose “the whole plain of the Jordan” because it was well watered (Gen. 13:10). The word for “plain” is kikkār H3971, used of round thin objects, such as “loaf” (Jdg. 8:5) or “talent” (Exod. 25:39). In regard to the Jordan, opinion varies as to whether the word refers to the broadening out of the plain just N of the Dead Sea or to all the valley in which the Dead Sea lies. This is particularly crucial in the matter of locating the CITIES OF THE PLAIN in Gen. 13 and 19. In any event, Lot went somewhere to the E and S of his uncle ABRAHAM. The same word also describes the Jericho valley in Deut. 34:3 (cf. the use of the term in Neh. 3:22; 12:28). Another passage (1 Ki. 7:46=2 Chr. 4:17) locates Succoth, the site where Solomon had the temple vessels cast in clay, in the plain of the Jordan.

JACOB in his prayer for deliverance from ESAU mentioned that he passed over the Jordan with only his staff (Gen. 32:10). He probably crossed at one of the many fords, as had his grandfather Abraham, either above or below the Sea of Galilee. After the Israelites' forty years of wandering and before the conquest of the Promised Land, the Jordan River was a focus of attention. The Israelites camped in the plains of MOAB by the Jordan (Num. 22:1 et al.). As the tribal allotments were delimited, the Jordan formed a mutual boundary between several of the tribes. MANASSEH had the longest border on the Jordan with half its tribe on the W and half on the E, reaching almost from Galilee to Jericho. NAPHTALI'S territory on the W of the river went from S of the Sea of Galilee northward to include the Jordan's sources. To a lesser extent, BENJAMIN and JUDAH bordered the river on the W, and REUBEN and GAD on the E (Num. 32 and 34, and Josh. 13–19, outline the borders in great detail).

The most momentous event involving the Jordan River was when the Israelite nation crossed it dry shod. The book of Joshua relates that as soon as the feet of the priests who bore the ARK OF THE COVENANT touched the river, "the water from upstream stopped flowing. It piled up in a heap a great distance away, at a town called Adam in the vicinity of Zarethan, while the water flowing down to the Sea of the Arabah (the Salt Sea) was completely cut off" (Josh. 3:16). A landslide probably occurred at Adam, as has happened as recently as 1927, and stopped the river. The miraculous element was in the timing of such a natural dam (Ps. 114:3 and 5 say that the Jordan "turned back").

Because Transjordan was part of the nation, the Jordan was crossed and recrossed many times in the business and exploits of the centuries that followed. Crossing to the E side of the river provided something of a refuge from the mainstream of activity. Hence, the Gileadites guarded the fords of Jordan against the pursuing enemy (Jdg. 12:5–6). ABSALOM sought refuge across the Jordan (2 Sam. 17:24), and thence ELIJAH fled from AHAB (1 Ki. 17:3, 5). It was a baptism in the muddy waters of the Jordan that ELISHA prescribed for the leprosy of NAAMAN, the Aramean general (2 Ki. 5:10). On these same waters floated the lost axe head at the behest of Elisha (6:1–7).

There are a few literary allusions to the Jordan and to the jungle that parallels it. Describing the strength of BEHEMOTH, Job says, "he is secure, though the Jordan should surge against his mouth" (Job 40:23). Jeremiah and Zechariah allude to the lions of the Jordan jungle (Jer. 49:19; 50:44; Zech. 11:3). None has been seen since the 19th cent.

C. In the NT. One might say that Jesus' public ministry began at the Jordan River, where JOHN THE BAPTIST baptized him and where the HOLY SPIRIT descended in the form of a dove (Matt. 3:13–17; Mk. 1:9–11; Lk. 3:21–22). There is some question as to where the baptism took place. The Matthean account indicates somewhere toward the S end of the Jordan (Matt. 3:5; 4:1), whereas Mark suggests a place in the N near Galilee (Mk. 1:9). There are no less than seven shrines along the Jordan outside of Jericho to mark the exact spot of the baptism. If the alleged connection of John the Baptist with the Qumran community is correct, then the theory of a southern site is more likely. Later, John baptized at Aenon near Salim, which may be a few miles S of Beth Shan (Jn. 3:23).

If residents of Nazareth and Galilee regularly avoided passing through Samaria, then it is most likely that Jesus crossed the Jordan many times on his way from Nazareth to the festivals in Jerusalem. He may have crossed into PEREA near Beth Shan and then back onto the W bank near Jericho. This would account for his being in Jericho to heal the blind man (Matt. 20:29–34; Mk. 10:46–52; Lk. 18:35–43). He was "passing through" Jericho when he met ZACCHAEUS (Lk. 19:1–2).

Jesus and his disciples were near the source of the Jordan when, at Caesarea Philippi, Peter confessed Christ's deity (Matt. 16:13–16; Mk. 8:27–29). Beyond these references and inferences, the Jordan plays no role in the NT.

D. In modern times. The Jordan receives little mention in the pages of history books. Perhaps the reason for this is that it did not again serve as a political boundary until modern times. From the Romans to the Ottomans both sides of the Jordan were one political entity. Pilgrims of the Middle Ages had almost nothing to report of this fabled river.

At the conclusion of World War I, however, the Jordan once more served as a political frontier. The Hashemite kingdom of Transjordan was then on the E and the British Mandate of Palestine on the W. As a result of Great Britain's and the United Nation's decisions in 1947 and 1948, the Israeli War of Independence made at least part of the Jordan the international frontier between Israel and the present Hashemite kingdom of Jordan. With the six-day war of June, 1967, the Jordan almost in its entirety from Galilee to the Dead Sea came to be the cease-fire line between these two hostile states. Thus the Jordan River, insignificant in size though it be, with more than its share of the headlines both ancient and modern, continues to play a major role in international intrigue.

The Jordan River also has strong symbolic associations. Being the border of the ancient promised land, it illustrates the barrier between this life and the next. Songs such as "I Won't Have to Cross Jordan Alone," or "On Jordan's Stormy Banks," illustrate the death of the saint. (See further G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, 25th ed. Joseph joh'sif (יֹסֵף H3441, “may [God] add” [cf JOSIPHIAH]; ‘Ιωσήφ G2737). (1) Son of JACOB and RACHEL (Gen. 30:24). While in PADDAN ARAM, Jacob saw and loved Rachel, and arranged to work seven years for her (29:17–18). LABAN, her father, gave his oldest daughter LEAH to Jacob, insisting that custom demanded that the oldest daughter be married first. Jacob worked seven more years for Rachel. Leah bore several children, but Rachel was barren for an extended period before giving birth to Joseph. Because Joseph was the first son of the favorite wife, Jacob was partial to him. Evidence of this is seen in the coat he gave to Joseph, alone, of all his sons (37:3).

The antagonism of Joseph's brothers grew when Joseph told them of the dreams he had, suggesting that they, along with his father and mother, would one day bow before him (Gen. 37:5–11). When Joseph was seventeen years old, his father sent him to SHECHEM to inquire about the welfare of his brothers. They had gone on to DOTHAN, where Joseph found them. The brothers saw him approaching and determined to kill him, but REUBEN, the oldest son of Jacob, persuaded his brothers to spare the life of Joseph and instead to cast him into a pit. Reuben hoped to rescue Joseph from the pit, but before he could do so a company of ISHMAELITE merchants passed. While Reuben was away, the other brothers sold Joseph as a slave to the Ishmaelites, who took him to Egypt. The brothers then dipped Joseph's coat in the blood of a goat, and told their father that they had found his blood-soaked coat. Jacob concluded that a wild animal had killed Joseph (37:12–36).

In Egypt, Joseph was sold to the captain of PHARAOH'S guard, POTIPHAR. As a trustworthy worker, Joseph was given a responsible position. Potiphar's wife was attracted to Joseph and attempted to seduce him. When Joseph spurned her advances, she accused him of being the aggressor, with the result that he was imprisoned for several years (Gen. 39).

In prison, Joseph again proved himself worthy of a position of trust. He interpreted the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker; the former was restored to Pharaoh's confidence, and the second, beheaded (Gen. 40). After two years Pharaoh had a dream, and the chief butler remembered how Joseph had correctly interpreted the dreams. Joseph was sent for, and he explained that the Pharaoh's dreams foretold seven years of plenty, to be followed by seven years of famine. Pharaoh was so impressed with Joseph that he appointed him superintendent of the royal granaries. Joseph was now second in rank to Pharaoh himself. He married ASENATH, daughter of a priestly family at On (HELIOPOLIS). Before the famine began, Joseph had two sons: MANASSEH and EPHRAIM (Gen. 41).

When the famine came, the entire world of the eastern Mediterranean lands suffered, but Joseph's advice saved Egypt. Joseph's brothers came from Canaan to buy food, but they did not recognize him. He recognized them, however, and questioned them closely concerning their family. The welfare of Jacob, his father, and BENJAMIN, his full brother who had remained at home, was his prime concern. Keeping SIMEON as a hostage, Joseph permitted his brothers to return home (Gen. 42).

On their second visit they brought along Benjamin, and Joseph plotted to find an excuse to keep Benjamin with him. Joseph ordered that a silver cup be placed in Benjamin's bag. This was done and Joseph then sent his men after the caravan to search for the supposed thief. When the cup was found in Benjamin's bag, all returned. JUDAH, however, insisted that Benjamin must return home. Jacob had lost his favorite son already, and the loss of the second child of the beloved Rachel would be too much for him. Judah offered to remain himself if Benjamin were permitted to go with his brothers home to Jacob (Gen. 43–44). Years before the brothers had been jealous of Joseph to the point that they were prepared to kill him. Now, however, they were willing to indulge their father in his special love for Benjamin.

Joseph was so moved at Judah's words that he could contain his emotions no longer. He ordered his courtiers out of the room, and revealed himself to his brothers. They were frightened, feeling that he would seek revenge for their treatment of him, but he assured them that he saw the hand of God in all that had happened. Joseph urged them to bring their father and settle in the eastern delta region of Egypt—in the land of GOSHEN. Jacob, who had difficulty believing that Joseph was really alive, joined his sons in moving down to Egypt. They were settled near Joseph's palace and enjoyed a favored position (Gen. 45–46). Jacob thus died a happy man. Joseph lived to the age of 110 (50:26), the ideal life span in Egyptian thought. At the exodus, the mummified remains of Joseph were taken from Egypt and, following the conquest, they were buried at SHECHEM (Exod. 13:19; Josh. 24:32). For a discussion of the tribes descended from Joseph, see EPHRAIM (PERSON AND TRIBE); MANASSEH (TRIBE).

Many scholars suggest that Joseph rose to prominence during the Second Intermediate, or HYKSOS, period of Egyptian history (c. 1780–1570 B.C.; see EGYPT V.D). Since the Pharaoh is not named, certainty is impossible. The Hyksos were Semites, and it is thought likely that Joseph would have been given a position of trust by fellow Semites. A further bit of evidence is the fact that the capital was located in the NILE delta, near GOSHEN, "in the region of Zoan" (Ps. 78:12, 43). The king "who did not know Joseph" (Exod. 1:8) was evidently of a new dynasty, and was certainly a ruler of the new kingdom, or empire period (after 1570 B.C.). Egyptian records document the presence of many Semites in Egypt during the time of Joseph. Forty-five Semites are named in a prison register from c. 1740 B.C. The list, known as Papyrus Brooklyn 35.1446, contains NW Semitic names similar to the biblical Jacob, Issachar, Asher, Job, and Menahem (cf. W. F. Albright in JAOS 74 [1954]: 222–33). For dress during the time of Joseph, the Beni Hasan tomb painting, showing Semitic traders entering Egypt, may be studied ( Benjamin Mazar et al. see, Views of the Biblical World [1959], 1:114–15).

Egyptian literature is thought by some to provide parallels to the Joseph narrative. The so-called

Story of Two Brothers tells of a young man who rejected the advances of his elder brother's wife, after which she accused him of attempting to seduce her (see ANET, 23-25). Another story concerns a man named Sinuhe, who left Egypt for political reasons and spent many years in Canaan and Syria. Sinuhe married the daughter of a bedouin chief and prospered in his adopted country. In old age, however, he had the opportunity to return to his native land, and did so. He was properly embalmed and buried in a pyramid (ANET, 18-22). Joseph, on the other hand, gave orders that his remains should be returned to his native land. In accord with Egyptian custom, Joseph, too, was embalmed. Subsequently his body was taken from Egypt to the Shechem area for burial.

Wilson, Joseph, Wise and Otherwise: The Intersection of Wisdom and Covenant in Genesis 37—50 [2004].)

(2) Descendant of ISSACHAR and father of Igal; the latter was one of the twelve spies sent by MOSES to Canaan (Num. 13:7).

(3) One of the sons of ASAPH who assisted their father in the prophetic ministry of MUSIC; he was the head of the first company of temple musicians appointed by lot under DAVID (1 Chr. 25:2, 9).

(4) One of the descendants of Binnui who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:42; in 1 Esd. 9:34 [KJV, "Josephus"], Joseph is listed as a descendant of Ezora).

(5) Head of the priestly family of Shecaniah during the high priesthood of JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:14; most Heb. MSS read “Shebaniah”).

(6) Son of Oziel and ancestor of JUDITH (Jdt. 8:1).

(7) Son of Zechariah and commander in the Maccabean army; he and another commander, Azariah, launched an unsuccessful attack against Jamnia (1 Macc. 5:18, 55-60).

(8) Son of MATTATHIAS (leader of the Maccabean Revolt); he was appointed by his brother Judas MACCABEE to command a military division (2 Macc. 8:22; 10:19). The name “Joseph” here is probably a variant of “John” (1 Macc. 2:2), but some have argued that it refers to a different person, perhaps a half-brother of Judas who should be identified with #7 above.

(9-10) The name of two individuals included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST: the son of Mattathias (not the leader of the Maccabean Revolt) and the son of Jonam (Lk. 3:25, 30).

(11) Son of Jacob and husband of MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS (Matt. 1:16; according to Lk. 3:23, he was the son [grandson?] of HELI; see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST). The Gospels of Matthew and Luke assert that Jesus was born to Mary at a time when she was betrothed to Joseph, before their marriage was consummated (Matt. 1:18; Lk. 1:27, 35). Joseph was a carpenter (Matt. 13:55) and was known as “a righteous man” (1:19). When he learned that Mary was bearing a child, he was understandably disturbed. After he was told by an angel that she was to become the mother of Israel’s MESSIAH through the instrumentality of the Holy Spirit, he proceeded with his plans, which brought him and Mary to BETHLEHEM, where the child Jesus was born.

A tradition embodied in the 4th-cent. History of Joseph the Carpenter states that Joseph was a widower with children at the time he espoused Mary, a girl of twelve. The Scriptures make one reference to Joseph following the Passover journey when Jesus was twelve years old (Lk. 2:41-48). Later references mention Mary and the BROTHERS OF JESUS (Mk. 3:31; 6:3), but not Joseph. Jesus asked John to treat Mary as his own mother (Jn. 19:26-27), implying that she had need of someone to care for her. References to the brothers of Jesus (Mk. 6:3) imply that Mary and Joseph had other children after the VIRGIN BIRTH of Jesus. Some scholars have assumed that these “brothers” were sons of Joseph by a previous marriage, or cousins of Jesus. The natural meaning of the words, however, implies that Mary and Joseph came together subsequent to the birth of Jesus (Matt. 1:25), and that they had children who grew up with Jesus and were known in the community as his “brothers.”

(12) Son of Mary and thus probably a half-brother of Jesus; listed with other brothers, James, Simon, and Judas (Matt. 13:55; instead of “Joseph,” some MSS have “Joses” and others have “John”). A parallel list includes James, Joses, Judas, and Simon (Mk. 6:3 NRSV); here the NIV understands JOSES as an alternate form of Joseph. See BROTHERS OF JESUS; JAMES II.

(13) Son of a certain Mary, possibly the wife of CLOPAS (Matt. 27:56 NRSV; NIV reads “Joses,” the reading found in a majority of MSS, though probably not original). This Joseph is no doubt to be identified with Joses, the brother of James the younger (Mk. 15:40). See JAMES III.

(14) A rich man from the town of ARIMATHEA who became a disciple of Jesus. After the crucifixion, he asked PILATE for the body of Jesus; the request being granted, he wrapped the body “in a linen cloth, and placed it in his own new tomb that he had cut out of the rock” (Matt. 27:57-60). Both Mark and Luke add the information that Joseph was a member of the Council, a term that probably refers to the SANHEDRIN, and that he “was waiting for the kingdom of God” (Mk. 15:43-46; Lk. 23:50-53). Luke also states that Joseph was “a good and upright man, who had not consented to their decision and action.” John points out that Joseph was a secret disciple of Jesus “because he feared the Jews,” and that NICODEMUS helped him bury the body (Jn. 19:38-40). (For further details on the BURIAL of Jesus, see R. E. Brown in CBQ 50 [1988]: 233-45.)

(15) A disciple of Jesus who also bore the surnames BARSABBAS and JUSTUS; he was one of the two men nominated to succeed JUDAS ISCARIOT in the apostolic band (Acts 1:23).

(16) An early Christian leader better known as BARNABAS (Acts 4:36).

Joseph, History of. Title given to a document very fragmentarily preserved in a few pieces of Greek papyri that may be dated to c. A.D. 600 (the work itself was prob. composed several centuries earlier). Very little can be inferred from the small amount of text that has survived, but it appears to be a retelling of the story of the patriarch JOSEPH, particularly his illustrious career in Egypt. At one point Joseph is referred to as “king of the people.” The phrase “Joseph remembering Jacob” apparently occurs several times in the surviving text, and this concept is thought to be an important theme in the document. (Introduction and trans. in OTP, 2:467-75.)

Joseph, Prayer of. An OT pseudepigraphal work no longer extant. The knowledge of this work is based largely upon the many quotations in Greek from it in the writings of ORIGEN. In the so-called Stichometry of Necephorus is a list of OT apocryphal works, as well as the canonical books of the Bible, together with the number of verses in each book. The Prayer of Joseph is third in this list, and the number of verses given is 1,100. The passages quoted by Origen have to do mainly with Jacob, who describes, among other things, a meeting with URIEL, whom he met on a journey from Mesopotamia. Uriel wrestled with him claiming that he was the greatest of the angels. Although Abraham and Isaac were great, Jacob is “the firstborn of all living beings,” in fact, the head of all the angels. This comment has been interpreted by some scholars to be a reflection of an anti-Christian bias, appearing to revere the patriarchs above Christ. Origen, however, held the book in high regard, making this view improbable. Origen also says it was used by the Jews, which indicates it was of Jewish origin. Nothing is known about its authorship.

Joseph and Asenath. Also Joseph and Aseneth. A lengthy apocryphal Jewish story, probably written in Greek in the 1st cent. B.C. or a little later. Expanding on the brief OT material (Gen. 41:45, 50-52; 46:20), this document recounts how ASENATH, the very beautiful daughter of an Egyptian priest, refused to marry JOSEPH. For his part, Joseph, who would not kiss an idolatrous woman, prayed for her conversion. Asenath repented, was visited by an angelic being, and married Joseph. Subsequently, the son of Pharaoh kidnapped Asenath, but she was rescued by Joseph’s brothers. The work was doubtlessly written to warn Jewish readers from IDOLATRY and to discourage them from marrying pagans. It has also been argued that the author wished to enhance the status of converts to Judaism. (Full introduction and English trans. by C. Burchard in OTP, 2:177-247; on the state of modern research, C. Burchard in New Perspectives on Ancient Judaism, ed. J. Neusner et al., vol. 2 [1987], 31-52; on the document’s relevance for NT studies, id., in NTS 33 [1987]: 102-34. See also R. D. Chesnutt, “The Social Setting and Purpose of Joseph and Aseneth,” JSP 2 [1988]: 21-48; E. M. Humphrey, Joseph and Aseneth [2000].)

Joseph the Carpenter, History of. Also known as the Arabic History of Joseph the Carpenter. An account of the life and more particularly the death of Joseph, the foster-father of Jesus, allegedly given by the Lord himself to his disciples. In it Joseph is described as a carpenter, a widower with six children (four boys and two girls), and quite old when he married the virgin, a girl of twelve years. The latter part of the book describes Joseph's sickness, death, and burial, and contains a eulogy spoken over him by Jesus. His death at 111 years of age is given as a model of holy dying. His burial is according to the burial rites of the Egyptian cult of OSIRIS.

This document, the oldest one extant intended to exalt Joseph and foster his cult, was written in Egypt no earlier than the 4th cent. and shows strong influences of Egyptian religions and GNOSTICISM upon it. Its original language may have been Greek (S. Morenz, Die Geschichte von Joseph dem Zimmermann [1951]), but it is extant now only in Arabic and Coptic (on which the Arabic depends). A 14th-cent. Latin translation based on the Coptic also exists. Materials from earlier apocryphal gospels, such as Protevangelium of James, are found in it. (English trans. in ANF, 8:388-94; summary in NTAp, 1:483-85.)

G. F. HAWTHORNE

Josephus, Flavius joh-see'fuhs, flay'vee-uhs. First-century Jewish writer; our main source of information for Jewish history during the intertestamental and NT periods. (The name Josephus occurs once in the KJV Apoc. as a form of JOSEPH, referring to a postexilic Israelite [1 Esd. 9:34].)

I. Life. Josephus was born in Jerusalem, A.D. 37 or 38. His father Matthias was a priest, and his mother a descendant of the royal house of the HASMONEANS. When he grew up he joined the PHARISEES, a group that he likened to the STOICS among the Greeks. In the year 64, at age twenty-six, he went to Rome and secured the release of certain priests who were being held there on rather nebulous charges. Upon his return he found the people smarting under the high-handed administration of the procurator Florus and ready for revolt. From this he attempted to dissuade them, having seen at firsthand something of Roman power.

Because of his attitude, he was sent to GALILEE to keep the peace there. The accounts of his activity in this region are conflicting and confused. The Jewish War seems to indicate that he was sent up as a general to take command of the situation; while in the Life he claims that he went up as a priest to pacify the disaffected. At any rate, because he was afraid that his pacification efforts would bring him under suspicion of favoring Rome, he finally pretended to concur with the views of the war party, going so far as to get them paid as mercenaries, but at the same time trying to persuade them to act on the defensive: not to attack the Romans, but let them make the first move. Thus he played a kind of double game, waiting to see the direction in which events would develop, accused by some of pro-Roman sentiment, by others of aiming at tyranny.

Finally the extremists forced him to a decision; either he would lose his post, or take over the active leadership of the war party. At this juncture the Roman general VESPASIAN arrived on the scene (A.D. 67), and Josephus was captured, after almost being killed by his companions. When Vespasian was summoned to Rome in 69, and his son TITUS was left to conduct the siege of Jerusalem, Josephus was used by the Roman commander as a mediator, going around the walls counseling the Jews to submit, but hated by the ZEALOTS and suspected by the Romans. See WARS, JEWISH. After the capture of Jerusalem he went to Rome with Titus and was shown great favor by Vespasian (now the emperor), by Titus, and later by DOMITIAN. He received Roman citizenship and took the name Flavius in deference to his patrons. He was married three times; one wife deserted him, and a second marriage ended in divorce. He died at about the beginning of the second century.

II. Works. Three major works have come from the pen of Josephus. (a) The Jewish War, written between 75 and 79, in seven books. This account of the struggle between the Jews and Romans was written under Roman auspices, Titus having urged Josephus to undertake the work. King HEROD Agrippa vouched for its accuracy. It was produced first in an Aramaic version, now lost, and this was followed by the Greek edition. One purpose for the writing of the book was certainly to deter others from revolting against the Romans as the Jews had done. The work is in the main a trustworthy account, for Josephus had firsthand materials: his own experience and the commentaries of Vespasian and Titus, the commanders involved in the struggle.

The camel-shaped hill of Gamala (looking W). Josephus reports on various battles between the Jews and Romans, including one that occurred here. (An excavated synagogue is visible in the lower left; right of it is a wall line and the remains of an ancient tower.)

(b) The Antiquities of the Jews, written in 93 or 94. This is a long work of twenty books, beginning with creation and extending to the outbreak of the war with the Romans. Nothing like it was ever attempted before; it represents a new departure in literary form. The first part of the work, to the end of the exile, follows closely the biblical narrative; the second part, dealing with the postexilic period, is compiled from miscellaneous sources. To the Antiquities is appended a biographical sketch (Life) written by Josephus as a defense against the accusations of a rival historian named Justus.

(c) Against Apion, a defense of the Jewish religion.

III. Importance of Josephus. He is the principal source for Jewish history between 100 B.C. and A.D. 100, and is invaluable for a knowledge of the geography of Bible lands. Recent archaeological discoveries at Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) and MASADA have indicated that the account of Josephus is remarkably accurate and ranks him high as a topographer. The student of the NT has in Josephus a wealth of material on agriculture, industry, religion, politics, and the outstanding personalities of gospel history: Herod, Pilate, the two Agrippas, Felix, and others.

As a historian many have distrusted him, mostly because they disapprove of him as a traitor. He is no more affected by human error (of memory, faulty sources, bias, and the like) than others of his time. The passage concerning Jesus (Ant. 18.3.3 §§63-64) is usually regarded as a Christian interpolation, though some argue that the bulk of evidence, both external and internal, marks it as genuine. Josephus must have known the main facts about the life and death of Jesus, and his historian's curiosity certainly would lead him to investigate the movement that was gaining adherents even in high circles. Arnold Toynbee rates him among the five greatest Hellenic historians, along with Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, and Polybius.

Josephus was doubtless an egoist, motivated by self-interest, and a flatterer of the Romans. He was hated by his countrymen as a turncoat. Yet he possessed a high degree of patriotism, for instead of disowning his nation he wrote an elaborate history of it, and composed a brilliant apology for his native religion.

R. C. STONE

Joses joh'siz (Ἰωσήφ G2736, hellenized form of יוֹסֵף G2737; see JOSEPH). (1) Son of MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS, and thus apparently a half-brother of Jesus (Mk. 6:3 NRSV); the NIV, on the basis of the parallel passage (Matt. 13:55), renders the name as "Joseph" (a reading attested in some MSS). See JOSEPH #12; see also BROTHERS OF JESUS; JAMES II.

(2) Brother of James the younger, whose mother Mary stood by the cross of Jesus and watched his burial (Matt. 27:56 [NRSV, "Joseph," following the earliest MSS]; Mk. 15:40, 47). See JAMES III; JOSEPH #13; MARY #4.

(3) The original name of BARNABAS (Acts 4:36 KJV, following the TR; most modern versions read "Joseph").

D. E. HIEBERT

Joshah joh'shuh (יֹשָׁה H3459, derivation uncertain). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:34). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38-41).

Joshaphat josh'uh-fat (יֹשָׁפָט H3461, short form of יְהוֹשָׁפָט H3398, "Yahweh has judged"; see JEHOSEPHAT). (1) A Mithnite who was one of DAVID'S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:43; this list adds sixteen names beyond the military elite known as the Thirty, listed in vv. 10-41 = 2 Sam. 23:8-39). The description "Mithnite" may point to his hometown, perhaps in TRANSJORDAN.

(2) One of the priests appointed to blow the trumpet when David transferred the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:24).

Joshaviah josh'uh-vi'uh (יֹשָׁבִיָּה H3460, possibly alternate form of יֹשְׁבִיָּה H3458, "Yahweh makes [me] dwell"; see JOSHIBIAH). Son of Elnaam; he and his brother Jeribai are included in the Chronicler's list of DAVID'S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:46), which adds sixteen names (vv. 41b-47) beyond the military elite known as the Thirty (vv. 10-41 = 2 Sam. 23:8-39).

Joshebekashah josh'bi-kay'shuh (יֹשֶׁבֶקֶשָׁה H3792, possibly "sitting in prayer [or in misfortune]"). Son of HEMAN, David's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). He and his thirteen brothers were set apart "for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal" (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the seventeenth lot (v.

Josheb-Basshebeth joh'shib-buh-shee'bith' (יֹשֶׁב בַּשֵּׁבֶת H3783, "one sitting in the seat"). A Tahkemonite listed as chief of DAVID'S three main officers (2 Sam. 23:8). See JASHOBEAM.

Joshibiah josh'uh-bi'uh (יֹשִׁבִּיָּה H3458, "Yahweh makes [me] dwell"). KJV Josibiah. Son of Seraiah and father of Jehu; the latter is listed among the clan leaders in the tribe of SIMEON whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (1 Chr. 4:35; cf. vv. 38-41).

Joshua josh'yoo-uh (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ H3397, short form in postexilic writings יֵשׁוּעַ H3800 [see JESHUA], "Yahweh is salvation [or help]"; Ἰησοῦς G2652 [see JESUS]). (1) Son of Nun and commander of the Israelites during the conquest of Canaan. Although his name appears first as Joshua (Exod. 17:9-14), one reads subsequently (Num. 13:16; cf. v. 8 and Deut. 32:44 MT) that MOSES changed his name from HOSHEA (KJV, "Oshea"), meaning "Save," to Joshua (more accurately transliterated as Jehoshua), "Yahweh is salvation," making the name theophorous. This change may throw light upon the fact that names compounded with Yahweh were relatively rare in the period of the exodus. Moses (whose mother's name was JOCHEBED, "Yahweh is glorious," Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59) may have wished to popularize such a custom by changing the name of his "minister" to Jehoshua. In the exilic period, the shorter form of the name (Jeshua) came into use (the son of Nun is called Jeshua in Neh. 8:17; the name of the postexilic priest is spelled "Jeshua" in Ezra and Nehemiah, but "Jehoshua" [Joshua] in Haggai and Zechariah).

Joshua son of Nun belonged to the tribe of EPHRAIM (Num. 13:8). After the conquest of Canaan, he settled in TIMNATH SERAH (Josh. 19:50 [Timmath Heres, Jdg. 2:9]) in the hill country of Ephraim, and was buried there (Josh. 24:30). As BEZALEL and OHOLIAB (Exod. 31:1-6) undoubtedly had received training in the arts and crafts of Egypt, and as JOSEPHUS (Ant. 2.10.1-2) imagines that Moses led an Egyptian army against the Ethiopians, it is likely that Joshua had served in Pharaoh's army before the exodus. Foreigners were common in the army of Egypt. Moses considered him sufficiently battle-tested to appoint him leader of the Israelite defense against the attack of the Amalekites at REPHIDIM (Exod. 17:8-16). Since Joshua was apparently known to Moses, he may already have been in charge of organizing the undisciplined crowd of slaves who had escaped from Egypt into orderly marching columns. Joshua served as personal minister to Moses when the latter was on Mount SINAI receiving the law (Exod. 24:13; 32:17). He was also in attendance whenever the Lord would speak to Moses in the Tent of Meeting outside the camp (33:11). On one occasion, when he wanted to forbid certain elders to prophesy, he learned from Moses the value of the anointing of God's Spirit (Num. 11:27-29).

His selection as one of the twelve spies gave Joshua the opportunity to learn the nature of the Canaanites and the topography of the land at first hand. This information became invaluable when his time came to plan the campaigns to conquer Canaan. Furthermore, he grew in strength of character as he and CALEB, with their report of the reconnaissance, stood against the majority (Num. 14:6-9). They called upon the community of Israel to rise up in faith and expect Yahweh to give them the excellent land to the N. Caleb and Joshua were spared when the ten who had incited the Israelites to grumble against Yahweh by disparaging the land were struck dead (14:30, 36-38). Of the generation numbered at the beginning of the wilderness journey, only Joshua and Caleb followed the Lord faithfully and remained alive to be registered at the end of the forty year period (26:65; 32:12; Deut. 1:34-40).

When Moses was told that he must die instead of being allowed to lead the Israelites into Canaan, the lawgiver asked God to give the community of Yahweh a new shepherd (Num. 27:12-17). Telling Moses to select Joshua, a man indwelt by the Spirit, the Lord replied: "Give him some of your authority so the whole Israelite community will obey him" (27:20). Moses formally ordained Joshua in the presence of ELEAZAR the priest and the whole community (27:21-23; Deut. 3:21-28), and imparted to him the spirit of wisdom by the laying on of hands (Deut. 34:9). Later, Moses commanded Joshua before the entire nation to be strong and to lead Israel across the JORDAN in order to possess the land promised to the patriarchs (Deut. 31:3, 7-8). Then the two presented themselves at the door of the TABERNACLE. There Joshua received the divine commission or charge from God (31:14-15, 23). After Moses' death the Lord graciously repeated this commission to Joshua privately and enlarged upon it, to prepare him for the overwhelming task lying ahead (Josh. 1:1—9).

Several outstanding characteristics enabled Joshua to perform the responsibilities committed to him. (a) First, he was humble enough to recognize that he was not the gifted and educated man that Moses was. Joshua accepted himself and thus leaned all the more heavily upon the Lord in his comparative ordinariness. He was not too big for God to use; hence God could exalt him (Josh. 3:7; 4:14).

(b) He was a man of strong faith and faithful to his calling. When the divine Commander-in-chief appeared in THEOPHANY to him as he scouted the JERICO defenses, Joshua was quick to bow in worship (5:13-15) and to receive orders how to capture the enemy bastion (6:2-5). Even though the daily encirclement with trumpets blowing might seem militarily stupid, and be subjected to the ridicule of the defenders, Joshua obeyed implicitly. He cried to God in repentance for his nation after the AI debacle (7:2-5). At the foot of Mount EBAL he put worship and covenant before further war and conquest (8:30-35). At GIBEON he prayed for supernatural assistance, and God answered with a terrifying hailstorm (10:10-14).

(c) Third, he saturated his mind and heart with the word of God, meditating therein day and night. Thus the people had confidence to execute his decisions (1:13-18; 8:30-35; 11:12, 15; 14:1-5), and he could appeal to them at his life's end to continue adhering to the law of Moses (23:6).

(d) Fourth, he displayed sound military strategy. He established his base of operations at GILGAL with its easy access to the TRANSJORDAN tribes as a source of supplies and in its position guarding two trade routes up into the central highlands. By capturing Ai and silencing BETHEL (Josh. 8:17; 12:16), he took the heart of Canaan first, and cut the land in two. He was able to campaign separately against the southern and the northern kings. His military policy was a combination of surprise and speed, of catching his enemies in the open and destroying their troops, since his own desert army was untrained in siege operations.

(e) Last, Joshua was an able administrator in peace as well as in war. His keen geographic judgment enabled him to draw up boundaries for the tribal allotments that were sensible and not provocative of intertribal wars. He did make mistakes, as W. S. La Sor points out (Great Personalities of the Old Testament: Their Lives and Times [1959], 75—76), by allowing the crafty Gibeonites to keep their territory (see GIBEON), by not capturing Jerusalem from the Jebusites (see JEBUS), and by failing to dispossess the small but growing enclaves of early PHILISTINES. These factions divided the country across the middle, so that after Solomon's death the nation split apart forming two kingdoms. Some would criticize Joshua for failing to pick and train a successor; on the other hand, after the partitioning of the land, God meant that each tribe should consolidate its own territory as Caleb did at HEBRON.

As seen in the similarity of their names, Joshua is a type of Christ as our conquering commander. Joshua was an agent both of grace (e.g., in the case of RAHAB) and of damnation in the holy war of Yahweh against the seven wicked nations in the Promised Land, just as Jesus is both the Savior and the Judge of all men, who metes out death as well as life. “Everything in Canaan was put into the hands of Joshua as trustee for the people. It was his responsibility to divide and assign the land as each tribe came to claim its portion from him” (A. Redpath, Victorious Christian Living: Studies in the Book of Joshua [1955], 22). Even so each believer who desires to walk in the realm of victory and full salvation must claim the spiritual blessings and authority and power that are his rightful inheritance in Christ. We may rest from personal struggle because every spiritual foe that we face already has been defeated by our Joshua (Heb. 3:12—4:8). (See F. B. Meyer, Joshua and the Land of Promise [n.d.]; C. Armerding, The Fight for Palestine in the Days of Joshua [1949]; J. L. Kelso, Archaeology and Our Old Testament Contemporaries [1966], 47-48. For a summary of the modern debate regarding the historicity of the Joshua traditions, see G. W. Ramsey in ABD, 3:999-1000.) See also JOSHUA, BOOK OF.

(2) The owner of a field in the town of BETH SHEMESH (1 Sam. 6:14, 18). When the PHILISTINES returned the ARK OF THE COVENANT to the Israelites, the two cows pulling the cart “went straight up toward Beth Shemesh” and stopped near a large rock in Joshua’s field (v. 12). Using the cart for wood and the cows as sacrifice, the people offered a burnt offering to the Lord that very day. The Levites placed the ark on the rock, which became a witness to these events.

(3) A city governor in the days of King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:8). As part of the religious reform during his reign, Josiah “desecrated the high places, from Geba to Beersheba, where the priests had burned incense. He broke down the shrines at the gates—at the Gate of Joshua, the city governor, which is to the left of the city gate” (the pl. “gates” can be construed in more than one way; cf. M. Cogan and H. Tadmor, II Kings, AB 11 [1988], 286-87). It is usually assumed that the city in question is JERUSALEM, but an alternate view sees here a reference to BEERSHEBA (Y. Yadin in BASOR 222 [Aug. 1976]: 5-17; but see Z. Herzog et al. in BASOR 225 [Feb. 1977]: 49-58).

(4) Son of Jehozadak and high priest at the time of the return from Babylon and the rebuilding of the TEMPLE (Hag. 1:1 et al.). See JESHUA #1.

(5) Son of Eliezer, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:29; KJV, “Jose”).

Joshua, Book of. The sixth book of the OT. It is commonly regarded as the first of the historical books; in the Hebrew Bible, Joshua is the first of the Former Prophets. The book is named after JOSHUA, the leader of the Israelites during their invasion and settlement by tribes in the Promised Land.

8. Theology

I. Background. The events set forth in the book of Joshua follow immediately after the death of MOSES. The cultural and historical setting for the conquest of Palestine is similar to that of the exodus and the wilderness journey. The data for determining this background are supplied by the biblical records and archaeological research. The patriarchs sojourned in Canaan during what archaeologists call the Middle Bronze Age (2100-1550 B.C.). This was a time of change with the influx of new peoples such as the AMORITES. In the 19th and following centuries strongly fortified HYKSOS cities began to dot the land. ABRAHAM arrived at SHECHEM and BETHEL (Gen. 12) probably c. 2000 B.C. during the two centuries when settlements existed in the NEGEV (2100-1900) to sustain the caravan routes to Egypt (Gen. 12:9; 13:1-3; 20:1; 24:62). The narrative in Gen. 14 suggests a time after the collapse of the Sumerian UR III dynasty (2113-1991) but before the strong first dynasty of Babylon under HAMMURABI (1792-1750), when several kings in MESOPOTAMIA might well have formed a coalition for mutual assistance to raid the asphalt pits and copper mines S of the DEAD SEA.

JOSEPH probably rose to power as vizier of Egypt during that country's illustrious 12th dynasty (1991-1786 B.C.). It is known that Pharaoh Sesostri III (1878-1843) broke the power of the landed nobility, "reducing the monarchs to the status of servants of the crown and doing away with their feudal states" (W. C. Hayes, The Sceptre of Egypt, 2 vols. [1953], 1:196). The explanation of how he accomplished this may possibly be found in Gen. 47:13-26, the account of Joseph's buying up the fields of Egypt for Pharaoh. The cultural milieu of the Joseph narratives is thoroughly Egyptian, and the international political situation seems peaceful enough throughout the land, unbroken by the later strife caused by the foreign Hyksos rule in the NILE delta (1730-1570). The seat of government remained in the MEMPHIS area (just S of modern Cairo) throughout the 12th and 13th dynasties. The region of GOSHEN would have been a comfortable distance from the palace (Gen. 46:28-34).

The new king who arose over (or against) Egypt and “who did not know Joseph” (Exod. 1:8 NRSV), that is, who refused to recognize Joseph’s contribution to Egypt’s history, was likely a Hyksos ruler in the Nile delta region. If the Hyksos afflicted instead of favoring the Israelites, and forced them to build PITHOM and RAAMSES (the Hyksos capital also known as Avaris or Tanis, most likely to be identified with the site of Qantir in the NE delta), this would explain why Israel did not flee Egypt when native Egyptians thrust out the Hyksos before 1550 B.C.

The Pharaohs of the 18th dynasty (1567-1320) evidently continued to enslave the Israelites until Moses finally led them into Sinai. According to one view, this event took place c. 1445, that is, 480 years before SOLOMON began to build the temple (1 Ki. 6:1). The exodus would have occurred during the reign of Amenhotep II (1450-1425), following the long reign of the mighty THUTMOSE III (1483-1450), the oppressor of Israel from whom Moses fled after killing the Egyptian taskmaster (Exod. 2:15). While the capital of these kings was at THEBES in Upper Egypt, they had subsidiary palaces at Memphis, HELIOPOLIS (near Cairo), and probably Bubastis (see Pi BESETH), where Pharaoh could have been in residence during the time of the plagues. The exodus occurred 430 years after Israel had come to dwell in Egypt (Exod. 12:40; or as the SEPTUAGINT and the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH indicate, after he had come to dwell both in Canaan and in Egypt), returning with his family and flocks from PADAN ARAM. According to the 18th-dynasty date for the exodus, Joshua would have led Israel across the Jordan c. 1405, at the close of the Late Bronze I Age (1550-1400). After making the tribal allotments, Joshua lived on until 1390-1380, or even later. The period of the judges then would have lasted over 300 years until SAUL was anointed king c. 1040. This is known as the “early date” view of the exodus and conquest.

An alternate view dates Joseph’s career to the Hyksos period and the exodus during the reign of Pharaoh RAMSES II (1304-1237) or even of his successor MERNEPTAH (a stela of the latter mentioning Israel as being in Canaan makes any later date for the exodus highly improbable). Proponents of this view base their interpretation on the appearance of the name Raamses in Exod. 1:11, on the settled Edomite and Moabite towns and line of fortresses which archaeologists claim were not built until the 13th cent., and on the widespread destruction of Canaanite cities c. 1250-1200. Those who hold this “late date” view take the 480 years of 1 Ki. 6:1 to be a conventional number for twelve generations, supposedly lasting forty years each, but in actuality only about twenty-five years each. The exodus would be only 300 years before Solomon began his temple, or c. 1270. JEPHTAH’S figure of 300 years from Moses’ capture of HESHBON to his own day (Jdg. 11:26) cannot be taken literally, and the periods of rest (and perhaps of oppression as well) in the era of the judges must be foreshortened and/or drastically overlapped. (For an extensive defense of an early date, see J. J. Bimson, Redating the Exodus and the Conquest [1978]; cf. also B. K. Waltke in WTJ 52 [1990]: 181-200.) See also CHRONOLOGY (OT) IV; EXODUS, THE II.

Even more serious to the careful interpretation of Scripture, the adherents of the late date view find it necessary to reject the biblical picture of a unified movement of all twelve tribes from Egypt to Canaan under Moses and Joshua. They believe they must account for certain extrabiblical evidence, such as a seeming 14th-cent. date for the destruction of JERICHO and the occurrence in inscriptions of Seti I and Ramses II of the name Asher as a territory in southern Phoenicia. Some scholars admit that the term HABIRU, mentioned in the TELL EL-AMARNA Letters (c. 1390-1360), refers to bands of Hebrew Israelites. By suggesting that the supposed late documents that make up the sources of the Pentateuch and Joshua (the so-called JEDP theory) contain conflicting data, such scholars believe they are able to reevaluate the biblical statements and to see some of the Israelite tribes entering Palestine c. 1400 and others c. 1250. Some tribes supposedly may have infiltrated from the N, some from KADESH BARNEA into the NEGEV, and some crossed the Jordan to attack Jericho. Some tribal groups may never have left Canaan to sojourn in Egypt. (For an extreme fragmentation of the settlement of Canaan by the various clans or tribes, which later amalgamated under the name of Israel, see N. K. Gottwald, A Light to the Nations [1959], 152-65, and his later work, The Tribes of Yahweh: A Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel, 1250-1050 B.C.E. [1979, reprinted with new preface, 1999].)

This picture of the conquest and settlement differs greatly from that presented in the books of Moses and of Joshua. The Bible indicates that all twelve sons of Jacob were with him in Egypt, all twelve tribes were at Mount Sinai when God gave them the covenant and the laws and were numbered there, all were present at Kadesh Barnea, and all encamped at ABEL SHITTIM where another census was taken. All twelve tribes crossed the Jordan together with Joshua and erected two monuments of twelve stones each, all assembled at Mount Ebal, and all the tribes received their territorial allotments from either Moses or Joshua before they began to settle. To argue for two or three successive waves of conquest or infiltration is to invalidate the biblical record.

According to the early date view, by the time of the Israelite invasion of Canaan, Pharaoh Amenhotep III (1417-1379) was losing interest in his Asiatic territories. The campaigns of Thutmose III and his successors into Palestine and the oppressive administration of their oft-corrupt commissioners had seriously weakened the feudal system and towns established by the Hyksos. Most of the petty kings of Canaan and Syria soon revolted from Egypt or stopped paying annual tribute. CUNEIFORM tablets found at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt, the site of the capital of Amenhotep's son AKHENATEN (1379-1362), are part of the royal archives of these two pharaohs. The majority were letters from vassal princes in Palestine and Syria pleading for aid from the Pharaoh against neighboring city-states or against the Habiru (cuneiform ideogram SA.GAZ). Apparently most of these pleas went unanswered. The silence in the books of Joshua and Judges concerning Egypt thus may be explained by the fact that Egypt had a weak foreign policy from Amenhotep III until Seti I (1318-1304), the next pharaoh to march into Palestine. Even then the Egyptian armies did not always attempt to invade the mountains but stuck to the coastal route when going to campaign against the HITTITES in Syria.

The Amarna tablets show that the book of Joshua accurately portrays the political situation in Canaan—a country divided into numerous small feudal city-states prone to war with one another. It is perhaps significant that none of the extant Amarna letters come from or mention Jericho, Ai, Bethel, or Gibeon, cities destroyed or controlled by Joshua and the Israelites. Cities not captured or not permanently occupied by Israel are those from which letters were sent to Egypt requesting help—Jerusalem, Gezer, Lachish, Jarmuth, and Eglon. The Amarna correspondence seems to reflect the situation in Palestine early in the period of the judges, although probably not during the time of the conquest itself under Joshua. (See Gleason L. Archer, A Survey of Old Testament Introduction, 3rd ed. [1994], 288-95.)

By the period of Joshua and the Judges, Canaanite religion had become exceedingly degraded. The chief emphasis was upon fertility and sex. The Ras Shamra tablets (see UGARIT) reveal the licentious and brutal characteristics of Baal, Anath, Ashtoreth, Asherah, and other deities. The extant relics of fertility cult practices and serpent worship unearthed at Beth Shan, Megiddo, Hazor, Gezer, etc., and evidence of child sacrifice as in a foundation at Dothan, bear mute testimony to the need for strong measures on the part of the invading Israelites.

Joshua divided the land among the twelve tribes of Israel.

Since sacred PROSTITUTION and other religious practices were spiritually contaminating, one can understand why God commanded Israel to exterminate the seven nations in Canaan. In holy war they and their cities were to be devoted to destruction lest the religious life of God's people be endangered through contact with such idolatrous peoples (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [1957], 230-35, 281; Archer, Survey, 296-99).

II. Authorship and date. The book of Joshua in its present form appears to be a literary unit, composed by an anonymous author. Critical scholars have insisted that the book is a composite work of several source documents, later compiled, revised, and supplemented by various Deuteronomistic editors (see DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY). When one recognizes the different types of literary materials found in the book of Joshua—narrative, topographic description, exhortation—there remain no strong arguments against its internal unity.

Artur Weiser (The Old Testament: Its Formation and Development, 4th ed. [1961], 143-47) and Gerhard von Rad (Old Testament Theology, 2 vols. [1962], 1:296-305) are typical of modern critics in their views of the sources used in Joshua. They say that the book belongs to the PENTATEUCH in that it continues the story of those books, but the method of using the various strands or sources is different. The basis of Josh. 1-12 is mainly the "E" (Elohistic) strand, though later revised by the Deuteronomistic school. In chs. 2-9 "E" has transformed old Benjamite traditions, presumably nurtured at the tribal sanctuary of Gilgal, into a narrative of the conquest of central Canaan by all of Israel under Joshua. In ch. 10 "E" uses a piece of an old Ephraimite heroic saga, in which the figure of Joshua was original, and combines it with a song about Joshua out of the Book of JASHAR (10:12-14), and in ch. 11 employs an equally isolated Galilean tradition. A few traces of the Yahwist or "J" (Jehovistic) writer still may be seen in 5:13, 14; 9:6-7; 17:14-18. These "E" and "J" strands were not shaped until early in the monarchy. A major Deuteronomistic revision that agreed with the E tradition of the conquest of Canaan took place around the time of King JOSIAH, perhaps to reflect the northward expansion of the kingdom of Judah during his reign. The “D” (Deuteronomistic) additions were chiefly ch. 1; 10:16-43 and 11:10—12:24 (lists of captured towns and kings); 21:43—22:6; and ch. 23; ch. 24 is substantially “E” with “D” editing. Later, in the time of EZRA, the “P” (Priestly) writer(s) added most of the contents of chs. 13—21 and 22:7-34.

Other scholars, especially Martin Noth (Das Buch Joshua [1938]) and John Bright (in IB, 2:541-48), reject this analysis, claiming that it is impossible to trace out Pentateuchal documents in Joshua. The only literary contact on which a majority of scholars are agreed is with the book DEUTERONOMY itself, so the book of Joshua is described as “thoroughly Deuteronomic” in its present form.

It is true that the author of the book of Joshua did make use of sources. He specifically refers to the Book of Jashar (Josh. 10:13) and indicates that Joshua ordered a description of the land to be written (18:9). Joshua himself wrote the words of the covenant renewal and various statutes and ordinances for the people in the book of the law of God at Shechem (24:25-26). Furthermore, a comparison of Josh. 6:26 with 1 Ki. 16:34 suggests that Joshua also wrote down the oath he made regarding Jericho and the curse upon any future rebuilding; the passage in 1 Kings says literally that HIEL restored Jericho at the cost of his two sons, Aerial view of OT Jericho (looking SE). The Lord gave Joshua and the Israelites a memorable victory over this city.

according to the word of the Lord which he spoke “by Joshua the son of Nun” (16:34).

Joshua cannot have been the final author of the book bearing his name, since it records his death (Josh. 24:29-30). While the TALMUD attributes the book to Joshua, it explains that this death notice was written by ELEAZAR the priest, and that his son PHINEHAS appended the last verse (24:33) to finish the book (b. Baba Batra, 14b-15b). Several events are mentioned that did not occur until after Joshua’s death: Caleb’s conquest of HEBRON (15:13-14; cf. Jdg. 1:1, 10, 20), OTHNIEL’S capture of DEBIR (Josh. 15:15-19; cf. Jdg. 1:1, 11-15), and the migration of the Danites to Leshem/LAISH (Josh. 19:47; cf. Jdg. 17-18) at a time after idolatry was tolerated in Israel (idolatry was apparently held in check during Joshua’s lifetime, Josh. 24:31). The author evidently employs the name HORMAH (12:14; 15:30; 19:4) for the town earlier known as ZEPHATH, and the name was not changed until the days of the Judges (Jdg. 1:16-17). The phrase “all the Hittite country” (Josh. 1:4) in referring to Syria SW of the EUPHRATES would not have been historically accurate until the takeover of that territory by King Suppiluliuma c. 1350 B.C. The phrase is not in Deut. 11:24.

On the other hand, the author was an eyewitness of some of the events he described. He speaks of the Lord’s blocking Jordan “until we had crossed over” (Josh. 5:1 [following the Ketib], italics added).

Excavation Area A of OT Jericho (looking N from the southern base of the tell). Defensive walls like these, built before the time of Joshua, may have continued to function until the time of his attack against this city.

He identifies Israel’s previous generation by saying, “For the LORD had sworn to them that they would not see the land that he had solemnly promised their fathers to give us” (5:6, italics added). RAHAB was still living at the time of writing (6:25). After outlining their boundaries the author himself addresses Judah directly: “This shall be your south boundary” (15:4 NRSV). Consider also his detailed narratives (2:3-22; 3:14-17; 4:8-18; 7:16-26) and the repeated use of preconquest place names (15:9, 49, 54).

The book must be pre-Solomonic, since Canaanites still held GEZER (Josh. 16:10; cf. 1 Ki. 9:16), and pre-Davidic, because JERUSALEM was still inhabited by the Jebusites (Josh. 15:8, 63; cf. 1 Sam. 5:5-9 and see JEBUS). It must have been written before the reign of King SAUL, who massacred many Gibeonites and planned to destroy them all (2 Sam. 21:1-9), because the Gibeonites were still servants around the tabernacle at the time of writing (Josh. 9:27). One can also argue that the book is earlier than the 12th cent., because SIDON rather than TYRE is considered to be the leading city of PHOENICIA (11:8; 19:28), and the people of that region are called Sidonians (13:4-6), whereas Tyre gained the ascendancy over Sidon c. 1200. At the time of writing, moreover, the PHILISTINES were not yet considered to be a menace, occupying at that time only a part of the “south” (Negev), along with the Geshurites and the Avvim; and the territory as a whole was reckoned as Canaanite (13:2b-4a; the Philistines are mentioned only here in Joshua). Not until after 1200, according to the Egyptian records of Ramses III, did the Philistines come in force to the Palestinian coastal plain (for corroborating archaeological evidence see K. M. Kenyon, Archaeology in the Holy Land [1960], 221-32).

Since the author follows the style that Moses employed in writing the book of Deuteronomy, and since he seemingly had access to Joshua himself in order to learn of the leader’s private confrontation with the Lord near Jericho (Josh. 5:13-15), a proposed author has been PHINEHAS, the last person named in the book (24:33). Phinehas, the son and successor of Eleazar the high priest, stood firmly for the Lord at PEOR (Num. 25:7-13) and fought the Midianites, killing BALAAM (31:6-8). He, rather than Joshua, is the prominent figure in settling the dispute over the altar erected by the two and one-half eastern tribes in the Jordan valley (Josh. 22:10-34). He would have been about forty years old at the time of the invasion of Canaan, apparently having been born in Egypt before the exodus (Exod. 6:25). Joshua may have lived until c. 1380, Eleazar a few more years, and Phinehas until perhaps 1360-1350, living to be eighty or ninety years old. Thus Phinehas could have written during the judgeship of Othniel (Jdg. 3:8-11; cf. Josh. 15:17). He was given a town in the hill country of Ephraim (Josh. 24:33).

On the other hand, there are indications that the writer may have been an unnamed priest closely associated with Phinehas, but who resided within Judah, perhaps even in Hebron, one of the cities of refuge (Josh. 20:7; 21:13). Special interest is shown in Hebron in describing its being assigned to Caleb before any other allotments were made (14:6-15), in relating its recapture by Caleb (15:13-14; cf. 10:36-37), and in naming it not only first but with special notation among the forty-eight cities for the Levites (21:11-13). The far greater familiarity with the territory finally occupied by the tribe of Judah (cf. the detailed account of the southern campaign, 10:1-43) and the lengthy list of the borders and towns of Judah (15:1-63) may indicate that this became the author's homeland. He only sketchily traces the borders of the important Joseph tribes to the N, even though within them lay both Shiloh and Shechem (chs. 16-17).

If he lived in Judah, it is understandable that he might list the geographical areas of that territory first without specifying that the hill country near the Negev belonged to Judah (Josh. 11:16). Since there is repeated mention of the fact that no territorial inheritance was allotted to the tribe of Levi (13:14, 33; 14:3-4; 18:7), perhaps he was a Levite if not a priest (see J. J. Lias, Joshua, in Pulpit Commentary 3 [1881], xi-xii). Whoever the author, his book evidences thorough knowledge of and dependence on the fourth and fifth books of Moses (e.g., cf. the description of Aroer in Josh. 13:9 with that in Deut. 2:36).

III. Destination and purpose. Just as Moses wrote down the words and works of God and had the scroll(s) placed beside the ARK OF THE COVENANT in the sanctuary to remain there as a witness to the nation (Deut. 31:9, 24-27), so also later prophets such as SAMUEL wrote additional material "in the book" (MT, bassēper, 1 Sam. 10:25) and laid it up before the Lord. Evidently true prophets of the Lord were enrolled in the register of the house of Israel (Ezek. 13:9), implying that they and their writings were accepted during their own lifetimes as having divine authority. The book of Joshua would likewise have been added to the sacred Scriptures of Moses soon after writing, and kept along with them in the tabernacle for the benefit of God's chosen people and their anointed leaders. The Scriptures were to be read periodically at the time of the annual feasts and on special occasions of covenant renewal, as in the time of EZRA and NEHEMIAH (Neh. 8-9).

The book of Joshua was written to continue the sacred history of Israel begun in the Pentateuch. Deuteronomy set forth the historical basis of God's election of Israel and fully stated the COVENANT (or theocratic constitution), which was revised and mediated to Israel afresh by Moses before his death. The book of Joshua proceeds to show how this chosen people under the covenant became established in its Promised Land. Herein is found the record of Yahweh's faithfulness to his covenants with the patriarchs and with the nation (first given to it at Sinai). This Scripture is to inspire and guide God's people to corresponding covenant loyalty and unity and high morale in future generations.

The fundamental purpose of all of the prophetic books of the Hebrew canon is to exhort and warn Israel to return and adhere to the Mosaic covenant (Neh. 9:30; Zech. 7:8-12). This book teaches that God is fully able to perform all of his good promises to his people (Josh. 21:45), that he is ever guiding them and overruling in the dangers that beset them. By comparing, for instance, the lengthy record of ACHAN'S sin and punishment (ch. 7) with the brief report of the whole northern campaign (11:1-15), it becomes apparent that there is a selection of materials in the account of the conquest—much interesting factual data is obviously omitted. The clear aim is to set forth moral and religious lessons and to demonstrate that Israel is God's chosen agent for the carrying forward of his purposes on earth.

IV. Canonicity. In the Hebrew Bible, Joshua heads the division known as the Former Prophets, which covers Israelite history from the conquest to the Babylonian exile; it includes the books of Joshua, Judges, 1-2 Samuel, and 1-2 Kings. See CANON (OT).

As already noted, Martin Noth and others claim that this theological history of Israel in Palestine began with the book of Deuteronomy as its introduction. It is clear, however, that in Jewish history Deuteronomy always has been considered as part of the TORAH, as one of the five books of the law. In 2 Ki. 14:6 the statement that King AMAZIAH followed what was written in the Book of the Law of Moses is accompanied by a quotation in full of Deut. 24:16. The postbiblical book of ECCLESIASTICUS, both in the translator's foreword and in the text, distinguishes between the Law and the Prophets (Sir. 45:21; 48:22—49:12). When asked which is the great commandment in the law, Jesus Christ replied by quoting Deut. 6:5 (Matt. 22:36-38). Likewise he attributed the provision for divorce in the law (found in Deut. 24:1-4) to Moses (Matt. 19:8), not to some later writer. The apostles continued to recognize statements in Deuteronomy as belonging to Moses (Acts 3:22, citing Deut. 18:15) or as written in the law of Moses (1 Cor. 9:9, citing Deut. 25:4; Heb. 10:28-30, referring to Deut. 17:6; 19:15; 32:35-36). JOSEPHUS (Ag. Ap. 1.7-8) clearly states that the Jews of his day had five books belonging to Moses, and thirteen by prophets who wrote down what was done in their times from the death of Moses till the reign of ARTAXERXES.

Further difficulties for the theory of a Deuteronomistic History of Israel occur in the lack of any recognizable Deuteronomistic framework (the covenant renewal pattern of Deuteronomy and Joshua) for the books of Judges through 2 Kings. The Deuteronomistic style that purportedly characterizes Joshua is not evident in Judges, as the critics S. R. Driver and C. F. Burney admit.

The older theory that Joshua was the sixth book of a late Jewish collection dubbed the HEXATEUCH is also unrealistic. This view seems first to have been suggested by Alexander Geddes in 1792. It was developed in line with the documentary (JEDP) theory of the Pentateuch by such critical scholars as Bleek, Knobel, and Nöldeke in the 19th cent. The classic presentation in English of the Hexateuchal analysis and its defense is by J. E. Carpenter and G. Harford-Battersby (The Hexateuch, 2 vols. [1900]). It was argued that there must be a suitable conclusion to the story of Israel's beginnings described in the first five books of the OT. The theme of the Promised Land permeates the Pentateuch from Abraham to the Israelites' wilderness wanderings; it is said that without Joshua the narrative would be incomplete. Furthermore, source analysis spotted the familiar Pentateuchal documents in the sixth book. Especially the P source was thought to be present in Joshua but not in the subsequent books of Judges – 2 Kings.

The term Hexateuch has no basis, however, in Jewish tradition. There is no evidence that Joshua was ever considered as forming a unit with the five books of Moses. Evidence already has been given that the Law always was distinguished from the other books. Joshua was not included in the annual and triennial systems of reading the Law, whereas selections from Joshua were included in the Haphtaroth (selected readings from the Prophets).

As E. J. Young (Introduction to the Old Testament [1949], 158) points out, there are linguistic peculiarities in the Pentateuch that do not appear in Joshua. In the former, the masculine singular personal pronoun (hû' H2085) is commonly used for both genders, but not in Joshua. The name Jericho is spelled yěreḥô in the Pentateuch (e.g., Num. 22:1; Deut. 32:49) but yěriḥô in Joshua (Josh. 2:1 et al.). The phrase “Yahweh, the God of Israel” occurs fourteen times in Joshua but is very rare in the Pentateuch.

Even from the standpoint of documentary analysis, the idea of a Hexateuch is inconsistent. In Genesis-Numbers, the Priestly source supposedly provides the framework, but in Joshua, P is said to appear only in the section about the land allotments (Josh. 13-22). If the alleged sources of the Pentateuch are continuous and run through Joshua, why is P completely absent from Deuteronomy and from Joshua 1-12; 23-24?

The strongest argument against a Hexateuch is that the SAMARITANS considered only the Pentateuch to be canonical. For them, Joshua was not considered part of the canon even though it contains various elements that would have commended it to Samaritan sectarianism. It features Shechem (their city of Nablus is next to Shechem) as a city of refuge and the center where all the tribes of Israel were gathered for the covenant renewal ceremony (Josh. 24:1) and where Joseph's bones were finally buried (24:32). No intimation of Jerusalem's future importance as Israel's center of worship is to be found. It even describes the formal reading of the law by the entire nation at the foot of Mount GERIZIM (8:33), where the Samaritans later worshiped (cf. Jn. 4:20). As G. L. Archer concludes, “the only possible explanation for the failure of the Samaritans to include Joshua in their authoritative canon was that it was not actually a part of the Mosaic Torah. The Torah must, therefore, have existed as a separate Pentateuch at the time of the Samaritan schism” (Survey, 288).

Actually, the connection of Joshua with Deuteronomy is no closer than its connection with Judges. Both the books of Joshua and Judges begin with an identical formula, wayhî ’aḥārê môt, lit., “And after the death of...” The most logical explanation is that the Scriptures are one record, since by divine INSPIRATION they have one ultimate Author. Thus each human writer, performing the function of a prophet, added to the existing Word that already had been recorded and recognized as canonical. On the other hand, the various higher-critical theories have proved to be destructive of one another, without proposing an explanation in line with Jewish tradition and the Bible’s own testimony concerning itself.

That the book of Joshua was accepted by the early church as the Word of God may be seen in the quotation from Josh. 1:5 to be found in Heb. 13:5, “for he has said, ‘I will never fail you or forsake you’” (NRSV). Numerous other references may be found in the NT to persons and events mentioned in Joshua, showing that there was no doubt as to the authenticity of its record.

V. Text and versions. The Hebrew text of Joshua contains relatively few corruptions. B. J. Roberts lists five or six minor scribal errors that have crept into the MT of this book (The Old Testament Text and Versions [1951], 96-98). The Hebrew MSS from the Qumran caves, especially the fragments from Cave IV, indicate that there was existent in Palestine a Hebrew text of Joshua somewhat different from the MT and closer to the text that lies behind the SEPTUAGINT. The DSS “establish once for all that in the historical books the Septuagint translators faithfully and with extreme literalness reproduced their Hebrew Vorlage” (F. M. Cross, Jr., The Ancient Library of Qumran and Modern Biblical Studies [1958], 134). Whether the LXX-type text is superior to the MT must be decided in the case of each individual reading.

In general, however, it would seem that no important corrections are suggested by the LXX. Its rendering of geographical names is unreliable. A. S. Geden (ISBE [1929], 3:1751) lists a number of slight variations from the MT in the last six chapters of Joshua. There remains some question as to which LXX recension, the Lucianic or the shorter form, preserves the more original Greek text. (A comprehensive critical edition of the LXX was produced by M. L. Margolis, The Book of Joshua in Greek, 5 vols. [vols. 1-4, 1931-38; vol. 5, 1992]; see also L. J. Greenspoon, Textual Studies in the Book of Joshua [1983]; M. N. van der Meer, Formation and Reformulation: The Redaction of the Book of Joshua in the Light of the Oldest Textual Witnesses [2004].) The value of the other ancient versions for the restoration of the Hebrew text is minimal; most of them are secondary, rendered from the Greek LXX.

VI. Special problems. These may be designated as theological, archaeological, and exegetical.

A. Theological. Many preachers and writers have sensed a contradiction between the goodness and love of God and his command to exterminate the Canaanites (Deut. 7:1-5; 20:16-18; Josh. 11:20). Typical is the view that “the God of Joshua is infinitely remote from the God of Jesus,” that he is “a purely nationalistic deity, a God of Battles whose power is chiefly manifested in the prosecution of Holy War” (The Oxford Annotated Bible, ed. H. G. May and B. M. Metzger [1962], 263).

In answering such a charge, we must recognize that God is one, that he does not change, that he is the same both in the OT and the NT. He shows love and mercy both to the heathen (e.g., to Nineveh, Jon. 4:11) and to Israel in the OT; and he shows wrath and takes vengeance on the wicked and idolaters in the NT (e.g., on the money-changers, Jn. 2:14-16; cf. Rom. 2:1-9; Eph. 4:17-24; 5:3-11; 2 Thess. 1:5-9; Rev. 21:8). God is no respecter of persons. Equally severe judgment was inflicted upon false prophets and idolaters among the ranks of Israel (Exod. 32:25-29, 35; Deut. 13:1-18). God warned his own chosen people of the consequences of disobedience, and later executed punishment upon them by the sword of cruel nations. He will do so again in the end time when Jerusalem will be besieged and trodden down yet once more (Lk. 21:24; Rev. 11:2; 13:5).

But why exterminate the Canaanites? Were they actually more wicked in Joshua's day than other idolatrous peoples on earth? The Aztecs and Mayas of Central America, for instance, practiced human sacrifice. But in his inscrutable wisdom God selected Canaan, not another region, as the land he promised to Abraham. He considered it to be at the center (lit., "navel") of the earth (Ezek. 38:12; cf. 5:5); hence it would exert an influence on the rest of the world throughout history out of all proportion to its size.

Did the Canaanites bear a greater responsibility? In Joshua's time Canaan benefited from civilizations on either side that were already illustrious and old. Furthermore, the Canaanites were sinning against spiritual light. In the days of MELCHIZEDEK and ABRAHAM, they had a witness from the one true God, they saw divine judgment fall upon SODOM and its sister cities, and before the conquest they quaked to hear about him (Josh. 2:8-11). God delayed judging Canaan because in Abraham's time "the sin of the Amorites has not yet reached its full measure" (Gen. 15:16). Baalism had not yet developed: BAAL is never mentioned in the patriarchal narratives, and EL was still the high god of the Canaanites according to the Ugaritic epics. By 1400 B.C. the Canaanite civilization and religion had become one of the weakest, most decadent, and most immoral cultures of the civilized world. Many of its repulsive practices were prohibited to Israel in Lev. 18. In view of the sexual perversions listed, it is more than likely that venereal diseases ravaged a large part of the population. Hence stern measures were required to prevent decimation of the Israelites by the spread of these and other diseases such as malaria and smallpox. Contagion would be possible by sudden fraternization before immunity could develop (R. E. D. Clark, The Christian Stake in Science [1967], 55, 150). Yet in his control of history God grants freedom of will and motive to his agents. He is not therefore responsible for their greed and atrocities.

Finally, it should be noted that in the midst of wrath Yahweh remembered mercy. Rahab and her family were spared, delivered from death "by grace through faith." For the significance of people and things cursed and devoted to destruction (Josh. 6:17-21; 8:21-29), see DEVOTED (THINGS); for the concept of holy war (5:13-15), see WAR.

B. Archaeological. The proper interpretation and dating of mute archaeological findings taxes the skill of the most experienced excavator. With regard to JERICHO, Kathleen M. Kenyon believes her excavations have shown that the strong Middle Bronze Age Hyksos city lay abandoned from c. 1550 to c. 1400 B.C. Most of the evidence for a town during the Late Bronze Age had been removed by previous expeditions or had disappeared through erosion. But burials in tombs and stratification on the town site (a portion of a house floor with an oven and juglet) testify to occupation in the Late Bronze Age II. Kenyon dated this to the 14th cent. B.C., but not the 13th. Her dating, based on meager evidence, is within fifty years of the early date of the conquest, but clearly does not aid the late date theory ("Jericho," in Archaeology and Old Testament Study, ed. D. W. Thomas [1967], 271-75).

The identification of AI with any known archaeological site cannot yet be established. The imposing ruins of Khirbet et-Tell, 2 mi. ESE of BETHEL and covering an area of c. 25 acres, well fits the biblical geographical description (Josh. 7:2; 8:9, 12). French (1933-35) and American (1964, 1966) expeditions have discovered, however, that there was no Middle or Late Bronze occupation of the mound. While it was one of the best-fortified cities in the Early Bronze Age (c. 2900-2500 B.C.) and villagers settled there from 1200 to 1000, “nothing in the present evidence warrants an identification of the village with the city of Ai captured by Joshua as described in Josh. 8:1-29” (J. A. Callaway in BASOR 178 [April 1965]: 27-28). Soundings in the vicinity at Khirbet Haiyan, in a yard of a resident of the modern village of Deir Dibwan, and at Khirbet Khudriya have produced no remains of a settlement as early as the OT period. Perhaps Ai was ENE of Bethel, at or near Rimmon (Jdg. 20:45). This puzzle has spawned such attempted explanations as the view that Ai was simply a military outpost of Bethel, leaving no occupational debris; or that Josh. 7-8 really refers to the destruction of Bethel (cf. Jdg. 1:22-25), the story being changed etiologically to explain the ruins of et-Tell.

C. Exegetical. The proper understanding of the so-called “long-day” passage (Josh. 10:12-14) remains a crux interpretum for the biblical scholar. Did God miraculously prolong the daylight about a whole day? A number of modern commentators have suggested that instead of asking for a lengthened day, Joshua prayed that the sun and moon would, literally, be dumb or keep silent, that is, cease their normal “speech” of shining. The reason for this request is that following their all-night forced march from Gilgal, Joshua’s troops would become exhausted quickly by having to pursue the Amorites in the hot sunlight. God answered miraculously by sending an unseasonal storm with destructive hailstones (Archer, Survey).

J. S. Holladay (in JBL 87 [1968]: 166-78) presents an alternate view in keeping with the ancient practice of observing the astral bodies. If the full moon first appears opposite the rising sun on the fourteenth day of the lunar month (i.e., at mid-month), things are in balance and normal, suggesting that prosperity and victory will ensue (cf. “The Creation Epic,” 5.18, in ANET, 68). Hence Joshua asked for the sun and moon to stand in opposition at dawn as a sign or good omen of victory, that this day might be auspicious, even as Gideon asked for signs with respect to his fleece. See also DAY, JOSHUA’S LONG.

VII. Content and outline. The book of Joshua divides easily into two equal parts: conquest (Josh. 1-12) and settlement (chs. 13-24). The first division recounts how Joshua must both lead Israel across the Jordan and break the fighting potential of the Canaanites. The Lord enabled him to face several problems: his own doubts (1:1—9); the two and one-half eastern tribes (1:12-18); the defenders of Jericho who would perhaps be patrolling the W bank of the Jordan (but the spies reported that the terrified inhabitants had barricaded themselves in Jericho, ch. 2); fording the flooded Jordan (chs. 3-4); and dealing with “the reproach of Egypt” by circumcising the men of Israel at Gilgal (5:2-9).

By means of the sound military strategy of “divide and conquer,” and by brilliant field tactics, Joshua was enabled to capture the key fortresses guarding the trade routes to the highlands. In times of crisis divine power was manifested to reduce strong cities (Josh. 6) or to wipe out superior armies (10:10-11); but usually Joshua employed tactics known to Hittite commanders of that day, such as surprise attacks, night marches, rapid marches by a “flying column,” and destruction of enemies in the open and burning their cities rather than long sieges and stationing garrisons in every captured town (see JNES 25 [1966]: 162-91). Since it was a holy war, sin in his own camp could not go unpunished (ch. 7), and worship and covenant ceremony must have priority over further conquest (8:30-35).

Failure to seek the mind of the Lord as to the identity of the Gibeonites led Joshua to make an unholy alliance that generations later erupted in much bitterness and grief (ch. 9; cf. 2 Sam. 21:1-14).

In the second division of the book, Israel's settlement lists embrace Joshua's territorial allotments made at Gilgal (Josh. 13-17) and at Shiloh (chs. 18-21), including the CITIES OF REFUGE and Levitical towns, before the tribes had begun to colonize their portions. The method of delineating borders by naming towns and topographical landmarks was also used at that time by the Hittites in Syria. The partitioning of the land was no simple task, but a complex one that demanded wisdom, careful direction, and considerable time.

Joshua's final acts sought to prepare the nation to love and continue on with their faithful God after his own decease. Peace was restored between eastern and western tribes (Josh. 22); he urged the officials to cleave to the Lord (ch. 23); and he gathered all the people to Shechem to lead them formally and solemnly to pledge anew their covenant allegiance to God (ch. 24). The book may be outlined as follows.

1. The conquest of Canaan (Josh. 1-12)
  1. Preparation for the conquest (1:1—5:12)
    1. Divine charge to Joshua (1:1-9)
    2. Joshua's orders for the invasion (1:10-18)
    3. Mission of the two spies (2:1-24)
    4. Crossing the Jordan (3:1—5:1)
    5. Ceremonies at Gilgal (5:2-12)
  2. Conduct of the campaigns (5:13—11:15)
    1. Central campaign (5:13—8:29)
    2. Covenant ceremony at Ebal (8:30-35)
    3. Southern campaign (9:1—10:43)
    4. Northern campaign (11:1-15)
  3. Summary of Israel's wars (11:16—12:24)
    1. Territorial conquests of Joshua (11:16-23)
    2. Kings conquered by Moses (12:1-6)
    3. Catalog of kings defeated by Joshua (12:7-24)
2. The settlement in Canaan (chs. 13-24)
  1. Allotment of the Promised Land (13:1—21:45)
    1. Divine command to divide the land (13:1-7)
    2. Territories of the eastern tribes (13:8-33)
    3. Beginning of the distribution of Canaan (14:1-15)
    4. Territory of the tribe of Judah (15:1-63)
    5. Territories of the Joseph tribes (16:1—17:18)
    6. Partition for the seven remaining tribes (18:1—19:51)
    7. City-inheritances of Levi (20:1-21:42)
    8. Summary of the settlement (21:43-45)
  2. Consecration of the chosen people (22:1—24:28)
    1. Peace restored with the eastern tribes (22:1-34)
    2. Joshua's final charge to the elders (23:1-16)
    3. National covenant renewal at Shechem (24:1-28)
  3. Epilogue: death of Joshua and subsequent conduct of Israel (24:29-33).

VIII. Theology. Meaning is found in Israel's history as one understands the theology of Yahweh's covenants with the nation. The Promised Land is given by God to his people as their conditional inheritance, contingent upon obedient loyalty to the Mosaic covenant. In each generation the tribes must renew the vows taken by their ancestors at Sinai. This step of recommitment they took upon Joshua's exhortation (Josh. 24:14-24). God is shown to be utterly faithful to his covenants with the patriarchs and the theocratic nation by fighting for them, winning their battles, and settling the tribes in their promised homeland (4:23-24; 10:14; 11:6-8; 21:43-45; 23:3, 9-10; 24:2-13, 18). The triumph of faith is stressed in Joshua as it portrays an entire nation marching unitedly to victory in total dependence upon the Lord.

The spiritual victory God provides in Christ is beautifully pictured in this book. The very name "Joshua," the Greek form of which is "Jesus," means "Yahweh is salvation." The redemptive history of Israel's crossing the Jordan, battling the Canaanites, and possessing her inheritance illustrates the Christian's spiritual experience of conflict, triumph, and blessing in the "heavenly realms" (Eph. 1:3; 2:6; 6:12) through the mighty power of God (1:19, 20; 6:10).

According to Isa. 49:8, the predicted MESSIAH will be a second Joshua whom God gives as a covenant to the people to establish the land and apportion the desolate heritages (cf. Josh. 1:6). PAUL teaches that the events of the exodus and the conquest have typological significance (1 Cor. 10:1-11; see TYPOLOGY). Therefore Joshua serves as a type, prefiguring Jesus as the "captain" of our salvation (Heb. 2:10 KJV). As Joshua led the people of God into the Promised Land and allotted their territories, so Jesus brings believers today into Promised Rest (Heb. 4:8-9; Acts 20:32; 26:18). As Joshua interceded for Israel when the nation sinned and was defeated (Josh. 7:6-15), so Jesus is our Advocate who intercedes continually for his own (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 Jn. 2:1). As Joshua led the Israelites to victory over the enemies of God, so Christ makes possible victory over sin (Rom. 8:37; 2 Cor. 1:10; 2:14) and over Satan (Heb. 2:14-15; 1 Jn. 3:8).

Josiah joh-si'uh (יְחִישָׁיָה H3288, derivation uncertain, possibly "Yahweh heals"; Ἰωσίας G2739). (1) Son of AMON and sixteenth king of the southern kingdom of Judah (2 Ki. 22—23; 2 Chr. 34—35; Matt. 1:10—11). (2) Son of a certain Zephaniah; the prophet ZECHARIAH was told to go to Josiah's house and crown the high priest Joshua (JESHUA, Zech. 6:10). The rest of this article is devoted to King Josiah.

I. Chronology. Josiah's reign of thirty-one years (2 Ki. 22:1) ended with his death in battle at MEGIDDO, now firmly dated in June/July of 609 B.C. (cf. J. Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology, rev. ed. [1998], §430). The date 608 has been argued from the synchronism of JEHOIAKIM'S fourth year with NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S "first" (Jer. 25:1); but CARCHEMISH in 605 was also in Jehoiakim's fourth (46:1), and it can be shown that Jewish sources (2 Ki. 24:12; 25:8; Jer. 52:12, 28-30) reckoned an extra year to Nebuchadnezzar as compared with Babylonian sources (see D. N. Freedman in BA 19 [1956]: 50-60). The Babylonian Chronicle makes no reference to a major Egyptian expedition in 608. If Josiah died in 610/9 (fall reckoning), his reign began in 640/39.

II. Early years. After MANASSEH'S reign of terror, his son AMON (at twenty-two) showed similar tendencies. His assassins may have wanted a dynastic change or rebellion against Assyria (so A. Malamat in JNES 9 [1950]: 218-27); but the country party rejected them (2 Ki. 21:24), installing Josiah at the age of eight (there is slight textual support for "eighteen," but Amon's youth precludes this). There must have been a regency, controlled by supporters of the dynasty who welcomed relief from its misgovernment. As J. M. Myers suggests (II Chronicles, AB 13 [1965], 205), Zephaniah may well have had some influence. Josiah's active pursuit of a godly policy is dated from 631 B.C. (2 Chr. 34:3).

III. Contemporary events and foreign policy. Early in Josiah's reign, the Assyrian grip on Palestine was already relaxing, and Psamtik (Psammetichus) I was gradually reestablishing Egyptian authority on the coast of PHILISTIA. NABOPOLASSAR'S enthronement in BABYLON (Nov. 626 B.C.) heralded the extinction of the Assyrian empire; by 616, the situation was serious enough for Egypt to align herself with Assyria. NINEVEH fell in 612; Assyrian forces kept the field in upper Mesopotamia, with Egyptian support, until their final defeat at Carchemish.

Josiah, starting as Assyria's vassal at least in name, found increasing scope for acting independently. The covenant (622 B.C.), amounting to formal defiance of the Assyrian deity, brought no political repercussions; and it is possible, though perhaps irrelevant, that his assumption of authority in the provinces of Samaria (2 Ki. 23:19-20) and Megiddo could have been represented as in the Assyrian interest. Josiah may have hoped to restore the kingdom of DAVID; it should be noted, however, that the description of the land (23:8) is still “from Geba to Beersheba”; whereas, so far, none of the stamped jar handles associated with this reign have been found N of Tell en-Naṣbeh (see MIZPAH). It is going beyond the evidence to ascribe Josiah’s PASSOVER feast to an expansionist policy (J. Segal, The Hebrew Passover [1963], 216ff.).

Westward expansion may be attested by traces of settlement at Meṣad Hashavyahu (Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 403; for the theory that the boundary lists in Joshua relate to Josiah’s kingdom, see the discussion on pp. 347-49). Josiah married Hamutal of Libnah, perhaps for diplomatic reasons (2 Ki. 23:31; cf. 8:22), and Zebidah of Rumah (23:36; some emend to “Dumah”).

IV. Josiah’s reformation. In 2 Ki. 22:3-7, it is related that Josiah gave orders for major repairs to the TEMPLE in 622/1 B.C., during which the high priest found the Book of the Law (v. 8). The king was greatly shocked by what he read; when the prophetess HULDAH confirmed its message of doom, he held a national assembly to renew the COVENANT that it contained. This was followed by a purge of IDOLATRY, extended to Bethel and the Samaritan cities (23:4-20), and the Passover celebration (23:21-23). The narrative includes an appreciation of Josiah’s work (23:25) and records his death (23:28-30).

The Chronicler traces Josiah’s devotion from boyhood through his first reforms in 628/7 B.C. (2 Chr. 34-35). Having mentioned Josiah’s activity in Israel, the Chronicler describes how the book was found and the covenant made after “he had purged the land and the house” (34:8 NRSV). The effect in Israel is again noted (v. 33). The Passover is described, and characterized as surpassing all previous celebrations under the monarchy (35:18). In Kings, Josiah’s recall to the covenant is the most important event of the reign; Huldah’s prophecy holds the key—the curse must be fulfilled, but Josiah’s faith was accepted. To this, all else is incidental. The Chronicler is concerned mainly with the record of Israel’s last God-fearing king, and with the witness to God’s ordinances even in the shadow of disaster. The presentation in Kings is not incompatible with the earlier reforms recorded in Chronicles, which are implied in 2 Ki. 22:2 and indeed by the temple repair fund.

The covenant was established in the terms of the Book of the Law, which Josiah read at the ceremony. Many scholars (esp. those who reject the Chronicler’s account) have concluded that the reforms followed more or less specifically the directions of the book. This may be debated (see below); moreover, the book was found during the restoration of the temple, which would hardly have been undertaken without religious reform. Recognizing this, some scholars see Josiah as following HEZEKIAH’S lead toward making the temple the one and only sanctuary of the Lord, where the Passover would be kept. On this view, the book supported but did not inspire Josiah’s moves (see KD on 2 Chr. 35:19); and the Passover was not new in principle but in the number of participants and the ordering of the service (both 2 Ki. 23:22 and 2 Chr. 35:18 can be understood thus). Some authorities, however (e.g., J. Gray, A. Alt) see this Passover as instituting a “pilgrimage” in place of a family festival.

It is not clear whether the Passover was unique or a pattern for the rest of the reign. G. Widengren (in JSS 2 [1957]: 1-19) connects Passover and the covenant with the New Year as an annual ceremony (similarly, S. Mowinckel, Psalmstudien, 2 vols. [1961], 2:204-6). This means a fall Passover and a celebration at the beginning of Josiah’s eighteenth year, both very improbable—so much had already happened in that (regnal) year. The restoration of the temple may well have started in October (2 Ki. 22:3 LXX, though Keil [KD on 2 Chr. 35:19], reckons this detail “a worthless gloss”).

As with the Passover, the reformation does not seem to have originated with the book, though the covenant terms clearly denounced pagan worship to the point of allowing only one national place of sacrifice. It was the severity of the penalties in the covenant that alarmed Josiah. These penalties, the directions for the Passover, and the prohibition of idolatry, are all that we know directly of the book. On the reasonable assumption that it formed part of the PENTATEUCH, it was most probably DEUTERONOMY; of the principal alternatives, the EXODUS covenant does not specify penalties, whereas the “Holiness Code” (Lev. 17-26) barely mentions the Passover (23:5).

The explicit command in Deut. 12 to “centralize” worship has received so much attention that many scholars have inferred a direct connection and correspondence between the book and the reforms. H. H. Rowley (The Growth of the Old Testament, 3rd ed. [1967], 30) claims that only as regards country priests “did the reform not implement the provisions of Deuteronomy.” This is an exaggeration (J. Gray, I and II Kings: A Commentary, 2nd ed. [1970], 715n.); most of Deuteronomy relates to other things (A. Alt, Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel, 3 vols. [1953], 2:252ff., finds wide variations from the reform).

V. Death of Josiah. In the summer of 609 B.C., Josiah opposed the Egyptian army as it approached the MEGIDDO pass en route to support the Assyrian attempt to recapture HARAN. Despite assurance by NECO that he had no aggressive designs on Judah, Josiah persisted, and was defeated and mortally wounded. The account in 2 Ki. 23:29 is brief, and various reconstructions have been proposed. A. C. Welch (in ZAW 2 [1925]: 255-60) and others think that Neco summoned Josiah, but the details given in 2 Chr. 35:20-23 tell against this. English versions at v. 21 (e.g., NRSV, “against...against”) conceal a change in the Hebrew preposition: the phrase <sup>1</sup>el-bēt milḥamtī probably means “to my (forward) base” (cf. A. Malamat in JNES 9 [1950]: 218-27). Neco had no time to exploit his victory until the fall (see JEHOAHAZ). It is difficult to understand Josiah’s rash initiative. He may just have been opposing Egypt and Assyria on principle, or deliberately working with the Babylonians (D. N. Freedman in BA 19 [1956]: 52 n. 10; but this is highly inferential). Nevertheless, these events fulfilled the promise of 2 Ki. 22:20. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

jot jot. KJV transliteration of Greek iōta G2740 (Matt. 5:18; NIV, “smallest letter”). See DOT; IOTA; YOD.

Jotbah jot’buh (יִטְבָּהּ H3513, “pleasant”). Hometown of MESHULLEMETH, wife of King MANASSEH (2 Ki. 21:19). The town is possibly mentioned by TIGLATH-PILESER III in the account of his conquest of GALILEE (Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 372); and it is almost certainly the Jotapata that JOSEPHUS fortified and defended (War 2.20.6 §573). Jotbah is usually thought to be the same as modern Khirbet Jefat (Shifat), some 9 mi. NNW of NAZARETH (Aharoni, Land of the Bible, 403), but this identification has not been confirmed by archaeological finds. Alternate proposals are Kerem el-Ras, c. 4 mi. NNE of Nazareth (see ABD, 3:1020), and JOTBATHAH, to the far S, near the Gulf of AQABAH (see J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Kings, ICC [1951], 521).

Jotbath jot’bath. KJV alternate form of JOTBATHAH (Deut. 10:7).

Jotbathah jot’buh-thuh (יִטְבָּתָּהּ H3514, “pleasant”). A stopping place of the Israelites in their forty years of wilderness wanderings (Num. 33:33-34). They found it to be “a land with streams of water” (Deut. 10:7; KJV, “Jotbath”). Some scholars identify it with modern Ṭabeh, c. 6.5 mi. SW of ELATH (see Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 199-200).

Jotham joh’thuhm (יֹחָתָם H3462, “Yahweh is perfect” or “may Yahweh complete”). (1) Youngest son of GIDEON (Jerub-Baal). Jotham escaped the massacre of his family by the citizens of SHECHEM, who had been incited by his half-brother ABIMELECH (Jdg. 9:5). Upon hearing that Abimelech had been proclaimed king, Jotham went up to the top of Mount GERIZIM and spoke his famous fable of the trees, depicting Abimelech as a worthless bramble incapable of offering the men of Shechem security or profit. He then predicted their mutual destruction and fled to BEER (vv. 6-21). Three years later (v. 22), when Abimelech besieged THEBEZ, the curse was fulfilled (vv. 50-57).

View looking W at Mount Gerizim, from where Jotham told his famous fable of the trees.

(2) Son of JAHDAI and, apparently, a descendant of JUDAH somehow related to CALEB (1 Chr. 2:47).

(3) Son of UZZIAH (Azariah) and king of the southern kingdom of Judah (2 Ki. 15:32-38; 2 Chr. 26:21—27:9). The rest of this article is devoted to King Jotham.

I. Chronology. Jotham was made regent when his father Uzziah became ill (2 Ki. 15:5); Uzziah died about 740 B.C. and Jotham became king (v. 7). According to the narrative, Jotham began to reign in the second year of PEKAH of Israel (v. 30), and he was still on the throne when the Aramean REZIN began trying to force Judah into alliance against ASSYRIA. However, it was Jotham's son, AHAZ, who bore the brunt of this pressure (cf. Isa. 7) and who invoked help from Assyria, leading to the fall of DAMASCUS in 732. Ahaz was followed by HEZEKIAH, in whose fourteenth year (prob. 701) SENNACHERIB invaded Judah (2 Ki. 18:13). This implies that Ahaz began his sixteen-year reign about 730; it could be inferred that Jotham had surrendered the reins of government a few years earlier.

The dating of HOSHEA'S accession (731) in the twentieth year of Jotham (2 Ki. 15:30), and the allotting of only sixteen years for Jotham's reign (v. 33), may point to the same conclusion. Jotham's "twentieth year" may well be reckoned from his coregency; his "sixteen" could be taken in the same way (E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], 132), or emended to "six" (J. Gray, I and II Kings: A Commentary, 2nd ed. [1970], 57, 70). It is clear that the chronological data in 2 Ki. 15-18 is not based on a single system of reckoning. C. Schedl (VT 12 [1962]: 90-98) has propounded the theory that some of the original figures were increased by ten as a result of referring Jotham's sixteen years to the death of Uzziah, whereas Thiele shows that the synchronisms (in 17:1; 18:1, 9-10), which do not match with the remaining data, could arise from taking PEKAH'S years as following those of MENAHEM and PEKAHIAH, instead of running concurrently. Jotham on this basis became sole ruler in 740/39, and his reign ended effectively in 736/5 B.C. See also CHRONOLOGY (OT).

II. Regency. Jotham's position during his father's illness is described as being "over the house" (2 Ki. 15:5; NIV, "had charge of the palace"). As J. A. Montgomery (A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Kings, ICC [1951], 117) and H. Katzenstein (IEJ 10 [1960]: 149ff.) have shown, this office developed in importance during the monarchy; it is low on the list in 1 Ki. 4:6, whereas in 2 Ki. 19:2 the holder is principal deputy for the king. There is no hint elsewhere of this "chamberlain" having judicial functions, which properly belonged to the king; because Uzziah was not actually deposed, Jotham may have held the office purely for status, whereas he was in effect carrying out the royal functions.

It is interesting to compare this recorded coregency with those inferred by Thiele to solve chronological problems of the divided monarchy. JEHOSEPHAT, probably coregent because of ASA's incapacitation, provides the clearest precedent. The lack of an explicit statement about Jehoshaphat's coregency may reflect the difference in circumstances; though Asa's disease is noted in a context of spiritual failing, there was no dramatic event of direct interest to the biblical historians that would have led them to mention a coregency, nor was Asa necessarily deprived of all his royal functions.

A seal bearing Jotham's name was found at ELATH and published by N. Glueck (BASOR 79 [Oct. 1940]: 13-15). W. F. Albright (BASOR 100 [Dec. 1945]: 18-21) argued from the absence of any patronymic or official designation that the owner was a very important person indeed; but that, being mounted in copper, the seal was probably used by a local officer for royal business. Subsequent discussion suggests that Jotham himself might have had charge of the fort before his regency (N. Avigad in BASOR 163 [Oct. 1961]: 18-22). There is little evidence either way; Elath was in Judean hands for most of Jotham's lifetime.

III. Achievement. Jotham followed the steps of his father both in religious faith and in other state policy; both Kings and Chronicles credit him with a steadfast loyalty to the Lord, but observe that local sacrifices were still permitted in Judah.

It is recorded in Kings that Jotham built the UPPER GATE of the TEMPLE (2 Ki. 15:35); the Chronicler adds that he built extensively on the OPHEL wall and set up other defense works in the country (2 Chr. 27:3). J. Simons (Jerusalem in the Old Testament [1952], 330) sees the building in Jerusalem as part of a long-range plan to extend the city walls around the outlying quarters, because later Hezekiah built a new N wall and Manasseh completed the circuit. It might be inaccurate, however, to think of a "plan" in any more formal sense than the evolution of a response to a continuously growing need. In the country, Jotham seemed to have strengthened and guarded the places of habitation rather than the frontiers; the "wooded areas" (2 Chr. 27:4) indicate the western and particularly the northwestern areas.

The Ammonites, who had brought tribute to Uzziah, were defeated in battle by Jotham, and appear to have paid heavy tribute for three years running (2 Chr. 27:5; the text is not clear and may be defective, but there is no doubt of the general sense). The limitation at the third year may be due to the turn of the tide as REZIN of ARAM began to press southward (2 Ki. 15:37). (Note further S. Horn in AUSS 2 [1964]: 40-52; V. Pavlovský and E. Vogt, Bib 45 [1964]: 321-30.) See also ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

joy. The feeling or expression of intense happiness; in the Bible, it is viewed especially as the result of a right relationship with God.

I. In the OT. There is a general usage of the term joy in the OT (most commonly Heb. śimḥâ H8525) that applies to the state of mind in any pleasurable experience. A more particular usage, however, refers to religious emotion. This is most notable in the PSALMS, where it appears as a natural consequence of the individual's fellowship with God, who is the source of joy (Pss. 16:11; 51:12). Various attributes and works of God evoke this joy, such as his judgments (Ps. 48:11), and his governance over the earth (Ps. 97).

Joy was prominent in the total national and religious life of Israel. The inward emotion found expression in outward shouting, singing, leaping, and dancing. The most complete occasion or motivation for this religious joy was the experience of SALVATION, which came to particular intensity in the contemplation of the future state (Isa. 49:13; 61:10-11). Nor is joy solely a human quality. God is pictured as rejoicing in his works (Ps. 104:31), and delighting in prospering his people (Deut. 30:9). (See J. B. Payne, The Theology of the Older Testament [1962], 417-19; NIDOTTE, 3:1251-54.)

II. In the NT. The NT is richer yet in its description of joy (primarily Gk. chara G5915). The mighty redemptive works of God, especially the coming of his Son (Lk. 2:10), and the resurrection of Christ (24:41), were causes of joy. Joy in the NT is not merely an emotion, but a characteristic of the Christian. It is a fruit produced by the inner working of the HOLY SPIRIT (Gal. 5:22), being dynamic rather than static. It is not affected by circumstances, however adverse and painful; in fact, joy may be the outcome of suffering for Christ's sake (Col. 1:24).

Jesus was characterized by joy in the task and goal set before him (Heb. 12:2). The Father is pictured as rejoicing over the salvation of one lost sinner in the three parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son (Lk. 15:3-24). Paul also found joy in the spiritual development and steadfastness of fellow believers (Phil. 4:1). (See further E. G. Gulin, Die Freude im Neuen Testament, 2 vols. [1932-36]; W. Morrice, Joy in the New Testament [1984]; NIDNTT, 2:352-61.)

M. ERICKSON

Jozabad joh'zuh-bad (יֹזָבָד H3416, short form of יְהוֹזָבָד H3379, "Yahweh has granted"; cf. ELZABAD, JEHOZABAD). (1) Son of SHIMEATH; an official who, with JEHOZABAD son of SHOMER, murdered King JOASH of Judah at BETH MILLO (2 Ki. 12:21; NRSV has JOZACAR, following many Heb. MSS). The parallel passage identifies him as "Zabad, son of Shimeath an Ammonite woman" (2 Chr. 24:26).

(2) A man from GEDERAH who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4); he was among the ambidextrous warriors from the tribe of BENJAMIN who were kinsmen of SAUL (v. 2).

(3-4) Two warriors from the tribe of MANASSEH who joined David at Ziklag; they are described as "leaders of units of a thousand" (1 Chr. 12:20). Some believe that there was only one Manassite warrior named Jozabad and that the second name is a scribal mistake of dittography.

(5) A Levite included in the list of supervisors of the temple storerooms during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:13).

(6) A leader of the Levites in the reign of JOSIAH who gave liberally toward the sacrifices (2 Chr. 35:9; called "Joram" in 1 Esd. 1:9).

(7) Son of Jeshua, a Levite, who is mentioned as one serving in Jerusalem at the time of EZRA's return (Ezra 8:33). This is probably the same man mentioned as agreeing to put away a foreign wife (10:23), as helping the people to understand the law (Neh. 8:7; 1 Esd. 9:48 [KJV, "Joazabdus"]), and as one who had charge over the outside work of the house of God (Neh. 11:16).

(8) One of the descendants of PASSHUR who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:22; the parallel passage at this point has “Gedaliah,” 1 Esd. 9:22 [KJV, “Ocidelus”]).

Jozacar joh’zuh-kahr (יִזְכָּר [not in NIV], “Yahweh has remembered”). According to many Hebrew MSS, Jozacar was the son of Shimeath; he and JEHOZABAD son of Shomer murdered King JOASH of Judah (2 Ki. 12:21 [cf. KJV, NRSV]; called “Zabad” in 2 Chr. 24:26). The NIV, following other Hebrew MSS, including Codex Lenin-gradensis (the basis of BHS), has JOZABAD.

Jozadak joh’zuh-dak. See JEHOZADAK.

Jubal joo’buhl (יִבְלָהּ H3415, meaning uncertain). Son of LAMECH and ADAH; described as “the father of all who play the harp and flute,” apparently indicating that he invented musical instruments (Gen. 4:21). The form of his name can be interpreted as a passive (pual) participle from the verb yābal H3297, which in another verbal stem (hophal) means “to be brought, led” (cf. Isa. 55:12, and note the name of Jubal’s brother, JABAL). Moreover, the consonants in the name are identical to those of the Hebrew word for the musical instrument known as “ram’s horn” (yôbēl H3413, Exod. 19:13 [here written defectively]; cf. Josh. 6:4-8), which in turn became the term for JUBILEE YEAR (inaugurated by the blowing of the trumpet, Lev. 25:8-13). Thus some speculate that the name Jubal may mean “led in procession” or the like (cf. R. North, “The Cain Music,” JBL 83 [1964]: 373-89, esp. 380).

Jubilees, Book of (τὰ Ἰωβηλαῖα or οἱ Ἰωβηλαῖοι). A pseudepigraphic work, claiming to be a revelation given to MOSES on Mount SINAI, and consisting of a midrashic expansion of the biblical narrative from Gen. 1 to Exod. 12. It is also known as the Little Genesis and as the Apocalypse (or Testament) of Moses; in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS it is referred to as the Book of the Divisions of the Times into Their Jubilees and Weeks (CD XVI, 3-4).

The common designation Jubilees refers to the fact that the book divides the history of the world—from the time of CREATION to the giving of the law on Mount Sinai—into jubilee periods of forty-nine years each (cf. Lev. 25 and see JUBILEE YEAR). Israel entered Canaan, according to the author, at the close of the fiftieth jubilee, that is, 2,450 years after creation. Much that is characteristic of the book is due to the use of other PSEUDE-PIGRAPHA and ancient traditions of a haggadic and halakic character (see HAGGADAH; HALAKAH). Jubilees appears to be the work of one author, who based his narrative on much older material. He interpreted earlier history in the light of the ideals of his own time, especially the emphasis on legalism.

The book can be compared with the rewriting of 1-2 Samuel and 1-2 Kings in the work of the Chronicler. The author tried to do with the traditions concerning the patriarchs and Moses what the author of Chronicles had done for the stories about Samuel and the kings of Israel and Judah. The PATRIARCHS are presented in Jubilees as having been rigorous observers of the law, as it was understood during the time when the author lived. The work is closely related in spirit to writings like 1 Enoch (see ENOCH, BOOKS OF) and the older portions of the TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS, but also to writings of the QUMRAN community. There is strong evidence to support the assumption that the author of Jubilees also belonged to this group. He may have been a priest, because he exalted Levi over Judah (cf. Jub. 30 with Gen. 49:5-12). The writer seems to have been a supporter of the HASMONEAN princes, since he applied to Levi's successors the title first assumed by the Hasmoneans, "priests of the Most High God" (Jub. 32.1). The book must have been composed prior to 100 B.C. (the apparent date of Hebrew fragments found in Qumran), but probably no earlier than 170.

The book was written originally in Hebrew, but only fragments of several MSS in this language are preserved. An Ethiopic translation, dating back probably to the 6th cent. A.D., was found and published in the middle of the 19th cent., and fragments of a Latin version (prob. 5th cent.) came to light in 1861, covering about one fourth of the whole. Both the Ethiopic and the Latin translations go back to a Greek version of the original Hebrew. The fragments of the book found at Qumran correspond closely to the Ethiopic and Latin translations. It therefore can be assumed that these provide relatively good versions of the original text.

The author claims that an angel spoke to Moses upon God's order and dictated the complete history of creation and that of early mankind until Moses' own time. He was bidden to write down everything he heard. The angel is supposed to have used the heavenly chronological tablets for this dictation, namely "the tables of the divisions of years—from the time of creation—of the law, and of the testimony of the weeks of jubilees, according to the individual years, according to the number of the jubilees..." (Jub. 1.29). Through these traditions the Israelites were supposed to get information about "the laws of the seasons, and the seasons according to the division of their days" (50.13). The laws were to be observed upon the threat of divine punishment.

The theology expressed in Jubilees differs in many respects from that of the OT. The author expected a MESSIAH sprung from Judah, without however attaching much significance to this figure. A messianic kingdom was to be brought about gradually, resulting in one thousand years of peace and happiness. A final judgment was expected at the end of this messianic age. No hope for the RESURRECTION of the body is expressed, but the book expects an IMMORTALITY OF THE SOULS of the righteous after death. There are parallels in the belief in angels and demons between Jubilees and the NT, views that were shared also by the PHARISEES, but not by the SADDUCEES (cf. Acts 23:7). In many other respects, however, there are marked differences from the NT. The laws concerning Sabbath observances, tithes, marriage, circumcision, Passover, firstfruits, and others, are stricter in Jubilees than in the Talmudic literature. The author expresses the view that there is no longer any prophet, because the law has made the free exercise of such an office an offense against itself and God.

A matter of much scholarly debate is the calendar for the festive seasons suggested in Jubilees. It seems quite likely that the Qumran community used the calendar claimed to be the law of God in this book, which was radically different from the system used by other Jewish groups. This evidence in particular is what makes it likely that the author was not a Pharisee, but a Qumran covenanter. It is certain, in any case, that Jubilees influenced that community more than any other group in Judaism.

Jubilees expresses the view that there is no hope whatsoever for the GENTILES. Complete separation from them is the best course of action. This view certainly was in the most radical way practiced at Qumran; but it was the opposite of what the early Christians learned to do (cf. Acts 11:18 et al.). (Introduction and English trans. by R. H. Charles in APOT, 2:1-82; and by O. S. Wintermute in OTP, 2:35-142. See also J. VanderKam, A Critical Text and English Translation of the Ethiopic Book of Jubilees [1989]; M. G. STROTHOTTE

Jubilee Year. KJV Jubile. The Hebrew term (found both with and without the word for “year”) is yôbēl H3413, used of a “ram’s horn” as a musical instrument (Exod. 19:13; in Josh. 6:4-13 it is always constructed with “horn” or “trumpet”). The connection may be that the Year of Jubilee began with the sounding of a trumpet on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 25:9, though here the usual term for “trumpet,” šôpār H8795, is used). Other etymologies are possible, however. Some, for example, think it derives from the verb yābal H3297 (hiphil, “to bring [as gift or sacrifice]”) and that it has agricultural origins (cf. R. North, Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee [1954], 96-108; H. Cazelles in VT 5 [1955]: 321-24). When yôbēl refers to the Year of Release, the SEPTUAGINT renders it with Greek aphesis G912 (“release, forgiveness”), but subsequently the Hebrew word itself was borrowed in the form iōbēl and further hellenized as iōbēlaios, thence Latin iobeleus (later, under the influence of the unrelated Lat. term iubilare, “to rejoice,” the word became iubilaus, thence English jubilee).

I. Provisions. The law of the Jubilee is laid out in Lev. 25:8-55 (cf. also 27:16-25) and affects the dedication of property. The law was operative in the case of the daughters of ZELOPHEHAD: it was ruled that an heiress in possession could not marry outside her tribe, because her property would then not revert to her family even at the Jubilee (Num. 36:4). The Jubilee (unlike the SABBATICAL YEAR; see below) is not mentioned elsewhere in the canonical or apocryphal writings.

The beginning of the Jubilee Year was marked by the sounding of the shofar.

The first part of the law (Lev. 25:8-17) includes the following provisions: (a) the Jubilee is to be announced on the Day of Atonement in the “fiftieth year”; (b) it consists in the return to alienated land of its original owners, including any who were in bondservice; (c) it includes the prohibition of sowing, vintage, and harvest; (d) land valuation is to take into account the years to run before the Jubilee (note that the guarantee of provision to cover the sabbath year, vv. 18-24, appears to be conditional on the observance of these laws; cf. also vv. 1-7).

The provisions of the second part (Lev. 25:25-38) are that (a) the land may be redeemed within the Jubilee period; (b) the redemption option on city dwellings is limited to one year, and if not so exercised, such property is exempt from next release (Levitical property not subject to these provisions); (c) the poor are to be a charge on the community, in the last resort.

Part three (Lev. 25:39-55) includes two items: (a) Israelite bondmen are to be discharged at the Jubilee and not subjected to the full rigors of slavery; (2) Israelites bound to foreigners may redeem themselves or be redeemed by kinsmen, at a proportion of their original price depending on the years remaining to the Jubilee, or else be released at the Jubilee.

II. Aims. The primary aim was to reunite owners (or their heirs) with their property, so far as practicable, thus (a) restricting the estates from growing to the detriment of small holders, and (b) maintaining the basic security of a property-owning, agricultural community. It is assumed that owners would sell only in extreme necessity, which would usually entail going into hired service; the intention was to give such servants a fair opportunity to become self-supporting again. In practice, usury and profiteering made recovery almost impossible (Neh. 5 illustrates this aspect).

The law would be frustrated unless bondservants were freed to claim their property. Further, as a buyer was virtually taking leasehold, there had to be a fair valuation of the lease in relation to expected yield, and definition of redemption rights. The Mosaic law sought to forestall a tendency toward aggregation, which throughout history has been a cause of political revolution.

III. Relation to the sabbatical year. The laws of the seventh or SABBATICAL YEAR are found in Lev. 25:1-7 (cf. Exod. 23:10-11) and in Deut. 15:1-11 (release, with attached provisions for individual release of slaves after six years' service, 15:12-19; cf. Exod. 21:2-6). The phrase "seven years" occurs as a time-unit as early as Gen. 29:8-30, but the term "weeks [sabbaths] of years," used freely in Daniel, is explained in Lev. 25:8 as if it were unfamiliar.

The Deuteronomic release or discharge from indebtedness (šēmitṭâ H9024, Deut. 15:1-2) is not concerned with land; neither did a servant, released on expiry of his six years, necessarily recover any land (hence 15:13-14). The Jubilee property law, on the other hand, did not assume any outstanding debt, whereas the general release was merely to facilitate the restoration (North's emphasis on "mortgage" is misplaced; cf. Cazelles).

IV. Observance of Sabbath and release laws. The prophet JEREMIAH could appeal to the law limiting bondservice (Jer. 34:14, although v. 8 does not refer directly to the law or to the SABBATH [see IDB, 4:142]; the nonobservance of it had made release overdue). One of the provisions of Nehemiah's covenant (Neh. 10:31) also implies past neglect of a known law. The saying that the land would "enjoy its sabbaths years" during the exile (Lev. 26:34-35, 43; Deut. 31:10; 2 Chr. 36:21), although connoting rest rather than a time interval, presumes the latter, since the point is that crops would not be raised. In 163 B.C., warfare during the "sabbath for the land" (1 Macc. 6:49; or "seventh year," v. 53) found cities unable to stand a siege because reserves of food were soon exhausted. JOSEPHUS (Ant. 14.16.2; 15.1.2) refers to the sabbath year as a fallow-year and asserts that both ALEXANDER THE GREAT and JULIUS CAESAR recognized this practice and granted remission of tribute (11.8.5-6; 14.10.6; it involved abstaining from offensive war, 13.8.2; War 1.2.4). He mentions the Jubilee in his account of the law (Ant. 3.12.3), apparently taking the "fiftieth" as the seventh sabbath, and discussing value adjustment as at release (based on profits) rather than as at sale (based on expected yield). The book of Jubilees regards the forty-ninth year purely as a calendar event. The official Mishnaic view is that the Jubilee was abolished after the EXILE (m. Šebi'it 10:3); expedients for avoiding release of debt relate, presumably, to the šēmitṭâ (indebtedness).

V. The problem of the fallow. Despite Josephus's testimony and the more convincing (because it is incidental) evidence of 1 Macc. 6:49, authorities have doubted whether a national fallow would be practicable; some have tried to relate sabbatical year and Jubilee to intercalary periods, despite the explicit mention of sowing and harvest. North (Sociology, 120) sees the fallow as applied to individual fields on a staggered basis, arguing that a general fallow would not help the poor. It is difficult, however, to imagine such restraint being introduced otherwise than generally. The law was directed primarily at stewardship of the land, and was only one of many measures aimed at the relief of poverty.

The apparent implication of a two-year fallow in Lev. 25:20-22 is difficult. J. Morgenstern (HUCA 10 [1935]: 83ff.) infers a spring new year: the crop sown at the end of the sixth, unharvested, would provide food; and with no sowing in the next year, there would be no proper harvest in the eighth. Admittedly, 25:8-11 suggests a fall new year; Morgenstern concludes that vv. 20-22 are editorial. The passage can hardly refer to a Jubilee fallow after the seventh sabbath, for despite its position, it refers to “seventh,” etc., not “forty-ninth, fiftieth”; 23:15-16 may show that “fiftieth” was used for a seventh sabbath, as Josephus and Jubilees understood it. (R. S. Kawashima, in VT 53 [2003]: 117-19, argues that there was no distinctive Hebrew counting system and that therefore the Jubilee was supposed to take place every fifty years. For NT implications, see S. H. Ringe, Jesus, Liberation, and the Biblical Jubilee: Images for Ethics and Christology [1985]. See also C. J. H. Wright in ABD, 3:1025-36.)

Judaea. See JUDEA.

Judah joo’duh (יְהוּדָה H3373, “[God/Yahweh] be praised,” by popular etymology and possibly actual derivation, Gen. 29:35; 49:8; see J. D. Fowler, Theophoric Personal Names in Ancient Hebrew [1988], 165; gentilic יְהוּדִי H3374 [see JEW] Ἰουδαῖος G2683; see also JUDAS). KJV NT Juda, Judas. (1) Fourth son of JACOB by LEAH (Gen. 29:35). Early in his life, Judah apparently rose to prominence in the family. It was he who said, “What will we gain if we kill our brother [JOSEPH] and cover up his blood? Come, let’s sell him to the Ishmaelites and not lay our hands on him; after all, he is our brother, our own flesh and blood” (37:26).

Significantly, the narrative concerning Joseph is interrupted to relate some negative incidents in Judah’s life. Judah withdrew from his brothers and married a Canaanite woman (Gen. 38:1-2). His firstborn ER was a wicked man, and the Lord took his life (38:6-7). His second son, ONAN, was told to have intercourse with Er’s widow, TAMAR, to preserve his brother’s line, but Onan “spilled his semen on the ground to keep from producing offspring for his brother,” and so the Lord “put him to death also” (38:10). At that point Judah promised Tamar that he would give her to his next son, SHELAH, but he failed to do so. Many years later Tamar, disguised as a shrine prostitute, had intercourse with Judah himself and eventually gave birth to twins, PEREZ and ZERAH (38:13-30). The material in ch. 38 is inserted at this point in the narrative no doubt for the purpose of highlighting the moral contrast between Judah and Joseph. It is remarkable that Matthew’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST not only includes Judah, but also mentions Tamar, Perez, and Zerah (Matt. 1:3; cf. Lk. 3:33).

Subsequently, Judah played a positive role both in persuading Jacob to let BENJAMIN accompany the brothers to Egypt (Gen. 43:1-10) and in interceding for Benjamin before Joseph (44:14-34). His leadership role is reflected even in an incidental comment, when we are told that Jacob, as he himself prepared to leave for Egypt, sent Judah ahead to lead the way (46:28). Moreover, Jacob’s deathbed blessing upon Judah (49:8-12) takes on special significance: Judah would be victorious over his enemies, and the scepter would not depart from him until the coming of a promised one (for a discussion of this prophecy see SHILOH). The genealogies of Judah's offspring occur in 1 Chr. 2-4. See further JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, TRIBE OF.

(2) Ancestor of a family of Levites who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 3:9 KJV; see HODAVIAH #3).

(3) One of the Levites who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:23; 1 Esd. 9:23 [KJV, "Judas"]).

(4) Son of Hassenuah; a postexilic leader who had charge "over the Second District" of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9; according to NRSV, he was "second in charge" after Joel son of Zicri).

(5) A Levite who returned from the exile and served as worship leader (Neh. 12:8).

(6) A leader who took part in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:34).

(7) A priest who played a musical instrument at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:36).

(8) Son of a certain Joseph, included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:30).

Judah, kingdom of. One of the two kingdoms of the Hebrews into which Israel was divided after the death of Solomon. The twelve tribes of Israel had previously constituted a united kingdom. The dynasty established by DAVID continued to rule in JERUSALEM until the destruction of the southern kingdom in 586 B.C. by NEBUCHADNEZZAR, but the power and influence of the dynasty were seriously limited after the division of the kingdom upon the death of Solomon in 936. The tensions between the northern and southern sections of the country polarized around REHOBAM of Judah, the son of Solomon, and JEROBOAM son of Nebat, of the tribe of EPHRAIM in the N. Jeroboam's secession movement was successful, and he became the first king of the northern kingdom, whereas Rehobam retained the crown of David as king of the kingdom of Judah in the S.

I. The nature of Judah's territory. The kingdom of Judah comprised, besides the tribe of Judah (see JUDAH, TRIBE OF), most of BENJAMIN, and apparently the tribe of SIMEON, which was isolated in the southernmost area of Israel. As the tribe of Judah grew in power, it practically absorbed Benjamin and Simeon. The physical characteristics of Judah's territory had important effects upon the life, culture, and history of the people. The W boundary of Judah was the Mediterranean Sea, and the

The kingdom of Judah.

E was bounded by the Jordan River and the Dead Sea. On the S was the desert, incapable of sustaining life without a system of irrigation. On the N there was no natural division between the territory of Judah and that of the rest of Israel. The boundary seems to have shifted somewhat but was usually thought to run a little to the N or S of BETHEL (modern Beitin). The line extended approximately from a point a little N of JOPPA to the JORDAN River at a point about 13 mi. N of the DEAD SEA. It was along this line that the frontier fortresses of Micmah, Ramah, Gibeon, Bethel, and others were built. The territory of the kingdom of Judah roughly resembled a square, covering approximately 45 square miles.

This area includes a variety of physical features, climate, and resources, which may be divided into three main sections; the coastal plain, the SHEPHELAH, and the hill country. The coastal plain was never completely dominated by the Hebrews due to the power of the PHILISTINES, who gave the name to the whole country in the word PALESTINE. Because of their dominance, the coastal plain came to be known as the “land of the Philistines” (2 Ki. 8:2). In modern times, the success of the citrus groves has demonstrated the fertility of the area, but the ancient Israelites were not able to develop it. The unbroken coast line of the plain did not provide suitable harbor facilities for the development of commerce as did the rugged coast of the Phoenicians to the N.

East of the coastal plain was the Shephelah, or lowlands (Josh. 11:2, 16), a district formed by the broken foothills of the Judean highlands. Situated between the coastal plain and the hill country, the Shephelah was the scene of many battles between the Philistines and the Israelites. The strongholds of Azekah, Beth Shemesh, Debir, Lachish, and Libnah were located here. The region was extremely important to Judah for defensive reasons, but also for the olive orchards of its hills and the grain of its valleys. The Shephelah is separated from the central mountain range by a system of valleys, the most famous of which is the valley of AIJALON.

The hill country is an area about 35 mi. long and 15 mi. wide. Approaching Jerusalem from SAMARIA, the range descends to c. 2,500 ft. above sea level, and then as they go S they rise to the highest point of 3,370 ft. just N of HEBRON. This area did more to form the character and influence the life of the Jews than any other geographical feature of the country. The mountains form an adequate watershed on the W slope; clouds that come in from the Mediterranean Sea deposit rainfall that sustains the life of the country. The eastern slope is the wilderness of Judah (Jdg. 1:16), a wasteland deeply cut by valleys, leading to the Jordan River and the Dead Sea. The descent to the Dead Sea, 1,291 ft. below sea level, is so sharp that there is little possibility for agricultural development. In this eastern area of the country were located Jericho, En Gedi, Qumran, and Masada.

II. The history of the kingdom of Judah. The dynasty of David occupied the throne during its entire history, with the capital at JERUSALEM. This gave the country a stability that was lacking in the northern kingdom, and contributed to the life of the people until the disintegration of the southern kingdom set in. Its history is recorded in 1 Ki. 12-25; 2 Chr. 10-36, and in the writings of the contemporary prophets. The kings of Judah, with their approximate dates (all B.C.), are as follows:

1. Rehoboam (936-919)
2. Abijah (919-916)
3. Asa (916-875)
4. Jehoshaphat (875-851)
5. Joram (850-842)
6. Ahaziah (842-841)
7. Athaliah (841-835)
8. Joash (835-795)
9. Amaziah (795-768)
10. Uzziah (768-740)
11. Jotham (740-731)
12. Ahaz (731-725)
13. Hezekiah (725-696)
14. Manasseh (696-641)
15. Amon (641-639)
16. Josiah (639-608)
17. Jehoahaz (608)
18. Jehoiakim (608-597)
19. Jehoiachin (597)
20. Zedekiah (597-586)

The history of the kingdom of Judah may be conveniently divided with respect to the relations it had with other nations (Israel, Assyria, and Babylon). The first period extends from Rehoboam to Jotham (936-731); the second from Ahaz to Josiah (731-608); the third from Jehoiakim to Zedekiah (608-586).

A. Judah and Israel. The first period was characterized by Judah's relations with Israel. The inevitable strife between the two Hebrew kingdoms began immediately upon their separation, as REHOBOAM mustered an army to force Israel back under the domination of the house of David. Because of the intervention of the prophet Shemaiah, however, he did not complete his plan.

Rehoboam fortified the country by building fortresses in at least fifteen cities throughout the land; but this did not prevent SHISHAK (Sheshonk) of Egypt, who had supported JEROBOAM in his rebellion, from invading Judah and plundering the treasures of the temple and palace. Rehoboam's numerous wives had a corrupting effect on him, drawing him under the influence of foreign gods. The defeat at the hands of Shishak was interpreted to be divine judgment, and the king and people confessed their sin. Rehoboam's son and successor, ABIJAH, gained a great military victory over Jeroboam. As a result, Judah recovered some border cities from Israel. Religiously, there was widespread apostasy to the worship of strange gods and images, with sacred groves as worship centers. Abijah had sought an alliance with SYRIA (ARAM) against Israel as did his successor ASA against BAASHA of the northern kingdom. Before the end of his reign in 875 B.C., Asa was able to establish friendship with Israel, which endured until the Assyrians destroyed the northern kingdom in 722. According to the records, Asa was the first of the kings to combat actively the pagan cult of ASHERAH, even deposing his mother "from her position as queen mother, because she had made a repulsive Asherah pole" (2 Chr. 15:16). In the later years of his reign, however, Asa became a victim of the BAAL cult.

Asa's son JEHOSEPHAT continued to fight against Baalism. He also reformed the courts of justice, but in his attempt to revive the maritime commerce of Solomon, he was not very successful. In the extended wars waged by the Arameans and MESHACH of MOAB against the northern kingdom, Judah took no direct action beyond sending aid to the sister kingdom. In the battle of RAMOTH GILEAD against the Syrians, Jehoshaphat himself fought side by side with AHAB of Israel with almost disastrous results (2 Chr. 18:31-32). Judah's alliance with Israel was strengthened by the marriage of Jehoshaphat's son JEHOHAM to ATHALIAH, the daughter of Ahab and the Phoenician JEZEBEL. One evil result of this marriage was the introduction of the degrading FERTILITY CULT of the Tyrian Baal to Jerusalem. When JEHU rebelled against Joram of Israel and killed him, King AHAZIAH, the son of Jehoram and Jezebel, who was visiting his uncle Joram, also was slain by Jehu. Ahaziah had reigned only a year. Athaliah seized the throne of Judah and proceeded to exterminate the Davidic line by murdering the children of Ahaziah.

Looking E through the wide U-shaped valleys of the Shephelah toward the Judean hill country.

Of Ahaziah's sons, only the infant JOASH was rescued by the quick action of the priest JEHOIADA and his wife JEHOSHEBA, the daughter of King Jehoram (2 Chr. 22:10-12).

Athaliah, the only woman to rule over the Israelites, was able to maintain herself in power for six years. She was executed in a rebellion led by the priest Jehoiada, who then placed on the throne the legitimate heir—seven-year-old Joash, the son of Ahaziah (2 Chr. 23:1—24:1). Jehoiada also led the move to suppress Baalism, and governed the state until Joash became of age. Joash proved to be weak and inept and was assassinated after a long reign because he paid tribute to the Aramean HAZAEL with the temple treasure as a price for withdrawing from Jerusalem. From this time on, the priesthood grew in influence in the affairs of the state.

Under AMAZIAH, the son and successor of Joash, Judah began a period of prosperity and progress that eventually made it one of the leading kingdoms of the western ANE. An important factor in this success was the recapture of EDOM and its capital SELA (later Petra), which Judah had lost under Jehoram. This victory gained the control of overland traffic of W ARABIA as well as that of the RED SEA from the Gulf of AQABAH and ELATH. Amaziah's success led to overconfidence, which led to war with Israel. He was defeated and taken prisoner, but he was released upon paying a ransom with the treasures of the temple and the royal palace, together with submission to the destruction of the walls of Jerusalem and the surrender of hostages.

UZZIAH (Azariah), Amaziah's son, was unusually capable and brought Judah to its greatest power. He strengthened the country internally as well as the army, built fortresses in the NEGEV, and extended his kingdom to control some of the Philistine and Ammonite territory. He developed the natural resources of Judah by promoting agriculture, constructing cisterns, and making use of the harbor at Elath (EZION GEBER). Near the close of his life, Uzziah was stricken with leprosy and was succeeded by his son JOTHAM, who acted as regent until the death of his father. "The year that King Uzziah died" (Isa. 6:1) was 740 B.C. Jotham's reign in many respects resembled his father's. The success of Judah in the period of Uzziah was contemporaneous with the same development of Israel under Jeroboam II. The surrounding nations, weak at the time, were in no position to interfere in the affairs of Judah and Israel.

B. Judah and Assyria. The second period of Judah's history began with the reign of AHAZ son of Jotham, and was characterized by the surge of Assyrian might with its threat to Israel and Judah. It was TIGLATH-PILESER III (the Pul of 2 Ki. 15:19; 1 Chr. 5:26) who initiated this period of ASSYRIA'S expansion, much to the concern of the small nations of the ANE. In expectation of an Assyrian advance, PEKAH king of Israel and REZIN of Aram tried to coerce first Jotham and then Ahaz into an alliance against Tiglath-Pileser III. To frustrate an invasion of Judah by Pekah and Rezin, Ahaz, against the admonitions of ISAIAH, called upon Assyria for help, which Tiglath-Pileser III was happy to grant on the basis of a treaty for which Judah paid heavy tribute. Ahaz thus introduced into Judah a policy of treaty-making that was proving to be fatal to the northern kingdom.

Tiglath-Pileser III destroyed Aram and divided Israel, the northern half of which was annexed by Assyria. Isaiah's advice proved to be correct, for Ahaz had to pay tribute to Tiglath-Pileser III as a vassal, and he witnessed Assyrian paganism introduced into the temple in Jerusalem. The incident of Pekah and Rezin forms the historical background of Isaiah's IMMANUEL prophecy (Isa. 7). It was largely due to the influence of Isaiah that Judah did not become involved in the machinations of the small states of the ANE that eventuated in the final destruction of Israel by the Assyrians in 722 B.C.

HEZEKIAH followed Ahaz to the throne and in the early successful years of his reign accepted the advice of Isaiah, which led to a religious reform and the repudiation of the Assyrian gods imported during the reign of Ahaz. The repudiation of the gods of Assyria was a part of the attempt to throw off Assyrian domination. Against the prophets' advice, he became involved in a coalition with MERODACH-BALADAN of Babylonia, with Egypt, and with other countries, which was directed against Assyria. Isaiah reflects his feeling of disappointment in Hezekiah's involvement in international power politics (Isa. 28). The Assyrians (now under King SENNACHERIB) moved against the coalition; Judah was soon overrun and Jerusalem besieged. According to Sennacherib's inscriptions, he captured forty-six cities in Judah and noted that he considered their inhabitants numbering 200,150 as his subjects.

Isaiah had consistently prophesied that Jerusalem itself would be spared. Hezekiah, anticipating the Assyrian invasion, had strengthened the defenses of the city and, to insure the water supply of the city, had excavated the SILOAM tunnel. As Sennacherib invested Jerusalem (c. 701 B.C.), Isaiah encouraged Hezekiah to hold out. Isaiah as usual was right, for Sennacherib suddenly was forced to raise the siege because "the angel of the LORD went out and put to death a hundred and eighty-five thousand men in the Assyrian camp" (Isa. 37:36). In his inscriptions describing his campaign into Judah and his siege of Jerusalem, Sennacherib boasts of his victories and investment of the city but says nothing about the catastrophe that overwhelmed his army. Of Hezekiah he says, "Himself I made a prisoner in Jerusalem, his royal residence, like a bird in a cage" (ANET, 288a). It was not the custom of the ancient monarchs to record their defeats.

The defeat of the major objective of Sennacherib vindicated the preaching of Isaiah and led the people to cooperate in expurgating the temple of paganism. They broke in pieces the brazen serpent of the wilderness wanderings that had come to be worshiped, and they returned to the ethical monotheism of Yahwism (2 Ki. 18:4). On the other hand, there developed a formality in religion and a superstitious veneration of the temple that prompted the prophet MICAH to warn, "Therefore because of you, Zion will be plowed like a field" (Mic. 3:12).

Hezekiah died in comparative youth and was followed by his son MANASSEH, who reversed the policy of his father, and the prophets saw in his reign the deathblow to the kingdom of Judah. He submitted to Assyria as a vassal, and the land was practically under their control. Both ESARHADDON (681-669) and ASHURBANIPAL (669-630) list Manasseh with Edom, Gaza, Ammon, Tyre, and others, as tributaries. Cuneiform tablets discovered at GEZER indicate that the Assyrians had a garrison there. The situation was such that the infiltration of foreign ideas and customs into the life of Judah was inevitable. Religion and politics were inseparable, resulting in unlimited religious syncretism that included Baal, Asherah, the host of heaven, and even the sacrifice of children upon the pagan altars in the Valley of HINNOM. The reign of Manasseh was characterized by degeneracy in worship, faith, and morals (2 Chr. 33:1-20). In the later years of Manasseh's fifty-five year reign, he was taken a prisoner to Babylon by the Assyrian Esarhaddon, perhaps for an attempted insurrection, and then permitted to return to Jerusalem. The chronicler indicates that the incident of the king's arrest was divine punishment, and upon his repentance he was released to return to Jerusalem to begin a religious reform, which apparently did not succeed very well (33:1-2, 11-17).

During the reign of Manasseh, Assyrian power reached its zenith, but before the end of that reign, there were evidences of Assyrian disintegration. Manasseh's son AMON succeeded and continued his father's evil practices (2 Chr. 33:22-23). He was assassinated after he had reigned two years and was followed on the throne by his eight-year-old son JOSIAH, who was proclaimed king by "the people of the land" (v. 25).

The decay of Assyria is reflected in the inscriptions of Ashurbanipal, which state that the provinces of his empire were inflamed by the revolt of his brother Shamash-shum-ukin. The situation encouraged throughout the Assyrian empire the expression of national feelings of independence, and Josiah's reign was an example. The preceding regime had been one of corruption and oppression, when worshipers of Yahweh dared not confide in their closest relatives and friends (Mic. 7:5-6). In a new political situation, Josiah, king by popular choice, was upon the throne. Under him the reforming party gained the upper hand.

A principal event of Josiah's reign was the discovery in 621 B.C. of "the Book of the Law of the LORD that had been given through Moses" (2 Chr. 34:14-15). The scroll discovered at this time is said by some scholars to have been the newly written book of DEUTERONOMY, or at least the core, which was promulgated as the law of Moses. This is contrary to the plain statement of the reference and other scriptural evidence. The book terrified the king and the priests, and with the support of the prophet JEREMIAH a widespread reformation was initiated. Abominations in religion and morals were eradicated, but though the reform of Josiah was more thoroughgoing than that of Hezekiah, it was not permanent (Jer. 25:3-7; 36:1-32). An indication of the weakness of Assyria is the fact that Josiah extended his reformation into northern Israel, especially the areas of Galilee, Ephraim, and Manasseh (2 Ki. 23:19; 2 Chr. 34:6-7). He destroyed the pagan shrine at Bethel, which was a special abomination to Jerusalem. The effect of Josiah's reformation in northern Israel indicates that Judah also experienced a political renaissance, partly due to the weakness of Assyria hard pressed by Media and Babylonia. The political influence of Josiah in the N does not represent a defiance of Assyria as much as his position as a vassal of Assyria who ruled not only his own country but also controlled the Assyrian provinces of Megiddo and Samaria.

The hegemony of Assyria in the fertile crescent now was being challenged by Babylonia. NINEVEH fell in 612 B.C. under an onslaught of a coalition of Medes, Persians, Scythians, and Babylonians led by the Babylonian NABOPOLASSAR. Sinshariskun, the last king of the great Assyrian dynasty, died in the battle; but his army, under the leadership of Ashur-uballit, prepared itself for the final battle, which took place at CARCHEMISH in 605.

As Assyria decayed, EGYPT recovered from the attacks of Ashurbanipal to which NAHUM refers (Nah. 3:7-10). Pharaoh NECO, fearful of the growing power of Babylonia, allied himself with the Assyrians and in 608 marched through Judah. Josiah, against the advice of Jeremiah, tried to stop the Egyptians and was slain at MEGIDDO (2 Chr. 35:20-27). Pharaoh Neco now controlled both Judah and Syria. JEHOAHAZ (Shallum) was made king of Judah by the people, but after three months was deposed by Neco and exiled to Egypt, where he died (36:1-4; Jer. 22:11). He was replaced by Josiah's oldest son, Eliakim, whose name was changed by Neco to JEHOIAKIM to demonstrate his change of allegiance. Neco joined Ashur-uballit and the Assyrians to fight the battle of Carchemish against the coalition led by the Babylonians under NEBUCHADNEZZAR the son of Nabopolassar. This battle was a turning point of history; the Babylonian victory ended Assyrian hegemony in ANE.

C. Judah and Babylon. The third period of Judah's history began with the Babylonian defeat of the Assyrians. Jehoiakim, who was placed upon the throne of Judah as a vassal by Neco in 608 B.C., was friendly to Egypt, but he was a Babylonian subject after the battle of Carchemish and paid tribute to Babylon. His policies encouraged Baalism in Judah, and he disregarded Jeremiah's advice not to disturb existing relations with Nebuchadnezzar. He renounced allegiance to Babylonia (2 Ki. 24:1), which brought Nebuchadnezzar to Jerusalem to besiege the city, in the course of which Jehoiakim died or was assassinated. Jerusalem fell in March of the year 597.

JEHOIACHIN, who followed his father on the throne, after a reign of only three months was taken into EXILE, along with his mother, many of the leaders of Judah, and the treasures of the royal palace and the temple. Among the exiles was EZEKIEL, who dates the chronology of his prophecy from the date of his captivity. Archaeological discoveries in BABYLON in the form of cuneiform tablets, which list among the people receiving rations of grain “Yaukin [i.e., Jehoiachin], King of Judah,” five of his sons, and other Hebrews, provide a valuable addition to the biblical narrative. Jehoiachin was released from prison by EVIL-MERODACH in 560, the thirty-seventh year of his exile. His remaining years were spent in captivity, but in royal comfort (2 K i. 25:27-30).

Nebuchadnezzar placed Mattaniah, another son of Josiah, upon the throne of Judah to replace Jehoiachin, and changed his name to ZEDEKIAH. This last king of Judah took an oath of loyalty to Nebuchadnezzar (Ezek. 17:13), but soon wavered in his allegiance by conspiring with the Egyptians against the Babylonians. Jeremiah again remonstrated strongly against Judah’s involvement in international intrigue but without success. Zedekiah’s disloyalty to his oath brought Nebuchadnezzar back to Jerusalem. The siege began on 10 January 587 and lasted until 9 July 586. Nebuchadnezzar was encamped at RIBLAH on the ORONTES, from where he directed the siege. The help that Zedekiah expected from Egypt did not come, and Nebuchadnezzar ravished the country. The OSTRACA discovered at LACHISH reflect the progress of the Babylonian campaign and the confusion and panic in Judah and Jerusalem. These are dispatches from a Judean military officer leading a party of scouts near Lachish. The messages, sent to his commander in the city, report the advance of the Babylonians and also allude to the tensions, intrigues, and suspicions that gripped the people of Jerusalem. Disloyalty, famine, and pestilence contributed to the horror of the siege until the Chaldeans breached the city wall built by Hezekiah (2 Chr. 32:5). Zedekiah and his entourage fled toward the Jordan Valley but were intercepted and taken to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah. He was forced to witness the execution of his sons, and then was blinded and taken in chains to Babylon after a reign of eleven years. The chief priest Seraiah and other leaders were taken to Riblah and executed upon the orders of Nebuchadnezzar. On 7 August 586 B.C. NEBUZARADAN, the captain of Nebuchadnezzar’s bodyguard, ordered Jerusalem destroyed. The temple and palace were burned, the walls of the city broken down, and many people carried off into captivity (2 Ki. 24:20—25:21; Jer. 39:1-10). This disaster was the fulfillment of Jeremiah’s warning.

The Babylonian policy toward her defeated enemies was not as destructive as that of the Assyrians. GEDALIAH, the former mayor of Zedekiah’s palace, was appointed governor of Judea by Nebuchadnezzar. He exercised his office in MIZPAH, about 5 mi. NW of Jerusalem. Gedaliah issued an appeal for loyalty to Babylon and tried to restore the country to normal life. He was treacherously assassinated by ISHMAEL, a member of the royal family, who also killed many members of Gedaliah’s court and Babylonians stationed at Mizpah. This new rebellion brought the Chaldeans back to Jerusalem, and in 581 another deportation of Hebrews to Babylonia took place. Some of the Hebrews of anti-Babylonian sentiment fled to Egypt, and forced Jeremiah, who had been given special consideration by Nebuchadnezzar, to accompany them (2 Ki. 25:22-26; Jer. 40-44).

The kingdom of Judah was now completely crushed. It had been in existence as an independent kingdom for 350 years, calculating from the year of the disruption in 936 B.C. This was 214 years longer than the existence of the northern kingdom, the longer survival of the kingdom of Judah being due primarily to the loyalty of the people to Yahweh. (For further details and bibliography, see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.)

A. C. SCHULTZ

Judah, tribe of. Judah belonged to the major group of Israelite tribes descended from LEAH. The tribe played no special part in either the exodus or the wilderness wanderings apart from leading the vanguard (Num. 2:9). The defeat at Ai was occasioned by ACHAN, a member of the tribe (Josh. 7), and this may have been why Judah was required to mount an independent attack on the Canaanites (Jdg. 1:1-2).

The territory given to Judah was not allocated by lot in SHILOH before being conquered (Josh. 18:1-10; Jdg. 1:3). The tribe occupied the Palestinian uplands, being bounded on the N by parts of Dan and Benjamin, and on the E and W by the Dead and Mediterranean Seas (although the tribe never had full control of the coastal plain, Jdg 1:19). To the S it stretched as far as cultivation permitted. Part of the land, however, was given to the tribe of SIMEON, “because Judah’s portion was more than they needed” (Josh. 19:9).

The hill country of Judah is characterized by a semidissected plateau, trending N-S, primarily a pastoral land, but supporting some agriculture on its small fields and terraced hillsides. Its natural boundaries provided defenses on three sides, only the N being militarily vulnerable. In the W the hills rise abruptly from the SHEPHELAH, traversed by a series of steep valleys leading upward to the central high land. The desert of the NEGEV lay across the S, and on the E was the formidable wilderness of Judea, with its rugged terrain rising sharply from the Dead Sea and Jordan Valley.

The biblical narrative gives a detailed treatment of the settlements within this territory. Of special importance were the frontiers, with their towns (Josh. 15:1-12). This is followed by a listing of the places in the NEGEV (vv. 21-32), the lowlands (vv. 33-47), the hill country (vv. 48-60), and the wilderness (vv. 61-62). The adjacent portions of Benjamin (18:11-28) and Dan (19:40-48) also played a large part in the continuing history of Judah. The rugged barrenness of this environment greatly influenced the life and literature of its inhabitants.

The possession of Jerusalem by the Jebusites (see JEBUS) made for a degree of separation between Judah and the centrally located tribes, and this situation may account for the lack of appeal to the other tribes when Judah became tributary to the Philistines. The isolation of Judah seems to have been recognized as a fact in the time of SAUL, when the men from Judah were enumerated separately (1 Sam. 11:8; 15:4; et al.). Because the confederation of tribes still remained loosely associated in the time of Saul, the economic and military dangers of Philistine aggression presented further problems for Judah, although the anointing of David over the twelve tribes (2 Sam. 5:1-5) prevented the separation from becoming more acute. (Certain details, such as the absence of any reference to Judah in the ancient Song of Deborah [Jdg. 5], have led some scholars to deny its existence as a distinct tribe prior to David. Cf. ABD, 3:1033-36.) See also JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; JUDEA; TRIBES, LOCATION OF.

Judaism. The Greek word Ioudaismos G2682 occurs in only one biblical passage (Gal. 1:13-14; KJV, “the Jews’ religion”; cf. also 2:14). Although the term Judaism can be used broadly of the Hebrew culture as a whole, it often refers to the religion of the Jews subsequent to the OT period. As such, Judaism is typically contrasted to the OT, but one cannot forget that the postbiblical developments were firmly rooted in the religious attitudes and practices of the Hebrew Scriptures.

I. The rise of Judaism

A. Exile. Properly speaking, Judaism ought to be regarded as beginning with the Babylonian EXILE. This experience proved to be a watershed in the history of Hebrew religion, for it marked a break with the type of pagan cultic observance that had occupied the attention of both Israel and Judah to varying degrees previously, and set the scene for a different type of religious observance based more firmly upon the ancient covenantal ideals. See ISRAEL, HISTORY OF; ISRAEL, RELIGION OF.

Life in Palestine had been totally disrupted when the Babylonians ravaged Jerusalem in 586 B.C., and though a few survivors of the catastrophe continued to live around Jerusalem, the most important elements of the nation had been carried in captivity to BABYLON. Deprived of all their former religious and cultic associations, the exiles were forced by circumstances to consider the adoption of a type of nonsacrificial religion contemplated by Jeremiah. The full formulation of this concept did not occur until a later period, and as far as the exiles were concerned, the most pressing need was for a fresh outlook on life that was completely divorced from the earlier sanctuary worship.

In this situation of emotional crisis, a firm lead was given by EZEKIEL, who shared the spiritual ideals of JEREMIAH and brought them to fuller development. His ministry to the exiles had as its aim the inculcation of a sense of repentance for the past transgressions of the nation, and a firm resolve to exemplify under the conditions of a restored community life in Palestine the ideals and spirituality of the Sinai covenant. He saw that the only way to preserve the spirit of nationality among the exiles was by a careful attention to those religious customs that could be observed with impunity on alien soil. Thus memorial celebrations were substituted for the preexilic FEASTS, and special fasts were instituted on anniversaries connected with the fall of Jerusalem. CIRCUMCISION was stressed as a distinguishing mark of the exiles, and the ancient laws of PURITY in the Pentateuch were more closely observed. The SABBATH came into particular prominence as the weekly day of WORSHIP, and marked the time when people gathered in houses to hear the law read and to pray. Open-air services also were held by the KEBAR irrigation canal, at which confession and the recitation of parts of the TORAH were consistent features.

The house meetings instituted by Ezekiel laid the basis of subsequent SYNAGOGUE worship, and were of great significance in focusing the attention of the exiles on the divine word rather than on ritual or cultic performances. Other distinctive exercises of piety by the exiles were designed to stimulate a greater sense of national sin and the consequent need for ATONEMENT. By the time that liberty was proclaimed to the captives through the decree of CYRUS in 538 B.C., there had arisen among the exiles a consciousness of being different from and superior to other peoples in view of the higher religious character that participation in the covenant relationship offered them.

B. Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. The pattern that life in the returned community of Judea followed was that of a THEOCRACY or religious commonwealth in which the will of God was mediated to the people through the priesthood. The Persian authorities encouraged the repatriates to follow this form of government, and between 520 and 515 B.C., under the prophetic leadership of HAGGAI and ZECHARIAH, the TEMPLE was rebuilt and worship renewed in Jerusalem. From the writings of these two men, it is apparent that the zeal with which the repatriates returned to Palestine was soon dissipated, and only after considerable exhortation were the Jews inspired to reconstruct the temple. The prophecy of MALACHI, dated about 450, shows that certain abuses had crept into the temple worship and the religious life of the theocracy, and there was a real danger that a lax priesthood would once again bring the people to the brink of spiritual ruin.

C. Ezra. These tendencies were brought to an abrupt halt by the work of EZRA the SCRIBE, who was appointed by ARTAXERXES I as minister for Jewish affairs to regulate life in Judea. He instituted various reforms that purified the priesthood and established the covenantal ideal of the theocracy more firmly than ever. He placed great emphasis upon the primacy of the Torah, which he interpreted less as a law code than a set of principles that could be applied to every aspect of life, and that were particularly binding upon the Jews. Ezra has been described quite accurately as the “father of Judaism,” for in coming to Judea he was not introducing a new law so much as demonstrating a new way of keeping the old one.

D. The Greek period. The centuries that followed saw determined opposition to the policies of Ezra both from the richer priestly classes and the SAMARITANS, the latter having benefited from the reforms in Judea to the extent of having gained a high priest from Jerusalem who had been unwilling to surrender his foreign wife. The dramatic rise of HELLENISM throughout the empire of ALEXANDER THE GREAT brought about important changes in ANE culture that by nature were more pervasive and threatening than anything the Jews had experienced previously in their varied history.

The Judeans struggled hard against these influences, being determined to maintain their historic religious distinctiveness. The upper classes of Jews found Greek traditions fairly attractive, and to counteract this tendency, the theocratic ideal was widened and strengthened. The high priesthood played an important role in this process, since it represented the most advanced and influential levels of administration in the religious community. The high priest was the spiritual head and representative of the state, controlling a hierarchy of priests, Levites, and temple officers.

The most characteristic emphasis of Judaism was upon keeping the law, and when many of the priests succumbed to Hellenism, the priestly interpreters of the law, who were known as scribes, succeeded them as guardians of the Torah. Their interpretations gradually acquired an authority of their own, and during the Greek period the scribes became accepted as the real instructors of the faithful Jews, using the synagogues as their principal sphere of influence. In the 2nd cent. B.C., another group of zealous teachers arose who came to be known as PHARISEES, or “separatists,” because of their sanctity and moral strictness in such matters as food and religious ceremonies. They accepted the oral tradition of the law as having equal authority with the Torah itself, and maintained that if a person carried out all the injunctions of the law and the tradition, he or she could obtain justification with God. The Pharisees claimed support from the general mass of the people, and became so influential in the 2nd cent. B.C. that they challenged the authority of the priestly scribes by training their own instructors in the traditional law. They brought a degree of stability to bear upon normative Judaism, which enabled it to survive the catastrophe of A.D. 70.

Another religious group that arose in the 2nd cent. B.C. was that of the SADDUCEES. The origin of the term has been disputed, but the influence of this party was unquestionably great. It was composed of priestly aristocratic families who kept aloof from the general populace, preferring instead to exercise control over national life at an intellectual, political, and cultic level. Although the Sadducees were in contact with Hellenism sooner than the Pharisees, they were better equipped intellectually to resist its attractions. The Sadducees claimed authority for the Pentateuch alone, and rejected any doctrine that could not be proved from the Torah. Though a decided minority, they secured control of the high priesthood, an office they monopolized until Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70.

The Samaritans comprised one of the chief schismatic elements in early Judaism, and when they broke with the postexilic theocracy as a result of the reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah, they established their own temple on Mount GERIZIM and formed a flourishing community in nearby SHECHEM in the 4th cent. B.C. During the conquests of Alexander they revolted, but were crushed and expelled from Samaria. Alexander placed the province of Samaria under Jewish control, so that when the Samaritans ultimately returned to Shechem they found themselves once again in the power of their religious opponents. Like the Sadducees, the Samaritans accepted the Torah as canonical, and they furnish independent testimony to the antiquity of this section of the Hebrew CANON.

The upheaval that followed the death of Alexander in 323 B.C. had repercussions in Judea as elsewhere. PTOLEMY I, who succeeded to power in EGYPT, annexed SYRIA shortly after 320, and marching into Jerusalem he occupied the city and deported a number of its inhabitants to Egypt. After he had gained control of Judea by this show of force, he pursued the liberal policies of Alexander—ultimately winning the confidence of the Jews to the extent that many of them emigrated to Egypt. Friendship with the Jews characterized the early SELEUCID regime also, and Nicator I was as successful as Ptolemy in encouraging Jews to migrate to more distant parts of his realm. The influence of the Jerusalem priesthood was greatly enhanced in the time of Ptolemy I by the wise administration of SIMON I (c. 300-287), but political intrigue began with his successor, ONIAS II. Under Ptolemy II (285-246), the task of translating the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek was begun; the end result was the SEPTUAGINT version. This proved to be the principal means by which Hebrew thought was conveyed to the Jews living outside Palestine. About 225 B.C., a reactionary group in Judea agitated for allegiance to the Syrian regime of ANTIOCHUS III instead of to Egypt, but the ambitions of the latter were thwarted by Ptolemy, who marched into Judea and quelled the dissident elements. In 198, however, Antiochus defeated Egyptian forces in battle near Sidon and incorporated Judea into Syria.

E. The Roman period. When the Romans invaded ASIA MINOR c. 197 B.C., Seleucid influence over Palestine was menaced. Intrigue in Judea increased under SELEUCUS IV (187-175), heightening the tension between orthodox Jews and those who had succumbed to the hellenizing policies of the Seleucids. Matters came to a head under Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-164), whose avowed intent was to eradicate Judaism in his territories. A HASMONEAN priest led a revolt at Modein in 167, and with this commenced the Maccabean conflict. See MACCABEE.

A protracted struggle saw military successes on both sides, and in 141 B.C. the Syrians issued a decree that recognized the independence of Judea. A period of prosperity ensued, during which the traditional customs and beliefs of the Jews were enforced and the supremacy of the law was asserted. This brief respite ended in 129, when Antiochus VII made Judea tributary, but independence was restored under John Hyrcanus (135-104), a Hasmonean leader. After 104, civil strife broke out in Judea, during which the Pharisees came to the fore as a political influence. Syrian control over Palestine came to an end when POMPEY marched into Syria in 64 B.C. and made it a Roman province. Jerusalem was subjugated and placed under the control of the Herodian dynasty in the person of Antipater, father of HEROD the Great. Although the latter did not impose hellenizing policies upon the Jews, his acts of brutality during his reign (37-4 B.C.) gained him the hatred of his subjects and more than offset his generosity in enlarging the temple. Throughout the period of the Gospels, an uneasy peace was maintained in Judea marked by periodic revolts against the occupying Roman power. The destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 marked the end of Judea as a state, but the complete liquidation of popular resistance was not accomplished until the ill-fated Second Jewish Revolt against Rome (A.D. 132-135). See WARS, JEWISH.

II. Doctrines of Judaism

A. *Theocracy and covenant. The form of the returned community was that of a religious commonwealth rather than a nation. The remnant had been redeemed to attempt again the task of exemplifying the ideals of the Sinai covenant in communal life. The Jews had been called by divine grace to be witnesses to the ransoming and renewing power of God, and the theocracy was to be the vehicle for such a testimony to contemporary society. As Ezekiel had foreseen, the priesthood occupied an important place in the community, for it was by this means that the will of God was revealed to the people after the voice of prophecy ceased with Malachi (c. 450 B.C.).

The destiny of the nation was to realize within itself the COVENANT concept of a kingdom of priests, which would reflect the HOLINESS inherent in the divine nature (cf. Exod. 19:6). Strict observance of the divine will would prevent any further disastrous lapses into idolatry or apostasy, and would preserve the ancestral faith intact. As a result of this, pagan nations round about could expect to receive the blessings of God, for the nation had the responsibility as the servant of the Lord of bringing the light of divine rule to the heathen (Isa. 42:1-9; 49:1-6). The theocratic ideal assumed the form of covenant obligations with the work of Ezra, who made covenant and law the normative elements of community life. Because the Jews were surrounded by pagans, the danger of cultural and ideological assimilation was real. Consequently it was necessary then as during the exile for the Jews to maintain a distinctive character. This particularistic attitude, unfortunately, had the side effect of provoking a conflict with the universalism inherent in OT prophecy, a tension that remained unresolved in Judaism throughout the NT period. Nevertheless, the basic commission of the theocracy was that of absolute fidelity to the provisions of the covenant and the exemplification of divine holiness in society as a means of blessing for the world.

B. *The Torah. The keeping of the law was the most characteristic emphasis of Judaism, and in this area the Pharisees exercised a dominant influence. So exalted did the role and value of the Torah become that the keeping of the precepts associated with it, both written and oral, became the explanation and justification for the existence of Judaism. The obligations of covenant law had always been a dominant feature of Hebrew religion, but in Judaism they were developed to the fullest extent. Because the prophets had insisted that the punishment of the exile was the result of a breach of covenant law, the repatriates were encouraged to take its observance far more seriously in the future. Its permanence and stability could not be questioned, since it alone had survived when cult and nation alike had been destroyed in the exile.

Because the theocracy was based upon observance of covenant law, the Torah came into its greatest prominence as the regulative norm for individual and corporate behavior. If the observance of the Torah, or written law, was of such importance, it was necessary to formulate agreed principles for its study and exegesis. Such principles and their application to daily living became the oral Torah or "tradition," of the priestly and later the Pharisaic scribes. The tradition protected the enactments in the written Torah by the formulation of new rules that when observed would guarantee the keeping of the basic commandments. This procedure became known as "making a hedge about the Torah," and found its fullest development in the TALMUD. The Talmud consisted of the MISHNAH, the oral law in existence by the end of the 2nd cent. A.D. as collected by Rabbi Judah ha-Nasi (c. A.D. 200), and the GEMARA, or rabbinical comments on the Mishnah, between 200 and 500. In addition, the Midrashim (see MIDRASH) were the official expositions of the OT books and consisted of homiletical and expository material.

For the pious Jew, keeping the law was virtually the whole of his religious obligation. Although the cult of the Jerusalem temple continued to carry out the rites and ceremonies prescribed by the law, it became less important with the growth of the synagogues. The ancient Levitical function of instruction was given prominence in the theocracy, and even the smallest village had its synagogue where the law was read and explained. The Torah thus superseded priestly functions, and with the end of prophecy it became the prime source of the divine will for Judaism.

C. *Paradise and resurrection. The word PARADISE (originally Old Persian) occurs only in a few OT Scriptures (Neh. 2:8; Eccl. 2:5; Cant. 4:13). In Hebrew thought, it originally expressed primeval bliss, an idea that was subsequently applied to the glories of the future messianic kingdom. About c. 200 B.C., as a belief in the RESURRECTION of the dead emerged in Judaism (cf. Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2-3), there arose the conviction that the righteous would live, after their resurrection, in the Garden, or “paradise,” of Eden (see EDEN, GARDEN OF). The Jews also held that paradise was a reality in their own day, but was concealed from view. It was the location to which the souls of the patriarchs and the righteous had been taken at death, and constituted their eternal home.

The idea of paradise among pre-Christian Jews was thus rather fluid and gives the impression that the concept fulfilled varying roles in different periods of thought. The TREE OF LIFE (Gen. 2:9) naturally acquired prominence in descriptions of paradise as the abode of the righteous dead (cf. 1 En. 25.4-5; 4 Ezra 8.52; et al.). Whereas the Sadducees denied the resurrection altogether (Acts 23:8; Jos. Ant. 18.1.4), since it could not be proved from the Torah, the Pharisees accepted the doctrine warmly, and only excluded from the privilege of resurrection certain classes of apostates. Their tenets became normative in Judaism and found expression in their liturgies. Pharisaic concepts of resurrection, however, were sometimes both gross and materialistic, for they conveyed the impression that in the next world men would live in opulent luxury—eating, drinking, and having carnal relations with their wives.

D. *Messianic hope. As a teleological figure, the MESSIAH had been long present in Israelite thought. The specific attachment of this hope to a future royal figure went back to the early monarchy (2 Sam. 7:12-16) and the promise of a stable dynasty of DAVID. Isaiah prophesied gifts of wisdom for this great ruler who would usher in the glorious kingdom (Isa. 9:6-7), and Ezekiel spoke of him as the shepherd of Israel (Ezek. 34:23-24). This anointed one from God also appeared in prophecy as the Servant (Isa. 41:8; 42:1; et al.), the anointed Redeemer (59:20), the Branch (Jer. 23:5; Zech. 3:8; 6:12), and the Son of Man (Dan. 7:1-28). Under Roman occupation, the Jews looked for a leader who would restore national greatness (cf. Acts 1:6), and by the time that Christ entered upon his ministry, popular expectation was at its peak. Consequently Christ, to avoid misunderstanding, rarely employed the term “Messiah.”

Judaizer. The Greek verb ioudaizō G2678, used only once in the NT (Gal. 2:14, but found already in the LXX of Esth. 8:17; cf. also Jos. War 2.17.10 §454; 2.18.2 §463; Plutarch, Cicero 864 [7.6]), has an intransitive meaning, “live as a Jew, become a Jew, adopt the traditions of Judaism.” PAUL, however, uses it in combination with the verb anankazō G337, “to compel,” and that has led to the modern use of Judaize in the transitive sense “to force/coerce Gentiles to become Jews.” In biblical scholarship, therefore, the noun Judaizers is most frequently applied to early Christian Jews who opposed Paul’s message of freedom from the law and insisted that GENTILE Christians should become circumcised and follow the Mosaic regulations (cf. Acts 15:1-2; Gal. 2:3-5). See COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM; GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

Judas joo’duhs (Ἰούδας G2683 from Heb. יְהוּדָה H3373, “praise”). Greek form of Hebrew JUDAH, which originally was the name of one of the sons of JACOB. After the EXILE, it became one of the names most frequently used by the Jews, and it is not surprising that in the APOCRYPHA and NT it designates a considerable number of different men.

(1) Son of MATTATHIAS and leader of the Maccabean Revolt (1 Macc. 2:4 et al.). See MACCABEE.

(2) Son of Chalphi and commander of the Maccabean forces (1 Macc. 11:70). Only this Judas and another commander, Mattathias son of Absalom, stood with Jonathan Maccabee when others fled at Hazor after walking into an ambush. Jonathan was able to rally the forces and routed the enemy, killing 3,000 men.

(3) Son of SIMON MACCABEE (1 Macc. 16:2, 9, 14). This Judas and his brother John were sent to fight the Seleucids in Kedron; the Jewish forces were victorious, though Judas was wounded. Some time later, Judas was killed in the same ambush that took the life of his father and of his brother Mattathias.

(4) Judas the Galilean, described by GAMALIEL as a man who “appeared in the days of the census and led a band of people in revolt. He too was killed, and all his followers were scattered” (Acts 5:37). The enrollment or assessment for tax purposes here in view was that under QUIRINIUS during his governorship of SYRIA in A.D. 6-7. JOSEPHUS too in a number of places (e.g., Ant. 18.1.6) calls this Judas a Galilean, but elsewhere, evidently referring to his place of birth, calls him a Gaulanite from the city of Gamala (18.1.1). Josephus regards Judas of Galilee as a founder of a fourth sect or school of philosophy among the Jews (18.1.6; War 2.8.1). Those in this party agreed with the position of the Pharisees in all matters, he reports, except that they acknowledged God alone to be their governor and lord and were passionately devoted to liberty.

With the support of a Pharisee named Saddok, Judas vigorously opposed the enrollment under Quirinius and engendered strife, violence, and bloodshed (Ant. 18.1.1). From Judas’s incendiary activity and teaching, the ZEALOTS and the Sicarii (see ASSASSINS) would seem to have sprung. Josephus mentions the violent deaths which a number of Judas’s descendants suffered. Two of his sons, James and Simon, were sentenced by Tiberius Alexander to be crucified (20.5.2). Another son, Menahem, prominent and influential shortly before the fall of Jerusalem, was tortured and put to death (War 2.17.8-9). A descendant (perhaps grandson) of Judas named Eleazar was a leader of the Zealots or Sicarii who urged death at their own hands on his followers rather than capture by the Romans at

MASADA. Practically all of them accepted his counsel in the matter (War 7.8-9). (Josephus also mentions a Judas who was the son of a notorious bandit in the days of King HEROD [Ant. 17.10.5; War 2.4.1]; there is some question as to whether this man is to be identified with Judas of Galilee.)

(5) Judas son of MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS, and thus probably a half-brother of the Lord; he is listed with other brothers, James, Joseph (Joses), and Simon (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3). He is to be distinguished from the apostle Judas, one of the Twelve (see below, #6), because the BROTHERS OF JESUS did not believe in him during his ministry (Jn. 7:5). After the resurrection, however, they are represented as believers (Acts 1:14, where, it is to be noted, they are distinguished from the apostles). They appear to have gone about in the interests of the gospel, some at least accompanied by their wives (1 Cor. 9:5).

The author of the epistle of JUDE was in all probability this Judas. He does not designate himself as one of the apostles, and seems to distinguish himself from them (see Jude 17-18 and cf. v. 3). He identifies himself as “Jude [Gk. Judas], a servant of Jesus Christ and a brother of James” (v. 1), no doubt meaning James the Lord’s brother (see JAMES II). EUSEBIUS (Eccl. Hist. 3.19-20) quotes Hegesippus to the effect that two grandsons of Jude (Judas) were required to appear before DOMITIAN, but on their explaining that the kingdom which they were awaiting was not of this world, but heavenly, and would come with Christ’s return, they were released. (See further R. J. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church [1990].)

(6) Judas son of James, included among the twelve apostles (Lk. 6:16; Acts 1:13). The KJV interprets the ambiguous Greek to mean “Judas the brother of James,” but it appears that when Luke means “brother” rather than “son,” he makes the designation explicit (Lk. 3:1; 6:14; Acts 12:2; the same construction is used in designating this Judas as is used in the case of James the son of Alphaeus, Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13). In the other lists of the Twelve, THADDAEUS occurs instead of Judas of James (Matt. 10:3 [KJV, “Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus,” following the TR]; Mk. 3:18); the same apostle may well have been called by both these names, but not all scholars adopt this solution. In Jn. 14:22 he is sharply distinguished from Judas Iscariot and is reported to have asked a question of Jesus: “Then Judas (not Judas Iscariot) said, ‘But, Lord, why do you intend to show yourself to us and not to the world?’” In the Syriac tradition, this Judas is identified with THOMAS. (See the discussion in R. E. Brown, The Gospel according to John (xiii-xxi), AB 29A [1966], 641.)

(7) JUDAS ISCARIOT (see separate article).

(8) Judas of Damascus. After the Lord had appeared to Saul (PAUL) on the road to DAMASCUS, Saul was led into the city and stayed in the house of a man named Judas, presumably a believer himself (Acts 9:11). The Lord directed ANANIAS to go to the street called STRAIGHT and inquire for Saul in Judas’s house.

(9) Judas surnamed BARSABBAS. At the COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, the apostles and the elders selected out of their company Judas Barsabbas and SILAS, “two men who were leaders among the brothers,” to go to ANTIOCH OF SYRIA with Paul and BARNABAS (Acts 15:22) to confirm by word of mouth the contents of the letter containing the decree of the council (15:27). The epistle from the council was delivered to the church in Antioch, and Judas and Silas, “who themselves were prophets, said much to encourage and strengthen the brothers” (15:32). After they had been some time in Antioch, “they were sent off by the brothers with the blessing of peace to return to those who had sent them” (15:33). Possibly this Judas was a brother of the Joseph called Barsabbas, surnamed JUSTUS, who was chosen with MATTHIAS as a candidate for the place from which Judas Iscariot fell away (1:25).

Judas, Gospel of. Writing late in the 2nd cent., IRENAEUS makes reference to a certain sect whose members claimed that JUDAS ISCARIOT “knowing the truth as no others did, accomplished the mystery of the betrayal; by him all things, both earthly and heavenly, were thus thrown into confusion. They produce a fictitious history of this kind, which they style the Gospel of Judas” (Haer. 1.31.1). Nothing more was known about this document until the beginning of the 21st cent., when a team under the direction of R. Kasser was able to reassemble and analyze the fragments of a codex that had been discovered in the 1970s near El Minya, Egypt (c. 150 mi. S of Cairo). This MS contains several writings, including a Coptic version of the Gospel of Judas, which was probably composed in Greek about the middle of the 2nd cent.

The book purports to record a revelation that Jesus gave to Judas some days before the crucifixion. Much of the account is consonant with material found in other Gnostic writings (see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT; NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY). Near the end of the document, however, Jesus says to Judas, “Look, you have been told everything. Lift up your eyes and look at the cloud and the light within it and the stars surrounding it. The star that leads the way is your star.” We are then told that “Judas lifted up his eyes and saw the luminous cloud, and he entered it.” The account concludes with a brief description of the betrayal. The natural implication seems to be that Judas was following Jesus’ instructions when he handed the Lord over to the authorities. (See R. Kasser et al., eds., The Gospel of Judas: From Codex Tchacos [2006]; H. Krosney, The Lost Gospel: The Quest for the Gospel of Judas Iscariot [2006]; S. E. Porter and G. L. Heath, The Lost Gospel of Judas: Separating Fact from Fiction [2007].)

Judas Iscariot joo’duhs is-kair’ee-uht (Ἰούδας Ἰσκαριώτης G2683 + G2697). One of the Twelve, known primarily as the disciple who betrayed Jesus to the authorities. The Gospel of John further identifies him as “the son of Simon” (Jn. 6:71; 13:2, 26). The meaning of the epithet Iscariot is uncertain: some scholars relate it to the word sicarii, “dagger-men” (see ASSASSINS), and speculate that he may have belonged to the party of the ZEALOTS; others to Hebrew šeqer H9214, “false [one]”; or to Aramaic ʿaskērā, “choking” (alluding to his death; see Origen, Comm. Matt. 35); and so on. A widely accepted interpretation is that the term is a hellenized form of ʿiš qēriyyōt, “man of KERIOTH,” and thus serves to indicate his origin.

Nothing is known for certain of the early life of Judas. If he came from Kerioth he may have been the only Judean among the disciples. He is first mentioned in the choosing of the Twelve (Matt. 10:4; Mk. 3:19; Lk. 6:16), at which point all the synoptics add the clause, “who betrayed him.” His relation to Jesus is not mentioned until the episode at BETHANY when MARY anointed Jesus with a vial of expensive ointment. John notes that Judas initiated the protest of the gift as a waste, and adds the footnote that Judas’s interest was prompted by his avarice. Had the ointment been sold, the cash proceeds would have become available to Judas, who was the treasurer of the Twelve (Matt. 26:6-13; Mk. 14:3-10; Jn. 12:1-8). The synoptics leave the impression that Jesus’ rebuke evoked the displeasure of Judas, and that he immediately went to the chief priests to bargain for the betrayal (see also Lk. 22:3). According to Jn. 13:26-30, Judas withdrew from the meal in the upper room in order to complete his arrangement. The two accounts are not irreconcilable. He may have begun negotiations early, subsequently informing the priests of the proper occasion for arrest. John implies this definitely by saying that Judas had already been motivated to betray Jesus (13:2), but that the decisive act came during the LAST SUPPER (13:26-30).

The motive for Judas's treachery is not stated categorically in the Gospels. Probably he joined Jesus' company because, like the rest of the disciples (cf. Matt. 16:16; Jn. 1:41, 45, 49; 11:27), he believed that Jesus was the promised MESSIAH, and that he would recover the independence of Israel from Gentile domination (Matt. 19:27; 20:20-23; Lk. 24:21; Acts 1:6). Jesus' consistent refusal to make his mission political, and his open declaration at the feast of Bethany that his death was imminent, may have spurred Judas to action. If he could not be assured of a prominent place in the coming messianic kingdom, he could at least profit by disposing of Jesus to his enemies. Disillusionment, the frustration of his expectations, and greed as John indicates, plus a definite Satanic influence (Jn. 13:2, 27), prompted his treachery.

Not only did he arrange for the capture of Jesus, but he also identified him in the garden of GETHSEMANE, where the arrest took place (Matt. 26:47; Mk. 14:43; Lk. 22:47; Jn. 18:3-5). When Jesus was officially condemned to death, Judas was overwhelmed with remorse and attempted to undo his evil deed by returning the money, only to be contemptuously rejected (Matt. 27:3-8). Matthew states that he hanged himself; Luke adds a footnote in Acts to the effect that he was killed by a fall (Acts 1:18-19). The money was used by the priests to buy the potter's field, later called AKELDAMA, the Field of Blood, as a burial place for strangers.

Judas tree. Name given to Cercis siliquastrum, which according to legend is the tree from which JUDAS ISCARIOT hanged himself (the biblical accounts of Judas's death do not expressly mention a tree; see Matt. 27:5; Acts 1:18). The tree is a native of Palestine. It grows about 30 ft. tall, and could provide branches on which a person might hang. Reddish flowers like drops of blood appear before the foliage, not only on the young wood, but straight out of the trunk itself. Tradition has it that the tree weeps blood each spring in memory of Judas. The leaves, shaped like a heart, are said to refer to the hard heart of Judas.

Jude, Epistle of jood. The last of the CATHOLIC EPISTLES.

I. Background. This letter is one of the shortest books in the Bible, containing only twenty-five verses and considerably fewer than 1,000 words in the original Greek text. As is true of the other NT epistles, it originated as a personal letter from one of the leaders of the early church to one or more of the congregations dispersed throughout the ROMAN EMPIRE. As the church developed and grew, its historical situation changed, and the officers had to meet new challenges, opportunities, and draw out further applications of the gospel message. The alterations in the church's relationship to the pagan world about it is reflected in the epistolary tradition of the NT. The epistle of Jude was written during a phase of the church's growth when it was represented among all levels of Hellenistic society and extended to every corner of the known world.

The dangers facing the church at this time were not those of outright persecution and extinction. Some areas of the Roman empire were still to suffer extensive repression, but the threat of internal subversion and accommodation to the resurgent paganism of the times was considerably more dangerous. As the Christian gospel, with its theme of creation-fall-redemption-restoration, came into conflict with the form-matter notions of Greek thought, popular among both Hellenists and Romans, the danger of synthesis arose. The latter epistles of the NT deal with this new problem, which threatened both the purity of the gospel message and the expansion of the church.

II. Authorship. The first verse of the epistle follows the form of Jewish and Aramaic correspondence of the Hellenistic age by indicating the names of both the sender and recipient of the letter. The author-sender is introduced simply as: "Jude [Gk. JUDAS=JUDAH], a servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James [Jacob]." Since the most widely known JAMES in the early church was the head of the congregation in Jerusalem, the brother of Jesus Christ, and the author of the epistle of James, Jude must have been his younger brother. Indeed such a brother of Jesus, a son of Mary and Joseph, is mentioned in Matt. 13:55 and Mk. 6:3. See BROTHERS OF JESUS.

The humble self-designation of the author, who denotes himself only as "the brother of James," is of great significance in understanding his belief in the Messiah, Jesus. He is to the messianic figure not a brother but a servant. According to an ancient patristic tradition, the grandsons of Jude were brought before Emperor DOMITIAN (A.D. 81-96) as descendants of King David and subjects of Christ the King. When it was discovered they were only poor farmers and that they did not plan any political revolution but were subjects of a heavenly domain, the emperor dismissed them with disdain (Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 3.19-20). Whether or not the epistle actually was written by the hand of Jude or by one of his helpers in preaching the gospel cannot now be determined. It is also possible that the epistle is the compendium of his teachings over many years.

III. Date. The dating of this epistle is an extremely difficult problem, as there is no direct evidence within the book or in the rest of the NT regarding the time of composition. The book is not mentioned elsewhere in the NT, and rarely by the historians of the apostolic age. However, since the main thrust of the argument follows that of GALATIANS and other warnings against subversive heresies, it must be placed after the initial period of missionary expansion. All the NT writings contain specific references to false teachers and their evil notions. Jude mentions them as perverting the Christian gospel for personal gain (Jude 4). Such heresies probably made their appearance at the end of the age of the apostolic church. Such a date would fall about A.D. 80-90 during the reign of Domitian, a period of incitement by paid schismatics seeking to bring the latent power of the church closer to the political leadership of the senate and people of Rome.

IV. Origin and destination. The epistle of Jude contains no geographical references from which its place of origin may be known. Since it appears to have been written well after the fall of Jerusalem and the age of the Roman conquest under TITUS, it was probably penned outside of Palestine. Some authorities insist on an Alexandrian origin for the work (see ALEXANDRIA). The recipients are addressed simply as “those who have been called, who are loved by God the Father and kept by Jesus Christ” (Jude 1). This designation denotes two divine activities of which the readers were recipients. First, they were beloved of God, a phrase entirely applicable to the Jew (Rom. 11), and applied to these readers also. Second, they were kept by (or for) Jesus Christ, as though they once were partakers of the old covenant and had later accepted the Messiah.

It seems reasonable to infer that the readers were Jews of the DIASPORA who had joined the church. This assumption is further strengthened by the numerous references in the epistle to obscure persons and events in the OT and several allusions to the APOCRYPHA and PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. Such readers, already separated from Judaism and aware of the nonrabbinical writings of the time, would be open to the heretical appeals they had received. By properly interpreting the OT on these points, the author was no doubt attempting to turn them again to the truth.

V. Occasion and purpose. In the NT it is clear that the message of the apostles is based on the messianic blessing promised in the OT. Jude applies the OT imprecations to those who pervert the new covenant. In this negative sense the author connects the old and the new revelations. The purpose of the epistle is threefold: (1) It identifies the false doctrine and its adherents as one with the infidels of all ages. (2) It demonstrates the full extremity of their perversion and the degradation to which they have sunk in their twisting of the truth. (3) The faith of the true believer is pointed toward the longsuffering of God and the maintenance of his promises. Each of these three aspects is presented as centered in the apostolic teachings and demonstrable from the OT text. The purpose of the epistle is to warn and to commend, and it succeeds admirably.

VI. Canonicity. The inclusion of the epistle within the CANON appears to have been based largely upon the assumption that it was, in fact, written by the brother of James, the author of the epistle attributed to him, and the younger brother of Jesus. Its final acceptance, however, was quite probably based upon its reliance on OT quotations and points of doctrine identical to many in 2 Peter. Its inclusion of apocryphal material caused some concern about its proper place. Of special interest is the possibility that Jude had actually intended to write a more theological or pastoral treatise entitled, peri tēs koinēs hēmōn sōtērias, “concerning the common salvation” (Jude 3). Instead, however, events forced the author to produce this strong condemnation of certain heretics. The fact that the offenders are nameless in the book has added to the mystery about its writing and purpose.

In detailed evidence the canonicity of Jude is better attested in the early church than that of 2 Peter and James. The one point of rejection was that by the Syrian church, which also rejected 2 Peter and 2-3 John. Among the patristic writers who mention the book, EUSEBIUS, writing in the year 337-

338, includes both James and Jude among “those [books] that are disputed, yet familiar to most” (Eccl. Hist. 3.25). TERTULLIAN, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, ORIGEN, JEROME, and the MURATORIAN CANON all receive the book as authoritative. Certainly by the time of the Nicene council A.D. 325, Jude was accepted as Scripture by the preponderant majority of congregations of Christendom.

VII. Sources and style. Of the twenty-five verses of Jude, nineteen are to some degree reduplicated by 2 Peter. The question of literary dependence has been raised many times but is not clearly answerable. It is highly probable that both made use of a common body of apostolic preaching and teaching about the heresies of the time. So far all arguments for or against the originality of the text of Jude are specious.

After the initial address and greeting, the epistle leaves the traditional epistolary style and does not resort to it until the doxology at the close (Jude 24-25). Whether or not the book as we have it is derived from a Hebrew or Aramaic original is impossible to determine from the text. The Greek of the epistle is reasonably polished and flows swiftly in its short compass from one OT citation to another. These quotations and allusions are based upon the SEPTUAGINT. There are a number of phrases peculiar to the NT. These may be stylistic variants of the author (or of the translator). Jude also has a marked favor for triplets of all kinds, both semantic and stylistic, which may be a hint at an original Hebrew text, since such a usage is known from Semitic sources of the Hellenistic age (vv. 2, 7, 8, et al.).

VIII. Use of Apocryphal and Pseudepigraphic books. One point of concern about both the canonicity and authority of Jude throughout the history of exegesis has been the inclusion of the story of the dispute between MICHAEL and the devil over the body of MOSES (Jude 9) and a speech of ENOCH (v. 14). In v. 6 there is a reference to the legend of the judgment of the fallen angels. Clement of Alexandria and others assumed that these references in an otherwise canonical book confirmed the authority of the noncanonical writings. This extreme view has been repudiated in more recent study.

The events of Jude 9 are derived from the apocryphal Assumption of Moses, which has survived in a badly damaged Greek version only (see MOSES, ASSUMPTION OF). In this text the passage containing the dispute is lacking. Undoubtedly, the ultimate origin of the story was a now long lost Aramaic commentary on Genesis. In the Slavonic translation of some of these commentaries and in some Greek fragments, the passage is preserved. In the passage it is against MOSES, as slayer of the Egyptian (Exod. 2:11-15), that the devil brings his accusation, but the archangel MICHAEL makes no reply of the same sort. The allusions in Jude 6, 14-15 are taken from the pseudepigraphic 1 Enoch, fragments of which in the original Hebrew were discovered at Qumran (see ENOCH, BOOKS OF). The quotations are to be explained as necessary to the author's argument against the false teachers. It is well known that the sectarian Jewish texts were disseminated among the Diaspora. The author demonstrates that even these texts were misused by the heretics, and he seeks to demonstrate that even the legends, when rightly interpreted, support the orthodox view of the OT.

IX. Content

1. The greeting and occasion (Jude 1-3)
2. Warnings against heretics (vv. 4-16)
  1. False teachers pervert God's grace (v. 4)
  2. Biblical and other examples (vv. 5-7)

3. The defamation of authorities (vv. 8-10)
4. The cases of Cain, Balaam, and Korah, who rebelled (vv. 11-13)
5. The prophecy of Enoch (vv. 14-16)
3. Perseverance in the apostolic faith (vv. 17-25)
  1. Apostolic warnings against the mockers (vv. 17-19)
  2. The life of Christian love (vv. 20-23)
  3. Doxology (vv. 24-25)

X. Theology. The theological teaching of the epistle seems to follow closely that of the Pauline and Petrine epistles. The fate of the wicked is described as vividly as in Revelation, and in that sense it seems fitting that it should come between these two sections of the NT. It calls down upon the unbeliever and the seducer no other judgment than that meted out by God. The book contains several liturgical phrases from the earliest period of Christian worship and smoothly weaves these into the fabric of the argument. The resignation to the mercy and faithfulness of God is as clearly encouraged as anywhere in Scripture. Of special interest is the inclusion of many doctrinal assumptions. They are perseverance (Jude 3), predestination (v. 4), redemption (v. 5 et al.), judgment (v. 11), sacraments (v. 12), and glorification (v. 24). It is in its essence a book of warning and an assurance of hope.

Judea joo-dee'uh (Ἰουδαία G2677, from Heb. יְהוּדָה H3373; see JUDAH). Also Judaea. Name used for the southern part of PALESTINE, especially after the end of the kingdom of Judah (see JUDAH, KINGDOM OF).

I. The name. Judea is the Greco-Roman designation of an area earlier included in the former kingdom of Judah, and to which the Hebrews of the Babylonian captivity returned. Added to this is the fact that most of the returnees from the EXILE were of the tribe of Judah (see JUDAH, TRIBE OF). The name is used first in Tob. 1:18, where it refers to the Davidic kingdom of Judah. The term is sometimes used freely to designate western Palestine (Lk. 23:5; Acts 10:37). Used strictly, it specified the southernmost of the three traditional divisions of ancient Palestine. The other two were SAMARIA (in the center) and GALILEE (in the N).

Judea.

II. The nature of Judea's territory. The geographical area of Judea seems to have varied somewhat in different periods. There was no clearly marked boundary to divide Judea from Samaria. The line separating the two regions customarily was thought to run a little to the N or S of BETHEL (modern Beitin). There is no valley or any sharp break in the terrain to separate the two areas, since the hill country of southern Samaria levels to a plateau. The line of this northern boundary of Judea extended approximately from a little N of JOPPA to the JORDAN River at a point about 13 mi. N of the DEAD SEA.

The S boundary of Judea was even more nebulous than the N boundary. BEERSHEBA was considered to be at the southern limit of Judea, as it was the traditional boundary of Israel as a people (Jdg. 20:1). Farther S beyond that point was the dry NEGEV wilderness that without irrigation could support little life. The W boundary of Judea was the Mediterranean Sea from a little below GAZA northward to Joppa. The E boundary was the Dead Sea from about MASADA northward to the southern reaches of the Jordan River and a little N of JERUSALEM. Thus Judea resembled a square of about 45 mi. on each side.

The heart of Judea was the upper hill country, a plateau extending from Bethel to Beersheba and including such well-known cities as JERUSALEM, BETHLEHEM, and HEBRON. Near Jerusalem the plateau rises to an altitude of 2,693 ft. and at Hebron to 3,346 ft. This was the center of the life of the people of this area from the earliest times. The plateau gently slopes downward to the W through the SHEPHELAH to the maritime plane and finally the Mediterranean. Clouds moving eastward in from the sea supplied rainfall sufficient to sustain the farming and pastoral life of the people. It is estimated that in Roman times c. 200,000 Jews lived in Judea, a large proportion of them in Jerusalem.

Eastward from the plateau, the terrain slopes rapidly down toward the Dead Sea and the Jordan River. This eastern area is known as the Wilderness of Judea (or Judean Desert) because the rain clouds empty their moisture on the plateau and its W slope, leaving little for the E section of the country. It was in the Wilderness of Judea that JOHN THE BAPTIST appeared as the forerunner of Christ (Matt. 3:1; cf. Mk. 1:4; Lk. 3:2). The most important city in this eastern area was JERICO. There was also MASADA, the site of HEROD the Great's fortress, where the Jews made a heroic last defense in A.D. 73 against the Romans who had destroyed Jerusalem three years before. There is also EN GEDI, an oasis of fresh-water springs, and QUMRAN, the center of the discoveries of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

St. George's Monastery in the Judean Desert near Jericho.

Judea depended upon the natural resources of her territory for some of her wealth. Grain was grown in the valleys, and grapes, figs, olives, and citrus fruits were an important part of the annual crop. The importance of the pastoral life in Judea is reflected everywhere in the Bible. From the Dead Sea came salt, potash, and other minerals. Perhaps the most important source of income for Judea was the TEMPLE in Jerusalem. The annual half-shekel tax paid by all adult male Jews, even those of the DIASPORA, brought large regular sums to Jerusalem. Added to this were the pilgrims who contributed to the income of the government. Contributing also to the influence of Judea was the SANHEDRIN, which sat in Jerusalem. It ruled over all Judea, but its influence was also felt in other areas of Palestine.

It should be noted that along the Mediterranean coast, and within Judea's territory, was PHILISTIA with its powerful cities. Among these were ASHKELON, GAZA, EKRON, ASHDOD, and GATH, a group of towns sometimes referred to as the Philistine pentapolis. These cities were a constant source of difficulty for the Jews, and even during the Roman domination of Judea, much of the maritime plane was governed separately from Judea proper by the Romans. In this area also was JABNEEL, later called Jamnia, the center of important rabbinical activity after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

III. History of Judea. The history of Judea may be said to begin when CYRUS, the first Persian emperor, gave the captive Hebrews permission to return to their native land to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple. Later, after the fragmentation of the empire of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, Palestine was eventually ruled by the SELEUCIDS. The attempt of the Seleucids to destroy the religion of the Jews was thwarted by the courage of the HASMONEANS, which initiated events leading to a short period of Jewish independence.

Palestine came under Roman control in 63 B.C., and Antipater, called Procurator of Judea, was its nominal ruler under Julius CAESAR in 47-43 B.C. Herod the Great, who rebuilt the TEMPLE, was king of all Palestine from 40 to 4 B.C. His son Herod Archelaus (see HEROD IV) ruled Palestine from 4 B.C. to A.D. 6. He was deposed by the Romans, who then appointed a series of governors that ruled Judea, Samaria, and Idumea from A.D. 6 to 41. The most familiar of these is Pontius PILATE (A.D. 26-36), under whom Jesus was crucified. Herod Agrippa I (see HEROD V), grandson of Herod the Great, was king of all Palestine from A.D. 41 to 44, after which Roman governors again ruled Judea and the surrounding areas until the Jewish rebellion of 66-73. The Romans destroyed Jerusalem in the year 70, and in 135 crushed another Jewish revolt. Jerusalem was soon rebuilt, under the Roman emperor HADRIAN, and called Aelia Capitolina, but Jews were forbidden to live there. See WARS, JEWISH.

It is notable that in the following period in Judea, many Christian churches were built, not only in Jerusalem and Bethlehem but also in various Christian settlements, for example, at Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin) and at Messana (ʾAuja el-Hafir). Constantine the Great reorganized the area and called Judea and Samaria by the name of Palestina Prima. The Muslims took Judea in 637 and held it (except for the Crusader kingdom from 1099 to 1187) until it was made part of the British mandate of Palestine after World War I. Judea was partitioned between Israel and the Hashemite kingdom of the Jordan by the United Nations, after the 1947-48 war between the Jews and the Arabs. As a result of the Six-Day War of June, 1967, the Jews regained control of Judea. (See further G. A. Smith, Historical Geography of the Holy Land [1931], 237-315; H. Daniel-Rops, Israel and the Ancient World [1964], 279-358; R. Y. T. Lee, Romanization in Palestine: A Study of Urban Development from Herod the Great to AD 70 [2003].)

Judea, ridge of. According to the book of JUDITH, HOLOFERNES brought an enormous army from NINEVEH to Palestine. “Then he came toward Esdraelon, near Dothan, facing the great ridge of Judea [tou prionos tou megalou tēs Ioudaias],” and there he camped for a month as he waited for supplies (Jdt. 3:9; the Gk. word priōn means “saw” or “jagged row”). Because DOTHAN is near the hills of SAMARIA, far from the Judean range, a textual error is suspected.

S. BARABAS

judge. One who governs, dispenses justice, judgment, and protection, and as such is the representative of God. See also JUDGMENT.

I. In the OT. Significantly, the first mention of a judge in the first book of the OT applies the title to Yahweh. In his intercession for SODOM, ABRAHAM prays: “Will not the Judge [ptc. of šāpaṭ H9149] of all the earth do right?” (Gen. 18:25). The thought underlying Genesis and all that follows is that God is the righteous judge of both peoples and individuals (3:14-19; 6:3-7; 11:5-9; 15:14; 16:5; 20:3; 31:53).

Under the PATRIARCHS, judicial authority is exercised by the head of the household (Gen. 21; 22; 27). Disputes between families are settled by force or mutual agreement (chs. 21; 31). Although judges were not unknown outside the chosen people (19:9; Exod. 2:14), they were first instituted in Israel at the suggestion of MOSES' father-in-law, JETHRO, to assist Moses in acting on behalf of God in settling disputes (Exod. 18:13-27; Deut. 1:9-18). The Deuteronomic code provided for the appointment of "judges and officials" in every town (Deut. 16:18). More important cases were to be tried by a judge with priests as assessors (17:8-13).

During the conquest of Canaan, judges took part in the solemn assemblies of the nation (Josh. 8:33; 24:1). After the death of JOSHUA, Israel's fortunes depended upon judges whom Yahweh "raised up" to save "them out of the hands of...raiders" (Jdg. 2:16). Their task was not merely to try cases, but to keep the nation from idolatry and lead it in battle (vv. 17-19). They were sometimes called "saviors" or "deliverers" (3:9, 15). The book of Judges records their exploits from OTHNIEL (3:9) to SAMSON (chs. 13-16). Among them was the prophetess DEBORAH (4:4-5). See JUDGES, BOOK OF; JUDGES, PERIOD OF. The last of the line was the priest and prophet SAMUEL (1 Sam. 1-19; cf. Acts 13:20; 3:24), who "continued as judge over Israel all the days of his life," visiting key centers annually (1 Sam. 7:15-16). In his old age the people wanted a king to "judge" them (Heb. šāpaṭ, 1 Sam. 8:5 [NIV, "lead"]; cf. Deut. 17:14-20).

Under the monarchy the king was the supreme—and at times apparently the sole—judge (2 Sam. 15:2-3). JEHOSEPHAT (whose name means "Yahweh has judged") appointed judges in all the fortified cities of Judah (2 Chr. 19:5-7). With the EXILE the monarchy lapsed, but on the return EZRA was authorized to "appoint magistrates and judges to administer justice" according to the laws of God and of the king of PERSIA (Ezra 7:25-26).

Judges are even occasionally called "gods" (ʾēlōhîm H466) in view of their divinely authorized function (Ps. 82:1, 6; cf. Jn. 10:34-35; and possibly Exod. 21:6; 22:7-8). (See further R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel [1961], 143-63; NIDOTTE, 4:213-20.)

II. In the NT. It was Roman policy to preserve as far as possible the culture and self-government of subject peoples. In Palestine justice was administered by the SANHEDRIN, which could inflict flogging and expulsion (Lk. 6:22; Jn. 9:22; 12:42; 16:2; Acts 5:40; 2 Cor. 11:24), but not the death penalty (cf. Matt. 27:1-2). At the same time individual judges (kritēs G3216) were familiar enough figures to provide vivid illustrations in the teaching of Jesus (Matt. 5:25; Lk. 12:14, 58; 18:2, 6).

As in the OT, judges have God's authority, even though they may be pagan (Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Tim. 2:2; 1 Pet. 2:13-14; cf. Matt. 22:15-22). As such they must be respected. Individuals are never to set themselves up as judges (Matt. 7:1-5; Lk. 6:37-38; Rom. 2:1; 12:19-21; 14:10). JUDGMENT will be passed on all people by God, the supreme Judge (Rom. 3:6; Heb. 10:30; 12:23; Jas. 4:12; 5:9; cf. Matt. 5:21-26; Deut. 32:35-36). It is an indirect testimony to his divinity that the Judge will be one who as a man was himself judged by men, Jesus Christ (Matt. 25:31-46; Jn. 8:16; Acts 10:42; 17:31; 2 Tim. 4:1; 1 Pet. 4:5; cf. 1 Cor. 15:24-28). All human beings will appear before his JUDGMENT SEAT. As in the OT THEOCRACY, so in the kingdom the saints will receive delegated authority to judge (Lk. 22:30; 1 Cor. 6:2-3.; Rev. 20:4; cf. Dan. 7:9, 22, 27). (See further O. Cullmann, The State in the New Testament [1957]; L. Morris, The Biblical Doctrine of Judgment [1960]; NIDNTT, 2:361-71.)

I. Archaeological background. It is apparent that the Israelites settled down immediately in the land, for archaeological excavation at several of the cities destroyed at this time show no subsequent break in occupation. The absence of any transitional period is a witness to the fact that the Israelites were not typical nomads. There is, however, a clear distinction between the well-built Canaanite structures and the simpler, almost primitive type of Israelite occupation that succeeded it. This decline in architectural standards is illustrative of a lower cultural standard among the incoming Israelites.

The evidence of continuing Canaanite occupation of the low-lying areas (e.g., at MEGIDDO and BETH SHAN), where their extensive chariot forces gave them a tactical advantage, confirms the biblical admission that these areas were not occupied in the earlier part of the judges' period (e.g., Josh. 11:13; 13:1-7; 17:16; Jdg. 1:19, 27; et al.). Before the Israelite invasion, because of the uncertain water supply, there was limited Canaanite occupation of the central hill country. Coincident with the entry of Israel was the widespread employment of underground cisterns to store water during the prolonged summer drought, facilitated by the use of a waterproof lime plaster that made them leak proof. This discovery made possible the extensive Israelite settlement in areas that previously were sparsely populated. The fact that no Israelite sanctuary of the judges' period has yet been discovered may be attributable to their inferior building techniques. However, it may also be an indication of the divine prohibition against an indiscriminate erection of sanctuaries (Exod. 20:24-26; Deut. 12:1-7).

Many clay figurines representing a naked female about to give birth have been found. The lack of any insignia of a goddess calls into question an identification with the fertility goddesses of Canaan; they may simply have been good-luck charms associated with childbirth. It is not impossible, however, that this may be an incidental witness to the fundamental prohibition against idol worship (Exod. 20:4-6 et al.). No representation of a male deity has been found at any known Israelite site of this period.

The decisive victory of DEBORAH and BARAK took place “at Taanach by the waters of Megiddo” (Jdg. 5:19). This cryptic allusion to MEGIDDO has been illumined by archaeological research, which suggests that this town and TAANACH, about 5 mi. apart, were not occupied simultaneously. The inference is that Taanach was settled at the time of this battle, whereas Megiddo was in ruins. For many scholars, the convergence of historical, archaeological, and literary evidence has made a date c. 1125 B.C. virtually certain.

Archaeological research in TRANSJORDAN has illumined the state of the small kingdoms, which were as thorns in Israel's side during the period (esp. MOAB and AMMON). Westward, our knowledge of the culture and organization of the PHILISTINES has been enriched by discoveries in the NEGEV, the SHEPHELAH, and even as far away as CYPRUS. It is clear that the Philistines formed a ruling class over a subject population whose religion and culture they assimilated. The god of the Philistines was DAGON, an old AMORITE deity (1 Sam. 5:2-5). The extent of the Philistine penetration of the hinterland may be estimated by the degree of distribution of a distinctive type of pottery known generally as “Philistine ware.” This accords with the literary evidence of Judges and 1 Samuel.

The destruction of the shrine at SHILOH is not mentioned in Judges, but its place in Israelite tradition is witnessed by Ps. 78:60 and Jer. 7:12; 26:6. Archaeological research shows that it was, in fact, destroyed by fire c. 1050 B.C. It is clear that this followed the double defeat inflicted upon the Israelite army at APHEK (1 Sam. 4). Other Israelite cities were destroyed at this time, doubtless by the same agency, which reflects the Philistines' dominance in the immediate premonarchic period. (See also JUDGES, PERIOD OF.)

II. Purpose. The purpose of the editor of the book of Judges determined his selection and use of material. The book covers the period from the death of JOSHUA (Jdg. 1:1; 2:8) to the point when the Philistine menace had become acute, c. 1060 B.C. His concern was to account for, as well as to describe, the political, moral, and religious decline during the period, and to demonstrate its effect upon the life of the community. This general observation will throw light upon the consideration of such things as structure and date.

III. Composition, unity, and date

A. Composition. The book of Judges divides naturally into three distinct sections: (1) Jdg. 1:1—2:5

Mold for making idols dated to the Late Bronze Age. The attraction of Canaanite worship was a nagging problem throughout the period of the judges.

sets forth the settlement in Canaan. The major portion (1:1-36) deals with the attempt by the tribes to occupy their territory. The general movement is from S to N, beginning with the tribe of Judah, whose exploits are dealt with in far greater detail (see JUDAH, TRIBE OF). This may indicate that this section originated in Judah. A certain deterioration is discernible as the chapter progresses; Judah (1:1-19) and the JOSEPH tribes (vv. 22-27) are relatively successful, but the remainder of the tribes had scant success (vv. 21, 27-36 give a catalogue of unoccupied territory). The close connections with the book of Joshua (cf. Josh. 15:13-19 with Jdg. 1:10-15; Josh. 15:63 with Jdg. 1:21; Josh. 17:11-13 with Jdg. 1:27-28; Josh. 16:10 with Jdg. 1:29) show that this is an account, or extracts from an account, of the conquest. It is, therefore, a valuable complement to the account in Joshua. The opening words, "After the death of Joshua," cannot therefore apply to this section but are rather a general introduction and title to the whole book. The reason for the inclusion of this historical survey is to set the scene for the period of the judges. This was a disordered situation, with only a minority of the tribes occupying their territory, whereas the remainder dwelt in varying degrees of tension with the Canaanites. Judges

2:1-5 completes this bleak picture by bringing into prominence the fact of the broken covenant.

(2) Judges 2:6—16:31 presents the judges of Israel. In this, the main portion of the book, are recorded the exploits of Othniel (3:7-11), Ehud (3:12-30), Deborah and Barak (4:1—5:31), Gideon (6:1—8:35), Jephthah (10:6—12:7), and Samson (13:1—16:31). These are usually classified as the major judges, in contradistinction to the minor judges, of whom little is recorded. This second group comprises Shamgar (3:31), Tola and Jair (10:1-5), and Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (12:8-15).

The individual passages undoubtedly had a history of their own before they were gathered together. Possibly they were preserved in both oral and written forms in the areas in which the exploits were performed (Jdg. 8:14 is an important attestation to an early, widespread diffusion of the art of writing). Some of the difficulties of the stories, and the alleged duplications, are readily explicable on this assumption. The author of this selection may have used more than one account of the same event, for example, the prose and poetical accounts of deliverance from the Canaanites (chs. 4-5). Or there may be an incidental witness to the art of the storyteller with his use of reiteration to preserve the vital thread of the narrative.

Recent literary conventions should not be imposed upon the literature of the ANE. One of the fallacies of the Graf-Wellhausen documentary hypothesis was its examination of the text of the OT without reference to literature from Israel's contemporaries. The criteria used for dissecting the early books of the Bible—including double names of individuals, groups, places, common nouns, the deity, and even changes of style—consist of features that are in fact paralleled in contemporary documents from Israel's neighbors. For this and many other reasons, the classic documentary hypothesis has been widely abandoned or modified. In particular, it is not now generally held that the so-called Elohist or Yahwist sources can be traced in Judges.

The individual stories have been brought together in an orderly manner, in which their chronological sequence has been maintained (see JUDGES, PERIOD OF III), and set in a framework of editorial comment. A standard form of introduction is discernible in the stories of Othniel (3:7-9), Ehud (3:12-15), Deborah (4:1-3), Gideon (6:1-6), Jephthah (10:6-10), and Samson (13:1). A standardized conclusion is discernible in 3:10-11, 30; 8:28; in the case of Deborah it is divided between 4:23 and 5:31. In the case of the minor judges, excepting Shamgar (3:31), the standard details include the length of judgeship and the place of burial (10:2-3, 5; 12:7, 9-15). The same details are given in the case of Samson (15:20; 16:31). An extended general introduction to the period is given in 2:6—3:6. This notes the general trends in the period after Joshua's death, with its pattern of apostasy, judgment, repentance, and deliverance, a cycle of events that is traced in the remainder of the period of the judges. The composition of this major section, therefore, reflects a certain artistry and a clear point of view. It may be described as interpretative history (cf. V. P. Long, The Art of Biblical History [1994], reprinted in FCI, 281-429).

(3) Judges 17:1—21:25, the final section of the book, contains two apparently unrelated events: (a) the shrine of MICAH and the Danite migration (17:1—18:31); (b) the outrage at GIBEAH and its aftermath (19:1—21:25). There is no evidence of the religiously motivated comment that characterizes 2:6—16:31. Instead, the reason for the disorders is found in the absence of the centralized authority of a monarchy (cf. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25). It is unlikely that these narratives were preserved in the traditions of the two tribes principally involved (Dan and Benjamin), since they were shown in an uncomplimentary light. The link that connects these two incidents may be the ineffectiveness of the tribal organization. In the first story, Micah has no court of appeal against the heartless rapaciousness of the Danites. In the second narrative, the so-called AMPHICTYONY intervened to punish the men of Gibeah, but their judgment was so mismanaged that the complete extinction of the whole tribe of Benjamin was averted only by resorting to two desperate expedients. The historical setting of the editor of this section is, almost certainly, the reigns of DAVID and SOLOMON, when the kingdom was firmly but justly administered. These two incidents are of great importance in revealing the conditions operating in certain areas at definite points in the period of the judges. But allowance must be made for the selection of this kind of incident and the final judgment balanced by the completely different picture of the book of RUTH.

B. Unity. Attention has been drawn to the diversity of the contents of the book of Judges. However, there is an inward unity in that all the contents witness in one way or another to the political, social, moral, and religious decline in the period between the death of Joshua and the institution of the monarchy. The first section traces the incompleteness of the conquest, with at least a hint of deterioration within the dismal record of the first chapter. Judah and Simeon enjoy a measure of success, and Benjamin, Manasseh, Ephraim, and Naphtali seem to have dominated over local Canaanite populations, but in the case of Asher and the Danites, the reverse is true.

The second section traces the recurring cycle of apostasy and deliverance through the exploits of the judges. Once more there is a general deterioration with the passage of time, and from Abimelech onward there is no mention of peace. Gideon was able to avoid civil war with Ephraim (Jdg. 8:1-3), but Jephthah failed (12:1-6). The story of Abimelech demonstrates the clash between Israelite and Canaanite elements in the neighborhood of Shechem (9:1-57), and illustrates the effects of an incomplete conquest. Samson effected no real deliverance from the Philistines, and the material concerned with his exploits (chs. 13-16) shows a decline in the religious comment of the editor, perhaps even suggesting that the stories speak for themselves.

The final section is a graphic picture of the disorders of the period and is devoid of specifically religious comment, the implication being that the nonexistence of the monarchy was the cause of the national malaise. Thus there is an inherent unity in the whole book, and an unmistakable impression is created that this was the “Dark Ages” of Israel’s history.

C. Date. The period of the early monarchy is the most likely date for the composition of Judges in what was basically its present form. The collection of the material in the main section (Jdg. 2:6—16:31), that is, the exploits of the individual judges, could hardly have taken place before the restoration of national unity. The time of David and Solomon was such a period, and the awakening of national pride would lead to an interest in recording past traditions (the literary activities of Samuel, Nathan, and Gad are noted in 1 Chr. 29:29; 2 Chr. 9:29).

Moreover, there was a human motive underlying the promulgation of the book of Judges. The monarchy in the early period faced opposition from the champions of the old traditions. There was an active concern to show that the monarchy had achieved what the amphictyony had singularly failed to win—namely, a complete conquest and the establishment of law and stability, which indicates an early date rather than one after the disruption (922 B.C.). The favorable attitude to the monarchy thus implied makes the Talmudic tradition that Samuel himself was the author of Judges appear unlikely (his attitude to the monarchy is clearly revealed in 1 Sam. 8). To the main corpus of the book was added a prologue, itself a selection from an otherwise unknown source, showing the incompleteness of the conquest (Jdg. 1:1—2:5). Similarly, an epilogue was appended (17:1—21:25), underlining the low standards of the period now replaced by the monarchy.

It is impossible to determine precisely the date of the book of Judges, or whether more than one hand was involved in its production. The difference in attitude between the second and third sections points to two editors. One fact may be of significance, namely, that BETHLEHEM (in Judah) figures in both of the incidents narrated in the third section (Jdg. 17:7-9; 19:1-2) as well as in the events of the book of Ruth (Ruth 1:1-2, 19, 22). This lends slight support to a date in the reign of David, himself a native of Bethlehem. Although admitting the absence of definite proof, it seems most probable that the book of Judges was compiled during the reign of David, and that its human motive was to demonstrate the advantages of the monarchy in contrast to the ineffective system operating since the death of Joshua.

Brief mention may be made of two critical theories concerning the composition of Judges. One view proposes that certain sections (Jdg. 9; 16; 17—21) that are devoid of the religious comment found elsewhere are secondary, having been interpolated into the text at a later date. A second view asserts there were two editings. In the first, dated to the 7th cent. B.C., these sections were excluded, the remainder being subjected to editorial treatment from the so-called Deuteronomic school. In a second revision, in the following century, the omitted chapters were reincorporated as they stood, thus escaping the editorial comment that was characteristic of the first edition. The possibility of minor revisions and reshaping when the book of Judges was incorporated into the so-called Former Prophets, the official history of Israel from the conquest to the Babylonian Captivity, must not be excluded. The finalizing of this section was accomplished probably in the early years of the exile. But the most acceptable view of the origin of the book of Judges itself, is, as indicated, during the reign of David.

IV. Place in canon. In the Hebrew Bible, Judges is the second book of the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings). The designation

The judges in Israel.

“prophet” is a witness to the belief that the will and purpose of God was mediated through the facts of history as well as by the mouths of the prophets. This section of the Hebrew Bible frequently is described as DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY, since it illustrates, both by example and editorial comment, the principles enunciated in the book of DEUTERONOMY. So long as no critical undertones concerning the date of Deuteronomy attach to this expression, no objection need be taken to its use. The book of Ruth was originally in the third section of the Hebrew CANON, the Writings (HAGIOGRAPHIA). In the SEPTUAGINT it was placed immediately after Judges, presumably because it related to the same period. This order was followed in the VULGATE and most modern versions. The canonicity of Judges never has been seriously questioned.

V. Text. The Hebrew text of Judges has been remarkably well preserved. One exception to this, the Song of Deborah (Jdg. 5), is generally reckoned to be contemporary with the events it describes. The poetical form and its archaic features present considerable problems to the translator and probably have resulted in slight damage to the text in its transmission.

A unique problem relates to the SEPTUAGINT text, which witnesses to two apparently independent versions of Judges. The first is represented principally by CODEX ALEXANDRINUS or A (5th cent. A.D.), supported by most of the uncial and cursive MSS of the Greek texts. The second finds its main witness in CODEX VATICANUS or B (4th cent. A.D.), which has the support of texts emanating from Upper Egypt. There is no unity among scholars about the interrelationship of these recensions, or which approximates most closely to the original LXX text; each textual variant must be considered on its own merits. In Rahlfs's Septuaginta, the unusual expedient has been adopted of printing the two principal versions side by side.

VI. The moral problem of Israel's judges. The reader of Judges soon becomes aware of a difference in its leading characters when compared with Israel's leaders of other periods. The blemishes of Abraham, Jacob, Moses, and David, for example, are depicted honestly, without affecting the general estimate of the high quality of their lives. In Judges, on the other hand, the characters are of lesser stature; their shortcomings are more obvious; and there is a certain popular delight in their less reputable exploits. EHUD appeared as an assassin; Jael was praised for a treacherous act (Jdg. 4:17-21; 5:24-27); GIDEON settled his family feud in the course of his victory over the Midianites (8:18-21); whereas JEPHTHAH is a brigand chief with a vindictive streak and a scant concept of the requirements of the Lord. The situation becomes most acute in connection with SAMSON, who, in spite of his NAZIRITE state, shows a regrettable lack of genuine consecration and indulges his own sensual appetite in an irresponsible manner. These men were anointed with the Spirit of the Lord, that is, they were charismatic individuals. How is this divine endowment to be equated with the low moral and spiritual tone of their lives? The following points must be considered:

First, one must differentiate between the popular verdict of the Israelites who lived through those times and the viewpoint of the editor who collected the stories. No doubt those who had firsthand experience of the various oppressions exulted in every savage detail of the overthrow of their overlords. But the editor who selected these incidents may well have been aware of these moral and religious blemishes. Indeed, part of his concern may have been to illustrate the low standard of leadership of the period (cf. his condemnation of Gideon in Jdg. 8:27). The judges lived in an age of low standards, and this fact is reflected in the narratives, giving a graphic representation of conditions in a period of apostasy, when the Mosaic covenant, with its high standards, was in partial abeyance.

Second, special attention must be given to the stories of Samson. It has been observed that in this section (Jdg. 13-16) there is an absence of the religiously motivated comment characteristic of the earlier section. A frequent explanation of this phenomenon is that the stories had become so fixed in tradition that the editor could not adapt them, although surely the same would apply equally to the other traditions. It seems more reasonable to suppose that these narratives were self-explanatory. Here was a leader, but of what character! Unable to effect a deliverance from the Philistines, his exploits were resented by his own countrymen (15:11). Similarly, the material in the appendix (chs. 17-21) could speak for itself, without adding to the politically motivated comments of 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 20:25. One can be grateful for the overruling of the Holy Spirit in the selection and presentation of this history. It serves as a perpetual reminder of what happens to a nation, and the individuals comprising it, when the Lord is forsaken and his commandments broken. Some parts of Scripture are for inspiration and edification, but the book of Judges sounds a solemn note of warning.

In the third place, the OT events frequently are related directly to God himself. He hardened Pharaoh's heart (Exod. 4:21; 7:3, 13; et al.); he sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem (Jdg. 9:23); an evil spirit from the Lord troubled Saul (1 Sam. 16:14; 18:10; 19:9); he put a lying spirit in the mouths of the false prophets (1 Ki. 22:23). It is the effect upon the object rather than the quality of the spirit itself that is prominent in the latter references. The significance of this in common life was that unusual power or qualities of any kind, such as strength or wisdom, were conceived to be a unique endowment from the Spirit of the Lord. But the vital connection is with the sovereignty of God, who influences and controls men and nations in accordance with his own will. This is reflected in Jdg. 14:4, where the parents of Samson, having understandably opposed their son's marriage outside of the covenant people, are shown to be unaware of the divine overruling. Samson himself was devoid of higher motives, but God used him to "begin to deliver Israel from the hand of the Philistines" (13:5).

Therefore, the charismatic anointing of the judges' period was for a limited but definite purpose. It must not be understood as parallel to the NT doctrine of the Spirit, which invariably is associated with holiness of life. The Lord made the judges a channel of his power or the means of his revelation, without any necessarily direct influence upon their moral character. Elsewhere in the OT God employed unlikely agents, such as Balaam, a professional prophet (Num. 22-24); Nebuchadnezzar, the Babylonian king who was called his servant (Jer. 25:9; 27:6; 43:10); and the Persian Cyrus, described as "my shepherd" and "his [God's] anointed" (Isa. 44:28; 45:1; cf. 45:4). The wisdom of God's choice is not always observable to human beings, and there must always remain an inscrutable element. He could use a man like Samson, whose short career centered upon his illicit relationships with Philistine women, some of whom were of dubious character. It must be stressed, however, that Samson and others should have lived up to the standards already revealed in the Mosaic law.

VII. Permanent value. The book of Judges sheds light on the political, social, and religious condition of Israel during the vital period between the conquest and the institution of the monarchy. The manner in which this is done allows the reader to capture the atmosphere of the period in a way that would be impossible in a formal history.

It provides a dramatic illustration of the effect of APOSTASY upon every aspect of life. The root cause of Israel's decline was that the COVENANT relationship with the Lord, with its requirement of absolute and loyal obedience to his commands, was broken. This led to disintegration in the political, religious, social, and family spheres and to a sharp increase in immorality. The book of Judges serves as a reminder that a nation cannot live on its past glories. The author of Judges was, of course, a preacher to his own generation, but his message has a permanent and universal application, and may be summed up in the words of Prov. 14:34, “Righteousness exalts a nation, / but sin is a disgrace to any people.” Israel’s chronic inability to profit by its own bitter history is a solemn exhortation to profit from the lessons of the past, whether observed or experienced.

Against this somber background, the enduring character of God stands out more clearly. He remained faithful to his COVENANT, not making a final end of his people in spite of their repeated infidelity. His RIGHTEOUSNESS is seen in his JUDGMENT, for sin is an affront to him that he cannot pass over lightly. The SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD is revealed in his use of the surrounding nations as the rod of his anger against Israel. He is able to save by few as well as by many (cf. Jdg. 7:2-7). The forces of nature are at his disposal (5:20-21). When his Spirit comes upon a human being, such an anointing makes that person invincible (3:10; 6:34; 11:29; 14:6; et al.). God’s longsuffering evidences itself in his willingness to hear the cry of his distressed people, and to give them a new chance, however short-lived their REPENTANCE might be. While the solemn note of judgment may appear to predominate, it does not silence the undertones of GRACE.

The points made in the preceding paragraph reflect, in measure, the point of view of the later editor. He wrote from the standpoint of a living FAITH in God, for the spiritual edification of his contemporaries. This quality of faith also characterized the principal characters in Judges. They were not free of moral blemishes, nor did they always conform to the requirements of God’s law; but there can be no question of their vital apprehension of their God. Since the Song of Deborah is agreed to be contemporaneous with the events it narrates, it is a telling example of this fact. It speaks of his effective past intervention on Israel’s behalf (Jdg. 5:4), of his control of nature (5:4-5, 20-21), and of his present participation in Israel’s fight against the Canaanites (5:23). The enemies of Israel are his enemies also (5:31). The intolerance that characterizes this poem cannot hide the incredibly vivid faith that it reveals. In an apostate age, people who knew their God in this way wrought great exploits for him (cf. Dan. 11:32), and four of them—Gideon, Barak, Samson, and Jephthah—are catalogued among the great heroes of faith (Heb. 11:32).

A. The partial conquest of Canaan (Jdg. 1:1—2:5)

1. Relative success of the tribes of Judah and Simeon (Jdg. 1:1-21). Soon after an initial success, the tribe of SIMEON lost its identity and was absorbed into the more powerful tribe of JUDAH. This account is complementary to Josh. 10:1-43, which highlights the activities of the individual tribes recorded in Jdg. 1 within the overall strategy of JOSHUA'S leadership. The fact that the general movement is from N to S, beginning at Jerusalem, is evidence against the view that this section witnesses to an independent invasion from the S by the Judah tribes. Jerusalem was defeated but not occupied (1:8). Subsequently reoccupied by the Jebusites (1:21), it resisted capture until David's reign (2 Sam. 5:6-11). The initial victory against the lowland cities, recorded in Jdg. 1:18, is qualified by the admission of 1:19.

2. Destruction of Bethel (Jdg. 1:22-26). Although the destruction of BETHEL is attested by archaeology, the event is not recorded in Joshua. The inhabitants of the city assisted in the defense of Ai (Josh. 8:17), which was adjacent to Bethel. Some connection between the two accounts must be assumed, but the question is complicated by archaeological evidence from the site of Ai, which appears to have been unoccupied from c. 2200 B.C. Since Ai is described as a small town (Josh. 7:3), whereas the identified site of Ai shows a relatively large and well-defended city, the most likely explanation is that the survivors of the earlier city resettled at another adjacent site. The HITTITES (Jdg. 1:26) were a major power c. 1800-1200 B.C. Their empire spread over modern ASIA MINOR and SYRIA (cf. Josh. 1:4).

3. Listing of unoccupied territory (Jdg. 1:27 – 36). In certain cases the Israelites were strong enough to reduce the Canaanites to bondage (1:30, 33, 35), although this was not always achieved quickly (1:28). The Asherites appear to have been the weaker group (1:32), and the Danites were quite displaced (1:34). The Canaanites retained control of the low-lying areas, where their chariots could be effectively deployed, until the time of Deborah and Barak (chs. 4-5). The result was that many of the tribes failed to occupy their allotted portion, and the lists in Josh. 14:1 were consequently idealistic.

4. Disobedience of Israel (Jdg. 2:1-5). The Israelites' great sin of disobedience was, in effect, a breaking of their covenant with Yahweh. The idea of COVENANT, which was fundamental in the early history of Israel, has been illumined by archaeological evidence of covenant TREATY forms (mainly Hittite) of the 2nd millennium B.C. This provides further attestation of the reliability of the early OT records. The movement of the angel of the Lord from GILGAL to BOKIM probably is to be associated with the transference of the central sanctuary from Gilgal. The LXX connects Bokim (i.e., "Weepers") with Bethel, where the sanctuary was subsequently located (20:18-28; 21:1-4). Confronted with this challenge, and with the manifestation of the deity, the people wept, but their subsequent conduct shows that there was no permanent reformation.

B. Israel's judges (Jdg. 2:6—16:31)

1. Introduction (Jdg. 2:6—3:6). The material in Jdg. 2:6-10 is paralleled in Josh. 24:28-31, a reminder that the death of a great man both begins and ends an era. It is a tribute to Joshua that the people remained faithful to the Lord in his generation, although they all had firsthand experience of the great works of the Lord (TIMNATH HERES in Jdg. 2:9 should be read as Timnath Serah, as in Josh. 19:50; 24:30; a scribe reversed the consonants).

The general tendency of the whole of the judges' period is summarized (Jdg. 2:11-15). It was a period of apostasy in which the nature-gods of Canaan were worshiped. BAAL, the god of the thunderstorm and the rain, was the great, active figure in the Canaanite pantheon. Astarte (see ASHTORETH) was one of the goddesses of war and fertility. The plural forms (vv. 11, 13) may hint at the many local variants and name derivatives (e.g., Num. 25:3; Josh. 11:17; Jdg. 9:4; 2 Ki. 1:2), but more likely it refers to the totality of the Canaanite gods who were worshiped in the FERTILITY CULTS. These gods were thought responsible for fertility in human beings, beasts, and agriculture, and possibly a semipagan generation of Israelites considered it wise to pay them due respect. They ignored the absolute sovereignty of the Lord, who chastised them for their infidelity.

The cycle of apostasy, servitude, and deliverance through a divinely empowered judge is outlined (Jdg. 2:16—3:6), along with the general deterioration characteristic of the period. For this reason they were unable to drive out the original inhabitants of the land. But the historian, conscious of an overruling sovereignty, saw other good reasons why these nations were allowed to remain (2:22; 3:1-2, 4). The PHILISTINES were a people of AEGEAN stock who inhabited their pentapolis of GAZA, ASHKELON, ASHDOD, EKRON, and GATH. Canaanites may designate all the inhabitants of the land, but sometimes the name is restricted to those settled in the low-lying areas. The Sidonians and Jebusites were the Canaanite inhabitants of SIDON and Jerusalem (see JEBUS) respectively. The HIVITES usually are associated with the HORITES, who established a strong kingdom in upper Mesopotamia some centuries before the judges' period. The AMORITES are ethnically indistinguishable from the Canaanites. They are often associated with the hill country, in contradistinction to the specialized use of the name Canaanite (Num. 13:29). Little is known of the PERIZZITES, who may have been an aboriginal group. One of the prime causes of Israel's apostasy was the intermarriage with this pagan population (Jdg. 3:6), in which the relationship of the individual deities would be a major problem. This is referred to as spiritual adultery (2:17; cf. Jer. 3:1-3).

2. Othniel (Jdg. 3:7-11). The first oppression came from ARAM NAHARAIM ("Aram of the two rivers"). The equivalent term MESOPOTAMIA ("between the rivers") is a Greek form that usually describes the area drained by the rivers TIGRIS and EUPHRATES. The reference could be to the Euphrates and one of its tributaries. The name of the oppressor is disguised in the text: CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM possibly means "Cushan of double-wickedness." The Israelites were sufficiently united at this early period to be led by OTHNIEL, CALEB'S nephew, who was associated with the southern tribe of Judah (cf. Josh. 14:13-15; Jdg. 1:10-15), against an invader from the N.

3. Ehud (Jdg. 3:12-30). The second oppression came from MOAB, which was located E of the DEAD SEA between the ARNON and the ZERED Rivers, her NE neighbor, AMMON, and the Amalekites (see AMALEK), who came from the area S of Judah. The Moabite penetration probably was limited to the territory of BENJAMIN and EPHRAIM. JERICHO (the City of Palms, v. 13) had been under a curse by Joshua (Josh. 6:26) and was not rebuilt until the time of AHAB (1 Ki. 16:34). The reference is probably to an adjacent site, which would utilize the natural resources of the region.

EHUD, a left-handed man (cf. Jdg. 20:16; 1 Chr. 12:2), was the deliverer on this occasion. His assassination of EGLON was cunningly planned and boldly executed. Disarming the Moabite king by the offering of tribute, he secured a private audience in the secluded roof chamber and used his left-handedness to devastating effect. The natural reticence of Eglon's servants gave him time to escape. The "sculptured stones" near Gilgal (Jdg. 3:19, 26 NRSV) were possibly the commemorative stones set up by Joshua (Josh. 4:19-24). The number of the Moabites slain ("ten thousand," v. 29) indicates an unusually large force W of the Jordan. Though the figure is not impossible, it may be that the word for "thousand" (elep H547) refers to an army unit of indeterminate size.

4. Shamgar (Jdg. 3:31). Here is no mention of Israel's apostasy or cry for deliverance, or of an actual oppression, nor any reference to divine enablement. Moreover, Jdg. 4:1 takes up the story from the death of Ehud, not SHAMGAR. Since his name is non-Israelite (possibly Hittite or Hurrian), it has been conjectured that he was a foreigner whose exploits benefited Israel. ANATH was another of the Canaanite goddesses of war, etc., and the expression "the son of Anath" may refer to his warlike propensities. An ox-goad was a metal-pointed implement about 9 ft. long. Such a weapon may indicate that the Philistine policy of depriving the native population of weapons was already in force (1 Sam. 13:19-22). Certain Greek texts place Shamgar after the Samson stories (i.e., after Jdg. 16:31), but 5:6 confirms the chronology of the Hebrew text.

5. Deborah and Barak (Jdg. 4:1—5:31). Two accounts have been preserved of the deliverance from the Canaanites, a prose account (4:1-23) and a poem of victory (5:1-31), the latter being generally attributed to DEBORAH herself. There are difficulties in the interrelationships of the accounts. In ch. 4, JABIN appears as the nominal leader of the Canaanites, although SISERA, the commander of the chariot force, has the active part. Two tribes, Naphtali and Zebulun, are mentioned, and the engagement takes place between Mount TABOR and the River KISHON. In ch. 5 Jabin is not mentioned, although the coalition of the Canaanite city-states is implied (5:19); four more tribes—Ephraim, Benjamin, Makir (prob. W Manasseh), and Issachar—participate and the action moves westward to "Taanach by the waters of Megiddo" (5:19). There is also the question of another Jabin, king of HAZOR, who led an earlier Canaanite coalition against Joshua's Israelites (Josh. 11:1-15).

It is not necessary to assume that Jdg. 4 and 5 are contradictory accounts. Archaeology confirms the destruction of HAZOR by fire (cf. Josh. 11:11—13) about the time of the Israelite invasion. Thereafter, only the upper city (c. 25 acres) was occupied, the lower city (c. 150 acres) remaining unoccupied. Hazor, however, had a strategic position dominating a major trade route, and its emergence as the leader of a coalition of Canaanite city-states a century later is not surprising. It was probably more convenient to maintain the chariot force at HAROSHETH HAGGOYIM (Jdg. 4:2) under the control of the local king, Sisera, where they could deal more effectively with any Israelite uprising.

The biblical historians were concerned to give God the glory for the victory rather than to give a detailed account, but the following reconstruction is reasonable. Deborah, who was a civil judge (Jdg. 4:5) before she became a military judge, encouraged BARAK to break the Canaanite yoke, the initial movement being confined to the tribes principally affected, Naphtali and Zebulun. A considerable success was gained between Tabor and Kishon, which was followed by a general summons to the tribes, with the exception of Judah and Simeon, who were isolated because of geographical and political factors. The rout of Sisera's army was completed by this reinforced Israelite army in the vicinity of Taanach (5:19), which resulted in the precipitant westward flight of the Canaanites. Sisera's attempted escape was foiled by the treachery of Jael, who efficiently dispatched the man whom she had lulled into a false sense of security. Hazor itself, and Jabin, survived the events of this campaign (4:23-24), but the Canaanite power was shattered.

Among the incidental details of these chapters are the following: (1) The picture of a God who controls the forces of nature (Jdg. 5:4-5, 20-21); probably an unseasonable thunderstorm immobilized the Canaanite chariotry and nullified Sisera's advantage. (2) The condition of Israel under the crippling bondage of the Canaanites (5:6-8). (3) The evidence of partial unity among the Israelites; six tribes participated in the deliverance, whereas four (Reuben, Gilead [prob. Gad and E Manasseh], Dan, and Asher, 5:15-17) were upbraided for their nonparticipation. The inference is that they ought to have been present, which confirms the existence of the tribal league. (4) The song of Deborah witnesses to a genuine faith in God.

6. Gideon (Jdg. 6:1—8:33). There is greater detail concerning the oppression by the people of MIDIAN and their allies, and GIDEON'S liberation of his people, than about any other of the similar episodes narrated in Judges. Possibly the author combined two or more of the popular accounts of this great deliverance, including all that he considered significant. Or the apparent repetitions may be due to the technique of the ancient storyteller, who needed an occasional recapitulation—not unrelated to the natural element of repetition that appears in the parallelism of poetry, and which probably influenced prose composition.

The seasonal incursions of the Midianites and their allies had disastrous effects upon the economy of the land and the morale of the Israelites (Jdg. 6:1-6). In the patriarchal period there was a similar seasonal movement between the Negev and the central hill country that occasionally resulted in friction even though the land was sparsely populated (cf. Gen. 34). The Midianites came into areas that had a settled population, and their annual predatory raids reduced Israel to poverty. The full-scale use of the CAMEL in this passage is the first historically documented employment of this beast in warfare. It struck terror into the hearts of the Israelites. Gideon's action in beating out wheat in a wine press (Jdg. 6:11) shows both his fear and the smallness of his crop. His reply to the angelic visitor (6:13) illustrates the popular explanation of their plight; the Lord had forsaken them. But Gideon seemed unaware of the reason for this rejection (cf. 6:1, 7-10).

Gideon's hesitation to accept the divine commission is paralleled in the case of Moses (Exod. 4:13), Barak (Jdg. 4:8), and Jeremiah (Jer. 1:6; cf. 2 Cor. 3:5, 6). Before he could deliver Israel, work was to be done nearer at hand, for the syncretistic tendencies of the age were illustrated in the shrine of Baal, of which his father JOASH was custodian. Gideon broke down the shrine and also cut down the Asherah, a Canaanite cult-symbol (with undoubted sexual connections) made of wood, probably a formal substitute for a sacred tree. Joash was a man of good sense who saw that if Baal was a real god he could deal personally with this affront.

The seasonal invasion of the Midianites was the occasion of Gideon's charismatic anointing (Jdg. 6:34). Initial support came from his own town (showing the absence of resentment for the destruction of its Baal shrine), his fellow tribesmen of Manasseh, and the tribes of Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali. Issachar is surprisingly omitted from this list, but its territory must have been affected. The faith of Gideon was strengthened by three signs from the Lord, who graciously accommodated himself to the timidity of his anointed (6:36-40; 7:9-14). From this point on, Gideon's faith did not waver. The first stage in the reduction of his army (7:2-3) followed the provisions of Deut. 20:8; the second stage (Jdg. 7:4-7) probably marked out those who remained on their guard, scooping up the water and lapping from their cupped hands without relaxing vigilance. Against the immense hordes of Midianites (6:5; 7:12), such a reduction of numbers must have appeared incredible, but it emphasized that this was the Lord's act of salvation, not man's.

The audacious plan of attack was implemented with careful attention to detail (Jdg. 7:19-25). The aim was to make as much noise as possible from all sides, the lights giving the impression of a great host. As the watch had just changed, more men than usual would be moving about in the darkness, thus increasing the confusion. The effect of the clamor upon the camels would be disastrous. A full-scale panic ensued, in which every man's sword was against his neighbor, followed by a desperate flight for the fords of Jordan. Gideon's men hardly seem to have been engaged in this phase, and they suffered few, if any casualties (8:4).

This initial overwhelming success led to the summoning of the tribal contingents, which doubtless included those who had no heart for battle at an earlier phase (Jdg. 7:23-24). An ugly crisis with the Ephraimites, which could have facilitated the Midianite escape, was averted by the diplomacy of Gideon (8:1-3). The refusal of the rulers of Succoth and Peniel to supply their brethren with provisions was an act of treachery motivated by self-interest; they were nearer to the haunts of the Midianites and were afraid of reprisals. They paid dearly for their unbrotherliness when Gideon returned (8:13-17; note the incidental witness to the widespread early use of writing in v. 14), after his successful pursuit of the remnant of the Midianite host that had escaped before the Ephraimites sealed the Jordan fords (7:24). The end of Gideon's campaign came at KARKOR (8:10), well to the E of the Dead Sea, where the Midianites must have felt secure. But Gideon, by forced marches along the caravan routes (8:11), took them by surprise a second time and completely routed them. Then, wisely, he returned home, exacting a personal revenge upon the two captured kings for their slaughter of his brothers (8:18-21).

Such was the sense of gratitude of the Israelites that they offered Gideon the kingship (Jdg. 8:22). Some scholars believe that his refusal was in fact an acceptance, but couched in ambiguous terms, hinting that such an honor would be within the kingly rule of the Lord. Support for this is seen in the fact that Gideon subsequently exercised the functions of a king, and it was assumed that his sons would rule after his death (9:2; cf. 8:35). However, v. 29 does not indicate any great accession of power, and in any case his influence would be limited to a small area and probably was not significantly greater than that of the other judges. His construction of an EPHOD, for oracular purposes, probably was innocent enough in its intention, but its very preciousness (8:26-27) meant that it became itself an object of worship, indicating that IDOLATRY was not far removed from the average Israelite at that time. Gideon's indulgence (8:31) involved his family in near extinction subsequently (9:1-5), and his example in his declining years made a sad contrast to his earlier devoted leadership.

7. Abimelech (Jdg. 9:1-56). Gideon's son ABIMELECH was not one of Israel's judges. His mother lived in SHECHEM, a city that retained many Canaanite characteristics; possibly it was incorporated into Israel by treaty. Since Abimelech's mother was a concubine, his own citizenship was attached to Shechem rather than to his father's family in OPHRAH. Abimelech himself appears as a vindictive and utterly unscrupulous individual, and the story witnesses to the tensions that existed between the Israelites and the original inhabitants of the land. His three-year rule in Shechem and its district was hardly an antecedent of the monarchy in Israel; rather it was a reversal to the localized rule of the king of a Canaanite city-state.

Abimelech's first act was to arrange the massacre of the legitimate sons of Gideon, securing the help of the citizens of Shechem by appealing to their self interest. The scheme was financed by funds from the heathen sanctuary (Jdg. 9:4). The one survivor, JOTHAM, fled after delivering his famous fable (vv. 7-21) from the top of Mount GERIZIM. The point of the fable was that the Shechemites had made the wrong choice of a king: the useless bramble created a fire hazard and was incapable of giving shade. The doom of the Shechemites already was sealed by their treacherous ingratitude to the house of Gideon.

The remainder of the chapter documents the fulfillment of this prophecy. The Shechemites soon tired of their new loyalty, and when open rebellion was advocated, Abimelech acted ruthlessly to crush it. The "tower of Shechem" (Jdg. 9:46), unlike that at THEBEZ (v. 50) and most ancient cities, was apparently outside the city. It was reduced by a stratagem that Abimelech sought to reapply at Thebez, with disastrous results. His request to his armor-bearer (v. 54) reflects the sense of dishonor at dying at the hands of a woman. His reputation, however, was not saved (2 Sam. 11:21). No reason is given for the campaign against Thebez, but the attitude of rebellion against Abimelech probably was widespread.

8. Tola and Jair (Jdg. 10:1-5). The lack of detail in this section means that the minor judges, in contrast to the rest, do not appear as dynamic characters. In the case of JAIR, the reference to his numerous sons, donkeys, and towns (v. 4) is an indication of prestige and prosperity.

9. Jephthah (Jdg. 10:6—12:7). An editorial section (10:6-16; cf. 2:6—3:6) introduces the oppressions of the Ammonites and the Philistines, which probably were contemporary (10:7). It outlines again the main characteristic of the period: Israel's apostasy, with the people oblivious to the Lord's past deliverances; Israel's weakness under the pressure of her neighbors; Israel's repentance and reformation; and the renewal of the Lord's mercy. The Ammonite raids had extended beyond the Jordan to include Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim (v. 9), although the attack that brought JEPHTHAH to leadership apparently was confined to GILEAD. The Gileadites, in despair, turned to Jephthah, the leader of a band of brigands (10:17—11:1). Jephthah was the son of a prostitute, but unlike Abimelech, his lineage attached to his father's family, and thus his expulsion was clearly illegal. Nevertheless, he was opportunist enough to pocket his pride when he was offered the leadership of his people.

Judges 11:12-28 is surely one of the earliest diplomatic wrangles in recorded history. Jephthah met the Ammonite claim by reminding them of Israel's care not to offend Edom and Moab during the wilderness journeyings. SIHON, the Amorite king, had attacked Israel and consequently lost his kingdom. The disputed territory, therefore, had been Amorite, not Ammonite, and in any case, any Ammonite claim had lapsed with the passage of time (v. 26). As in many subsequent diplomatic exchanges, the Ammonites remained unconvinced. Two factual errors may be noted in Jephthah's message: CHEMOSH (v. 24) was the god of the Moabites, not the Ammonites; the 300 years (v. 26) can hardly be taken literally. Possibly it was unwise to expect absolute accuracy in the statement of a robber chief.

Jephthah's sweeping victory, under the influence of the Spirit of the Lord, is dealt with briefly (Jdg. 11:32-33). The main interest of the historian concerns Jephthah's rash vow and its tragic fulfillment. The vow, which was intended to secure the Lord's favor, was both unnecessary and undesirable. The practice of child sacrifice in the ancient world was usually reserved, as here, for an emergency (cf. 2 Ki. 3:27). It was alien to true Israelite worship and was not widely practiced until the latter period of the monarchy (2 Ki. 16:3; 21:6). Jephthah evidently intended a human sacrifice (Jdg. 11:31), but the emergence of his only daughter at his victorious return (v. 34) was unanticipated. The text will not allow any other interpretation than that Jephthah literally fulfilled this vow. There is something magnificent, if pathetic, about the acquiescence of Jephthah's daughter in her fate (vv. 36-40).

Although on an earlier occasion (Jdg. 8:1-2) Gideon had pacified the jealous Ephraimites with conciliatory words, Jephthah was not a man of peace, and he resented the nonintervention of the Ephraimites in Gilead's crisis. Recalling his recently dispersed army, he smote the Ephraimites and seized the fords of Jordan to prevent their escape. The Ephraimites apparently did not use the sound sh in their dialect. Any word with this sound included would have revealed their identity, and it was the word SHIBBOLETH (lit., "ear of corn") that was employed. This word has become proverbial as a catchword for certain groups.

10. Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (Jdg. 12:8-15). The BETHLEHEM where IBZAN was from (v. 8) was not the well-known city of Judah, but a small town about 10 mi. N of MEGIDDO, within the tribal territory of Zebulun. The "hill country of the Amalekites" (v. 15) may indicate an Amalekite enclave, although this is inconsistent with the geographic and biblical evidence (Exod. 17:8-13; Deut. 25:17-19; 1 Sam. 15:2-3); or it may have some connection with the raids of Jdg. 3:13; 6:3; 7:12; 10:12.

11. Samson (Jdg. 13:1—16:31). The Philistine menace (13:1) was the greatest threat to Israel's existence during the period of the judges and the early monarchy. This was, in measure, due to the nature of Philistine control: a Philistine overlordship was superimposed upon an alien population, backed up by a military efficiency unknown in Israel. The men of Judah, who did not find this kind of rule particularly onerous, resented the activities of SAMSON (15:11). This apathetic acceptance of the situation was dangerous, and the value of Samson's exploits was in bringing the conflict out into the open. Samson waged a one-man war on the Philistines, who had penetrated into the territory of Dan and Judah. Later, during the time of Samuel and Saul, Israel would be engaged in a life-and-death struggle with the Philistines, whose power finally was broken by David (2 Sam. 5:17-25).

Samson's birth was announced by the angel of the Lord (Jdg. 13:2-20; cf. Gen. 18:10; Lk. 1:13), and special instructions were given concerning both mother and child. Two forms of the NAZIRITE VOW are found in the OT. The regular vow was for a limited period and contained three stipulations:

(1) abstinence from all products of the vine; (2) the hair was to be left unshorn; (3) all contact with the dead was to be avoided (Num. 6:1-21). A second type was a life vow taken by the parents of the one consecrated. Of the three stipulations, only the second was taken seriously by Samson, and his actual consecration to the Lord was nominal. The concern of the parents for the upbringing of their child was most laudable (Jdg. 13:12). They were unaware of the identity of their divine visitor until his ascent in the sacrificial flame, after which MANOAH'S wife showed a great deal more common sense than her husband (vv. 22-23). It was widely believed that such an encounter was inevitably fatal (cf. Gen. 32:30; Exod. 33:20; Jdg. 6:22-23).

There is an interconnection between all the events recorded in Jdg. 14:1—15:20, which made Samson the principal public enemy of the Philistines. TIMNAH was 4 mi. SW of ZORAH, on the opposite side of the fruitful Valley of SOREK. The short distance between the two places may explain the ambiguity in the movements recorded in ch. 14; for example, the return journey of Samson's parents (cf. vv. 5, 9) is not noted. The editor of Judges accounts for the apostasy of the period by the prevalence of mixed marriages (3:6; cf. Exod. 34:16; Deut. 7:3); so it is more revealing when one of Israel's judges was involved in at least two relationships with foreign women (Jdg. 14:1-2; 16:1).

When Samson chose to marry a Philistine woman, his parents grieved (Jdg. 14:3)—an understandable reaction, particularly in the light of the supernatural nature of his birth, although they were unaware of the divine overruling (14:4). The marriage normally was consummated at the end of the wedding feast, but the enraged Samson left precipitantly when the solution of his riddle was revealed (14:10-18). Such an event brought great shame upon the bride's family, so she was immediately given in marriage to the "best man." Samson evidently had made it clear that he knew who was responsible for the revealing of his secret (14:18b; 15:2). Several acts of revenge followed in quick succession. First, Samson destroyed the standing crops of the Philistines (15:3-5), a devastating blow in an agricultural community (cf. 2 Sam. 14:29-33). The Philistines, guessing correctly the identity of the incendiary, took a summary judgment upon the family responsible (15:6). Finally, Samson slaughtered an unspecified number of Philistines (15:7-8).

A fourth act of revenge was thwarted by Samson's incredible strength. A large force of Philistines sought to capture Samson in his hideout at the "rock of Etam," which has been tentatively identified about 2.5 mi. ESE of ZORAH (see ETAM #4). The apathetic acceptance of Philistine rule is shown by the concern of 3,000 men of Judah not to alienate their overlords. Even after Samson's exploit, they made no effort to secure their freedom. It is equally obvious that the Philistines did not regard the actions of Samson as representative of Israel generally. The "fresh jawbone of a donkey" (Jdg. 15:15) would be a formidable weapon in the hands of a determined man. The name of the place, LEHI ("jawbone," 15:14; also Ramath Lehi, "the hill of the jawbone," v. 17), was given as a result of this episode. Another etiological feature is the name EN HAKKORE ("the well, or spring, of him who called," v. 19; 1 Ki. 19:4-8 provides a parallel to God's gracious care for his overwrought servant). Some have thought that Jdg. 15:20, which records the length of Samson's judgeship, marked the end of an earlier version of the book of Judges.

GAZA was the southernmost of the five Philistine cities, and here Samson (Jdg. 16:1-3), a man of unbridled passions, sought the company of a prostitute. A plot to seize him when morning broke was foiled by Samson's incredible feat of uprooting gates, posts, and securing-bar. City gates were strong, for this was an obvious danger point in time of siege, but Samson transported this heavy load to the top of a prominent hill on the way to Hebron, 38 mi. distant. Small wonder that the Philistines were subsequently unwilling to approach him until they were sure he was rendered helpless.

Samson's passions were to prove his undoing (Jdg. 16:4-31). The movements of this chapter involve at least six visits to DELILAH and indicate more than a passing infatuation. The large bribe that was offered (v. 5), as well as Delilah's use of the term "the Philistines" (vv. 9, 12, 14, 20), may indicate that she was an Israelite, although the bribe would be commensurate with the risk involved. Samson's playfulness in suggesting various explanations of his strength was countered by the heartless persistence of Delilah. In their second attempt (vv. 10-12), Delilah and the Philistines overlooked, or were unaware of, the earlier failure of this method (15:13-14). The third attempt, involving the weaving of Samson's hair, came perilously close to the truth.

Eventually, Delilah's desire for gain, perhaps aided by her unwillingness to concede defeat, wore down Samson's resistance. His capitulation led swiftly to his capture, degradation, and imprisonment. Samson's unshorn hair was, in one sense, only the symbol of his Nazirite consecration, but the surrender of this led to the withdrawal of the Lord's power. The sentence, "But he did not know that the LORD had left him" (Jdg. 16:20), is surely one of the saddest in the OT. Yet one final triumph was in store. It appears incredible that the Philistines, knowing the secret of Samson's strength, should have allowed his hair to grow again. Probably they thought they had nothing to fear from this blind shambles of a man who could be led about by a lad (v. 26).

DAGON (Jdg. 16:23) was an Amorite grain or vegetation god, and his worship by the Philistines shows their propensity to accept the culture and even the religion of the people they dominated. Samson's one act of true devotion is noted in v. 28, and even this contains a grim jest in the reference to "one of my two eyes" (RSV, a literal rendering of the Heb.). The house (v. 26 et al.) was supported by wooden pillars set on stone bases. The whole structure was rendered unstable because of the large number of spectators on the roof, pressing forward to see this Samson who had taken cover between the pillars. Samson's last feat of strength displaced two of the pillars from their bases and the whole building crashed in ruins. More Philistines died in this catastrophe than the total previously killed by Samson in his lifetime (16:30; cf. 14:19; 15:8, 15).

The final estimate of Samson is one of an unrealized potential, because his massive strength was not matched by discipline and genuine devotion.

C. Appendices (Jdg. 17:1—21:25)

1. Danites move to the north (Jdg. 17:1—18:31). The setting of the account of MICAH and the Danites is the later period of the judges, when the intertribal organization had decayed and when the Danites, reduced by the Philistine pressure (chs. 13-16) to a small area around Zorah and Eshtaol (18:2), were compelled to migrate northward. Thus the events of the first appendix followed soon after those of the Samson narratives.

The low standards and the religious irregularities of the time are clearly evidenced (Jdg. 17:1-13). Micah's mother may have suspected her son, hence the uttering of a curse in his hearing (17:2). In the ancient world, a curse was considered to have effective power of fulfillment, but it could be countermanded by a blessing. Only part of the restored fortune was used to make an image, although this whole amount had been dedicated (17:3). Micah bypassed the Levitical priesthood by consecrating his own son, but when a true Levite appeared, he was immediately engaged in preference. His genealogy (18:30) confirms that the Levitical priesthood was operative at this period, and the reference in 17:7 must be construed accordingly. He was not of the tribe of Judah, but was a Levite attached to that tribe. However, some disorder is evident, for he had no secure place of service. The idolatrous nature of Micah's shrine is evident by the presence of an EPHOD, TERAPHIM, and a molten image. The teraphim probably were household gods and, like the ephod, were used to ascertain the divine will.

Events are sometimes determined by apparently insignificant details (Jdg. 18:1-31). The chance hearing of a Levite's voice secured a propitious oracle for the mission of the five spies, which seemed to be confirmed by the evidence of their own eyes (v. 7). LAISH, the modern Tell el-Qadi, was a large city in a fertile valley, with an assured water supply. See DAN (PLACE). Its secluded nature, shielded as it was by the LEBANON range and Mount HERMON, had lulled its inhabitants into a false state of security. The spies recognized a situation that offered rich rewards at minimum cost, and so the remnant of the tribe of Dan moved northward (v. 11). The recollection of the earlier oracle led to the theft of all the equipment of Micah's shrine and to the abduction of the Levite, who was willing to sell himself to a higher bidder. Micah's protestations (v. 24) were met with a thinly veiled threat, and being outnumbered by the Danites, Micah retreated. The mission was completed, and the Levite was duly installed in what was to become one of Israel's national shrines during the reign of JEROBOAM I (1 Ki. 12:26-30). The "time of the captivity of the land" (Jdg. 18:30) often is taken to refer to the Assyrian deportation under TIGLATH-PILESER or SARGON in the 8th cent. B.C. But the parallel time reference, "all the time the house of God was in Shiloh" (v. 31), suggests a reference to the Philistine control after the events of 1 Sam. 4.

2. Civil war against the Benjamites (Jdg. 19:1—21:25). The affair of the Levite's concubine and the subsequent war between Israel and Benjamin probably took place in the earlier part of the judges' period. There is no hint of Philistine oppression, and the tribal unity was still evident; the tribal league moved swiftly to deal with the outrage. PHINEHAS (20:28; cf. Josh. 24:33) was still alive, and the central sanctuary appears to be at Bethel, not Shiloh.

This sordid and tragic story began simply enough (Jdg. 19:1-15) with a Levite seeking to win back his estranged concubine. The joy of the father is understandable, since his daughter's return would bring shame to his house. This joy as well as leisureliness, characteristic of the E, are reflected in the prolonged festivities. The Levite and his party cannot have left much before 3 P.M. on the fifth day, when there was no possibility of reaching their destination before nightfall. Jerusalem, 5-6 mi. to the N and still a Jebusite city (cf. 2 Sam. 5:6-9), was avoided because it was non-Israelite—a fact that has added significance in the light of the sequel. GIBEAH and RAMAH were respectively 4 and 6 mi. N of Jerusalem. Sunset made a continuation of the journey impossible, so Gibeah was, of necessity, their stopping place; but they were met with an ominous lack of the traditional Eastern hospitality.

This omission of the Benjamites was made good by a generous sojourner (Jdg. 19:16-30), another detail that highlights the boorish conduct of the men of Gibeah. Faced by an intimidatory, homosexual demand, the Levite's host placed the claims of hospitality above those of family relationship and was willing to sacrifice his own daughter and the Levite's concubine (cf. Gen. 19:1-11). The Levite, confronted with acute personal danger, saved his own skin by thrusting out his concubine to endure a night of shame and terror. His reaction the next morning was no more creditable, for there was no indication of any intent to ascertain the fate of his concubine before setting off. His subsequent action is paralleled in 1 Sam. 11:1-8 and was clearly an urgent and solemn challenge to the tribes. There may have been a sacramental significance in that the nation was involved in the life that had been taken, or a magical connection invoking a curse of the blood of the life taken upon those who failed to respond. The inference is that the tribe of Benjamin was included in this summons.

The reaction of the eleven tribes was immediate (Jdg. 20:1-11,) but the Benjamites stood by Gibeah, rejecting the subsequent appeal of the allied tribes (vv. 12-13). The allies assembled at MIZPAH, a few miles nearer to Gibeah than the central sanctuary of Bethel. Careful plans were laid for an extended campaign, and Judah, whose tribal portion was similar to that of Benjamin, was chosen to lead the attack against a tribe renowned for the prowess of its fighting men (cf. Gen. 49:27; 1 Chr. 8:40; 12:2). The minor discrepancies in the numbers of the Benjamites (Jdg. 20:15, 35, 46-47) may be due to the fact that no casualties are recorded for the first two days. The 700 men of Gibeah (v. 15) probably are to be identified with the select group who were expert with the sling, a formidable weapon that could project a stone weighing a pound at great speed. In restricted territory, these men wrought havoc on two successive days, causing the Israelites to seek the Lord's help with a greater sense of urgency.

A certain recapitulation, characteristic of the storyteller anxious not to omit any details, makes it difficult to understand the events of the third day (Jdg. 20:29-48). Further complication is the proximity of Gibeah, Gibeon, and Gebah, which frequently are confused. But the general movement is clear. A small ambush was set W of GEBAH, which was NE of Gibeah (v. 33). The main attack came from the same direction as previously, that is, the NW, toward GIBEON (which should be read in v. 31, since two roads are indicated: the Gibeah-Bethel and the Gibeah-Gibeon highways). The main army, feigning flight, drew the Benjamites away from Gibeah (v. 32), which was then taken and burned by the force in ambush (v. 37). The smoke of the doomed city was the signal to the Israelite main force to turn (v. 38), and the Benjamites, fleeing eastward, probably between Gebah and Gibeah, were trapped in a pincers movement (v. 42) and decimated. The survivors turned northwards to the rock of Rimmon (v. 47), and the victorious Israelites put all that remained of Benjamin to the ban, which involved a dedication of total destruction to the Lord in fulfillment of a vow.

The attitude of the allied tribes, so roughly handled by Benjamin in the early stages of the battle, reflects creditably upon them (Jdg. 21:1-25). There was no sense of exultation, but rather, deep sorrow at the prospect of the elimination of one tribe, which reveals their sense of unity. It is evident that, in the heat of the crisis, ill-considered and hasty vows had been made. The Israelites extricated themselves from their dilemma by a somewhat casuistic weighing of one vow against another, and by their condoning of mass abduction. Their motives were good, but their methods were questionable and the editor regarded the proceedings as irregular (v. 25). The nonparticipation of the men from JABESH GILEAD (v. 9) may be due to their closer kinship with Benjamin; both were descendants of RACHEL. Subsequently there was an understandably close link between the Benjamites and Jabesh Gilead (cf. 1 Sam. 11:1-11; 31:11-13). The detailed description of Shiloh (Jdg. 21:19) shows that it had not yet become prominent as the central sanctuary; it may have been a Canaanite enclave (v. 12), since clearly it had no representative in the discussion of vv. 19-22. The “annual festival of the LORD” (v. 19) was possibly a Canaanized version of the Feast of Tabernacles.

judges, period of. The time from the death of JOSHUA to the accession of SAUL as king. Apart from the evidence of ARCHAEOLOGY, the chief sources of information are the book of Judges and 1 Sam. 1-8. See JUDGES, BOOK OF; SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. It is evident that this is not a homogeneous account, although a unity of outlook can be discerned. It is likely that the Israelites entered the Promised Land c. 1230 B.C., though an earlier date in the 15th cent. cannot be ruled out. See CHRONOLOGY (OT). Making allowance for the latter years of Joshua and the elders who outlived him (Josh. 24:31; Jdg. 2:7), an approximate date for the commencement of the period of the judges may be set at 1200 B.C. There is considerable uncertainty concerning the length of Saul’s reign, but a tentative date of 1020 may be nominated for his accession. The period of the judges, therefore, was c. 1200-1020, that is, approximately 180 years.

I. Internal chronology. The conclusion reached in the previous paragraph raises the problem of relating the chronological data supplied in Judges to a period of under two centuries. The following table provides the relevant facts:

Oppression of Cushan-Rishathaim	8 years
Period of rest following Othniel’s deliverance	40 years
Moabite oppression	18 years
Period of rest following Ehud’s deliverance	80 years

Canaanite oppression	20 years
Period of rest following Deborah's deliverance	40 years
Midianite oppression	7 years
Period of rest following Gideon's deliverance	40 years
Abimelech	3 years
Tola	23 years
Jair	22 years
Ammonite oppression	18 years
Jephthah	6 years
Ibzan	7 years
Elon	10 years
Abdon	8 years
Philistine oppression	40 years
Samson	20 years

To these 410 years there must also be added approximately twenty years for SAMUEL, making a total of 430 years. This figure could be reduced, since SAMSON'S judgeship was probably within the period of PHILISTINE oppression, and the oppressions by AMMON and the Philistines were, in part, contemporaneous (Jdg. 10:7). No separate allowance has been made for the forty years of ELI'S judgeship (1 Sam. 4:18). Among attempts to reduce the overall total are the exclusion of the years of foreign domination, or the exclusion of the minor judges and of the usurper ABIMELECH. All such attempts are conjectural, and a simpler explanation is that the chronology is relative rather than absolute.

An examination of the territories involved shows that only a small area was affected by each invasion. Sometimes the struggle against an aggressor was confined to one or two tribes, and only in the case of the Canaanite attack (Jdg. 4:5) and the later phase of the Philistine aggression (1 Sam. 4:7) was a majority of the tribes involved. It is likely, therefore, that the periods of foreign oppression and of the individual judges overlapped. This allows serious consideration of the chronological data within the book of Judges, but care is required in interpreting the figures. The recurrence of the figure forty and its multiples suggests that it may be a round figure to indicate a generation.

II. The structure of Israel. Many have thought that the structure of Israel during the period was an AMPHICTYONY, a form that had its parallels in Greece and elsewhere in the Mediterranean region (although recent scholars have found the analogy inadequate). The number of the tribes, the religious nature of the bond that united them, and the centralization of their religious and administrative organization at a sanctuary are features of this pattern and are consistent with Israel's traditions. The nation's structure originated with the COVENANT event at SINAI and is witnessed to in the wilderness period by the centrality in the twelve-tribe arrangement of the Tent of Meeting and the TABERNACLE; by the fact that the region where the Israelites spent the greater part of the period was named KADESH

BARNEA (the Heb. word qādēš H7729 meaning “holy” or “sanctuary”); and by the fact that after the settlement the central sanctuary was to continue as the focal place of the national WORSHIP (Deut. 12:5-7; 16:1-2), where difficult cases were to be tried (17:8-13).

The events of Josh. 22:9-34, which occurred soon after the conquest, have been regarded as proof of the existence of the amphictyony, for it shows the nine and one half tribes W of the Jordan acting decisively against what was believed to be the setting up of a rival altar and sanctuary by the Transjordanian tribes. This was construed as an act of rebellion against Yahweh (22:12, 16-20). Following the settlement, the amphictyonic shrine was located successively at SHECHEM near Mount EBAL (Josh. 8:30-35); SHILOH (Josh. 18:1; 22:12); BETHEL (Jdg. 20:18, 26-28; 21:2); and again at Shiloh (Jdg. 18:31; 1 Sam. 1:3, 9; et al.). Shiloh was destroyed by the Philistines, almost certainly after the events of 1 Sam. 4. During the period of Philistine supremacy, it was not possible to rebuild the central sanctuary, and some of the functions of the amphictyony in this turbulent period appear to have attached themselves to Samuel (cf. 1 Sam. 7:15-17; 9:13; 13:8-14; 16:1). Later on, NOB (1 Sam. 21:1; 22:11, 19) and GIBEON (1 Ki. 3:4; cf. 1 Chr. 16:39; 21:29; 2 Chr. 1:3, 6, 13) appear prominently.

III. Historical background. Toward the end of the 13th cent. B.C., Egyptian influence in Canaan, apart from a brief foray by MERNEPTAH (c. 1220), was nominal. It continued so for the major part of the judges' period, except during the reign of the vigorous RAMSES III (c. 1176-1144). This allowed Israel a considerable degree of freedom to consolidate her position. The kingdoms of EDOM and MOAB were established about fifty years before the entry of Israel into Canaan, this latter event coinciding roughly with the settlement of AMMON. Moab, and Ammon in particular, with the predatory nomads from the desert (the people of the E, Jdg. 6:3 et al.), frequently sought to increase their territory at the expense of Israel. The Israelite failure to complete the conquest, particularly in ESDRAELON, led to a resurgence of Canaanite power that temporarily threatened Israel's independence (chs. 4-5).

The major threat came from the PHILISTINES, a people of AEGEAN stock who settled in large numbers on the eastern littoral of the Mediterranean during the first decades of the 12th cent. B.C., leaving a wake of destruction from UGARIT in the N to the Egyptian border. See SEA PEOPLES. Egypt, hard pressed to keep them at bay, allowed them to settle in their pentapolis (Gaza, Gath, Ashkelon, Ashdod, and Ekron). The decline of Egyptian power encouraged them to extend their territory at the expense of Israel; initially this was confined to the tribes of Dan and Judah (Jdg. 13-16), the former being completely displaced (ch. 18). By the time of Eli, the Philistine threat had assumed the proportions of a major national crisis.

IV. Israel's judges. The main feature of this period was the emergence of individuals who delivered their fellow countrymen from these oppressors. The rendering “judge” (for the ptc. of the Heb. verb šāpaṭ H9149, “decide, administer justice, rule”) suggests a preoccupation with legal affairs and is thus misleading, for besides judicial functions they exercised a saving, liberating activity that was conceived to be the result of a direct endowment from Yahweh. Many prefer to describe this company as “charismatic” individuals, that is, they were the recipients of the divine grace. Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson are rightly accounted judges because of their spectacular exploits against Israel's oppressors. Some of these appear to have ruled subsequently over the people almost like local kings.

The anointing of the Spirit was also revealed in the display of exceptional wisdom (as in the case of Solomon, 1 Ki. 3:4-15). This may have been the reason why the so-called minor, or pacific, judges—Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon—were regarded as judges, although the brevity of the records may account for the absence of any warlike exploits. Indeed there is a hint of unrecorded exploits in the case of Tola, who “rose to save Israel” (Jdg. 10:1). Deborah herself judged Israel before leading Israel against the Canaanites (4:4). The high priest would also be regarded as a judge (cf. 1 Sam. 4:18), as the central sanctuary was, traditionally, the place of arbitration. High priest, wise man, and warrior—from these three classes came Israel's judges. Their conduct frequently fell far below that of the great characters of the OT period, but they were people of faith (cf. Heb. 11:32-33) who fulfilled a vital role in a time of crisis.

V. The importance of the period

A. *Division and disunity in Israel. The ideal picture of the twelve tribes of Israel, each settled in its own tribal portion, with an amphictyonic shrine that acted as the focal point of all aspects of the national life, was hardly ever realized. Political and geographic conditions combined to destroy effective unity. This was due largely to the failure to complete the conquest, particularly in such strategic areas as the ESDRAELON Valley (Jdg. 1:27-28), GEZER, the AIJALON Valley, JERUSALEM (1:21, 29, 35), and the northern coastal plain (1:31). Israelite control was limited to three separate areas—Judah, the central highlands, and a portion of Galilee. Only Ephraim appears to have completed the occupation of its designated area, which accounts for its preeminence during the period (8:1-3; 12:1). The remainder of the tribes were hard-pressed to maintain their positions and often were involved in conflict with neighboring countries. In the case of Dan, the pressure was so great that the survivors had to migrate northward to win new territory (1:34; ch. 18). The tribe of Judah, effectively isolated for the major part of the period, never again achieved a full unity with the northern tribes. Even during the reigns of David and Solomon, the division between N and S was pronounced (2 Sam. 19:11, 41-43; 20:1-2; et al.).

APPROXIMATE CHRONOLOGY OF THE JUDGES' PERIOD

(Where relevant, Scripture references and the area of Israel involved in each incident are noted. All dates are B.C.)

- 1230 Israelite conquest of Canaan
- 1220 Philistine settlement commences
- 1205 The incident of the Levite's concubine and its aftermath (Jdg. 19:1—21:25)
- 1200 Commencement of the judges' period with the death of the elders who outlived Joshua (2:7)
- 1190 Othniel's defeat of Chushan-Rishathaim of Mesopotamia (3:7-11 South)
- 1170 Ehud's victory over the Moabites (3:12-30 Southeast)
- 1150 Shamgar's exploit against the Philistines (3:31 Southwest)
- 1125 Deborah and Barak triumph over Jabin and Sisera of Canaan (4:1—5:31 Central and North)
- 1110 Gideon defeats the Midianites and Amalekites (6:1—8:35 Central, North, and East)
- 1085 Abimelech the usurper becomes king over the Shechem District (9:1-56 Central)
- 1070 Jephthah defeats the Ammonites (10:9—12:7 South, Central, and East)
- 1070 Samson's exploits against the Philistines (13:1—16:31 Southwest)
- 1060 The Danite migration to Laish (18:1-31)
- The Philistine's twice defeat Israel and capture the ark. The death of Eli and the
- 1050 destruction of Shiloh (1 Sam. 4:1-22; Ps. 78:59-64; Jer. 7:14 South, West, and Central)
- 1040 Samuel becomes judge over Israel

B. The rise of the monarchy. The breakdown in the amphictyonic structure is evident from the small number of tribes involved in each of the successive crises. Frequently a tribe was cast back on its own resources, and the maximum number of the tribes found cooperating at any one point is six (Jdg. 5:14-15, 18). Leadership became an acute problem; note the desperate expedient of the elders of Gilead in electing the brigand Jephthah to be their ruler (11:4—11). This situation led to the rise of the monarchy. Inevitably, the Israelites compared their own organization with that of the surrounding nations, whose kings appeared to organize their subjects into effective military units. This led to a desire for an Israelite king, and Gideon, following his success against the Midianites, was offered the kingly office (8:22). The events of ch. 9 also show the inclination toward the monarchy. However, it was not until the Philistine crisis threatened the very existence of Israel, coupled with the renewed Ammonite threat (1 Sam. 11; 12:12), that the traditional reluctance to replace amphictyonic government by a monarchy was overcome (8:4-22; 12:13).

C. Religious and moral decline. Canaanite religion was a polytheistic nature cult in which the observable powers of nature were personalized and worshiped. See CANAAN IX. This religion, as revealed in its cultus and mythology, was linked with the recurring seasons and was designed to promote fertility in agriculture, livestock, and human beings. Whereas it was not totally devoid of praiseworthy features, the moral level was relatively low; cultic PROSTITUTION of both sexes was a prominent feature. Human sacrifice was also practiced, but not as frequently as is commonly supposed.

Into this situation came Israel, with a religious faith that was expressed in forms superficially resembling Canaanite customs, but on an entirely different basis. Instead of a gross polytheism, there was a belief in Yahweh, whose sovereignty in nature and history was such that other gods paled into insignificance. It was accompanied by a highly moral approach to the whole of life, the result of a unique COVENANT relationship with Yahweh, following his mighty deeds in delivering them from Egypt. The final victory of Yahwism over the Canaanite religion has transformed history, but in the initial phases of the conflict was a pronounced religious and moral decline in Israel for the following reasons:

(1) Because of the failure to complete the conquest, Israel was surrounded by the Canaanite religion, which, by nature of its appeal to man's sensual nature, had a fatal fascination. Moreover, there would be a temptation to defer to the nature gods of the land, who were conceived to be responsible for its fertility because they controlled the rain and the springs. The problem of the relationship between Yahweh and the Canaanite gods would become acute as the number of mixed marriages multiplied. Syncretism was inevitable in such a situation, with the gods of one nation being absorbed into the pantheon of the other, a process in which the functions and even the names of the deities became confused. The prophets attacked this Canaanization of Yahweh worship (Hos. 2; Jer. 2; et al.), but not until the EXILE did the nation, as a whole, break free from this influence.

(2) Linked closely with this was the ineffective leadership exercised by the Israelite amphictyony. A strong central authority could have averted major religious deviations; its absence made possible a gradual decline from Mosaic standards. The later editor accounted for this moral decline by the absence of the firm centralized authority exercised by the king (Jdg. 17:6; 18:1; 19:1; 21:25).

(3) There was also a decline in the standard of individual leadership following the death of Joshua (Josh. 24:31; Jdg. 2:7). The stories of Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson make thrilling reading, but their blemishes of character are for the most part sadly apparent. Not until Samuel arose, late in the period, was the leadership comparable to that of Moses and Joshua.

(4) Admittedly, the standards of the average Israelite usually fell below that of their leaders. This is hardly surprising when the background of bondage in Egypt and the fact that they were a “mixed multitude” (Exod. 12:38 KJV) are considered. The frequent murmuring and lapses of faith in the wilderness were ominous portents of future events. Even after two generations had witnessed Yahweh’s power to deliver and provide, polytheism was still widely diffused (Josh. 24:15).

The moral and religious decline is carefully noted by the biblical historian. It appears (a) in the editorial comments of Jdg. 2:12, 17, 19; 3:6, 7; et al.; (b) in the lament of 17:6; 21:25; (c) in the clear evidence of syncretism in the Gideon narratives (6:25, 32; 8:27); (d) in Jephthah’s tacit recognition of Chemosh as the god of the Ammonites and his sacrifice of his daughter (11:24, 30-31); (e) in Micah’s construction of a graven image and a molten image, an ephod, and teraphim (ch. 17); (f) in the abysmally low standards shown in chs. 19-21; (g) in Eli’s depraved sons, Hophni and Phinehas (1 Sam. 2:12-17, 22), and in the conduct of even Samuel’s sons, Joel and Abijah (8:1-4).

It is apparent that the historian regards this period as the “Dark Age” of Israel’s history, but the picture must not be overdrawn. Judges 19-21 also reveals a national conscience; and a sense of intertribal unity and the revival of Yahwism in the time of Samuel and the early monarchy show that there were those loyal to the old traditions. The book of RUTH provides another counterbalance to the conditions portrayed in Judges. (Cf. R. K. Harrison, A History of Old Testament Times [1957], 121—40; M. Noth, The History of Israel, 2nd ed. [1960], 141-68; W. F. Albright, Archaeology of Palestine [1960], 87-120; J. Bright, A History of Israel, 4th ed. [2000], 162-82.) judgment. This English term and its cognate verb to judge have a variety of meanings. In logic, for example, to judge is no more than to establish a mental relation between two or more terms, and a judgment is simply a proposition that affirms or denies a connection between concepts. In psychology the noun is but another name for perspicacity or sagacity, a quality ascribed to one who has the gift of discernment and a capacity for sound appraisal (cf. Ps. 119:66; Phil. 1:9). In the OT, the usual word rendered “judgment” (mišpāt H5477, generally in the pl.) is sometimes used to designate the TORAH, “instruction, law,” that is, the sum of God’s testimonies and ORDINANCES (Deut. 4:1; Neh. 1:7; Ps. 119). The central context of the term is in jurisprudence, where to judge means “to test or try,” and where a judgment is a “judicial decision.” This is the context—the context of justice—in which the words are chiefly employed in the Bible.

Back of this, however, and providing the ultimate context of the words, is, on the one hand, the RIGHTEOUSNESS of God (a blend of justice and love), and, on the other, the moral and spiritual posture and behavior of people and societies residing in a fallen world. In this ethico-judicial context, the framework of judging and judgment is the divinely established moral order; the central concepts are those of good and evil, right and wrong; and the operative principle is, “whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap” (Gal. 6:7 KJV). The standard of judgment, however, is not the bare law, but the LAW and the GOSPEL. What ultimately decides a person’s eternal destiny is his attitude to the Savior Jesus Christ (Rom. 8:1). By faith in him, men and women are justified and acquitted (Rom. 3:24-26); by disbelief in or rejection of him, they remain under law and are by that law found guilty and condemned (Rom. 2:12; Gal. 2:16).

I. The Judge. In the Scriptures, God and Christ are presented as judges who, in terms of gospel and law, pass a verdict on human beings, their sentiments, and their actions; and who in history and at the end of it either vindicate or condemn them.

A. God. God is the Judge of all the earth (Gen. 18:25; Ps. 96:10; Isa. 33:22; Heb. 12:23; Jas. 4:12; 1 Pet. 1:17). He is fitted to be the Judge because with him is ultimate authority, unlimited knowledge, supreme righteousness, ineffable love, and unrestricted power.

1. Authority. God, as the Scriptures witness (Gen. 1:1), is the creator of heaven and earth (see CREATION). He is thus LORD of the universe. His jurisdiction knows no bounds, and his authority is absolute. Because he is God, he is the very standard of justice and equity: to his judgments all people are obliged to conform, and from his decisions there is no appeal (1 Sam. 2:10; Pss. 9:8; 58:11; 99:4; Prov. 8:15).

2. Knowledge. God is the great discerner. Being the ultimate determiner of good and evil, he perceives with unerring accuracy the distinction between them (Gen. 2:17; 3:4, 22; cf. 1 Ki. 3:9). He is also the great discriminator. With absolute nicety he sifts the elements in human behavior, and like an expert winnow, separates and weighs the good and evil ingredients in the human moral complex (1 Sam. 2:3; Prov. 8:14; 20:8). And he is omniscient (see OMNISCIENCE). Nothing is hid from his sight. Piercing beyond the superficial and external, he sees into the depths and perceives the intents and purposes of the heart (Job 22:13; Jer. 11:20; Rom. 2:16; 1 Cor. 4:5).

3. Righteousness. God is always found on the side of the good. To evil he addresses no word but No, and to every good his word is Yes. Indeed, it may be said that his affirmations and negations are what constitute good and evil, for he is the final determiner. In any case all his judgments are just and righteous (Gen. 18:25; Deut. 32:4; Pss. 33:5; 37:28; 89:14; Prov. 8:8; Jer. 11:20; Ezek. 33:20; Rom. 3:5; 1 Pet. 2:23; Rev. 16:7; 19:2). Because he judges rightly, the oppressed and aggrieved find in him their advocate and support. In this sense his judgments are often saving, and are as such a token of his love (Deut. 32:36; 1 Sam. 24:12, 15; Pss. 10:18; 76:9; 135:14; Isa. 30:18; 2 Thess. 1:5-6).

4. Love. God's justice most clearly coalesces with his LOVE in the act by which he delivered his only begotten Son into condemnation and death in order that through his sacrifice and merits believers may have pardon and life (Rom. 8:32; Gal. 1:4). The OT saint knew that God saved by his righteousness (Ps. 31:1), but in Christ it is made unmistakably clear that mercy and forgiveness flow to sinners through the judicial sentence passed by God on the Son of his love (Jn. 11:51, 52; Rom. 5:8; 1 Cor. 15:3; 1 Thess. 5:10).

5. Power. The POWER of God to execute the sentences he imposes and to protect those whom he vindicates is limitless. Those whom he judges are veritably judged, being gripped or upborne by his OMNIPOTENCE. No one is strong enough to snatch the lambs from his bosom or to withstand the vigor of his wrath and the force of his sentence (1 Sam. 2:10; Pss. 54:1; 110:5-6; Rev. 18:8).

B. Christ. Christ came in the flesh to inaugurate and establish the KINGDOM OF GOD, which had been promised beforehand and is to be consummated at the end of the age. He came, therefore, not in judgment, but in GRACE (Jn. 3:17; 8:15; 12:47). Yet, since in his person, message, and deeds he is the touchstone of destiny for all, his very presence in the world was a judgment. By his redeeming presence, the world was judged (9:39; 12:31); also its prince (16:11) and all who disbelieved (3:18; 5:24). Moreover, although he refused during his earthly ministry to be a judge in mundane matters (Lk. 12:14), he will reappear in glory at the last day to preside at the great and final assize in which all will appear before his JUDGMENT SEAT to receive from him the divine and irrevocable verdict upon their lives (Isa. 11:3-5; Jn. 5:22-30; 8:16; Acts 10:42; 17:31; Rom. 2:16; 1 Cor. 4:5; 2 Cor. 5:10; 2 Tim. 4:1, 8).

C. Others. Although the people of NINEVEH will arise at the judgment and condemn the evil generation that sought a sign from Jesus (Matt. 12:41), and although Christ gives his CHURCH the keys of the kingdom (16:19) and declares that his enthroned disciples will judge the twelve tribes of Israel (19:26), and although PAUL says that the saints will judge the world and angels (1 Cor. 6:2-3), God in Christ will not therefore vacate the judgment seat. Repentant Gentiles will no doubt shame the unbelieving Jews on the Day of the Lord, and the lives and testimonies of the redeemed will be to those who are not in Christ like the accusations of their conscience; but, with the saints concurring in his verdicts, Christ alone will be the Judge.

II. The judgments. Although the great day of judgment is still in the offing, divine judgments have long been upon the earth, and judgment is being passed daily. In the past, it was by the judgment of God that the antediluvian civilization was washed away by the flood (Gen. 6:5-7; see FLOOD, GENESIS), that Israel was sent into EXILE (Jer. 20:4), and that the several nations mentioned in the prophecies of Amos were scourged or destroyed. Chief and most fateful of all such judgments was, of course, that which brought condemnation and death to all mankind on account of ADAM'S trespass (Gal. 5:15-16).

In the present, because God maintains the moral order, his judgments still fall upon individuals and nations. More importantly, just as during his life on earth, so yet today Christ is set for the rise and fall of many, and the judgment that is implicit in his person is even now separating people into two camps. It is by virtue of this fact that believers can in the present, before the final judgment, know and rejoice that for them there is and will be no condemnation (Rom. 8:1, 38).

But a day is coming—which no man knows (Matt. 24:36)—when the Lord will come in majesty, put an end to history, gather before him all those who ever lived, and seal their destiny with a decisive and unalterable verdict of life or death (1 Chr. 16:33; Ps. 96:13; Eccl. 3:17; Joel 2:30-32; Matt. 12:36; 25:31-46; Jn. 12:48; Acts 17:31; Rom. 14:10; 2 Cor. 5:10; 2 Thess. 1:6-7; Heb. 9:27; 10:31; 2 Pet. 3:7; 4:5; Rev. 6:10; 11:18; 14:9; 20:12-15). See DAY OF THE LORD; ESCHATOLOGY.

III. Christian judging. Not only are judges in human courts of law authorized to make judgments in civil and criminal cases, but all people everywhere are permitted and even obliged to assess human claims upon truth, beauty, or goodness, and to appraise the character, conduct, and teaching both of themselves and of their fellows. This is a fortiori true of Christians (Lev. 19:15; Matt. 7:15-19; Lk. 12:57; Jn. 7:24; 1 Cor. 2:15; 1 Thess. 5:21).

But judgment that is uninformed, impulsive, superficial, premature, or biased is strictly forbidden in the Bible. Bigotry and censoriousness are emphatically denounced. Christians are urged, when they judge, to do it in a constructive spirit and in accordance with authentic norms. All other judging is contraband, particularly the sort that preempts Christ's prerogative to determine a person's eternal destiny (Matt. 7:1-2; Lk. 6:37; Rom. 2:1; 14:3-4; 1 Cor. 4:5; Col. 2:16; Jas. 2:4; 4:11).

judgment hall. This term is the doubtful KJV rendering of the Greek noun praitōrion G4550 (Jn. 18:28, 33; 19:9; Acts 23:35; the KJV renders it "common hall" in Matt. 27:27, "Praetorium" in Mk. 15:16; and "imperial guard" in Phil. 1:13). The Greek term is a Latin loanword that contains no reference to judgment. It was originally the tent of the Roman commander or PRAETOR. By extension it came to denote the army headquarters, residence of a provincial governor, palace, barracks (cf. Matt. 27:27; Mk. 15:16; Acts 23:35), and also the PRAETORIAN guard. These would all normally be housed in the same complex of buildings; Phil. 1:13 could refer either to the guard or to the buildings. The Roman GOVERNOR of JUDEA normally resided in the PRAETORIUM at CAESAREA (Acts 23:35), but there was also one in JERUSALEM. It was here that PILATE interrogated Jesus (Jn. 18:28-38; 19:9-11). But it was outside "at a place known as the Stone Pavement" that Pilate sat on "the judge's seat" (Jn. 19:13; see JUDGMENT SEAT) and handed Jesus over to the Jews. Jesus then was brought back into the praetorium for the soldiers to prepare his execution (Matt. 27:27; Mk. 15:16). (See C. Kopp, The Holy Places of the Gospels [1963], 354, 366-73.). On SOLOMON'S "Hall of Judgment" (1 Ki. 7:7 RSV), see HALL.

judgment seat. The Greek word bēma G1037 (aside from Acts 7:5, where it means "step" or "length") usually refers to a "tribunal," "judicial bench," "judgment seat," or "throne," traditionally erected in public, and from which JUDGMENT and other official business was conducted. Herod Agrippa I (see HEROD VII) thus addressed the people of TYRE and SIDON (Acts 12:21). Jesus was brought before PILATE'S judgment seat (Matt. 27:19; Jn. 19:13; NIV, "judge's seat"). Jews at C ORINTH accused PAUL before the tribunal of the Proconsul GALLIO, who drove them out but ignored the beating of SOSTHENES there (Acts 18:12, 16-17). The remains of a public rostrum—probably the one before which Paul was brought—still stand among the ruins at Corinth (see photo under CORINTHIANS, FIRST). Later Paul was brought before the judgment seat of FESTUS at CAESAREA (25:6, 10, 17). (See O. Broneer, "Corinth: Center of St. Paul's Missionary Work in Greece," BA 14 [1951]: 91-92; A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament, 2nd ed. [1963].)

Ironically the roles will one day be reversed, and Jesus who was unjustly judged by men will sit in righteous judgment over them. "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive what is due him for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad" (2 Cor. 5:10; cf. Rom. 14:10). This includes even those who are reconciled. While they have the righteousness of Christ, their work will be tested (2 Cor. 5:18-21; cf. 1 Cor. 3:13-15). See ESCHATOLOGY.

Judith joo'dith (יְהוּדִיתָּ H3377, fem. of יְהוּדִי H3374, "of Judah, Judean, Jewish"; Ἰουδίθ). Daughter of Beerli the HITTITE and one of the wives of ESAU (Gen. 26:34). Since the name is Semitic, she and her family are not thought of as belonging to the Indo-European Hittites from ANATOLIA, but rather as Canaanites (cf. 36:2).

(2) The heroine of the book of Judith in the OT APOCRYPHA. She killed HOLOFERNES, the general of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, and thus saved Jerusalem and her countrymen (Jdt. 8:1 et al). See JUDITH, BOOK OF.

Judith, Book of. One of the books of the APOCRYPHA, bearing the name of its principal character.

I. Text and versions. Most scholars agree that the original text of Judith was written in Hebrew. Evidence for this is found in the many Hebraisms in language and ideas and from apparent errors in translation (see the material given by T. W. Davies in ISBE [1929], 3:1780). JEROME states that the Jews included Judith among their Apocrypha, but ORIGEN claims that the Jews did not use the book at all (Letter to Africanus 13). The older rabbinical literature fails to make any reference to Judith. In spite of these negative arguments, the evidence for a Hebrew original seems conclusive. The story exists in several forms in Hebrew from later sources. An ostrakon found in Cairo in 1946 and dated to the 3rd cent. A.D. contains Jdt. 15:1-7.

Which of the versions most closely resembles the original is a matter of dispute. The Greek text appears in several recensions: (1) the most reliable one is represented in the major uncials—Alexandrinus, Vaticanus, and Sinaiticus—as well as most late minuscules; (2) the Antiochene or Lucianic recension, found in MSS 19 and 108; (3) an edition attested in MS 58 and a few other minuscules. The Old Latin and two Syriac versions appear to be based on the recension represented by MS 58.

Jerome asserts that he included in his VULGATE translation (actually a revision of the Old Latin) only what could be adequately supported by the “Chaldee” (Aramaic) text. The Vulgate omits some geographical details and concrete incidents found both in the SEPTUAGINT and the Old Latin. F. C. Porter (in HDB, 2:822) argues that the deviations of the Vulgate from the SEPTUAGINT are due mainly to the Aramaic version. He believes this is made even more probable by the additional concrete details found in the Vulgate but not in the other texts (see specifically Jdt. 7:6, 7; 11:11; 14:1-12; 16:31). Porter cites a Hebrew MIDRASH that summarizes chs. 1-5 briefly, but in chs. 7-14 it follows the Vulgate so closely that it is certain there is a relationship between them. Both in omissions and additions, as well as in a number of lesser details, the Vulgate and Midrash agree.

II. Date. The consensus of scholars is that the book of Judith was written in the 2nd cent. B.C., probably as a result of the Maccabean conflict (see MACCABEE). The persecution of ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes would provide a favorable background for this type of literature. Those who argue for this view point out several details: the book emphasizes zeal for orthodox Judaism (a characteristic of the Maccabean period); the high priest is head of the state; ONIAS (prob. Onias III) is named as high priest; the war in which they were engaged is regarded as a holy war. It is impossible to date the book from internal historical references. NEBUCHADNEZZAR is erroneously said to be the king of the Assyrians in NINEVEH, but Nineveh was destroyed in 612 B.C. A period of several years elapsed before Nebuchadnezzar was king in Babylon, and almost twenty years until the twelfth year of his reign. The Jews are described as having already returned from exile, an event that took place even later, in Persian times.

Porter argues that the author lived in the 1st cent. B.C., but wrote of an event that took place three centuries earlier. Thus he could speak of a period of peace and of a recent return from the EXILE, and make no mention of a king in Judah. Nebuchadnezzar would be a reflection of Artaxerxes Ochus, who made an expedition against Phoenicia and Egypt in 350 B.C. This king had generals by the name of HOLOFERNES and BAGOAS. C. C. Torrey (The Apocryphal Literature [1945], 88-93) suggests a post-Maccabean date in the first decades of the 1st cent. B.C. He argues that the glorification of SHECHEM (BETHULIA is identified as Shechem) is more likely after John Hyrcanus had destroyed the temple on Mount GERIZIM (c. 120) and had razed the city of SAMARIA (c. 109).

III. Historicity. There are differences of opinion concerning the author’s historical reliability. Was he wholly ignorant of history so that he confused many outstanding events, or was he merely using his characters as symbols in a historical novel? Luther claimed the author was interested only in showing that Judah is preserved from any danger when it keeps the law. Others contend that present or recent history is disguised by the use of the names. Nebuchadnezzar has been identified with Antiochus IV Epiphanes or with Artaxerxes Ochus. R. Pfeiffer (History of New Testament Times, with an Introduction to the Apocrypha [1949], 285-303) has reproduced a list of seventeen kings (first published by Brunengo) with whom Nebuchadnezzar has been identified. These range from Adadnirari III (810-783 B.C.) to Hadrian (A.D. 117-138). The book has too many chronological, historical, and geographical errors to be taken literally.

IV. Setting. Identification of the geographical names is difficult. Torrey forcefully argues for an identification of Bethulia with Shechem and Betomasthaim with Samaria. Davies suggests that Bethulia is a disguised form of Beth Eloah (or Elohim) and simply means, “the place where God is with his people.” He rejects Torrey’s identification. In the Aramaic version used by Jerome, Bethulia may have been intended as Jerusalem, but the LXX account describes it as a place in N Samaria near DOTHAN. The descriptions in the book favor the position that the author was a resident of Palestine.

V. Purpose. Almost all scholars agree that the author was not trying to teach history. “It is evidently designed to entertain as well as to instruct,” says Torrey, “and it is well fitted to accomplish both purposes. The author’s chief interest, indeed, seems to have been in the story itself, rather than in any teaching to be gained from it.” A similar view is expressed by L. H. Brockington (A Critical Introduction to the Apocrypha [1961], 40-48), but he places more emphasis on the purpose, which is to “encourage adherence to faith in God even in the direst circumstances.” A more moderate view, and the one this writer supports, is that of B. M. Metzger (An Introduction to the Apocrypha [1957], 43-53), who states that the author “wished both to encourage his people in resisting their enemies and to inculcate a strict observance of the Law of God.”

E. J. Goodspeed (The Story of the Apocrypha [1939], 45-51) is of the opinion that the author was more concerned for the early Pharisaic ideals (see PHARISEES) than for the history of the postexilic period. The religious views are certainly Pharisaic. These include the attitude toward the temple, tithes, food laws, prayer, fasting, and ceremonial washing. In the religious sphere, Judith resembles very much the book of TOBIT. In its concern for summoning the Jews to resistance at a time of national crisis, it compares favorably with DANIEL, ESTHER, and the books of the MACCABEES.

VI. Content. According to the book, Nebuchadnezzar made war on Arphaxad, who ruled over the Medes in Ecbatana. Nebuchadnezzar appealed to all his western subjects, those living in the area corresponding to modern Syria, Lebanon, Palestine, and Egypt, but they refused to join him in the war. Angered by this rebuff, he vowed to avenge himself on this whole territory. In his seventeenth year he defeated Arphaxad, then returned to Nineveh and feasted for 120 days. The next year he put into effect his plan to destroy all those who had not obeyed his command. Holofernes, his chief general and second in command, was dispatched with 120,000 infantry and 12,000 cavalry to carry out the king’s wish.

Holofernes led his army westward, covering a distance of about 300 mi. in three days. The territory of Asia Minor and Syria was devastated. At DAMASCUS he burned the fields, destroyed the flocks, and executed all the young men. When news of this reached the seacoast cities of Sidon, Tyre, Jamnia, Azotus, and Ascalon, the people surrendered unconditionally. Their religious shrines were demolished, and they were instructed to worship only Nebuchadnezzar as god. Holofernes then moved to the edge of ESDRAELON and spent a month gathering supplies for this vast army, which now had been increased by troops from the neighboring countries.

The people of Israel began extensive preparations to defend themselves. Joakim, the high priest in Jerusalem, sent word to the people of Bethulia and Betomasthaim, two cities that faced Esdraelon, to hold the passes against the Assyrians so Judah would not be invaded. Reports of Israel’s military activity reached Holofernes and angered him greatly. He summoned all the leaders of Moab, Ammon, and the coastal areas, to question them concerning this people who had defiantly refused to surrender. Achior, the Ammonite leader, related the history of the Jewish people to Holofernes. He concluded with the statement that if the Israelites sin against their God then they can be defeated easily, but if there is no transgression in the nation, then Holofernes might just as well go on by, because God will defend and protect them against all odds. This speech aroused the other leaders who had been listening and they suggested that Achior be put to death. When the clamor died down, Holofernes boasted that his forces would destroy Israel from the face of the earth. Achior was taken to the foot of the hill on which Bethulia was located. He was left bound, for Holofernes wanted him to die with the people of Israel. The men of Israel found Achior and brought him into the city.

The next day Holofernes ordered his troops into position against Bethulia. The force now numbered 170,000 infantry and 12,000 cavalry. On the third day, Holofernes took his cavalry out to survey the situation. They seized the springs of water, but made no further move against the city. Then the leaders of Edom, Moab, and the coastlands advised Holofernes not to make a direct attack on the city because that would cause unnecessary loss of life. Rather, they suggested, he should seize the spring of water at the foot of the mountain and destroy the people by thirst and famine. Guards placed on the nearby hills would see to it that not a man got out of the city.

The plight of the Israelites worsened. After thirty-four days most of the water in the city was gone and a strict ration was in effect. The people assembled and pleaded with Uzziah and the other rulers to surrender to the Assyrians, for they concluded that there was no one to help them; God had sold them into the hands of their enemies. Uzziah appealed for a delay of five days. If God did not deliver them within that time, then they would surrender.

At this point the heroine Judith is introduced: a beautiful widow, rich, and the model of piety. For over three years, since her husband died of sunstroke, she had lived at home, dressed in sackcloth and garments of her widowhood. She fasted every day except on days when it was forbidden to fast. She sent for the elders of the city and criticized them for the stand they had taken. She was particularly distressed that they “put God to the test.” Such an act was unthinkable. Man cannot understand his own mind or heart, so how can he expect to search out God? She urged the people to look upon this experience as a test of them by God—to educate them, not punish them. Uzziah and the other rulers asked Judith to pray for them that God would send rain within the five days and fill their cisterns. Judith, however, had a plan of her own which she refused to reveal to the people or the rulers.

At the time when the evening incense was being offered in the temple at Jerusalem, Judith prayed to God. She asked strength for herself that she might do what she had planned, and that by the deceit of her lips she might bring about the defeat of the Assyrians. Her prayer ended, she removed her sackcloth and widow’s garments, bathed with water, anointed herself with precious ointment, combed her hair, and put on her gayest clothes. She finished it off with jewelry—anklets, rings, earrings, bracelets, and ornaments—to be as appealing as possible to the eyes of all men. She prepared food for herself and gave this to her maid to carry, then she went to the city gate. All those gathered there were struck by her beauty. She ordered that the gate be opened that she might go out and accomplish her task.

Judith and her maid went straight to the Assyrian lines. When she was taken into custody by an Assyrian patrol, she said she was fleeing from the Hebrews, because they were about to be handed over to the Assyrians. She had come to Holofernes to “show him a way” he could capture the whole hill country without the loss of one of his men. The soldiers were completely captivated by her words and physical beauty. They chose a hundred men to escort her to the tent of Holofernes. A huge crowd gathered around her as she waited outside the tent. The reaction to her beauty was a general consensus that all the Israelites should be killed to a man, for if they had women like this, they would be able to ensnare the whole world.

Judith was graciously received by Holofernes, who assured her she had nothing to fear from him. Judith told him that the words of Achior were true. Now a sin had been committed by the people and they would soon provoke God to anger. When this happened, the people would be handed over to the Assyrians to be destroyed. She claimed that God had revealed this to her and sent her to Holofernes to accomplish through him something that would astonish the whole world. Every night she would go out into the valley to pray. God would tell her when the people had committed their sin and she in turn would inform Holofernes.

Holofernes fell for her ruse. He invited her to dine with him. She refused to eat any of his food, but ate only of that which she had brought with her. Judith slept until midnight. Then she arose and requested permission from Holofernes to be allowed to go out to pray. This procedure she followed for three days. On the fourth day, Holofernes held a private banquet to which he invited Judith, who seemed pleased with the invitation. Holofernes, overcome by the beauty of Judith and with his desire for her, drank much more wine than he had ever drunk before. When his slaves withdrew, Holofernes lay on his bed intoxicated. Alone with him, Judith seized the opportunity. She first prayed, then took his sword, took hold of his hair, prayed for strength, and hacked off his head with two blows of the sword. She pushed the body off the bed, pulled down the canopy from the bed, and calmly walked out and handed the head of Holofernes to her maid who placed it in her food bag.

Judith and her maid went out as they had done on previous nights, but this time they went to the city. When the elders had assembled, she showed them the head of Holofernes and indicated that her beauty had tricked him to destruction, but carefully noted that she had not committed any sinful act with him to accomplish her purpose. Judith gave orders that the head should be hung upon the wall, and at sunrise every man should go out of the city armed for battle. She predicted that the reaction of the Assyrians would be one of fear when they discovered the death of their general. She also requested that Achior be brought to see the head. At the first sight of the head he fainted, but when he recovered, he believed in God, was circumcised, and became a Jew.

At sunrise the events transpired as Judith predicted. The Assyrians were routed and their camp was plundered for thirty days. Joakim, the senate, and the people from Jerusalem came to see what God had done and to bless Judith. She was given the tent of Holofernes and all his furnishings. The women gathered to Judith and she led them in a dance. All the men of Israel followed, bearing their weapons, wearing garlands, and singing. Judith (as a personification of all Israel) sang a thanksgiving psalm.

All the people went to Jerusalem to celebrate. Judith dedicated to God all the vessels of Holofernes that the people had given to her and the canopy she had taken from his bed. The feasting in Jerusalem lasted for three months. Judith returned to Bethulia. She had many suitors, but she remained a widow until her death at 105 years of age. She freed her maid and divided her property among her husband's relatives and her own.

Juel joo'uhl. KJV Apoc. form of JOEL (1 Esd. 9:34-35).

jug. See POTTERY.

Julia joo'lee-uh (Ἰουλίᾱ G2684, from Lat. Iulia, fem. of Iulius; see JULIUS). A Christian woman greeted by PAUL (Rom. 16:15). Because she appears to be linked with Philologus (by the use of Gk. kai, “and”), some have speculated that the two may have been related, possibly as husband and wife. Julia was a common Roman name, especially among freed slaves. (For a discussion of the names in Rom. 16, see P. Lampe in The Romans Debate, ed. K. P. Donfried, rev. ed. [1991], 216-30.)

Julius joo'lee-uhs (Ἰούλιος G2685, from Lat. Iulius). A Roman CENTURION of the Imperial Regiment stationed at CAESAREA; he was charged with the custody of PAUL for his trip to Rome and his hearing by the emperor (Acts 27:1). Why a centurion would have been given this responsibility has been a matter of some discussion (cf. ABD, 3:1125-26; on this and related questions, see AUGUSTAN COHORT). Although Julius did not listen to Paul's advice at one point (v. 11), the narrative suggests that there was a significant measure of mutual respect between them (cf. vv. 3, 31-32, 42-43).

Julius Caesar. See CAESAR.

Jung Codex. Alternate name given sometimes to Codex I in the NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY. Because the well-known Swiss psychologist Carl G. Jung had an interest in GNOSTICISM, this MS was initially acquired by the Jung Institute, though it was subsequently returned to Egypt.

Junia joo'nee-uh. KJV form of JUNIAS.

Junias joo'nee-uhs (Ἰουνιάς G2687, perhaps short form of Lat. Iunianus; because the form is elsewhere unattested, many understand it as the common fem. name Ἰουνία, thus KJV, “Junia”). A Christian at Rome whom Paul greets in Rom. 16:7. Both Junias and ANDRONICUS are described as “my relatives” (KJV, “my kinsmen”) and as episēmoi en tois apostolois; the latter phrase probably means “outstanding among the apostles,” though some argue it should be rendered “well known to the apostles” (so ESV). There is debate also on whether the name should be understood as masculine (J. Piper and W. Grudem, eds., Recovering Biblical Manhood and Womanhood: A Response to Evangelical Feminists [1991], 79—81) or feminine (most recent commentators; cf. C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, ICC, 2 vols. [1975-79], 2:788). If the reference is to a woman, she was probably the husband of Andronicus. (See now the extensive treatment by E. J. Epp, Junia: The First Woman Apostle [2005].)

juniper. An evergreen tree (or shrub) with leaves like needles or scales; their seed-bearing cones are aromatic. The KJV uses “juniper” to render Hebrew rōtem H8413 (1 Ki. 19:4-5; Job 30:4; Ps. 120:4), but this word appears to refer to the BROOM tree. According to some scholars, another Hebrew term, bērōš H1360, designates the Juniperus phoenicia (e.g., 1 Ki. 5:8; NIV, “pine logs”). The rare word (ar'ār H6899 (Jer. 17:6) is identified by some with J. phoenicia or J. oxycedrus. (Cf. FFB, 131—32, 162—64.) See also FLORA (under Leguminosae).

Jupiter joo'puh-tuhr. The Roman name for the supreme deity, corresponding to Greek ZEUS (Acts 14:12-13; 19:35 KJV).

Jushab-Hesed joo'shab-hee'sid (יֵשׁוּב חֶסֶד H3457, “mercy will be returned”). Son of ZERUBBABEL and descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:20), possibly born in Palestine (see HASHUBAH).

just, justice. See JUSTIFICATION; RIGHTEOUSNESS.

justification. In Christian theology, justification is that act of God by which sinners, who are responsible for their guilt and are under condemnation but believe in Christ, are pronounced just and righteous, or acquitted, by God the JUDGE (Rom. 3:28; 4:25; 5:16, 18; 8:28-34). According to the Scriptures, God justifies by GRACE, for Christ's sake, through FAITH.

14. Summary of doctrine of justification

I. Terminology. The Greek noun that most closely approximates the meaning “justification,” dikaiōsis G1470, occurs only twice in the NT (Rom. 4:25; 5:18). The infrequent occurrence of the term does not imply that the doctrine of justification is not important in biblical theology, only that the biblical writers, and Paul in particular, are prone to speak of justification in dynamic terms with the cognate verb, dikaioō G1467, “to justify,” which is found also in the SEPTUAGINT translation of the OT. Moreover, the meaning “justification” is often represented by the word for “righteousness,” dikaiosynē G1466 (cf. Heb. ṣēdāqâ H7407), a pregnant dynamic term that may indicate God’s act of “pronouncing righteous,” “making righteous,” or even “doing what is righteous.” Certainly the concepts of justification and RIGHTEOUSNESS are very closely related.

The English term justification is derived from Latin iustificare, itself composed of two words, the adjective iustus (“righteous”) and the verb faciō (“to do, make”), thus “to make righteous” or “to do righteousness.” In the Scriptures, however, the terms justification and to justify are typically used in a special forensic or judicial sense, “to declare or pronounce righteous,” not “to make righteous.” F. Godet says, “As to dikaion (to justify), there is not an example in the whole of classic literature where it signifies: to make just” (Commentary on St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans, 2 vols. [1880-81], 1:157). It is thus a declarative act of the God of grace by which he declares sinners free from the guilt and consequences of their sin through faith in the ATONEMENT of Christ.

One should not be misled by the familiar use of these terms today. In present-day usage the “justified person” often refers to someone who is innocent. The terms are also used to excuse action or to prove one is right, to vindicate oneself either in the eyes of other people or before the law. A person may say, “The man accused of murder did not commit murder. He was ‘justified’ in killing the intruder because he acted in self-defense.” A reliable dictionary today will define justification as “a reason, a fact, circumstance, or explanation that justifies or defends, for example, ‘the insult was sufficient justification for her to leave the party.’” (In the art of printing, justification means the spacing of words and letters in a line so that all lines in a column have even margins.) Used in these ways, the term has little in common with the prevalent meaning in Scripture.

II. Justification according to the apostle Paul. When the apostle PAUL preached the doctrine of justification in the ancient Roman world, it appears that the term was readily understood by both Jew and Greek (Rom. 1:14). The apostle does not take great pains to define the term, although the word usually may be understood from the context in which it is used. To the Corinthians he simply wrote, “But you were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and by the Spirit of our God” (1 Cor. 6:11), and let it go at that.

Even in the epistle to the ROMANS, the longest and most detailed presentation of justification in the Bible, the apostle does not pause to explain these terms but assumes that his readers understand them. Although in his inspired written record of God’s revelation of salvation to sinners the apostle uses other picture words to describe God’s action, such as “redemption” (Rom. 3:24) and “reconciliation” (5:11), his favorite terms are dikaiosynē and its cognates. Whether Paul speaks of justification by faith or its opposite (justification by works), the meaning of the word by itself is basically declarative or forensic (the word forensic is used in connection with law, courtroom procedure, judgment, or public discussion and debate). A person justified by works would be pronounced righteous because he or she did the necessary works and a judge confirmed it; God pronounces sinners righteous because of Christ’s work for them. In both cases the act of judging or justifying is forensic.

A study of Paul's letter to the Romans reveals that the idea of JUDGMENT or rendering a decision is the leitmotif of his entire presentation on justification. When he says that "God gave them over" (Rom. 1:24-28) in speaking of the sins of men and women, this act involved a judgment on the part of God. Another section in his treatise (2:6-11) especially exemplifies this meaning of justification. Since God's justice is righteous and perfect, he will pronounce judgment upon all human beings according to their works. Paul says that a judgment, a "justification," will be rendered for all—eternal life to those who have done well, wrath and damnation to those who have disobeyed. The verdict will be as it should be, for there is no partiality with God.

The forensic situation is the same as that of which MOSES writes: "When men have a dispute, they are to take it to court and the judges will decide the case, acquitting [hiphil of šādaq H7405; LXX, dikaioō] the innocent and condemning the guilty. If the guilty man deserves to be beaten, the judge shall make him lie down and have him flogged in his presence with the number of lashes his crime deserves" (Deut. 25:1-2). The apostle states that it is the "doers of the law who will be justified" (Rom. 2:13 NRSV). Using the term in a context of law and judgment, the apostle does not say the doers of law become righteous, or make themselves righteous, but that they are pronounced or judged righteous before God. Paul is not teaching salvation or justification by works but maintains the basic meaning of the term justify. No one can fulfill the law of God perfectly and cannot receive a judgment or justification by work. Nevertheless, even if sinners could fulfill its demands, they would not thereby make themselves righteous, but would have to be pronounced righteous or innocent by the judge.

In the phrase "justified by faith" (Rom. 3:28), the term means to judge or declare a sinner not guilty, that is, to acquit a guilty person (not an innocent one). Justification is a reversal of God's attitude toward the sinner because of his justification by faith in Christ. The sinner is declared free from guilt and the punishment of sin (cf. 2 Cor. 5:19-21; Acts 13:38-39). This is Paul's unique use of the term justification: God's acquittal of the sinner. A just person is not pronounced just because he is just; rather, a sinful person is pronounced just because his sins have been atoned for by the righteousness of Christ. In another illustration on this point, in Rom. 2:26, Paul says that a man's uncircumcision is regarded or counted as CIRCUMCISION. In other words, one thing is simply counted for another, or a person is regarded as something he really is not. This is the basic, scriptural concept of the idea of "to justify" or "justification."

Accordingly, the early Lutheran theologian Martin Chemnitz writes of Paul's teaching on justification: "Paul everywhere describes the article of justification as a judicial process wherein the conscience of the sinner, accused before the tribunal of God by the divine law, convicted, and subject to the sentence of eternal damnation, flees to the throne of grace and is restored, absolved, and freed from the sentence of condemnation and received to eternal life for the sake of the obedience and intercession of the Son of God, our Mediator, which is laid hold of and made one's own through faith" (Justification: The Chief Article of Christian Doctrine as Expounded in Loci Theologici, trans. J. A. O. Preus [1985], 69, emphasis added). According to this description, justification signifies "to be pronounced righteous" or "to be acquitted."

III. Justification by works. In Rom. 3, Paul answers the vital question, How is a person justified? How does one obtain a favorable judgment or acquittal? He writes: "Then what becomes of boasting? It is excluded. By what law? By that of works? No, but by the law of faith. For we hold that a person is justified by faith apart from works prescribed by the law" (3:27-28 NRSV). The verdict may be “not guilty” or “guilty,” whether rendered by God or by a human being, but in God’s spiritual courtroom, we are always guilty under sin; therefore we cannot justify or render ourselves innocent (4:13-15). Considering all possible circumstances among all peoples, Paul is forced to conclude that no one can gain acquittal by his works or by himself. If the Jew with all of his advantages could not achieve justification by works, certainly no one else could (4:1-5). The verdict pronounced on every one from God’s universal courtroom is that “every mouth...be silenced [that is, if anyone protests God’s decision] and the whole world held accountable to God. Therefore no one will be declared righteous in his sight by observing the law” (3:19-20). A triple truth thus emerges regarding justification by works: sinners cannot do sufficient good works to gain acquittal; they cannot render judgment on themselves because they are always guilty; a just God cannot render them just by their works, for they are sinners by nature (7:21-25).

IV. Justification and the righteousness of God. In the broader concept of justification in both OT and NT, the idea of the righteousness of God (dikaiosynē theou) is closely related to God’s judicial act of salvation. At times the terms “justification by faith” and “righteousness of God” can be used almost interchangeably: “But now a righteousness from God, apart from law, has been made known, to which the Law and the Prophets testify. This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe” (Rom. 3:21). The revelation of God’s wrath in the first part of Romans (1:18) is answered by the revelation of God’s saving righteousness (3:21-26).

The well-known phrase “righteousness of God” as Paul uses it in Rom. 1:17, however, is not an attribute of God but his activity in saving sinners. The concept of divine righteousness is found again and again in the OT, where God’s salvation in Christ is witnessed by the Law and the Prophets (3:21). Especially in the Psalms and in Isaiah the term pictures God’s grace in rescuing and delivering his people from sin and the oppressor. “The LORD has made his salvation known / and revealed his righteousness to the nations” (Ps. 98:2). “Maintain justice / and do what is right, / for my salvation is close at hand / and my righteousness will soon be revealed” (Isa. 56:1). Paul teaches that this righteous activity of God, this saving act of God, is fulfilled in Jesus Christ. God saves believers through the atonement of Christ, and his merit earned on the cross is appropriated by faith. To have this righteousness is to be justified.

The teaching is clear in Rom. 3:22-26, especially in these statements: “This righteousness from God comes through faith in Jesus Christ to all who believe” (v. 22); “God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood” (v. 25). All human righteousness and justification are excluded. God’s righteousness revealed in the gospel is that act of grace by which he cancels the condemnation of his WRATH upon sinners. It is not the attribute of God’s divine justice or HOLINESS, but that righteousness which is the justification of sinners in Christ, and by which he bestows salvation, for Christ’s sake, through faith. Therefore, it is also faith-righteousness since it is God’s righteousness. Faith receives the righteous saving act of God and renounces and looks away from self to find its all-in-all in Christ.

V. Justification and the atonement of Christ. If God’s righteousness is the saving act of God in Christ for our SALVATION, then justification is closely related to the Lord’s ATONEMENT. In fact, Christ’s atonement is the grounds for justification. Christ’s person and activity is the justification or reconciliation with God and the basis of all individual justification. It is the only basis upon which God can and does justify the sinner (Rom. 3:24; 8:1; 2 Cor. 5:18-21). The atonement of Christ answers the question: “How can a just God acquit a sinner—yes, one who remains sinful even after being justified?” Justification does not mean God overlooks sin or pretends that we are not sinners. The sentimental view that conceives of God as a gracious old “grandfather,” who winks at the sins of little children, denies the integrity of the true God and destroys any concept of justification. God’s justice and holiness demand payment for sin, and this penalty Christ paid in the atonement on the cross. Thus in justification God devised a plan whereby both his attributes of justice and his love manifested in grace for salvation of sinners are given full meaning.

By making Christ a substitute for the sinner, God preserves his own justice and at the same time achieves salvation for us (Rom. 3:26). It is unbiblical, therefore, to speculate whether God could or does forgive without Christ. Sinners “are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus,” whom God presented “as a sacrifice of atonement, through faith in his blood” (vv. 24-25).

God is involved in the justification-atonement syndrome in three ways: (1) He is the initiator, who first loved the sinner. (2) He is the instrument or means, who gave himself in the incarnate Christ as the once-for-all sacrifice for our sin. (3) He is also the object of his saving work, who satisfied his wrath and justice over sin through Christ’s all-atoning sacrifice. At one and the same time God satisfies himself and forgives the sinner. Therefore, only in Christ does God justify the sinner by imputing Christ’s perfect righteousness to the sinner who has none of his own (2 Cor. 5:21). The Scriptures teach plainly that the wrath of God comes upon sinners or else the Son of God must die for them. Either the sinner dies or Christ dies. But God “shows his love for us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8).

VI. Objective and subjective justification. The universal language used in some biblical passages has led to different interpretations. The position taken by the present writer is as follows: Christ’s atonement covered the sins of all people—past, present, and future—and therefore justification may be described as objective or universal. By raising his Son from the dead, God pronounced absolution on the entire human race (1 Jn. 2:2). Those yet unborn were all included in Christ’s sacrifice and God’s universal declaration of justification or absolution: “For he chose us in him [Christ] before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless in his sight” (Eph. 1:4, though most scholars would argue that passages such as this one apply only to believers).

Objective justification, according to this view, does not mean universal salvation, but rather universal grace and forgiveness. God pronounced all people righteous in Christ, but many will not accept this forgiveness and many may not hear of it (Rom. 10:14-17). It does mean, however, that our sins were declared forgiven even though we were not personally involved. The apostle teaches that as sin came upon all through the death of ADAM, so Christ’s act of righteousness leads to their acquittal (4:12, 18). This is what prompted Paul’s statements that Christ “died for the ungodly” (5:6; cf. v. 8). This is why the church can and does proclaim the GOSPEL to the whole world (Jn. 3:16; Rom. 1:14-17).

Objective or universal justification is important for what may be called personal or subjective justification. It is clear that if God did not justify the ungodly, then one would be justified by works and there could be no justification by faith. Also, if God had not justified all mankind, the individual sinner might doubt that he was included. (For alternate approaches to this subject, see the articles on ATONEMENT; ELECTION; SALVATION. ) Subjective or personal justification is simply this: when sinners hear the gospel and the Holy Ghost thereby works faith in Christ in their heart, then Christ’s atonement becomes theirs and they personally possess God’s forgiveness and belong to the family of God.

But it should be understood that universal or objective justification and subjective justification are really not two separate acts of God. The latter is only the application of the former. Missionaries through the centuries have declared that universal and personal justification should give the church great incentive to preach the gospel to all people. All of God's love and Christ's great atonement on the cross mean nothing to anyone if a person does not hear the gospel. In such a case, the gospel is just as meaningless as if Christ had not risen (1 Cor. 15:17). It should be kept in mind that terms like "objective justification," "subjective justification," and "forensic act," are not formulas the Bible uses, but were created by the church to illustrate, emphasize, and protect the great truths of God's salvation for sinners.

VII. Justification and forgiveness. Justification is really legal picture language for FORGIVENESS of sins. Christian theologians have considered justification above all else as forgiveness of sins and have used the two expressions interchangeably. Jesus' parable of the prodigal son illustrates this concept dramatically (Lk. 15:11-32). Paul affirms that it is taught in the OT: "David says the same thing when he speaks of the blessedness of the man to whom God credits righteousness apart from works: / 'Blessed are they / whose transgressions are forgiven,/whose sins are covered'" (Rom. 4:6-7). God says to the sinner, "I do not count your transgressions against you. My Son has paid the punishment of your sin. I pronounce you righteous in my sight. I forgive you your sin." This is what Christians do when they forgive each other their trespasses: "I do not hold your sin against you. I release you from obligation. I forgive you your sin. God has forgiven my sins, too." In like manner Jesus taught Christians to pray, "Father, forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." Justification, then, is not only a judicial declarative act but it is at the same time a remissive act in which God actually forgives the sin of individuals. The demands of the law and condemnation to punishment also Roman bronze relief of a boar being led to sacrifice by an attendant (c. A.D. 100). Jesus used the parable of the lost son, who was welcomed back by his father even though he had eaten with pigs, to illustrate the depth of forgiveness available to sinners.

are satisfied in Christ and forgiven. Justification as forgiveness is more than a pardon from sin, but an actual forgiving of the sinner, who, though guilty, has his guilt and sin remitted in Christ.

VIII. Justification as imputation of righteousness. Justification as forgiveness of sin involves God's act of IMPUTATION. This act is both negative and positive: in justification there is non-imputation of sin but also imputation of Christ's righteousness. The merits of Christ are imputed to sinners. They are given a righteousness alien to themselves, namely, Christ's righteousness, just as their sins are not imputed or counted to them (2 Cor. 5:19). Through faith the sinner receives the righteousness Christ worked on the cross (Rom. 3:25-26). The Lutheran confessional statements, for example, teach imputation very clearly: "The second matter in a mediator is, that Christ's merits have been presented as those which make satisfaction for others, which are bestowed by divine imputation on others, in order that through these, just as by their own merits, they may be accounted righteous. As when my friend pays a debt for a friend, the debtor is freed by the merit of another, as though it were by his own. Thus the merits of Christ are bestowed upon us" (The Apology of the Augsburg Confession 21.19).

IX. Justification by faith. Because of the emphasis given to FAITH in the Bible, Christians speak of justification especially as justification by faith. The phrase by faith is just as vital as the term justify in understanding the nature of justification as taught in the Scriptures. Paul, for instance, states the theme of the book of Romans thus: "For in the gospel a righteousness of God is revealed, a righteousness that is by faith from first to last" (Rom. 1:17). The OT text Paul proceeds to quote (Hab. 2:4) also emphasizes the nature and function of faith: "The righteous will live by faith." Faith and justification go hand in hand. Neither is meaningful or even possible without the other. We read in the OT that "Abraham believed the LORD," but his faith is immediately linked to the words, "he [God] credited it to him as righteousness" (Gen. 15:6). Elsewhere Paul also says, "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:8-9).

In justification, what exactly is the significance of the phrase by faith? Christians have always been aware of pitfalls at this point. Justifying faith is not faith in one's works or merit; neither is it faith in a church, faith in an organization, faith in a certain system of theology, or knowing a certain set of facts. While saving faith is an act of the human intellect and will, it is much more than an intellectual accepting of the fact that God exists, that Christ died on the cross, and so on; saving faith is believing in the gospel, relying on Christ's merit, and receiving God's declared righteousness.

For Paul, by faith essentially meant three things. (1) Salvation is without works. Faith and works in justification itself are mutually exclusive. Works never influence God in justifying a person; justification is "by grace." Works always follow faith. No one can add to the atonement of Christ because Christ has done all (Gal. 3:18, 23-29). (2) Faith in justification is the God-given instrument or means by which the sinner accepts God's justification of forgiveness in Christ (Rom. 1:17; 3:25; Eph. 2:8). (3) Faith is always faith in Christ. It appropriates Christ's work on the cross, which is the basis of justification or forgiveness. If faith justifies, it does so only because it receives Christ's merit. The righteousness of Christ is always intended for those who believe, and all who believe receive this righteousness. (This traditional understanding of Paul's teaching has been challenged by some recent scholars. See GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, VII.)

Faith is essentially trust or confidence of the individual Christian that full forgiveness is bestowed for Christ's sake and that he or she is now a child of God possessing the Holy Spirit for a new life. Faith believes the gospel. Faith is always personal; each person believes for oneself and relies on the promises of the gospel. Thus faith is in no sense a moral achievement or ethical principle originating in a human being. If people call faith a good work, they do not mean that it merits favor or adds to Christ's work or influences God in justifying a sinner, but that it receives Christ. The person believes, but faith is really God's work in that person, for "no one can say, 'Jesus is Lord,' except by the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor. 12:3).

This is what the Reformation leaders meant when they stressed sola fide (by faith alone) and sola gratia (by grace alone). If justification is without works, and if God justifies sinners before they come to faith (as he did Abraham before he was circumcised), then faith's role in justification is to receive the forgiveness offered in the gospel as one's own. The apostle never says a person is justified on account of faith, or because of faith, but by or through faith. To speak in terms of the courtroom, as Paul does: when a guilty person is acquitted by faith all he can do is take the judge's word for it, and walk out of the courtroom a free person, exceedingly grateful and humble.

The reality of this teaching staggers the human mind. People have balked at the doctrine that God declares guilty sinners innocent, that he pronounces the unrighteous to be "not guilty as charged." People protest when they hear the teaching that God declares sinners to be what they are not and does so in strictest justice. They say, "In secular courts every effort is made to pronounce guilty people guilty and innocent people innocent. Every person must be responsible for his own sin. How can God do otherwise?" They label justification by faith as "a shocking doctrine," "unjust," "unworthy of God," "unethical and immoral," and "a license to sin." Justification by faith is not "rational" (proceeding from human reason), but theological. This is what it means to be justified by faith. It takes faith, which is the gift of God, to receive God's forgiveness in this matter. Human protests and criticisms only document the fact that it is justification by faith.

Justification by faith is always total and complete. There are no degrees of justification as in SANCTIFICATION. When God justifies, a person is forgiven completely, and that not in a long drawn-out process but in an instant. Also, all people are justified in the same way. Justification by faith is not REGENERATION, if this term is used to describe the entire life of a Christian; nor is it some psychosomatic or physical act that magically transforms an evil person into a righteous person. Justification by faith is complete and once-for-all; it involves nothing of injustice, since it is God who justifies (Rom. 3:26). If the judge himself has paid the debt, he has a perfect right to free the guilty person (8:31-34).

This free forgiveness he gives in the gospel and the sacraments by faith. These means of grace are God's dynamic power to convey, present, and seal to us his forgiveness through faith (Gal. 3:27; 1 Cor. 6:11). The Lutheran Augsburg Confession presents this concise definition of what it means to be justified by faith: "also they teach that men be justified before God by their own strength, merit, or works, but are freely justified for Christ's sake, through faith, when they believe that they are received into favor, and that their sins are forgiven for Christ's sake, who, by his death, has made satisfaction for our sins. This faith God imputes for righteousness in his sight." In summary, then, justification by faith should include these seven items:

1. God
2. Justifies
3. Sinners
4. By grace
5. For Christ's sake
6. Through faith alone

7. For a new life here on earth and in heaven.

X. Justification by faith as central doctrine of Christianity. Justification by faith has been called the apex of all Christian teaching, the central and cardinal truth of Christianity. Paul declares: “For I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified” (1 Cor. 2:2). It is not only the central teaching of Paul, but also of Jesus and the apostles and of the prophets of the OT. In both the OT and NT, it is the heart of all of God’s mighty salvation acts. It is like the hub of a wheel from which extend all other doctrines of Scripture. Properly understood, all doctrines of the Scriptures serve the doctrine of justification by faith. It involves all the fundamental teachings of the law and gospel and relates all truths of the Scriptures in one harmonious whole. If Christ is not God, how could he rise again? If he is not man, how could he die for man? If Christ were not man’s substitute, how could God justify a sinner, for then God could justify only the righteous. If one denies that human beings are sinful, why bother with the gospel or forgiveness? If one asks, “What is the church?” the answer must be “all those who believe in Christ for forgiveness and reconciliation.”

This is why Martin Luther and the other reformers of the 16th cent. called justification “the doctrine of the standing or the falling of the church.” “This article is the head and cornerstone of the church, which alone begets, nourishes, builds, preserves, and protects the church; without it the church of God cannot subsist one hour. Neither can anyone teach correctly in the church or successfully resist any adversary if he does not maintain this article” (Luther’s Works, 14:168).

XI. Justification and the OT. It has been said that justification by faith is only a NT doctrine or only “Pauline theology.” In reality, however, justification by faith is derived from the OT and simply spelled out in greater detail in the NT under various pictures. The SEPTUAGINT uses the same Greek terms as the NT. Paul did not invent either the words or their contents. From his epistles, we know that Paul was well acquainted with both the Hebrew OT and the Greek LXX.

Paul often quotes the OT for support of his doctrine of justification. An example is Ps. 51:4, which Paul quotes in Rom. 3:4, “So that you may be justified in thy words” (NRSV). Here the term “justified” (NIV, “proved right”) is used of God in the declaratory or forensic sense, since one can scarcely say that the perfect God is in any way made righteous. Another outstanding example is Paul’s appeal to DAVID in Ps. 32:1-2, showing that justification by faith is embedded in the Scriptures of the OT: “Blessed are they / whose transgressions are forgiven, / whose sins are covered. / Blessed is the man / whose sin the Lord will never count against him” (Rom. 4:7-8). Here David speaks of nonimputation of sin as parallel to forgiveness of sin. The statement is also in opposition to salvation by works. Nothing could be more illustrative of Paul’s thesis. The blessed are not those who have good works, but those whose sins are not laid to his account. Even without Paul’s use of the terms in the context of his teaching on justification, the words in the Psalm by themselves clearly teach justification by faith as a declaratory act of God’s forgiveness.

Perhaps the crowning example of the teaching of justification by faith in the OT is the believing patriarch ABRAHAM. It is stated in Genesis that he “believed the LORD, and he credited it to him as righteousness” (Gen. 15:6). Even without Paul’s use of this passage to support his teachings in Rom. 4:3, the statement is as clear as that of David. The outstanding aspect of Abraham and justification by faith is that the great hero of the Jewish people, whom all called “Father Abraham,” with all of his blessings and good works, still is recorded as believing and having it counted to him for righteousness. The example is somewhat the opposite of King David, who fell into sin and threw himself upon God’s mercy. Yet both men were justified by faith.

Several important items may be pointed out concerning Abraham as an example of justification by faith: (1) Justification is reckoning or imputing to a person something he did not possess before, namely, righteousness before God. (2) God reckoned righteousness to Abraham entirely without merit on Abraham's part, as seen by the fact that it took place long before Abraham was circumcised or before the Jewish law was given. (3) It was, therefore, justification by faith, because he received righteousness through simple trust in God's precious promise of the Messiah through his people. (4) This led to his obedience to God so that by faith Abraham left the land of his fathers and went to a strange country (Heb. 11:8).

The essential features of justification by faith are to be found in embryo in simple short OT texts like this, particularly in Isaiah, the prophets, and the numerous messianic promises. Paul selected the examples of David and Abraham from among many others he could have used. After a thorough study of the concept of justification and related words in the LXX, Leon Morris (The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross [1955], 234) concludes: "When we turn to those passages where the term 'to justify' occurs, there can be no doubt that the meaning is to declare rather than to make righteous."

XII. Jesus and justification. Did Jesus teach justification by faith? This is an important question, for if Jesus and Paul taught a different doctrine on salvation, then there is such a thing as a special Pauline theology. The answer to the question is clearly in the affirmative, when seen in the light of our Lord's dealings with certain PHARISEES "who were confident of their own righteousness and looked down on everybody else" (Lk. 18:9), and to whom he said, "You are the ones who justify yourselves in the eyes of men, but God knows your hearts" (16:15). These words of Jesus to the Pharisees are also to the point: "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (5:31-32).

Several outstanding examples from the Lord's teaching might also be cited. In the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (Lk. 18:9-14), Jesus depicts the tax collector as someone who had nothing to offer God and who said, "God, have mercy on me [lit., be propitiated for me], a sinner" (v. 13). On this worst of sinners in the Jewish world, Jesus' judgment is that "this man, rather than the other, went home justified before God" (v. 14). Another example is the story of the prodigal son (15:11-32). The picture or figure here is that of the family and not of the courtroom. The father (who represents God the forgiving Father in heaven) acquits a wayward and guilty son, forgives him, and reinstates him in the family without making any demands. Certainly the son had nothing to offer except to say "I'm sorry," but even his sorrow was not what caused the father to justify him: his father's love had forgiven him long before he came home. The "elder brother" in the story did not understand the father's verdict because he was thinking in terms of works, worthiness, and tradition.

Human reason (like that of the older brother) does not comprehend this situation. That Jesus' view of works, merit, grace, and forgiveness was something radically different from the traditions of the Jews is apparent in his parable of the workers in the vineyard (Matt. 20:1-16). The rational mind questions the employer's justice in giving the same pay for unequal number of hours of work, but this is the very nature of justification by grace through faith. The Lord will offer salvation as he will since he is the Lord. He has chosen to do so by grace and faith, and one's works will not influence his love. All of the grumbling in the world will not alter the situation these words describe: "'These men who were hired last worked only one hour,' they said, 'and you have made them equal to us who have borne the burden of the work and the heat of the day.' But he answered one of them, 'Friend, I am not being unfair to you. Didn't you agree to work for a denarius? Take your pay and go. I want to give the man who was hired last the same as I gave you. Don't I have the right to do what I want with my own money? Or are you envious because I am generous?” (20:12-15).

Thus the Lord teaches the same amazing grace of God in Christ which Paul articulates and expands so well in his epistles. One may well infer that Paul and Jesus teach the same doctrine through different literary form and picture. Both Jesus and Paul preach this gospel to both Gentiles and Jews because grace breaks down all barriers and makes all people equal before God, both in sin and in grace (Eph. 2:1-22).

XIII. The relevance of justification today. Many have, with good reason, criticized the doctrine of justification by faith, or forensic justification, when it remains only “forensic” in the lives of Christians. Some have said that Paul, for instance, took the simple gospel of the FATHERHOOD OF GOD and changed it into a drama of redemption through blood and antinomian justice. The point is made that Paul never heard of Darwin, Freud, or Dewey. What can a doctrine of forensic justification, through process of mind and intangible faith, say to modern man who has walked on the moon? “Who feels guilty?” they ask, “and who wants to be saved by works?” Involved is the fact of human sin and shortcoming, as well as people’s inhumanity to others, which cannot easily be written off as ignorance or something that can be cured by education and better socioeconomic arrangements. Since the doctrine of justification by faith is central to the Christian religion, the important question must be asked, “Is this biblical diagnosis of sin and a cure through justification relevant and meaningful for modern human beings?”

The modern predicament—which society uses vast resources to remedy—is really of man’s own making, whether he traces evil back to Adam, or looks around at his own existence. After centuries of conflict and many ineffective solutions from the greatest minds, the common person today knows that his world is not a delusion. More and more people have come to realize that the problem of the world is a theological one. The modern human predicament, found in various forms throughout the centuries, is the old predicament of sin of which the Scripture speaks. Justification by faith says that sinners are not hopeless and helpless in their situation, but that God has heard their cry and offers deliverance.

Three important areas immediately suggest themselves: (1) For the meaningless and emptiness of many today, the doctrine of justification by faith should mean “by the gospel alone.” The heart of biblical revelation should teach mankind that God has not abandoned his creatures or his world. They are not cut off. He has adopted the children of this world as his own, freely and fully out of a compassion he would give them to live by. He has reconciled not only human beings but also the cosmos to himself (Rom. 8:12-37; Eph. 1:10). The importance of acceptance and “belonging” in psychotherapy, of “being” and “meaning”—answers to all these prominent current concerns may be found in God’s justification and reconciliation of the world. God has redeemed sinners from the slavery of self. He himself has paid the supreme sacrifice. Men and women can now give up worship of themselves and material possessions and turn to the loving God who gives meaning to all things. We no longer need to create our own purpose or our right to exist. God has done this for us in Jesus Christ. In the language of the day, “We may stop trying to justify ourselves.”

(2) Just when modern men and women need it most, justification by faith in Christ is a source of limitless spiritual and moral power for them in their world (Rom. 1:16-17). What often is called the doctrine’s greatest weakness is actually its greatest strength. Faith in God does not cast off Christian works, but is the source and power of the greatest work of all, namely, LOVE. Luther said, “Good works do not make a good man but a good man does good works.” When opponents suggested to Paul that a doctrine of salvation by faith and not by works implied “Let us do evil that good may result” (Rom. 3:8), his firm answer was: “By no means! We died to sin; how can we live in it any longer? Or don't you know that all of us who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were therefore buried with him through baptism into death in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, we too may live a new life" (6:1-4). Justification by faith means not only forgiveness of sins but also the gift of the HOLY SPIRIT (15:13). To be justified is to experience the power of God in one's heart. Paul said: "I can do everything through him who gives me strength" (Phil. 4:13). Justification by faith is the act of God which connects us to the dynamo of all power for all good in the world.

Justification by faith should lead to all the Christian virtues. If the teaching is empty and meaningless today, it is because it has not been completely seen and taught in all its dimensions, or because it has been accepted as a mere creedal statement—only a legal fiction so that people remain as before. Not only the act of justification but also the results must be emphasized: peace, freedom, responsibility, compassion, the Spirit life, love, meekness, patience, strength to do well—the whole life of the Spirit of God. Luther once referred to the doctrine of justification as the peric-ulosissima doctrina, the "most dangerous teaching," because it has been used to allow license to sin and be irresponsible. He pleaded that the teaching be proclaimed so as to inspire gratitude to God, daily repentance, and resolve to serve God and neighbor in a life of newness and obedience. Sinners have been accounted righteous not in some distant world, but here and now in the church, and in and for our world.

(3) Justification by faith assures all people of God's love and eternal life with him after death. We can face the future with confidence. Final judgment does not appall us, for we have already met our Judge and are forgiven. All systems of religion and philosophy that use or imply works for salvation result inevitably in wretchedness and tension of doubt. Those who trust in the doctrine of justification by faith, therefore, need no longer be the "devil's martyrs." In his commentary on Galatians, Luther used this pungent expression to describe those who worked harder trying to get to heaven by works than the wicked did in going to hell without them, only to arrive in the same place.

When God says he justifies the ungodly, all sinners know they are included. When God says to all, "the promise comes by faith, so that it may be by grace and may be guaranteed to all Abraham's offspring" (Rom. 4:16), all sinners know his grace is sufficient. When God takes human beings from eternity to eternity in justification (8:30), they receive the comfort that no words can convey. Beset by difficulties of every kind, this hope remains: "No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (8:37-39). Moderns are not dissimilar to their ancient counterparts in their needs of this truth, power, and certainty of life as offered by God through justification by faith.

XIV. Summary of doctrine of justification. The following items or aspects may be considered a summary of the doctrine of justification as taught in the Holy Scriptures. (1) Justification is an act of God. In both the OT and NT, God is the initiator and actor in the COVENANT and our SALVATION. It is a once-for-all act that is already accomplished in Christ (Rom. 5:16-18).

(2) Justification is a forensic act of God. God declares the sinner or the ungodly righteous in his sight (Rom. 5:8).

(3) Justification is based upon the atonement of Christ. God justifies a sinner for Christ's sake. Without the substitutionary atonement of Christ, God could not forgive the sinner all his sins without being unjust (Rom. 3:24).

(4) Justification is objective or universal. In the gospel God offers the forgiveness of sins gained by Christ to the whole world (Jn. 3:16). Personal or subjective justification is impossible without universal justification.

(5) Justification is remission or forgiveness of sins. Justification is the same as forgiveness of sins. God does not count our sins against us but forgives them and sets us free (Rom. 4:7-8).

(6) Justification is remission of punishment. The justified believer is declared free from the demands of the law and all condemnation resulting from sin against the law (Rom. 3:25; 6:7). It is more than pardon of sin, but a declaration by God. The sinner, though guilty, is relieved of the consequences of his guilt and sin.

(7) Justification is RECONCILIATION of the sinner to God. Justification by faith restores the sinner to personal relationship with God as Father. Mere acquittal or remission of sin would be tantamount to discharging a criminal from the court room in alienation. Justification implies that God looks upon sinners as if they had not sinned since they are again his own (Lk. 15:11-32; Gal. 3:6; 2 Cor. 5:19-20).

(8) Justification is imputation of God's righteousness. Since sinners have no righteousness of their own by which to be justified in God's spiritual court, the salvation Christ wrought through his life and works is imputed to believers as their own righteousness (Rom. 3:25-26; 2 Cor. 5:19-20).

(9) Justification excludes salvation by works. Scripture not only teaches that we are justified without works, but also denounces any introduction of works into God's justification (Rom. 10:2-3; Gal. 3:10-14; 5:4).

(10) Justification presupposes God's universal grace. By grace God justified sinners, and not because of their influence on God (Eph. 1:1—4). God loves and therefore justifies all alike (Jn. 3:16).

(11) Justification is by faith. The fact that justification is "by faith alone" does not exclude God's grace, Christ's work, or the means of grace (word and sacrament). Being justified by grace, for Christ's sake, through the gospel, is being justified by faith alone to the exclusion of works. Faith alone is the instrument of receiving justification so that works are excluded (Rom. 3:28; Eph. 2:8-10).

(12) Justification is bestowed through the means of grace. Although God justifies us, he offers his justification through the word of the gospel and the sacraments. Justification is pronounced in the word of the gospel (Rom. 10:5-12).

(13) Justification is followed by good works and a life of faith. Although the presence of good works is not the condition to receive justification, justification through the gospel by faith offers the power of the Holy Spirit in people's lives so that they lead a life of good works (Jas. 2:14-15; Rom. 6:1-6).

(14) Justification is central to all Christian teaching. The teachings of God; the person and work of Christ, sin, anthropology, word and sacrament, law and gospel, are all involved in the doctrine of justification. In this broad sense, "justification by faith" is theological shorthand for the various terms and concepts of Scripture to describe the entire action of God for our salvation.

Justin Martyr juhs'tin-mahr'tuhr (Ἰουστίνος). Born of pagan parents in SAMARIA probably at the beginning of the 2nd cent., Justin was a student of philosophy who became a Christian sometime before A.D. 135. He taught Christianity for a period in EPHESUS, where he was opposed by a Jewish scholar named Trypho. Subsequently he opened a school for Christians in ROME and taught there until his martyrdom in 165.

Widely regarded as the most important Christian apologist of his time, Justin wrote perhaps a dozen books (cf. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 4.18). Two of his works have survived. The Apology (usually regarded as consisting of two distinct treatises, the First Apology and the Second Apology) refutes slanders against Christianity, delineates true Christian teaching (with emphasis on the fulfillment of the OT by Christ), and provides the earliest full description of baptism and the Eucharist. The Dialogue with Trypho the Jew seeks to demonstrate the transitory character of the old covenant, arguing that believing Gentiles take the place of Israel.

Justin, who includes numerous biblical quotations in his writings, is a primary source of information for establishing the texts of the SEPTUAGINT and the NT. Scholars are also dependent on him for an understanding of early church faith and practice. In addition, his theology (with its strong emphasis on the notion of the LOGOS) sheds much light on the development of Christian thought.

Allert, Revelation, Truth, Canon, and Interpretation: Studies in Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho [2002].)

Justus juhs'tuhs (Ἰουστος G2688, from Lat. Iustus, "just, righteous"). The use of a double name was common among Jews and proselytes (cf. A. Deissmann, Bible Studies [1901], 315-16) and probably the appellation Justus denoted obedience and devotion to the law.

(1) Surname of Joseph BARSABBAS, one of the two men put forward to take the place of Judas in the apostolic band (Acts 1:23). PAPIAS relates that he survived a heathen plot by drinking deadly poison without injury (Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 3.39).

(2) Titius Justus, described as "a worshiper of God" at CORINTH who, after the closing of the Jewish synagogue, opened his home next door so that PAUL might continue preaching (Acts 18:7). The form of his name varies in the MSS: "Titius Justus," though found in very few witnesses (including CODEX VATICANUS), is probably original; "Titus Justus" (in CODEX SINAITICUS and a dozen or so other witnesses) is very likely a scribal adjustment to the more familiar name of TITUS; "Justus" by itself (attested in CODEX ALEXANDRINUS and the majority of MSS, thus KJV) could easily have been the result of an accidental omission (cf. B. M. Metzger, Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament, 2nd ed. [1994], 410). That he was the Titus of Paul's epistles is an ancient but unfounded guess. Some would identify him with Gaius of Corinth (Rom. 16:23); see GAIUS #3.

(3) "Jesus, who is called Justus," Paul's appreciated Jewish coworker who sent greetings to the church in COLOSSE (Col. 4:11). The apostle describes him and two others—ARISTARCHUS and Mark (see MARK, JOHN)—as "the only Jews among my fellow workers for the kingdom of God, and they have proved a comfort to me." The remark indicates that during Paul's first Roman imprisonment almost all of the Jewish Christians at Rome failed to cooperate with Paul in the work of the gospel. These three Jewish believers, however, had been an encouragement to him.

Juttah jut'uh (יִטָּה H3420, possibly "level place" or "settlement"). A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:55), later allotted to the Levites (21:16; the name is omitted in the MT of 1 Chr. 6:59, but see NIV and note). It is identified with modern Yaṭṭa, c. 5.5 mi. SSW of HEBRON.

The Kadesh Treaty, dated c. 1258 B.C., is the earliest known international peace agreement.

kab. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES III. B.

Kabbon kab'uhn. TNIV form of CABBON.

Kabul kay'buhl. TNIV form of CABUL.

Kabzeel kab'zee-uhl (כַּבְּזֵאֵל H7696, “God has gathered”; alternate form כַּבְּזֵאֵל H3677, “God will gather”). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDM (Josh. 15:21). Kabzeel was the native town of BENAIHA son of Jehoiada, a valiant warrior who was in charge of DAVID’S bodyguard (2 Sam. 23:20; 1 Chr. 11:22). Also called Jekabzeel, it was reinhabited by the Judeans after the EXILE (Neh. 11:25). The town was at one point tentatively identified with Khirbet Gharreh (Tel Ira, c. 8 mi. E of BEERSHEBA), but this proposal has been abandoned; its precise location is unknown.

Kadesh Barnea kay'dish-bahr'nee-uh (קדש H7729, "holy [city]," and קדש H7732, perhaps "sanctuary [at the place] of contention"). Also Kadesh-barnea. A site in the N of SINAI, often referred to simply as Kadesh.

I. Geography. The name Kadesh Barnea was applied to an oasis area made by the presence of four springs: 'Ain Qedeis, 'Ain el-Qudeirat, el-Qoseimeh, and el-Muweilih (moving E to W). This multiple spring area was the largest in the NEGEV district and was located approximately 50 mi. SW of BEERSHEBA and also about 50 mi. from the Mediterranean coast to the W. Earlier scholars usually applied the name Kadesh Barnea to only one of these springs. Since the name 'Ain Qedeis preserves the original name of Kadesh, some scholars accepted this site, but it was only a small spring. It might have been sufficient for the TABERNACLE and its staff, but no more. Kadesh Barnea is now generally identified with 'Ain el-Qudeirat, the largest of the springs between Suez and Beersheba. The ruins of a Judean fortress have been discovered at that site.

The name Kadesh, "Holy," is a natural designation for a site with so much water in a desert area. Only the gods could have done this! The meaning of Barnea is uncertain. Kadesh Barnea was the junction point on the Negev-Sinai border where the road from Beersheba forked into three tracks. The W road followed the Wadi el-'Arish to the Mediterranean. The central road continued S to Egypt and the E track soon turned S to the Gulf of AQABAH.

II. History. The first biblical reference to the site (Gen. 14:7) uses the alternate name EN MISHPAT, "the spring of judgment": since it was a holy place, legal problems would be settled there. This was the W terminus of the armies of KEDORLAOMER and his allies, who invaded EDOM and Sinai for valuable COPPER supplies. During the wilderness wanderings, MOSES referred to Kadesh Barnea as being on the edge of the territory belonging to the king of Edom (Num. 20:16). Archaeological evidence, however, shows that the site was occupied as early as Late Chalcolithic times and the Early Bronze Age.

ABRAHAM used Kadesh Barnea as a major supply depot on his trade road between GERAR, his Palestinian business base, and his Egyptian market (Gen. 20:1). His donkey caravans found both the water and the fodder they needed. The area's largest population in OT times was in the period of Middle Bronze I, which is the date for Abraham.

Kadesh Barnea.

HAGAR'S experience at BEER LAHAI ROI was near here on the road to Egypt (16:7-14).

Kadesh Barnea shared with Mount Sinai the key historic events of the wilderness wanderings, although scholars differ concerning the exact amount of time Israel spent at Kadesh. In Deut. 1:19, the eleven-day journey from Mount Horeb to Kadesh Barnea is summarized: "Then, as the LORD our God commanded us, we set out from Horeb and went toward the hill country of the Amorites through all that vast and dreadful desert that you have seen, and so we reached Kadesh Barnea." (The same eleven-day schedule has been used on that trade route in modern times.) Kadesh Barnea became the key locale in the exodus story. The spies were sent from Kadesh Barnea (Deut. 1:22-24). The report of the returning spies (Num. 13:25—14:45), Israel's consequent revolt against Moses, and God's rejection of that rebellious generation took place here. The passage includes a brief résumé of Israel's defeat when the nation disobeyed God and attacked the hill country N of Kadesh Barnea.

The springs at Kadesh Barnea are also called "the waters of Meribah [contention] Kadesh" (Num. 27:14; Ezek. 47:19). It was here that the Israelites complained to Moses that there was no water for the people; and it was here that Moses forgot to give God the glory for the miracle of water (Num. 20:1-13). MIRIAM died at Kadesh (20:1), and nearby, in Mount HOR, AARON was buried (20:22-29).

Moses sent messengers from Kadesh to the king of Edom asking permission to cross his territory, but the request was denied (Num. 20:14-21). As already mentioned, Kadesh was on the edge of Edomite territory, which at that time extended much farther W than many Bible readers realize. The S boundaries of the Promised Land are given in Num. 34:1-5. Kadesh Barnea is the first site mentioned after the ascent of AKRABBIM. Then follows HAZAR ADDAR, which is sometimes identified with (Ain Qedeis, and AZMON, which is possibly (Ain Muweilih. These are all at the headwaters of the Wadi of Egypt (el-(Arish; see EGYPT, BROOK OF). The same boundary is given in Josh. 15:3.

JOSHUA conquered Kadesh Barnea (Josh. 10:41). At GILGAL, CALEB refers to the earlier Kadesh Barnea spy episode and requests as his inheritance the hill country that had defeated Israel's abortive entry shortly after the exodus. Some time later, JEPHTHAH too reviewed the story of Moses' request from Kadesh to pass through Edom (Jdg. 11:16-17).

III. Archaeological material. The Abraham period has archaeological material that illuminates the Genesis story (see B. Rothenberg, God's Wilderness: Discoveries in Sinai [1961], 35—56). Archaeologists have found no permanent buildings from the period of the exodus at any of the four Kadesh springs. The OT is specific, however, that the Israelites were nomads in Sinai; even their TABERNACLE was a mobile building; consequently, there is little for the archaeologist to discover. It is hoped, however, that further research may throw some light on this period.

The archaeologist resumes the story at Kadesh Barnea by the discovery of the fort that M. Dothan has excavated (see IEJ 15 [1965]: 134-51). Earlier work on it had been done by C. L. Woolley and T. E. Lawrence (The Wilderness of Zin, new ed. [1936]). The earliest phase is 9th cent. B.C. or slightly earlier. The main fort dates from the 8th cent. B.C. or slightly earlier, and was used through the 6th cent. B.C. It was destroyed by Edomites. The fort was not on high ground, but in the valley alongside the stream that flows from (Ain en-Qudeirat. It is a typical casemate-fortress measuring 60 x 41 meters. Each of its casemate walls is about a meter thick with four or five meters of open space between them. There were eight towers, one on each corner and one near the center of each side. The upper story of the fort was brick. This site became militarily important under JEHOASHAPATH when he entered the Red Sea trade.

Some sherds from the Persian period show a postexilic occupation around the spring, but the next major occupation in the whole Kadesh Barnea area was NABATEAN. The last masters in the general area were the Byzantines. (See R. Cohen, Kadesh-Barnea: A Fortress from the Time of the Judaean Kingdom [1983]; NEAEHL, 3:841-47.)

Kadesh on the Orontes. Also Kedesh and Qadesh (in TELL EL AMARNA texts, Qidša; see Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 159). A town on the ORONTES River in SYRIA, just S of the Lake of Homs (Ḥoms). The familiar battle between RAMSES II and the HITTITES took place here in 1288 B.C. It is the modern Tell Nebi Mend, about 45 mi. S of HAMATH and 75 mi. N of DAMASCUS. Some believe that the term “Desert of Kadesh” (Ps. 29:8) is a reference to this area. Moreover, it has been argued that the words ʿereṣ taḥtîm ḥodšî (2 Sam. 24:6; NIV, “the region of Tahtim Hodshi”) should be emended to read, ʿereṣ haḥittîm qadēš, “the land of the Hittites, namely, Kadesh” (cf. NRSV), perhaps a reference to Kadesh on the Orontes (or to KEDESH in Naphtali; for further discussion see TAHTIM HODSHI).

Relief of the military campaign of Ramses II against the Hittites at Kadesh on the Orontes in c. 1288 B.C.

J. B. SCOTT

Kadmiel kad'mee-uhl (קדמיהל H7718, possibly “God is the ancient one” [BDB, 870b] or “God is in front [i.e., leads]”). The head of a Levitical family that returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:40; 3:9; Neh. 7:43; 12:8, 24; 1 Esd. 5:26 [KJV, “Cadmiel”]). He is presumably the same Kadmiel who supervised the workmen that rebuilt the temple (Ezra 3:9; 1 Esd. 5:58 [KJV, “Cadmiel”]), sealed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:9), and assisted in leading worship (9:4-5; 12:24).

S. BARABAS

Kadmonite kad'muh-ni't (קדמוני H7720, “easterner”). A people group whose land was promised to ABRAHAM'S descendants (Gen. 15:19). They are mentioned with other groups as a people whose land was somewhere within the region stretching between “the river of Egypt” on the S (see EGYPT, RIVER OF) and the EUPHRATES on the N (v. 18). The name Kadmonite derives from qedem H7710, which means “front” or “before.” The Hebrews and other peoples designated directions by facing toward the rising sun: “before” or “front” was the direction EAST, to the right was SOUTH, etc. Accordingly, the land eastward was the “land of Qedem” (25:6; NIV, “land of the east”), and the Kadmonites were people of the “east country.”

The people who inhabited eastern lands also are called “sons of Qedem,” that is, “eastern people”; they include JOB (Job 1:3), the camel-riding kings from MIDIAN (Jdg. 8:10-12), and certain wise men of SOLOMON'S time (1 Ki. 4:30-31). See EAST, CHILDREN OF THE. Within the stretch between the river of Egypt and the Euphrates, the Syrian desert E of Byblos (see GEBAL) is perhaps more specifically the region of the Kadmonites. Some scholars, however, are hesitant to identify the Kadmonites with the people of Qedem and suggest that the list in Gen. 15:9 moves from S to N; if so, the Kadmonites, along with the KENITES and KENIZZITES, were Canaanites that lived in the S of Palestine and were later absorbed into the tribe of JUDAH (see T. Ishida in Bib 60 [1979]: 461-90, esp. 484).

H. E. FINLEY

Kain kayn (כַּיִן H7805, possibly “[place of] metal workers”; cf. CAIN). A city of the hill country in conquered territory assigned to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:57; KJV, “Cain”). It is tentatively identified with en-Nabi Yaqin (Khirbet Bani Dar), 3.5 mi. SE of HEBRON. However, since the SEPTUAGINT omits the name and reduces the summarized number of cities from ten to nine, some scholars have proposed to read “Zanoah of Kain,” that is, “of the Kenites” (the latter having been added by scribes to distinguish this ZANOAH from the one mentioned in v. 34). The same Hebrew word refers to the KENITES in two other passages (Num. 24:22 [cf. v. 21]; Jdg. 4:11).

Kaiwan ki’wuhn. Also Chiun, Kiyyun. Both this name and SAKKUTH (Amos 5:26 NRSV, NIV mg.), possibly referring to one or more pagan deities associated with stars, involve a revocalization of the MT, which has kiyyûn H3962 (apparently “pedestal”) and sikkût (perhaps a form of sukkâ H6109, “tent, tabernacle”; cf. NIV, “shrine”). The basis for the reading Kaiwan is Akkadian kayamānu, “the steady one,” a term applied to Saturn (prob. because, being the farthest of the planets that are visible to the naked eye, it moves most slowly against the background of the stars). Later Aramaic texts definitely use the term kywn as a title for Saturn. The SEPTUAGINT renders the Hebrew term with Greek Rhaiphan G4818 (cf. the quotation in Acts 7:43), an otherwise unknown word that, if not a textual corruption (see REPHAN), possibly reflects the Late Egyptian (Coptic) form Repa, equivalent to Seb, a god also associated with Saturn. The rendering Kaiwan remains uncertain, however (see R. Borger in ZAW 100 [1988]: 70-81; DDD, 478). C. de Moor translates, “But you carry around the stele of your king / and the pedestal of your statues” (in UF 27 [1995]: 1-20, esp. 9-12).

Kalkol kal’kol. TNIV form of CALCOL.

Kallai kal’i (כַּלַּי H7834, derivation uncertain). Head of the priestly family of Sallu during the days of the high priest JOIAKIM (Neh. 12:20).

Kalneh, Kalno kal’neh, kal’noh. TNIV forms of CALNEH, CALNO.

Kamai. See LEB KAMAI.

Kamon kay’muhn (כַּמּוֹן H7852, derivation uncertain). KJV Camon. The town where JAIR, one of the “minor judges,” was buried (Jdg. 10:3-5). Kamon was probably in GILEAD, but its location is uncertain; one possibility is modern Qamm, about 11.5 mi. SE of the Sea of Galilee. (See further ABD, 4:5.)

Kanah kay’nuh (כָּנָה H7867, “reed”). (1) A brook or ravine mentioned in the delineation of the territories of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH (Josh. 16:8; 17:9). It is generally identified with the Wadi Qana, which runs to the W, joining other wadis and then the Yarkon River (see M E JARKON) before flowing into the Mediterranean Sea, just N of JOPPA.

(2) A townmarking the boundary of the tribal territory of ASHER toward the N (Josh. 19:28).

The village of Qanah still lives on and is about 7.5 mi. SE of TYRE.

J. B. SCOTT

Kandake kan'duh-kee. TNIV form of Candace.

Kanneh kan'uh. TNIV form of CANNEH.

kaph kaf (from קָפָה H4090, “palm [of hand], hand”). The eleventh letter of the Hebrew ALPHABET (כּ) with a numerical value of twenty. It is named for the shape of the letter, which in its original form resembled a three-fingered hand. Later it developed an elongated diagonal stroke, and in this form was borrowed into the Greek alphabet as kappa, from which the k in the Roman (and English) alphabet was derived.

The Hebrew word kaph is the name of the consonant k and means “palm of a hand.”

G. L. ARCHER

Kareah kuh-ree'uh (קָרְיָה H7945, “bald head”). Father of Johanan and Jonathan, who were among those who joined GEDALIAH at Mizpah (2 Ki. 25:23 [KJV, “Careah”]; Jer. 40:8, 13, et al.). See JOHANAN #1.

Karka kahr'kuh (קָרְקָה H7978, “floor, ground”). KJV Karkaa. A settlement that served to mark the SW border of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:3; the name is missing in the parallel, Num. 34:4). It is listed between ADDAR and AZMON, and possibly should be identified with modern (Ain el-Qeseimeh, c. 50 mi. SW of BEERSHEBA, not far from KADESH BARNEA.

Karkas kahr'kuhs. TNIV form of CARCAS.

Karkor kahr'kor (קָרְקֹר H7980, possibly “fountain”). A site in TRANSJORDAN where GIDEON defeated ZEBAH AND ZALMUNNA, kings of MIDIAN (Jdg. 8:10). Its location is uncertain. According to the text, Gideon reached the Midianites by taking “the route of the nomads east of Nobah and Jogbehah” (v.

11). Some scholars identify Karkor with modern Qarqar (on Wadi Sirhan; see Y. Aharoni et al., Carta Bible Atlas, 4th ed. [2002], map 9), but others consider this location too far (more than 100 mi. E of JOGBEHAH; see H. A. Thompson in ABD, 4:6).

Karmi, Karmite kahr'mi, kahr'mit. TNIV forms of CARMi, CARMITE.

Karnaim kahr-nay'im (קַרְנַיִם H7969, “[two] horns”). Also Carnaim. A city in N TRANSJORDAN that was captured by the Israelites (Amos 6:13; KJV, “horns”). It is identified with modern Sheikh Sa'd, c. 23 mi. E of the Sea of Galilee. Karnaim eventually replaced nearby ASHTAROTH (see also ASHTEROTH KARNAIM) as the center of the region and became the capital of the Persian fifth satrapy (see SATRAP). The city had a temple dedicated to ATARGATIS that was the scene of a great and bloody slaughter by the Jews under Judas MACCABEE in 165 B.C. (1 Macc. 5:26, 44-45; cf. 2 Macc. 12:21-26 [KJV, “Carnion”]).

Karshena kahr-shee'nuh. TNIV form of CARSHENA.

Kartah kahr'tuh (קַרְתָּה H7985, “city”). A Levitical town within the tribal territory of ZEBULUN, allotted to the descendants of MERARI (Josh. 21:34). The location of Kartah is unknown, and the name is missing in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 6:62 MT, but see LXX, followed by NIV); many scholars think it is an inadvertent scribal repetition of “Kartan” (Josh. 21:32).

Kartan kahr'tan (קַרְתָּן H7986, possibly “city”). A Levitical town within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI, allotted to the descendants of GERSHON (Josh. 21:32). The parallel passage has KIRIATHAIM (1 Chr. 6:76), probably an alternate form. Some identify Kartan/Kiriathaim with modern Khirbet el-Qureiyeh in Upper GALILEE, some 12 mi. SE of TYRE (cf. R. Boling in Biblical and Related Studies Presented to Samuel Iwry, ed. A. Kort and S. Morschauser [1985], 23-32, esp. 25); others believe it may be the same as RAKKATH, on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee (cf. Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 438 and map 22; for further details, see ABD, 4:7).

Kasiphia kuh-si'ee-uh. TNIV form of CASIPHIA.

Kasluhites kas'luh-him, kas'luh-hits. TNIV form of CASLUHIM, CASLUHITES.

Kattath kat'ath (קַטָּת H7793, meaning unknown). A town allotted to the tribe of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:15; NASB, “Kattah,” apparently by mistake). It is mentioned next to NAHALAL, leading many scholars to think that Kattath is the same as KITRON (Jdg. 1:30), though the difference in form is difficult to explain. The town was probably in the N part of the Jezreel Valley (see ESDRAELON), but the precise location is unknown.

katydid. An insect related to the grasshopper. See LOCUST.

Kebar kee'bahr (כְּבַר H3894, perhaps “large, great”). A watercourse in Babylonia. In the OT, the name occurs eight times in the expression nēhalkēbār, lit., “the river Kebar” (Ezek. 1:1, 3; 3:15, 23; 10:15, 20, 22; 43:3). The Babylonian equivalent, nādrū kabari, appears on two contract tablets (from 443 and 423 B.C.) unearthed at NIPPUR. The nāru kabari was indeed a “great canal” that branched off from the EUPHRATES above BABYLON, flowed 60 mi. SE, through Nippur, and finally emptied back into the Euphrates near ERECH. Today, after centuries of neglect, this artificial watercourse is dry; the Arabs refer to it as Shaṭṭ en-Nil (“the river Nile”). Most scholars identify the “Kebar River” with this canal. NEBUCHADNEZZAR settled a colony of Jewish exiles on the banks of the Kebar; and EZEKIEL saw his earlier visions as he ministered here. Whether Kebar was dug with the forced labor of Jewish captives is unknown.

R. C. RIDALL

Kedar kee’duhr (𐤊𐤍 H7723, perhaps “mighty”; cf. E. A. Knauf, Ismael, 2nd ed. [1989], 66). Son of ISHMAEL and ancestor of a tribe in North ARABIA.

I. Importance in OT. Kedar is named second in each of the two lists of Ishmael’s sons (Gen. 25:13; 1 Chr. 1:29), but the OT contains no further information about him. The name occurs ten other times as a designation of an Arabian tribe that does not enter directly into the OT history at any point, but must have been well known to the Israelites. It is used figuratively, along with the name of MESHECH (a different ethnic group that lived in an entirely different area), to describe the situation of one dwelling among barbarous strangers, either in a place distant from one’s own home, or in a homeland in which the people have turned against truth (Ps. 120:5). In Isa. 42:11 and 60:7 it indicates the future wide extension of God’s kingdom. In Jer. 2:10 it is used to point to the distant E, in parallel with KITTIM for the distant W.

Isaiah also refers to the many skillful archers and mighty warriors of Kedar (Isa. 21:17). The great multitude of its flocks, camels, and tents is mentioned elsewhere (Isa. 60:7; Jer. 49:28-29; Ezek. 27:21). In Ezek. 27:21 trade with the princes of Kedar is listed as one of the marks of the greatness of TYRE. The tents of Kedar are used along with the curtains of SOLOMON as a figure to depict the dark beauty of Solomon’s beloved one (Cant. 1:5). All these comparisons show how well known distant Kedar must have been to the Israelites in the years between 1000 and 500 B.C. Isaiah predicts that God will soon remove the glory of Kedar and destroy its powerful forces (Isa. 21:16), and Jeremiah predicts a later destruction, this time at the hands of NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Jer. 49:28-29).

II. Extrabiblical references to Kedar. In view of the many biblical references to the N Arabian tribe of Kedar, it might seem strange that early Arabic literature contains no reference to it. Pre-Islamic N Arabic material, however, is extremely limited in quantity. Almost 1,200 years intervened between the time of Nebuchadnezzar and the rise of Islam. In the 19th cent., new light came from the discovery of the annals of ASHURBANIPAL, the last great king of ASSYRIA (669 to c. 632 B.C.). The account of Ashurbanipal’s ninth campaign includes the record of an expedition against the people of Kedar (Qedar), which was evidently a powerful factor in N Arabia, both in his reign and in that of his predecessor. An Aramaic inscription from the 5th cent. B.C., found in Egypt, indicates that Geshem the Arabian (perhaps the same GESHEM as is mentioned in Neh. 2:19 and 6:1-6) was a king of Kedar, and that there were at that time Kedarites on the eastern border of Egypt, probably stationed there as guards by the Persians (see I. Rabinowitz in JNES 15 [1956]: 1-9). Thus the importance of Kedar in biblical statements is attested by archaeological discoveries.

After the blows inflicted by Ashurbanipal and Nebuchadnezzar, the tribe probably dwindled rapidly and in the course of a few centuries disappeared or was assimilated into other Arabian tribes. In constructing a genealogy of Muhammad, the Islamic hagiographers traced his descent from Abraham and Ishmael through Kedar. (See further F. V. Winnett, "The Arabian Genealogies in Genesis," in Translating and Understanding the Old Testament, ed. H. T. Frank and W. L. Reed [1970], 171-96, esp. 193-96; I. Eph'al, The Ancient Arabs: Nomads on the Borders of the Fertile Crescent, 9th-5th Centuries B. C. [1982], 223-27 et passim; E. A. Knauf in ABD, 4:9-10.)

A. A. MACRAE

Kedemah ked'uh-muh (קֶדְמָה H7715, possibly "easterner"). Son of ISHMAEL and ancestor of a tribe in N ARABIA (Gen. 25:15; 1 Chr. 1:31). In contrast to the other tribes that descended from Ishmael, Kedemah is not attested in extrabiblical literature. See also NODAB.

Kedemoth ked'uh-moth (קֶדְמוֹת H7717, "eastern [place]"). A city, probably on the upper course of the ARNON River, from which MOSES sent messengers to SIHON, king of the AMORITES, requesting a passage through his country (Deut. 2:26; Josh. 13:18). Kedemoth was assigned to the tribe of REUBEN and became a Levitical city allotted to the descendants of MERAR (Josh. 21:37; 1 Chr. 6:79). Its location is uncertain; one of several possibilities is Aleiyan, c. 20 mi. E of the DEAD SEA and 6 mi. N of the Arnon (for other proposals, see Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 441).

S. BARABAS

Kedesh kee'dish (קִדְשׁ H7730, "holy place"). Name of several places in Palestine (see also KADESH ON THE ORONTES); some of the identifications are debated. The name Kedesh (like KADESH, with which it is sometimes confused) generally indicated a place where some kind of shrine had stood. Since such shrines were probably common, the term may have been used at various locations, in some of which it was retained, eventually becoming simply a name with no continuing recollection of the cause of its origin.

(1) The most prominent city in Scripture that bore this name was conquered by JOSHUA from a Canaanite king (Josh. 12:22; however, some scholars believe this text refers to #3 below); it later became one of the "fortified cities" in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (19:37). Described as "Kedesh in Galilee in the hill country of Naphtali," it is listed as one of the three CITIES OF REFUGE set aside W of the Jordan (20:7). It was also one of the Levitical cities allotted to the descendants of GERSHON (21:32; 1 Chr. 6:76). Kedesh is listed among the cities that TIGLATH-PILESER conquered, deporting its inhabitants to ASSYRIA in the reign of PEKAH (2 Ki. 15:29). Generally identified with modern Tell Qades (c. 17 mi. NNW of the Sea of Galilee), Kedesh had a strategic location, being in a fertile plain that overlooks the JORDAN Valley. (See NEAEHL, 3:855-59.)

(2) BARAK is said to have come from "Kedesh in Naphtali" (Jdg. 4:6), and it was to this city that he called the representatives of ZEBULUN and Naphtali to plan the gathering of troops at Mount TABOR (vv. 9-10). We are also told that HEBER the Kenite lived near it, by a great tree in ZAAANANNIM (v. 11). Some scholars have argued that this Kedesh is the same as #1 above, but the text suggests strongly that Barak's hometown must have been relatively close to Mount Tabor and Zaanannim, not in Upper Galilee. A possible identification is modern Khirbet Qedish, about a mile W of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee (see Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 223-24; the same general area is suggested by Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 231-35, but he acknowledges that there is no reliable identification). Still other scholars point to Jdg. 5:19, which places the battle "at Taanach by the waters of Megiddo," and argue that the Kedesh in question should be identified with #3 below (but see Aharoni, Land of the Bible, 208 n. 109).

(3) A Levitical city within the tribal territory of ISSACHAR, allotted to the Gershonites (1 Chr. 6:72; contrast Kedesh of Naphtali, v. 76). In the parallel list (Josh. 21:28), the place occupied by Kedesh is taken by the name KISHION (one wonders whether this could be another name for the same place based upon its nearness to the historic river KISHON). Because the reference to Kedesh in Josh. 12:22 seems to point to a city in the vicinity of TAANACH, MEGIDDO, and JOKNEAM (i.e., in or near the plain of ESDRAELON), some have argued that this Kedesh is the one in Issachar, not Kedesh in Upper Galilee (see #1 above), and that it should be identified with Tell Abu Qudeis, a small mound between Taanach and Megiddo. Others argue that this site is too far W to have been included in the territory of Issachar (see TRIBES, LOCATION OF). It has also been suggested that Kedesh in Issachar was Barak's hometown (Jdg. 4:6) and/or the place where Heber the Kenite lived (4:11; see #2 above).

(4) A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDOM (Josh. 15:23). Since there is no other mention of such a place in the Scripture, it may be a city otherwise unknown or, as some have suggested, another name for KADESH BARNEA (but see Aharoni, Land of the Bible, 353).

A. A. MACRAE

Kedorlaomer ked'or-lay'oh-muhr (קדורלאמר H3906, prob. from Elamite kutir [Akk. kudur] and Lagamaru, "servant of [the goddess] Lagamar"). Also Chedorlaomer. The king of ELAM defeated by ABRAHAM (Gen. 14:1-17). The goddess Lagamar (or Lakamal) is referred to in Akkadian texts of the Agade and Old Babylonian period (MARI) and is common in Middle Iranian. The name is therefore appropriate to the period c. 2000-1700 B.C.

Kedorlaomer is named as king of Elam and leader of a coalition (Gen. 14:4) with AMRAPHEL of SHINAR (Babylonia), ARIOCH of ELLASAR, and TIDAL king of GOIIM, which sacked SODOM and GOMORRAH when these cities revolted after a submission of twelve years. On their return near DAMASCUS, Abraham and his band of retainers defeated them in a surprise night attack. Archaeological evidence of an advanced civilization (Middle Bronze I) in TRANSJORDAN, the NEGEV, and SINAI that collapsed suddenly authenticates the background of this event.

The view that this text represents an authentic historical document is in no way belittled by present uncertainty in the identification of Kedorlaomer or his associates. Powerful coalitions of kings marching long distances in the 2nd millennium B.C. are known from CUNEIFORM texts. The commonest view is that which identifies Kedorlaomer with Kutir-nahḫunti I of Elam c. 1625 B.C. (?) but this requires an unsupported equation of nahḫundi with la<omar, which is unlikely in view of the divine name given above. A more complex view, based on the so-called "Kedorlaomer" tablets in the British Museum (7th cent. B.C.), identifies him with a king of Elam named there KU.KU.KU.MAL. It has been suggested that the four kings represent different periods and the four "world-regions"—Babylonia (S), Elam (E), Ellasar (N = Assyria), and Goiim (W = Hatti). On this view, Gen. 14 would be an early MIDRASH. (See M. C. Astour in Biblical Motifs: Origins and Transformations, ed. A. Altmann [1966], 65-112, and in ABD, 1:893-95, s.v. "Chedorlaomer".)

D. J. WISEMAN

Kedron kee'druhn (Κεδρών). KJV Cedron. A town near Jamnia (see JABNEEL #2), fortified by the SELEUCID commander Cendebeus at the orders of ANTIOCHUS VII as preparation for an invasion of JUDEA during the time of SIMON MACCABEE (1 Macc. 15:39-41; 16:9). It provided strategic control of several roads into Judea. It is generally identified with modern Qaṭra, about 8 mi. SE of Jamnia and 25 mi. W of Jerusalem.

F. B. HUEY, JR.

keeper. This term is used over forty times in the KJV (but fewer than ten times in the NIV) to render various terms, especially the participle of Hebrew šāmar H9068, “to keep, guard” (e.g., Gen. 4:9; 1 Sam. 17:20 [NIV, “shepherd”]; Ps. 121:5 [NIV, “watches”]) and Greek phylax G5874, “guard” (e.g., Acts 5:23). The expression “keeper of the wardrobe” refers to a civil servant who was apparently in charge not only of the king’s personal clothing, but also of robes used by others in the royal court (2 Ki. 10:22, where “wardrobe” translates the HAPAX LEGOMENON meltāḥâ H4921; in 22:14 and 2 Chr. 34:22 the term is beḡed H955, a very common word meaning “clothing, garment”).

Kehelathah kee’huh-lay’thuh (קהלתה H7739, “assembly”). A stopping place of the Israelites between Rissah and Mount Shepher on their wilderness journey (Num. 33:22-23; LXX Makellath [cf. vv. 25 – 26]). The site is unknown.

Keilah kee-i’luh (קֵיִלָּה H7881, derivation uncertain). (1) A town in the SHEPHELAH allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:44). It is identified with modern Khirbet Qila, c. 17 mi. SW of JERUSALEM and 8 mi. NW of HEBRON. DAVID led a daring expedition to Keilah to deliver it from attacks by the PHILISTINES who were robbing the threshing floors. Hearing of it, SAUL sent troops there to capture him and his men. David was forced to retreat again into the wilderness of ZIPH, when it became apparent after consulting the ephod that the men of Keilah might turn him over to Saul (1 Sam. 23:1-13). Keilah is mentioned in the TELL EL-AMARNA letters as Qilti, an Egyptian base. Letters to AKHENATEN, pharaoh of Egypt, from the princes of Jerusalem and Hebron complained of each other’s occupation of Keilah at various times. The town was inhabited by Jews returning from the EXILE and was included in the roster of those who participated in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:17-18). There is a tradition that the prophet HABAKKUK was buried in Keilah.

(2) A GARMITE included in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. 4:19). The passage as a whole (vv. 16-20) lists a number of persons whose connection with the descendants of Judah is not given. Keilah probably gave his name to the town (above, #1). See also ESHTEMOA; HODIAH.

F. B. HUEY, JR.

Kelaiah ki-lay’yuh (קְלִיָּה H7835, meaning uncertain; see J. D. Fowler, Theophoric Personal Names in Ancient Hebrew [1988], 148). A Levite who agreed to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:23; 1 Esd. 9:23 [KJV, “Colius”]). The text further identifies him as KELITA.

Kelal kee’lal (קָלָל H4006, possibly “completeness, perfection”). One of the descendants of PAHATH-MOAB who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

Kelita ki-li’tuh (קְלִיטָא H7836, possibly “midget” or “cripple”). Also called KELAIAH (Kelita may be a nickname). A Levite who agreed to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:23; 1 Esd. 9:23 [KJV, “Calitas”]). He is probably the same Levite listed among those who instructed the people (Neh. 8:7) and who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (10:10; 1 Esd. 9:48 [KJV, “Calitas”]).

Kelub kee'luhb (כְּלוּב H3991, apparently from a word meaning “basket”). (1) A man identified as brother of Shuhah and father of Mehir (1 Chr. 4:11; the LXX has CALEB). These persons and others are referred to as “the men of Recah” (v. 12). They were apparently descendants of JUDAH, but their precise genealogical connection is not given.

(2) Father of Ezri; the latter was an official of DAVID charged with supervising “the field workers who farmed the land” (1 Chr. 27:26).

K. L. BARKER

Kelubai. See CALEB #2.

Keluhi kel'yoo-hi (כְּלוּחִי H3988 [thus Ketib, but perhaps to be vocalized differently; Qere כְּלוּדִי], possibly from a root meaning “complete”). KJV Chelluh; NRSV Cheluhi. One of the descendants of BANI who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:35 [LXX, Chelia]; the name is missing in the parallel passage, 1 Esd. 9:35).

Kemuel kem'yoo-uhl (קִמּוּאֵל H7851, possibly “God has arisen” or “Qam is God”). (1) Son of NAHOR, nephew of ABRAHAM, and father of ARAM (Gen. 22:21).

(2) Son of Shiphtan; he was a leader from the tribe of EPHRAIM, chosen to assist in the distribution of the land (Num. 34:24).

(3) Father of Hashabiah; the latter was an officer over the tribe of LEVI in the days of King DAVID (1 Chr. 27:17).

S. BARABAS

Kenaanah ki-nay'uh-nuh (כְּנַעֲנָה H4049 [in form, fem. of כְּנַעֲנִי H4046; see CANAAN]). Also Chenaanah. (1) Son of Bilhan and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:10); he and his brothers were warriors and heads of families (v. 11).

(2) Father of ZEDEKIAH; the latter was a false prophet who predicted victory for AHAB at the battle of RAMOTH GILEAD (1 Ki. 22:11, 24; 2 Chr. 18:10, 23); 1 Ki. 22:24; 2 Chr. 18:23).

F. W. BUSH

Kenan kee'nuhn (קִינָן H7809, apparently derived from קָיָן H7803, CAIN; ΚΑΙΝΩΜ G2783). Son of ENOSH and grandson of SETH (Gen. 5:9-14 [KJV, “Cainan”]; 1 Chr. 1:2); included in Luke's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:37 [KJV and NRSV, “Cainan”]; in v. 36, the same Gk. form is rendered CAINAN by the NIV).

Kenani ki-nay'ni (כְּנַנִי H4039, short form of כְּנַנִּיחִי H4041, “Yahweh has strengthened”; see KENANIAH). Also Chenani. One of the Levites who led the people in confession and worship after EZRA read from the Book of the Law (Neh. 9:4).

Kenaniah ken'uh-ni'uh (כְּנַנִּיחִי H4041 and כְּנַנִּיָּה H4040, “Yahweh has strengthened [or is firm]”; see KENANI). Also Chenaniah. (1) The head Levite who was “in charge of the singing” when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was transported to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:22, 27). The term for “singing” is maśśā H5362, “lifting, burden,” usually interpreted to mean “the lifting [of song],” but some argue that it refers to “the lifting [of the ark],” indicating that Kenaniah supervised the proper handling of the ark of the covenant. Still others suggest that the word used here is the homonym maššā < H5363, “pronouncement, oracle,” and that Kenaniah was a leader of prophecy (cf. JB, “versed in divine oracles,” v. 22).

(2) A Levite descended from IZHAR; in the time of DAVID, Kenaniah and his sons were “assigned duties away from the temple, as officials and judges over Israel” (1 Chr. 26:29; cf. Neh. 11:16).

M. R. WILSON

Kenath kee’nath (𐤊𐤍𐤔 H7875, derivation unknown). A city in BASHAN, taken from the AMORITES by a Manassite leader called NOBAH, who gave it his own name (Num. 32:42; cf. Jdg. 8:11). It was later lost to the Geshurites and Arameans (1 Chr. 2:23; the KJV rendering is incorrect). Kenath is mentioned in Egyptian and other extrabiblical texts. In Hellenistic times it became one of the cities of the DECAPOLIS under the name Kanatha; the Arabians defeated HEROD the Great there (Jos. War 1.19.2). It is usually identified with modern Qanawat in Syria (about 57 mi. E of the Sea of Galilee), where there are many impressive ruins from Greco-Roman times.

S. BARABAS

Kenaz, Kenizzite kee’naz, ken’uh-zit (𐤊𐤍𐤏 H7869, meaning uncertain; gentilic 𐤊𐤍𐤏𐤕 H7870, “Kenizzite” [KJV also “Kenezite”]). (1) Son of Eliphaz and grandson of ESAU; an Edomite chief (Gen. 36:11, 15, 42; 1 Chr. 1:36, 53).

(2) Younger brother of CALEB (son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite); father of Othniel and Seraiah (Josh. 15:17; Jdg. 1:13; 3:9, 11; 1 Chr. 4:13). For the view that Othniel was Caleb’s younger brother and that therefore Kenaz was Caleb’s father, see discussion under OTHNIEL.

(3) Son of Elah and grandson of Caleb (1 Chr. 4:15).

(4) Clan or family name. The Kenizzites are one of the S Palestinian tribes (listed between KENITES and KADMONITES) whose land God promised to Abraham’s descendants (Gen. 15:19). Unless predictive prophecy is involved here, these Kenizzites must be a different family from that connected with Kenaz son of Eliphaz (#1 above). Caleb is said to be the son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite (Num. 32:12; Josh. 14:6, 14), but the exact meaning of the clan name here is not clear. On the one hand, the Kenizzites are described as an alien people (Gen. 15:19), and Caleb apparently is promised a portion of the land because of faithfulness rather than birthright (Josh. 14:6-14). On the other hand, the genealogy of 1 Chr. 2 (see vv. 9, 18) speaks of Caleb son of HEZRON (the latter being a grandson of JUDAH). Many scholars believe that Caleb belonged to the Edomite clan known as the Kenizzites (which along with other non-Israelite groups living in S Palestine was absorbed into the tribe of Judah) and that the Chronicles genealogy is an attempt to give the descendants of Caleb legal status in postexilic Judaism. It is possible that the apparent discrepancy may be accounted for by duplicate names. (See further H. L. Ginsberg and B. Maisler, “Semitized Hurrians in Syria and Palestine,” JPOS 14 [1934]: 243-67; N. Glueck, “Kenites and Kenizzites,” PEQ no vol. [1940]: 22-24; J. M. Miller and J. H. Hayes, A History of Ancient Israel and Judah [1986], 103.)

Kenezite ken’uh-zit. KJV alternate form of Kenizzite. See KENAZ.

Kenite ken’it (𐤊𐤍𐤕 H7808, gentilic of 𐤊𐤍𐤕 H7803, “metal worker”; see CAIN). Clan or tribal name of seminomadic peoples of S Palestine and Sinai. Its probable etymology suggests that the Kenites were METAL workers, especially since Sinai and the Wadi el-(Arabah were rich in high-grade COPPER ore. W. F. Albright (in CBQ 25 [1963]: 1-11) has pointed to the Beni Hasan mural in Egypt (19th cent. B.C.) as an illustration of such a wandering group of smiths. This mural depicts thirty-six men, women, and children in characteristic Semitic dress leading, along with other animals, donkeys laden with musical instruments, weapons, and an item that Albright has identified as a bellows. He has further noted that LAMECH'S three children (Gen. 4:19-22) were responsible for herds (JABAL), musical instruments (JUBAL), and metal work (TUBAL-CAIN, meaning possibly "Tubal the smith"), the three occupations which seem most evident in the mural.

I. General references. It is clear that references to the Kenites are not to a tightly knit group living in a narrowly defined area. The name rather applies to a number of loosely related groups possessing common skills or perhaps claiming a common ancestor. At times the term is used quite narrowly in the Bible and at other times more widely, but at no time must it be applied to all Kenites. The land of the Kenites is promised to ABRAHAM'S descendants (Gen. 15:19). This would be the territory of a certain Kenite clan, probably S of HEBRON. Similarly, it is a particular group of Kenites that is condemned in BAALAM'S oracle (Num. 24:21-22), while another group is praised for having been kind to the Hebrews in the wilderness (1 Sam. 15:6). The exact cause for Baalam's condemnation is not given, but in the context it appears that these Kenites had allied themselves with AMALEK against MOSES.

II. Relations with Moses. The exact identity of Moses' father-in-law is very complex. He seems to carry three personal names: JETHRO, REUEL, and HOBAB. In Exodus and Numbers he is called a Midianite (Exod. 2:16-21; 18:1; Num. 10:29), but in Jdg. 1:16 and 4:11 a Kenite. Albright has proposed the following solution: Jethro, a Kenite of the Reuel clan, was living in Midian (well-known for its rich copper lodes) when Moses first met him. Later, during the exodus, Moses' son-in-law (ḥātān H3163 rather than ḥōtān H3162) named Hobab, also of the Reuel clan, was asked to act as guide for the Israelites. Whether this reconstruction of the relationship of the names is correct or not, it does appear that Kenite was the actual tribal affiliation, while the name Midianite refers to location only. It may be that the skill of Moses and Aaron in smelting and casting (cf. the golden calf and the brazen serpent) was gained through Moses' association with the Kenites. It has been proposed that the essentials of Yahwism were learned from the Kenites. Julian Morgenstern (in HUCA 4 [1927]: 1-138) claimed that the earliest document of the Pentateuch was the K, or Kenite, document. Although many scholars have espoused such a position at one time or another, no evidence within Scripture or without can be adduced to show that the Kenites were Yahwists before Moses.

III. During the period of the judges. According to Jdg. 1:16, the descendants of Moses' Kenite father-in-law (Jethro in LXX Codex B) allied themselves with the Israelites and settled with them in the NEGEV near ARAD (S of HEBRON and E of

Region S of Hebron where the Kenites lived. (View to the NW.)

BEERSHEBA at the S edge of the Judean wilderness). The Hebrew text says that these Kenites “lived among the people [hā’ām],” but some scholars emend it to read “lived among the Amalekites [hā’Āmālēqî]” (cf. NRSV). This emendation was occasioned by the reading of some Greek MSS, but perhaps more by 1 Sam. 15:6, which states that SAUL, before attacking Amalek, told the Kenites to depart from Amalek lest they be destroyed as well. This may simply mean, however, that a nomadic group of Kenites was living among the Amalekites at that time rather than having been settled for many years.

The nomadic character of the Kenites is clearly seen in the detail that one family (not a whole tribe), that of HEBER, had migrated northward to GALILEE (Jdg. 4:11). The fact that the Canaanite general SISERA took refuge in Heber’s tent because JABIN and Heber’s clan were in good terms (4:17) shows that Kenites were expected to live among a people (in this case, the Hebrews) without having partisan loyalties. In this situation, unfortunately for Sisera, Heber’s wife JAEL did possess such loyalties (5:24-26). Since the PHILISTINES had a monopoly on iron workers (1 Sam. 13:19-20), the Kenites probably worked only with copper and bronze.

IV. The early monarchy. During this period a significant concentration of Kenites was located in the southern Judean territory. This is clear from 1 Sam. 15:6, cited above, and also from DAVID’S relations with them. While David was a Philistine vassal, he attacked the enemies of Judah in the S while telling his superiors that he was attacking Judah, the Jerahmeelites, and the Kenites (27:10). Not only was he not attacking Judah and her friends, he was sending them gifts from his spoils (30:29).

The fact that the villages of JEZREEL and CARMEL, from which came two of David’s wives (25:42-43), are listed in the same group with Kain (Josh. 15:55) has caused some scholars to say that David’s wives were Kenites. However, there is no certainty that all the villages in that group were inhabited by these clans. R. North (JBL 83 [1964]: 373-89) has attempted to link David with the Kenites in another way. He argues that the Kenites were the musicians of the day, and that it was because David was a Kenite that he introduced music into the temple worship. While the Kenites may well have been musicians (note that Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal are all based on the root ybl, “to lead in [festival] procession”), the relationship with David is most tenuous. Much of the argument rests on the fact that David sent gifts to his “kinsmen” (Heb. rāa' H8276), the elders of Judah, and, among many others, the Kenites (1 Sam. 30:26-31), but the usual translation “friends” (i.e., “brothers” in a common cause) is the most likely interpretation.

V. Postexilic references. In 1 Chr. 2:55 the families of scribes living at JABEZ are said to be Kenites. Apparently, during the kingdom and exile periods, certain Kenites had given up nomadic smithing and had taken on the more sedentary, but equally honorable, profession of SCRIBE. The same text indicates some connection between them and the house of RECAP; perhaps the Recabites were a clan within the Kenite lineage. (See further H. Schmökel, “Yahwe und die Keniter,” JBL 52 [1933]: 212-29; B. Halpern in ABD, 4:17-22.)

kenosis ki-noh'sis (κενώσις “emptying, depletion”). This term, which occurs first in the patristic literature, was used in Christian theology from very early times, usually as a synonym for the INCARNATION. It refers to a view that emphasizes Christ's humiliation or condescension. Support for the doctrine rests primarily on Phil. 2:6-8, with parallels having to do with his humiliation (2 Cor. 8:9) and exaltation (Jn. 17:5; see EXALTATION OF CHRIST). The cognate verb kenoō G3033 (with the reflexive pronoun) occurs in Phil. 2:7, which is often translated, “[Christ] emptied himself” (NIV, “made himself nothing”). Whereas the Philippian passage gives support to Christ's humiliation, the problem of interpretation is raised by those passages that clearly portray his divine powers, especially in the Gospel of John (cf. Jn. 1:14, 48; 5:19-24; 10:30; 11:41; 13:1-3).

The basic question, therefore, is how and to what extent Jesus' full humanity forced him to “empty” himself of the divine, and how and to what extent his divine powers remained. The theological issue is profoundly difficult, for it takes one into the nature of the TRINITY: when divine powers are allowed in the man Christ Jesus, what, if anything, has happened to the person of God himself? Problems of interpretation are further aggravated by the fact that the other uses of the verb (Rom. 4:14; 1 Cor. 1:17; 9:15; 2 Cor. 9:3) are uniformly figurative in their context and will not bear the weight of literal usage that the Kenoticists demand of the same word in Phil. 2:7.

Solutions to the problem have moved across the spectrum of five possible interpretations. (1) In the incarnation, Christ gave up all divine attributes and thus was deprived of all cosmic functions and divine consciousness (Gess, Beecher, et al.). (2) A distinction is made between essential and relative attributes in God, so that Christ in his incarnation gave up not his essential attributes but only his relative attributes (Thomasius, Delitzsch, et al.). (3) In his obedience to his Father, Christ gave up no divine powers but gave up their independent exercise. (4) His humanity was such that he did not exercise his divine powers at all (Martensen and Gore). (5) The divine nature united itself with his humanity only gradually, and his full deity was consummated finally at the resurrection; the incarnation was process rather than act (Dorner).

Exegetes vary in their point of emphasis. The best interpretation of Phil. 2:6-8 seems to center not on morphē theou, “the form of God,” but on einai isa theō, “being on an equality with God.” In other words, he did not give up his powers but gave up his position. He no longer acted as sovereign but as servant. J. B. Lightfoot states the position by noting that Christ divested himself not of the divine nature, which was impossible, but “of the glories, the prerogatives, of Deity. This He did by taking upon Him the form of a servant” (St. Paul’s Epistle to the Philippians [1869], 112). Modern interpreters tend to evade the theological and even the exegetical questions in terms of the general thrust of the passage, which simply states in vivid language Christ’s willingness to leave his glory for the cross. He suppressed himself so utterly that only the vision of his rights in glory as against the shame of the cross can give mankind the “mind of Christ.”

Kephar Ammoni kee’fuhr-am’oh-ni (כפר העמון H4112, “village of the Ammonites”). KJV Chepharhaammonai; NRSV Chephar-ammoni. A town allotted to the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:24). The name suggests that it was inhabited by (or perhaps captured from) Ammonites (see AMMON). The site is unknown, but like some of the other towns in the list (e.g., BETHEL, OPHRAH), it may have been N of Benjamin’s boundary, within the territory of EPHRAIM.

F.W. BUSH

Kephirah ki-fi’ruh (כפירא H4098, “[open] village”). Also Chephirah. A city of the Gibeonites (see GIBEON) included in the treaty they obtained from Israel by stealth (Josh. 9:17). They were apparently HIVITES (9:7). The town was later included in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN (18:26). Inhabitants of Kephirah were among those who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:25; Neh. 7:29; 1 Esd. 5:19 [KJV, “Caphira,” with the additional clause, “they of Pira, seven hundred,” for which there is very weak textual support]). The site is modern Khirbet el-Kefireh, about 8.5 mi. WNW of JERUSALEM (on the road to Jaffa), 5 mi. WSW of Gibeon (el-Jib), and less than 2 mi. N of KIRIATH JEARIM.

F.W.BUSH

Kerak kuhr’ahk (Arab. name derived from Aram. כרד “fortified place”). (1) The modern name of a Transjordanian site probably to be identified with the Moabite city of KIR HARESET.

(2) Khirbet Kerak (not mentioned in the Bible) is a large and important archaeological site on the SW shore of the Sea of Galilee, just N of the present mouth of the Jordan River. It was strategically located at the crossroads of two important caravan routes. The site covers over 54 acres, and is 1,200 by 350 meters in size. Excavations from 1941 to c. 1955 were carried out by B. Mazar, M. Stekelis, M. Avi-Yonah, P. Guy, and Mr. Bar-Adon (see IEJ 2 [1952]: 165-73, 218-29). Occupations during Late Chalcolithic through Middle Bronze II periods were reported, with a gap until Hellenistic times. The TALMUD identifies the site with Beth Yerah (“House of the Moon”), which L. Sukenik showed identical with Philoteria, named in honor of PTOLEMY Philadelphus's sister (JPOS 2 [1922]: 101-8).

The famous Khirbet Kerak pottery ware was first identified at this site, although it evidently originated in northern Anatolia and the Caucasus region. Its sudden appearance speaks of conquest from that direction. Khirbet Kerak was one of the region's major cities in its early history, but there was also an occupational gap between the end of the Early Bronze and beginning of the Middle Bronze Ages. Fortifications included Early Bronze walls of 30 ft. in thickness (fully demonstrating the city-state in urban structure), and strong Hellenistic structures. (See G. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, 25th ed. [1932], 451-55; Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 134-35.)

M. H. HEICKSEN

Keran kee'ruhn (כֶּרָן H4154). Also Cheran. Son of DISHON and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chr. 1:41).

kerchief. This term is used by the KJV to render Hebrew mispāḥā H5029 (only Ezek. 13:18, 21). It is found in a passage dealing with DIVINATION, which required the head to be covered. It is not known what kerchiefs looked like or how they were used, but apparently they were veils varying in length with the height of the wearer and were worn by those who consulted the seers.

S. BARABAS

Keren-Happuch ker'uhn-hap'uhk (כֶּרֶן הַפִּיחַ H7968, "horn of ANTIMONY," i.e., "container of [black] eye-paint"). The youngest of JOB's daughters, born to him after his restoration from affliction (Job 42:14). The name alludes to her beauty (cf. v. 15).

Kerethite ker'uh-thit (כֶּרֶתִי H4165, possibly "Cretan"). Also Cherethite (in Ezek. 25:16, KJV has the superfluous pl., "Cherethims"). The Kerethites were a people group that apparently came from the AEGEAN area; DAVID chose his personal guard from the Kerethites and the PELETHITES (1 Sam. 30:14; 2 Sam. 8:18; 15:18; 20:7, 23 [Qere, CARITES]; 1 Ki. 1:38, 44; 1 Chr. 18:17; Ezek. 25:16; Zeph. 2:5 [cf. also v. 6 NIV]).

Although some ancient versions (Targum, Syriac) and modern commentators (KD, 1—2 Samuel, 367) have understood the words as common nouns ("executioners" and "runners"), the ending is denominative and frequently employed in proper names as a gentilic. It is virtually certain that the words refer to people groups. The Kerethites are generally said to have been Cretans on the basis of the similarity of the two names (the name CRETE for the Mediterranean island is already attested in Homeric times) and the connection between the Kerethites and the PHILISTINES (Aegeans who invaded Palestine). On the other hand, J. Prignaud (in RB 71 [1964]: 215-29) points out that the Kerethites are never directly associated with Crete; he believes that they may have had another origin and were subsequently assimilated by the Philistines. (See further M. Delcor in VT 28 [1978]: 409-22.) As for the Pelethites, they are generally held to be Philistines.

Whatever their identification, the Kerethites and Pelethites appear in the Bible as parts of David's army. They seem to have been especially active in times of crisis for David, remaining loyal to him in all three revolts against the king. They went with him when he had to flee from ABSALOM (2 Sam. 15:18); they pursued SHEBA after his rebellion (20:7); when ADONIJAH tried to succeed David as king, it was the Kerethites and Pelethites who formed the bodyguard for Solomon's anointing (1 Ki. 1:38). Their leader was BENAIAH son of Jehoiada (2 Sam. 8:18), who is also called the leader of David's bodyguard (23:23). It is probable that the Kerethites and Pelethites were this bodyguard.

D. HUTTAR

Kerioth ker'ee-oth (קְרִיּוֹת H7954, pl. of קְרִיָּה H7953, "town, city"). (1) A city in MOAB declared to be under God's judgment (Jer. 48:24, 41 [NRSV, "towns"]; Amos 2:2). Kerioth is probably to be identified with el-Qereiyat, about 8 mi. E of the DEAD SEA and 7 mi. NW of DIBON.

(2) According to the KJV, a city in the extreme S of the territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:25). See KERIOTH HEZRON.

J. B. SCOTT

Kerioth Hezron ker'ee-oth-hez'ruhn (קְרִיּוֹת הֶזְרוֹן H7955, "towns of HEZRON"). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDOM; it was also known as HAZOR, a common name (Josh. 15:25; KJV, "Kerioth and Hezron"). Its location is uncertain, but it has been tentatively identified with modern Khirbet el-Qaryatein, about 13 mi. SSE of HEBRON and 4 mi. S of MAON.

Kerith kahr'ith (כְּרִית H4134, possibly "ditch" or "cutting"). Also Cherith. A brook or valley E of the JORDAN where ELIJAH fled after he had announced the coming drought to King AHAB of Israel (1 Ki. 17:3, 5; NIV, "Kerith Ravine"; NRSV, "Wadi Cherith"). The expression "before Jordan" (KJV) is not clear as to which side of that river was meant. Since Elijah's home was in GILEAD, the E side seems more likely, although there is a tradition that it is the Wadi Qelt near JERICHO on the W side. Any number of WADIS with their numerous caves could be the brook Kerith; one possibility is Wadi Yabis (Naḥal Yavesh) in Gilead, which empties into the Jordan about 22 mi. S of the Sea of Galilee.

R. L. ALDEN

Keros kahr'os (כְּרוֹס H7820, perhaps "crooked"). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:44; Neh. 7:47; 1 Esd. 5:29 [KJV, "Ceras"]).

Kerub kahr'uhb (כְּרוּב H4132). Also Cherub. One of five Babylonian places from which certain Jewish exiles returned who were unable to prove their Israelite ancestry (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). If Kerub here is a place name, its location is unknown. However, the parallel in the APOCRYPHA reads, "The following are those who came up from Tel-melah and Tel-harsha, under the leadership of Cherub [Gk. Charaath], Addan, and Immer" (1 Esd. 5:36 NRSV, following a generally accepted conjectural emendation), and some scholars argue that this reading is original.

kerygma ki-rig'muh (κηρυγμα G3060, "proclamation"). This term is used in biblical scholarship to refer to the apostolic PREACHING of the GOSPEL, especially its original proclamation (e.g., the sermons in the book of Acts). It is often contrasted with the didachē G1439, its "teaching" aspects. See DOCTRINE.

Kesalon kes'uh-luhn (כְּסָלוֹן H4076, possibly "[on the] flank, loin"; cf. KESIL and KESULLOTH). Also

Chesalon. A town on the N boundary of the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:10). Located between Mount SEIR and BETH SHEMESH, Kesalon is given in the text as another name for the “northern slope of Mount Jearim.” The modern site is a ruin known as Kesla, about 11 mi. W of JERUSALEM, at an elevation of more than 1,900 ft. Although the region as a whole is characterized by oak forests (JEARIM means “woods”), Kesla itself is a summit on bare rock.

Kesed kee’sid (כְּסֵד H4168, apparently related to כְּשָׁדִים H4169, “Chaldeans, Babylonians”). Also Chesed. Son of NAHOR by his wife MILCAH; nephew of ABRAHAM (Gen. 22:22). The passage as a whole seems to indicate the origins of various tribes, and possibly Kesed is presented as the ancestor of the Babylonians.

Kesil kee’sil (כְּסִיל H4069, “flank, side”; cf. KESALON and KESULLOTH). Also Chesil. A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDOM (Josh. 15:30). Much of this section of the city-list (beginning with Moladah) is presented elsewhere as an enclave of the tribe of SIMEON, but in those parallel passages the name Kesil seems to be replaced by Bethul (Josh. 19:4) and Bethuel (1 Chr. 4:30). For further discussion, see BETHUEL #2.

F. W. BUSH

Kesulloth ki-suhl’oth (כְּסוּלוֹת H4063, possibly “[on the] loins”; cf. KESALON and KESIL). Also Chesulloth. A town allotted to the tribe of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:18). It is probably the same as KISLOTH TABOR, a town mentioned in the description of the SE border of ZEBULUN (v. 12). It has been identified with Iksal, in the foothills about 2 mi. SE of NAZARETH and 3 mi. W of Mount TABOR (but see J. Simons, The Geographical and Topographical Texts of the Old Testament [1959], 330).

F. W. BUSH

Ketab kee’tab (כְּתָב). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (1 Esd. 5:30; KJV, “Cetab”). The name is omitted in the parallel lists (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:48).

Kethibh kuh-theev’. See KETIB.

Kethubim ki-thoo’vim. See KETUBIM.

Ketib kuh-teev’ (כְּתִיב, “written,” pass. ptc. of Aram. כָּתַב H10374, “to write”). Also Kethib, Ketiv. The written, consonantal form of the Masoretic text of the Hebrew Bible (see MASORAH). This term is used primarily in contrast to QERE, the latter indicating “what is to be read,” that is, an alternate form or a textual variant preferred by the Masoretes. See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (OT) VI.

kettle. This English term is used by various Bible versions to render Hebrew dûd H1857 (“pot, basket”) in one passage, referring to a deep cooking pot in which a sacrifice might be boiled (1 Sam. 2:14); in addition, the NRSV uses it once to translate sîr H6105 (Mic. 3:3; NIV, “pan”). In the NT, it occurs as the rendering of Greek chalkion G5908, “[copper] cauldron” (Mk. 7:4; KJV, “brassen vessel”).

Ketubim ki-too'bim (כְּתוּבִים, “written things,” from כָּתַב H4180, “to write”). Also Kethubim, Ketuvim. The “Writings” (also known as the HAGIOGRAPHIA, “Sacred Writings”), a term applied to the third division of the OT Hebrew canon, and consisting of the poetic books (Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations) as well as Ruth, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. See CANON (OT).

Keturah ki-tyoo'ruh (קֵטוּרָה H7778, “one covered in incense [i.e., perfumed]”). Wife of ABRAHAM (Gen. 25:1, 4; 1 Chr. 1:32-33; in the latter passage, she is referred to as a CONCUBINE). Keturah is mentioned by name only, and nothing is known of her background. Although her name appears in the Genesis record only after the death of SARAH, it is possible that she bore sons to Abraham while Sarah was still living. On the other hand, Abraham's apparent rejuvenation at the age of 100 by becoming the father of ISAAC may have been prolonged, so that after Sarah died and Abraham had reached the age of 137, he had sons born to him by Keturah. Scripture does not give enough data to determine these details.

To Keturah and Abraham were born six sons: ZIMRAN, JOKSHAN, MEDAN, MIDIAN, ISHBAK, and SHUAH (Gen. 25:1-4). Seven grandsons are also listed. Through these descendants a number of the N Arabian tribes trace their lineage back to Abraham and Keturah. Some Arabic writers mention an Arabian tribe near Mecca by the name of Keturah. BILDAD the Shuhite, one of the friends of JOB (Job 2:11), may have been a descendant of Shuah. Of the three tribes that were distinctly Arabian—Midian, SHEBA, and DEDAN—the Midianites are the best known. They located on the upper stretch of the RED SEA littoral and are mentioned in the biblical record as caravan merchants (Gen. 37), as related to MOSES by marriage (Exod. 2:16; 3:1; 18:1), and as invaders of Israel (Jdg. 6-8). (Cf. J. A. Montgomery, Arabia and the Bible [1934], 37-53; H. C. Leupold, Genesis [1942], 688-93; I. Keveh kee'vuh. See KUE.

key. An instrument, usually of wood but sometimes of metal, for moving the bolt of a lock. Keys often were large. In OT times the key (Heb. māptēah H5158) was worn on the shoulder as a symbol of AUTHORITY (Isa. 22:22). Normally in the Bible, and always in the NT (Gk. kleis G3090), the term is used in a figurative sense to refer to the means of entry into the realms of spiritual destiny, thus keys symbolize spiritual authority.

I. Keys in the ancient world. Many ancient peoples thought of the realms of spiritual destiny as entered by doors, and of the gods and angelic beings or the demons as having the keys to those realms. Among the holders of such keys were Shamash (Babylonia), Dike (Greece), Janus (Rome), Aion-Kronos (Mithraism), and Helios (Neo-Platonic period). The underworld, too, had key-keepers: Nedu (Babylonia), Pluto, Aiacos, Persephone and Selena-Hecate (Greece), Anubis (magic literature) and Isis (mystery religions). (Cf. J. Jeremias in TDNT, 3:744-45.)

II. Keys in the OT and Judaism. The only nonfigurative use of the term is in Jdg. 3:25, which mentions the key to the doors of King EGLON'S private quarters (cf. also 1 Chr. 9:27, where the Heb.

word may mean simply “opening”). In Isa. 22:22, the reference is to the investing of ELIAKIM son of Hilkiah with authority as comptroller of DAVID’S household: “I [Yahweh] will place on his shoulder the key to the house of David; what he opens no one can shut, and what he shuts no one can open.” Of this crucial verse, J. Bright (in Peake’s Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. Black and H. H. Rowley [1962], 505) comments most significantly for an understanding of NT usage: “The key, carried slung from the shoulder, was the symbol of the major-domo’s authority to admit or deny access to the king.” Consistent with Isaianic usage, later Jewish writings refer to the granting of authority with similar language. For example, the angel Michael is described as “the holder of the keys of the kingdom of heaven” (3 Bar. 11.2).

III. Keys in the NT. In Lk. 4:25 Jesus speaks of the time in the days of ELIJAH when the doors of heaven (the sky) did not open to let the rain come down; and Rev. 11:6 says the two witnesses “have power to shut up the sky so that it will not rain.” Although the term key is not used in these passages, this language may reflect the rabbinic notion that God “keeps the key of rain and that He gave it only temporarily to Elijah” (TDNT, 3:745).

References to spiritual authority include several in the book of Revelation. One of them is in Rev. 3:7 (a clear allusion to Isa. 22:22), where Christ says to the church in Philadelphia: “These are the words of him who is holy and true, who holds the key of David. What he opens no one can shut, and what he shuts no one can open.” In the next verse he adds, “See, I have placed before you an open door that no one can shut,” that is, he has provided access to God and to David’s city, the new Jerusalem, in the last age.

At the beginning of the book, the one “like a son of man” asserts, “I am the Living One; I was dead, and behold I am alive for ever and ever! And I hold the keys of death and Hades” (Rev. 1:18; cf. the saying attributed to Rabbi AKIBA to the effect that God will give Michael and Gabriel the keys to open the 40,000 gates of GEHENNA [TDNT, 3:746 n. 26]). W. Bousset (Kyrios Christos [1970], 65) suggests that to get these keys from the ruler of the underworld God must have won them in a victorious battle; O. Cullmann (Peter: Disciple, Apostle, Martyr, 2nd ed. [1962], 209) adds that God intends to open the doors of Death’s domain for those imprisoned inside.

Finally, Rev. 9:1 and 20:1 refer to “the key to [the shaft of] the Abyss” (NRSV, “bottomless pit”; see ABYSS). Jeremias (TDNT, 3:746) sees this as a well-like shaft where evil spirits are imprisoned. It is to be opened in the end-time so that demonic locusts can blight the earth, and once again at the beginning of the MILLENNIUM SO that SATAN can be incarcerated in it. Jeremias also argues that this abyss must be distinguished from death’s domain. Death, hell, and the “bottomless pit” all reflect a view of the grave as a prison in which human beings are bound and held captive.

Moving to the teaching of Jesus, we note first Lk. 11:52, where he criticizes the Jewish experts in the law for taking away “the key of knowledge.” Scholars have debated the meaning of this passage.

On the lips of Jesus (Sitz im Leben Jesu), Jeremias suggests, the phrase tēs gnōseōs (“of knowledge”) was probably a genitive of apposition: “You have taken away the key to God’s kingdom, namely knowledge of him.” But in its present Lukan context it would be more natural as an objective genitive: “You have taken away the key to knowledge” (cf. NIV), that is, the knowledge of God contained in the OT Scriptures, which the scribes were supposed to unlock for God’s people (TDNT, 3:747-48). Jesus expresses a similar idea (though not using the term key) in Matt. 23:13, “You shut [kleiō G3091] the kingdom of heaven in men’s faces.” In the light of Bright’s comment (above) and the Jewish tendency to use “heaven” as a substitute for “God,” the Jewish leaders are accused of preventing the access of men to God’s royal presence.

The best-known reference, however, is Matt. 16:19, where Jesus tells PETER, “I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven.” The plural here may reflect a Jewish belief that God held four keys in his hand—to rain, conception, resuscitation of the dead, and crops. This passage (including vv. 17-19) assumed in the course of church history a significance far out of proportion to the role it plays in the Gospel of Matthew. Particularly as the doctrine of penance was elaborated in the Western church and at the time of the Protestant Reformation, it became a crux interpretum. Within the Roman Catholic tradition, the doctrine of the “privilege of Peter” developed into a doctrine of church unity centering in the bishop of Rome, the “pope.” Peter is said to have delegated to those bishops and priests in communion with him the power to forgive sins through a system of penance and absolution.

Protestants traditionally have emphasized Peter’s FAITH as the foundation “rock” of the CHURCH, and have rejected the idea that Peter’s privilege was transmitted to Peter’s successors. Although the keys are not specifically mentioned in Matt. 18:18, most contemporary biblical exegetes view the BINDING AND LOSING mentioned there as corresponding to the giving of the keys to Peter. They therefore agree that the same authority given to Peter is given to the other apostles, and in fact to the whole Christian congregation (but for a different view, see TDNT, 3:752). Typical is the view of the Catholic biblical scholar T. Worden: “The actual power to forgive sins is not given directly to Peter and the apostles in Mt 16:19 and 18:18. These verses are better interpreted as referring to the full authority given to the Church in matters of doctrine and morals” (as summarized in New Testament Abstracts 2 [1958]: 262). There is a tendency to see the exercise of the keys in the threefold process of discipline by reprimand, public rebuke, and full excommunication (Matt. 18:15 – 17; Tit. 3:10). Agreement has not been reached on the extent of the correspondence between Peter’s authority to bind and loose and the current Catholic practice of penance.

Keziah ki-zi’uh (קִצְיָהּ H7905, “cassia”). KJV Kezia. The second daughter born to JOB after his fortunes were restored (Job 42:14). The name, possibly referring to the sweet smell of CINNAMON (see CASSIA), alludes to her charm (cf. v. 15).

Kezib kee’zib (קִיב H3945, “deceit”). Also Chezib. A town in the SHEPHELAH, near ADULLAM, where Shelah son of JUDAH was born (Gen. 38:5). Kezib is usually identified with ACZIB (#2) and COZEBA.

E. RUSSELL

Keziz. See EMEK KEZIZ.

khirbet kihr’bet. An Arabic term meaning “ruin” and often used in geographical names, such as Khirbet KERAK and Khirbet QUMRAN. The corresponding term in Hebrew is ḥorbat (construct of ḥorba H2999).

Kibroth Hattaavah kib’roth-huh-tay’uh-vuh (קִבְרוֹת תַּחְמוֹהַּ H7701, “graves of craving”). Also Kibroth-hattaavah. One of the stops of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. 11:34-35; 33:16-17). It was probably 10-20 mi. NE of Mount SINAI (the next stop was HAZEROTH), but the exact location is unknown. Here the people, craving the foods they had left behind in Egypt, complained about the MANNA (11:4-6). In response, God sent QUAIL into the camp in such numbers that the people became satiated. As they ate, God smote the people with a severe plague (11:33). Because large numbers of Israelites died and were buried there, the place was called Kibroth Hattaavah (“graves of desire”). Later, MOSES reminded the people that here they had provoked God to wrath (Deut. 9:22).

Kibzaim kib-zay’im (קִבְצַיִם H7698, possibly “[twin] heaps”). A Levitical city within the tribal territory of EPHRAIM, allotted to the clan of KOHATH (Josh. 21:22). See JOKMEAM.

kid. See GOAT.

kidnapping. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS I.B.6.

kidneys. Paired organs, approximately 4 x 2 x 1 inches in size, located in the loin directly in back of the abdominal cavity on either side of the vertebral spine. They are well protected from behind by the thick muscles of the back. Their function is primarily that of excretion of waste products from the blood. To accomplish this, blood flows through the capillaries of the glomerulus, of which there are approximately 1,000,000 in each kidney, each one being surrounded by a so-called Bowman's capsule. In the process, filtration from the blood which courses through these capillaries takes place. From each Bowman's capsule this filtrate fluid is carried off into a corresponding tubule from which the lining cells selectively reabsorb some of the substances the body needs to conserve, including water, and selectively excrete other substances of which the body needs to be relieved. The end product that is emptied out of these tubules is urine, which is collected into the funnel-shaped pelvis of the kidney, whence it passes down the ureter to the bladder for elimination from the body. Literal references to kidneys in the Bible occur primarily in descriptions of animal sacrifices (Exod. 29:13 et al.).

The ancients often attributed to the kidneys many of the functions that we now know are performed by the brain, including thinking and emotional reactions. When the kidneys become severely diseased, uremia (the accumulation of toxins in the blood) often precipitously puts in its appearance because of inadequate elimination. While symptoms of uremia are exceedingly variable, one of the most startling is sudden lapse into coma or unconsciousness. This state is not necessarily irreversible, and the return of consciousness was easily associated with the return of kidney function, as manifested by reappearance of urine excretion. Thus the ancients had some justification in attributing thinking and emotional reactions to the kidneys. This notion is possibly reflected in conventional language in the Bible, as when Hebrew kilyâ H4000, "kidney," is linked with lēb H4213, "heart"; for example, Ps. 7:9 says literally that God "tests kidneys [KJV, reins] and hearts" (NIV, "searches minds and hearts"; see also Ps. 26:2 and Rev. 2:23 [Gk. nephros G3752], and cf. Ps. 16:7).

P. E. ADOLPH

Kidon ki'duhn (כִּידוֹן H3961, "javelin" or "[short] sword"). Also Chidon. The owner of a threshing floor (or possibly the name of the place itself) where UZZAH died because he touched the ARK OF THE COVENANT while it was being transported toward JERUSALEM (1 Chr. 13:9). The place is called NACON in the parallel passage (2 Sam. 6:6 MT; LXX Nōdab), and P. K. McCarter (II Samuel, AB 9 [1984], 164) argues that both Kidon and Nacon (kydn, nkwn) are corruptions from an original Nodan (nwdn, which is the reading of 4QSam<sup>a</sup>). Because of God's judgment here, DAVID named the field PEREZ UZZAH ("outbreak [of wrath] against Uzzah").

The location of the threshing floor is unknown, but if the procession took a direct route from KIRIATH JEARIM, the site must have been W of Jerusalem. (Some suggest that David took the longer route through GIBEAH of Benjamin—thus announcing to SAUL'S clan who was in charge—and that the threshing floor was on higher ground N of Jerusalem. See ABD, 1:904, s.v. "Chidon.") According to M. Ben-Dov (Historical Atlas of Jerusalem [2002], 41-42, maps on pp. 31 and 43), both the threshing floor of Kidon (Nacon) and the one belonging to ARAUNAH were cultic sites outside the City of David, the former being on the western hill and the latter just N of the city walls. He further claims that David had intended to use the former as a permanent place for the ark but changed his mind because of what happened to Uzzah. Eventually David purchased Araunah's field, where the future home of the ark, Solomon's TEMPLE, would be built.

Kidron kid'ruhn (כִּדְרוֹן H7724, "turbid [stream]"; Κεδρὼν G3022). KJV NT Cedron. A valley E of JERUSALEM c. 3 mi. in length which lies between the walls of the city and the MOUNT OF OLIVES, and takes its name from the brook running through it. It is now known as the Wadi Sitti Maryam (“Valley of St. Mary”). Opposite St. Stephen’s gate its depth is at least 100 ft. The lower part of the valley is today called Wadi en-Nar. After leaving Jerusalem the brook bears to the SE, winds through the wilderness of Judah, and eventually drains into the DEAD SEA.

Jerusalem itself is located on the central limestone ridge of PALESTINE c. 2,500 ft. above sea level at a place where the ridge has become a small plateau. Extending S from this plateau are two promontories, separated by a valley called in Roman times the Tyropoeon Valley (now called El-Wad) but which today is largely filled with debris. The western side later became known as ZION and the eastern side was OPHEL (City of David). East of Ophel, separating it from the Mount of Olives, is the Kidron Valley, through which the intermittent GIHON SPRING courses. It was once the source of Jerusalem’s main water supply. It is now called (Ain Sitti Maryam (“Spring of St. Mary”). Water flows through it only during the season of heavy rains in the winter. To the S, where the Kidron and HINNOM Valleys meet, is a second spring, EN ROGEL.

Charles Warren (c. 1870) discovered a shaft cut through the rock from the city to the spring, similar to the one at GEZER, which enabled the inhabitants to secure water without going outside the city. The waters of the Gihon Spring were diverted through a tunnel to a cave that served as a reservoir. Going up from this point was a vertical shaft about 40 ft. high, at the top of which was a platform where the women could stand to lower and raise their water vessels. This water system was possibly in use when the Jebusites occupied Jerusalem through the period of the judges to the time of DAVID, though some archaeologists argue that “Warren’s Shaft” must have been constructed some time later (see JERUSALEM III.B). The water was subsequently diverted by a rock tunnel to the pool of SILOAM (prob. during the reign of HEZEKIAH).

Northern segment of the Kidron Valley with the Mount of Olives rising above it. (View to the SE.)

The Davidic kings owned property in the Kidron, and thus it came to be known as the KING’S VALLEY. As David fled from ABSALOM, he crossed over the Kidron (2 Sam. 15:23). SHIMEI was warned by SOLOMON that if he left Jerusalem and crossed beyond the limits of the Kidron, he would be put to death (1 Ki. 2:37).

The portion of the valley on the E side has been used as a common burial ground from ancient times even until today. Perhaps for this reason one finds that idols, altars, images, and the ASHERAH were taken from the temple and burned here as a part of the reform of various kings (Asa, 1 Ki. 15:16; Josiah, 2 Ki. 23:4-12; Hezekiah, 2 Chr. 29:16; 30:14). JOSEPHUS says ATHALIAH was taken to the Kidron for execution so that the temple would not be defiled by her blood (Ant. 9.7.3). There are four tower-like burial monuments in the Kidron Valley surrounded by a modern Jewish cemetery; tradition identifies them as the tombs of Jehoshaphat, Absalom, James the Less, and Zechariah, but they probably date from the Herodian period. Square letters (see ALPHABET IV) on stone inscriptions have been found at the so-called grave of Jacob in the Kidron Valley. The poorer people were interred outside the city in simple graves, one of these places being in the Kidron Valley (2 Ki. 23:6; cf. Jer. 26:23).

HEROD the Great restored the temple during his reign and greatly enlarged the surrounding area by erecting new foundation walls. At its outermost pinnacle (cf. Matt. 4:5) the temple enclosure was 170 ft. above the valley of the Kidron, prompting Josephus to comment, “One who looked down grew dizzy” (Ant. 15.11.5, LCL). GETHSEMANE was just across the brook Kidron, on the western slope of the Mount of Olives. From the western descent of the mount one has a view directly across the Kidron Valley to Jerusalem. Jesus crossed the valley with his disciples after leaving the upper room to spend the night in the Garden of Gethsemane (Jn. 18:1). JUDAS ISCARIOT undoubtedly led the soldiers across the Kidron to the place where Jesus was praying, for he “knew the place” well (18:2).

JEREMIAH looked forward from his time to the day when the city of Jerusalem would be rebuilt and the places of burial, including the fields as far as the Kidron Valley, would be sacred to God (Jer. 31:40). Kilan ki’luhn (כִּילָאֵן). Ancestor of a family that returned from exile with ZERUBBABEL (1 Esd. 5:15; KJV, “Ceilan”).

Kileab kil’ee-ab (כִּלְעָב H3976, derivation uncertain). Also Chileab. DAVID’S second son born at HEBRON, his first by ABIGAIL (2 Sam. 3:3). The SEPTUAGINT has Dalouia (a reading possibly reflected also in 4QSam<sup>a</sup>), and he is called Daniel in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 3:1). The last three Hebrew consonants of Kileab (lʾb) are the same as the first three of the following word, so the text of Samuel may be corrupt. Some believe Daniel may be original; others follow the SEPTUAGINT and emend the Hebrew to dlwyh, “Daluiah” (P. K. McCarter, Jr., II Samuel, AB 9 [1984], 101). Nothing more is known about this son of David; presumably he died young.

Kilion kil’ee-uhn (כִּלְיוֹן H4002, possibly “frailty” or “destruction”). Also Chilion. Son of ELIMELECH and NAOMI (Ruth 1:2, 5; 4:9). When the family moved to MOAB, Kilion married a woman named ORPAH, and his brother MAHLON married RUTH. Both Kilion and his brother died some years later while they were still in Moab.

Kilmad kil’mad (כִּלְמָד H4008, derivation unknown). One of several places that were trading partners with TYRE (Ezek. 27:23). Its location is unknown, and various locations have been proposed (cf. ABD, 1:908, s.v. “Chilmad”). Since it is mentioned after ASSHUR, Kilmad was probably in N MESOPOTAMIA. The TARGUM, however, understands the name as a reference to MEDIA, and on that basis some scholars read the Hebrew text as kol-māday, “all Media.”

kiln (oven). This term is used by the NRSV to render Hebrew kibšān H3901 in two passages (Exod. 9:8-10; 19:18; the only other occurrence of the Hebrew term is in Gen. 19:28). See FURNACE; OVEN.

Remains of a pottery kiln from Tarsus.

Kimham kim’ham (כִּמְחָם H4016 [כִּמְחָם] in 2 Sam. 19:40; in Heb., v. 41], possibly “pale face”). Also Chimham. Apparently a son of BARZILLAI the Gileadite (2 Sam. 19:37-38, 40; some MSS of the LXX, as well as the Syriac version, expressly identify Kimham as Barzillai’s son; cf. also Jos. Ant. 7.11.4). While DAVID was in exile at MAHANAIM, Barzillai had provided him with food. After ABSALOM’S rebellion had been quelled, David invited Barzillai to be his guest at Jerusalem. Barzillai declined but sent Kimham instead. Apparently David granted Kimham a royal pension (1 Ki. 2:7)—maybe even a piece of land near BETHLEHEM, as some have inferred from the comment that JOHANAN ben Kareah and his band, four centuries later, encamped at GERUTH KIMHAM, a name that means, “lodging place of Kimham” (Jer. 41:17).

R. C. RIDALL

Kinah ki’nuh (קִינָה H7807, possibly “lament” or else related to the gentilic KENITE [cf. 1 Sam. 27:10]). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDOM (Josh. 15:22). Its location is unknown, but because Wadi el-Qeni may preserve the name, some have identified Kinah with nearby Khirbet Ṭaiyib (c. 3 mi. NNE of ARAD [Tell (Arad)]) and others with Khirbet Ghazzeh (on a spur of the wadi, c. 4 mi. SE of Arad; cf. NEAEHL, 4:1495, s.v. “(Uza, Horvat”; but see RAMAH #4).

kindness. The state or quality of being kind: generosity, humaneness, tenderness. The word can also refer to a particular instance of kind behavior: a token of friendliness, good will, affection. This English term is used variously in Bible translations to render a number of words. In the OT, it occurs primarily as the rendering of Hebrew ḥesed H2876, which conveys various senses, such as “loyalty,” “mercy,” “grace,” and “love” (Gen. 19:19 and frequently). In the NT, it translates Greek philanthrōpia G5792, “love or concern for humanity, benevolence” (Acts 28:2; Tit. 3:4), chrēstotēs G5983, “goodness, uprightness, generosity” (Rom. 2:4; 11:22; et al.), and other expressions. (See NIDOTTE, 2:203-6, 211-18; NIDNTT, 2:105-7.)

Kindness is both an attribute of God (Tit. 3:4) and a characteristic of true LOVE (1 Cor. 13:4, where the verb chrēsteuomai G5980 is used). God’s kindness is great (Joel 2:13; Jon. 4:2) and everlasting (Isa. 54:8, 10). God is kind to the ignorant and wayward (Heb. 5:2), to the ungrateful and evil (Lk. 6:35). Believers are exhorted to possess this trait (Col. 3:12; 2 Pet. 1:7). It is sinful to refuse kindness to one’s neighbor, whereas those who are kind to the poor receive a blessing (Prov. 14:21, where the verb ḥānan H2858, “to be gracious,” is used). The ideal woman speaks kind words (31:26 NRSV).

God’s people should be kind to fellow-believers (Deut. 22:1; Zech. 7:9, 10; Rom. 15:5; Eph. 4:32; 1 Pet. 3:8; 4:8), neighbors (Rom. 15:2), foreigners (Lev. 19:34), widows (1 Tim. 5:9, 10), orphans (Zech. 7:10), the needy (Matt. 5:7; 1 Jn. 3:17-18), the weak (Acts 20:35; Rom. 15:1), the sorrowing (12:15), the weary (Gal. 6:2), the fallen (6:1), all men (6:10), even enemies (Lk. 6:34-35). At the final judgment, Christ will reward those who have been kind to his people (Matt. 25:34-36).

Biblical examples of kindness include the following: Pharaoh to Jacob (Gen. 45:16-20; 47:5-6), Pharaoh’s daughter to Moses (Exod. 2:6-10), Rahab to the spies (Josh. 2:1-3; 6:17-25), David to Mephibosheth (2 Sam. 9:1-13), Joab to Absalom (14:1-24), Ahab to Ben-Hadad (1 Ki. 20:32-34), Elisha to the Shunammite (2 Ki. 8:1), Evil-Merodach to Jehoiachin (25:27-30), Jehoshabeath to Joash (2 Chr. 22:11), Jews to less fortunate brethren (Neh. 5:8-19), Mordecai to Esther (Esth. 2:7), Nebuchadnezzar to Jeremiah (Jer. 39:11-12), Joseph to Mary (Matt. 1:19), a centurion to his servant (Lk. 7:2-6), Jews to Mary and Martha (Jn. 11:19, 33), John to Mary (19:27), Felix to Paul (Acts 24:23), Julius to Paul (27:3, 43), Onesiphorus to Paul (2 Tim. 1:16-18), and Paul to Onesimus (Phlm. 17-19). kine. KJV plural form of cow.

king, kingship. The Hebrew word for “king,” melek H4889, appears over 2,000 times in the OT. The SEPTUAGINT translates this term with the Greek equivalent, basileus G995, which occurs some fifty times in the NT.

I. Kingship and the gods. In the system of the ancient religious state, patriotism and religious piety were synonymous. To oust or overthrow the legitimate king was to commit treason against the state cult. Unless a new administration could gain the ritual approval of the hierarchy of the cult and the necessary legitimization of the city gods, it would be the victim of a counterrevolution that often degenerated into fratricidal feuds and harem intrigues.

Throughout the long centuries of Egypt's history, and sporadically in Mesopotamia, the gods were considered royalty and the rulers as divine. In Syria-Palestine and other border areas of the great river valley civilizations, the kings served as the high priests of the cult. Even in imperial Rome, the grandest of the Caesar's honorific titles was pontifex maximus. The approval of the town deities was of such importance that conquerors, with mock reverence, often listed the gods of captive regions in the place of geographic names. In fact it was the obeisance of the conqueror to these deities that could establish his right to the local authority even though the gods along with their towns had been captured. The supercilious prayers of these rulers contain their imprecations against their enemies and their implorations for victory addressed to a veritable menagerie of deities.

Undoubtedly this common kingly practice furthered the collection of elaborate pantheons containing deities of diverse origins. Such pantheons, like the king's courts they served, consisted of regular ordered hierarchies of superhuman beings; in effect they were divine prisoners of war. On the other hand, the PHARAOH of Egypt was the mundane and fleshly embodiment of the deity Horus, and every pharaoh possessed a long title or throne name including some mention of the deity. Just as an earthly monarch would have his circle and entourage of courtiers and servants, so the myths and epics picture the gods as bound to a feudal if not manorial scale of importance. In this divine state each is waited on by his heavenly vassals and company of retainers.

The epithets of many of the Mesopotamian deities are synonymous with those of human sovereigns. Some gods are characterized by a great feat of arms, while the names of others indicate their vocation in the supernal palaces. Some are addressed as "shepherds," others as "cup or throne bearers," others as "gardeners," "porters," and even "canal inspectors." From such myths and the popular folktales, many insights can be gained concerning the inner workings of an ancient oriental palace and its inhabitants.

The life of the kingly gods was viewed monistically as a rectilinear extension of endless time. The life unending sought by both Akkadian and Egyptian alike was a quantitative continuation of the life known on earth. In the Ugaritic Legend of Aqhat, the goddess Anath promises immortality to Aqhat and says, "Ask for life and I'll give it thee, / For deathlessness, and I'll bestow't on thee. / I'll make thee count years with Baal, / With the sons of El shalt thou count months" (A, vi; see ANET, 151b). It was probably this end to which the pharaoh built his PYRAMID, or to which the Lugal of Ur constructed the great "death pit."

However, although the people of Egypt may have considered the pharaoh divine, worshiping and reverencing him, his contemporaries who ruled the neighboring kingdoms certainly did not. They were addressed by their vassals in anything but reverential terms. As Egypt's Asiatic empire began to dissolve, the rulers of the petty states beyond its control treated the divine pharaoh with common contempt. Perhaps it was the aloofness of the pharaohs or the insularity of Egyptian culture and the enigma of their script, but the pharaonic institutions seem to have little influenced the development of the idea of kingship outside of Egypt and its vassals.

In some cultures of the ANE annual agricultural festivals were held that were intended to insure the continuation of the regime and the bounty of the harvest for the ensuing year. See AGRICULTURE. The best evidence for such celebrations comes from BABYLON, and it is possible that a similar ritual was enacted in UGARIT. Both traditions can be traced back to the old zag-mukku festivals of early SUMER.

This cuneiform tablet from the 2nd cent. B.C., discovered in Babylon, contains a Hellenistic king list.

Part of the action consisted of a symbolic humiliation and reenthronement of the king as well as the presentation of offerings and sacrifices. In Babylon this involved also a long procession of the idols, their priests and devotees up from the festive boats on the river and into the temple of MARDUK, the magnificent Esagila.

The layout and architecture of the city was arranged in accord with the needs of the cultic calendar. The high holiday was the rēsh shatti, New Year's Festival, and had as its center activity the akîtu(m) ceremony. In the ritual of the akîtu(m) the epic of ENUMA ELISH was chanted as an accompaniment to an elaborate ritual of sympathetic magic. A ritual combat with chaos was produced, followed by a sacred marriage ceremony, in which the parts of the god and his consort were taken by the king and a temple prostitute. However, there were great divergencies in the style, actions, and interpretation of the ritual drama over the centuries. The sum and substance of the festival in all ages was the recoronation of the king for another year. It is not clear whether the king actually was considered a deity during the rites or whether he only took the part of the god. He must have taken and answered to the divine titles during and after the ceremony, and so gained legitimacy to continue his reign.

Some scholars, such as the Scandinavians I. Engnell and S. Mowinckel, have attempted to interpret certain passages in the OT as evidence that an annual "Enthronement Festival of Yahweh" was held and that in time it became the motive for OT ESCHATOLOGY. This type of construction of the biblical data is highly speculative and many necessary components of it are simply undemonstrable from the text. At heart there is the fact that no Jewish monarch at any time ever received the titles or reverence which belonged to Yahweh. Nor did any Jewish ruler act as lawgiver or legislator. All, whether good or bad, were subject to the Mosaic law and claimed to be nothing more than men. There is the added difficulty that the divine pronouncements of the OT come neither through the king nor the priests but through a special non-ritualistic office, the prophet. It is this spokesman of Yahweh who introduces and explains the OT eschatology and draws the prefigurement of the MESSIAH. The Scandinavian hypothesis of the enthronement ritual character of much of the OT is based on assumptions concerning the composition of the text and speculations on its humanistic development, all of which are suspect.

II. Kingship in Israel. The historic establishment of kingship in Israel appears to be a contradiction of the principle that the nation was peculiarly under Yahweh's providence. The judge S AMUEL, acting in the prophetic office, clearly declared the extent of the liability that such an earthly monarch would prove to be. After listing the avaricious requirements of a royal establishment, Samuel adds, "When that day comes, you will cry out for relief from the king you have chosen, and the LORD will not answer you in that day" (1 Sam. 8:18). The kingship of Yahweh had been expressly stated in Moses' first discourse from Sinai: "Now if you obey me fully and keep my covenant, then out of all nations you will be my treasured possession. Although the whole earth is mine, you will be for me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation" (Exod. 19:5-6). It was this aspect of God's sovereignty over Israel that the nation rejected when they asked for a king. As God said to Samuel, "Listen to all that the people are saying to you; it is not you they have rejected, but they have rejected me as their king" (1 Sam. 8:7). This statement has in view the revealed precepts of God in regard to the Mosaic law and its authority, it does not denote the decrees of God's sovereign providence in and over history. For this reason even the perverse desire for kingship in Israel was constructed in terms of the law of God, although it manifested itself as a rejection of his law.

The period of the judges was one of conflict between the migrant and tribal people of Israel and the loose knit confederacy of Canaanite city-states. See JUDGES, PERIOD OF. During the time preceding the exodus from Egypt, the Israelites had confronted the monolithic façade of the Egyptian religious state. As Egypt lost its Asiatic provinces, the Philistines pushed southward and Israel settled the land. In time the small states and trading villages of Syria-Palestine coalesced into petty monarchies and ultimately into dynasties. The achievement of Saul, David, and Solomon was not a novelty nor did it take place in vacuo, but was paralleled by centralization of authority elsewhere at that time and in that area of the ANE. The problem of synthesizing the archaeological material from the period of the conquest of Canaan is difficult and tedious, but it is clear that the first king, SAUL, came to the newly established throne at about 1030-1020 B.C.

III. Kingship in the OT. Kings and kingship are first mentioned in the OT in the narrative of the battle fought by Abram (ABRAHAM) with a number of rulers (Gen. 14). Even the pharaohs of Egypt during the time of Israel's sojourn are called "kings." After the conquest, settlement, and solidification of the tribal organization of Israel in Canaan, the judges became the legal and executive authorities of the twelve tribes. Even though a number of judges were also prophets, the judgeship was not an anointed office (1 Sam. 15:10) and thus it served no direct messianic function in the Israelite theocracy.

Samuel acted as a prophet in selecting and anointing Saul as the first king of Israel (1 Sam. 11:15). It is basic to the OT concept of kingship to recognize the necessity of the prophetic office. The prophet as spokesman for Yahweh assented to the people's request for a king, determined who should be king, and then marked him as a person of messianic character by anointing him. Therefore no king could claim legitimacy without the prophetic approval and its divine investiture. The impossibility of the royal line being infiltrated by foreigners or compromised from outside the community of Israel was assured. The later history of the Hebrew monarchy demonstrates the frequency with which the prophets rejected the iniquitous infatuation of the kings with Gentile and pagan royalty. For this reason both Persia and Greece found it necessary to unseat the monarchy totally, and to replace it with an authority based on their own culture, whereas in other civilizations they conquered they were able to gain the legitimization of the ancient cult.

In most of the nations thriving in the 1st millennium B.C., the rulers were chosen from a large group of pretenders, either by the officials of the state cult or by some settlement among the aristocratic families. In Israel it was the choice and direction of Yahweh which determined the successor to the throne, though a process of drawing by lots may have been involved (1 Sam. 10:21). In this text the verb translated “was chosen” literally means “to draw by lot” (cf. NRSV, “was taken by lot”), and this accords with the suggestion of several other texts. The prophetic anointing of the king not only indicated the messianic character of the Hebrew ruler, but imparted to him divine authority demanding the obedience of the people (11:7).

The king, like the prophet and the priest, was sacrosanct but never sacerdotal (1 Sam. 24:6). Even the members of the royal house and potential future kings were accorded reverence, as in the case of the boy JOASH (2 Ki. 11:2-3). The families of former and subsequently rejected rulers were shown certain honor (cf. the benefits King DAVID bestowed upon MEPHIBOSHETH, the grandson of Saul, 2 Sam. 9:6-10). This respect reached even to the pagan relations of a slain ruler, as in the case of the murdered JEZEBEL, concerning whose body JEHU commanded, “Take care of that cursed woman...and bury her, for she was a king’s daughter” (2 Ki. 9:34). On the other hand, the divine approval of either king or royalty could be removed, and this decision too would be indicated to the king by the prophet (1 Sam. 16:14).

Unlike other monarchs of antiquity, the Jewish king was not an absolute autocrat. Like the humblest commoner, he was subject to the Mosaic legislation (Deut. 17:18-20). Kingship in Israel was not instituted by divine innovation, as were prophetism and the priesthood, so that from the beginning it was a reconstituted instrument, and its character and prerogatives were determined by nonrevelatory, nonbiblical and non-Jewish influences. Ideally the kingship and commonwealth of Israel were to have been a theocracy. For this reason the kingdom of God and the monarchy of Israel are neither parallel nor congruent at all points in the narrative of the OT. Often they were cojoined at the point that the redemptive sovereignty of God was worked through the historical events of the mundane monarchy of Israel. The Israelite kingship was in fact a paradigm or example of Yahweh’s government of all human history. And in the same fashion that the nation of Israel was chosen to be the vehicle of divine revelation and the commissioners of the oracles of God, so the kingly office in the monarchy was to be the messianic prefigurement.

The kingdom of God is seen in the OT as operating in two separate domains. The first is the sovereignty of Yahweh over creation by virtue of his creative acts (Pss. 93; 103:19). The second is God’s kingship by virtue of his redemption, the ransom of his covenant people. The messianic character of all three anointed offices—prophet, priest, and king—is directed toward the completion of this redemption and the fulfillment of the promise given to Abraham (Gen. 17:7-8). The three aspects of this blessing were the preservation of the children of Israel as Abraham's seed, the inheritance of the land of Canaan, and the appearance of the Messiah from the people and in the land. All these were bound up in the Israelite kingship. In a sense all were brought about and accomplished by means of the royal house of David and his heirs. The history of Israel cannot be understood apart from a realization that the monarchy was not only historical, but also supernatural. Although the kings did upon rare occasions prophesy (1 Sam. 10:10), they were forbidden to take the place of the priests in the ceremonies of the temple. The combination of the three sacrosanct offices in one historic personage was to await Messiah's coming.

Hebraic poetry as found in such books as Job and Psalms is so constructed that the rhythm and euphony is carried not by rhyme but by the duplication, replication, and contrast of ideas. Similar, complementary, and contrasting concepts are set in parallel pairs of phrases. These pairs of terms not only yield synonyms between parallel lines, but also indicate the subtle nuances of words. The word "king" and its extensions "kingship" and "dominion" appear frequently in OT poetic passages. By far the major number of citations, the term melek is in the initial half of the pair or the first line and may be considered the "A" term. The corresponding term in the second phrase, which may be called the "B" word, frequently adds depth of meaning to the structure of the whole. The following words are paired with king in parallel in OT poetry: chief (Job 29:25); nobles (34:18); rulers (Ps. 2:2); judges (2:10); mighty men (33:16); king's son (72:1); princes (Prov. 8:15); preeminent one (Ps. 105:20); anointed (18:50); David (144:10).

In the few number of citations when the order is reversed, there is some clear semantic indication of why it was done. In one set it indicates a rising gradation of social importance: princes/kings (Ps. 76:12), and in another the contrast is between the collective and one of its representative parts in a stylistic synecdoche: nations/kings (102:15; 135:10). Of primary importance is the point that whenever the divine kingdom or the godly reign is mentioned, the order is strictly such that the divine name appears as A, while "king," which is normally initial, serves as the B term (e.g., Yahweh/king, 47:2; God/king, 47:6). In all such syntactical relationships the name of Yahweh or his titles precedes all other parallels and ascriptions.

The view that these poetic passages were hymns for the rituals of the annual enthronement of Yahweh must deal with the basic semantics of such passages. It is necessary to relate the usage of such terms with the careful preservation of the transcendent quality of the divine name. The OT declares the present and eternal kingship of Yahweh unequivocally, and conforms to the A/B word sequence. The present and future temporal aspect of the divine kingship is stated definitively and uniquely in such biblical expressions as Ps. 10:16, which says literally, “Yahweh is King forever.” The overt transcendence of God is so strictly maintained that he is declared to be superior over even all deities (95:3). Such expressions suppose the real existence of hierarchies of deities; they are used in the text for literary projection only. In light of the usage quoted above, it is not accidental that Ps. 149:2 declares the joy of Israel before Yahweh as both creator and king in a precise and beautiful parallelism, “Let Israel rejoice in their Maker, / let the people of Zion be glad in their King.”

IV. The royal establishment in Israel and the OT. Since the character of Israelite kingship was defined largely by the customs of the nations round about Canaan, in the same manner the duties and privileges of the Jewish rulers followed the ancient traditions. The customary ANE monarch possessed a palace, was installed upon a throne, and had access to a harem of wives and concubines. In time all these aspects became a part of the Jewish monarchical establishment. Interestingly enough, even the terms for some of these fixtures were assumed with the practices. The ancient Sumerian term for “large house” or “palace,” e-gal (Akk. ēkallu; Ugaritic hkl), appears in the Hebrew Bible (apart from 1 Sam. 1:9) only after the founding of the monarchy. In its Hebrew form the word is hēkāl H2121, and it indicates the magnificence and luxury of the royal apartments (cf. Ps. 144:12).

Another term commonly used for “palace” is the Hebrew bîrâ H1072, as used in David’s declaration concerning the building of Solomon’s temple: “The task is great, because this palatial structure is not for man but for the LORD God” (1 Chr. 29:1). The word is never used of the abode of any Jewish king. It occurs mostly in the later books of the OT, especially Esther, Nehemiah, Ezra, and Daniel, and its frequent use with Persian geographical names has suggested a possible Indo-Iranian origin. However, it is more probable that it is to be connected with Akkadian birtu, meaning “citadel, castle.” The OT word for “throne” (kissē H4058) is also derived ultimately from the earliest monarchical foundation in the ANE. In the Sumerian orthography it is preceded by the determinative sign that designates an object made of wood. In later times the kussu was probably still made of wood, but overlaid with beaten gold and silver filigree.

Although the ultimate symbol among most of the ancients was the scepter, no such instrument is ever described or associated with a Jewish king. In an age when livery was considered of great importance, the royal garments of Israel are described as an outer robe or vestment befitting rank (1 Ki. 22:10, 30), and the usual cloak or under mantle (1 Sam. 24:4, 11) of the highest quality (1 Chr. 15:27; 2 Sam. 13:18). Two types of metallic ornaments are mentioned, the chaplets or fillets (2 Sam. 1:10) and the crown or diadem, which in Zechariah’s time was made of silver and gold, possibly electrum (Zech. 6:11).

The maintenance of more than one wife must have been a feature of the monarchy, and in the later times the oriental HAREM appeared in Israel. In time the custom of political marriage, whereby a king would certify a treaty by marriage into the allied nation’s royal family, became common in Israel. SOLOMON and his followers adhered to this tradition, and it was this contradiction of the divine commandment that led to the situation of AHAB and JEZEBEL, where a pagan princess, their daughter ATHALIAH, became queen.

The kings were accompanied by groups of retainers who acted as a bodyguard. Chief among these were the family detachments known as the Kerethites, Pelethites, and Gittites (2 Sam. 15:18). In the eighth chapter of 2 Samuel are listed the officers of David's court: JOAB the general of the army; JEHOSEPHAT the remembrancer, a sort of chief adviser; ZADOK and AHIMELECH the priests; SERAIAH the scribe; BENAIAH the chief of the bodyguard; and the princes of the palace who served as David's ministers. It is safe to assume that this list gives only the names of the king's cabinet and that there were armor-bearers (1 Sam. 16:21) and other military officials as well as a large group of cooks, wine stewards, butlers, tailors, and other such official craftsmen.

The relationship of the various classes one to another is not clear, and the evidence is further complicated by the recurrent changes of rulers and outside penetrations of the last one hundred years of the monarchy. An extrabiblical source yields some data on social classes among the W Semitic people. In the royal inscription of Azitawadda from Karatepe, there is a prohibition to all classes of mankind, and these are described as "a king among kings and a prince among princes or a man who is (just) a man" (ANET, 654a). This list follows the Mesopotamian system of kings, lords, and freemen. All the terms that appear in the Karatepe text also appear in the histories of the Israelite monarchy, so the social structure was undoubtedly similar.

Like other regents, the kings of Israel had the authority to levy taxes and collect tribute from their subjects (1 Ki. 4:6-21). Subject kingdoms and peoples under Israel's sovereignty paid their annual tribute in the same way as when Israel itself was a suzerain of ASSYRIA under HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 18:15-16). Wealth was counted in material stores of gems, garments, precious metals, and livestock (2 Chr. 32:27-29). Opulence and magnificence were determined by the number of servants and retainers a king could command and support, as well as the style of dress, food, and appointments in which he kept them (2 Chr. 31:16-19). Taxation was mostly in kind, and the royal flocks, herds, and vineyards were tended by work corvées made up of the citizenry. The international trade was also in terms of goods and produce, most of which came from the royal forests and mines (1 Ki. 5:10-11). However, because of the Mosaic law, which bound even the kings of Israel, the right of commandeering except for military necessity was forbidden. The royal establishment had to pay its debts. The case of Ahab is quite clear (21:1-16). The same was true of the women of the land, who were not to be taken by the king and placed at his whim in the royal harem. The story of David and BATHSHEBA (2 Sam. 11) bears out the king's responsibility to the moral commandments.

V. The later history of the Jewish kingdom. In the full perspective of the thousands of years of Jewish history, the monarchy actually involved a brief duration. Under the early rulers, Saul, David, and Solomon, the spirit of conquest was still lively enough to advance the kingdom territorially and materially to its greatest extent. Even this period of ascendancy above the neighboring petty states of the E Mediterranean coast lasted a scant century. After the division of the kingdom under REHOBOAM and JEROBOAM, the political power of the Jewish monarchy declined until in about 200 years' time Israel, the northern regency, had not the resources to forestall its destruction before Assyria (722 B.C.). Judah, the more stable principality, lingered on until 586 B.C., when Jerusalem fell to Babylon. Without ever being freed, the Jewish people passed under the domination of PERSIA and finally into the kingdom of SELEUCUS in the Age of Hellenism.

At last a respite came during the revolution of the Maccabees and the leadership of Judah MACCABEE and his brothers, 165-142 B.C. The dynasty of rulers they established ruled as the HASMONEANS until the last of their number was made a puppet of POMPEY. The Idumean chieftain Antipater was now actually ruling the country in the name of his Roman masters. His dynasty, the Herodian, brought about some of the blackest moments in the history of the Jewish people. The final collapse came after generations of alien puppet rule, when a series of abortive revolutions brought the invasion of TITUS and the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The last remnants of the free and sovereign dominion of David fled to the fortress of MASADA in the Dead Sea region, where they died after a long siege by the Tenth Legion under Flavius Silva in the year 73. The immediate results of this final and irremediable disaster was the dispersion of the Jewish people throughout the Mediterranean world. This process of dispossession, which had been started by the Assyrian empire, was now complete.

VI. Kingship in the DSS. Many of the Hebraic documents written by the Jews of the DIASPORA have apocalyptic subjects and indeed these points of view are found in both the APOCRYPHA and the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. In the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, the image of a restored kingship to Judaism is a recurrent theme. In the War Scroll (1QM) the deeds of the past hero kings of Israel are quite prominent, but there is little said about the restoration of the monarchy.

VII. The messianic kingship of Christ. In the light of the prophecies of the coming of the King-Messiah of the OT, it is clear what is meant by the ascription of this fulfillment to the life of Christ. The kingship of Christ over his spiritual people of Israel was initiated with his accomplishment of ATONEMENT. By the one great act of redemption, the death on the cross and the resurrection, the theocratic kingdom was forever established, and the centuries of OT prefigurement were fulfilled and completed. However, in the NT one further as yet unforeseen aspect is still maintained, the final culmination of history and the establishment of the kingdom of heaven, wherein Yahweh will be absolutely and ideally represented before his subjects by the messianic King Jesus Christ. See KINGDOM OF GOD.

I. The kingship of God in OT teaching. Although the idea of the kingdom of God finds its main expression in the teaching of Jesus, it is a theme found throughout the Bible, and the teaching of Jesus can be understood only against the background of earlier thought. In the OT the actual word kingdom is infrequent; the basic notion is of the active rule of Yahweh as King over the whole world. This concept is developed in three ways.

A. God as King of the universe. God is regarded as sitting upon a THRONE (Ps. 103:19a; Ezek. 1:26-28) where he is surrounded by the heavenly host who serve him (1 Ki. 22:19) and from where he watches over the whole earth (Ps. 33:13-14). In the praise offered to him by Israel he was regarded as the King of the whole world (1 Chr. 29:11; Ps. 103:19b) and of all the kingdoms of the earth (2 Ki. 19:15; Ps. 47:2, 7). He is the eternal King (Ps. 145:13; Dan. 4:3-4), both from everlasting (Pss. 74:12; 93:2) and to everlasting (Exod. 15:18). His right to be king rests upon the fact that he is the Creator of the heaven and the earth (Ps. 95:3-5). His kingly rule is displayed in his present jurisdiction over the nations of the world (cf. Ps. 22:28; Jer. 46:18; 48:15; 51:57) and in his appointment of their rulers (Dan. 2:37; 4:17; 5:21; et al.). He overcomes the forces of chaos and disorder symbolized by the mighty floods and the sea (Pss. 29:10; 93:1-4), and his reign is characterized not only by power and glory (145:11 – 12) but also by truth and righteousness (96:13; 99:4), so that it is right and just that he should be the Judge of the world (96:10). He is worthy of praise (97:1; 98:6) and of fear from all peoples (99:1-3; Isa. 6:5; Jer. 10:7-10; Mal. 1:14).

B. God as King of Israel. Although the whole world is the sphere of God's rule, he is preeminently the King of Israel, the people whom he had created and chosen to be his special possession. Although his throne was regarded as being in HEAVEN, there was also a sense in which it could be said to be above the cherubim in the TEMPLE (2 Ki. 19:15; Isa. 6:1), and he was described as ruling from Mount ZION or JERUSALEM (Pss. 48:2; 99:1-2; Jer. 8:19). A number of the psalms have been the subject of much discussion in recent years as to whether they imply that the kingship of God was celebrated annually in the temple at the new year festival (Pss. 47; 93; 96; 97; 99; cf. 68:24). Whatever be the truth in this theory, the kingship of God was certainly associated especially with his rule over Israel as his people. He was the true King of Israel (Deut. 33:5; 1 Sam. 12:12; cf. Jdg. 8:23), and Israel was the kingdom of Yahweh (1 Chr. 17:14; 28:5; 2 Chr. 13:8; cf. Exod. 19:6). He had created Israel (Isa. 41:20; 43:15) and brought the people out of Egypt to serve him (Ps. 74:12). He had given them their land and had overcome its inhabitants (Ps. 10:16; 44:4; 47:3-4).

When the people wished that they might have an earthly king like the other nations, they were in a sense rejecting the direct rule of Yahweh over them; nevertheless, he responded to their request by himself appointing their kings, SAUL (1 Sam. 15:11, 35), DAVID (1 Sam. 16:1), and SOLOMON (1 Ki. 3:7; 2 Chr. 1:8-11; Neh. 13:26), who were to rule not for themselves and their own ends but on behalf of God (2 Chr. 9:8). The human king occupied a most important place as the representative of God to the people, and of the people to God. He was the object of God's special concern, and stood to him in the relationship of a son to his father (2 Sam. 7:14). He could address Yahweh as "My God and king,” but the use of this phrase in the psalms should not be regarded as restricted to the lips of the king; it expressed the close relationship which any pious Israelite could have with God (Pss. 5:2; 44:4; 68:24; 74:12; 84:3; 145:1).

C. The future reign of God. In the OT God is thought of as exercising his kingly rule from everlasting to everlasting. Alongside this belief in his eternal kingship, there is also the hope that he would exercise his kingly power in a special way as the king of Israel. Conscious of the fact that this present world and their own situation in it fell far short of God’s purpose as a result of sin and evil, the prophets of Israel looked forward to a time in the future when God would give his people salvation. He would manifest his kingly power in saving his people from their enemies (Isa. 34:12; 44:6; Zeph. 3:15) and in bringing back those who were exiles held in foreign captivity to their own land (Isa. 52:7; Ezek. 20:33-38; Mic. 2:12-13). Then he would reign in Zion, setting up an everlasting kingdom and ruling over the nations of the world who would pay him their homage (Isa. 24:23; Obad. 21; Mic. 4:6-7; Zech. 14:9-17). In this way the promise of his eternal rule would be fulfilled (Ps. 146:10; Dan. 2:44; 7:27).

As “the saints of the Most High,” the people of Israel looked forward to the privilege of rule in this kingdom (Dan. 7:18, 27). They frequently associated their hopes with the reign of an anointed king belonging to the line of David (Isa. 9:6-7; 11:1-5; Jer. 23:5-6; Ezek. 34:23-24; 37:23-24; Zech. 9:9 – 10). This coming king is customarily called the MESSIAH (i.e., the anointed one), although this title for such a future king is not used in the OT itself (but see Dan. 9:25 – 26). The hope of his coming grew up especially during the later period of Israel’s history; disillusioned by their human kings and crushed by the tribulations of the EXILE, the people began to look forward to Yahweh, or his agent, the Davidic king, acting in power to establish a new era of peace and righteousness, and the prophets declared that their hopes would not be disappointed.

II. The kingship of God in Jewish thought. During the period between the composition of the bulk of the OT and the coming of Jesus, Jewish thought about the character of God’s rule did not stand still, and it continued to develop for a long period afterward. One may trace its growth in the APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, some of it produced prior to NT times, and in the rabbinic writings, which are of a much later date but contain the teaching ascribed to rabbis of the same period (see MISHNAH). Many different influences affected Jewish thought at this time, and there were several different schools of thought, often with highly individual points of view, so that it is impossible to present a system of beliefs generally held by all Jews or even to give a fully coherent account of the various shades of opinion that were held and of their historical development. The sources available are scanty and often imperfectly preserved; they present such problems of dating and interpretation that scholars are by no means unanimous in the conclusions they draw from the evidence.

A. The eternal sovereignty of God. As in the OT, the concept of the eternal kingship of God over the world, established at creation, forms the background of Jewish theology. It is found in the apocalyptic writings (e.g., 1 En. 9.4; 84.2-3; Pss. Sol. 2.33-36; 17.4; 1QSb [1Q28b] IV, 25-26), but is especially prominent in the rabbinic literature (Str-B, 1:172-78). God’s kingly power was regarded as being exercised primarily over Israel, the nation that recognized him as its king in contrast to the pagan peoples of the world (Pss. Sol. 5.21-22; 17.51). Consequently it was the duty of individual Jews to accept God’s rule over them, as ABRAHAM had done (Jub. 12.19). The phrase frequently used for this act is “to take upon oneself the yoke of God’s rule.” For all practical purposes this meant acceptance of his will as revealed in detail in the law of Moses or TORAH. Since this law was expressed succinctly in the Shema (Deut. 4:4-5), it could be said that to recite the Shema was to take the yoke upon oneself. The saying of Jesus, “Take my yoke upon you” (Matt. 11:28-30), bears such a close relationship to this manner of speaking that he must have been echoing Jewish teaching.

B. The establishment of God’s future reign. The center of Jewish theological interest, however, lay not so much in the idea that God was now king as in the expectation of his future activity, in setting up his rule visibly and powerfully among men. Within the Gospels there is ample proof of the mood of expectancy that filled the people quite apart from any stimulus to their enthusiasm supplied by Jesus himself. The raison d’être of the apocalyptic writings was their claim to supply information on precisely this topic by reinterpreting the OT prophecies and assuring the people that they were about to be fulfilled (e.g., Pss. Sol. 17-18; Ass. Mos. 10; Sib. Or. 3.46-50, 767-71). The QUMRAN community is the most notable example of a group of Jews who based their behavior on the hope that God would soon come in kingly power to lead them to victory over their oppressors (1QM [1Q33] VI,

The War Scroll from Qumran Cave 1. The Essenes taught that at the end of days the Children of Light would defeat the Children of Darkness and the kingdom of God would be established.

6; XII, 7; the interpretation of 1QSb III, 5 is uncertain). A number of Jewish prayers, dating in whole or in part from the NT period, contain the same hope. The Qaddish prayer is the best known: “May he set up his sovereignty in your lifetime, and in your days, and in the lifetime of the whole house of Israel, speedily and in a time that is near.”

The form and content of this hope are greatly varied. In the earlier apocalyptic writings, the expectation was of an earthly rule of God, centered on Jerusalem with a rebuilt temple, and involving the defeat and destruction of Israel’s enemies and judgment upon the ungodly. The righteous dead would be raised up to share in the bliss of the new age, and the people would live in peace and righteousness. They would be under the rule and protection of God. Sometimes he is thought of as himself ruling directly over the people (1 En. 6 – 36; 81 – 104; Ass. Mos. 10; Jub. passim), at other times the Messiah is his agent (1 En. 90; T. 12 Patr. passim; Sib. Or. 3.652-784; Pss. Sol. 17-18; 4 Ezra 7.28-29; 2 Bar. 39; Tg. Onk. on Gen. 49:10-11). Modern writers tend to call this era the messianic kingdom, whether or not the ancient writers explicitly refer to the Messiah. In some sources, however, the idea of the kingdom took on a more heavenly and transcendent character; there would be a renewal of the creation and the establishment of communication between heaven and earth (Ass. Mos. 10; 1 En. 104). In 1 En. 37-71 the SON OF MAN, a heavenly figure, takes over the place and functions of the earthly, Davidic Messiah.

The practice arose of referring to the messianic era as “the age to come” in contrast with the preceding “present age.” Probably many Jews were unconscious of any incompatibility between a this-worldly, strongly nationalistic hope of the messianic kingdom and the more transcendent, cosmic hopes that were beginning to arise, although some thinkers began to separate the two concepts. The messianic age was regarded as a temporary, earthly prelude to the heavenly kingdom of God, from which it was separated by the RESURRECTION of the dead and the final judgment. The term “the age to come” was reserved for this eternal, heavenly kingdom of God. That this development goes back to the 1st cent. A.D. is shown by its occurrence in 4 Ezra 7:27ff. and 2 Bar. 40, possibly also in 1 En. 104. (The date of 2 Enoch is too uncertain for its evidence to be used with any confidence.) As far as the rabbinic material is concerned, most of it is of later date, but there is evidence that during the 1st cent. A.D. the rabbis accepted a scheme similar to that in 4 Ezra with a temporary messianic kingdom preceding the final, eternal state of heavenly bliss (the age to come). Later developments of rabbinic terminology and thought may here be ignored. (For the interpretation given above see esp. Str-B, 1:178-80; 4/2:799-976.)

C. Kingdom of God and kingdom of heaven. In the Aramaic TARGUMS (translations of the OT text that are often paraphrastic), the phrase “the kingdom of God” was used to translate OT expressions about God reigning. The way in which the phrase is used shows clearly that it expresses God’s activity in ruling rather than the area or realm over which he rules, although of course the latter meaning is not excluded. In the rabbinic literature outside the Targums, the phrase used was “the kingdom of heaven.” The two phrases are undoubtedly synonymous. The adoption of the latter was due to that same Jewish reverence for the name of God and consequent avoidance of uttering it which led to the substitution of “Lord” (Adonai) for the name “Yahweh” at the same time (see GOD, NAMES OF).

It is difficult to be certain which form of the phrase Jesus used. Mark, Luke, and John use “the kingdom of God” in every case, but Matthew has the form “the kingdom of heaven” thirty-two times and “the kingdom of God” only four times (Matt. 12:28; 19:24; 21:31, 43). Either Matthew has corrected the phrase used by Jesus in accordance with Jewish use, or the other Gospels have substituted the phrase that would be more intelligible to Gentiles. In any case, there is no difference in meaning between the two phrases; the distinctions drawn between them in The Scofield Reference Bible (note on Matt. 6:33) are unfounded.

The phrase “the age to come” (1 En. 71:15; Abot 2:7; 4 Ezra and 2 Baruch passim) is rare in the Gospels (Matt. 12:32; Mk. 10:30; Lk. 18:30; 20:35). Whereas the rabbis used the phrase “the kingdom of heaven” only sparingly to refer to the new era and preferred to describe the awaited blessings of God’s rule by the phrase “the age to come,” Jesus preferred to use the term “the kingdom of God” to express the content of his message about God’s future promise of salvation for his people.

III. The kingship of God in the teaching of Jesus. (In what follows, questions regarding the authenticity of sayings attributed to Jesus in the Gospels have not been discussed because an adequate treatment would have seriously exceeded the limits of the article. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM; JESUS CHRIST VI.)

A. The centrality of the theme. The Greek word for “kingdom” (basileia G993) is found fifty-five times in Matthew, twenty times in Mark, forty-six times in Luke, and five times in John. When allowance is made for the use of the word to refer to secular kingdoms and for parallel versions of the same sayings of Jesus, the phrase “the kingdom of God” and equivalent expressions (e.g., “the kingdom of heaven,” “his kingdom”) occurs about eighty times. The word “king” is used also of Jesus with considerable frequency but only rarely with reference to God (Matt. 5:35; cf. 18:23; 22:2). The verb “to rule” is rare (Lk. 1:33; cf. 19:14, 27).

These statistics show the great importance of the concept in the teaching of Jesus. According to Matthew, JOHN THE BAPTIST also spoke of the kingdom of heaven in words that anticipated those of Jesus (Matt. 3:2). Mark’s introductory summary of Jesus’ message makes it plain that the kingdom of God was his central theme (Mk. 1:15; cf. Matt. 4:17). Jesus stated that his task was to preach the gospel of the kingdom (Lk. 4:43), and the evangelists echo his words (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; Lk. 8:1; 9:11; cf. 16:16; Acts 1:3). He appointed his disciples to proclaim the same message (Matt. 10:7; 24:14; Lk. 9:2; 10:9). There can be little doubt, therefore, that the phrase “the kingdom of God” expresses the main theme of his teaching.

B. The nature of God’s kingship

1. Its imminence. In making the kingdom or kingship of God the theme of his preaching, Jesus did not have to arouse interest in his message or to explain to the people what he meant. Although their ideas were often misguided, especially as a result of their narrowly nationalistic hopes, the people had some idea of what the kingship of God meant (Matt. 18:1; 20:21; Mk. 11:10; 15:43; Lk. 14:15; 17:20; 19:11; 23:42, 51; cf. Acts 1:6). At first sight, therefore, the new element in the teaching of Jesus was concerned not with the character of the kingdom but with the time of its coming. The time was fully accomplished and the kingdom of God was at hand (Mk. 1:15). What God had planned from the beginning (Matt. 25:34) and what his people had hoped for down the centuries was near.

This way of putting the matter indicates that by “the kingdom of God” Jesus meant the kingly action of God at the end of the age rather than the present, eternal rule of God in heaven, for it would be strange to say that the latter was at hand. Certainly Jesus did speak of the eternal kingship of God (Matt. 25:34-35), for it is upon the fact of his present rule that the hope of his future action depends.

What did Jesus mean by saying, “the kingdom of God has come near” (Mk. 1:15, Gk. ēngiken, from engizō G1581)? Was he indicating that at the time when he spoke the kingly action of God was about to take place or that it was already taking place? On purely linguistic grounds a decision is difficult, though the balance of probability favors the former interpretation. The problem must be solved by considering the whole teaching of Jesus.

At the beginning of the present century, such scholars as J. Weiss and A. Schweitzer advocated an interpretation now known as “thoroughgoing eschatology” (konsequente Eschatologie). In their view, Jesus preached that the kingdom of God was very near, and that by this phrase he meant exclusively the final, visible act of God in setting up his kingdom. Jesus expected the end of the age almost immediately; the inauguration of the new age would take place through a glorious cataclysmic event. Support for this view can be found in texts that speak of this transcendent era and its coming (Matt. 6:10 = Lk. 11:2; Matt. 8:11 = Lk. 13:29; Matt. 16:28 = Mk. 9:1 = Lk. 9:27; Matt. 22:1-14 = Lk. 14:16-24; Matt. 26:29 = Mk. 14:25 = Lk. 22:16, 18 [cf. 21:31]) or of the imminent coming of the SON OF MAN (Mk. 13:26-30; 14:62) and of future entry to the kingdom (Matt. 5:20; 7:21; 8:11-12 = Lk. 13:28-29; Matt. 18:3 = Mk. 10:15 = Lk. 18:17; Matt. 25:34; Mk. 9:47).

About thirty years later a different interpretation of the teaching of Jesus was put forward, principally by C. H. Dodd. He adopted the view that, according to Mk. 1:15, the kingdom had already come at the time when Jesus was speaking, and he showed that a number of other sayings indicated that the kingdom was already present during his ministry (Matt. 10:7 = Lk. 10:9, 11; Matt. 11:12 = Lk. 16:16; Matt. 12:28 = Lk. 11:20; 17:20-21). Jesus' own appearance and ministry were the final act of God for the salvation of sinners, and the kingship of God did not mean some mighty apocalyptic act at the end of history, but God's sovereign and gracious act in bringing redemption in Jesus. This theory earned the name of "realized eschatology," since it held that the eschatological events had already happened (the German phrase sich realisierende Eschatologie also is used to describe it).

The result of subsequent intense discussion has been to show that neither theory can stand on its own. Each can be defended only at the cost of explaining away, often by very dubious methods, the evidence for the other. The Weiss-Schweitzer theory paid a one-sided attention to the sayings about the future coming of the kingdom and ignored the sayings to which Dodd later drew attention. Dodd for his part was quite unconvincing in his attempts to interpret the future sayings in line with his view that the kingdom had already come. The most careful study of the evidence, that by W. G. Kümmel (Promise and Fulfillment [1957]), showed that Jesus spoke both of the presence and of the future coming of the kingdom.

Once this polarity or dualism has been recognized, the problem is to explain it. (a) R. Bultmann and his followers stressed the primacy of the future elements in the teaching of Jesus, but then reinterpreted his sayings in existential categories in such a manner that the concept of a real future coming of the kingdom has been effectively denied. (b) Kümmel's own solution was to restrict the presence of the kingdom to its presence in Jesus; in his own person the future consummation already had come, but apart from his presence the kingdom is not present and its coming lies in the future. (c) Others, taking their cue from Mk. 9:1, have distinguished between the coming of the kingdom in Jesus' ministry and its future coming in power (e.g., A. M. Hunter), or between the veiled revelation of the kingdom in the ministry of Jesus and its open manifestation at the end of time (e.g., C. E. B. Cranfield), or between the partial and provisional manner of its manifestation in the ministry of Jesus and its future full manifestation (e.g., H. Ridderbos).

There are elements of truth in all these various attempts at elucidation, and they may be combined with each other (as several scholars do combine them). (d) Perhaps the most satisfactory statement of the matter is that suggested independently by R. Schnackenburg and G. E. Ladd, who distinguish between the fulfillment and the consummation of the OT promise of the kingdom. "For Jesus, the kingdom of God was the dynamic rule of God which had invaded history in his own person and mission to bring men in the present age the blessings of the messianic age, and which would manifest itself yet again at the end of the age to bring this messianic salvation to its consummation" (G. E. Ladd, Jesus and the Kingdom [1966], 303). By this terminology the reality of the coming of the kingdom in the ministry of Jesus is safeguarded.

It is probably wasted labor to attempt to show that one aspect or the other of the coming of the kingdom had the greater significance for Jesus. Although the actual number of sayings referring explicitly to the future coming is greater, it remains true that the teaching about the presence of the kingdom was especially distinctive of Jesus and contained new ideas about its nature. The truth is that the two aspects were not rigidly separated by him. The future coming was near because God had begun to act; the present time was full of significance because God already was bringing his final gift of salvation to men.

2. The presence of the kingdom. It is necessary to examine more closely both aspects of Jesus' message about the kingdom. The evidence in the Gospels is fully consonant with the usage of the rabbinic literature in that the phrase "the kingdom of God" refers primarily to the action of God who follows out his sovereign will toward mankind. This means that the kingdom of God never refers to an action undertaken by human beings or a realm which they set up. However noble may be the idea of laboring to establish the kingdom of God, the biblical terminology is completely inconsistent with the language of modern liberal theology. The kingdom is a divine act, not a human accomplishment, nor even the accomplishment of dedicated Christians.

At the same time, however, although the idea of action is primary, the word kingdom also refers to the realm set up by God and the benefits associated with it. People may enter the kingdom (Lk. 16:16 = Matt. 11:12) or receive it as a gift (Lk. 12:32). Consequently, the message of the kingdom comes as a piece of good news (cf. above, section III.A). The present world is under the rule of SATAN (Matt. 4:9 = Lk. 4:6; Matt. 12:26 = Lk. 11:18; Lk. 13:16; cf. Jn. 12:31; 14:30), but the action of God in Jesus means that Satan is being attacked, his rule is being brought to an end, and his captives are being set free. If, therefore, the coming of the kingdom already means the hour of judgment upon wicked men (cf. Matt. 3:10 = Lk. 3:9), it is also the hour of deliverance in which sinners are set free from the demonic powers (Matt. 12:28 = Lk. 11:20).

The deeds of Jesus are, therefore, to be seen as signs of the coming and the presence of the kingdom. They are part of the message (cf. Matt. 4:23). They do not simply show the power of God—hence there is no hard-and-fast division to be made between the miraculous and nonmiraculous deeds of Jesus—but rather the kind of power that he displays. The kingdom of God is characterized by grace (Matt. 20:1-16) and a compassion that is mighty to help the unfortunate and the outcast.

The teaching of Jesus is equally a sign of the presence of the kingdom. By proclaiming the kingship of God, Jesus made it possible for people to turn from their sin, own his kingship, and receive the blessings of his rule. This is seen particularly in the PARABLES. They present the rule of God as being like a hidden treasure or a costly pearl that people should make every effort to acquire (Matt. 13:44-46). They paint its joys as being like those of a marriage feast to which all are invited (22:2-14). They show how it has come quietly and secretly in the ministry of Jesus, like seed newly planted in the ground, but will one day come to a glorious and visible consummation, like an abundant harvest (Matt. 13:31-32 = Mk. 4:30-32 = Lk. 13:18-19; Matt. 13:33 = Lk. 13:20-21; Mk. 4:26-29). They indicate that the hour of decision has come: people must listen with care (Matt. 13:19), so that at the end when the harvest is gathered they may be numbered among the righteous (13:24-30, 36-43, 47-50).

In these various ways the MYSTERY or secret of the kingdom is revealed (Matt. 13:10-17; cf. Mk. 4:10-12 and Lk. 8:9-10). The content of the mystery is that God is at work in the ministry of Jesus for the salvation of human beings before the time comes for judgment and the opportunity for repentance is past. Although the mysterious working of God in this completely unexpected manner was no secret to the disciples (yet even they did not completely comprehend it), it remained hidden from many, who remained willfully blind to what God was doing in Jesus and refused to seek out the message concealed in the parables. They could not believe that God was working in Jesus, and so the secret remained hidden from them.

From what has been said, it will be apparent that the message of the kingdom is a message of salvation rather than a message about God in himself. Jesus said very little about God's reigning or acting as king, and he associated the term kingdom much more with the blessings that it brought to men and women. He preferred to think of God not so much in terms of kingship as of FATHERHOOD, and part of his message was the new filial relationship with God that God's children could enjoy in the kingdom (Matt. 6:9-10 = Lk. 11:2; Lk. 12:32; 22:29; cf. Matt. 18:3).

3. The coming of the kingdom. Although the kingdom was truly present in the ministry of Jesus, he also spoke of it as a future entity and told his disciples to pray for its coming (Matt. 6:10 = Lk. 11:2) and to be ready for its coming (Matt. 25:1-13). More than once he indicated that it would come soon (Matt. 16:28 = Mk. 9:1 = Lk. 9:27; Lk. 17:20-21; 21:31). By this manner of speaking Jesus was referring to the age to come (Mk. 10:30 = Lk. 18:30), which was associated with the coming of the Son of Man, the resurrection of the dead, and the setting up of an eternal realm of bliss, often described in the imagery of a banquet or marriage feast (Matt. 8:11-12 = Lk. 13:28-29; Matt. 22:1-10 = Lk. 14:16-24; Matt. 25:1-13; Lk. 22:28-30).

The closest connection exists between the presence of the kingdom in the ministry of Jesus and its future consummation. If the presence of the kingdom is closely associated with the person of Jesus (see above, III.B.4), its future coming is associated with the coming of the Son of Man. It is true that the connection is not explicitly made in the texts, but it is impossible not to believe that the two events formed part of one single eschatological hope.

The question of the imminence of the future kingdom has been the subject of much discussion. Against the contention of many scholars that Jesus expected its arrival immediately after his death, W. G. Kümmel has shown that he certainly envisaged an interval between his death and its arrival. During this time the disciples were to preach the gospel to all the nations (Matt. 24:14). Jesus spoke of founding his CHURCH, to which he entrusted the keys of the kingdom (16:18-19). The problem of whether the interval expected by Jesus was as long as it is turning out to be is part of the general question of ESCHATOLOGY in the Gospels, and is discussed elsewhere.

4. Jesus and the kingdom. How was Jesus himself related to the kingdom? Was he simply the herald of its coming like JOHN THE BAPTIST, or was it more closely linked to his person?

Earlier discussion has shown that Jesus brought the kingdom of God to human beings by his teaching and his mighty deeds. The point to be emphasized now is that they were his words and deeds or those of men sent out by him. It was through him that God had chosen to work. He was conscious that a new era had begun: the kingdom was pushing its way forward among men and being proclaimed as good news (Matt. 11:12 = Lk. 16:16).

Furthermore, although Jesus was extremely reticent on the matter in his public teaching, he knew himself to be the One who perfectly fulfilled the roles of the Messiah and the Son of Man. In other words, he was conscious of being the key figure associated with the coming of the kingdom (for the Son of Man exercising kingly functions, see Dan. 7:13-14; 1 En. 69.26-29).

Jesus required of people to make a personal response to him if they wished to enter the kingdom. He called them to faith and discipleship, and, although the texts that directly link discipleship to the kingdom are few, the impression is inescapable that response to him is the condition for receiving the benefits of the kingdom both now and hereafter (Matt. 7:21; 13:52; Lk. 12:32; 22:29-30; 23:42). He declared authoritatively who was near to or who was excluded from the kingdom (Matt. 21:31, 43; 23:13; Mk. 12:34).

Jesus did not directly link the coming of the kingdom with his death upon the cross. Already before his death, the kingdom of God was present. Nevertheless, the connection is there, and the cross is to be regarded as one of the key stages in the coming of the kingdom. It is probable that the coming of the kingdom “with power” (Mk. 9:1) is to be connected with the events made possible by the death and resurrection of Jesus. The discussion of places of honor in the kingdom (10:35-45) is closely linked with the thought of the sacrificial death of Jesus; it is only by the way of suffering that the Son of Man may enter into his glory. The same thought recurs in Mk. 14:25 (cf. Lk. 22:16, 18), where Jesus stated that he would not drink of the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God had come. These sayings show that Jesus was aware that the kingdom could not fully come except by his death, but they do not fully express the nature of a relationship that could become evident to his disciples only after his death and resurrection.

A number of passages speak of Jesus as ruling. The title of Messiah means an anointed king, and it was because he was thought to be claiming an earthly kingship that Jesus was crucified as “the king of the Jews” (Mk. 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32, and parallels). This was in fact the status claimed for him at his birth (Matt. 2:2; Lk. 1:33), and by himself when he entered Jerusalem as the promised king (Matt. 21:5; Lk. 19:38). He also looked forward to his future role as king, although the relationship of this messianic kingdom to the kingdom of God is not clearly explained in the Gospels (Matt. 13:41; 16:28; cf. 20:21; Lk. 22:29-30; cf. 23:42).

All this evidence shows that the kingdom is inextricably linked with Jesus himself. One may well agree with MARCION, who said, “In the Gospel the kingdom of God is Christ himself,” and with ORIGEN, who described Jesus as being “himself the kingdom” (autobasileia). It must be carefully observed that, since the kingdom of God is primarily God’s action, it is not the person of Jesus in separation from his deeds which constitutes the presence of the kingdom but rather the activity of Jesus in coming into the world from God and in exercising God’s power in bringing salvation and judgment to sinners.

C. The human response

1. Entry into the kingdom. The preaching of Jesus about the kingdom demanded a response from his hearers. They were to repent and believe the good news (Mk. 1:15). They were to make the seeking of the kingdom their foremost concern in life (Matt. 6:33; cf. Lk. 12:31). Those who took these steps were promised that here and now in this life they might receive the kingdom and its blessings (Lk. 12:32).

Jesus also spoke of entering the kingdom in the future tense, in the same way as that in which he spoke of receiving eternal life or being saved or having a share in the age to come (Mk. 10:17, 25-26, 30). These various phrases all signified entry into the everlasting, heavenly kingdom of God. The “conditions” for entry included willingness to become humble and receptive like little children (Matt. 18:3-4), and readiness to endure persecution and sacrifice (Matt. 5:10; 19:12; Lk. 9:60, 62). It would, however, be wrong to think of these as “conditions” in the normal sense, as standards of fitness that people must attain to enable them to qualify for entrance. The ministry of Jesus affords ample proof that entry into the kingdom depends solely upon the grace of God and that this grace comes to the undeserving and sinful. As stated above (III.B.4), the primary response that Jesus sought from his hearers was discipleship, the willingness to trust him and commit their life to him. We should, therefore, regard these “conditions” as the characteristics of those who are humbly receptive to the grace of God and prepared to make any effort to receive it.

In laying down this way of entry into the kingdom, Jesus was denying entry to any Jews who thought that the kingdom rightfully belonged to them and failed to show the evidence of true discipleship and humble trust in God (Matt. 8:11 – 12;

Jesus said that one must “receive the kingdom of God like a little child” (Mk. 10:15).

cf. Lk. 13:28-29; Matt. 21:31, 43; cf. 23:13). The kingdom was no longer to be the exclusive property of the Jews, but was now open to the Gentiles. However, although the Jews as a nation had largely misused their opportunities (Matt. 23:13), the revelation of God in the OT was still a true means of knowing his will. A Jew who correctly understood the spiritual message of the OT was told by Jesus that he was not far from the kingdom (Mk. 12:34); the one thing necessary was that he should accept the Messiah promised in the OT and become a disciple (cf. 10:21).

2. The ethics of the kingdom. To acknowledge the kingship of God implies the acceptance of the kind of behavior he prescribes. It means submission to the concrete demands of the king (Matt. 5:19) and the production of a character more righteous than that of such men as the Pharisees and scribes (5:20; cf. 13:43). There must be a resolute determination to overcome temptation (Mk. 9:47) and a willingness to extend to others the FORGIVENESS God gives to his people (Matt. 18:23-35). The scribe who recognized the primacy of heart love for God and for his neighbor over external sacrifices was declared to be not far from the kingdom (Mk. 12:34).

Weiss and Schweitzer erred in thinking that this ethic of Jesus was teaching conditioned purely by the imminent approach of the end of the world, a set of stringent rules to be observed in a time of crisis but unsuitable for ordinary, everyday life. But it is not the nearness of a crisis that determines the content of Jesus’ ethic but rather the nearness of God; and what is demanded is not something that can be fulfilled only by people who are keyed up by the expectation of imminent crisis, but is rather the unchanging requirement of God from his people. The ethic comes with new force in the context of the preaching of the kingdom, and it is expressed more radically than was possible in the legal code of the Pentateuch, but it remains the same ethic as that which is found in the OT.

Once again one must beware of thinking that the ethic is a “condition” of entry to the kingdom, as if God were laying down certain qualities of character as the entrance requirements. Jesus’ message was the gospel of grace, and the ethic expresses the response that sinners should make to the gospel. It is the way of life for those who have already accepted the rule of God and experienced its blessings and who now look forward to the consummation of his rule. See also ETHICS OF JESUS.

3. The kingdom and the church. Although the word CHURCH occurs only twice in the Gospels (Matt. 16:18-19; 18:17-18), the idea was certainly present in Jesus’ teaching. The church is simply the company of those who accept the kingly rule of God and find themselves bound together by their common allegiance to God and his Son. During his ministry Jesus placed before men and women the need to commit themselves to him in discipleship, and this group of disciples must be regarded as the church in embryo. Within this larger company the Twelve occupied a special place. To them, and in particular to PETER, Jesus entrusted the keys of the kingdom, that is, the authority to preach the gospel of the kingdom and to admit people to it. This was their mission during his lifetime, and he commanded them to carry it on after his death.

The church, therefore, is not to be identified with the kingdom. It is rather part of the manifestation of the kingdom in the world, for it is the company of those who accept the message of the kingdom, own Jesus as their Lord and Master, and act as his agents in continuing to proclaim the gospel of the kingdom.

4. The kingdom and the world. Although the old translation of Lk. 17:21, “the kingdom of God is within you” (KJV, ASV, NIV), is rejected by many, it remains true that the kingship of God is fundamentally a spiritual matter. His kingdom is not to be put on a level with earthly kingdoms (Jn. 18:36), and entrance to it is possible only as a result of spiritual rebirth (3:3, 5). Nevertheless, the stage on which it is manifested is this world, and one day the forces of evil that control this world will finally yield to it. Although it is a spiritual realm and the natural man may be blind to its presence, those who accept God’s rule enjoy an earnest of heavenly blessing here and now in this world, and find themselves required to take up a definite attitude to the “powers that be” that may be arrayed in opposition to it. The kingdom may be said to spread in the world as people accept the rule of God personally, and even as the people of the world are moved to higher principles and more ethical behavior as a result of its working. There is, however, nothing in the teaching of Jesus to suggest that the world is necessarily going to become better or that eventually all will accept the kingship of God. On the contrary, the establishment of the kingdom at the advent of the Son of Man takes place only after the persecution of the disciples and amid human indifference.

IV. The kingship of God in the early church

A. The Acts of the Apostles. One of the most striking things about the preaching of the early church is the way in which the message of the kingdom of God fell into the background, and its place as the theme of preaching was taken by the person of Jesus himself. The preaching of the kingdom did not entirely lapse (Acts 8:12; 14:22; 19:8; 20:25; 28:23, 31), and there was a genuine continuity between the message of Jesus and that of the apostles. It is now the King rather than the kingdom who comes to the fore (17:7), and when the kingdom was preached it was in conjunction with the name of Jesus (8:12; 28:31). The idea of the kingdom as a future realm appears in Acts 14:22.

B. The epistles of Paul. In a number of passages PAUL retains the concept of the kingdom of God as a description of the future age (1 Thess. 2:12; 2 Tim. 4:1, 18). It will be inherited only by those who have turned aside from sin (1 Cor. 6:9-10; Gal. 5:21; Eph. 5:5; 2 Thess. 1:5). Only in Rom. 14:17 and in 1 Cor. 4:20 is the kingdom of God clearly spoken of in the present tense. In the former passage its blessings are stated to be the spiritual qualities of righteousness, peace, and joy in the HOLY SPIRIT, and in the latter it is emphasized that it is a real dynamic force in the world.

Elsewhere when Paul speaks of the kingdom in the present tense, he refers specifically to the kingdom of Christ, who now reigns in heaven (1 Cor. 15:25) and admits sinners into his kingdom (Col. 1:13). He is the King of kings and Lord of lords (1 Tim. 6:15) alongside his Father (1:17), to whom he is ultimately subordinate and to whom he hands over his kingship so that the Father may be supreme (1 Cor. 15:24). Although there is probably no reference to a millennial reign in this last quotation, the future kingship of Jesus is mentioned in 2 Tim. 4:1, 18. Believers will share in this reign (2:12; cf. 1 Cor. 4:8, which is expressed ironically), but even now they can be said to share in the privileges of reign (Rom. 5:17). Paul thinks of an active rule of God through Jesus Christ, both now in the period since the resurrection and also in the future dating from the PAROUSIA, but it cannot be said that the theme of the kingdom of God occupies a central position in his thought. For him, as for the other NT writers, the King has become more important than the kingdom, and in the context of the Hellenistic Roman world, the title of Lord gained much wider currency than the Jewish title of king.

C. Other writers. The rest of the NT does not contribute much to the development of the theme. The epistle to the Hebrews shares the common NT belief that Jesus now reigns as king, employing the language of Ps. 45:6 to express its confession of his divine kingship (Heb. 1:8). It also exhorts and encourages its readers with the thought that they possess a kingdom that cannot be shaken; with God as their king, it is implied, nothing should worry them, for the kingdom to which they belong will survive the fate of the perishable world (12:28).

In the epistle of James there is mention of the future blessings associated with the kingdom of God that are promised to the poor (Jas. 2:5). The thought of James is close to that of the gospel BEATITUDES, and elsewhere James speaks of the royal law that is promulgated by the king in the command to love one's neighbor as oneself (2:8). The first epistle of Peter speaks once of believers as a royal priesthood, thus combining the thoughts of their privilege of reigning and their duty of service (1 Pet. 2:9), and the second epistle stresses that people must live in such a way that they will gain entry to the eternal kingdom of their Lord and Savior Jesus Christ (2 Pet. 1:11).

Finally, the book of Revelation looks forward to the era of the kingship of God and of Christ when the kingdoms of the earth come under their rightful lord (Rev. 1:8; 4:8; 11:17; 15:3; 17:14; 19:6, 15) instead of being under the sway of evil demonic forces (9:11; 17:18; 18:7). Under the rule of God believers themselves already form a kingdom (1:6, 9), and they will share in the future reign of Christ both in the millennium and afterward (5:10; 20:4, 6; 22:5).

In the early church the concept of the kingdom of God was used, as in the teaching of Jesus, for the future triumphal reign of God. The church expressed the present era of salvation in other ways, but it did not altogether give up Jesus' manner of speaking about the presence of the kingdom, for it taught that he is now the exalted Lord and King to whom men and women must submit. At his SECOND COMING he will be displayed openly as king, and in the end God the Father will be seen to be all in all when the Son hands over sovereignty to him. In this life believers share in the blessings of his reign, just as the disciples did during the earthly ministry of Jesus, and they look forward to the consummation of their hopes in the coming kingdom of God and of his Son. See HEAVEN.

Kings, Books of. Two historical books of the OT that cover the period from the death of King DAVID to the end of the monarchy. The title derives from the Hebrew Bible (mēlākîm), where they are the last two books in the section known as the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, 1-2 Samuel, 1-2 Kings). Originally, the narrative formed only one book. The division between 1 and 2 Kings first appears in the SEPTUAGINT (where 1-2 Samuel and 1-2 Kings are entitled 1-4 Kingdoms or Reigns). A few medieval Hebrew MSS also separate the two books, and the division became standard in the Hebrew Bible after it was introduced in the Bomberg printed edition (published in Venice, A.D. 1516-17). This segmentation of the narrative, however, is quite arbitrary and consequently does not reflect any significance as far as the original volume is concerned. The account of the Hebrew monarchy in 1-2 Kings will therefore be referred to in the singular in this article.

I. Background. Spanning a period of more than four centuries (c. 971-562 B.C.), the historical survey in Kings portrays the Israelite kingdom in its most affluent era of political, economic, and religious achievements under SOLOMON. Due to Solomon's apostasy, the nation was divided, and ultimately both resulting kingdoms were terminated in exile.

International relations are frequently delineated. With Palestine as the geographical link between the Mesopotamian and Egyptian cultures, there were frequent political and economic pressures on the divided Israelite nation. Whereas the northern kingdom capitulated under the Assyrian advance in 722 B.C., the southern kingdom survived but ultimately succumbed to the Babylonian empire in 586. Numerous historical contacts with foreign nations have been noted in archaeological findings and related to the account in the book of Kings.

II. Authorship, unity, and date. The history in the book of Kings was distinctly religious history. The religious evaluation of each king throughout this long period of Israelite history is characteristic of the entire account. Every king in each kingdom is carefully noted, although some of the monarchs receive only a brief account in the record. Neither from the literary nor from the religious perspective is there any reason to suggest a diversity of authorship.

Although no one single author could have been associated with the events spanning over four centuries, it is quite apparent that the recurrent phrases throughout are characteristic of the prophetic school identified by many scholars as "Deuteronomic" (cf. C. F. Burney, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Book of Kings [1903], xiii and 131). See DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY. E. R. Thiele (The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, rev. ed. [1965], 177) concurs that this "unusual type of religious history in Kings is certainly peculiar to Hebrew prophetic ways of thought and action." The language used by Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other prophets, as well as the language of Deuteronomy, is similar to that of Kings, since the spirit of admonition, exhortation, reproof, and encouragement is common throughout.

A basic framework also appears throughout the book of Kings concerning each individual ruler. This usually occurs in connection with the introduction and/or conclusion of each king's reign. Normally for each of the kings of Judah and Israel the length of his reign is reported. For the kings of Judah the author usually gives the name of the queen mother and the age of the king at the time of his accession. For kings who were violently deposed, the formula is often incomplete. Such was the case with Joram king of Israel (see JEHORAM #2) and AHAZIAH king of Judah, who were both murdered by JEHU. Likewise for Jehu the formula is missing, since he was a rebel and took the throne by killing the king under whom he served as captain of the Israelite army.

As a religious history, the account gives an appraisal of each king concerning his reign and his relationship to God. The kings of the northern kingdom were all committed to IDOLATRY, breaking the first commandment, which dealt with wholehearted devotion to God. JEROBOAM began this idolatrous trend, and his successors followed in the promotion of idolatry. In the southern kingdom there were periodic revivals under God-fearing kings. Outstanding for their piety were JEHOSEPHAT, HEZEKIAH, and JOSIAH. ASA and UZZIAH were also concerned about the religious welfare of their people. Among the most idolatrous and defiant were JEHORAM, AHAZ, and MANASSEH.

Since this was a religious history covering so many centuries of time, it is quite reasonable to conclude that these records were kept by the PROPHETS. MOSES, through whom Israel was established as a nation, provided a written account of Israel's history and the divine revelation given through him. This written record by the prophet Moses was given so that future generations would have knowledge of God's requirements. Subsequent to Moses' time the history of Israel is recorded by authors who were sensitive to Israel's obedience in relationship to the COVENANT established at Sinai. In all likelihood these authors were prophets or spokesmen for God.

According to Deut. 17, the kings of Israel were to be obedient to the law. For this purpose they were to be provided with a personal copy of the law. In the anointing of both SAUL and DAVID, the prophet SAMUEL was personally involved (1 Sam. 10:1; 16:12-13). NATHAN the prophet and ZADOK the priest anointed SOLOMON, whose line continued throughout the history of Judah down to 586 B.C., interrupted only by the reign of terror under ATHALIAH. AHIJAH the prophet informed JEROBOAM about his prospects of ruling over the seceding tribes in the N (1 Ki. 11:29-38). The prophet JEHU announced God's judgment upon the dynasty of BAASHA (16:1-4). A different Jehu, an Israelite army captain, was anointed as king by ELISHA's servant, who actually implemented the divine commission given to ELIJAH at Mount Horeb (1 Ki. 19:6-7; 2 Ki. 9:9-12). Elijah and Elisha continually carried on a ministry that made Israelite and foreign kings conscious that they were representatives for God. Boldly they warned and denounced kings, offered their aid in time of need, and made the people conscious of the solemn obligation that they ought to serve God instead of idols.

Since prophets apparently were active in every generation in the history of Israel, it seems that the concern was that the king should conform to the written revelation given to Moses, which would have been expressed in the written records. Consequently it is possible that many more prophets were engaged in keeping records than is indicated in the OT writings that have been preserved. Among those that are identified as providing written sources are the following: the book of Samuel the seer (1 Chr. 29:29); the book of Nathan the prophet (29:29; 2 Chr. 9:29); the book of Gad the seer (1 Chr. 29:29); the book of Nathan the prophet; the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite (2 Chr. 9:29); the visions of Iddo the seer (9:29); the book of Shemaiah the prophet (12:15); the book of Iddo the seer (12:15); the story of the prophet Iddo (13:22); the acts of Uzziah by Isaiah (26:22).

That some of the prophets like Isaiah and Jeremiah were intimately associated with and often involved in the political affairs during their ministries is readily apparent in the books bearing their names. They were fully aware of the national and international problems and often had messages directly related to the issues confronting the king and his people.

Court recorders were not necessarily religiously inclined. This may have been especially true when they were appointed and employed by kings who did not fear God. It seems unlikely that court recorders would have assumed responsibility for delineating the details of the wicked deeds of Ahab and Jezebel, Ahaz, Manasseh, and other rulers who were committed to idolatry and defied the prophets of Israel's God.

Prophets, on the other hand, were not employed by the king or any court officials. They were accountable to God and responsible to convey God's messages that were in harmony with and supplementary to the Mosaic revelation and the messages of the prophets that preceded them. By this standard they evaluated the kings and would have been at liberty to record these crucial facts only if they had been active in some neutral point removed from either of the capitals of the Hebrew kings.

The synchronism between the two kingdoms throughout the book of Kings seems to favor the idea that these records were kept by the prophets. It is unlikely that court recorders would have consistently made reference to the kings of the other kingdom, especially so when the two kingdoms were at war with each other. To the prophets, however, this approach would have been of significant interest, since the citizens of both kingdoms were Hebrews and descendants of Abraham.

On the basis of the above considerations, it seems reasonable and likely that the prophets kept the records throughout the generations of the Hebrew kingdoms. One or more of these prophets living between 600 and 550 B.C. probably was responsible for the final edition of the book of Kings in its present form. From earliest times it (along with Joshua, Judges, and 1-2 Samuel) seemingly has been associated with the writing of the prophets and classified with the books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve.

III. Place of origin. If the conclusion is correct that the prophets were responsible for keeping these records, it seems reasonable to concur with Thiele (Mysterious Numbers, 174—91) that these prophetic centers were located in some of the cities in the border area between the N and the S. Here the prophets could have been engaged in such literary activities as are reflected in the book of Kings. Cities like Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah were teaching centers in the days of Samuel (1 Sam. 7:16). During the times of Elijah and Elisha the cities of Bethel, Gilgal, and Jericho had prophetic schools where groups of prophets were educated. These cultural, educational, and religious centers consequently were not under the direct control of the state.

Since the capital cities of Samaria and Jerusalem were 40 mi. apart, the towns in the border area were far enough from the political centers to allow them considerable freedom from direct interference. At the same time they were close enough so that the prophets who resided in the border area had access to the news as it happened in either kingdom. Furthermore, in time of war they were not the main object of attack as the capital cities were. In time of peace they undoubtedly had vital contact with both capitals.

It is doubtful that the records kept by the prophets were widely circulated during the period in which they were written. Consequently there was not much opportunity for the kings who were in power to react to the writings or the authors in question. Normally these accounts may not have reached the royal courts unless the king was particularly friendly to the prophets. The kings who cared neither for God nor the prophets and their messages may have generally ignored the activity of the prophets in keeping the records of their nation's history.

It is also probable that some of the prophets were primarily interested in their own kingdom and limited their literary activity to either the N or the S, reflecting the customs and interests peculiar to their native state. The developments in the other kingdom were only brought into their account when both kingdoms were involved in contemporary affairs. Representative of this approach are the books of CHRONICLES, in which the account is primarily limited to the southern kingdom. There may have existed a number of such historical records that are now lost, but they may have been used by the author who was responsible for the edition of the book of Kings as it is preserved in the OT.

After the northern kingdom capitulated to the Assyrians in 722 B.C., the border became less important. During Josian days, as the Assyrian domination diminished, the distinction between the N and the S may have been completely erased. It is during this era, by about 600, that this account in the book of Kings may have been completed and the subsequent events down to 586 added as they occurred. Nothing is reported beyond that concerning the Hebrew people except that Jehoiachin remained in Babylonian captivity until 561, when he was released.

IV. Occasion, purpose, and destination. The minute details given in Kings seem to indicate that records were kept of the events as they happened throughout the centuries, from the time of Solomon to Jehoiachin's release. Of primary interest was the record concerning every king in both Hebrew kingdoms. What happened during each reign is reported briefly in some instances and again extensively concerning others. Frequently other leaders who were associated with the kings are mentioned, but special attention seems to be given to the religious leaders who were influential at various times. Prophets seem to be mentioned more frequently than priests.

Since the Hebrews were God's chosen people and as such had a covenant relationship with God, it was crucially important for them what the attitude of their king was toward God. A king in Israel, unlike kings of other nations, had a stewardship responsibility to God. When Samuel anointed Saul, it was explicitly stated that the king in Israel was captain of God's inheritance (1 Sam. 10:1). In his place of authority and power he was to be conscious of the fact that he was ruling over God's people. The basic requirement of each individual Israelite was that of exclusive devotion to God (Deut. 6:5). Consequently it was of vital significance whether or not the king exemplified this pattern of living in his place of leadership as head of the nation. The written copy of the revelation given through Moses was to provide guidance for the nation as well as the king. Moses had instructed the priests that a special copy was to be provided for the king's personal use as leader of God's people (17:18-20). Consequently, as the records are kept concerning the kings of the Hebrew people, the recorders or writers reflect a sensitivity to the responsibility a king had who was entrusted with the opportunity of ruling over God's chosen people. If the king exemplified a wholehearted devotion to God, the writers frequently gave a detailed account of their activities in leading their people to conform to God's requirements. If a king, however, led the people into idolatry, this was also noted.

Prophets are also frequently noted in this book of Kings. The prophets did not come into their ministries as spokesmen for God by virtue of being anointed or by inheritance, nor specifically take the position of another prophet when his term expired. Although priests continued in successive official positions, the book of Kings does not provide such a list. Some of the priests are occasionally mentioned. Prophets, however, are so frequently mentioned in this record that hardly a generation seems to be without the ministry of a man who claimed to deliver God's message.

Prophets also were crucially important in their ministry to the Hebrew people. Moses had assured the Israelites that they could expect prophets after his decease. Any prophet who did not conform to the basic requirement of worshiping God exclusively was to be regarded as a false prophet (Deut. 13:1-3). Throughout this record in the book of Kings, it was usually indicated concerning each prophet whether or not he was a God-fearing individual in his pattern of behavior. True prophets were directly accountable to God and some suffered martyrdom. Idolatry and its promotion provided specific evidence that a king or prophet was an apostate as far as the law of Moses was concerned.

The book of Kings is not addressed to anyone in particular. It is reasonable to assume that those who were responsible for keeping these records were primarily concerned about providing an account of Israel's history for future generations. The religious evaluation concerning the kings, prophets, and the people likely was intended to serve as a warning to the readers that they should be concerned about living as God's covenant people ought to live in expressing their love and devotion to God. As a whole the constructive periods, when real concern was expressed to serve God, are delineated in much greater detail than the accomplishments of godless kings like Omri and Jeroboam, even though they were the most powerful kings in the Northern Kingdom. The ministries of Elijah and Elisha are given much more coverage in this record.

The concluding paragraphs concerning the northern kingdom (2 Ki. 17:1-41) may be indicative of the purpose of the author or authors of the book of Kings. The Israelites had had a long succession of kings who had led the people into idolatry instead of influencing their people to serve God as outlined by Moses. Not only had the king and his people disobeyed the terms of God's covenant with them, but they had also ignored the prophets God had sent to them. The division of the kingdom had occurred because Solomon himself had turned to idolatry. This division came as a divine judgment upon his dynasty. The northern kingdom was terminated with the Assyrian captivity because the kings as well as the people had not responded positively to the warnings of the prophets who came as God's messengers. This indictment against Israel for their disobedience to the Mosaic law and the prophets may indicate the purpose of the author or authors in warning coming generations to learn from history.

V. Canonicity. The book of Kings, which constituted one large scroll in the collection of the sacred literature of the Hebrews, has never been questioned concerning its inclusion in the CANON. Due to its contents it always has been recognized as providing the continuing account of the Israelites subsequent to the books of Samuel. In the Greek and Latin versions, the books of Samuel and Kings were regarded as one continuous account in four volumes.

According to JOSEPHUS, the canon of the Jews was completed by about 400 B.C., composed of twenty-two books (representing thirty-nine books in the English versions). Although the arrangement or order of these twenty-two volumes may not have been fixed until several centuries after the beginning of the Christian era, the book of Kings usually was listed with the grouping identified as Prophets. The fact that Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve are included within the canonical division of Prophets may indicate that all of these books were regarded as being written by prophets and on that basis had the recognition of being canonical on a par with the books of Moses. For the prophets and their messages the book of Kings provided the essential background. Current scholarship seems to have no knowledge of any questions propounded concerning the proper place of Kings in the canon of the OT.

VI. Text. The Hebrew text of the book of Kings has been subject to intensive study and analysis. Some of the early 20th-cent. scholars had tentatively come to the conclusion that the biblical chronologies of the Hebrew kings—which are extensively delineated in the books of Kings and Chronicles—were notable for their undependability. Problems of chronology were already puzzling to the devout Jews who translated the Hebrew scriptures into the Greek language. Apparently they altered some of the numbers in the text, possibly attempting to eliminate some of the statements they considered as inconsistent. Josephus likewise reflects difficulties with the numbers in the Hebrew text.

Although other systems, such as the absolute chronology of the Assyrians, were accepted as reliable by modern scholars, the Hebrew chronologies were often not recognized as trustworthy and accurate. Consequently, the text of these records in the Hebrew Bible usually was approached with excessive reserve as to its dependability. The chronological features often excited severe criticism and derision in the study of the book of Kings as well as the records in Chronicles.

The intensive scholarly analysis of the numbers of the Hebrew kings by Thiele (Mysterious Numbers) brought about a change in attitude as far as the reliability of the Hebrew text is concerned. In precisely the matters that were considered to be so inaccurate—the numbers in the text—Thiele provided evidence that they were recorded and transmitted accurately by the scribes throughout the centuries. Few were the errors that occurred in the process of transmission. When the data in the book of Kings are interpreted and understood in terms of the methods of dating systems used during the kingdom period of the Israelites, most of the difficulties in the text disappear. In the light of this approach the text may be regarded as remarkably accurate and reliable. (It should be noted, however, that not all scholars are persuaded by Thiele's method. For a recent defense of the LXX text, see A. Schenker, Älteste Textgeschichte der Königsbücher: Die hebräische Vorlage der ursprünglichen Septuaginta als älteste Textform der Königsbücher [2004].)

VII. Chronology. Since the systems of keeping historical records in ancient times were not understood correctly, it was impossible to develop a consistent chronology for the Hebrew kings who reigned during the divided kingdom era. Modern scholarship is indebted to Thiele for his intensive study in this area of OT scholarship. The fundamental principles he developed are essential for a correct interpretation of the data given concerning the Hebrew kings. These basic principles are noted briefly in the paragraphs following.

The system of counting years varied in the two Hebrew kingdoms. Whereas the accession-year system—also known as “postdating” since a king counted the first full year of his reign as his first year—was used in Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia, the system varied in the Hebrew kingdoms. Under Solomon the accession-year system of numbering a king's reign was used and continued in use in the southern kingdom until the middle of the 9th cent., when possibly Jehoram or Athaliah changed to the nonaccession-year system of numbering. This system of dating—also known as “antedating” because the king counted the part of the calendar year in which he began his reign as the first year regardless of its brevity—was used in the northern kingdom beginning with Jeroboam I in 931 B.C. Shortly after 800, both kingdoms—Judah under Amaziah and Israel under Jehoash—reverted to the accession-year method of numbering the reigns of their kings.

The calendar year used by the Hebrews is also crucially important when interpreting these records. The religious calendar began with Nisan in spring, while the civil year began with Tishri in the fall. On the basis of the biblical text, Thiele ascertained the principle that in Judah the regnal years were dated from Tishri to Tishri under Solomon and continued in the historical records of the Hebrews down to the time of Nehemiah. Since specific evidence is lacking concerning the practice in the northern kingdom, Thiele has demonstrated that a harmonious chronological pattern can be established when a Nisan-to-Nisan year is used for the N and a Tishri-to-Tishri year for the S. Thiele suggests that Jeroboam may have been influenced in this practice by Egyptian customs, where the year at that time happened to begin in April. In this way Jeroboam conformed to Egypt and Mesopotamia in his regnal year rather than to the rival kingdom of Judah, which continued under the Davidic rule against which he had rebelled.

Another factor in interpreting the chronological data in the Hebrew records is the question of scribal usage in referring to the kings of another kingdom. This was particularly significant when one kingdom used the accession-year system and the other used the nonaccession-year system in keeping their records. Did the scribe use his own system for noting the year of a foreign ruler or that of the foreign nation involved?

The question of coregencies or interregna also is vitally important in analyzing chronological data. At times sons were made joint rulers, which then would duplicate the years during which both were living. It is only on the assumption of this practice that the references in 2 Ki. 1:17 and 8:16 can be understood properly. During times of revolt and dynastic changes, contending rulers might be in power in various districts at the same time. This also would account for a duplication of years in the history of the kingdom involved. Such was the case when Tibni and Ahab were both contending for the Israelite throne.

Within a kingdom there occurred changes from one chronological method to another. Although this change in method was not indicated by the scribes or authors in the book of Kings, it has become apparent to Thiele. This principle of change must be recognized in developing an accurate chronology for the Hebrew kingdoms and applied as necessary.

Another important factor for an absolute chronology is the correlation of dates that can be fixed with certainty in the records. Using the data in the book of Kings and the dating of Assyrian events also stated in the biblical records, Thiele has established the basis for an absolute Hebrew chronology. Although there were frequent contacts with Egypt, Syria, and lesser states, the contacts with Assyria and later with Babylon basically provided the basis for this correlation. The Assyrians used the solar year and kept records known as the Eponym Canon during the several centuries of the divided kingdom era.

The biblical data that are crucially important for establishing this absolute chronology are secured from the reigns of AHAB and JEHU in Israel and SHALMANESER III in Assyria. Ahab participated in the battle of Qarqar in 853 B.C. and Jehu paid tribute to Assyria in 841, which were respectively identified as the sixth and eighteenth years of Shalmaneser III according to his records. Within this twelve-year period occurred the end of Ahab's reign, the reigns of Ahaziah and Joram, and the enthronement of Jehu in the northern kingdom. During the same period in the southern kingdom occurred the end of Jehoshaphat's reign, the reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah, and the beginning of Athaliah's rule. Furthermore, the fact that Jehu in his enthronement killed both kings—Joram king of Israel and Ahaziah the ruler in Judah—at the same time provided a fixed date within the same year when both kingdoms changed rulers.

Using these fixed dates of 853 and 841 B.C., Thiele has been able to develop an accurate chronology by correlating the data given concerning the

The date of the division of the kingdom is variously placed between 983 and 931 B.C. There are difficulties in the chronology of the period apparent discrepancies may, in part, be accounted for by “overlapping reigns,” “associated sovereignty,” “intervals of anarchy,” and “parts of years as years.” These dates are only approximate.

Hebrew kings. Going backward and accounting for all the years allotted to the kings in both kingdoms in this period, the date for the division of Solomon’s kingdom is given as 931. The terminal date for the northern kingdom is 723, and the destruction of Jerusalem that ended the southern kingdom occurred in 586. Since the Assyrian system provided modern scholarship with an absolute chronology fixed by modern astronomic calculations, the chronology for the Hebrew kings can now be regarded as a sound and accurate system for dating that period of OT times. (Although this chronology of the Hebrew kings is well established as a whole, some problems still remain. In particular, the notations concerning the Ahaz-Hezekiah era are still subject to intensive study by various scholars.) See CHRONOLOGY (OT).

VIII. Content and outline. The content of Kings is vitally important for the history of the Israelites in OT times. It narrates the developments from the establishment of the Davidic kingdom down to the exile in Babylon. Although Chronicles offers a survey of the history of the Davidic dynasty, only the book of Kings provides a continuous integrated account of the developments in both kingdoms—the northern kingdom known as Israel, and the southern, frequently identified as Judah. Crucially important is the emphasis given to the ministry of the prophets. While some are briefly noted, others like Elijah and Elisha are given extensive consideration (1 Ki. 17 to 2 Ki. 9). Some of the writing prophets like Amos and Hosea are not mentioned in the record.

The content of this book may be outlined in numerous ways. For a brief analysis the following division may be used:

1. The reign of Solomon (1 Ki. 1-11)
2. Two Hebrew kingdoms (1 Ki. 12-22 and 2 Ki. 1-17)
3. The southern kingdom (2 Ki. 18-25)

If the content is to be studied with emphasis upon the developments in the southern kingdom the outline below may be helpful:

1. Solomon (1 Ki. 1-11)
2. Rehoboam to Jehoshaphat (1 Ki. 12-22)
3. Jehoram to Ahaz (2 Ki. 8-16)
4. Hezekiah to Amon (2 Ki. 18-21)
5. Josiah to Zedekiah (2 Ki. 22-25)

In the northern kingdom the ruling dynasties changed frequently. During the period of its existence as an independent kingdom—931-722 B.C.—its nineteen kings represented nine dynasties. Eight of these kings either were murdered or committed suicide. The complete list of dynasties is as follows: Jeroboam, Baasha, Zimri, Omri, Jehu, Shallum, Menahem, Pekah, and Hoshea. Some of these men, however, were in power for such a brief period of time—Zimri ruled seven days—and others had no dynastic successors or were so weak that they hardly deserve listing among the ruling families. The dynasty of Jehu had the longest rule, 841-753. In considering a concentrated study of the northern kingdom the content in this book may be outlined as follows:

1. Jeroboam's dynasty (1 Ki. 12-15)
2. Dynasty of Baasha (1 Ki. 15-16)
3. Dynasty of Omri (1 Ki. 16-22 and 2 Ki. 1-9)
4. Jehu's dynasty (2 Ki. 10-15)
5. The last kings (2 Ki. 16-17)

An analysis of the content of the book of Kings offers an interesting study. Approximately one-fourth of this volume (1 Ki. 1-11) is devoted to the forty-year reign of Solomon. The remainder accounts for nineteen kings in the southern kingdom who ruled for 345 years and for nineteen kings who ruled for 210 years in the northern kingdom. Solomon's reign,

  2. God's judgment (11:9-43)

Solomon inherited the kingdom established by David through a successful policy of military expansion. Under David, Israel emerged as the strongest nation in the FERTILE CRESCENT, being respected by surrounding nations and unchallenged by any powers in either Egypt or Mesopotamia. Although David designated Solomon as his heir, Solomon's enthronement was challenged by Adonijah. With the blessing of Nathan the prophet and Zadok the priest, Solomon emerged as the sole ruler. In an attitude of humility and wholehearted devotion he prayed for divine wisdom to be granted to him in his responsibility as king of Israel. His administration is portrayed as reflecting the use of extraordinary wisdom.

Solomon built the temple that David had hoped to construct in Jerusalem. In seven years this was completed in all its beauty through the arrangements that had been made with Hiram the king of Tyre. Divine benediction on Solomon in this effort was apparent as the glory of God filled the temple. Solomon not only delivered the dedicatory sermon but also offered the dedicatory prayer. In this manner Solomon was divinely confirmed and recognized before his own nation as the ruler of God's people Israel, which enjoyed the acclaim as the strongest nation in the Fertile Crescent.

Brief is the information concerning the building of Solomon's palace, which was thirteen years in the process of building (1 Ki. 7:1-8). The fame of Solomon gained international attention. From the political, economic, and religious perspective, it appeared as though Israel had reached its zenith.

The conclusion to Solomon's reign is clearly delineated in 1 Ki. 11. Religiously Solomon was guilty of apostasy, having succumbed to idolatry. The foreign wives Solomon brought to Jerusalem erected shrines to their gods in the environs of the Holy City. Tolerant of their idolatry, Solomon broke the first commandment—the covenant relationship of wholehearted love toward God. Because of this, God permitted adversaries to rise in power in various parts of Solomon's kingdom. When Solomon died these rulers asserted themselves so that the Davidic throne was acknowledged only by the little area known as the southern kingdom or the kingdom of Judah. Besides the rebellion of the ten tribes under Jeroboam, there emerged strong rulers in Syria, Egypt, and other areas.

The first two centuries of the divided kingdom era are portrayed in 1 Ki. 12 through 2 Ki. 17. Due to the extensive accounts of the ministries of Elijah and Elisha, it seems that the author of this book allots more consideration to the northern kingdom than he does to the Davidic dynasty in the S. For an analysis of this part of the book of Kings as it relates to each of the kings, note the following:

Rehoboam (1 Ki. 12:1–24)	Jeroboam (1 Ki. 12:25—14:20)

Ahaz (2 Ki. 16:1–20)	Hoshea (2 Ki. 17:1–41)

Among the kings listed above, there seem to be no God-fearing kings in the northern kingdom, which succumbed to the Assyrian advance in 722 B.C. The southern kingdom survived the era of Assyrian supremacy and continued to be ruled by the Davidic dynasty down to Babylonian times.

Jeroboam established the northern kingdom after the death of Solomon. Although Nadab succeeded his father on the throne for one year, this dynasty was exterminated after a twenty-three-year rule (931-909). The dynasty of Baasha was in power for approximately the same number of years and also was abruptly terminated when his son Elah was killed in 885.

While these two dynasties were ruling Israel, there was continual tension and warfare in their relations with Judah. Religiously both dynasties were committed to idolatry and ignored the warnings of the prophets who spoke of impending judgment. Militarily the northern kingdom was weak. When a religious revival in Jerusalem attracted people from the N, Baasha began to fortify Ramah, which was located 5 mi. N of Jerusalem, in order to keep his people from moving S. King Asa countered this aggressive military act by bribing Ben-Hadad, the Aramean king who captured numerous cities from the Israelites in the far N.

With the accession of Omri to the throne of Israel in 885 B.C. there came a reversal in international relations. Omri established policies of friendship with the surrounding nations. Often these were sealed by intermarriages of the royal families. Such was the case when his son Ahab married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal the king of Tyre. Trade between Israel and Phoenicia, which had commercial contacts throughout the Mediterranean world, was mutually advantageous for both. Friendly relations with Judah were sealed in the marriage of Ahab's daughter Athaliah to Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat.

Although Omri's reign was relatively short, he established Israel as a powerful kingdom. Economically his policies brought prosperity. It was under his leadership that the city of Samaria was built and fortified as the capital city of Israel. Religiously, however, the leadership of the Omride dynasty left much to be desired. Not only had Israel departed from serving God, but under Ahab and Jezebel idolatry was promoted in Israel in an unprecedented manner by the erection of a Baal temple in Samaria. It was this nationalistic devotion to Baalism supported by hundreds of priests that the prophet Elijah was commissioned to challenge. As God's representative, Elijah confronted Ahab and made Israel conscious of the fact that they should serve God. The ministry of Elijah through his messages and miracles countered the royal family in their idolatry and gave the Godfearing people an opportunity to respond to God's concern for them. In spite of Elijah's warnings the Omride family continued in their God-defiant ways and were divinely judged in accordance with the prophet's predictions. Elijah was joined by Elisha, who continued as an effective prophet under the Jehu dynasty down to the turn of the century.

Jehu, who served as an army captain in Israel, usurped the throne and exterminated the Omride dynasty, killing Joram king of Israel, Ahaziah king of Judah, and Jezebel in 841. Jehu's dynasty continued in power for nearly a century down to 753. Because of such a drastic revolution, the policies of Israel were affected radically. The suppression of Baalism, which had been introduced from Phoenicia, must have abruptly affected Israel economically. With Athaliah seizing the throne in Judah, it is unlikely that friendship prevailed southward after Jehu shed so much royal blood in Samaria. About this time Hazael was enthroned in Damascus and he extended his military aggression southward, taking Israelite territory and at times threatening the city of Jerusalem. In addition Jehu faced the threat of an Assyrian invasion. To avoid this, Jehu sent tribute to Shalmaneser III, which the Assyrian king noted on the famous Black Obelisk. Although Jehu, who ruled down to 814, was unable to establish a strong kingdom, he maintained Israel's independent status.

After 800 B.C., Israel emerged gradually under Jeroboam II as the strongest nation in Palestine. He regained the territory previously lost to the Arameans, recovered international trade, and fortified the city of Samaria. Israel's political and economic prosperity was exceeded in history only by that of the Solomonic era.

Religiously the reign of Jeroboam was marked by idolatry and by indifference to the fact that the Israelites were God's chosen people who were to maintain a covenant relationship with him. The economic success and the religious lethargy of the Israelites during this time of prosperity are vividly portrayed in the messages of Hosea and Amos. Both of these prophets warned their people of God's judgment awaiting them, but apparently there was little response.

After the death of Jeroboam in 753, the kingdom disintegrated rapidly, weakened by internal strife and threatened by an Assyrian advance into Palestine. Under a pro-Assyrian policy, Menahem paid tribute to Tiglath-Pileser III, who ascended the Assyrian throne in 745, but in 736 Pekah adopted an anti-Assyrian policy when he formed an alliance with Rezin in Damascus for the purpose of resisting the Assyrian advance. In 732 Rezin was killed as the Assyrians occupied Damascus, and Pekah was replaced by Hoshea, who became a tributary vassal of Tiglath-Pileser. Hoshea's rebellion in 725 precipitated the conquest of Samaria in 722, whereby the northern kingdom was terminated and reduced to a provincial status in the great Assyrian kingdom.

Explicitly the account in 2 Ki. 18 delineates the reasons for the termination of the northern kingdom. When Jeroboam I established the Israelite throne in 931, he was assured by the prophet Ahijah that his kingdom would be established and endure if he would exemplify a wholehearted devotion to God. Neither he nor any of his successors did so. Prophet after prophet was ignored. Divine judgment came because they had disregarded the law of Moses under whom the covenant was established and the prophets whom God had sent to warn and admonish them.

The southern kingdom by contrast had occasional periods of revival as they continued to be ruled by the dynasty of David. When Rehoboam began his reign in 931, limited to a small fraction of the Solomonic kingdom, he was also faced by an invasion by Shishak the king of Egypt. Tension with the northern kingdom and idolatry characterized the reigns of Rehoboam and Abijam.

Asa and Jehoshaphat led in one of the great revival movements in Judah by enlisting the support of priests and prophets. Both kings, however, were severely rebuked for their alliances with ungodly kings. The marriage of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son, to Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, brought well-nigh disastrous results. Jehoshaphat narrowly escaped with his life when he joined Ahab in battle against Syria. Jehoram and Athaliah promoted bloodshed and idolatry, and after Ahaziah their son was killed in the Jehu revolution, Athaliah promoted a bloody purge in Jerusalem that almost exterminated the Davidic dynasty as she began her reign of terror.

Under the leadership of the priest Jehoiada, Queen Athaliah was executed. Weakened by internal problems and foreign pressure in the following decades, Judah did not emerge as a strong power in Palestine until the reign of Uzziah. During the time of Jeroboam's reign in the N, Uzziah developed policies that strengthened Judah internally. After Jeroboam's death Uzziah headed Palestinian coalitions attempting to stop the advance of Tiglath-Pileser III southward in 742.

When Uzziah died in 740, Jotham attempted to maintain an anti-Assyrian policy. Internal pressure brought Ahaz to the Davidic throne while Jotham was still living, reversing this policy. Ignoring Isaiah's advice, Ahaz made an alliance with Tiglath-Pileser and introduced Assyrian cult worship into Jerusalem in the environs of the temple. Judah, however, warded off occupation by Assyria while the northern kingdom capitulated to the Assyrians.

The rest of the book of Kings continues to narrate the developments in the kingdom of Judah. The content of 2 Ki. 18-25 as related to each of the kings may be divided as follows:

Hezekiah (2 Ki. 18:1—20:21)

Manasseh (21:1-18)

Amon (21:19-26)

Josiah (22:1—23:30)

Jehoahaz (Shallum) (23:31-34)

Jehoiakim (Eliakim) (23:35—24:7)

Jehoiachin (Jeconiah) (24:8-17)

Zedekiah (Mattaniah) (24:18—25:7)

Exile (25:8-30)

Hezekiah led in a very effective reform movement countering the idolatrous trends introduced by his father Ahaz. Anticipating the renewal of Assyrian aggression, Hezekiah fortified Jerusalem and prepared for enduring a siege of Jerusalem by building the Siloam tunnel. Assured by Isaiah during this crucial period, Hezekiah survived the Assyrian threats made by Sennacherib. During this period Hezekiah was also personally restored to health and his life was miraculously extended. Isaiah, the great prophet who had announced God's impending judgment upon Jerusalem, assured him that this judgment would be postponed and that ultimately the Babylonians—not the Assyrians—would take the Jews into captivity.

Under Manasseh the people of Judah reverted to gross idolatry. Even though Manasseh was temporarily taken captive, he was restored to his throne so that the dynastic rule of the Davidic line continued. Amon his son ruled only two years before he was murdered.

When Josiah at the age of eight came to the throne in 640 B.C., the Assyrian power, which had in the meantime extended down to Thebes in Egypt, began to diminish. Under his reign Judah not only was relatively free from Assyrian pressure, but Josiah also had the opportunity to lead effectively in an extensive religious reform. Politically and religiously, optimism prevailed under the leadership of this youthful aggressive king in Judah.

Sudden changes took place in 609. When Josiah suddenly rushed his army to Megiddo to stop the Egyptians from marching N to aid the Assyrians, he was killed. Subsequently the Egyptians enthroned Jehoiakim in Jerusalem as a tributary vassal. By 605 the Babylonians, who had previously routed the Assyrians, defeated the Egyptians and exacted royal hostages from Jerusalem as a token of Jehoiakim's subservience. In 597 the Babylonians took thousands of Jews into exile, including their king, Jehoiachin. Following Zedekiah's rebellion, the city of Jerusalem was destroyed and the temple was reduced to ruins by the Babylonians as the kingdom of Judah was terminated. Although the Israelites were in exile, the final notation in this book indicates that Jehoiachin was released from prison by Evil-Merodach, the king of Babylon.

IX. Theology. The book of Kings does not merely narrate the history of the Hebrew kingdoms. Throughout this account there is apparent a definite theological viewpoint that is in harmony with the Mosaic revelation and the prophets who followed Moses from generation to generation.

The religious achievement of each of the kings seems to be more important than their political success. Omri and Jeroboam II, the two kings who achieved the greatest measure of success in bringing political and economic prosperity to the northern kingdom, are allotted a very brief account in this record. Ahab and his sons were given extended coverage, but this is primarily related to the ministry of Elijah, Elisha, and other prophets who represented Israel's true religion in contrast to the idolatrous religion promoted by the kings. Other kings, such as Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah, are given much prominence since they led in reform movements guiding their people back into a right relationship with God. Although the account in the book of Kings offers a continuous history of the Hebrew kings, the reader always is conscious of the fact that this is a religious history with a definite theological perspective.

The theological viewpoint throughout is in harmony with the book of Deuteronomy. It may be identified as Deuteronomistic without adopting the reconstructed view of Israel's history based on the theory of the documents. Taken in its historical setting, the book of Deuteronomy summarizes the essence of God's revelation to Israel through Moses. God had chosen and redeemed Israel and entered into a relationship with the people in which mutual love should prevail. Exclusive devotion to God was the duty of the Israelites, and idolatry was a certain sign that this relationship did not prevail. All the evils within the nations were signs that this relationship had been broken. Throughout the account in the book of Kings, this criterion is applied to the leaders of the Hebrew people.

When David commissioned Solomon as king of Israel, the law of Moses was set before the new ruler and the elders as the standard to which they should adhere if they desired success and prosperity (1 Ki. 2:3). Extensive is the account of the building and dedication of the temple in which God was to be worshiped. When Solomon himself became tolerant of idolatry brought into the environs of Jerusalem by his foreign wives, the author explicitly narrates Solomon's failure. The disruption of the great Davidic and Solomonic kingdom came by divine permission because of the apostasy of Solomon. Kings in succeeding generations are repeatedly judged because of their failure to serve God in accordance with the law. In the northern kingdom dynasty after dynasty was exterminated because of their gross idolatry. Although the Davidic dynasty continued in power throughout the centuries of the existence of the southern kingdom because of David's devotion to God, the kings who were idolatrous are judged by the Deuteronomic standard.

The prophets and their messages were crucially important. They were spokesmen for God and were identified as true prophets if they were in harmony with the law of Moses. Any prophet who advocated or tolerated idolatry was a false prophet. Prophets who endorsed the law of Moses and were confirmed by signs and miracles were to be accorded the same recognition as the Deuteronomic revelation. The author of Kings distinctly points out that both Hebrew kingdoms as well as individual kings were judged and subjected to captivity because they failed to conform to the divine instructions given through Moses and the prophets.

Israel's history, according to the author of the book of Kings, is under the control of God who directs the affairs of the Hebrew people throughout. When the kings and their people failed to heed the warnings of the prophets, judgment followed. When they listened to the prophets and turned to God in an attitude of repentance and obedience, then the impending judgment was postponed. Ultimately, however, national judgment came in accordance with the principles delineated by Moses in his final messages to the new generation of Israelites, who were about to occupy the land of Palestine.

Theologically the book of Kings complements and continues the history of Israel, which begins with the Mosaic revelation and its background in the Pentateuch. The books of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel with the book of Kings provide a continuous record of the Israelites as God's chosen people from Moses to the Babylonian exile.

king's dale. See KING'S VALLEY.

king's garden. When the Babylonians laid siege to JERUSALEM and broke through the city wall, King ZEDEKIAH and his army fled, leaving "the city at night by way of the king's garden, through the gate between the two walls" (Jer. 39:4; cf. 52:7 and 2 Ki. 25:4). This garden may have been watered by the overflow from the Pool of SILOAM, near which it was located (Neh. 3:15). JOSEPHUS (Ant. 9.10.4 §225) speaks of "the royal gardens" as being near Eroge (EN ROGEL).

King's Gate. The name of a gate on the eastern side of the TEMPLE where a certain Shallum, chief of a group of postexilic gatekeepers, was stationed (1 Chr. 9:17-18; prob. the whole group was stationed there). See SHALLUM #8. Nothing else is known about this gate.

king's highway. (Often capitalized.) An important road running N and S from DAMASCUS to the Gulf of AQABAH, E of the DEAD SEA and the JORDAN Valley. Direct reference is made to the king's highway (derek hammelek) in the book of Numbers. MOSES requested permission to use this route for passing through the territory of EDOM (Num. 20:17; called simply mēsillâ H5019, "highway, main road," in v. 19) and of the AMORITE king SIHON (21:22; cf. Deut. 2:27), promising to keep strictly to the highway. It was one of the essential caravan routes in international commerce. It ran through BASHAN (cf. Num. 21:33), GILEAD, AMMON, MOAB, and Edom, and connected with roads across the NEGEV leading into Egypt.

This route of travel is known to have existed well before 2000 B.C., for a number of Bronze Age fortresses have been discovered along its line. The invasion of KEDORLAOMER and his allies apparently followed it (Gen. 14:5-6); control of this road probably lay behind the invasion. Fortifications at strategic points guarded the road when the Edomites and Ammonites objected to Israel's use of the highway. During SOLOMON'S reign it was an important trade link between EZION GEBER, Judah, and Damascus. In the 2nd cent. A.D. the Romans under TRAJAN incorporated it in their important highway across TRANSJORDAN. The modern auto road follows the old track. (See N. Glueck, The Other Side of the Jordan, rev. ed. [1970], ch. 1; J. A. Thompson, Archaeology and the Old Testament [1957], 57-58; Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 54-57.)

King's Pool. A reservoir in JERUSALEM located near the FOUNTAIN GATE (Neh. 2:14). It is thought to be an alternate designation for the Pool of SILOAM, built by King HEZEKIAH.

King's Valley. KJV “king's dale.” A broad valley in which the king of S ODOM met ABRAHAM (Gen. 14:17). Identical with the Valley of SHAVEH, it was evidently near SALEM, the city of which MELCHIZEDEK was king. Here too ABSALOM set up a pillar or monument (2 Sam. 18:18). The location is uncertain. A monument known as Absalom's Tomb (no earlier than the Hellenistic period) stands just E of JERUSALEM, but the site can hardly be called a valley. Some scholars place the King's Valley to the S of the city, at the juncture of the HINNON and KIDRON Valleys (M. C. Astour [“Shaveh, Valley of,” in ABD, 5:168] argues that it can be “definitely” located here, but not all would agree).

Kinnereth kin'uh-reth (כְּנֶרֶת H4055, perhaps “lyre”; sometimes in the pl. forms כְּנֵרוֹת H4054 [Josh. 11:2] and כְּנָרוֹת H4054 [12:3; 1 Ki. 15:20]). Also Chinnereth. (1) A fortified town within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:35), identified with modern Khirbet el-(Oreimeh, on the NW shore of the Sea of GALILEE. The name is included among the cities listed by THUTMOSE III (Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 160). When BENHADAD invaded Israel, “all Kinnereth” was one of the places he conquered (1 Ki. 15:20; KJV, “Cinneroth”; NRSV, “Chinneroth”). The small plain in that area is referred to as GENNESARET in the NT (Matt. 14:34; Mk. 6:53). (See ABD, 1:909-200; NEAEHL, 3:872-73.)

(2) The Sea of Kinnereth is an old name applied to the Sea of Galilee (Num. 34:11; Josh. 12:3 [KJV, NRSV, “Chinneroth”]; 13:27). In two passages (Deut. 3:17; Josh. 11:2 [KJV, NRSV, “Chinneroth”]), the name Kinnereth may be an abbreviation for Sea of Kinnereth; otherwise, it refers to the town that gave the lake its name (see above, #1) or to the general area. Some have speculated that the name (if it is related to kinnôr H4036, “lyre, harp”) may be derived from the shape of the lake itself or from the likelihood that shepherds played lyres in that area. See also GALILEE, SEA OF.

The king's highway.

Kios ki'os (Xίος G5944). Also Chios, Khios. A large island in the AEGEAN SEA, about 30 mi. long N to S and varying in width from 8 to 10 mi. It is separated from the coast of ASIA MINOR by a narrow channel. At its narrowest the channel is 5 mi. wide and contains a number of small islands. The island is generally rocky and unproductive, but its wines and gum mastic have been a source of trade in ancient and modern times.

Kios was the reputed home of the poet Homer and had a distinguished literary and artistic tradition. Its inhabitants were called the richest of the Greeks in the 5th cent. B.C. Later it became nominally a part of the Roman province of ASIA, but Kios, the chief city of the island on the E coast, was a free port (until VESPASIAN suspended its rights). Thus it was generally administered in accordance with local rather than Roman law. HEROD the Great, while being delayed by weather on the island, gave to the city a considerable amount of money to restore its large portico (Jos. Ant. 16.2.2 §§18-19).

The ship on which PAUL sailed from TROAS to PATARA passed through the channel between Kios and the mainland before turning SE toward SAMOS (Acts 20:15).

Kir kīhr' (כִּיר H7817, "wall"). (1) The place to which TIGLATH-PILESER, king of ASSYRIA, carried the captives of DAMASCUS (2 Ki. 16:9). AMOS had prophesied that this would happen (Amos 1:5).

Apparently Kir (or Qir) had been the place of origin of the Arameans in their ancient history (see ARAM), and their departure from Kir is compared in Scripture to God's bringing the Israelites from Egypt and the PHILISTINES from Caphtor (Crete; Amos 9:7). Kir is also mentioned, together with ELAM, in connection with the Valley of Vision in Isa. 22:6 (though some have doubted that this is the same place). Although several identifications have been proposed (cf. ABD, 4:83), the location of Kir is not known; it was probably in the area of the TIGRIS River in S Babylonia. (2) A Moabite city mentioned in parallel with AR (Isa. 15:1). Often referred to as Kir of MOAB, this city is probably the same as KIR HARESETH.

J. B. SCOTT

Kirama kuh-ray'muh (Κίραμας). Apoc. form of RAMAH #3 (1 Esd. 5:20; KJV, "Cirama").

Kir-haraseth. KJV form of KIR HARESETH.

Kir Hareseth kihr-hair'uh-seth (קִיר הַרְשֵׁת H7819 [2 Ki. 3:25; Isa. 16:11], קִיר־הַרְשֵׁת H7818 [Isa. 16:7; Jer. 48:31, 36], "wall of pottery"). Also Kir-haraseth, Kir-haresh, Kir-heres. An important city in MOAB, apparently its capital at the time of King MESHACH. When Mesha rebelled against King Joram of Israel (see JEHORAM #2), JEHOSHAPHAT king of Judah and the king of EDOM joined Israel in attacking the Moabites (2 Ki. 3:4-9). The allied forces ran out of water and were in danger of being defeated, but after the prophet ELISHA performed a miracle, they successfully invaded Moab and destroyed its towns. "Only Kir Hareseth was left with its stones in place, but men armed with slings surrounded it and attacked it as well" (v. 25). Unable to take the city, the Israelites retreated (v. 27, though the meaning of this verse is debated), and Mesha boasted of having conquered the king of Israel (in the MOABITE STONE; see ANET, 320-21).

Years later Isaiah, in his oracles against Moab, prophesied that Kir (prob. a reference to Kir Hareseth) would again be ruined (Isa. 15:1) and that the Moabites would grieve for the RAISIN CAKES of the city (16:7), possibly referring to the destruction of the vineyards or perhaps using a wordplay on the similar-sounding word for "men" (cf. NIV and note the parallel in Jer. 48:31, 36). Isaiah himself lamented deeply for Kir Hareseth (Isa. 16:11; KJV, "Kir-haresh"; NRSV, "Kir-heres").

Kir Hareseth is to be identified with el-Kerak, some 10 mi. E of the S part of the Dead Sea. From ancient times it was a place of great importance in that area. It was a strategic site, easily defensible, being on a high place, with the sides of the mountain sloping steeply all around it. The city, located on the famous KING'S HIGHWAY from SYRIA to EGYPT, dominated the ancient caravan routes and was recognized by the Crusaders as a significant site. It towers about 3,690 ft. above sea level and was walled on all sides. The only problem with this location was water, for the springs were all outside the city. (See D. Baly, The Geography of the Bible [1957], 31, 87, 92, 118, 238; J. Simons, The Geographical and Topographical Text of the Old Testament [1959], 64-65, 265, 361, 435.) J. B. SCOTT

Kir-haresh, Kir-heres. See KIR HARESETH.

Kiriath kihr'ee-ath (קִרְיַת H7956, "city"). KJV Kirjath. A town within the tribal territory of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:28). See KIRIATH JEARIM.

Kiriathaim kihr'ee-uh-thay'im (קִרְיָתַיִם H7964, “[twin] cities”). KJV also Kirjathaim. (1) A city built by the tribe of REUBEN in their territory (Num. 32:37; Josh. 13:19). Later it fell into the hands of MOAB, who rebuilt it (as recorded in the MOABITE STONE; see ANET, 320, “Qaryaten”), and was condemned to judgment by God (Jer. 48:1, 23; Ezek. 25:9). It is possibly to be identified with Qaryat el-Mekhaiyet, about 9 mi. E of the Dead Sea and the same distance N of the ARNON River.

(2) A town within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI, assigned to the Levites descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:76). See KARTAN.

J. B. SCOTT

Kiriath Arba kihr'ee-ath-ahr'buh (קִרְיַת אַרְבֶּעַ H7957, also קִרְיַת הָאַרְבַּע H7959 [Gen. 35:27; Neh. 11:25], “city of Arba” or “fourfold city”). KJV also Kirjath-arba. Ancient name of HEBRON, used again after the EXILE. It first appears in the patriarchal narratives as the place where ABRAHAM and ISAAC stayed and where SARAH died (Gen. 23:2; 35:27). It also occurs several times in Joshua, as well as in Jdg. 1:10 and Neh. 11:25. In all these references except the last, Kiriath Arba is expressly identified as Hebron. Because the name appears to mean “city of four,” some have speculated that the city originally was a tetropolis (a league of four towns), or was divided into quarters, or was identified either with four giants (Anakites) or with four clans descended from CALEB (cf. Josh. 14:13 with 1 Chr. 2:18-19; see HALOT, 3:1142). In several passages, however, the name is associated with a certain ARBA, said to be the ancestor of the Anakites (Josh. 14:15; 15:13; 21:11; see ANAK). One cannot rule out the possibility that the name refers to a pagan deity (cf. C. F. Burney, The Book of Judges, with Introduction and Notes [1903], 43-44) or that there is a play on words.

Kiriatharim kihr'ee-ath-air'im. NRSV form of KIRIATH JEARIM (Ezra 2:25 [KJV, “Kirjath-arim”]; 1 Esd. 5:19 [KJV, “Kiriatharius”]).

Kiriath Baal kihr'ee-ath-bay'uhl (קִרְיַת בַּעַל H7958, “city of the lord”). KJV Kirjath-baal. Older name of KIRIATH JEARIM (Josh. 15:50; 18:14).

Kiriath Huzoth kihr'ee-ath-hyoo'zoth (קִרְיַת חֲצוֹת H7960, “city of streets” or “city of open spaces”). KJV, Kirjath-huzoth. A Moabite city where B ALAK and BALAAM went on their way to BAMOTH BAAL (Num. 22:39; LXX, poleis epauleōn, “cities of courtyards”). Its location is unknown, but it was probably not far from DIBON #2.

Kiriatharius kihr'ee-ath-ee-air'ee-uhs. KJV Apoc. form of KIRIATH JEARIM (1 Esd. 5:19).

Kiriath Jearim kihr'ee-ath-jee'uh-rim (קִרְיַת יַעֲרִים H7961 [קִרְיַת יַעֲרִים in Ezra 2:25, prob. by scribal mistake; cf. Neh. 7:29], “city of forests”). KJV Kirjath-jearim (in Ezra 2:25, Kirjatharim). A city of the Gibeonites (see GIBEON) that was later on the border between the tribes of JUDAH and BENJAMIN. It was evidently the site of a pre-Israelite shrine to BAAL, as indicated by its alternate names in the Bible: KIRIATH BAAL (Josh. 15:60; 18:14), BAALAH (Josh. 15:9), and BAALE OF JUDAH (2 Sam. 6:2; cf. 1 Chr. 13:6; the LXX rejected this reading in both passages).

I. Identification. E. Robinson (Biblical Researches in Palestine, 2nd ed. [1856], 2:11-12) observed that the ancient name probably was preserved in Qaryat el-(Inab (Arabic, “city of the grapes”), a town about 8.5 mi. WNW of Jerusalem. The identification with Kiriath Jearim is confirmed by Eutychius, Patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 877-940), who says in his Annals that from BETH SHEMESH, the ARK OF THE COVENANT was taken by “the inhabitants of a village known as Qaryet el-Inab” (ed. L. Cheikho, Corpus scriptorum christianorum orientalium, Scriptores arabici, Ser. III, 6:43). The local Arab villagers used to call it simply Qaryeh, but the town is widely known as Abu Ghosh, being so named after famous sheiks of the 18th and 19th centuries who maintained hegemony over the highway between Jerusalem and the coast.

Though remains of the Roman and Crusader periods have been found in the village, the true site of the biblical period is the imposing mound upon which stands the Church of the Ark of the Covenant. This “tell” is known as Deir el-(Azar; some would see in this name an allusion to ELEAZAR son of ABINADAB, who was consecrated by the men of Kiriath Jearim to keep the ark (1 Sam. 7:1). Abundant sherds of the Late Bronze and Iron Ages are found on the slopes of the mound. (Archaeological investigation of the Abu Ghosh area has usually concentrated on the Roman-Byzantine and Crusader structures on the one hand, or on prehistoric settlements on the other.)

The commanding position of this site satisfies all the requirements of the ancient sources for Kiriath Jearim. EUSEBIUS said that Kariathiareim was about 10 Roman mi. from Jerusalem on the road to Lod (Lydda); later he corrected the distance to 9 mi. It stands between NEPHTOAH (Lifta) and KESALON (Kesla), which suits its position on the N border of Judah (Josh. 15:9; 18:15). It is almost directly S of KEPHIRAH (Tell Kefireh), which conforms to the boundary between Benjamin and Dan (Josh. 18:14). Critics of Robinson’s identification (e.g., C. R. Conder, HDB, 3:3; E. W. G. Masterman, ISBE [1929], 3:1812) made too much of JOSEPHUS’S statement (Ant. 6.1.4 §17) that Kiriath Jearim was a “neighboring” town to Beth Shemesh, in combination with the allusion to MAHANEH DAN on the W of it (Jdg. 18:12), since they assumed the latter to be restricted to an area between ZORAH (modern Sar(ah) and ESHTAOL (Ishwa() in accordance with Jdg. 13:25.

II. History. Kiriath Jearim was one of the four Gibeonite cities that made a covenant with the invading Israelites by deceiving them (Josh. 9:17). It served as a boundary marker between Judah and Benjamin (15:9; 18:14-15). One of the nearby heights apparently was known as Gibeah of Kiriath Jearim (1 Sam. 7:1; 2 Sam. 6:3, 4; ASV mg.), which probably is intended in Josh. 18:28 to mean that it belonged to Benjamin. The town of Kiriath Jearim was occupied by men of Judah (Jdg. 18:12). The “father” (prob. meaning “founder”) of Kiriath Jearim was SHOBAL, a descendant of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:50b, 52). Shobal’s descendants were the leading families of the town, namely, the Ithrites, the Puthites, the Shumathites, and the Mishraites, and some of their number moved down to settle in Zorah and Eshtaol (1 Chr. 2:53). In the administrative division of Judah, Kiriath Jearim and RABBAH comprised one small district (Josh. 15:60).

After the ark of the covenant had been returned by the Philistines to Beth Shemesh, it was transferred to Kiriath Jearim (1 Sam. 6:19—7:2); later it was brought by King DAVID to JERUSALEM (1 Sam. 6:1-15; 1 Chr. 13:5-14; 15:2-28; 2 Chr. 1:4). The BAALATH fortified by SOLOMON (1 Ki. 9:18; 2 Chr. 8:6; cf. Jos. Ant. 8.6.1 §152) was possibly Kiriath Jearim, which would provide an important link between GEZER and BETH HORON on the one hand and Jerusalem on the other. During the invasion by Pharaoh SHISHAK (1 Ki. 14:25-26; 2 Chr. 12:1-9), the Egyptian army apparently began its attack by taking Gezer, after which it advanced inland toward Jerusalem, taking Beth Horon and Rabbah on the way. Kiriath Jearim may have fallen before them (if the reading qdtm of no. 25 in Shishak’s list can be understood as an error for qrtm; r and d are quite similar in the Egyptian hieratic script from which the hieroglyphs were probably copied).

During the reign of JEHOIAKIM, a prophet named URIAH son of Shemaliah from Kiriath Jearim spoke out against the regime and was forced to flee to Egypt for fear of the authorities. From thence he was extradited and put to death (Jer. 26:20-23). Some of the citizens from Kiriath Jearim returned from the Babylonian captivity with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:25 [KJV, “Kirjath-arim”; NRSV, “Kiriatharim”]; Neh. 7:29; 1 Esd. 5:19 [KJV, “Kiriatharius”; NRSV, “Kiriatharim”]). The supposed reference to this town in Ps. 132:6 (šēdē-yā‘ar, “the fields of JAAR”) is doubtful. (See further C. R. Conder and H. H. Kitchener, The Survey of Western Palestine: Memoirs [1881-83], 3:43-52; F. D. Cooke in AASOR 5 [for 1923-24]: 105-120; Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 253-56, 326, 348-51; Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 133-34, 347-48, 394-95.)

Kiriath Sannah kahr’ee-ath-san’uh (קִרְיַת סְנָה H7962, “city of Sannah” [?]). Alternate name of Debir (Josh. 15:49). Possibly a textual corruption for qiryatsōpēr (“city of the scribe[s]”; cf. LXX, polis grammatōn). See DEBIR (PLACE) #1; KIRIATH SEPHER.

Kiriath Sepher kahr’ee-ath-see’fuhr (קִרְיַת סֵפֶר H7963, “city of book[s]”). Earlier name of Debir (Josh. 15:15-16; Jdg. 1:11-12). The SEPTUAGINT renders with polis grammatōn (or polis tōn grammatōn, “city of [the] scribes”), apparently reading qiryatsōpēr. See DEBIR (PLACE) #1; KIRIATH SANNAH.

Kirjath kahr’jath. KJV form of KIRIATH. See also KIRIATHAIM; KIRIATH ARBA; etc.

Kish kish (קִישׁ H7821, possibly “gift”). (1) Son (or grandson) of ABIEL, descendant of BENJAMIN, and father of SAUL, who was the first king of Israel. In 1 Sam. 9:1, Kish is identified as the son of Abiel, but in 1 Chr. 8:33 and 9:39, Kish is listed as the son of NER. Since ABNER (commander of Saul’s army) also is listed as the son of Ner in 1 Sam. 14:50, Abner and Kish would be brothers and, consequently, Abner would be the uncle of Saul. In the Hebrew of 14:50, however, the referent of “Saul’s uncle” is ambiguous, and v. 51 can be understood to mean that both Ner and Kish were sons of Abiel (cf. NIV). In that case, Ner would be the uncle of Saul (cf. v. 50 NIV), and Saul and Abner would be cousins. This view necessitates either the altering of the text of 1 Chr. 8:33 and 9:39 or understanding Ner in those verses as a different individual, namely, a more remote ancestor of Kish.

At any rate, Kish was a wealthy man (1 Sam. 9:1). One day his donkeys went astray, and Saul was sent to find them (9:3); it was through this incident that Saul met SAMUEL and was anointed by him the first king of Israel (10:1). Kish was buried in Zela in the land of Benjamin (2 Sam. 21:14). He is mentioned once in the NT (Acts 13:21) in PAUL’S sermon at ANTIOCH OF PISIDIA.

(2) Son of JEIEL of GIBEON and descendant of Benjamin (1 Chr. 8:30; 9:36). Many believe that Jeiel is to be identified with ABIEL; if so, this Kish is the same as #1 above.

(3) Son of Mahli and descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 23:21-22). His sons married his brother’s daughters. One of his sons was named Jerahmeel (24:29).

(4) Son of Abdi and descendant of LEVI through MERARI; he lived in the days of King HEZEKIAH and, as one of the priests, was chosen to cleanse the house of the Lord (2 Chr. 29:12).

(5) Ancestor of MORDECAI, the cousin of ESTHER, and descendant of Benjamin (Esth. 2:5). He was among those exiled from Jerusalem by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (v. 6).

Kishi kish’i (קִישִׁי H7823, perhaps “gift”). Son of Abdi, descendant of LEVI through MERARI, and father of the musician ETHAN (1 Chr. 6:44; called KUSHAIAH in 15:17).

Kishion kish’ee-uh (קִישִׁיֹן H8002, meaning uncertain). A town within the tribal territory of ISSACHAR (Josh. 19:20), assigned to the Levites descended from GERSHON (21:28; KJV, “Kishon”). Proposed identifications include Tell el-Muqarqash, about 4 mi. SE of Mount TABOR, and El-Khirba (Khirbet Qasyun, Tel Qishyon), near the S slope of the same mountain (ABD, 4:88-89; cf. NEAEHL, 3:873-74). See also KEDESH #3.

Kishon River ki’shon (קִישֶׁן H7822, meaning unknown). A WADI that drains the ESDRAELON Valley E to NW; it is mentioned in connection with DEBORAH (Jdg. 4:7, 13; 5:21; Ps. 83:9) and ELIJAH (1 Ki. 18:40). (Note also that the KJV uses “Kishon” once as an alternate form of KISHION [Josh. 21:28].)

I. Physical description. The total length of the Kishon River (Nahr el-Muqatta<sup>6</sup>) is only about 25 mi. Its source is S and E of modern Jenin, in the northern hills of SAMARIA, though it does not succeed in draining the Plain of DOTHAN. From Jenin to the narrow gap at Tell el-Qassis (“The Mound of the Priest,” below the traditional location of the contest between Elijah and the priests of Baal) the stream fall amounts to c. 250 ft. Along its course, which roughly parallels the trend of the Carmel ridge (see CARMEL, MOUNT), several tributaries join the main stream. Drainage from one of them reaches it just N of Jenin, and another one a mile or so W of<sup>6</sup>Affuleh.

Springs along the Carmel front form a trellis-type drainage pattern, and a number of small tributaries from the Galilean hills to the N are to be noted, as well as several reaching it along its course across the Plain of Acco to the sea. The Wadi el-Melek drains much of SW Galilee, including the Plain of Asochis, and the heavier precipitation in this area makes the Kishon a perennial stream in this coastal portion. Crocodiles were reported there in ancient times. The heavy run-off in connection with the spring rains, combined with a flat marshy topography in the Esdraelon (Jezreel) Valley, made this river a substantial geographical barrier to travel and military activity for a part of the year, though it shrinks to a mere brook, sometimes dry, in the later seasons. Intensive recent land reclamation in this area has changed the drainage pattern considerably.

II. Historical events. The Kishon River is probably alluded to in connection with the important towns near its course, such as JOKNEAM (Josh. 19:11), TAANACH, and MEGIDDO (Jdg. 5:19). The river was crossed by the principal caravan routes, and became witness to numerous military movements and engagements, including war with the Midianites and with the Philistines; the slaying of King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:29); as well as campaigns during Hasmonean, Roman, Crusader, and later times.

The Kishon River meanders down the Jezreel Valley towards Mount Carmel. (View to the W.)

A principal OT event is the battle between the Canaanites, under the leadership of SISERA, and the Israelites, under the direction of BARAK and DEBORAH, with the defeat of the former, in spite of their greatly superior chariot-equipped forces. There are conflicting opinions as to where along the Kishon the battle was fought. Sisera's army was encamped at HAROSHETH HAGGOYIM (Jdg. 4:7, 13), and Barak's men were rallied at Mount TABOR. The usual view has been that the principal fighting occurred toward the western part of the Esdraelon, and it is stated that Sisera's army, panicking when their chariots bogged down as the result of heavy rains and flooding of the marshes, fled in the direction of Harosheth Haggoyim and their camp. The river is referred to in the Song of Deborah as the "waters of Megiddo, at Taanach" (Jdg. 5:19), and a psalmist cites it as an exemplary victory over the enemies of God's people (Ps. 83:9).

William F. Albright (The Archaeology of Palestine [1960], 117-18) considered these references, with their general omission of Megiddo, to support an archaeological gap in the occupation of this city and the alternate vitality of Taanach. Yohanan Aharoni (The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 221-25) places the battle near Mount Tabor, which lies between the Kishon River and his designation of Harosheth Haggoyim as a general term describing the highlands of Galilee to the N and E of Mount Tabor. He regards the reference to the “kings of Canaan” (Jdg. 5:19) as descriptive of the participants involved in JOSHUA’S defeat of the HAZOR confederacy at nearby MEROM.

Another exciting drama was concluded at the Brook Kishon in connection with the contest between the prophets of BAAL and ELIJAH (1 Ki. 18:40). The defeated priests of Baal were taken to the Kishon, and there massacred. The reason for choosing this river location may have been the ritual cleansing provided by the water.

M. H. HEICKSEN

Kislev kis’lev (כסליו H4075, from Akk. kislimu [kisliwu]). Also Chislev; KJV Chisleu. The ninth month (before the winter solstice) in the Hebrew CALENDAR, corresponding to November-December (Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:1; Gk. Chaseleu, 1 Macc. 1:54 et al. [KJV, “Casleu”]).

J. LILLEY

Kislon kis’lon (כסלון H4077, possibly “sluggish”). Father of ELDAD; the latter was a Benjamite leader appointed to divide the land of Canaan among the tribes (Num. 34:21).

Kisloth Tabor kis’loth-tay’buhr (כסלת תבור H4079, meaning uncertain). Also Chisloth-tabor. A town mentioned in the description of the SE border of the tribe of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:12); probably the same as KESULLOTH in ISSACHAR (v. 18).

kiss. A caress or touch of the lips (to another person’s lips, cheek, beard, hands, or feet) in token of affection, greeting, or reverence. In Hebrew, the verb is nāšaq H5975 (Gen. 27:26 and frequently); the cognate noun nēšîqâ H5965 occurs only twice (Prov. 27:6; Cant. 1:2). In the NT, the Greek verb phileō G5797, which usually means “to love, have special affection for,” can also mean “to kiss” (Matt. 26:48 = Mk. 14:44 = Lk. 22:47), but the latter sense is normally conveyed by the compound kataphileō G2968 (Matt. 26:49 et al.), which the inspired writers employ with reference to several individuals: the sinful woman who kissed the feet of Jesus (Lk. 7:38; cf. Isa. 49:23); the prodigal son’s father (Lk. 15:20); and JUDAS ISCARIOT, who betrayed Christ by kissing him (Matt. 26:49; Mk. 14:45; cf. 2 Sam. 20:9). The cognate noun is philēma G5799 (Lk. 7:45a et al.). (See further NIDOTTE, 3:196-97; NIDNTT, 2:549.)

The kiss has been common in the E since patriarchal times as a gesture of practical affection or homage. It was implanted upon the cheek but rarely upon the lips. The romantic kiss of lovers (Cant. 1:2; 8:1) and the seductive kiss of harlots (Prov. 7:13) are rare in Scripture. Usually one member of a family kissed another: (1) a son his father (Gen. 27:26, 27; 50:1), or parents (1 Ki. 19:20), or father-in-law (Exod. 18:7); (2) a father his son (2 Sam. 14:33), his children (Gen. 31:28, 55), or grandsons (48:10); (3) a man his brother (Gen. 33:4; 45:15; Exod. 4:27), cousin (Gen. 29:11), nephew (29:13), or friend (1 Sam. 20:41); (4) a woman her daughters-in-law (Ruth 1:9). Among the Arabs even today, women and children kiss their husbands and fathers upon the beard; and it is returned upon the forehead.

Kissing to show affectionate salutation was practiced between individuals of the same sex (Gen. 29:13; 33:4; 45:15; Exod. 4:27; 18:7), and sometimes between those of opposite sex (Gen. 29:11). It was also a farewell token both in life (Gen. 31:28, 55; Ruth 1:14; 1 Ki. 19:20; Acts 20:37) and at the approach of death (Gen. 50:1). Sometimes a kiss was the prelude to a solemn blessing (Gen. 27:26-27; 31:55; 2 Sam. 19:39). In addition, there was the ceremonial kiss; for example, SAMUEL kissed SAUL as he anointed him (1 Sam. 10:1). Kissing was used to show respect for idols (1 Ki. 19:18; Job 31:26, 27; Hos. 13:2); and even the ground was kissed to indicate total submission to the king (1 Sam. 24:8).

One dare not assume amorous overtones in the accounts of DAVID kissing JONATHAN (1 Sam. 20:41) or BARZILLAI (2 Sam. 19:39). ABSALOM kissed people hypocritically (15:5; cf. Prov. 27:6); JOAB kissed AMASA treacherously (2 Sam. 20:9); NAOMI kissed ORPAH and RUTH sincerely (Ruth 1:9). One poetic thought surviving from the rabbinic period is that MOSES died with the kiss of God upon his lips (Deut. Rab. 11). Raguel wept as he kissed TOBIT (Tob. 7:7); later he and his wife both kissed their daughter farewell (10:12). In Sir. 29:5, kissing the hand might be a beggar's gesture of cowering submission.

Early Christians adopted the holy kiss (or kiss of love) as a friendly salutation (Rom. 16:16; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; 1 Thess. 5:26; 1 Pet. 5:14; cf. Lk. 7:45). It was a sacred bond that united the body of Christ and was undoubtedly exchanged by members of both the same (cf. Apostolic Constitutions 2.57.12) and opposite sex (St. Ambrose, Hexaemeron 6.9.68; Tertullian, Ad uxorem 2.4).

It is difficult to establish the link between the kiss of love and the liturgical kiss of peace. The latter had an established place in public worship after the middle of the 2nd cent.: (1) neophytes were kissed after baptism; (2) penitents, when they were reconciled (cf. Lk. 15:20); (3) candidates for ordination; and even (4) the deceased. It was practiced most widely during the celebration of the EUCHARIST. Kissing the dead was prohibited by the Council of Auxerre (A.D. 578), perhaps on account of the prevalent abuse of either placing the Host in the mouth of the corpse, or burying it with him. The kiss of peace was observed in the W until the end of the Middle Ages. Apparently it was discontinued earlier in the E. In both E and W this custom was replaced by kissing the altar, etc. The practice of kissing relics in the W dates from perhaps the time kitchen. This English term is used by modern Bible versions to render the Hebrew phrase bet hamēbaššēlīm, lit., “house[s] of the ones who boil” (Ezek. 46:24). It refers to four subcourts at the corners of the outer court of EZEKIEL’S ideal TEMPLE where the common people could have their sacrifices boiled at the hearths provided for the purpose. The priests protected themselves from defilement through contact with unconsecrated persons by cooking their offerings in their own kitchens (vv. 19-20).

kite. A predatory bird of the HAWK family. Kites are distinguished from other birds of prey by their long forked tails. In feeding habits they fall between VULTURES and hawks, taking a wide range of prey and also being content with carrion. Like all big raptors, they are masters of flight. The term is used by the KJV and other versions to render Hebrew <sup>ʾ</sup>ayyâ H370 twice (Lev. 11:14; Deut. 14:13; NIV, “black kite”). The use of the word kite in the KJV is not surprising, for this was the most familiar bird of prey in English towns and cities of the 15th and 16th centuries, when they were important scavengers. Two species were found in Palestine. The red kite—once common in England—is partly resident, but numbers also come from N for the winter. The slightly smaller and darker black kite is mainly a migrant seen frequently when passing N after wintering in Africa. The NIV uses “red kite” as the rendering of dē<â H1798 and rāâ H8012 respectively in the same two passages

Kithlish kith’lish. KJV form of KITLISH.

Kitlish kit’lish (כִּתְלִישׁ H4186, derivation unknown). Also Chitlish, Chithlish, Kithlish. A town in the SHEPHELAH within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:40). Kitlish was in the same district as LACHISH (v. 39), but the precise site is unknown.

Kitron kit’ron (קִטְרוֹן H7790, possibly “smoke, incense”). A Canaanite town within the tribal territory of ZEBULUN from which the Israelites could not drive out the inhabitants (Jdg. 1:30). Some believe Kitron is the same as KATTATH, but the site is unknown.

Kittim kit’im (כִּתִּיִּים H4183, gentilic of כֵּת [a place name attested in Phoenician]). KJV also Chittim. (1) Third son of JAVAN, grandson of JAPHETH, brother of ELISHAH (associated with AEGEAN peoples), TARSHISH (Spain or N Africa?), and RODANIM (Rhodes?) (Gen. 10:4; 1 Chr. 1:7, LXX Kitioi). Many interpret the name as referring to a people group descended from Javan (cf. TNIV, “the Kittites,” and see below, ##2-4).

(2) The island CYPRUS. Since the Hebrew form is a gentilic plural, “Kittim” originally would have referred to a people group. Indeed, JOSEPHUS (Ant. 1.6.1 §128) relates the name to the city Kition on the SE coast of the island. Phoenician inscriptions referring to this city call it kt and kty. Apparently the city name was extended to the whole island, or perhaps the city was named after an older island name. HERODOTUS (Hist. 7.90) relates that the island was first colonized by Phoenicians, Ethiopians, and Greeks (respectively descendants of SHEM, HAM, and JAPHETH). This situation would be similar to the one on the island of CRETE, where a Semitic people who had apparently come by way of Egypt (Minoans) were eventually displaced by Indo-Europeans from Greece (Mycenaeans). Probably a similar situation prevailed on Cyprus, although being nearer the Phoenician homeland, the Greek influence took longer to become dominant. (In ANE literature, such as the Tale of Wenamon, Cyprus is sometimes called Alishiya [Elishah?].)

For those interested in controlling coastal trade, Cyprus was a necessary prize. Records of the Akkadian empire in lower Mesopotamia (c. 2400 B.C.) indicate that Sargon, the founder, stretched his power as far up the Euphrates as the Mediterranean. Recovery of a seal cylinder of Naram-Sin, Sargon’s son, on Cyprus confirms that claim. Later, Cyprus became a tributary of THUTMOSE III. (This was by no means Egypt’s first contact with Cyprus, since high-quality Cypriot pottery was found in the 1st-dynasty tombs at Abydos [c. 3000 B.C.].) Later still, SARGON II, conqueror of Samaria, erected a stela on Cyprus, commemorating the island’s vassalage to himself (708 B.C.). This vassalage was renewed by both ESARHADDON and ASHURBANIPAL, the two final noteworthy Assyrian kings.

During the Neo-Babylonian period, the Egyptian Amosis, exercising pretensions toward empire, laid Cyprus under tribute. The Persians dashed such pretensions in turn, relinquishing their hold to the Greeks about 410 B.C. During most of the 1st millennium B.C., despite nominal political affiliations, the dominant cultural and mercantile influence upon Cyprus was Phoenician. Thus Ezekiel, in his dirge over TYRE, tells that Cyprus (Heb. kittiyyîm, LXX chettiin) supplied decking for Phoenician ships from its pine forests (Ezek. 27:6). Similarly, Isa. 23:1 and 12 (LXX Kitiaioi and Kitieoi) report that Cyprus will be intimately related to the downfall of Tyre. Tyre will flee to Cyprus, and from Cyprus will come news of its final downfall. This corresponds with the boast of SENNACHERIB (cf. ANET, 288) that Luli, king of SIDON, fled from Sennacherib to Cyprus, but was killed there.

(3) On occasion the name Kittim, like Javan, is extended to include the W in general, but especially the seafaring western areas. Jeremiah, speaking of the whole world (Jer. 2:10), uses the isles of Kittim to symbolize the far W and KEDAR the far E. BAALAM, forecasting the coming dominance of the W over the ANE (Num. 24:24), tells that the ships of Kittim will afflict Asshur (Mesopotamia) and Eber (the Levant). Daniel apparently uses “ships of Kittim” (Dan. 11:30; NIV, “Ships of the western coastlands”) to represent the Romans, who thwarted ANTIOCHUS IV (Epiphanes) in Egypt in 169 B.C. The SEPTUAGINT makes this reference explicit by reading “Romans” at this point (Rōmaioi; Theod., Kitioi). It has been suggested that Daniel interprets that event as the fulfillment of Num. 24:24 (esp. since the Targum of Onkelos reads “Romans” and the Vulg. “Italy”). The Apoc. and Pseudep. contain several references to the Kittim, all of which seem to relate to the Greek empire. ALEXANDER THE GREAT of Macedon is said to have come from the land of Kittim (1 Macc. 1:1, LXX Chettiim); similarly, Perseus of Macedon is called “king of Kittim” (8:5, LXX Kitieōn).

(4) The occurrence of numerous references to the Kittim in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS has created considerable scholarly controversy over the correct interpretation. These references—occurring predominantly in the commentary on Habakkuk (1QpHab), where the “Chaldeans” of the text are called Kittim, and in the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness (1QM)—have provoked suggestions that the Kittim were understood to be the Seleucid Greeks, the Romans, the Byzantines, the Crusaders, the Turks, or the unspecified eschatological foes of righteousness. In response to the last, it may be pointed out that apocalyptic terms, while they appear to be vague, have specific meaning for the initiate. Lack of specificity would be most unusual. Those who propose peoples after the time of Christ have generally done so because of a conviction that the DSS were a medieval production (cf. A. N. Poliak in JQR 49 [1958]: 89-107). This point of view seems to have been refuted adequately.

The majority of scholars have divided over an identification with the Greeks or with the Romans. H. H. Rowley (The Zadokite Fragments and the Dead Sea Scrolls [1952], passim; also in PEQ 88 [1956]: 92-109) has been the leading advocate for the Greeks, while F. M. Cross (The Ancient Library of Qumran, rev. ed. [1961], 82n, 123-24) has spoken out for the Romans. Implicit in the controversy has been the problem of dating 1QpHab and 1QM. A Maccabean or earlier date automatically precludes the Romans. The following references have been significant in the debate: the rulers of the Kittim fell one after another (1QpHab. IV, 11-12; decline of the Seleucid house or Roman civil war?); the Kittim sacrifice to their “signs” (1QpHab VI, 3-5; the deified standards of the Roman legions?); the Kittim of Egypt and Assyria (1QM I, 2-6; the Ptolemies and Seleucids?); the kings of Kittim will arise after the kings of Greece (4QpNah I, 3; a clear reference to Rome?). Perhaps Kittim meant for the Dead Sea Community, as #3 above, simply “Westerners” and could be applied to any particular western people as need arose.

knee, kneel. The ANE custom for public PRAYER was to stand, and so kneeling was confined to acts of obedience and obeisance. The official presentation of children on the father's knee was a sign legitimizing the child's legal claim in Israel (Gen. 30:3; 50:23; Job 3:12). Kneeling was a symbol of submission to royalty, and every letter in the vast CUNEIFORM collections mentions the bowing down at the feet of the superior personage. Such acts of humility are pictured on Babylonian, Egyptian, and Canaanite art works. The position of kneeling comes after that of total prostration, and indicates that certain rituals were observed if not performed in a kneeling posture (Ps. 95:6).

The Hebrew term for "knee" is berek H1386 (Gen. 30:3 and often; cf. Aram. ʾarkubbā H10072, Dan. 5:6), and the cognate verb bārak H1384 means "to kneel" (only Gen. 24:11; 2 Chr. 6:13; Ps. 95:6). Scholars in the past, assuming an etymological connection between these terms and bārak H1385 ("to bless" in piel stem), inferred a semantic link as well (e.g., persons knelt when they received a blessing), but most specialists today believe that two different roots are involved. Of course, one must leave open the possibility that speakers of the language, through popular etymologizing, associated the two.

In the NT, the common Greek term gony G1205 (Heb. 12:12 et al.) is used without exception as the noun, and the verb gonypeteō G1206 means specifically, "to kneel down before someone" (Matt. 17:14; 27:29; Mk. 1:40; 10:17). The verbal idea is often conveyed by the use of the noun in combination with such verbs as prospiptō G4700, "fall on" (Lk. 5:8); kamptō G2828, "bend" (Rom. 11:4; 14:11; Eph. 3:14; Phil. 2:10), and especially tithēmi G5502, "place, lay down" (Mk. 15:19; Lk. 5:8; 22:41; Acts 7:60; 9:40; 20:36; 21:5; this latter phrase probably influenced by Latin usage, ponere genua, "to genuflect"). In addition, the NIV and other versions use "kneel" as the rendering of the Greek verb proskyneō G4686 in a half dozen places in Matthew (Matt. 8:2; 9:18; 15:25; 17:14; 20:20; 27:29). This verb occurs in another seven places in this gospel with the usual meaning "to do obeisance, worship" (e.g., 2:2), and this sense is probably at least implicit in every instance.

This usage of bowing down became the traditional posture of prayer in the Christian church. It also appears as the posture of dying in the case of STEPHEN'S martyrdom (Acts 7:20). PAUL and his converts prayed and said farewell on their knees (20:36), and kneeling is mentioned in Paul's epistles. The apostle uses the conception of kneeling in the figurative sense of submission to the Almighty (Eph. 3:14), where it is his own confession that is foremost, and in the magnificent prophecy of Christ's ultimate triumph when all knees shall bow before the Messiah (Phil. 2:10). (See further NIDOTTE, 1:755-57; NIDNTT, 2:859-60, 875-79.)

knife. A small single-edged or double-edged cutting instrument of stone or metal. In form the knife generally resembled the dagger or short stabbing sword, but was smaller and usually without ornamentation. The usual Hebrew word for "knife" is ma'ākelet H4408 (Gen. 22:6 et al.), but the word for "sword" (ḥereb H2995) is rendered "knife" in Josh. 5:2-3 (cf. also KJV 1 Ki. 18:28; Ezek. 5:1-2). The knife generally had a straight blade 6 to 10 in. long, although knives with curved blades were known. The handles were made of one piece with the blade, or a wooden handle was fastened to the blade by a tang or by rivets.

Like other orientals, the Jews made little use of "table knives" in their meals. Meat was cut into small pieces before being served, while bread was broken by hand. The sharp edge of knives stands metaphorically for rapaciousness (Prov. 30:14; Heb. šakkîn H8501). A knife at table is used in a figure for restraint upon one's appetite (23:2).

Knives were used for various purposes. JOSHUA was commanded to use flint knives to circumcise the Israelites (Josh. 5:2-3; cf. Exod. 4:25). The use of flint knives when they were no longer in common domestic use implies an ancient ritual in which their use was still appropriate. Knives or small swords were used by the frenzied priests of BAAL for self-mutilation (1 Ki. 18:28). Animals were killed and skinned with food-cutters. ABRAHAM took one along to sacrifice ISAAC (Gen. 22:6), and the Levite used one to dismember his concubine (Jdg. 19:29). The "scribe's knife" of Jer. 36:23 (Heb. ta'ar hassōpēr H9509 + H6221; NRSV, "penknife") was used for trimming and splitting the reed employed in writing; the word ta'ar was also used with reference to a razor (Num. 6:5; Ezek. 5:1).

The "pruning hooks" (Joel 3:10; Heb. mazmērâ H4661) were probably curved knives (cf. Isa. 18:5 NIV). In Ezra 1:9, the KJV includes some "knives" (Heb. maḥĀlāp H4709, a HAPAX LEGOMENON) among the temple furniture returned under EZRA, but the RSV renders "censers," and the NIV, "pans." The SEPTUAGINT rendering, "of a different sort" (parēllagmena), does not give help on the real meaning. If they were knives, they doubtless were used to kill and cut up the sacrificial animals.

HEROD the Great used a knife for paring an apple and attempted to use it as an instrument of suicide (Jos. Ant. 17.7.1; War 1.33.7). (See W. F. Petrie, Tools and Weapons [1917], 22-28; C. Corswant, A Dictionary of Life in Bible Times [1956], 164.) D. E. HIEBERT

knop. A small ornamental knob. This word is used by the KJV to render Hebrew kaptôr H4117 in Exod. 25:31-36 and 37:17-22, referring to the decorations (knobby fruits or flower buds) of the golden CANDLESTICK or lampstand in the TABERNACLE. The KJV uses it also to render pěqā'im H7225, "gourd-shaped ornaments," which describes the decorations carved on the cedar lining of the walls of Solomon's TEMPLE (1 Ki. 6:18) and around the molten sea (7:24).

S. BARABAS

knowledge. This term may be defined simply as the sum of what has been perceived or learned, that is, truth or information acquired through experience and education. However, the problems that an analysis of knowledge entails are enormous.

1. Biblical usage
2. Faith and knowledge
3. Epistemology
  1. Philosophical
  2. Biblical
4. Modern theology
5. Knowledge of God

I. Biblical usage. The primary biblical terms used are Hebrew yādaʿ H3359, “to know, observe, recognize,” and daʿat H1981, “knowledge, ability, insight”; Greek ginōskō G1182, “to know, learn, perceive,” gnōsis G1194, “knowledge,” and oida G3857, “to know.” (See NIDOTTE, 2:409-14; NIDNTT, 2:390-409.)

The Bible frequently commends knowledge and wisdom: “The LORD is a God of knowledge” (1 Sam. 2:3 NRSV); “Have they no knowledge, all the evil doers who...do not call upon the LORD?” (Ps. 14:4 NRSV); “Teach me knowledge and good judgment” (Ps. 119:66); “Choose my instruction instead of silver, / knowledge rather than choice gold” (Prov. 8:10); “by his knowledge my righteous servant will justify many” (Isa. 53:11); “you will know the truth, and the truth will set you free” (Jn. 8:32); “Now I know in part; then I shall know fully, even as I am fully known” (1 Cor. 13:12); “...asking God to fill you with the knowledge of his will through all spiritual wisdom and understanding.” (Col. 1:9); “We know also that the Son of God has come and has given us understanding, so that we may know him who is true” (1 Jn. 5:20). One may note relative to this last verse that the so-called epistle of love uses the word “know” thirty times in its five chapters, not counting words like “understand,” “teach,” “see,” “hear,” “believe,” and “truth,” all of which have to do with knowledge.

In view of the misapprehensions of some, what the Bible does not say also should be pointed out. Nowhere does Scripture modify the high value it places on knowledge by deprecating “mere” human REASON. Reason and knowledge are integral parts of the IMAGE OF GOD in which human beings were created. In the OT the Hebrew terms for “heart” (lēb H4213 and lēbāb H4222) designate the mind, intellect, or reason in about three-fourths of its 850 occurrences. Examples are: “The LORD...said in his heart” (Gen. 8:21; obviously he did not say in his emotions); “I will raise up for myself a faithful priest, who will do according to what is in my heart [lēbāb] and mind [nepeš H5883]” (1 Sam. 2:35); “Make the heart of this people calloused...Otherwise they might...understand with their hearts” (Isa. 6:10); “their minds [lēb] closed so they cannot understand. No one stops to think [lit. turns to his heart]” (Isa. 44:18b-19a). The human mind or heart can be and is sinful, as some of these verses plainly indicate, but the antithesis between the heart and the head, along with the suggestion that the intellect is evil but the emotions are free from sin, is a distortion of the scriptural view of HUMAN NATURE.

Although the Hebrew and Greek verbs for knowing usually bear the most ordinary meaning (e.g., “I don’t know who has done this,” Gen. 21:26), they can also be used in other senses, some of which are sources of confusion in theology and philosophy. The sense in which the words are used to designate sexual intercourse (e.g., as in Gen. 4:1 RSV, “Now Adam knew his wife Eve, and she conceived and bore Cain”) causes no difficulty; we simply note the usage and pass on. Confusion, however, may arise from another meaning that also has no place in epistemology, namely, “to choose, select, [and therefore] approve.” When Ps. 1:6 RSV says that “the Lord knows the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked will perish,” it is not reflecting on divine OMNISCIENCE. In the ordinary sense, God knows the way of the wicked as well as he knows everything else. Here the word is used in the sense of approval (cf. NIV, “watches over”). Similarly, when Amos 3:2 RSV says, “You only have I known of all the families of the earth,” the prophet is not denying that God knew the Egyptians and Canaanites. This verse is no denial of omniscience; here the verb means “to choose or elect” (cf. NIV).

This usage, so clear in the OT, causes some theological confusion when NT material is discussed. Those who reject the doctrines of predestination or unconditional ELECTION try to base salvation on foreseen FAITH and election on foreknowledge (see FOREKNOW). Such a view is inconsistent with the meaning of the words. In 1 Pet. 1:2, where the RSV gives the correct sense, “chosen and destined by God,” the KJV has the more literal translation, “elect according to the foreknowledge of God.” In v. 20 the KJV renders the same word “foreordained.” Similarly Rom. 8:29 does not speak of a mere knowing ahead of time, as English usage would lead one to expect, as if God looked ahead into an independent and undetermined future and discovered (if anything undetermined could be discovered) what was going to happen; rather, foreknowledge means foreordination.

In addition to the above source of theological confusion, there is an alleged usage that causes philosophical confusion. Or, perhaps, it may be said that a certain philosophical confusion tries to construe knowledge in a still different sense. Some devout and fairly orthodox theologians, and in general the neoorthodox thinkers, insist that there is a radical difference between knowing a proposition and knowing a person, or between knowledge “about” and knowledge “by acquaintance.”

According to the neoorthodox position, God does not reveal truths that can be intellectually apprehended, but he reveals himself in a direct encounter or confrontation. Now insofar as support for this view is sought in the different compounds of ginōskō or in other verbs, the attempt is a failure. R. Bultmann states that this knowledge “is achieved in all the acts in which a man can attain knowledge, in seeing and hearing, in investigating and reflecting...[It] can also mean personal acquaintance and friendship with persons...Whatever can be the object of enquiry can be an object of ginōskein” (TDNT, 1:691-92). And in the SEPTUAGINT ginōskō and oida both translate the one Hebrew verb yāda<sup>6</sup>. The TDNT is replete with all the lexicographical details, none of which are of any help in epistemology.

II. Faith and knowledge. Noting the usage of the word knowledge in its ordinary meaning offers little aid in solving problems of theology and philosophy. One such problem is the distinction between knowledge and FAITH. The statement “Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up” (1 Cor. 8:1) does not at first sight agree with the praises of knowledge quoted earlier; yet the following verse indicates that the knowledge referred to is either mistaken opinion or a true proposition so misapplied and conjoined with error that the combination is false. Some commentators explain v. 1 as ironical.

A similar explanation is required to understand the Christian opposition to Gnosticism. This religion in the early centuries, using Christian terminology, made SALVATION depend on knowledge and, by implication, not on faith. The great objection to Gnosticism, however, is not a repugnance to knowledge as such. The real objection was twofold. First, the Gnostic tenets amounted to a texture of superstitious mythology. Second, even if the Gnostics had propounded a true science of astronomy, such knowledge could not save. Salvation depends on faith in Christ.

What then is the relation between faith and knowledge? Protestants have traditionally analyzed faith into knowledge, assent, and trust. This analysis is not as simple as it seems. Knowledge in this context apparently refers only to understanding (not believing) the meaning of a proposition. Of course one can understand the meaning of false propositions, such as “David was king of Tyre”; but in the traditional analysis undoubtedly true propositions are intended, because assent to or belief in a false proposition would be error, not knowledge.

Note that in this last instance of the word, knowledge does not bear the same meaning it bears in the analysis. In the analysis knowledge occurs as distinct from assent, as a separate element in faith; but if knowledge is defined as the mind’s possession of truth, there can be no knowledge apart from assent. This is one difficulty. Furthermore, worse, the element of trust, which Protestants emphasize, defies all explanation and remains in utter confusion. Illustrations, such as actually depositing money in a bank rather than merely believing that the bank is sound, depend on a physical action, in addition to the mental act of believing. Such additional external action is inappropriate to represent the thoroughly inner mental act of faith. Knowledge is an integral part of faith, and not its antithesis.

III. Epistemology

A. Philosophical. The main problem of knowledge, which is the crucial question in all the history of philosophy, concerns knowledge in its most ordinary sense. We say we know that two and two are four, that the earth revolves around the sun, or at least that a bright disk appears in the sky, and perhaps that God exists and stealing is immoral. Epistemology is a theory of how one can know anything. This question is not explicitly discussed in the Bible; but answers to it, however obtained, have a profound influence on theological formulations. Since the matter is extremely technical and difficult, some simplification is necessary.

Systems of philosophy generally can be divided into two groups: empirical philosophies are exemplified by Aristotle, Aquinas, Hume, and the modern schools of Pragmatism and Logical Positivism—the second group comprises the rationalistic or idealistic philosophies, exemplified by Plato, Augustine, Anselm, Spinoza, Kant, and Hegel. The first group exhibits serious divergencies, for Aristotle and Logical Positivism are rather far apart; but differences within the second group are perhaps even greater.

Empiricism is the view that all knowledge is based on experience alone. Experience has not always been restricted to the five senses, though this is a common form of the principle; but the Epicureans stressed the experience of pain, the Sophists acknowledged the experience of dreams and hallucinations (a fact Descartes and other rationalists use in opposition), others admit aesthetic experience (coining the word aesthetics from the Greek word for sensation), and finally Schleiermacher, the founder of modernism, and contemporary liberalism develop religion and theology out of religious experience. Sensation, however, remains basic in all forms of empiricism.

Rationalism (idealism is not a good name, for Berkeleyan idealism is completely empirical) holds that all or at least some knowledge is a priori, innate, rational, nonsensuous. Plato taught that the soul before birth is in contact with the ideal objects of knowledge, and that here on earth we remember what we previously knew. Spinoza taught that without the aid of sensation—doubtful aid because it is the source of error—all knowledge can be deduced from definitions by logic alone. Even the existence of God, as Anselm taught earlier, can be demonstrated from the definition that God is the all-perfect Being: if he did not exist, he would not be all-perfect. Kant said that the mind at birth is furnished with the a priori (independent of experience) intuitions of space and time, and a set of twelve a priori categories. Neither these by themselves, and much less sensations by themselves, are knowledge, but when sensory material is arranged and ordered by these a priori forms, the combination is knowledge. Finally, the dialectic of concepts of the last philosopher listed, Hegel, is just too complicated to characterize in any short space.

Two lines of procedure are now necessary: one should evaluate the merit of each of these main divisions of philosophy, and one should attempt to determine which, if either, the Bible favors. The first is a task for the professional philosopher. Some considerations, however, may be mentioned, which must be taken into account.

All philosophy, all theology, and all common conversation must make use of so-called abstract concepts. In philosophy the concepts of substance, cause, quality, relation find a necessary place; in theology there is sin and righteousness, atonement and justification, and so on; in common speech too one talks about causes and relations as well as about truth and falsity, times and places, cats and dogs.

Rationalism specifically asserts the reality of such concepts. These are the objects of knowledge that constitute Plato's World of Ideas. PHILO JUDAEUS and AUGUSTINE make them the content of the Divine Mind. Thus far rationalism makes philosophy, theology, and conversation possible.

Although nominalists such as Roscellinus and Occam assert that concepts refer to no reality whatever, that they are mere sounds in the air without meaning, and thus make philosophy and ordinary conversation both impossible, still the major empiricists try to explain the genesis of concepts. Aristotle attempted to abstract them from sensory experience. The concepts were somehow in the visible objects and could be detached, or abstracted by imagination and intellect. The British empiricists build up concepts by adding and subtracting particular sensations. Thus they claim to make knowledge possible.

The question, of course, is whether or not concepts can in fact be abstracted from sensations. Plato denied it. Further, even the abstraction of such "empirical" concepts as cat and dog depends on a theory of visual imagery that introspective psychology cannot sustain. It is all the more difficult to see how normative concepts, such as justice, can be derived from purely factual material.

Kant forcefully extended this argument in opposition to Hume. Knowledge, Kant insisted, contains necessary and universal judgments, such as two and two are (always are and must be) four and all pendulums always must swing in a certain way. Note definitely that when the law of the pendulum was formulated, the scientists thought that all pendulums in the past have swung and all future pendulums will swing just as described. But experience does not extend to all past pendulums, and with even greater clarity it does not extend to any future pendulums. Experience gives neither universality nor necessity. Similarly, normative moral principles can never be derived from experience. We see acts of honesty and instances of theft. The two are equally in experience. Experience can never determine that theft is wrong or that honesty is right.

Perhaps the simplest example of an a priori category is that of unity. The concept of the number one is essential, not only to mathematics, but also to all learning; for learning could never proceed unless we could distinguish one thing from another. Berkeley, the British empiricist, attempted to base the idea of unity in sensation. The unit, he said, is just any one thing you choose. You can count chairs or grains of sand. Thus we find our unit in experience. Kant demolished Berkeley's argument. First, the empiricist misstated the problem, which is not the selection of a unit from among other unities; the problem is the origin of the idea of unity. Second, the idea of one must be present before we can identify a chair or a grain of sand as one. The idea is not derived from the experienced object. And, finally, no experienced object is strictly a unity, since everything in space has parts. Therefore the concept of one must precede experience. These sample arguments must suffice to show the philosophic advantages of rationalism, or a priorism, over empiricism.

B. Biblical. Does Scripture take sides in the dispute between empiricism and rationalism? Obviously the Bible has no such technical arguments as those found in Kant. Nevertheless the prophets and apostles tell us something about HUMAN NATURE.

In the first place, God created man in his own image. The animals were not so created. The difference is that human beings are rational and animals are not. In Prov. 7:22-23 and Isa. 56:10, the natural ignorance of animals is used as a similitude to castigate the sinful ignorance of men and women. That knowledge is part of the image of God, and therefore that at least some knowledge is nonempirical, is broadly hinted in Col. 3:10, where the effect of REGENERATION is said to be the renewal of the knowledge original in the divine image.

Further, Rom. 1:32 and 2:14 show that even sin does not eradicate certain innate moral knowledge. And with respect to sin, all the historical churches acknowledge that a depravity of nature is inherited from ADAM. This is inconsistent with the view that the mind at birth is a blank sheet of paper (Locke), or morally neutral (Aristotle), and requires the admission of some sort of a priori. If therefore the more complex matters of morality are innate, how can one deny that simpler principles antecede experience? Scripture therefore seems to be on the side of a priorism.

IV. Modern theology. The discussion so far has maintained the position that knowledge is commendable and is essential to faith. Therefore religion, or at any rate Christianity, must hold theology in high esteem. At various times, however, protests are made against “cold” intellectualism or the pride of “mere” human reason. Mystics have commended trances; others make religion essentially emotional; and neoorthodoxy has enthroned paradox and contradiction.

These modern theologians have arrived at their position more by emotional reaction than by logic. They had been educated under a combination of Schleiermacher and Hegel. This liberalism looked on sin as a fast disappearing remnant of man’s animal ancestors. The KINGDOM OF GOD was equated with socialism, and optimism flourished. Then World War I revealed human depravity to Europeans, and World War II to Americans. Machine guns and concentration camps liquidated the utopian doctrine of man’s essential goodness and society’s inevitable progress.

Furthermore, Hegel’s rationalistic solution of all philosophic problems was too neat, and therefore unreal. The great dialectic came to appear as hollow wordplay. Yet these theologians were equally unable to solve the problems. They braved Socrates’ sad scorn of misologists (haters of reason) and declared that the problems of life are rationally insoluble. Life is deeper than logic. The universe and God himself are self-contradictory. We must make our decisions in the freedom of blind faith. Besides, religion is not an intellectual matter anyhow: it is an experiential encounter with God.

Emil Brunner states this position clearly. Rejecting the idea that REVELATION is a communication of truth, Brunner asserts that “All words have only an instrumental value. Neither the spoken words nor their conceptual content are the Word itself, but only its frame” (The Divine-Human Encounter [1943], 110). He then adds that “God can, when he wills, speak his Word to a man even through false doctrine” (ibid., 117).

Karl Barth earlier, in his Romans (2nd German ed., 1922), had given great importance to contradictions and insoluble paradoxes. Though later he lost some of his exuberance, he still rejected logical consistency. In a section refuting a defense of logical consistency, he argues, “The very minimum postulate of freedom from contradiction is acceptable by theology only upon the very limited interpretation, by the scientific theorist upon the scarcely tolerable one, that theology will not assert an irremovability in principle of the ‘contradictions’ which it is bound to make good” (Church Dogmatics 1/1 [1956], 8). This sentence is obscure: it neither asserts nor denies that contradictions are removable; it merely says that theology should not assert their irremovability. What follows in the passage seems to let the contradictions stand, for he says, “But the propositions in which it asserts their removal will be propositions about the free action of God, and so not propositions that ‘remove’ the contradictions from the world.” Continuing to talk of coherence and systematization, Barth insists that “The theologian...should know what he is doing when he transgresses them, and that as a theologian he cannot escape the necessity of transgressing them.” Or, in very plain words, a theologian must be incoherent.

Nevertheless the neoorthodox school writes theology, and Barth and Brunner have been especially voluminous. But if they do not recognize the necessity of being consistent, of what value can their theology be? In principle every one of their sentences is both true and false. If we discard logic, then, when we believe that David was king of Israel, nothing prevents us from believing at the same time that David was not king of Israel. This would be simply the necessary incoherence of theology.

In particular, the neoorthodox theologians, and some modernists as well, believe that God reveals himself through contradictory systems in the Bible. Brunner concocts a remarkable conclusion that we could believe in the resurrection of Christ, even if there were no reports, because the witness to the resurrection is not that of eyewitnesses but of faith-witnesses. He further makes Christ sinless but fallible. Then, again, when Paul speaks of a time before Esau’s birth, he means the Edomites in the days of Malachi. And, finally, “God and the medium of conceptuality exclude each other” (cf. Paul King Jewett, Emil Brunner’s Concept of Revelation [1954], 184 and passim).

If, however, all our theological talk is self-contradictory, if faith must curb logic, and if God and thought are mutually exclusive, then no knowledge of God is possible, and religion must be emotional and experiential. But it will not be Christianity.

V. Knowledge of God. In opposition to this neoorthodoxy and to all other forms of thought that deny God can be known, we here conclude with what was strongly hinted at the beginning of this article in its commendation of knowledge in general. We shall simply add a few references to knowledge of God in particular.

In the first place, all Scripture is inspired of God and is profitable for doctrine. See INSPIRATION. The following verses are some of those that are most explicitly profitable for the doctrine of God. “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” introduces the concept of CREATION and of God as creator. That this creation was decreed from all eternity and is always controlled by providence is taught in Eph. 1:11, “predestined according to the plan of him who works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will,” and in Dan. 4:35, “he does according to his will in the host of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand” (RSV), and in many other passages. The Bible also tells us that God exists in three persons; that God is eternal, omniscient, and immutable. See GOD, BIBLICAL DOCTRINE OF; TRINITY.

That God can be known, that humans can entertain truth, that theology is possible, has been an unbroken tradition among all Christians. To deprecate knowledge in favor of some emotional upheaval, to repudiate logic and enthrone contradiction and incoherence, to reduce the biblical material to the status of a symbolism that points uncertainly to an unknowable Something or other, is to abandon Christianity and commit intellectual suicide. knowledge, tree of. See TREE OF KNOWLEDGE.

Koa koh'uh (קוּא H7760). An otherwise unknown place (or people) that, along with the Babylonians, Chaldeans, Pekod, Shoa, and the Assyrians, is named as being among the enemies of Jerusalem (Ezek. 23:23). Some scholars suggest that the name may refer to the Quti (Gutians), who lived E of the TIGRIS River. If so, the form Koa may be a deliberate distortion (cf. W. Eichrodt, Ezekiel, OTL [1970], 328). See PEKOD; SHOA.

Kohath koh'hath (קֹהַת H7740 [also קֹהֲתִי], meaning unknown; gentilic קֹהֲתִי H7741 [also קֹהֲתִי], “Kohathite”). Second son of LEVI (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16); he is said to have lived 133 years (Exod. 6:18). He was the father of AMRAM, IZHER, HEBRON, and UZZIEL (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19, 27; 1 Chr. 6:2), who became Kohathite branches of the Levitical families (Num. 3:27). He was the grandfather, through Amram and his wife JOCHEBED (sister of Kohath), of AARON, MOSES, and MIRIAM (Exod. 6:20; Num. 26:59; 1 Chr. 6:3). The Kohathites were, therefore, the most prominent of the Levitical families.

After the construction of the TABERNACLE, the Kohathites, the Gershonites, and the Merarites were given charge over its care and transit (see GERSHON; MERARI). The Kohathites were to encamp on the S side of the tabernacle (Num. 3:29) and were to be responsible for “the ark, the table, the lampstand, the altars, the articles of the sanctuary used in ministering, the curtain, and everything related to their use” (3:31). Though these various items were the responsibility of the Kohathites, they were not to handle the holy things. Aaron and his sons were instructed to put a covering of goatskin upon these things before they were handled by the others (4:5-15). The manner of transportation was not to be in wagons, but upon the shoulders of the Kohathites. According to the census, there were 8,600 males above one month old (3:28) or 2,750 between the ages of thirty and fifty who attended to these duties (4:1-4, 34-37).

After the conquest of Palestine, the Kohathites were cared for in the same manner as the other Levitical families. Those who were descendants of Aaron received by lot thirteen cities and their pasture lands. The tribes of Judah and Simeon gave nine cities (Hebron [a refuge city for slayers], Libnah, Jattir, Eshtemoa, Holon, Debir, Ain, Juttah, and Beth Shemesh), while four cities were given by Benjamin (Gibeon, Geba, Anathoth, and Almon [Josh. 21:9-19]; the parallel passage [1 Chr. 6:57-60] lists only eleven of the thirteen, including the name Ashan with the former group). The rest of the Kohathites were provided ten cities (Josh. 21:20-26): four from the tribe of Ephraim (Shechem [a city of refuge], Gezer, Kibzaim [1 Chr. 6:68 has Jokmeam], and Beth Horon), four from Dan (Elteke, Gibbethon, Aijalon, and Gath Rimmon), and two from the half tribe of Manasseh (Taanach and Gath Rimmon [1 Chr. 6:70 has Aner and Bileam]).

During the reign of DAVID, the Levites were organized into three divisions according to the sons of Levi (1 Chr. 23:6). HEMAN represented the Kohathites in “the service of song in the house of the LORD” (6:31 NRSV), some had charge of the preparation of the showbread every Sabbath (9:32), and Uriel was appointed by David as chief of the 120 Kohathites chosen to assist in the return of the ARK OF THE COVENANT to Jerusalem (15:3-5).

When the Moabites and Ammonites came against Judah, JEHOSEPHAT presented the situation before the Lord, bowing in worship together with all the people of Judah and Jerusalem. The Kohathites were ministering in the temple and “stood up and praised the LORD, the God of Israel, with very loud voice” (2 Chr. 20:19).

In two different reform movements the Kohathites were active participants. During the reign of HEZEKIAH (715-687/6 B.C.), Mahath son of Amasai and Joel son of Azariah were among those who purified the temple (29:12-16). In JOSIAH'S reform and repair of the temple in 621, two Kohathites, Zechariah and Meshullam, were among the Levites whom the king set over the work on the temple (34:12). Koheleth koh-hel'ith. See ECCLESIASTES.

Kola koh'luh (Κωλα v.l. Χωλα). An otherwise unknown locality mentioned in the book of JUDITH (Jdt. 15:4; KJV, "Cola"). If the name is not fictitious, the town was probably not far from BETHULIA. On the basis of partial sound similarity, some identify it with KONA (Jdt. 4:4) or with HOLON (Josh. 15:51).

Kolaiah koh-lay'yuh (כֹּלַיָּהוּ H7755, possibly "Yahweh has spoken"). (1) Son of Maaseiah, descendant of BENJAMIN, and ancestor of Sallu; the latter was among those who settled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:7).

(2) Father of a false prophet named AHAB (Jer. 29:21).

Kol-Hozeh kol-hoh'zuh. TNIV form of COLHOZEH.

Kona koh'nuh (Κωνα). An otherwise unknown locality mentioned in the book of JUDITH (Jdt. 4:4; the KJV, following a different reading, has "the villages"). See also KOLA.

Konaniah kon'uh-ni'uh. TNIV form of CONANIAH.

koph kohf. See QOPH.

kor. Also cor. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES III.B.2.

Korah kor'uh (קֹרַח H7946, "bald [head]," possibly diminutive form; gentilic קֹרַחִי H7948, "Korahite" [KJV also "Korhite" and "Korathite"]; Κόρε G3169). (1) Son of ESAU by OHOLIBAMAH (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. 1:35).

(2) Son of ELIPHAZ and grandson of ESAU (Gen. 36:16; the name Korah is missing in the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH here). The parallel passages (Gen. 36:11; 1 Chr. 1:35) omit the name.

(3) Son of IZHAR, grandson of KOHATH, and great-grandson of LEVI (Exod. 6:21, 24). Korah, with 250 leaders of the congregation, rose up against MOSES and AARON, charging them with exalting themselves above the assembly of the Lord: "You have gone too far! The whole community is holy, every one of them, and the LORD is with them" (Num. 16:1-3). At the same time, DATHAN and ABIRAM of the tribe of Reuben rebelled against Moses' leadership, charging him with failure to bring them into the Promised Land and making himself a prince over the people (16:1, 12-14).

Disconcerted by these indictments, Moses charged Korah and the Levites with seeking the priesthood as well as the ministry of service before the Lord (Num. 16:8-10). Therefore, he challenged the rebels to meet with him at the Tent of Meeting, each man taking a censer and offering incense before the Lord, that the Lord might show who was holy (vv. 4-9, 16-19). However, Dathan and Abiram refused to meet with Moses (vv. 12-14). Judgment fell against those who rebelled. The earth opened and swallowed up Korah, Dathan, Abiram, and their families, and fire from heaven consumed the 250 leaders offering their incense (vv. 23-35). In the brief account of Num. 26:9-11, it is pointed out that the line of Korah did not come to an end. The bronze censers were then collected and “hammered out to overlay the altar” (16:36-38). Still the people murmured against Moses and Aaron so that God sent a plague upon them that was checked only by Aaron’s atonement for the people, but not before 14,700 people had died (vv. 41-49).

Some scholars regard this passage as a combination of several narratives. A. Kuenen and J. Wellhausen, working on the basis of the documentary hypothesis, indicate three narratives woven together. From the so-called JE document, the earliest source, comes the story of Dathan and Abiram, who were laymen revolting against the civil authority claimed by Moses (Num. 16:13); assigned to this source are vv. 1b-2a, 12-15, 25-26, and 27b-34. The remaining verses derive from two different strata of P. The first stratum (vv. 1a, 2b-7a, 18-24, 27a, 32b, 35) concerns the revolt of Korah and the 250 leaders against the Levites as the only ones to discharge the religious offices. In this instance, Korah and the leaders are not regarded as Levites, but as laymen controverting Levitical preeminence: “The whole community is holy” (v. 3). When Moses and Aaron met with their adversaries before the Lord, each man with censer in hand, fire from the Lord destroyed the 250 leaders, vindicating Moses and Aaron. The second stratum (vv. 7b—11, 16, 17, 35, 36-40) regards Korah as a Levite and indicates a struggle within the Levitical tribe against an Aaronide priesthood: “This was to remind the Israelites that no one except a descendant of Aaron should come to burn incense before the LORD, or he would become like Korah and his followers” (v. 40). According to the documentary theorists, this concern would relate to the period of the Second Commonwealth, when these distinctions were first made. However, there is no satisfactory explanation for the fusion of the stories of Korah and of Dathan and Abiram.

J. Liver (in Studies in the Bible, ed. C. Rabin [1961], 189-217) argues that Deut. 11:6 and Ps. 106:16-18 mention only the revolt of Dathan and Abiram, indicative of its earlier existence. During the time of SOLOMON, when the priestly service was organized and consolidated for the large TEMPLE, tensions arose over positions in the service. The Korahite Levites, one of the leading families, opposed the Jerusalem priesthood. To establish their position by tradition, this story was produced for authoritative support. It could not, however, achieve independent status and was thus appended to the tradition of the revolt of Dathan and Abiram against the authority and leadership of Moses.

There is no insuperable difficulty in viewing the passage as a harmonious unit. The proposed solutions to the various inferred problems are not only hypothetical, but often are equally problematic.

With regard to the miraculous judgments against Korah, Dathan, Abiram, and the 250 leaders, some have pointed to flash floods in the desert area accompanied by lightning, or to the mudflats in the region of the ARABAH, which under certain circumstances could well have swallowed up whatever was upon them (cf. G. Hort in ABR 7 [1959]: 2-26). While it may not be necessary to demonstrate natural phenomena that appear to corroborate the miracles in the Bible, it is always possible that God used such occurrences for his purposes. Korah’s rebellion is mentioned in the NT (Jude 11; “Core”).

Later, the Korahites were given responsibility “for guarding the thresholds of the Tent just as their fathers had been responsible for guarding the entrance to the dwelling of the LORD” (1 Chr. 9:19). One of these gatekeepers was SHALLUM, while his son, MATTITHIAH, “was entrusted with the responsibility for baking the offering bread” (9:31). A dozen psalms are given the superscription as “of the sons of Korah” (Pss. 42-49, 84-85, 87-88). It is probable that they originated among this guild of singers and were perhaps sung by them in the worship of the temple. Both the Korahites and the Kohathites led the worship when JEHOSEPHAT gathered the people to seek the Lord (2 Chr. 20:19). See also PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

(4) Son of HEBRON, grandson of CALEB, and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:43). Some argue that Korah here is the name of a town.

(5) Five of the men from the tribe of BENJAMIN who joined DAVID at ZIGLAG were called Korahites

(1 Chr. 12:6). While it is possible that these were Levites descended from #3 above, some scholars believe that they descended from a different (and otherwise unknown) Korah or that the reference is to a locality in the tribe of Benjamin.

A town situated near the Sea of Galilee, denounced by Jesus, and mentioned in the Bible in only one context (Matt. 11:21 = Lk. 10:13). Little is known of Korazin. The site is probably that of Khirbet Kerazeh, 2 mi. N of CAPERNAUM. This agrees with evidence provided by EUSEBIUS (Onomasticon 174.23) and JEROME (The Sites and Names of Hebrew Places, 194; but cf. Commentary on Isaiah, 3). Khirbet Kerazeh is high above Capernaum on the basalt hills, and evidence from the ruins indicates that it was inhabited as early as the later Stone Age. The TALMUD (b. Menahot 85a) mentions the town under the name Kerazim as being famous for its quality of wheat. A synagogue built of the black volcanic rock of the area forms part of the ruins. It was not as impressive as the synagogue in Capernaum, however. Also among the ruins was a carved stone seat with an Aramaic inscription in honor of the donor. This may well be an example of "Moses' seat" (see Matt. 23:2). Eusebius indicates that the city had died out by his times. (See F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine [1938], 2:154, 299, 300; C. Kopp, The Holy

Korban. See CORBAN.

Kore kor'ee (כֹּרֵי H7927, “one who calls out, partridge”). (1) Son of Ebiasaph (see ABIASAPH) and descendant of LEVI through KORAH (1 Chr. 9:19; 26:1 [here called son of Asaph]). Two of Kore's sons or descendants, SHALLUM and MESHELEMLAH (perhaps also OBED-EDOM, 26:4), were among the gatekeepers of the sanctuary.

(2) Son of Imnah; a Levite in the time of HEZEKIAH, he was keeper of the EAST GATE and “in charge of the freewill offerings given to God, distributing the contributions made to the LORD and also the consecrated gifts” (2 Chr. 31:14).

Korhite kor'hit. KJV alternate form of Korahite. See KORAH.

koum. See TALITHA CUM(i).

Koz koz (קֹז H7766, “thorn”). Also Coz. A man listed among the descendants of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:8). His place in the genealogy is unclear, but the NIV links this verse with the previous one, making Koz a son of ASHHUR by Helah (see vv. 5, 7).

Kozbi koz'bi. TNIV form of COZBI.

Kozeba koh-zee'buh. TNIV form of COZEBA.

Kub kuhb. See CUB.

Kue kyoo'ee (קֻי H7750, meaning unknown). Also Keveh. A HITTITE kingdom occupying SE ASIA MINOR, corresponding to E CILICIA. A document of NEBUCHADNEZZAR II, dated between 595 and 570 B.C., mentions the land of Hu-m-e (pronounced Khuwe or Khwe). It also occurs in the Istanbul Stela of NABONIDUS. The Annals of the Assyrian King SHALMANESER III (858-824) refer to Kue, and its king as an enemy. TIGLATH-PILESER III (744-727) received tribute from a ruler of Kue. HERODOTUS mentions Cilicia several times, hence it must be concluded that it was a country of some importance on the western Babylonian frontier.

An important trade route crossed this coastal plain, from the Syrian Gates in the Amanus Mountains to the Cilician Gates in the Taurus Range. IRON evidently was imported into SYRIA and BABYLON through Cilicia, but there is no evidence of its actually being mined there. The country was famous in ancient times as a source of the finest horses, many of which were imported by SOLOMON (1 Ki. 10:28; 2 Chr. 1:16; KJV, “linen yarn,” following a Jewish interpretation). (See J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Kings, ICC [1951], 227; Y. Ikeda in Studies in the Period of David and Solomon and Other Essays, ed. T. Ishida [1982], 215-38; D. D. Schley in JBL 106 [1987]: 595-601.)

Cilicia was made a Roman PROVINCE (Cilicia Pedias) in 103 B.C., and was governed by Cicero in 51 B.C. Later the administration was combined with that of Syria by VESPASIAN in A.D. 72. Both Luke and Paul were proper in combining Cilicia (Pedias) with Syria (Acts 15:23, 41; Gal. 1:21).

kum. See TALITHA CUM(I).

Kun kuhn. TNIV form of CUN.

Kushaiah koo-shay'yuh (קִישִׁי H7773, derivation uncertain). Descendant of LEVI through MERARI, and father of the musician ETHAN (1 Chr. 15:17); also called KISHI (6:44).

Kuthah kooth'uh. TNIV form of CUTHAH.

L. The symbol used to designate material peculiar to the Gospel of Luke; for some scholars, the symbol represents an independent literary source used by LUKE. If the infancy narratives are included, it comprises about half of the book. Some suppose that it originated c. A.D. 60, probably in CAESAREA, in either oral or written form. B. H. Streeter, in his Proto-Luke theory, held that Luke first wrote a gospel that consisted of Q (a sayings source from ANTIOCH OF SYRIA) and L, and that later on, when he became familiar with Mark's gospel, he alternated blocks of Proto-Luke with Markan material to form the canonical Gospel of Luke (The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins [1924], ch. 8). See GOSPELS; LUKE, GOSPEL OF.

S. BARABAS

Laadah lay'uh-dah (לַעֲדָה H4355, possibly "plump neck"). Son of SHELAH and grandson of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:21). He is described as the father of MARESHAH (possibly meaning the founder of the town by that name) and of “the clans of the linen workers at Beth Ashbea.”

Laadan lay’uh-dan. KJV form of LADAN.

Laban (person) lay’buhn (לָבָן H4238, “white” or “Moon God” [see also LEBANAH]). Son of BETHUEL, grandson of NAHOR (ABRAHAM’S brother), brother of REBEKAH (Gen. 24:29; cf. v. 15). The family is described as Arameans from PADAN ARAM (25:20). See ARAM (COUNTRY). It also is to be noted that Laban and his father were worshipers of the Lord (24:50).

Laban is first mentioned in connection with the arrival of Abraham’s servant at the home of Nahor to find a wife for ISAAC. Although Bethuel was still living at the time of the servant’s arrival, Laban was apparently the spokesman for the household (Gen. 24:29-33). In his meeting with Abraham’s servant, Laban shows the oriental politeness of that day, as well as a certain shrewdness (v. 30) that is more apparent later in dealing with his sister’s son, JACOB (29:13-26).

When Jacob was forced to leave his home, he was sent to his uncle Laban’s home to escape the wrath of his brother ESAU (Gen. 27:42-46). Here Laban is described as a resident of HARAN (27:43), where TERAH had lived and died (11:32). Haran was the chief city of the region of PADDAN ARAM. Laban was undoubtedly well-known there, as is evidenced by his large holdings and the immediate recognition of his name by the strangers whom Jacob met at the shepherd’s well (29:5). Jacob soon discovered that Laban had a beautiful daughter, RACHEL, and he immediately fell in love with her (29:6, 9-11, 16-18). Oriental politeness was once again shown by Laban toward Jacob as it had been earlier toward Abraham’s servant.

After a month had passed, Laban offered to hire Jacob to work for him. Jacob willingly agreed to work for the privilege of marrying Rachel. After seven years’ labor, Jacob asked for his wife. Laban’s shrewdness became evident as he substituted LEAH, who was older and less attractive, for Rachel (Gen. 29:23). He pleaded the custom of the country in his duplicity (29:26), but agreed that Jacob could have Rachel also after a week, if Jacob would work for him seven more years.

Not able to outwit Laban, and still poor after fourteen years of labor, Jacob now put his trust in God to avenge the wrong. A second bargain was made with Laban by which Jacob would receive those sheep and goats in Laban’s flock which were not of solid color (Gen. 30:20-34). It is not clear whether Jacob believed his trick—having the sheep conceive where he had peeled the rods—would work or not (30:37-43). He later testified that God had promised him Laban’s flocks and that all was of God’s doing (31:7-9).

Nevertheless, Laban’s flock did decrease and Jacob’s increased, apparently not by any dishonesty on Jacob’s part. Laban’s sons, heretofore not mentioned, murmured and Laban himself no longer trusted Jacob (Gen. 31:1-2). Jacob accused Laban of cheating him in wages, and from Laban’s past performance this is not hard to believe (31:6-7). Evidently Laban’s daughters did not doubt the truth of Jacob’s accusation (31:16). Jacob took his possessions and fled while Laban was away from home (31:20). Laban, on learning of Jacob’s flight, angrily pursued. After seven days he overtook Jacob at GILEAD in the hill country SE of GALILEE.

In this last encounter between the two branches of Terah’s family, the severe side of Laban is shown. He accused Jacob of cheating him by taking his daughters away without a farewell (Gen. 31:26-28). In addition he accused Jacob of stealing his household gods, something Jacob denied, not knowing that Rachel had indeed stolen them (31:19). Laban was unable to find the gods and Jacob soundly scolded him in return. He accused Laban of cheating him for twenty years though Jacob had faithfully served him (31:36-42). Laban never conceded a point in this argument, but yielded to Jacob anyway (31:43). Still distrusting one another, the two made a covenant whereby God was called to be a watcher over the two to prevent either from wronging the other. This has sometimes erroneously been called a “Benediction.” After that, Laban departed and never appears again in the history of God’s people.

A study of the NUZI tablets gives much insight into the biblical record concerning Laban and Jacob. Clarification is seen in the reason for Rachel’s theft of her father’s TERAPHIM, for by the teraphim she could claim inheritance in Laban’s house. (See further A. Laban (place) lay’buhn (𐤋𐤁𐤍 H4239, “white” or “Moon God”). A city in the area of encampment of Israel, across the JORDAN in the ARABAH (Deut. 1:1). In this area, MOSES spoke to Israel the words contained in Deuteronomy, just before his death. It is perhaps the same as LIBNAH, but the location is unknown.

Labana luh-bay’nuh. KJV Apoc. form of LEBANA (1 Esd. 5:29).

labor, work. The English term labor (as noun or verb) is used variously by Bible versions to render a number of terms, especially such nouns as Hebrew yēgîaʿ (H3330 and ʾĀbōdâ H6275, and Greek ergon G2240 and kopos G3160 (as well as their cognate verbs). These can refer to work in the physical (originally agricultural) sphere, but also to moral action. (See NIDOTTE, 2:400-2; 3:304-9; NIDNTT, 1:262-63; 3:1147-59.) In general, the idea of labor or work in the Bible usage seems to embody four major concepts: the productive, the disciplinary, the socioeconomic, and the redemptive.

I. The productive concept. God's original purpose for human beings is expressed in the Bible in a twofold manner as stewardship of "production" and "preservation" in the Garden of Eden under the divine commission to "work it and take care of it" (Gen. 2:15; see EDEN, GARDEN OF). That this was God's purpose, in part at least, is evidenced by his prior statement, "there was no man to work the ground" (2:5). However, this exalted divine purpose in the dignity of human labor finds its highest expression in God's commission involving the responsibility to "subdue" and "rule" the created natural order (1:28). Thus Adam and Eve were challenged to employ, under God's guidance and blessing, all phases of their personality (physical, 2:15; intellectual, 2:19-20; social, 2:18-24; and procreative, 1:28).

II. The disciplinary concept. This aspect of labor was added with a view to aiding human beings in their recovery from the divine-human alienation wrought by the FALL. While human effort (labor) then, as always in the Bible, could never be a substitute for divine ATONEMENT in salvation, it did, nevertheless, as in PAUL'S concept of the purpose of the LAW, direct and aid fallen sinners toward God's saving mercy (cf. Gal. 3:24-25).

Thus the "curse" or "judgment" pronounced by God upon humanity (Gen. 3:16-24), because of alienating sin, turned out to be God's most merciful blessing, designed to bring out of human beings, under the duress of difficult labor directed toward worthy objectives, the best and highest of their innate potential, and consequently to prevent them from yielding in slothfulness to the gravity of the fallen nature and degenerating to the lowest possible human denominator. Perhaps nothing short of the saving mercy of God in Christ is of greater benefit to human beings than honest, productive labor. If property is the extension of personality, then honest labor that produces or procures property contributes eminently to the realization of personal worth. Thus labor imposed upon humanity as a discipline because of SIN (3:17-19) turned out to be one of God's greatest corrective blessings.

III. The socioeconomic concept. The one day of rest derives its total significance from the six days of labor (Exod. 20:8-9; cf. Heb. 4:9-10). The success of the entire socioeconomic structure of all societies rests upon the various divisions of labor (men and women, skilled and unskilled, mental and manual, etc.), and the readiness of each person to perform his respective duties conscientiously and efficiently. It is as ethically obligatory upon the employed to thus serve his employer as it is for the employer to reward the employed equitably (Lk. 10:7; 1 Tim. 5:19). James pronounces strong condemnation upon the employer who withholds earned wages upon which the laborer is dependent for his livelihood (C. L. Mitton, The Epistle of James [1966], 179-80, on Jas. 5:4; cf. Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:15; Matt. 20:1-15).

Such injustices gave rise to guilds, organized labor, and trade unions to protect the workers' interests from unprincipled employers. Since labor is exacted of the SLAVE who is deprived of personal earning power, slavery or forced labor, whether under a primitive totalitarianism or a contemporary sophisticated socialistic system, can never be justified ethically. "The entire problem of work and rest, labor and relaxation, diligence and laziness, capital and labor, production and consumption, inventory and distribution, receive light from the fourth commandment" (J. B. Coffman, The Ten Commandments Yesterday and Today [1961], 55).

Wisely did Paul admonish his converts, some of whom were "living in idleness, mere busybodies," evidently equating religion with exemption from labor: "If a man will not work, he shall not eat" (2 Thess. 3:10-11). The DIDACHE (Teaching of the Twelve II) disqualifies a professed prophet if he remains with his host for more than three days, but especially if he asks for money. It has been well said that “Our highest happiness depends upon work and none should envy the poor parasite who manages to get along without it” (Coffman, Ten Commandments, 56).

IV. The redemptive concept. The ideas of labor for production and discipline merge with the biblical concept of labor in redemption. Thus considered, labor has a distinctive eschatological significance in the NT. From the outset, man began the redemption of the earth from the curse caused by human sin by laboriously tilling the soil from which he produced his livelihood (Gen. 3:17-18). But the idea of redemption is also implicit in the divinely given commission to subdue and rule the natural order (1:28). Thus the efforts (labor) of scientists throughout human history have been both redemptive and productive. The biblical redemptive concept of labor becomes more explicit in the NT. Christ labored to accomplish human salvation (Lk. 22:44; Jn. 4:34; 5:17; 9:4; 17:4), and believers are exhorted to labor to enter into the salvation-rest provided for them by Christ (Matt. 11:28-30; Jn. 6:27; Heb. 4:11). Thus considered, Christ’s eschatological provision offers deliverance from the wearisome burdens of the law. Labor for the reconciliation of unbelievers by believers is explicit and obligatory in the NT (Matt. 28:18-20; 2 Cor. 5:20; cf. 1 Thess. 1:3; Rev. 2:2). Accordingly, the last and distinctive NT use of labor for the believer on earth is in the interest of the Christian community (cf. 1 Cor. 9:16-25; Phil. 2:16; Col. 1:29; 1 Thess. 2:9). Finally, the redemptive labors of believers will be rewarded in eternal salvation by God himself (1 Cor. 15:58; Rev. 14:13).

In this wall painting from the Beni Hasan tombs in Egypt (early 2nd millennium B.C.), workers are shown in various agricultural tasks including threshing, sifting, rope-making, and harvesting.

Laccunus luh-koo’nuhs (Λακκουνος). One of the descendants of Addi who put away their foreign wives in the time of EZRA (1 Esd. 9:31; KJV, “Lacunus”); this name does not appear in the parallel list (Ezra 10).

lace. This English term is used by the KJV in the old sense of “band, cord” (Exod. 28:28, 37; 39:21, 31; Sir. 6:30).

Lacedaemonian las’uh-di-moh’nee-uhn (Λακεδαιμόνιος). KJV Lacedemonian. An inhabitant of Lacedaemon, more commonly called SPARTA, in southern GREECE. The term occurs once in the APOCRYPHA (2 Macc. 5:9; in the KJV, however, this English term is used regularly for Gk. Spartiatai, “Spartans,” 1 Macc. 12:2 et al.). Friendly relations between Sparta and the Jews began early in the 3rd cent. B.C. when Arius (309-265) was king and ONIAS I was high priest (320-290) in Jerusalem. In 168 B.C. JASON, the high priest, after his unsuccessful attempt to seize Jerusalem, was forced to flee, and went to Sparta “in hope of finding protection because of their kinship.”

This incident implies the existence of a Jewish colony in Sparta during the 2nd cent. In about 146 B.C., Jonathan wrote to the Spartans requesting renewal of the ancient friendship (1 Macc. 12:6-18) and reminding them of the earlier relations between Arius and Onias, even suggesting that the Spartans and Jews were both of the stock of Abraham and hence kinsmen (see MACCABEE). After the death of Jonathan, his brother and successor, Simon, received a reply to this letter (1 Macc. 14:20-22). In 1 Macc. 15:16-22 there is a declaration of friendship between Rome and the Jews, written by the consul Lucius to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, requesting that kings and nations refrain from fighting against the Jews. The same letter was also sent to many other neighboring countries, including Sparta (v. 23). While some have doubted the authenticity of these letters in 1 Maccabees, there are many scholars who regard them as genuine. There is no doubt that during the 2nd cent. B.C. such declarations of friendship with the Jews were made by both Rome and Sparta.

Lachish lay'kish (לָכִישׁ H4337, meaning unknown). A town within the tribal territory of JUDAH in the foothills of the SHEPHELAH, midway between JERUSALEM and GAZA, some 30 mi. SW of Jerusalem.

1. Name and identification
2. Biblical history
3. Extrabiblical historical references
4. Excavation
5. The Fosse temple
6. Inscriptions
7. The Lachish letters

I. Name and identification. The town is mentioned over twenty times in the OT, several times in the TELL EL-AMARNA correspondence, and in a few other extrabiblical sources (as early as the commercial texts from EBLA, and also on a hieratic papyrus from the days of THUTMOSE III [in the form Rakiša], a pottery bowl found in Egypt [form Latiša], and a wall relief from SENNACHERIB'S palace at NINEVEH).

Lachish is identified with Tell ed-Duweir, a large mound some 18 acres in size, 15 mi. W of HEBRON and 5 mi. to the SW of Beit Jibrin, the ancient Eleutheropolis. This identification is based on the following considerations. It is the most impressive site in the region and was occupied during the Bronze and Iron Ages as required by historical facts. It also suits the description of EUSEBIUS that “Lachish...is still a village today, seven miles from Eleutheropolis, towards the west as one goes to Daroma.” Excavation has revealed a striking resemblance between the Iron Age ruins at Tell ed-Duweir and the city shown on a relief from Nineveh depicting the attack of Sennacherib on Lakisu; the history of the site as revealed from excavation is parallel to what is known from both biblical and nonbiblical sources.

II. Biblical history. Lachish first features in biblical history in the story of the conquest (see ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, IV). It was ruled by an AMORITE king named JAPHIA who formed a coalition with four other Amorite kings under the leadership of ADONI-ZEDEK of Jerusalem (Josh. 10:1-27; 12:11). JOSHUA overthrew the city despite the help of the king of GEZER (10:31-33). Lachish was numbered among cities allotted to the tribe of Judah (15:39). After SOLOMON'S death it was fortified by REHOBAM (2 Chr. 11:9). AMAZIAH, king of Judah, sought refuge here when conspirators sought his life, but he was pursued and slain in the city (2 Ki. 14:19; 2 Chr. 25:27). In the days of HEZEKIAH, Lachish was taken by Sennacherib the Assyrian. From here he sent a message to Hezekiah in Jerusalem demanding surrender (2 Ki. 18:14, 17; 19:8; 2 Chr. 32:9; Isa. 36:2; 37:8). A century and a quarter later, Lachish and AZEKAH were the last provincial centers to withstand NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S attack (Jer. 34:7). After the EXILE, Lachish was resettled by the returning Jews (Neh. 11:30). An obscure description of Lachish as "the beginning of sin to the Daughter of Zion" (Mic. 1:13) may be a condemnation of Rehoboam's reliance on military defense rather than on God, or it may refer to the inauguration of an idolatrous cult there which later spread to other cities of Judah.

III. Extrabiblical historical references. Some meager but important references come from Syria, Egypt, and Assyria. As mentioned above, Lachish is mentioned in commercial documents discovered in Ebla (c. 2400 B.C.). An Egyptian papyrus of the time of Thutmose III (c. 1490-1435) points to Egyptian contact with the town. The Amarna correspondence of c. 1400-1360 mentions Lachish five times in contexts which show that Lachish was an important Egyptian strongpoint in Canaan. The city was involved in intrigue with the HABIRU, and other cities loyal to Egypt wrote appealing for help. In one letter from Jerusalem, the cities of Lachish, ASHKELON, and GEZER are blamed for supplying the Habiru with food and oil. Another letter refers to treachery in Lachish in which a certain Zimreda or Zimridi was slain. A bowl from Lachish dated c. 1200 or later and inscribed in hieratic refers to the "king of La-ti-ša(?)."

The Assyrian information, though limited, is important. The attack by Sennacherib on Lachish in 701 B.C. is depicted on alabaster bas-reliefs from Nineveh. The town of Lakisu is shown under siege. Some scenes depict Jewish prisoners being marched out, others being flayed, and some begging for mercy before Sennacherib seated on a throne. The inscription near the throne reads: "Sennacherib, king of the world, king of Assyria, sat upon a nîmedu-throne and passed in review the booty (taken) from Lachish (La-ki-su)" (ANET, 288b).

IV. Excavation. The history of Lachish becomes much clearer when the biblical and nonbiblical records are supplemented by information revealed by the excavation of the town. Tell ed-Duweir and selected areas on the neighboring slopes were excavated by the Wellcome-Marston Archaeological Research Expedition during the years 1932 to 1938. The director, James L. Starkey, was tragically murdered in 1938 by bandits, and the work was brought to completion by Charles H. Inge and Lankester Harding.

It is now clear that the region of Lachish was occupied very early. In Chalcolithic times (before c. 3000 B.C.) and in the first stages of the Early Bronze Age, there was a settlement in the Lachish area. Pottery, stone mortars and querns, stone maceheads and implements of flint and bone were found in natural caves over a considerable area. About 2800 in the Early Bronze II age, the settlement became confined to the present mound. The old cave dwellings then were used as tombs.

There is some disagreement about the actual dates of some of the levels, but in broad outline the following gives a general picture (all dates are B.C.):

Level I: 450-150

Gap: mound deserted Level

II: 700-586 Levels

III and IV: 900-700

Level V: City of David and Rehoboam 1000-900

Gap: mound deserted

Level VI: 1300-1225 Late Bronze

Level VII: 1450-1350

Level VIII: 1567-1450

(Subsequent work has revealed the need to revise this scheme, such as renumbering the strata beneath Level VI. For an updated report, see D. Ussishkin et al., The Renewed Archaeological Excavations at Lachish (1973-1994), 5 vols. [2004].)

Further excavation is needed to complete the story of the Early Bronze and the Middle Bronze Age. It is evident that during the HYKSOS period (c. 1720-1550) Lachish was a fortified site defended by a deep ditch or fosse and a plaster-covered glacis rising to about 100 ft. above the valley on top of which was a brick wall. These defenses fell into disuse early in the Late Bronze Age c. 1550, possibly as a result of Egyptian campaigns that drove the Hyksos conquerors out of Egypt and initiated the great period of Egyptian expansion into W Asia. A small temple was built over the debris that accumulated in the fosse, the so-called Fosse Temple (see below).

Egyptian influence in Lachish from the 12th dynasty (c. 1991-1786) onward is attested by Egyptian scarabs. The waning of Egyptian power may be marked by the destruction of the Fosse Temple c. 1220-1200, perhaps by Israelite tribesmen who followed up their earlier successes under Joshua (Josh. 10:3, 31-32). The inscribed bowl written in “year four” and mentioning the “king of Latish(?)” has been interpreted as a tax collector’s memorandum from the fourth year of MERNEPTAH (c. 1224-1216). A variety of important inscriptions was discovered in the Late Bronze Age city.

After a period of desertion during the 12th and 11th centuries, the Israelite Iron Age city was built around the year 1000. A fine palace for the provincial governor rose over the ruins of old Canaanite buildings in the center of the mound. It was built on an earth-filled platform about 105 ft. square and 23 ft. high. This structure is reminiscent of the MILLO (lit., “filling”) built by DAVID (2 Sam. 5:9) and SOLOMON (1 Ki. 9:15) in Jerusalem. Practically nothing of the original palace remains, but the ruins of a thick-walled brick building with long parallel rooms and high floors have been discovered, probably originally a granary or storehouse. Similar buildings are known from MEGIDDO and HAZOR during Solomon’s reign, but their presence at Lachish and BETH SHEMESH only 15 mi. to the N suggests that David may have had a provincial administration in Judah before Solomon’s organization of the N (1 Ki. 4:7-19). This platform was twice enlarged during the period 900-750. First it was lengthened to 256 ft. (Palace B), and then a strip 10 ft. wide was added on the E side (Palace C). On the stairway leading up to the citadel platform, the first five letters of the Hebrew ALPHABET in traditional order were scratched (dated c. 800 according to W. F. Albright).

During the late 10th cent. and at various times in the 9th, the kings of Judah improved the defenses of Lachish. The OT references to the work of REHOBOAM (2 Chr. 11:9) and possibly of ASA (14:7) before 900, then to JEHOASHAPHAT who set garrisons in the cities of Judah (17:12, 13), seem to point to occasions when the defense system of S Judah was strengthened against Philistines, Arabs, Egyptians, etc. (11:5-12). Excavation shows that during the 9th cent. Lachish was strongly protected with a double line of defense. The summit was surrounded by a ring wall some 19 ft. thick, with alternating salients and recesses and a series of defense towers. A farther 50 ft. down the slope was a second wall or revetment of stone and brick some 13 ft. thick, with alternate projecting and recessed sections and towers located at strategic points. The walls enclosed an area approximately rectangular in plan. On the W of the city, a roadway led up the hillside, and at the point where it entered the city gate a large square bastion was erected. This was later incorporated into the line of the outer wall. The masonry in the walls was mostly crudely squared boulders with more carefully prepared cornerstones. Inside the city, a street lined with shops led to the palace and the storerooms on the platform at the top of the mound. Numerous stamped jar handles dating to the 8th and 7th centuries come from what must represent Levels IV, III, II (see the discussion of inscriptions below).

There is some difference of interpretation about the destruction of Level III. Most archaeologists attribute it to the attack of Sennacherib in 701, but a few (e.g., Olga Tufnell) attribute it to NEBUCHADNEZZAR in 598 B.C. The bas-relief of Sennacherib and his written record suggest a severe attack on Lachish. In the debris outside the walls, scattered arrowheads, pieces of scale armor, sling stones, and an Assyrian-type helmet were found, and large earth ramps also were found built against the gateway area just as Sennacherib's relief depicts, so that the assignment of the destruction of Level III to the Assyrian assault is quite plausible. (See further D. Ussishkin, The Conquest of Lachish by Sennacherib [1982].)

On the NW slope of the mound was a huge communal grave containing the bones of 1,500 bodies in a heap. Many had been burned. On top of the human bones were animal bones, mostly of pigs. Large quantities of domestic pottery were scattered through the whole. It is suggested that the confused mass represents a gathering up of debris after the siege of Sennacherib. The pig bones may represent the food of the Assyrian soldiers. Three of the human skulls showed evidence of trepanning, a remarkable testimony to the standard of surgical skill in Judea in the days of Isaiah. Another feature of the Iron Age city was a great unfinished shaft on the SE side of the mound. It was a roughly hollow cube some 74 by 84 by 85 ft. in size and about half a million cubic ft. in capacity, probably intended for water storage.

After the fall of Lachish III the city probably was governed by an Assyrian governor and became a rallying point for levies from Philistines. Some reconstruction went on, and part of the ruined citadel was cleared for the building of a smaller gateway, but the rebuilding of city II was a slow process. Some claim that traces of SCYTHIAN warriors have been found in the city in the 7th cent., which may account for the slowness in rebuilding. However, the defenses were eventually restored, perhaps by MANASSEH (2 Chr. 33:11-14). A new stone wall replaced the inner wall, the former outworks were incorporated into the lower revetment as a bastion, and the entrance was by way of two gates, the outer one in the bastion facing S, and the inner one on the line of the upper wall facing W. This device exposed the invader on his right side as he approached the first gate. If he succeeded here, he turned right uphill across an enclosed court before he reached the second gate.

By the time of JEHOIAKIM, Lachish was once more a formidable city. There is evidence of two destructions early in the 6th cent. The first was no doubt due to the attack by the Babylonian army in 597, when the city gate and the citadel were partially destroyed. The brick superstructure of the palace collapsed and spread over the courtyard. The inner wall was rebuilt and some restoration undertaken, although the palace was not restored. In Nebuchadnezzar's second attack in 586 the full force of the Babylonian army was brought against the cities of Judah, which fell one by one until only Jerusalem, Azekah, and Lachish remained (Jer. 34:7). Of these, Azekah was the first to fall. Evidence of a huge conflagration at Lachish is found all over the city. It was evidently reoccupied soon after. A fine seal impression was found above the debris reading “Gedaliah who is over the House” (Isa. 22:15; 36:3; see below, VI.2).

Lachish was abandoned between 586 and 450 B.C. The postexilic city, Level I, had two phases, one Persian and one Hellenistic. During the Persian phase a fine palace was built in the N Syrian style for a governor under GESHEM (Gashmu) the Arab (Neh. 6:1). A small structure that was probably a temple contained a small limestone altar bearing an inscription carrying the name “Yah(weh)” (see below, VI.9). The second phase is attested by a “solar shrine” of the SELEUCID period. Lachish was abandoned c. 150 B.C. and was not occupied again.

V. The Fosse temple. This structure lay outside the Late Bronze Age city walls in the Middle Bronze Age fosse. It was in use from c. 1600 to c. 1200 B.C. and was enlarged on at least two occasions. Essentially it was a large room with an offering table, a hearth in front of the table, and in its final form a mud-brick altar in front of the offering table with three steps (cf. Exod. 20:26). Votive gifts of ornaments, beads, etc., in ivory, glass, alabaster, etc., lay on the table. Many small dipper flasks lay on the ground at one end of the offering table. Bones of birds, animals, and fish were found in the floor debris. The animals were all young, mostly sheep, goats, oxen, gazelles; and the bones discovered were mostly the right foreleg corresponding to the priests’ portion in Israelite sacrifices (Lev. 7:32). No statue was found inside the temple, but a bronze statuette of a male deity seated was found outside, and an ivory hand was recovered from a pit. Two inscribed pottery vessels, a ewer, and a bowl were found outside the temple (see below, VI.2). The exact nature of the Canaanite worship practiced is not clear, but evidently young animals were sacrificed, the right foreleg was reserved, gifts were placed on a cult table, fire burned in the hearth, and libation offerings were poured out. An altar with steps, an offering table, and a hearth were features of the temple furniture.

VI. Inscriptions. A variety of INSCRIPTIONS, many from the Late Bronze Age, have come from the excavation of Lachish. The following list is in chronological order (all dates are B.C.):

1. Four signs on a bronze dagger c. 1600. One sign, a human head, is possibly the ancient letter r (see RESH).

2. Five fragments with alphabetic signs of the Sinaitic type c. 1350-1200. These include a censer lid with three signs in red; a bowl with eleven signs of which five seem to be lšlšt, “for three”; a ewer decorated around the neck with wavy lines and squares and with stylized animals; an inscription of eleven letters very similar to those used at Serabit el-Khadim in the Sinai peninsula. The words mtn, “gift,” and ’lt, “goddess,” have been read.

3. A four-sided seal with the name of Amenhotep II (c. 1450-1425) on one side and a representation of Ptah and eight signs on another.

4. A fragment of a clay coffin c. 1200 or later, with unreadable hieroglyphic signs and two small hieratic inscribed sherds.

5. A pottery bowl with a hieratic text thought to be concerned with taxation including the words “King (of) Latish (?),” c. 1200 or later.

6. An inscription (c. 800) carrying the first five letters of the Hebrew alphabet in their traditional order (’ b g d h).

7. A jar fragment bearing the letters btlmyk, “the bath of the king” (a measure of capacity; see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES III .A).

8. Several seals or seal impressions with names in the old Hebrew script (8th to 6th cent.). One of them reads, “belonging to Gedaliah who is over the household”; it was possibly an official seal of GEDALIAH son of Ahikam, appointed governor of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 (2 Ki. 25:22).

9. A great number of stamped jar handles (8th to early 6th cent.), some three hundred stamped lmlk, “belonging to the king,” followed by the name of a town like Hebron, Ziph, Sochoh, or mmšt, and carrying a symbol such as a winged scroll.

10. A stone altar inscribed with three lines in Aramaic script of c. 5th to 4th cent. It begins with lbnt’, “incense.” The third line contains the words lyh mr’, “to Yah(weh) Lord (of heaven).”

11. A variety of stone weights of the 7th to 6th cent. inscribed nsp, pym, bq’. One had the letter b, others had numbers inscribed.

12. Twenty-one ostraca from the early 6th cent. written in black ink—the so-called “Lachish letters” (see next section).

VII. The Lachish letters. In 1935 eighteen ostraca inscribed in a cursive Hebrew of Jeremiah’s time were recovered from the debris in a small guard room in one of the towers of the outer city gate. Subsequently, in 1938, three more ostraca were found, bringing the total to twenty-one. These ostraca represent written documents in the classical Hebrew style from the last decade of the Judean kingdom. They are important historically because of the light they throw on the unsettled conditions in Judah during the Babylonian campaign of 586. The texts are not always clear, and scholars disagree about details of translation. (See the translations by W. F. Albright in ANET, 321-22, and by D. Winton Thomas, with extensive notes, in DOTT, 212-17.)

The Lachish letters. A portion of the 21 ostraca (potsherds inscribed in black ink) found in the gate area of Lachish destroyed by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. These letters comment on Nebuchadnezzar’s invasion, which put Jerusalem under siege.

Three of the letters are of special interest. Letter 3 gives the name of the writer, Hoshayahu, a subordinate officer in charge of an outpost of Lachish, within sight of Azekah, and of the recipient, Yaosh, the governor of Lachish. It is partly a complaint about some rebuke the writer had received, and partly a report of military movements, including reference to a journey to Egypt by a captain, Koniah son of Elnathan, and a warning message sent in by Tobyahu to Shallum, son of Yaddua, by the hand of an unidentified prophet. Letter 4 reports about commands that had been carried out and indicates that certain people had been detained. It concludes, “Let my lord know that we are watching for the fire signals of Lachish according to the signs my lord has given, because we do not see Azekah” (cf. Jer. 34:7). Letter 6 refers to disturbing letters from the king and the princes in Jerusalem: “The words of the pr(inces) are not good (but serve) to weaken our hands, (and to slac)ken the hands of the m(en) who are informed about them” (cf. Jer. 38:4). Letter 16 refers to a prophet whose name ends in -iah, variously identified with Uriah (Jer. 26:20) or Jeremiah, or perhaps some other who is unknown.

Lacunus luh-koo’nuhs. KJV form of LACCUNUS.

Ladan lay’duhn (לָדָן H4356, possibly “plump neck, double chin”). KJV Laadan. (1) Son of Tahan, descendant of EPHRAIM, and ancestor of JOSHUA (1 Chr. 7:26).

(2) Descendant of LEVI through GERSHON and ancestor of several Levitical families in charge of the temple treasuries (1 Chr. 23:7-9; 26:21). Because he is paired with SHIMEI (23:7), Ladan is usually identified with LIBNI son of Gershon (6:17), but some argue that both Ladan and the Shimei of 23:7 are more distant descendants of Gershon (KD, Chronicles, 256).

(3) KJV Apoc. form of DELAIAH (1 Esd. 5:37).

ladder. This English word is used by the KJV and other versions to render Hebrew sullām H6150, which occurs only in the account of JACOB’S dream

This artistic depiction of an Assyrian attack on an enemy town features a scaling ladder. (From Nimrud, c. 860 B.C.)

(Gen. 28:12; NIV, “stairway”). This image, it has been thought, was suggested by a flight of stone steps in the rock strata in the area where Jacob fell asleep. In ancient times ladders were used often in the siege of cities, and many are shown on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. Scaling ladders are also mentioned in the APOCRYPHA (1 Macc. 5:30; Gk. klimax). See also LADDER OF TYRE.

S. BARABAS

Ladder of Tyre (κλίμαξ Τύρου). A narrow strip of coastal alluvial plain about 5 mi. wide and a few hundred feet above the Mediterranean Sea, located between TYRE and the coastal town of ACZIB where the GALILEE hills come down almost to the sea. This strip of coast, near the present Israeli-Lebanese border, is marked by a series of intermittent low hills of Pleistocene limestone. No doubt, this narrow ledge made it difficult for any invader (or caravan) to pass from N to S, or vice versa.

The name Ladder of Tyre is not found in the canonical OT and NT, but it occurs in 1 Macc. 11:59, where ANTIOCHUS VI is said to have confirmed Jonathan MACCABEE, the Jew, as high priest, and his brother Simon as captain over the area from the Ladder of Tyre in the N to the borders of Egypt in the S. JOSEPHUS (War 2.11.2 §188) also refers to the Ladder and locates it at 11 – 12 mi. N of Roman Ptolemais (Acco), which would place it at about the present day Ras en-Naqura. (See D. Baly, The Geography of the Bible [1957], 8, 39, 128; Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 22, 182.)

W. H. MARE

lady, chosen (elect). See ELECT LADY.

Lael lay’uhl (לֵאֵל H4210, “belonging to God”). Father of ELIASAPH; during the wilderness period, the latter was a leader of the Levites descended from GERSHON (Num. 3:24).

Lagash lay'gash. An important city-state in SUMER during the first half of the 3rd millennium B.C. Lagash is identified with modern Tell al-Hiba in S Iraq, but it included the urban centers of Girsu and Nina-Sirara (modern Tello and Zurghul). Large temple complexes have been excavated. The Lagash Kinglist (early 2nd millennium), purportedly a record of the city's ancient rulers, includes a flood narrative. (See R. J. Matthews, "Girsu and Lagash," in The Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East, ed. E. M. Meyers [1997], 2:406-9; CANE, 2:2341-47.)

Lahad lay'had (לֹהָד H4262, possibly "slow, lazy"). Son of Jahath, descendant of JUDAH, and ancestor of a Zorathite clan (1 Chr. 4:2; see ZORAH).

Lahai-roi. See BEER LAHAI ROI.

Lahmam lah'mam. See LAHMAS.

Lahmas lah'mahs (לֹחֶמָס H4314 [many MSS לֹחֶמָס], meaning uncertain). Also Lahmam (if one follows the reading of many Heb. MSS and of the TARGUM). A town of JUDAH in the SHEPHELAH district of LACHISH (Josh. 15:40). The location is unknown, although some have suggested modern Khirbet el-Lahm, about 3 mi. E of Lachish.

Lahmi lah'mi (לֹחֶמִי H4313, in form a gentilic from the word meaning "bread" [cf. BETHLEHEM]). A PHILISTINE who is described as the brother of GOLIATH the Gittite and who was killed by Elhanan son of Jair (1 Chr. 20:5). The parallel passage (2 Sam. 21:19) reads differently. For a discussion of this problem, see ELHANAN #1.

Laish lay'ish (לַיִשׁ H4332, "lion"). (1) A Canaanite city in N Palestine captured by the Danites and renamed by them Dan (Jdg. 18:7, 14, 27, 29); earlier called LESHEM (in Josh. 19:47). See DAN (PERSON AND TRIBE); DAN (PLACE).

(2) Father of PALTIEL, to whom SAUL gave MICHAL, DAVID'S wife (1 Sam. 25:44; 2 Sam. 3:15).

(3) KJV form of LAISHAH (Isa. 10:30).

S. BARABAS

Laishah lay'i-shah (לַיִשָּׁה H4333, "lion"). KJV Laish. A village probably in BENJAMIN, named with GALLIM and ANATHOTH as lying along the usual invasion route of armies coming from the N (Isa. 10:30). The location is unknown, but it must have been a relatively short distance NNE of JERUSALEM.

lake. The Greek word for "lake," limnē G3349, is used only by Luke with reference to the Lake of GENNESARET—that is, the Sea of Galilee—and by the book of Revelation with reference to the LAKE OF FIRE (Lk. 5:1-2; 8:22-23, 33; Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14-15; 21:8). To prevent misunderstanding, the NIV also employs "lake" frequently to render Greek thalassa G2498, "sea," whenever this term (in imitation of Heb. yām H3542 and Aram. yam H10322) is used by itself with reference to the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:18 et al.). There are not many lakes in Syria and Palestine. Among the most important are the following: the DEAD SEA; the Waters of MEROM (Josh. 11:5, 7); Yammuneh (in the LEBANON, W of BAALBEK); and some small lakes E of DAMASCUS into which the rivers of Damascus flow and are evaporated. See also GALILEE, SEA OF.

S. BARABAS

lake of fire. This phrase translates Greek limnē tou pyros, which occurs several times in the book of Revelation (Rev. 19:20; 20:10, 14-15; cf. 21:8). All the enemies of God—the beast and the false prophet (19:20), the devil (20:10), death and HADES (20:14), all whose names are not found written in the BOOK OF LIFE (20:15), the cowardly, the faithless, the murderers, etc. (21:8)—are to be consigned at the end of this age (in the case of the beast and the false prophet), or after the 1,000 years, to the lake of fire. This is said to be the second death (20:14)—the first being presumably physical death—and consists in eternal exclusion from the new heaven and the new earth, and the new Jerusalem (21:2). See DEATH, SECOND. For the devil, the beast, and the false prophet at least, it also will include being tormented for ever and ever (20:10). Orthodox theology, linking this text with what is said elsewhere in the NT on the destiny of unbelievers, has normally understood it to apply also to unsaved human beings. On the other hand, there have been, and still are, those who feel that consignment to the lake of fire will result in the complete destruction and annihilation of unbelievers. Discussion under PUNISHMENT, ETERNAL. (See further H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John [1911] 258, 270-74, 282-83; A. B. Mickelsen, Interpreting the Bible [1963], 319-22.)

R. E. DAVIES

Lake of Gennesaret. See GALILEE, SEA OF.

Lakkum lak'uhm (לַקּוּם H4373, derivation uncertain). KJV Lakum. A town on the SE border of the tribal territory of NAPHTALI, named between JABNEEL and the JORDAN River (Josh. 19:33). Its precise location is uncertain, but some scholars identify it with modern Khirbet el-Mansurah, less than 2 mi. SW of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee, at the head of Wadi Fejjas.

lamb, Lamb of God. The principal words in Hebrew for “lamb,” that is, the young of SHEEP, are kešeb H4166 (Gen. 30:33 et al.) and śeh H8445 (Gen. 22:7-8 et al.). The common term in Greek is amnos G303, but arnion G768 is used almost thirty times in Revelation (Rev. 5:6-13 et al.; elsewhere only in Jn. 21:15).

The lamb was the principal animal of SACRIFICE among the Jews, being the offering each morning and each evening in the Mosaic system (Exod. 29:38-42), and especially on the SABBATH. Also the lamb was sacrificed on special days of religious significance: the first day of the new month (Num. 28:11), each day of the Feast of PASSOVER (28:16-19), at the Feast of PENTECOST (28:26-27), the Feast of Trumpets (29:1-2), the Great Day of Atonement (29:7-8), and the Feast of Tabernacles (29:12-16). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF; FEASTS. Specific sacrifices of a personal nature also used the lamb (e.g., a woman after giving birth, Lev. 12:6; a leper after healing, 14:10-18).

To the Jews the lamb represented innocence and gentleness. The prophets portrayed the tender compassion of God for his people under the figure of the SHEPHERD and the lamb (Isa. 40:11), and the lamb was an important symbol of the ultimate intention of God for his people (11:6). The psalmist carried the imagery of the shepherd and the lamb to its most beautiful expression in Ps. 23. Likewise the lamb was the climax of prophetic symbolism of the suffering of God's people, the servant nation, which the NT found to be a prefiguring of Jesus (Isa. 53:7; Acts 8:32).

In the NT the term is used only symbolically. Of special importance is the designation of Jesus as “the Lamb of God” by JOHN THE BAPTIST (Jn. 1:29). Some have regarded that pronouncement by the Baptist to be a thematic statement of the contents of the fourth gospel, Jesus being presented throughout the document as the lamb of sacrifice to take away the sins of the world. Much speculation has centered on the OT reference believed to have been in the mind of John when he thus spoke of Jesus. The Mosaic lamb of the Passover has been suggested frequently because Jesus is thus identified by PAUL (1 Cor. 5:7). Naturally many have found the suffering lamb (Isa. 53) to have been foremost in his mind. Still others have sought to avoid any particular reference and have considered the lamb simply as the principal animal of sacrifice in the worship of God.

Two things about this designation as applied to Jesus were most notable: he was declared to be the lamb of God and his sacrifice was for the world. All other lambs in the sacrificial system had been offered by human beings under the commandment of God; but just as God had substituted his own provision of a lamb instead of ISAAC who was under ABRAHAM’S hand, so God in Jesus provided his own Lamb. All other sacrifices of a lamb had been limited to the nation or to the individual; but the sacrifice of Jesus was worldwide, embracing all humanity in its scope. He was to take away the sins of the world. The lamb was a worthy symbol of Jesus, who in innocence patiently endured suffering as a substitute (Acts 8:32; 1 Pet. 1:19).

In the NT the term lamb was applied also to disciples of Jesus. Seventy disciples were sent forth “like lambs among wolves” (Lk. 10:3). Likewise the risen Christ charged the apostle PETER to feed his lambs (Jn. 21:15-17), which probably marked out Peter’s special responsibility to nurture and advance the people the ascended Lord would leave behind.

Of special interest is the use of the term in Revelation, where it occurs twenty-eight times in symbolic reference to Christ and once as a comparative statement identifying some aspect of the beast (Rev. 13:11). The beast was, no doubt, represented as having the horns of a lamb to point to its religious significance. The introductory reference in Rev. 5:1-14 is to the Lamb triumphant. This description of the Lamb and the works attributed to him clearly identify him as the Christ. The characteristics of the Lamb are significant. He stood as “one slain,” as if his throat had been cut in sacrifice. He had been slain, but was alive forevermore. He had seven horns, which probably were symbolic of his great power. He had seven eyes that represented his ceaseless vigilance for the people of God; thus the eyes were reinterpreted as the seven spirits of God, the fullness of God’s Spirit working in behalf of his people. His attributes were those of God—OMNIPOTENCE and OMNISCIENCE. (See L. Johns, The Lamb Christology of the Apocalypse of John [2004].)

The significance of the difference between the terms arnion (used in Revelation) and amnos (else where in the NT) has been much debated. It is most likely that the two words have the same essential meaning in the NT—a symbolic representation of the redemptive work of Christ, although in Revelation that redemptive work is viewed in connection with its triumphant victory over all things. (See ABD, 4:132-34.)

lame. This adjective (Heb. pissēah H7177; Gk. chōlos G6000) is applied to a person who walks with difficulty or is entirely unable to do so. If lameness is present at birth it is called congenital, but if it develops subsequently it is known as acquired. One form of lameness recognizable from antiquity is cyllosis, or clubfoot, which appears in variant forms but always involves permanent disability of the extremities. Another was represented on an Egyptian stela of the 18th dynasty (1570-1310 B.C.), depicting a man with an atrophied right leg, evidently the result of infantile paralysis.

Imperfectly formed or proportioned lower limbs were not unknown in early Israel (Lev. 21:18); such deformities disqualified a man from serving in the priesthood. During the early monarchy there were numerous lame people among the Jebusite population of Jerusalem (see JEBUS), though precise information is lacking (2 Sam. 5:6, 8). Allusions to lameness were incorporated into the lore of the Hebrew sages, who formulated a saying to the effect that a proverb in the mouth of a fool was similar to the legs of a lame man (Prov. 26:7). By this they implied that only the wise could use a proverb properly, and thus when employed by a fool it was as useless as the legs of a cripple. Quite apart from congenital conditions, many people doubtless became lame through accidents. Such was the case with MEPHIBOSHETH, the son of JONATHAN (2 Sam. 4:4; cf. 19:24).

Christ healed many lame persons (Matt. 15:30; 21:14), though the precise nature of the various conditions cannot be determined. More carefully described was the healing involved when PETER and JOHN were confronted by a congenital cripple at the BEAUTIFUL GATE (Acts 3:2-8). Luke used the medical terms basis G1000, “foot,” and sphydron G5383, “ankles,” in describing a weakness of the bones of the foot. While the exact nature of the pathology is unknown, it may have been a form of cyllosis or it could have resulted from a lesion of the spinal cord. Luke recorded the healing of another congenital cripple at LYSTRA by PAUL (Acts 14:8). Although this man had never walked, it is uncertain as to whether there was either malformation or atrophy present, since he was able to stand upright and walk when instructed to do so. See also DISEASE.

R. K. HARRISON

Lamech lay'mik (~~למך~~ H4347, possibly “strong man”; ~~Λάμειχ~~ G3285). (1) Son of METHUSHAEL and descendant of CAIN; the first polygamist (Gen. 4:18-24). Lamech was married to ADAH and ZILLAH. By Adah he produced JABAL, the first tent dweller and herder, and JUBAL, who invented the harp and flute, indicative of leisure time. By Zillah he begat TUBAL-CAIN, the first artificer in metals, and a daughter, NAAMAH. Lamech's poem in Gen. 4:23-24 is an example of early HEBREW POETRY, with perfect parallelism. There are at least two interpretations of the poem: (a) one is historical, that is, Lamech had committed murder, and in remorse and self-justification he excused his crime as self-defense; (b) the other views the statements as anticipatory, that is, a threat of what Lamech could do, since his son, Tubal-Cain, had invented the sword. Cain could be avenged sevenfold, but with the sword Lamech could exact seventy-seven times (going beyond the LEX TALIONIS that limited vengeance to exact equivalents). In either case Lamech, drunk with self-confidence and self-sufficiency, was not willing to wait for God's justice to operate. He did not trust in God, but rather his weapons became his gods—a phenomenon paralleled in Mesopotamian religion. The poem has been called an expression of titanic arrogance (KD, Genesis, 119). In Lamech, Cain's trend toward obstinate estrangement from God reached its climax.

(2) Son of METHUSELAH, descendant of SETH, and father of NOAH (Gen. 5:25-31; 1 Chr. 1:3; Lk. 3:36). This Lamech, weary because of the toil spent on the unfruitful land, expected the birth of his son (Noah) to remove the curse of ADAM (Gen. 5:29; cf. 3:17-19). As the son of Methuselah, he was in the godly line of Seth. The Qumran GENESIS APOCRYPHON also points this out. Since the number ten represented completion or conclusion, Lamech hoped that the tenth generation from Adam would bring fulfillment of the Edenic promise. He had lived 182 years when Noah was born, and died at the age of 777. (See G. Vos, Biblical Theology: Old and New Testament [1959], 57-59.)

According to some critics, the Cainite Lamech of Gen. 4 and the Sethite Lamech of ch. 5 were originally identical, with the two genealogies coming from one common legend or source. The alleged J document (ch. 4) preserved one variant list, and the P document (ch. 5) preserved another.

However, the differences of spelling and order of names are as striking as the similarities (note the objections to this theory in J. P. Lange, Genesis [1882], 261).

lamed lah'mid (לָמֶד, traditionally “ox-goad”). Also lamedh. The twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (ל), with a numerical value of thirty. It is possibly named for the shape of the letter, which in its older form resembled a pointed stick. Its pronunciation corresponds approximately to that of English l.

lamentation. See MOURNING.

Lamentations, Book of. The third book among the five MEGILLOTH (Scrolls) in the Hebrew Bible; found after Jeremiah in English Bibles. (JOSEPHUS, in Contra Apionem 1.8, gives evidence of a twenty-two rather than twenty-four book CANON, apparently including Ruth with Judges, and Lamentations with Jeremiah.) Its title in Hebrew is taken from the first word in the book, <sup>l</sup>êkâ H377 (“How!”) and may express a deep sense of lament over the tragic reversal of events. In the SEPTUAGINT, the title is Thrēnoi, “funeral songs, dirges, laments,” reflecting the Hebrew term qinôt (pl. of qînâ H7806), which is also used as a title for this book in the rabbinic writings. This Hebrew word designates a formal composition of grief that could be taught (Jer. 9:20), or written (2 Chr. 35:25), and that arose from tragic misfortune (2 Sam. 1:17-27; Amos 5:1). Later versions enlarged the title to “The Lamentations of Jeremiah.”

I. Background. The destruction of JERUSALEM by NEBUCHADNEZZAR in 586 B.C. is the historical background for all five poems in the book. Although Lamentations offers no direct historical references—the only proper name is EDOM, Lam. 4:22—N. K. Gottwald (in IDB, 3:62) observed the following substantial and convincing correlations between Lamentations and the accounts of the last days of Judah found in Kings and Jeremiah: siege (2 Ki. 25:1-2; Lam. 2:22; 3:5, 7), famine (2 Ki. 25:3; Jer. 37:21; Lam. 1:11, 19; 2:11-12, 19-20; 4:4-5, 9-10), flight of the king (2 Ki. 25:4-7; Lam. 1:3, 6; 2:2; 4:19-20), looting of the temple (2 Ki. 25:13-15; Lam. 1:10; 2:6-7), burning of the temple, palace, and important buildings (2 Ki. 25:8, 9; Lam. 2:3-5; 4:11; 5:18), demolition of the city walls (2 Ki. 25:10; Lam. 2:7-9), slaughter of the leaders (2 Ki. 25:18-21; Jer. 39:6; Lam. 1:15; 2:2, 20; 4:16), exile of the inhabitants (2 Ki. 25:11-12; Lam. 1:1, 4-5, 18; 2:9, 14; 3:2, 19; 4:22; 5:2), expectation and collapse of foreign help (Jer. 27:1-11; 37:5-10; Lam. 4:17; 5:6), Judah’s fickle political allies (2 Ki. 24:2; Jer. 40:14; Lam. 1:2, 8, 17, 19), and the provincial status of Judah (2 Ki. 25:22-25; Lam. 1:1; 5:8-9).

II. Unity. The usual critical view is that three or more authors over a period of perhaps two centuries produced these elegies (cf. R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction of the Old Testament [1948], 723). But Gottwald argued for the book's unity thus: "...the affinities, linguistic and ideological, are considerable. Diversities within the same poem as great as those between poems can be singled out, and yet few would ignore the acrostic unity of each of the poems and argue for composite authorship for any one chapter. Several literary types and images have been freely appropriated but not wholly assimilated, yet a single mood pervades the collection. All the poems are rooted in the same historical era—i.e., the period of the Palestinian 'exile' (586-538 B.C.). Probably the first four poems, and possibly all five, come from the same poet" (IDB, 3:62).

III. Author and date. Most scholars argue that the dramatic descriptions of the horrors of the siege were written by an eyewitness of those dreadful events, but someone who did not see the rebuilding of the second temple (538 B.C.). Now if the book is a unity, it follows that its author wrote these poems between 586 and 538. The traditional author is JEREMIAH. The LXX begins with the following introductory words: "And it came to pass, after Israel was led into captivity and Jerusalem laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem and said..."; subsequently the VULGATE added the qualifications, "with a bitter spirit sighing and wailing." This tradition was followed also by the TALMUD, the TARGUM (at Jer. 1:1), the Old Latin, and the Syriac version (see VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE, ANCIENT).

Against this tradition, N. K. Gottwald offered these objections: "One wonders if so adamant a prophet could have closely and sympathetically identified himself with the city's reliance on foreign help and facile trust in the king [Lam. 4:16, 19]. It is difficult to imagine the prophet, who remained in Palestine only a few weeks after Jerusalem's capture, writing the fifth poem, with its ennui and lassitude induced by years of foreign occupation. It is unlikely that Jeremiah, who in the whole of his identified writings never resorts to extensive poetic formalities, should have undertaken the construction of acrostic poems. And finally, if the poems are by the prophet, it is difficult to know why they were not included in the Book of Jeremiah, especially when we consider how many oracles of much later origin have been collected under his name" (IDB, 3:62).

Yet according to 2 Chr. 35:25, Jeremiah uttered laments for JOSIAH'S death, demonstrating that the prophet did compose this type of literature. Moreover, Gottwald acknowledged that in addition to figures common to both books, appeal can be made "to the large amount of Jeremianic diction" (cf. M. Lühr, "Der Sprachgebrauch des Buches der Klagelieder," ZAW 14 [1894]: 36-37). Finally, many scholars recognize that the "I" in Lam. 3 represents Jeremiah; for example, Gottwald himself said: "The speaker in vv. 48-51 is none other than Jeremiah (cf. Jer. 7:16; 11:14; 14:11, 17; 15:11)" (Studies in the Book of Lamentations [1954], 38). J. Köberle maintained that the third poem represents the appropriation of Jeremianic religious individualism by a later age. The poet desired, in Köberle's opinion, to speak e persona Jeremiae (Gottwald, Studies, 39-40). The objections against Jeremianic authorship do not seem sufficient to lead to Gottwald's conclusion that an anonymous author chose Jeremiah to deliver a kind of penitential sermon in the first person. If the "I" of Lam. 3 is Jeremiah and the book is a unity, it seems more desirable to conclude that the unanimous traditional view probably is founded in fact. Finally, as S. R. Driver has remarked, the same sensitive temper, profoundly sympathetic in national sorrow and ready to pour forth its emotions unrestrainedly, manifests itself both in Lamentations and Jeremiah (An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament [1912], 462; see further W. W. Cannon, "The Authorship of Lamentations," BSac 81 [1924]: 42-58).

IV. Style. The first four poems are ACROSTIC; that is, the stanzas begin with the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew ALPHABET in succession. The first three poems have three lines to a stanza (except for four lines in Lam. 1:7; 2:19), whereas the fourth

In this artistic depiction (from Nimrud, c. 728 B.C.), captives deported by Tiglath-Pileser III are sitting in a cart drawn by an ox. The later Babylonian deportation of Jerusalem's residents, deplored in the book of Lamentations, would have had a similar appearance.

poem has but two lines to a stanza. In ch. 3, the central poem, each line begins with the appropriate letter (thus there are three aleph lines, three beth lines, etc.). The final poem is not acrostic, but it too contains twenty-two lines. Concerning the exceptions to this arrangement (e.g., the transposition of ayin and peh in chs. 2-4), Gottwald observed: "Like a great cathedral, its unity is broken in innumerable pleasing ways, never distracting but always contributing to the total impression" (Studies, 23).

The apparent contradiction between this artificial literary form and spontaneity of emotion can be harmonized by understanding the purpose of the acrostic construction. De Wette, Keil, and others suggested that it furnished a form for exhaustive completeness to the lamentation. Gottwald quoted A. Jeremias thus: "When a person says the alphabet, he has thereby embraced all possibilities of words" (cf. Studies, 29). By proceeding from aleph to taw, the author achieved an emotional catharsis, a complete statement of grief and a complete cleansing of conscience through a total confession of sin. Second, it obviously aided the memory. Finally, the acrostic enforced the most judicious economy upon the poet. The poet's self-imposed restraint led to the obvious compactness and concentration of emotion.

The acrostic is combined with the clipped Qinah metre 3 + 2 (with ample exceptions 2+2, 2 + 3, and 3 + 3). The two together leave the impression of deep feeling that is disciplined and restrained. The fifth poem is chiefly 3 + 3.

V. Form. As to literary form, the poems are composite. The setting in life is that of communal lament. Moreover, these poems exhibit common motifs with communal lament psalms: (1) direct address to Yahweh, (2) assigning Yahweh responsibility for the national calamity and the resulting humiliation, (3) a motivation, appealing to Yahweh to act, and (4) a supplication, addressing Yahweh in the imperative. To achieve his purpose, the author draws upon motifs from other types of literature as well, particularly the funeral song and the individual lament.

According to an article by H. Jahn, "The Scheme of Reversal is the dominant element in the funeral song." Gottwald summarized this article thus: "Jahn observes that in the funeral song there are two basic themes. One is praise and the other is lament. Encomiums of the dead consistently emphasize certain features of the past glory of the deceased: his bodily excellence (Lam. 4.7, cf. Isa. 52.14; 53.2), his splendid garments, the number of his wives and children, his riches and luxuries (Lam. 4.5; Ezek. 27.3ff.)...Laments, on the other hand, bewail the sad state of the present...the abandonment and defenselessness of the survivors (Lam. 1.1), the manner of death especially if unnatural (Jer. 38.22; II Sam 3.33f; Lam. 1.19f.; 2.11, 21; 4.5), the infamy of such a death (II Sam 3.33f.), and the malicious joy of the enemy (II Sam 1.20 [Lam. 2.15, 16]). Far from being unrelated elements, the motifs of praise and lament were frequently placed in a definite scheme which Jahn calls, 'das Schema "Einst und Jetzt,"' i.e., the then and the now. By this means the starkest instances of past glory are deliberately contrasted with the most glaring examples of present misery and degradation. The effectiveness of both is doubled by their incongruity" (Studies, 53-54).

The motif as it appears in Lamentations is very complex. There is the primary and fundamental contrast between the former glory of Zion and her present ignominy, but there are variations of the theme. First, the central subject of the lament is not dead. Second, the contrast is between the expected future of Israel and the expected future of the nations. Gottwald referred to this latter variation as "the tragic reversal in reverse" (ibid., 55, 60). He concluded: "it is not overestimating the centrality of the category of tragic reversal to assert that nearly all of the other motifs are only related to it in one way or another, but that they actually find their mode of expression in its framework" (ibid., 61-62).

M. Löhr pointed out that two individual laments are found in Lam. 3:1-24 and 3:52-66 and are interrupted by a long passage in which Jeremiah is presented as the counselor of submissions and hope. In the lament psalms Jeremiah functions as the archetypal sufferer (M. Löhr, "Threni III. und die jeremianische Autorschaft des Buches der Klagelieder," ZAW 24 [1904]: 1-6). According to Gottwald, the author is not thinking in terms of an individual at all but is simply giving expression to the corporate personality. He said: "Jeremiah is the individual sufferer without equal, but by virtue of his representative position as the great prophet...He is Israel" (Studies, 40). C. Westermann (Praises of God in the Psalms [1965], 52-60) classified the fifth poem as a lament of the people manifesting the typical introductory address, lament, confession of trust, and petition.

VI. Purpose and theology. For H. Wiersma, the chief task of the poem is to effect a development and improvement in human conduct in the face of suffering. Wiersma sees various types of suffering: expiatory suffering, conversion suffering, purifying suffering, humbling suffering, and serviceable suffering ("Das Leid im Buche der Klagelieder," Zeitschrift für Aszese und Mystik 4 [1929]: 109). For Gottwald the situational key to the theology of lamentations is the tension between Deuteronomic faith and historic adversity. The Deuteronomic doctrine of retribution and reward is clear and simple: if the people of Israel obey the law of God and do his will, they will enjoy peace and blessing; if, on the other hand, they fail to keep God's commandments and laws, they will be visited by curses and misfortunes. But, according to Gottwald, the historical reality is that Judah suffered defeat after the Josianic reformation.

Yet Gottwald's thesis should be rejected, because this tension cannot be sustained in the book itself. On the contrary, the poet insists that it is precisely because of the people's sins that they have been struck by God's judgment (Lam. 1:5, 8-9, et passim). In reality he is in complete harmony with the theology of the Deuteronomist.

For B. Albrektson (Studies in the Text and Theology of the Book of Lamentations [1963]) the source of tension lies in the Zion traditions concerning the inviolability of Zion (Pss. 46:6-8; 48:2-9; 76:2-7), a doctrine familiar to the author (Lam. 2:15; 4:12; cf. also Lam. 5:19 with Ps. 48:2; and the reference to Elyon in Ps. 66:5 and Lam. 3:35, and the prophetic threats in Deut. 28). In fact, Albrektson convincingly demonstrated that the author consciously alluded to these visitations depicted in Deut. 28 as the wages of sin (cf. Lam. 1:3 with Deut. 28:58; Lam. 1:5 with Deut. 28:13, 44; Lam. 1:6 with Deut. 28:41; Lam. 1:9 with Deut. 28:43; Lam. 2:20 and 4:10 with Deut. 28:53; Lam. 3:14 and 45 with Deut. 28:37; Lam. 4:16 and 5:12 with Deut. 28:50). (Significantly, he argues here that Deut. 28 is older than Lamentations and cannot have been written as vaticinia ex eventu.) But the same objection must be raised against his thesis as against Gottwald's: the text does not exhibit this fabricated tension.

In addition to providing the people with an emotional catharsis through an exhaustive expression of grief and confession, the author was also determined to inculcate an attitude of submission and a prospect of hope. Gottwald said: "By intimately binding together the themes of sin, suffering, submission and hope, he intended to implant the conviction of trust and confidence in the goodness and imminent intervention of Yahweh. That this is the case is evident in the third poem where the acrostic form is intensified at precisely the point where hope becomes the strongest" (Studies, 30). Christian interpretation has rightly seen in these poems an apt expression of Christ's lament when God vented his wrath on him as he was made the sin of the world.

VII. Content. The primary points of the poems are these: Jerusalem's lamentable state (Lam. 1); God's wrath against the city (ch. 2); God's faithfulness acknowledged (ch. 3); God's faithfulness seen in discipline (ch. 4); God's faithfulness trusted (ch. 5).

lamp. The common household lamp is never described in the Bible, although the twisted flax wick is mentioned (Isa. 42:3), and so is olive OIL as fuel (Exod. 25:6; 27:20; Matt. 25:3-4). Palestinian tombs and excavations of towns, however, have provided innumerable lamps from the time of ABRAHAM onward, so that the archaeologist can carefully trace the development of lamp forms. While Scripture alludes to their common daily use (e.g., Prov. 31:18; Jer. 25:10), lamps also are mentioned with rich symbolical meaning.

Lamps found in Palestine from the OT period were made almost entirely of POTTERY. In some cases certain features indicate that metal prototypes were copied. In the Late Chalcolithic and Early Bronze Ages (3300-2100 B.C.) shallow round-based bowls for holding the oil seem—judging from marks of wicks burning on the rims—to have been used as lamps. Probably the incoming AMORITE tribesmen c. 2000 (Middle Bronze I) introduced the first true lamps; these are invariably fourspouted (i.e., the rim is pinched in four places to form wide lips for holding wicks). From c. 1850 onward, the ordinary lamp had a single lip. This became increasingly pinched together.

When the Israelites entered the Promised Land, they simply copied the Canaanite lamp shapes for many centuries. In the time of the prophets, potters in Judah added a base to make the lamp more stable. While the lip became more elongated, through the Persian period the lamp remained an open vessel, always with the danger of the oil slopping over when carried.

Imported Greek lamps were so practical, however, that in the Hellenistic age local potters soon switched from the open saucer lamp to the wheel-made lamp, with a central filling hole in the top of the round, enclosed body, to which a long projecting nozzle was attached. In the Roman period, the so-called Herodian lamp became popular in Jerusalem and the hill country, simple and small with round body and a short, flaring nozzle. Undoubtedly Jesus had this style in mind in his parable of the woman who lighted a lamp (Lk. 15:8; Gk. lychnos G3394) to search for her lost coin, and in the parable of the ten virgins who were awakened at midnight and arose to trim their lamps (Matt. 25:7; Gk. lampas G3286), that is, adjust the wicks.

Herodian oil lamps discovered at Masada.

The form of the individual lamps (Exod. 25:37; Heb. nēr H5944) on the golden lampstand (niěñôrâ H4963, see CANDLESTICK) in the TABERNACLE is suggested by a correct understanding of Zech. 4:2. The envisioned gold lampstand consists of a large bowl, elevated on a stand, with seven lamps, each having seven spouts or channels (NRSV, “lips”; Heb. mûṣāqâ H4609), arranged around its broad rim. Such seven-lipped lamps have been found in tombs and house ruins at many Iron I and Iron II sites in Palestine, so that the style was enjoyed by commoners as well as in the sanctuary. Lamps of this type seem to have originated around Ras Shamra in Syria (see UGARIT), where they have been excavated from the Middle Bronze level. It can no longer be held that the concept of a sevenfold light source was a priestly invention of the 5th cent. B.C.

In practice, the ordinary lamp in OT times held enough oil to burn through the night, but the wick had to be adjusted every few hours as it burned down. Hence, the virtuous housewife (Prov. 31:18) needed to arise once or twice during the night to trim her lamp lest it go out and there be no pilot flame to light her fire in the morning. Lamps probably were placed in concave niches in the walls of houses, as they were in walls of tombs and of water tunnels. If lampstands were used (cf. Matt. 5:15; Lk. 8:16; 11:33; KJV, “candlestick”), they were probably made of wood, for ceramic and metal stands have been found only in ruins of shrines. (Candles were unknown in Bible times; hence every KJV use of “candle” or “candlestick” refers to a lamp or lampstand.)

In 2 Ki. 4:10, the mûṣāqâ H4609 probably refers to a pottery lamp of a different style from the common nēr. It may have been the “cup-and-saucer” lamp, a high cup in the center of a small bowl, all made in one piece by the potter (see R. H. Smith in BA 27 [1964]: 14-17). More likely it was a pedestal lamp, a seven-spouted lamp on a terra-cotta pedestal in the form of a stylized tree, having religious significance and thus suitable for a “holy man of God” (ibid., 23-24).

Lamps in OT times were not adapted for night travel. Therefore the TORCH was used whenever light was needed, as in GIDEON’S attack on the Midianite camp (Jdg. 7:16, 20; Heb. lappîd H4365). The well-known verse “Your word is a lamp to my feet / and a light for my path” (Ps. 119:105) may depict two images, a lamplight for one’s walk in his home, and a torchlight for his journey out-of-doors. By NT times actual lanterns (phanos G5749) as well as torches were available for the temple police going to arrest Jesus (Jn. 18:3; see R. H. Smith in BA 29 [1966]: 6-7).

Since ANE peoples feared darkness, the presence of a burning lamp with its light symbolized abundant life, joy, and peace (Ps. 18:28); whereas the extinguishing of the lamp suggested dying and utter gloom and desolation (2 Sam. 21:17; Job 18:5-6; 21:17; Prov. 13:9; 20:20; 24:20). The lamp of the wicked will go out because it lacks the true life-giving illumination of God (Smith in BA 27:21). Because the ancient considered his life to be continued through his offspring, his “light” was not put out if he had a son. The lamp also symbolized posterity (1 Ki. 11:36; 15:4; 2 Ki. 8:19). Placing lighted lamps in tombs was a symbolic act signifying belief in, and hope for, life after death.

lampstand. See CANDLESTICK.

lance. See ARMOR, ARMS.

Land, Holy. See PALESTINE.

land, redemption of. See REDEMPTION.

land, theology of. The pervasive biblical concept of land is rooted in both CREATION and REDEMPTION. Because God is the creator of the world the whole belongs to him (Gen 14:24; Pss. 24:1; 89:11; et al.). The word land and related terms refer not only to the world, to countries, to regions, and to “turf,” but in many instances to much more than the physical world.

Of primary concern is the fact that land is where God placed his creatures to live. “The LORD God took the man and put him in the Garden of Eden to work it and take care of it” (Gen. 2:15). See EDEN, GARDEN OF. This passage is generally interpreted to mean that “work” was part of the intended creative order of God, and that humans are to be good—ecologically aware—stewards of God’s creation. While these ideas may be true, some have argued persuasively that a correct reading of this verse should be, “the LORD God took man and put him in the Garden of Eden to worship and obey” (J. Sailhamer in EBC, 1:44-48, following U. Cassuto). Humans were “placed” in the place that he had prepared for them, namely “Eden,” for rest and safety, and as a sacrifice is placed by God’s altar, to live their lives in God’s presence. This verse also answers the question as to why humans were created: to live their lives in the presence of their Creator “worshiping and obeying” him.

When ADAM and EVE sinned, they were removed from the presence of the Holy Creator, from the idyllic “restful” environment of Eden. Genesis 3-11 describes in vivid detail the results of the FALL and life outside of “the land of Eden” (Cain and Abel, Lamech, the sons of God and the daughters of men, the flood, and the Tower of Babel incident). The words spoken to ABRAHAM, ISAAC, and JACOB form the foundational promise of God to humanity as to how Edenic conditions will be restored (see W. C. Kaiser, Jr., Toward an Old Testament Theology [1978], 88). The new people of God will descend from Abraham, and they will be empowered (= “blessed”) to live their lives in God’s presence in the land (Canaan; Gen. 12:7; 13:15, 17; 15:7-8; 17:8; et al.) that God will give them. This restored community will be administered by God’s regent (king; 17:6, 16; 35:11), and ultimately, selected people from all nations will join this community (12:3; 18:18; 22:17-18; et al.).

After living in Egypt for over 400 years, God delivered the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob from bondage in fulfillment of his promises. The goal of this deliverance was to establish them as a worshiping obedient community in the Land of Canaan (Exod. 6:1-9). Note especially that God was leading them to his holy habitation, to plant them in the mountain of his inheritance, the place of his dwelling, his sanctuary (15:13, 17). In other words, they were being led back to “Eden” where they could live their lives in worshipful obedience to God (Gen. 2:15). Thus life in the Land of Canaan is much more than mere human socioeconomic relationships—it has to do with God’s intended destiny for his people.

As the exodus progresses, God’s presence fills the TABERNACLE (Exod. 40) in fulfillment of his promise to dwell in the tents of SHEM (Gen. 9:27), and then he leads his people in procession to the place where he will “put” them (i.e., cause them to “rest,” a possible rendering of the hiphil of nûah H5663 Gen. 2:15) and where he will dwell in their midst (Deut. 12). Viewed in this light, the legislation given at Mount SINAI provided the framework as to how God’s people are to live obedient worshipful lives in his presence (in fulfillment of the true destiny of humanity). The biblical writers call this intended idyllic state “rest,” and this was the goal of the conquest and settlement of Canaan as described in the books of Joshua and Judges (e.g., Josh. 1:13, 15; 22:4; 23:1; et al.).

Throughout the history of God’s people, the foundational intention (Gen. 2:15) and the redemptive promise were always available for fulfillment as they lived in the land. Notice one of the progressive climaxes as God comes to “dwell” in the TEMPLE SOLOMON had built (1 Ki. 8). However, God’s people failed to live their lives in grateful obedience, and the prophets were continually calling the people back to avoid punishment (Deut. 28) and to fulfill their destiny by truly obeying and worshiping God (e.g., Isa. 1 and Jer. 7). Because of continuing disobedience, God removed himself from their presence (Ezek. 9-11); then the covenant curses fell as the Babylonians devastated the land, destroyed Jerusalem, and carried many people into exile.

Prophets before, during, and after the physical exile wrote about a glorious day ahead when God and his people would return to the land to live in the idyllic conditions that would be established at that time (Ezek. 43; Isa. 40). They even prophesied that the Gentiles would experience blessing (empowerment) to worship and obey the true and living God (e.g., Isa. 2:1 – 5; 56). N. T. Wright has shown that during the time between the Testaments many Jews, even though physically living in the land, still thought of themselves as being in exile—for the glorious future described by the prophets had not developed (Christian Origins and the Question of God. Vol. 1: The New Testament and the People of God [1992], 268-69). Indeed, even though they were living in “the land,” they were under foreign domination.

With the coming of Jesus as God incarnate, and thus the inauguration of the new age, it is evident that the promises with regard to the land, Jerusalem, the temple, and Israel find their fulfillment in him. Jesus is the “seed” that had been promised to the patriarchs and to David (Rom. 4; Gal. 3:16). In addition, those called by him and living in covenantal faithfulness are in another sense the “numerous seed” (descendants) promised to Abraham and are the true people of God who are called to bring blessings to the Gentiles (Rom. 4; Gal 3:7-9, 14, 29).

Not only was Jesus “God in the flesh,” but his church (1 Cor. 3:16) and his followers (6:19) now exhibit his presence here on earth. Thus living “in Christ” now replaces the idea of living “in the land.” This is no “mere” spiritualization of any of the promises, but is in fact a heightened fulfillment of them. For God’s people, the call is the same as that to Adam and Eve in the garden (Gen. 2:15), and to Israel in Canaan—that is, to fulfill their God-appointed destiny by living their lives in his presence with true heartfelt worship and obedience.

Thus, just as the “seed” and “blessing” have been universalized, so too has “life in the land” been transposed to a higher and more intensive level. The believer’s calling is thus to enjoy “life in the land,” the “rest,” and the city (“Jerusalem”) that our spiritual ancestors were seeking on their earthly pilgrimage (Heb. 11:8-16; 12:22). The climax to the biblical idea of land is for God’s people to ultimately return to “Edenic land conditions,” but in a city—the new Jerusalem where God’s people will dwell with him in blissful worship and obedience (Rev. 21-22).

landmark. This English term is used by the KJV and other versions to render Hebrew gēbûl H1473 (“boundary”) when this term refers to an inscribed stone on which the boundaries of fields, districts, and nations were defined (cf. the heap and pillar set up by LABAN, Gen. 31:51-52). To remove a landmark was a serious offense. In Babylonia it was a crime, and it was forbidden in Egypt, Greece, and Rome. The law of Moses warns against the removal of landmarks (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; NIV, “boundary stone”). The removal of landmarks also is used in Scripture symbolically of overturning ancient customs or laws (Prov. 22:28; 23:10; cf. Job 24:2 [gēbûlâ H1474]).

languages of the Ancient Near East. Those languages of the Ancient Near East that have left behind many documents on clay, stone, PAPYRUS, or even PARCHMENT are fairly few in number and are for the most part well known. There were dozens of other languages and dialects spoken by the various nationalities and tribes of this region that left virtually no INSCRIPTIONS which have survived to our times, and whose existence is known either from references to them in extant literature or from archaeological recovery of their artifacts. In many cases all that have survived are a few of their personal names or the names of their gods, from which some elements of their language may be deduced. (For a general survey with useful bibliography, see J. Kaltner and S. L. McKenzie, eds., Beyond Babel: A Handbook for Biblical Hebrew and Related Languages [2002].)

I. The most ancient literary languages

A. Sumerian. The earliest pictographic inscriptions of Sumerian were found in clay tablets from about 3200 B.C. (see SUMER). It was characterized by a fairly rigid word order, in which the adjective always followed its noun rather than preceding it, and the verb tended to come at the end of its clause just as consistently as in classical Latin. Nouns were “inflected” by means of postpositions (equivalent to prepositions), and verbs were modified as to tense, aspect, pronoun subjects, and objects by prefixed or postfixed consonants or monosyllabic elements.

The pictographs, which later developed into CUNEIFORM equivalents, served not only as ideograms (i.e., a single sign conveying the entire word), but also as phonetic syllables available for sounding out other words having no relation in sense to the original pictograph (see WRITING). Thus the sign for a human mouth not only signified KA as the word for “mouth” itself, but also to spell out the cluster Urimaka (i.e., Urim. ak. a, “of Ur,” followed by the a pointing to the subject of the verb). Other signs were used as determinatives (i.e., indicators of the class to which the noun belonged, whether a country, a city, a god, a man, or an animal) without having any phonetic value at all. This system of writing was adaptable to other languages besides Sumerian, since it provided a syllabary capable of sounding out the words of, for example, Akkadian, Hittite, or Hurrian (see below).

The younger nations that fell under the cultural influence of Sumerian tended to adopt its entire syllabic system, although adding new sound values to the characters in accord with the same rebus principle that Sumerian itself had followed. Furthermore, a great many of the Sumerian words written in one or two signs were preserved in these other languages unchanged, even though they were read aloud in the equivalent words from those languages. For example, the Sumerian sign for “king” was pronounced lugal (literally “great man”); but if used in an Akkadian inscription, it was pronounced šarrum. Likewise in Hittite the Sumerian sign for “man” (lu) was copied out to express the idea of “man,” but it was undoubtedly pronounced antuhšaš, the actual Hittite word for “man.”

Sumerian was for the most part written in the Eme-ku dialect, but there was also a later dialect known as Eme-sal, which apparently was spoken particularly by women; it is not found in documents earlier than the 18th cent. B.C. (See further A. Falkenstein, Das Sumerische [1959]; M.-L. Thomsen,

This cuneiform tablet lists numerous foreign names with their Akkadian equivalents.

B. Egyptian. Traditionally, Egyptian has been considered an ancient representative of the so-called Hamitic languages. The connection between the Hamitic and the Semitic languages, however, has become more clearly understood in recent decades, and modern linguists prefer to use the term Afroasiatic (rather than Hamito-Semitic) and to view that large family as consisting of at least five branches: Egyptian, Semitic, Berber (spoken in N Africa), Cushitic (E Africa), and Chadic (sub-Saharan Africa); possibly also Omotic (SW Ethiopia). (See R. Hetzron, “Afroasiatic Languages,” in The World’s Major Languages, ed. B. Comrie [1990], 645-53; A. Loprieno, “Ancient Egyptian and Other Afroasiatic Languages,” in CANE, 4:2135 – 50.)

Documents in Egyptian, the literary language of the ancient NILE Valley, were written in pictographs quite different in appearance from those of lower Mesopotamia, and they operated upon a somewhat different phonetic principle. That is to say, the vowels of the spoken language were virtually omitted from its written form, which uses consonantal units only. Some characters were used acrostically, that is, they were indicated by the initial consonant of the object portrayed by the sign (e.g., from the sign “hand,” Egyptian dr.t became the alphabetic value d when this sign was used to spell other words). Others were biconsonantal (thus, the sign for “house,” pr, could be used to spell other words that contained the consonants p-r) or even tri-consonantal (like the scarab-beetle, ḥpr, which furnished the consonants ḥ-p-r to the common verb “become”).

Egyptian used many ideograms, as did Sumerian especially in the earliest stage of the language, but, in addition, the use of the determinatives became so extensive that nearly every noun and verb was equipped with at least one of these nonphonetic sense indicators (fortunately for the modern scholars who first deciphered the language). Unlike Sumerian and Akkadian, which used most of their determinatives at the beginning of the word, Egyptian invariably placed them at the end. In morphology and syntax the Egyptian language basically resembled the Semitic languages, in that it retained a tense (the Old Perfective) with sufformatives similar to the perfect tense of NW Semitic and S Semitic and to the so-called permansive of Akkadian. Furthermore, the subject followed the verb, rather than preceding it, except for the pseudoverbal construction (where the subject preceded either a preposition-governed infinitive, or else an Old Perfective).

Egyptian developed a large number of compound verbal “tenses” by the use of various auxiliaries and qualifying particles, some of which indicated past tense or future tense, others of which indicated the action as of central importance, or as consequent upon the action of the preceding clause. Eventually this Middle Kingdom Egyptian gave way to a New Egyptian, which made far greater use of the pseudoverbal construction and employed more signs to spell many of their words. It also made full use of the definite article as early as the 18th dynasty (although this was rather frowned upon in official literary style until the 19th dynasty). By the 1st millennium a still later form of the language, called Demotic, came into use, and this led to Coptic, that form of Egyptian which was spoken in the Greco-Roman period, and written no longer in hieroglyphics or any of its cursive forms (as Hieratic and Demotic were), but in pure alphabetic Greek letters, supplemented by a few Demotic signs to compensate for Egyptian sounds not present in the Greek alphabet.

Coptic appeared in several different dialects, of which the most important (considered also the most classical form) was Sahidic or Sa<sup>h</sup>idic, the language of S Egypt, in which the earliest literature and translations of the Bible were composed. From the standpoint of literary remains, the next most important dialect was Bohairic, spoken in N Egypt, the Delta. It eventually became the official language for the ritual of the Coptic Church, and has so remained to this day. In Middle Egypt the prevalent dialects were Akhmimic and Fayumic (called Bashmuric in older scholarship), of which far fewer specimens have survived to our day.

(See further A. H. Gardiner, Egyptian Grammar, 3rd ed. [1957]; J. Vergote, Grammaire copte, 2 vols. [1973-83]; J. Verný and S. I. Groll, A Late Egyptian Grammar, 3rd ed. [1984]; A. II. The Semitic languages. This group of languages, now understood to be a branch of the larger Afroasiatic family (see I.B above), has traditionally been divided into (1) East Semitic, consisting of Akkadian, that is, Babylonian and Assyrian (possibly Eblaite as well); (2) South Semitic, consisting of Arabic, Ethiopic, and S Arabian; and (3) Northwest Semitic, which is further subdivided into Aramaic and Canaanite (the latter comprising Hebrew, Moabite, Phoenician, et al.; many scholars include Ugaritic here as well). Recent specialists, however, tend to view Arabic (N Arabian) as closely related to the NW Semitic family and prefer a classification along the following lines (cf. J. Huehnergard, “Semitic Languages,” in CANE, 4:2117-34, who however prefers the term Levantine for NW Semitic):

East Semitic (Akkadian)

West Semitic

South Semitic (S Arabian and Ethiopic)

Central Semitic (N Arabian and NW Semitic)

It should also be noted that R. Hetzron (“Semitic Languages,” in The World’s Major Languages, 654-63) subdivides Central Semitic into S Central and Aramaic, then further subdivides S Central into Arabic and Canaanite. The suggestion that Hebrew may be genetically closer to Arabic than to Aramaic has not been widely accepted, but it does reflect a general dissatisfaction with the traditional analysis, even though no alternate classification has firmly taken hold in modern scholarship. It should also be noted that Eblaite (or Eblaic, the language of EBLA) is considered by some scholars to be an early form of NW Semitic, but a growing number of specialists regard it as E Semitic. (See further J. H. Hespers, A Basic Bibliography for the Study of the Semitic Languages, 2 vols. [1973]; J. Huehnergard, ed., New Directions in the Study of Semitic Languages [1996]; R. Hetzron, ed., The Semitic Languages [1997]; S. Izre’el, ed., Semitic Linguistics: The State of the Art at the Turn of the Twenty-first Century [= Israel Oriental Studies 20, 2002].)

A. Akkadian. The earliest stage of this language, known as Old Akkadian, was spoken from about 2500 to 1950 B.C. and is represented by a modest number of documents from Sargon of Agade and various later royal inscriptions. From this stage ensued various Babylonian and Assyrian dialects (see ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA).

Old Babylonian was spoken between 1950 and 1530 B.C. (cf. W. von Soden, Grundriss der akkadischen Grammatik, 2nd ed. [1969], 2) and found its best-known literary expression in the Code of HAMMURABI; but there are several religious texts, many letters, court dockets, contracts, receipt tablets, and other documents in the same dialect. Middle Babylonian was used from 1530 to 1000 in letters, records, royal inscriptions (in Assyria as well as Babylonia, since it was regarded as standard for literary expression), in the TELL EL-AMARNA letters, and at Nuzi (in slightly Hurrian cast). New Babylonian included the 1st millennium (von Soden regards the period after 625 as Late Babylonian), and comprised a rather sparse selection of letters and documents until its final florescence under the Chaldean or Neobabylonian Empire (when a simplified form of the script and a loss of inflectional vocalic endings characterized those inscriptions not dominated by the scholarly archaizing style favored in official circles in the Chaldean court).

Old Assyrian (1950-1750 B.C.) is preserved largely in the mercantile letters and records of the Assyrian merchants who did business in CAPPADOCIA. Middle Assyrian (1500-1000) was represented largely by various legal codes and royal inscriptions and a few letters, but much of the official writing was couched in literary Babylonian, as indicated above. New Assyrian or Imperial Assyrian marked the period from 1000 to 600, when the Assyrians by fluctuating stages achieved complete dominance in the ANE and adorned their palaces with bas-reliefs inscribed with their glorious conquests. The inscriptions from this era contain the references to Israel that are of greatest interest to the student of Bible history.

It should be added that even after the fall of the Assyrian and Chaldean empires, the Akkadian language found employment in the Persian and even in the Seleucid period as a scholarly literary medium, usually in such bilingual or polylingual monuments as the BEHISTUN INSCRIPTION (c. 490 B.C.), but with occasional monolingual dedicatory inscriptions as late as the reign of ANTIOCHUS I (281-260 B.C.). (See further E. Reiner, A Linguistic Analysis of Akkadian [1966]; R. Caplice, Introduction to Akkadian [1988]; A. Ungnad and L. Matouš, Akkadian Grammar, trans. H. A. Hoffner, Jr. [1992]; J. Huehnergard, A Grammar of Akkadian, 3rd printing [2000].)

B. Arabic. Monuments of the Arabic (N Arabian) dialects begin around the 5th cent. B.C. and continue into the 4th cent. A.D. They are usually divided into Thamudic, Lihyanic, and Safaitic, and are preserved largely in funerary or dedicatory inscriptions. Classical literary Arabic was a northern dialect spoken at Mecca and Medina, and owed its supremacy to its use in the Koran (composed c. A.D. 620-630), which set the standard for the Islamic world from that day until this. It may represent, though only in some respects, the closest approximation to the parent Semitic language from which all the rest were derived. In its vocalized form, Arabic preserves the full inflectional system, complete with all the short-vowel endings for both nouns and verbs, and the full use of the dual number (which remains obligatory for literary Arabic even to this day when two individuals are involved, rather than three or more). Its remarkably rich vocabulary has rendered it the single most important source of information concerning the meaning of rare or disputed words in Hebrew and the other ancient Semitic languages. (See further W. Wright et al., A Grammar of the Arabic Language, 2 vols., 3rd ed. [1896]; C. Rabin, Ancient West-Arabian [1951]; F. W. Winnett and W. L. Reed, Ancient Records from North Arabia [1970]; W. Fischer, A Grammar of Classical Arabic, 3rd ed. [2002].)

C. South Arabian. The earliest inscribed monuments in S Arabian date from the 8th cent. B.C. and are found as late as the 6th cent. A.D. They consist of inscriptions on stone stelae, mostly of a dedicatory nature or records of the inauguration of buildings, with an assortment of conveyances of real estate, various laws, and occasional decrees. There were at least four dialects, one of which, the Sabeian, used causatives and third person pronouns beginning with h- (whereas the rest begin these with s-). The other three were the Qatabanian (which preserved the earliest form of the language), Minean, and Ḥaḍramautian. The knowledge of these languages is hampered by their stylistic formalism, and also by their failure to include any verb forms or pronouns in the first or second person; all is couched in the third person singular or plural. It is noteworthy that in contradistinction to N Arabic, the S Arabian dialects preserved both kinds of s (cf. Heb. samek and šin) from Primitive Semitic. (See further W. Leslau, "Ethiopic and South Arabian," in Linguistics in South West Asia and North Africa, Current Trends in Linguistics 6, ed. T. A. Sebeok [1970], 467-527; A. F. L. Beeston, Sabaic Grammar [1984].)

D. Ethiopic. This language shows some affinity to the Old S Arabian dialects, adopting from them its alphabet. The original speakers of Ge'ez, as the classical form of Ethiopic is known, migrated from S Arabia to CUSH (now located in the Republic of Sudan) and pushed into northern ETHIOPIA, founding ultimately the powerful Kingdom of Axum (4th to 7th cent. A.D.) subsequent to smaller kingdoms and principalities such as that referred to in Acts 8:27 ("Candace, queen of the Ethiopians"). The earliest surviving inscriptions date from shortly before the rise of Axum, but the 4th cent. A.D. monuments from that kingdom furnish the first significant body of material in this language. Its phonology adheres quite closely to that of Arabic, except that it seems to have lost the aspirate quality of the šin quite early, and it developed two extra p's (pait and pesā). In the morphology of the verb it lacks several of the stems found in Arabic, but it possesses an additional five stems (causative intensive, causative frequentative, reflexive groundstem, causative reflexive intensive, and causative reflexive frequentative). It also used a gerundive to which pronoun suffixes were attached, resembling the Akkadian permansive. From ancient Ethiopic or Ge'ez (which is still the cultic language of the Ethiopian Coptic Church) were derived Amharic, the official state language of modern Ethiopia, as well as Trigrinya, Tigré, and others. (See further W. Leslau, Ethiopians Speak: Studies in Cultural Background, 5 vols. [1965-83]; R. Hetzron, Ethiopian Semitic: Studies in Classification [1972]; T. Lambdin, Introduction to Classical Ethiopic [1978]; E. Ullendorff, Ethiopia and the Bible, rev. ed. [1988]).

E. Aramaic. Old Aramaic inscriptions date from the 9th cent. B.C. (the Zakir or Zakkur Stela from HAMATH), although a quotation in Aramaic dates back to patriarchal times (Gen. 31:47). Two 8th-cent. inscriptions from Sam'al (modern Zenjirli) are classed by some as Ya'udic (cf. S. Moscati: Comparative Grammar of the Semitic Languages [1964], 11) because of certain distinctive traits. Imperial Aramaic (in German Reichsaramäisch) was used as an official international language as early as the 7th cent. B.C. in the Assyrian Empire, and so continued under the Chaldeans and the Persians. It is basically the form of Aramaic used in portions of Daniel and Ezra; and also by the Jewish colony at ELEPHANTINE in the 5th and 4th centuries B.C.

In the last half of the 1st millennium, Aramaic began to divide into W and E branches. In the W branch, Jewish Palestinian Aramaic is represented by the GENESIS APOCRYPHON of the 1st cent. B.C. (found in Qumran Cave One), and by several versions of the TARGUM, some of the Midrashim (see MIDRASH), and the Palestinian TALMUD. Christian Palestinian Aramaic is preserved in an old version of the Gospels. In addition, the Samaritan sect developed some distinctive traits, as shown by its own Targum of the Pentateuch (4th cent. A.D.). In spoken form, W Aramaic survives today in a few villages near DAMASCUS, notably Ma'lula. The NABATEAN Arabs also adopted this dialect and left inscriptions from the 1st cent. B.C. to the 3rd cent. A.D.

Eastern Aramaic developed in EDESSA as the literary medium of Syrian Christians, who produced the Peshitta during the 3rd cent. A.D. and the Syriac Hexaplar and NT versions (Sinaitic and Harklean) as well. See VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE, ANCIENT, III. Outstanding authors in Syriac Christianity included EPHRAEM SYRUS and Bar Hebraeus. Jewish Babylonian Aramaic, as represented in the “Babylonian” Talmud, belongs to this eastern branch as well (5th and 6th cent. A.D.). The same is true of the Gnostic sect of the MANDEANS, who flourished in Mesopotamia from the 3rd to 8th cent. A.D. (For further discussion and bibliography, see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE.)

F. Canaanite. This branch of NW Semitic included several dialects. (1) North Canaanite or Ugaritic was used at Ras Shamra in N Syria during the 15th and 14th centuries (see UGARIT). It was written in a cuneiform alphabet of thirty characters, and preserved many more of the original Semitic phonemes than the later dialects did. Its verbal system included not only the seven stems found in Hebrew, but two additional ones as well (its causative was shaphel rather than hiphil). Many scholars believe that Ugaritic, in spite of its obvious affinities with Hebrew, should be treated not as Canaanite but as a separate NW Semitic language, possibly earlier than the split of this family into Aramaic and Canaanite. (See further C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Textbook [1965]; S. Segert, A Basic Grammar of the Ugaritic Language [1984]; W. G. E. Watson and N. Wyatt, eds., Handbook of Ugaritic Studies [1999]; J. Tropper, Ugaritische Grammatik [2000]; D. Sivan, A Grammar of the Ugaritic Language, 2nd impression [2001]; G. del Olmo Lete and J. Sanmartín, A Dictionary of the Ugaritic Language in the Alphabetic Tradition [2003].)

(2) Sinaitic was used by the miners at Serabit el-Khadim and recorded in wall inscriptions dating between the 18th and 15th centuries B.C. and consisting of at least twenty-seven letters (cf. W. F. Albright, Proto-Sinaitic Inscriptions and Their Decipherment [1966], 13). According to Albright, it represents a very early stage of NW Semitic, when it stood much closer to Arabic (ibid., 3), but the matter is controversial. Related to this find are other pseudo-hieroglyphic inscriptions found at GEZER, SHECHEM, and LACHISH (dated 1800 to 1300). Unhappily these are of such brevity as to preclude accurate linguistic analysis.

(3) Middle Canaanite comprises the Phoenician branch of the Canaanite family, the earliest example of which is the Ahiiram epitaph at Byblos (see GEBAL #2), dating from the 11th cent. B.C. or earlier. See PHOENICIA. It was spoken all the way down the coast, at Tripolis, Berytus, SIDON, and TYRE, at which a goodly number of inscriptions (mostly 5th-2nd cent. B.C.) have been discovered. The extensive colonies of Phoenician settlers in Cyprus, Sicily, Sardinia, and Malta have also yielded inscriptional material in this language, and even in Athens and Marseilles examples have been found. Particularly significant is the large body of documents and stelae of various sorts found in the Carthaginian Empire, from N Africa to Spain (and in Sicily as well), which exhibit a subdialect known as Punic. These date from the 3rd cent. B.C. to the 3rd cent. A.D., and increasingly make use of vowel letters (“weak” consonants employed to indicate vowel sounds) as time goes on—unlike the Phoenician of the homeland, which eschewed vowel letters almost to the very end. The information as to vocalization comes exclusively from transcriptions into Greek and Latin (notably a passage or two in Plautus’s Poenulus). (See further Z. S. Harris, A Grammar of the Phoenician Language [1936]; S. Segert, A Grammar of Phoenician and Punic [1976]; C. R. Krahmalkov, A Phoenician-Punic Grammar [2001].)

(4) Moabite is known largely from the MOABITE STONE erected by King MESHA (c. 840 B.C.). It is distinguished from Hebrew by its retention of the -t ending for feminine absolute nouns (a trait it shared with Phoenician). (Cf. A. Dearman, ed., Studies in the Mesha Inscription and Moab [1989].)

(5) Hebrew, the language of the OT, has been preserved largely in the Judean or Jerusalem dialect, although much of Hosea shows the influence of N Israelite traits, and Ecclesiastes shows strong Phoenician influence. Extrabiblical Hebrew inscriptions are quite few, prior to the MS material from the Qumran caves. They include the GEZER calendar (c. 925), the SILOAM inscription (c. 705), the Samaritan OSTRACA (c. 770), the LACHISH letters (c. 588), and the name lists at ARAD from about the same period. (For further discussion and bibliography, see HEBREW LANGUAGE.)

No doubt Edomite (see EDOM) and Ammonite (see AMMON) should be included among the Canaanite dialects, although inscriptional evidence on these is very meager. (See further Z. S. Harris, The Development of the Canaanite Dialects [1939]; J. C. L. Gibson, Textbook of Syrian Semitic Inscriptions, 3 vols. [1971-82]; K. P. Jackson, The Ammonite Language of the Iron Age [1983]; W. R. Garr, Dialect Geography of Syria-Palestine, 1000—586 B. C.E. [1985]; W. E. Aufrecht, A Corpus of Ammonite Inscriptions [1989].)

III. The Indo-European languages. This family comprises a very large number of languages that are widely distributed, including the so-called classical languages (Greek, Latin, Sanskrit), most modern European languages (English, French, Russian, etc.), and many languages spoken in eastern countries (Farsi in Iran [see PERSIA IV]; Hindustani and others in India; etc.). Earliest in appearance was the HITTITE language, or more accurately Nesite (to distinguish it from the non-Indo-European Proto-Khatti spoken by the original population in ASIA MINOR who were conquered by the Nesians in the 1st half of the 2nd millennium). Little is known about hieroglyphic Hittite as yet, although conjectural translations have been attempted; it may have been the literary medium of the Cilician kingdom of Kassuwatna. Related dialects to Indo-European Hittite were Luwian and Palawi, Anatolian tongues of which very little remains. (See H. C. Melchert, “Indo-European Languages of Anatolia,” in CANE, 4:2151-59.)

Phrygian was spoken in E Asia Minor, and was in the 7th to 6th centuries B.C. written in an alphabet related to W Greek. Neo-Phrygian was written in conventional Greek characters during the Greco-Roman period. Phrygian traditionally has been classified as a satem-language, like the Indo-Iranian language group. That is to say, the palatal k softened to ç or s before original e or i. (Nesian Hittite, in contrast, was a centum language. Sanskrit for “hundred” is çata, whereas the Latin is centum—hence the designation. The value of the centum-satem distinction is questioned by some recent scholars, however.)

The language recorded in the syllabary known as Cretan Linear A remains unidentified (it is thought by some to be a form of Phoenician), but there is no doubt that Cretan Linear B was Indo-European, specifically, a dialect of Greek called Achaeian or Mycenaean, and used from the 15th cent. B.C. to the collapse of Minoan-Mycenaean civilization under the impact of the Dorian invasions, around the year 1000. These Linear B inscriptions are found at Pylos on the mainland of Greece, and in other Mycenaean centers. (Cf. J. Chadwick, The Decipherment of Linear B [1958]; J. T. Hooker, Linear B: An Introduction [1980].) On CYPRUS, the syllabary used was very similar and represented in all probability a closely related dialect of Greek.

Among the ANE languages one must include classical Greek as well, especially from the time of ALEXANDER THE GREAT'S conquest c. 330 B.C., when Greek became the language of government in Asia all the way from the Bosphorus to the Indus. It was at this time that Attic, a derivative from Ionic Greek, became adapted to the needs of the entire Hellenistic world, and soon developed into the Koine, which furnished the linguistic medium for the SEPTUAGINT and the NT. See GREEK LANGUAGE. LATIN was introduced at the time of the Roman conquest in 63 B.C. (when POMPEY annexed JUDEA to the empire), but it was largely confined to the Romans themselves, since even the Italian conquerors of the ANE were content to use Greek in communicating with their subjects. Latin inscriptions are largely confined to dedicatory monuments in such romanized centers as CAESAREA (which was founded by HEROD the Great).

Greek inscription from an area in Alexandria thought to have housed its famous library.

Moving farther to the E we come to the Iranian branch of Indo-European, notably Old Persian, which was written in a sort of semisyllabic alphabet of thirty-six cuneiform signs, plus six others that were ideograms. Linguistically it was related to Sanskrit; it possessed a seven-case declension and a verbal system employing four tenses, three voices, five moods, four participles, a dual number, and a single infinitive. The earliest inscriptions date from the 6th cent. B.C. (CYRUS the Great), and they continue until after the Greek conquest. See PERSIA.

In the 2nd cent. B.C., the PARTHIANS became dominant E of the TIGRIS; they spoke Arsacid PAHLAVI, derived from the Median form of Iranian (of Old Median we now possess only some names and a few glosses). The rise of the Sassanian Persians in the 3rd cent. A.D. led to the prevalence of Sassanian Pahlavi throughout their domains; closely related to this is Avestan, the language of the Zoroastrian or Parsee scriptures (see ZOROASTRIANISM). Apparently the SCYTHIAN peoples also spoke a type of Iranian, especially the Ossetians in the Caucasus. Virtually none of this has survived in written form. (See further R. G. Kent, Old Persian: Grammar, Texts, Lexicon, 2nd ed. [1953]; R. Schmitt, ed., Compendium linguarum Iranicarum [1989].)

IV. Miscellaneous languages. The HURRIANS spoke an agglutinative language unrelated to any other known to philology, except possibly Uartian. Although the original Mitannians must have been Indo-Iranian, judging from the names of their gods, the language of the Mitannian Empire (which flourished in the middle of the 2nd millennium) was Hurrian. Some inscriptions at MARI (18th to 17th cent.) were in Hurrian; Hurrian influences account for most of the peculiarities of the Akkadian used at Nuzi. One long letter from King Tushratta in the Amarna collection was couched in Hurrian (early 14th cent.); so were some texts at the Hittite capital of Boğazköy. Like Hittite, Hurrian used the Akkadian syllabary and many of its ideograms to write their language.

Uartian was spoken by a non-Semitic, non-Indo-European people living near Lake Van (it is also called by some either Vannic or Kaldi). These people later were conquered by a race speaking a language related to Phrygian, and which developed into the later Armenian. See ARMENIA. Cuneiform inscriptions in Uartian come from about 840 to 640 B.C.

Elamite first appeared in a pictographic form as yet undeciphered; they have been found largely at SUSA, and are known as Proto-Elamite (see ELAM). About 2300 B.C. cuneiform inscriptions in Old Susian began to make their appearance. Neo-Susian inscriptions date from the 16th to the 8th cent.; and the latest form was Neo-Susian, in use during Achaemenid times (6th cent.). It was an agglutinative language unrelated to any other, except possibly Kassite. The language of the Kassite conquerors of Babylon is known only from personal names and a few glosses. For international correspondence (as in the Amarna letters), the Kassite rulers were content to use Babylonian.

In Asia Minor perhaps the most important language after Hittite was Lydian, the language of the empire of Croesus (6th to 4th cent.). As yet the inscriptions in this tongue are imperfectly understood, although a bilingual (with Aramaic) found at Sardis furnishes a helpful key. Carian has been found in three 7th-cent. bilingual inscriptions from Egypt; there are also some graffiti and glosses. Lycian is preserved in a strange alphabetic script as well as in a Greek script and in a few bilingual (Greek-Lycian) texts from the 1st cent. B.C. Little or nothing is known about Cilician, Pisidian, Mysian, Isaurian, or Lycaonian from this polyglot area of Anatolia. After the Alexandrian conquest this entire region became linguistically unified by the Greek language, and so remained until the Muslim conquest.

languages of the Bible. The OT was given originally in Hebrew (one of the Semitic languages), except for parts of Ezra and Daniel, which were written in the closely related language of Aramaic. The NT was composed in Greek, although some have argued that one or more of the NT books were originally written in Aramaic and then subsequently cast into Greek, possibly by the authors themselves. See ARAMAIC LANGUAGE; GREEK LANGUAGE; HEBREW LANGUAGE; LANGUAGES OF THE ANE.

lantern. This English term is used in Bible versions once to render Greek phanos G5749, which occurs only in Jn. 18:3. In that passage we are told that the soldiers and officials who went to arrest Jesus were carrying lanterns and torches (lampas G3286, usually LAMP). In contrast to other versions, the NIV seems to regard phanos as meaning "torch" (which in fact was the earlier meaning of the term) and lampas as "lantern." It is possible that either (or both) of these terms refers to some kind of TORCH, although Romans in the time of Christ did have lanterns of cylindrical shape with translucent sides.

Laodicea lay-od'i-see'uh (Λαοδίκεια G3293 [according to some eds., Λαοδικία gentilic δικοῦς G3294, "Laodicean"). A city located on the southern bank of the Lycus River (a tributary of the Maeander River) in the SW region of ancient PHRYGIA, the area of modern Çürüksuğay in central Turkey. It was known in antiquity as Laodikeia hē pros tō Lykō (Lat. Laodicea ad Lycum), “Laodicea on the Lycus.” The ancient town stood on a plateau nearly 100 ft. above the river. To the N and W of the town lay the open broadlands of the Maeander; to the SE was the high country of the Babadağ-Akdağ Ranges.

Although Laodicea was undoubtedly a station on the caravan route from EPHESUS to N SYRIA in Neolithic times, its historic foundation was begun by the Hellenistic ruler ANTIOCHUS II (261-246 B.C.), who named the town for his wife, Laodice. The Greek geographers Polybius (202-120 B.C.) and Strabo (64 B.C. TO A.D. 19) list it as a Phrygian town, while the Alexandrian scholar Ptolemy (2nd cent. A.D.) says it was part of CARIA. The town grew to wealth and prominence during the period of Roman supremacy, when it was a way station for the extensive shipments by which Rome exploited Syria-Palestine. The Romans continued the city’s character as both a military outpost and a trade center after 133 B.C.

TACITUS (Annals 14.27) records that a serious earthquake struck Laodicea in A.D. 60, but that the city was rebuilt by the private wealth of her citizens (“propriis opibus revaluit”). An additional source of its wealth came from the wool of its famous black sheep, which was carded and woven in the locality, and its production of a poultice widely sought for treatment of eye ailments (see EYESALVE). In the environs were also the temples of the ancient deities, chiefly at Attuda, where the shrine of Men-of-the-Carians was located.

According to JOSEPHUS (Ant. 12.3.4 §§147-49), Antiochus III the Great settled 2,000 Jewish families in Phrygia and LYDIA after deporting them from Babylon. No doubt the rising economic position and business endeavors of the region caused the Jews to thrive. Two references to the Jews of Laodicea during the 1st cent. B.C. have survived.

Laodicea.

Remains of a Roman stadium at Laodicea. (View to the W.)

In his defense of Flaccus, Cicero mentions that the Jews of Asia Minor were forbidden to send money to Jerusalem (Pro Flacco 28), and Josephus records that the Jews were guaranteed freedom of worship by the city magistrates (Ant. 14.10.20 §241). It was this wealth and independence which is the background of the remark recorded in Rev. 3:17-18. Laodicea was widely known as a banking center, and the business of money changing prospered. Laodicea minted its own coins several centuries before the Christian era, expressing on them the attributions and inscriptions of the ancient gods.

From its inception, Christianity in Laodicea was bound up with the other missionary churches of the Lycus Valley. It was to these churches that the encyclical epistle of EPHESIANS was most probably written. It is also mentioned in a similar context with the church of COLOSSE (Col. 2:1; 4:13, 15 – 16). A spurious Latin pseudepigraphic work by the title of the Epistle to the Laodiceans was circulated for a goodly part of the medieval and Renaissance eras. However, the citation to an “epistle from Laodicea” (Col. 4:16) probably refers to the text of Ephesians (see LAODICEANS, EPISTLE TO THE). A certain EPAPHRAS apparently ministered in the Lycus area and represented PAUL and his coworkers (Col. 1:7, “on our behalf”; TR, “on your behalf”).

The most extensive reference to the city and its inhabitants is found in the address to it in the Revelation of John. In the course of centuries, many theories of the proper hermeneutics for the interpretation of this passage (Rev. 3:14-22) have been advanced. In the historical prophetic views of the text, this church and its spiritual destitution has been seen as the final state of apostasy before the PAROUSIA. On the basis of the reiterative explanations, it has been viewed as a classic warning against shortsighted and superficial faith. Of the seven churches addressed, Laodicea, being farthest inland, is the last mentioned. Unfortunately the remains and explanations of the postapostolic period, along with the archaeological remnants, shed no light upon the state of the church that is assumed in the address in Revelation.

The profundity of the challenge declared to this congregation (Rev. 3:20-21) is rarely equaled in drama or finality elsewhere in Scripture. There is no doubt that John was well acquainted with the location. He enjoins them to recognize that they are poor, blind, naked. With all their wealth, they must come to Christ to acquire gold refined in fire (cf. 1 Pet. 1:7); with their surplus of fine woolen garments, to obtain white garments; and with their medical academies and eye ointments, to receive spiritual salve for their blindness (Rev. 3:17-18). It is an incredible and accurate description of the city and its citizens in the light of the biblical judgment. Traditions abounded in later ages about Epaphras, Archippus, Nymphas (Col. 4:15), and Diotrephes (3 Jn. 9), but they are purely legendary. The city was the central episcopal seat of Phrygia by the 4th cent. A.D., but it was destroyed and abandoned during the internecine wars between the Muslims of the Middle Ages. The ruins known as Eski Hissar are all that remain.

W. WHITE, JR.

Laodiceans, Epistle to the lay-od'i-see'uhns. Writing to the COLOSSIANS, PAUL mentions "the letter from Laodicea," which he instructs them to have read in their church (Col. 4:16). This phrase has been much discussed (see the excursus by J. B. Lightfoot in Saint Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon [1875], 340ff.; the pagination differs in later editions). Three main suggestions have been advanced, each with several subordinate alternatives attached: (a) that it was a letter written by the Laodiceans; (b) that it was written by Paul from Laodicea; and (c) that it was addressed to the Laodiceans. The first two, on any of the alternatives suggested, present considerable difficulties, and the third is beyond question the most natural explanation; but it immediately raises the further question of identification. If written by Paul, the letter was presumably a companion to Colossians, but was it one of the extant letters (and if so, which?) or a letter now lost? According to TERTULLIAN (Adv. Marc. 5.11), the Marcionites identified it as EPHESIANS, but other suggestions also have been made. The MURATORIAN CANON mentions a letter to the Laodiceans "forged in Paul's name for the sect of Marcion."

A Latin Epistle to the Laodiceans is found in many MSS, the oldest being the Codex Fuldensis, written for Victor of Capua in the 6th cent. Its existence even earlier is proved by the warnings of the church fathers, especially JEROME (Vir. ill. 5), but despite these warnings it was widely disseminated in the W. This was due at least in part to the influence of Gregory the Great, who, although he limited the canonical epistles to fourteen, states nevertheless that Paul wrote fifteen, and was thus understood to affirm its authenticity. That it was read in the E in the 8th cent. is shown by the warning issued by the Second Council of Nicaea (A.D. 787).

Despite the arguments of A. von Harnack (Die apokryphen Briefe des Paulus an die Laodicener und Korinther, 2nd ed. [1931]), the Marcionite origin of this document remains uncertain (see MARCION). In fact, it contains nothing specifically Marcionite or calculated to promote the interests of the sect. Nor can one be sure of its identity with the letter mentioned in the Muratorian Canon. Its date can therefore be placed only approximately, between the 2nd and 4th centuries. In ancient MSS the letter is extant only in Latin, although it was to be translated into western vernaculars, notably English, but its use in the E and the evidence of the Greek fathers suggest that a Greek version was once current.

Lightfoot notes that this brief apocryphal document, largely a cento of passages from Paul, “has not the run of a Latin original,” but contains frequent Grecisms, and differs widely both from the Old Latin and from the VULGATE of the Pauline letters. Accordingly he argues for a Greek original, and offers his own retranslation into Greek. Another Greek version is given in Elias Hutter’s Polyglot New Testament (1599), while a MS in St. Andrews dated 1679 presents the epistle in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew (see R. Y. Ebied, Bib 47 [1966]: 243-54). Survival of an authentic Greek text to so late a date, when all the older MS tradition is in Latin, would be highly unlikely, and, in fact, this is Hutter’s Greek version, with some transcriptional errors (he writes that, having found the letter only in a volume of apocrypha, “operae pretium esse iudicavi ut eandem et in reliquas linguas converterem”).

The letter is in fact no more than a patchwork of Pauline phrases, beginning with the opening words of Galatians but heavily dependent on Philippians. M. S. Enslin (in IDB, 3:72) aptly quotes the comment of Erasmus that there is “no argument which will more effectively convince that this is not by Paul than the epistle itself.” The forgery was quite obviously occasioned by the desire to make good a gap in the Pauline Corpus by supplying the letter mentioned in Col. 4:16. (English trans. with introduction in NTAp, 2:42-46.)

lapis lazuli. An azure-blue or Berlin-blue colored mineral that has been valued as an ornamental stone since ancient times and may have been referred to as SAPPHIRE by some early writers (cf. Heb. sappîr H6209 in Exod. 28:18 et al.; Gk. sapphiros G4913 in Rev. 21:19). Lapis lazuli is possibly referred to also by the Hebrew word šōham H8732 (cf. the NJPS at Gen. 2:12 et al.; see ONYX). It is a sodium aluminum silicate cut and polished for ornamental purposes (possibly explaining the reference in Lam. 4:7), and used in the manufacture of mosaics. While too soft to be much used in jewelry, ancient Egyptian amulets carved out of it are common. It occurs in limestones adjacent to granitic intrusions in Iran, Turkestan, Afghanistan, and Mongolia.

D. R. BOWES

Lappidoth lap’i-doth (לפידות H4366, possibly “flames, lightning strikes”). KJV Lapidoth. Husband of DEBORAH, the prophetess and leader of Israel (Jdg. 4:4). Some have speculated that there may be a connection between Lappidoth and Deborah’s military associate, BARAK (v. 6; the latter’s name means “lightning”); in any case, the text clearly distinguishes between the two.

lapwing. Also known as the green plover, the lapwing is a well-known British bird, and it is a winter visitor to Palestine. Some thirty other shore birds either winter there or pass through on migration, and only one member of this very wandering family is a resident—the spurwing plover. The term “lapwing” is used by the KJV in two passages where a better rendering is HOOPOE (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18).

G. S. CANSDALE

lasciviousness. This English term (derived from the Latin lasciviosus, earlier lascivia), meaning “lust, overt sexual desire,” is used by the KJV to render Greek aselgeia G816 in a number of passages (e.g., 2 Cor. 12:21; NIV, “debauchery”; NRSV, “licentiousness”). The Greek noun occurs only twice in the SEPTUAGINT (Wisd. 14:26; 3 Macc. 2:26) and eight times in the NT. Plato and some Attic authors used the term to denote licentiousness or wanton violence, although the adjectival form generally meant “outrageous.” JOSEPHUS used it occasionally of lewd women (cf. War 1.22.3).

The history of the Greek form is uncertain at best, and its etymological origins have been sought in the verb thelgō, which was used by both early and late writers with reference to enchanting, spellbinding, cheating, and entrapping. Significantly enough, in one passage (Gal. 5:19-20) aselgeia is followed by pharmakeia G5758, “witchcraft,” although elsewhere (Mk. 7:22; Rom. 13:13; 2 Cor. 12:21; Eph. 4:19; 1 Pet. 4:3; 2 Pet. 2:2, 7, 18; Jude 4) the reference is clearly to sensuality, particularly that which outraged public decency. There could be no place for such behavior in the Christian life, as the NT references made clear. (The term also could imply insolence or violence toward another in NT times, and an A.D. 4th-cent. papyrus complained of a man using aselgēmata, “many abusive terms.”)

Lasea luh-see’uh (Λασαία G3297; also Λασέα and other variant forms). A city of CRETE near FAIR HAVENS, the bay that the ship on which PAUL was being taken to Italy had reached with difficulty (Acts 27:8). Quite possibly ruins about 5 mi. E of Fair Havens are those of Lasea. Not much is known about this city, which has received little notice in surviving literature; but it has been thought that it is the same as the Lasos which PLINY the Elder mentions among the one hundred renowned cities of Crete (Nat. Hist. 4.12.58-59).

J. H. SKILTON

Lasha lay’sshuh (לשע H4388, meaning unknown). A place marking one of the boundary points of the land of the Canaanites, mentioned after SODOM, GOMORRAH, ADMAH, and ZEBOIIM (Gen. 10:19). Its location is unknown, although a number of identifications have been suggested, among them LAISH (surely too far N) and Callirrhoe (or Kallirhoe, a ravine E of the DEAD SEA to which HEROD the Great went for his health during his last illness; see ZERETH SHAHAR).

Lasharon luh-shair’uhn (לשרון H4389, “belonging to Sharon [the plain]”). A Canaanite royal city whose king was defeated by JOSHUA (Josh. 12:18). However, the SEPTUAGINT variant accepted in Rahlfs’s Septuaginta is basilea Aphek tēs Sarōn, “the king of Aphek of Sharon,” and many scholars believe this reading is earlier than the MT (possibly an old gloss) or even original. If so, laššārôn is not the name of a city, but part of a phrase, distinguishing this APHEK from other cities of the same name. See SHARON.

lashes. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS III.C.

last days, last times. See ESCHATOLOGY.

Lasthenes las’tuh-neeZ (Λασθενής). A prominent official under DEMETRIUS II Nicator in the 1st cent. B.C.; perhaps governor of COELESYRIA. JOSEPHUS (Ant. 13.4.3 §86) refers to him as a Cretan and says that he had provided many mercenaries for Demetrius at the very important time c. 147 B.C., when the latter sailed from CRETE for CILICIA. Demetrius, in writing to Jonathan the high priest of the Jews (see MACCABEE) and to the Jewish nation, enclosed a copy of a letter he had written to his “kinsman” Lasthenes. In that letter to Lasthenes, Demetrius addresses him as his “father” (Ant. 13.4.9 §§125-29; 1 Macc. 11:30-37). The terms “kinsman” and “father” do not necessarily indicate any family relationship, but they do point to the high standing of Lasthenes and the regard which the king had for him. The contents of the letter are of considerable interest, touching as they do, among other things, on the subject of the boundaries of Judea and the privileges granted to the Jews.

Last Supper. See LORD’S SUPPER.

latchet. This term and “shoelatchet” are used by the KJV with reference to SANDAL thongs (Gen. 14:23; Isa. 5:27; Mk. 1:7; Lk. 3:16; Jn. 1:27).

Latin. One of the Indo-European languages (see LANGUAGES OF THE ANE III), Latin was the official medium of communication in the Roman empire, and it was used in the provinces, such as JUDEA, in official acts and at the Roman courts. Greek was the language of commerce (see GREEK LANGUAGE). In Palestine itself, ARAMAIC was the language spoken in the rural districts and more remote towns, while in the cities both Aramaic and Greek were used. That is why the inscription on the cross of Christ was written in three languages (Matt. 27:37). The Greek word for “Latin” (Rhōmaisti G4872) is found in the NT once: “the sign was written in Aramaic, Latin and Greek” (Jn. 19:20; a similar phrase is also found as a variant in Lk. 23:38). Hellenistic Greek borrowed a number of words from Latin (e.g., denarion G1324, “denarius”) and was otherwise influenced by this language, especially in the area of government (see the list in BDAG, xx). Many Latin names, such as PAUL (Paulus), are found in the NT. See also ROME.

S. BARABAS

Latin versions. See VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE, ANCIENT, II.

latter days. See ESCHATOLOGY.

latter rain. See RAIN.

lattice. A window covering made of crossed strips or bars of wood, metal, etc., and used as a screen (for Heb. hăṛakkîm H3048, Jdg. 5:28; 2 Ki. 1:2; Prov. 7:6; Cant. 2:9).

laughter. The term does not signify amusement in the Bible. As ABRAHAM considered his and SARAH’S age, he laughed with gentle incredulity at the promise of an heir (Gen. 17:17; Heb. sāhaq H7464). Most often, however, laughter denotes derision, mockery, and scorn in the Bible. The psalmist speaks of God’s laughing derisively at the efforts of earthly rulers to declare their independence of him (Ps. 2:4; Heb. śāhaq H8471). When HEZEKIAH sent couriers calling the people to return to the Lord and to celebrate the Passover, they were laughed to scorn (2 Chr. 30:10; cf. Isa. 37:22). JOB expressed his sense of being unjustly afflicted by pointing out that he, a just and blameless man, was a laughingstock (Job 12:4; Heb. śēhōq H8468). The crowd of mourners laughed (Gk. katagelaō G2860) at Jesus when he said JAIRUS’S daughter was sleeping, not dead (Matt. 9:24; Mk. 5:40; Lk. 8:53). The jaded cynic of ECCLESIASTES speaks of laughter as madness (Eccl. 2:2), and of mourning as better than laughter (7:3). Laughter, thus, occupied a different place in the ancient, oriental world than in the modern occidental world.

But laughter also is associated with joy at Zion's restoration (Ps. 126:2); bread is said to be made for laughter (Eccl. 10:19) and our Lord promised, "Blessed are you who weep now, for you will laugh" (Lk. 6:21; Gk. gelaō G1151). The Bible also contains hundreds of references to JOY. It is clear, therefore, that the common use of laughter for mockery and scorn does not suggest that a premium was placed on dourness nor that solemnity was a mark of sanctity.

The different references to laughter in the several passages cited can be subsumed under the categories of wit and humor. Wit is the aggressive use of humor. In wit, laughter is tinged with the sardonic. It contains elements of scorn, mockery, and disparagement, for it seeks to deflate or shrivel, to make a person feel small, foolish, and unworthy. True HUMOR springs from a sense of strength, security, and joy. It stems from the ability to take a healthy perspective on self, others, and the vicissitudes of life. True humor has a healing effect upon moods and upon relationships. It has been defined as a person's ability to laugh at the things he loves, including himself, while continuing to love them. This is the cheerful heart that "is good medicine" (Prov. 17:22). Its laughter is a healing force, and results from imagination, zestfulness, and delight.

L. I. GRANBERG

laver. This English term is the traditional rendering of Hebrew kiyyôr H3963, which the NIV and Reconstruction of the bronze laver that stood in the tabernacle courtyard.

other modern versions translate as BASIN (it can also mean "pan" [1 Sam. 2:14], "pot" [Zech. 12:6], and "platform" [2 Chr. 6:13]).

The laver or basin for the TABERNACLE, with its base, was made of bronze (Exod. 30:18 et al.). It contained water so that AARON and his sons could bathe their hands and feet when they entered the Tent of Meeting or approached the altar to minister (30:18-19). The basin was made by BEZALEL of the tribe of Judah and OHOLIAH of the tribe of Dan (31:1-9), along with other able men among the people (35:10-16). We read that it was made "from the [bronze] mirrors of the women who served at the entrance to the Tent of Meeting" (38:8; P. Fairbairn, The Typology of Scripture [1900], 2:258, quotes Aben-Ezra's comment that "these were women in Israel that served the Lord, who abandoned this worldly delight [of beholding themselves in a mirror to dress their hair] and gave away their glasses as a free-will offering, for they had no more use of them"). After anointment with the prescribed oil (Exod. 30:22-29; Lev. 8:11) and acceptance by MOSES (Exod. 39:39), it was the last article set in place before the erection of the court (Exod. 40:7, 17). The Bible does not state its shape, size, ornamentation, or transport.

In the TEMPLE built by SOLOMON, a great "molten sea" (see SEA, MOLTEN) took the place of the laver in the tabernacle for the priests' ablutions (2 Chr. 4:6; NIV, "the Sea of cast metal"). This "sea" was five cubits in height, ten cubits in diameter from brim to brim, and thirty cubits in circumference (1 Ki. 7:23). Some regard the last two figures as a mathematical impossibility. The circumference, however, may not include the outward flare of its lily shape at the brim (7:26), whereas the diameter may refer to the brim at its widest section. Gourds ran under its brim, ten to the cubit, surrounding the sea in two rows and cast at the same time as the vessel itself (7:24). It rested upon four groups of three bronze oxen oriented to the four compass points (7:25). This selection represented the priestly service of the twelve tribes even as the lions on Solomon's throne represented the royal service. A basalt laver supported by two bulls from the early 1st millennium B.C. was found at CARCHEMISH (NBD [1962], 718, fig. 132). The thickness of the bronze metal was a hand's breadth and the vessel held 2,000 baths (1 Ki. 7:26; according to KD [Chronicles, 320], the MT "the likeness of oxen" and the "3,000 baths" in the synoptic account of 2 Chr. 4:3, 5 are the result of scribal error).

Besides the great molten sea located on the SE corner of the temple, HIRAM (Hiram) of TYRE (1 Ki. 7:13-14, 40-44) also made ten bronze lavers, distributed evenly between the N and S sides of the temple (7:39). These lavers, four cubits in diameter and containing forty baths (7:38), were used for washing the animals to be offered as burnt offerings (2 Chr. 4:6), and were set upon mobile bronze stands (1 Ki. 7:27-37). A similar construction from CYPRUS, c. 1150 B.C., clarifies the painstaking study of these stands found in A Dictionary of the Bible (1863), edited by William Smith (2:66-67; cf. NBD [1962], 1244, fig. 205).

In connection with his apostasy, AHAZ cut off the panels of the stands, removed the lavers from them, and replaced the sea on a pediment of stone (2 Ki. 16:17). The Babylonians broke up what remained of the sea and stands and carried the bronze to Babylon (25:13). No mention is made in Scripture of the laver(s) in the second temple, nor by JOSEPHUS in his account of HEROD'S restoration.

7. Attitude to law in the OT

I. Meaning of the word Torah. The legal terminology of Semitic is very different from that of the familiar Indo-European languages. This in itself raises problems of interpretation and communication; but more serious is the fact that this difference in terminology corresponds to a basic difference in concept. Even Latin lex is not the same as Greek nomos G3795 (though perhaps Lat. ius or fas would come closer), and both words are totally different from Hebrew tôrâ H9368. There are several other words used for “law” in the OT, some of which will be discussed; but whether used of part or of the whole, Torah is the most frequent and the most characteristic.

Etymology is always a dangerous guide to the meaning of a word, especially if used as the only method (cf. James Barr, The Semantics of Biblical Language [1962]). Ultimately the meaning of a word is not determined by its etymology (of which most of its users are unaware) nor by the meaning in cognate languages, but by contemporary usage. Nevertheless, most scholars are now agreed that tôrâ (prob. from yāarâ H3723, hiphil “instruct, teach,” Exod. 24:12 et al.) originally meant “direction” or “guidance.” (Cf. also the cognate noun môreh H4621, “teacher,” Isa. 30:20 et al. Some have argued that tôrâ is derived from a different root, the homonym yāarâ H3721, “to throw, shoot”; whether this once had reference to shooting of arrows, or “shaking” them out of a quiver, or the “casting” of lots as methods of obtaining divine guidance, is quite uncertain.)

There are cognate Semitic roots meaning “to guide, show the way,” but older ideas of direct borrowing of the word from Babylonian tērtu, “oracle,” are now generally rejected, although the rhythmic form of many of Israel’s laws does suggest a priestly oracle. The etymological meaning at least seems clear in broad outline as “teaching, guidance instruction.” (See further A. Bentzen, Introduction to the Old Testament, 5th ed. [1959], 213-14.) Next, this meaning must be tested from actual usage in the OT.

Here Ludwig Koehler’s divisions (in HAL) seem sound. (1) He sees tôrâ as initially being direction or advice in a given situation, asked from God and mediated through the priests or perhaps also “prophets” (Hag. 2:10-13 is an example of this custom). It does not appear that in historical days the priest necessarily gave such direction by the sacred lot, URIM AND THUMMIN, or by the EPHOD, although such methods were certainly used at times (1 Sam. 28:6; 30:7). Rather the priest seems to have acted as a prophet did later, in giving a spoken utterance (Hag. 2:12). (2) Second, tôrâ may be advice or instruction given by one human to another (e.g. Prov. 1:8, a mother to a son). This is a useful corrective, for it shows that the noun was by no means restricted to the religious or legal sphere; indeed, such specialization of reference is foreign to the thought world of the OT. (3) The term may mean a single law or instruction (not apparently an enactment or a legal decision, however). An example of this use is Lev. 6:8, where tôrâ clearly means “instructions about” a particular offering. In this sense the word approaches the meaning of “regulation.” (4) Finally, it is used (esp. with the definite article, or with the addition of a proper name to make it definite) to mean the totality of all such “instruction” in Israel. It may be in the singular or in the plural (the latter is also true of many synonyms); in either case, it has a collective sense. The plural noun may possibly denote a greater stress on separate laws, or separate codes of law.

The proper name qualifying tôrâ, and thus making it both definite and collective, is either Yahweh/ God (Exod. 13:9; Josh. 24:26) or else MOSES (Josh. 8:31). In this last case, Moses is regarded as mediator, not source, of the law. At first, to judge from these contexts, the word is used as referring to the injunctions and commands in the law; then it is extended to cover narrative and all other parts of the PENTATEUCH. This is part of a general broadening of concept; by NT days, either “the Law and the Prophets” or just “the Law” is a general term embracing the whole OT (Matt. 22:40; Jn. 12:34). See also the article on TORAH.

II. Other terms for “law.” There are several other words used in the OT to describe individual laws, rather than a complete corpus; nevertheless, when such a word is used in the plural (often with a second word also in the pl. as parallel), it does approach the collective meaning of tôrôt, “laws,” meaning the totality of God’s revelation in this field. Unfortunately there is no agreement among scholars as to the exact correspondence of these other terms to English words. This may be simply because of the different Semitic understanding of the nature of the law; or, as many have suggested, particularly in view of the frequent use of different terms in close parallelism in the Psalter, it may be that old distinctions of meaning had been blurred, and that the varied terms are really synonyms in many cases.

Nevertheless, there is at least one which is both clear and theologically important, in that the TEN COMMANDMENTS are called by the Jews the “Ten Words” (‘ăšeret haddēbārîm, Deut. 4:13). This certainly corresponds to a basic difference in attitude: the English term “commandment” concentrates on the authoritarian nature, while the Hebrew “word” (dābār H1821) concentrates on the revelational nature. Authority is in the Ten Words, but it is not the primary thought, and the “words” only gain this authenticity because they are the revelation of Yahweh’s will and purpose for the Israel whom he has redeemed by a revelation of his power. A. Weiser (The Old Testament: Its Foundation and Development [1961], 88) well points out that this combination of law and saving acts, exodus and Sinai, both equally regarded as the revelation of God, is typically Israelite.

This attitude to the Ten Commandments, as shown by the use of dābār, “word,” is thus not an isolated phenomenon. Indeed it also corresponds to the way in which all legal matter is seen as tôrâ, “instruction,” as much as any of Israel’s history of salvation. The term dābār is not the name for a particular type of law; it is an expression of an attitude to law as a whole, a part of an Israelite philosophy of revelation. Some scholars have tried to distinguish between a sacred “word” and a secular “judgment” (mišpat H5477). Even if meanings had corresponded, this would have been an impossible distinction for Israel to make, seeing that all process of judgment was to them a sacred task (Deut. 1:17). For this meaning of dābār, compare the common OT phrase “word of Yahweh” to describe an oracle or a revelation (Jdg. 3:20). Such revelation came with authority and could not be ignored.

The term hōq H2976, traditionally translated “statute,” is another word of a general nature. By etymology it would seem to mean something “engraved” (or perhaps “fixed,” from the root hāqaq H2980). This could perhaps refer to something “engraved” on tablets, like the Ten Words (Exod. 32:16), but Ps. 2:7 shows a much wider use of this noun in the sense of “decree” or “divine oracle,” so that Koehler considers it as a mere parallel to tôrâ. Others, however, have regarded the word as referring to Israel’s fixed annual festivals, perhaps once marked by notches on a stick, but this seems far-fetched. Yet others have seen it as referring to the “categoric” sections of Israel’s law: the absolute commands of God (as in the Ten Words or the Twelve Curses) rather than the case-law, arising from judicial decisions. This is possible but cannot be proved. In any case, in later days such linguistic distinctions were blurred, if they had ever existed, especially when the word was used in the plural.

The noun mišpāt is quite clearly, from its linguistic form, a “judicial decision” or “act of judgment” or “precedent,” which itself becomes law. It has been suggested, with some plausibility, that the mišpātîm in Israel’s law are the sections of case-law, beginning “If...” or “When...” No doubt in the lifetime of Moses himself there was much need for this sort of law, especially if the tradition of a forty-year stay in or around KADESH BARNEA is taken seriously (Deut. 1:46). In Gen. 14:7, the old name of Kadesh is in fact given as EN MISHPAT, “the well of judicial decision”; and in Num. 15:35 there is an example of Moses himself being compelled to seek a decision, in this sort of case-law, also called casuistic law, from Yahweh. Further, the story of the appointment of the seventy elders to share the burden of Moses shows that Moses was compelled to give many such decisions (Num. 11:16-25). The activity of DEBORAH (Jdg. 4:5) or SAMUEL (1 Sam. 7:15) or his sons, bad though they were (8:1-3), shows the continuance of this responsibility in Israel. Indeed it was through failure to fulfill it that DAVID nearly lost his throne to ABSALOM (2 Sam. 15:3).

The term miswâ H5184, “command,” may, like hōoq, correspond to the categoric framework of Israel’s law, rather than its largely “casuistic” content. To put it another way, miswâ would be a definite order issued by Yahweh, rather than a case-law or application of divine principles. The etymology of the word would support this interpretation. It corresponds in association most to the English “command,” though not, perhaps, to “law.” However, like all the other terms, it frequently is used in the plural in a collective sense to describe Yahweh’s law as a whole; in such cases, all distinctiveness of meaning has long since disappeared. In modern Hebrew usage, bar-miswâ, “son of law,” means “under obligation to keep the law,” and is used of the Jewish boy when, at puberty, he accepts the “yoke of the law” as his own responsibility. Here the term has become, even in the singular, a full equivalent of tôrâ.

III. Two forms of Israel’s law. Whatever the reason, there are two distinct forms clearly discernible in Israel’s law, even when broken into the smallest possible units. The two are not always as clearly marked now as they may have been initially, partly because of explanatory editorial additions, which blur the original clarity of the outline, and partly owing to the existence of “mixed forms” that combine, in one whole, features drawn from both forms.

The first form is that usually called categoric or apodictic, and is best illustrated in the format of the first part of each of the Ten Commandments. It is characterized by its terseness and abruptness, and is an absolute command, apparently admitting no exceptions, usually making use of the second person singular future (either in the positive or negative form). Sometimes the second person plural is used, and sometimes the imperative is substituted for the future. The style is heavy and impressive; the structure is rhythmic, assonant, parallel, and poetic. Presumably this was for ease of memory (cf. the NT BEATITUDES) and perhaps for ease of recitation, if laws, or collections of laws, were indeed liturgical texts, read at the great religious folk-meetings of Israel, as many modern scholars believe, and as the law itself enjoins (“when all Israel comes to appear before the LORD your God at the place he will choose, you shall read this law before them in their hearing,” Deut. 31:11).

Another early form, using the participial form instead of the second person singular, is the pattern “Anyone who strikes a man [lit., One striking a man]...shall surely be put to death” (Exod. 21:12 and following verses). In this type there is deliberate rhythm and assonance (Gen. 9:6 is an instance from a very early period). Bentzen reckons this type of law as belonging to the second or casuistic form, but it contains so many early features that it is best treated with the categoric commands of the type found in the Ten Words. Both of these, from their rhythmic nature, have been associated by some scholars with the concept of the divine oracle or Torah given originally by a prophet or priest of Yahweh. Whether this is so or not, it is quite clear that in Israel they are regarded, like all law, as a divine revelation. Moses by tradition was prophet and priest as well as law-giver.

This apodictic law used to be described as “desert law”—somber and authoritarian, with no concessions to the complexities of urban or even agrarian life in highly developed Canaan. Its austerity was therefore held to be typically Israelite, and it was considered to be the only original law of Israel. By contrast, all law belonging to the second or “casuistic” type was held to be a borrowing from the Canaanites after the Israelite entry into the land. Neither of these theses can now be sustained at least as far as the argument is based on the format of the laws.

As far as the “casuistic” law is concerned, direct borrowing from Canaan is not now held to be nearly as likely as inheritance from the “common law” of W Semitic folk, in which Israel shared as much as did the Canaanites, and which Moses must have known. Regarding the uniqueness of the apodictic form, R de Vaux (Ancient Israel [1961], 147) has shown that, while it is not characteristic of Semitic law as known largely from heavily settled Mesopotamia (naturally, no written laws from the desert survive), this form is characteristic of some HITTITE treaties (see TREATY). In view of the known fact that the Israelite theory and practice of COVENANT has many similarities with Hittite “suzerainty treaties” made by an imperial overlord with subject peoples, this is interesting as perhaps showing further Hittite links. It can, therefore, no longer be claimed that this form is either “desert” or “pure Israelite”; thus, any judgments as to the originality of the material, if based only on the form, would be erroneous. A safer position to take is to regard all Israel’s laws, whether categoric or apodictic, as permeated with the light of the new revelation of Yahweh.

The second type of law to be found in the Torah is casuistic, or case-law. This normally introduces an instance, ending with a “then...,” as in the Mesopotamian case-law codes. Such laws should not be regarded as hypothetical instances, but as actual precedents or case judgments, whether earlier (Sinaitic) or later. It is in these areas that Israel’s case-law approaches most closely that of her immediate Semitic neighbors. This is natural enough, since, given roughly similar levels of civilization and circumstances of life, similar problems were liable to arise, and broadly similar solutions to be found (although Israel’s law is always more humane). Semitic law is most familiar to modern scholars in its later codifications, like that of HAMMURABI of Babylon, or the Middle Assyrian law code, or the neo-Babylonian laws. None of these were in any sense innovations. They were merely codifications and systematizations of far earlier laws, as can be seen from comparison with the Lipit-Ishtar Code and the Eshnunna Code.

How many of these precedents rested ultimately on early Semitic “common law” and how many on Sumerian codes, it would be hard to say; perhaps it would be wrong to consider these as ultimately distinct. In view of the proven widespread knowledge of these later codifications among the W Semitic peoples (annotated copies of Hammurabi’s laws have been found in Egypt), one may safely assume a widespread knowledge of the earlier “customary law” that underlay them. There is no need to assume any direct or conscious borrowing by Israel of Canaanite case law at a comparatively late date (the conquest), the more so as there is no reason to assume that Canaanite law was any different from the general Semitic pattern.

Naturally, where it is a matter of the content, Israel’s laws throughout are dominated by the revelation of God received at Mount Sinai. There is a humaneness, an avoidance of mutilations and other savage punishments, and an awareness of the value of human personality and the individual, for which we would search in vain in other codes. This, and not any outward form, is the distinctiveness of Israel’s law. One example will suffice: the small space given in Israel’s code to property laws, and the large space to personal relations. Even in the case of the land laws, the motivation for every law is strongly personal and religious.

IV. Contents of the law. It comes as a surprise that, in the so-called law of Moses, strictly legal matter takes quite a minor place. Even if the area is enlarged to cover all matter of religious or ceremonial interest, it is still not dominant. If the basic meaning of Torah as “instruction” is kept in mind, this will no longer surprise. Israel’s ancestral traditions—the salvation story of exodus, with the bittersweet experiences of the desert wandering—teach about God and his ways as surely as the Ten Commandments, or as the distinctions between “clean” and “unclean” which occupy especially Lev. 11-15. HISTORY is not law, but history seen through God’s eyes is indeed Torah (“instruction”)—just as later Israelite history was reckoned as “prophecy,” and included the books of the Prophets in the CANON of the OT. This also explains another aspect—the evident love of Israel for the Torah, expressed, for instance, in Ps. 119. Few men except lawyers could love a legal system (although the PHARISEES of NT days seem to have done so); but all people could love the Torah, with its combination of poem and history, law and exhortation, for this was the very lifeblood of early Israel, cast in a literary form.

For the analysis of the material contained within the Torah, R. H. Pfeiffer (Introduction to the Old Testament [1941], 130-33) may be followed in the main, with minor modifications. (1) The origin of the world and of the nations of mankind (Gen. 1-11). (2) The patriarchs (chs. 12-50). (3) Moses and the exodus from Egypt (Exod. 1-18). (4) The divine revelation at Sinai (chs. 19-40). (5) The Levitical legislation at Sinai (Lev. 1-27). (6) The last events and laws at Sinai (Num. 1-10). (7) The journey to the plains of Moab (chs. 11-21). (8) Events in the plains of Moab (chs. 22-36). (9) The last discourses of Moses (Deut. 1-34).

At first sight, this looks like a coherent whole; and it is, in point of fact, a cogent historical arrangement of much diverse material. Even a cursory glance at the analysis above will show that of “law” in the narrower sense, only half of Exodus and all of Leviticus are constituted. Both Numbers and Deuteronomy contain sections of laws, but in the first, legal matter is subordinate to narrative, and in the second, to exhortation. Therefore the Torah has at least as good a claim to be called a history book as a lawbook and considered from either angle, it is still uniquely God's "instruction."

V. Codes of the law. FORM CRITICISM has brought a new freshness to biblical studies by its isolation and study of the different "forms" within the books of the Bible instead of the endless documentary analysis. Where form criticism restricts itself to descriptive study, it can be a valuable analysis of biblical matter along entirely new lines; when some of its advocates push it further and base unwarranted value judgments on its conclusions, there is no need to follow them. Therefore, in isolating various "codes of law" within the Pentateuch for study, there is no necessity for postulating different sources or different dates. Indeed, all might well have originated in the Mosaic age, for all we know. Many of the codes cannot in any case have had an independent existence at any time in Israel's history. With this proviso, some seven or more separate codes may be cataloged as follows. They are mainly taken from Exodus, Leviticus, and Deuteronomy, with small sections from other books.

A. The Ten Commandments. These "Ten Words" stand at the very heart of the law and are fundamental to the whole. They appear twice, with minor differences in the explanatory additions (which may well themselves be early) in the second half of each verse: Exod. 20:1-17 and Deut. 5:6-21. It is these laws, probably in the shorter form consisting of the first half of each verse, without the explanation, which according to the Bible were engraved on the tablets in the ARK OF THE COVENANT (Exod. 24:12).

Violent controversy has raged over the date of the Ten Commandments (see H. H. Rowley, Men of God [1963]). Scholars like R. H. Pfeiffer reject any possibility of Mosaic mention of Sabbath or noniconic worship, and are even doubtful as to the forbidding of the worship of other gods as early as Mosaic times. Scholars of the Albright school, on the other hand, point to the literary form of the commandments, as well as their contents, as indicating "an original date of the Decalogue no later than the thirteenth century B.C." (W. F. Albright, Yahweh and the Gods of Canaan [1968]). With this, the basically aniconic nature of Israel's worship (as witnessed archaeologically for the days of the judges) agrees; there is no valid reason to doubt a Mosaic origin. It often has been argued that what is taught in the Ten Words is properly monolatry, not monotheism—the exclusive worship of one God, rather than the denial of the existence of all others, as presented in the second half of Isaiah. But this view usually assigns such passages as Gen. 1 to the postexilic period and fails to reckon with statements like Exod. 12:12, or misinterprets Exod. 15:11 and other such passages.

The Ten Commandments can be seen only, like the rest of the law, against the background of the COVENANT; this in turn rests on the salvation history of the exodus. Other codes within the law are basically an expansion and application of these principles to various facets of life, rather as the NT epistles apply the truth of the gospel. Thus the Ten Commandments became the root of all subsequent Israelite morality as well as of religion.

B. The Covenant Code. Immediately following the Ten Words (Exod. 20:22—23:33) is the Covenant Code, often called the Book of the Covenant. It seems to be regarded in Scripture not only as having been promulgated at the time of the covenant made between God and Israel at Sinai, but also as being the actual terms of this covenant. Whatever the underlying reason, it certainly is a coherent whole, and may be studied in isolation from the rest of the law without doing violence to its context.

Some scholars today, following the Albright school, would see it as a typical piece of Bronze Age legislation, and therefore of Mosaic date, although others would claim that it was borrowed at that date from Canaanite or other sources. Much depends upon whether the historian accepts the biblical tradition of a generation of semisettled life around the oasis of Kadesh before the conquest of Canaan (Deut. 1:46). Clearly the Covenant Code contemplates settled agricultural life of a simple nature such as could well be practiced there. Sheep and oxen and slaves are the usual forms of wealth; the old generic name “Hebrew” is still used, probably with a wider meaning than “Israelite” (Exod. 21:2); altars are of earth (20:24); crops are sown (22:5; 23:10); three agricultural festivals are kept (23:14-17). None of this goes beyond what was possible in that semisettled generation.

It is possible that much of this code (as no doubt parts of the Ten Commandments, cf. Gen. 26:12) antedates Moses. Whatever the duration of the Israelite stay in Egypt, they were certainly settled, not nomadic, in GOSHEN. Even in the earliest days of the migration, Israel’s ancestors had been assnomads, not camel-nomads, which implies certain contacts with settled life. The branch of the clan settled at HARAN seems to have progressed in this direction even more rapidly than Abraham’s group. It is therefore inconceivable that Moses should have been ignorant of all these legal traditions of his people. If it contains many of the customary laws of Israel’s forefathers (no doubt now transformed by the fuller revelation given to Moses at Sinai), it is not surprising that the Covenant Code bears many similarities to other codes preserved by Israel’s Semitic neighbors (likewise no doubt crystallizations of Semitic traditional law). Nor is it surprising that in part Deuteronomy repeats the provisions of the Covenant Code, in part supplements them, presumably by including other areas of the same ancestral law, purified by the clear light of “Yahwism.”

Whether or not Moses’ stay in MIDIAN had any influence on the law as a whole and the Covenant Code in particular is a question that cannot be answered with present limited knowledge. The biblical tradition is clear that Moses spent a generation in MIDIAN, that he married a Midianite girl, and that her father was a priest of Midian (Exod. 2:17-21). Midian was at least half-settled at the time; JETHRO was associated with Moses in judicial activity (18:13-22). It is thus unthinkable that Moses should have been ignorant of Midianite law and custom; it is highly likely that this was only another form of ancestral Semitic law.

C. The Deuteronomic Code. Found in Deut. 12-26, this code is another coherent group of laws about whose separate existence there can be no doubt. Even the most extreme critics usually recognize the book of DEUTERONOMY as an independent literary unit. While in some ways it is a summing up of the whole of the law and history of early Israel (a sort of multum in parvo), in other ways it is only a “supplement” of earlier codes, especially the Covenant Code, by covering areas initially omitted, as well as reinterpreting the old. That is why its position may be compared to that of John’s gospel in the NT. Much of it is cast in discourse style, a sort of “reminiscences of Moses,” with which the speeches in Acts may be compared. A recognition of the historicity of the material of John (cf. C. H. Dodd, Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel [1963]) is not without significance in such a parallel. Deuteronomy is infused throughout with a warmth of love that continually introduces new motives for keeping the law (Deut. 25:3) and humanitarian application of the law, even extending to wild animals (22:6). “Covenant love” so dominates the code that it has a right to be called a “Covenant Code” (Exod. 20-23), which it so closely resembles.

Many scholars have considered Deuteronomy a postprophetic production, both from its style and language (where it closely resembles Jeremiah) and also from its theology. But it does not in theology differ essentially from the Ten Words or the Book of the Covenant; indeed, it is precisely because of this similarity that some critical scholars “late-date” these two latter codes. In addition, many undoubtedly early features appear in the Deuteronomic Code (cf. the valuable study on Deuteronomy by M. Kline, The Treaty of the Great King [1963]). The old terminology “Hebrew” is still used (Deut. 15:12). Life is still basically simple and rural, though houses (22:8) and towns (13:12) are known. If, as suggested, Deuteronomy draws heavily on ancestral Semitic law (like the Covenant Code), then all is explicable. Similarities to Hammurabi’s Code are likewise explicable if the latter is only a codification of common Semitic law; in any case, Moses would have known Hammurabi’s Code, since it was widely studied in Egypt.

If Deuteronomy was the law book found in JOSIAH’S day in the temple (2 Ki. 22:11), it would certainly have existed in 621 B.C. That does not necessarily prove that it was produced only then, the more so as, when read, it was immediately recognized as being the well-known substance of the “Law of Moses.” Some scholars like E. Robertson (The Old Testament Problem [1950]) have considered that it was the formulation of Mosaic law made in Samuel’s day; others have considered that it was a N Israelite law book, based on Mosaic tradition and preserved at some northern sanctuary. Samuel wrote out some constitution for the kingdom (1 Sam. 10:25) which must surely have had some relation to the material of Deut. 17:14-20. Perhaps all that can be said is that Deuteronomy, like the Book of the Covenant, is an instance of formulation of part of one and the same early Hebrew legal tradition apparently adopted and purified by Moses for the use of his people.

The two vexed questions of Deuteronomy are the so-called “Law of the Kingdom” (Deut. 17:14-20) and the “Law of the Single Sanctuary” (12:5). These are both reckoned as showing late dates, the first because of the nonexistence of kingship in Israel till two centuries after Moses; the second, because it seems to contradict Exod. 20:24, which appears to allow worship wherever Israel has received any divine revelation or theophany. As this included the patriarchal age, obviously there could be many such sites; and the OT does show that there was worship at Bethel, Beersheba, Gilgal, Jericho, etc. Neither of these passages is decisive, in itself alone, as proving a late date for the material of Deuteronomy. Israel might not have had kings, but all her sister peoples had kingship long before the time of Moses (Edom, Moab, Ammon, as well as the Canaanites); and from earliest days, while perhaps worship of Yahweh was tolerated elsewhere, there had been only one “amphictyonic sanctuary” where the annual religious folkmoets were held (cf. Josh. 22:10-12).

D. The Code of Holiness. This code is contained in Lev. 17-26, which again seems a cohesive “whole within a whole.” It is dominated by the same lofty thought of the HOLINESS and transcendence of God as is found in Ezekiel. The code is full of elaborate instructions as to how to maintain, even in the physical realm, this holiness that comes from being the people of God. Leviticus, as a whole, makes less appeal to moderns than, say, Deuteronomy—partly because all of Leviticus is virtually a “priest’s handbook” on technical matters of religion, and partly because such rules of cleanliness and worship have ceased to be directly applicable or practical in modern life. With no temple, no sacrifice, no distinction between clean and unclean food (Mk. 7:19), much of the direct relevance has gone for the Christian today. If Deut. 6:5 contained the first part of the Lord’s summary of the law (“Love the LORD your God...”), Lev. 19:18 contained the second (“love your neighbor as yourself”). No code that contains such a statement can be considered barren, and this verse is by no means an isolated instance of what might be called a “Deuteronomic attitude.”

Further, the Code of Holiness contains the same sort of motivation as the Ten Commandments, by which ethics are deduced directly from theology (in the proper sense of that word, as being the known and revealed nature and will of God). A keynote of the Holiness Code is Lev. 19:2, “Be holy because I, the LORD [Yahweh] your God, am holy.” Put more succinctly, the keynote becomes the simple phrase, “I am Yahweh” (19:4 and many other passages), placed at the end of a verse as the reason for the command that has gone before. No code can be called barren that contains such motivation, and the sonorous rhythm of the phrase sounds early.

The Code of Holiness usually is associated closely with the teaching of the prophet EZEKIEL; as he was a priest himself, this is not surprising. The minor differences between Ezekiel and the code may perhaps be explained by the possibility that Ezekiel recognized in the captivity the judgment of God, and was concerned to recall his people to the ancient law. Minor differences need not disturb, for in time some laws become inapplicable and disused. Ezekiel quotes from the Code of Holiness (Ezek. 20:11, 13, 21). The literary style may not be due only to a late date. Certain aspects may be typical of the clipped conservatism of religious and liturgical language.

E. The Priestly Code. This may be a useful name to apply to the material of the rest of Leviticus (which has no such one compelling motive as the Code of Holiness) and perhaps to certain other parts of the Pentateuch. To describe it as a code, as though it had existed in isolation, seems a misnomer; it is only a convenient term for the vast body of traditional material that every sacrificing priest in Israel must know. As he was not only priest, but also doctor and health inspector, as well as custodian of public and private morals, the Priestly Code covers a wide area of life.

The archaeological discoveries at Ras Shamra (see UGARIT) and elsewhere in the Middle E have shown, by the existence of parallels, the probable age of the material contained therein, whatever the date of the transcription. Perhaps therefore in the ritual area, too, Moses adopted and purified many of the sacrificial practices of Israel's ancestors. Although there appears to have been no specialized priesthood in Israel until Mosaic days (Exod. 32:29), it is hard to believe that the patriarchs had no customary rules governing their offerings and sacrifices.

F. The Ritual Decalogue. So far, the codes isolated have had at least some claim to individual identity. Whether the so-called Ritual Decalogue (Exod. 34:10-26) ever existed independently of its context, or whether it is a creation of biblical scholars, is most uncertain. It is undoubted that various ritual prescriptions existed; it is even possible that they were combined into lists or catalogs and read at festival times at one or other of the great early meeting places (Gilgal, Shechem, or Shiloh). There is no reason to isolate ten or twelve arbitrarily to make either a Decalogue (corresponding to the Ten Commandments) or a Dodecalogue (corresponding to the Twelve Tribes). Indeed, the first of these names is probably influenced by the false idea that there must be a set of "ritual" rules corresponding to the "ethical" rules of the Ten Words.

This view, however, ignores the fact that no such distinction was felt in early days; even the Ten Words contain two provisions that might be described as ritual (the prescribing of aniconic worship, and the enjoining of observance of every seventh day). With this proviso, it may be admitted freely that there is a concentration of "ritual laws" governing Israel's worship found in Exod. 34:10-26. R. H. Pfeiffer finds traces in various other parts of the Covenant Code and the Deuteronomic Code. Certainly this Exodus passage is couched in typically abrupt early Israelite style, with the use of the second person singular ("you shall...you shall not..."). The chief items are the destruction of Canaanite altars and images, and the observance of the SABBATH and the three great annual FEASTS of Yahweh.

In the biblical account, these laws are prefixed by a revelation of Yahweh's name and nature, accompanied by the recarving of the tablets of the law, and introduced by the words, "Behold, I make a covenant" (Exod. 34:10 KJV). Perhaps therefore "Second Book of the Covenant" would be a better name for this material; v. 27 is particularly clear, "for in accordance with these words I have made a covenant with you and with Israel.”

G. Blessings and curses. The modern fashion is to see the blessings and curses (cf. the NT “Beatitudes” and “Woes”) as liturgical forms, pronounced solemnly and in public at great religious ceremonies, and believed to be effective in themselves as producing the result described. While many will dissent from the latter part of such a definition, there is evidence in Scripture that the first part is true, at least on certain historic occasions, if not as part of the regular worship of Israel. A good example is Deut. 27:15-26, where twelve solemn curses are to be pronounced by the Levites at an assembly on the hills above SHECHEM (cf. Josh. 8:34).

Two things, however, should be noted: the liturgical curses pronounced are not on a set of new offenses, but on offenses condemned elsewhere in other Israelite “codes.” The list of curses is only a summary of the negative aspect of Israel’s law, and their direction and rhythm is that of the early Israelite Torah. Second, the curses are not pronounced in isolation. This is no magical ceremony, but a proclamation of the consequences of either obeying or disregarding the revealed mind of God.

Six tribes were to stand on Mount GERIZIM to bless, while the other six tribes stood on Mount EBAL to curse. Presumably the “blessings” are substantially those contained in Deut. 28, perhaps originally expressed in a more succinct form, corresponding to the form of the curses in the previous chapter. For examples of similar blessings see the poetic blessings of Jacob in Gen. 49 (which also contain curses in the case of Reuben, Simeon, and Levi; see vv. 3-7) and the blessing of Moses (Deut. 33), with the other smaller fragments. In addition Num. 23-24 contain some very oracular poems (the Oracles of BALAAM), which combine blessings with curses; nevertheless, it is hard to think that such found any regular place in public worship.

H. Moses and the law codes. Apart from these seven codes, others have been isolated from time to time with varying degrees of plausibility by different scholars, but none has commanded general acceptance. Even these seven are mainly of interest as showing the possible raw material that underlay the law of Moses.

Surely the background, training, and education of Moses was God’s preparation for the writing of his great lifework. He was by birth an Israelite, and also a member of the wider Hebrew group, and thus an inheritor of the common law of all Semitic people; by training an Egyptian noble, and thus familiar with Hammurabi’s law and Egyptian juristic comment on it; by force of circumstance, a great man in Midian, and both a spectator and participant in the legal processes of the semidesert. Who was better trained and equipped than he to become under God the great lawgiver of Israel, and codifier of his people’s law? No doubt in the Torah of Moses’ day, there was much that was new, in the shape of the fresh and deeper revelation of Yahweh. No doubt, since Yahweh was also expressly the “God of the Fathers,” even if his name was not known to them (Exod. 6:3), there was also much that was old and familiar, although now purified and transformed by the new revelation. Both parts alike are God’s self-revelation and the Torah.

VI. Land laws in the OT. As Israel was basically an agricultural people from the time of the conquest of Canaan until the Babylonian captivity (with a brief essay to the world of commerce and manufacturing, under Solomon), a study of their land laws may be of some interest. First, it is well to notice that no complete system of land laws can be built up from the Pentateuch alone; and yet no other codification of early Israelite laws is known, except for the MISHNAH, which seems to preserve additional laws in force at the time of the destruction of Herod’s temple. Obviously, Israel had more land laws than these two works contain; therefore it is only reasonable to assume that in this area (as doubtless in that of commerce and elsewhere) she simply used the common Semitic law, supplementing it by specifically Israelite regulations where such were necessitated by Israel's revelation of Yahweh. Only some such practice can account for the otherwise inexplicable "gaps" in the Torah, here and elsewhere.

Second, Israel must have had some "land laws," even if only customary law, long before Moses. Nomads need no such laws, but ABRAHAM seems to buy the sepulchre for SARAH by good Hittite law (Gen. 23) which would illustrate both the need for land laws and the "law borrowing" mentioned above. As soon as ISAAC began to sow crops in the coastal plain (26:12), there must have been need to observe the local land laws, insofar as such laws were neutral religiously (vv. 17-22 suggest considerable litigation over water rights). In Egypt, whatever the exact duration of the stay of the Israelites, they seem to have been market gardeners as well as herdsmen, otherwise they would scarcely have longed for cucumbers, melons, onions, leeks, and garlic, when wandering in the Sinai desert (Num. 11:5). Complicated land laws would have been necessary for those whose garden plots were annually flooded by the NILE, obliterating all divisions.

If Israel was semisettled at Kadesh for a generation (Deut. 1:46), she surely grew crops around the oasis, as well as sending her flocks and herds to graze in the desert; at least primitive land law would have been necessary. JACOB bought land legally from the sons of HAMOR (Gen. 33:19), though the sons held the SHECHEM area by right of conquest (34:25-29), as Israel under Joshua held her Canaanite acres. Once the sacred lot had apportioned conquered land to tribe and family it must be held legally or not at all, and since the land was Yahweh's gift, such land law was religious law.

This last attitude can be seen clearly as late as the reign of AHAB in the N, where NABOTH asserts it (1 Ki. 21:3). For the same reason, the removal of a neighbor's land mark was a serious religious offense in Israel (Deut. 19:14), as well as stealing land from a neighbor. Jacob, as he lay dying, bequeathed his plot to JOSEPH (Gen. 48:22) by legal act of INHERITANCE. Once land was owned and assigned, the aim of the law was to keep it in perpetuity in the same family or clan. The principle had been established already by the Mosaic judgment (Num. 27:1-11), whereby a brotherless heiress could inherit her father's estate. In such cases, the husband who married her must belong to her own clan, lest the land should leave their possession. (See 26:33; 27:7; 36:11; Josh. 17:4 for the "test case" of the daughters of ZELOPHEHAD.) Numbers 27 and 36 are important passages for understanding this fundamental principle of Israelite land tenure, and also for seeing the importance gradually assumed by the "next of kin” to whom the land fell in default of direct heirs.

In pursuance of the same principle, land might not be permanently alienated by its owner. Important here is the peculiarly Israelite custom of the JUBILEE YEAR, when all lands reverted to their original owners (Num. 36:4). While it appears that this law actually became a dead letter in Israel, in principle it corresponded to the modern practice of “leasing” land for a period of years, after which the land would revert to the state or the original landlord. Seven sevens of years was a doubly sacred number, and for the Israelite it corresponded to the “ninety-nine years” or “nine hundred and ninety-nine years” of British leases. There is nothing inherently improbable in such a regulation, the more so as it is linked with the agrarian system by which fields were to be left fallow every seventh year—a wise provision in a marginal country with inadequate use of fertilizers.

The book of Leviticus deals in detail with both sabbatical and Jubilee years (Lev. 25:1-12). The great principle upon which all is based is clearly enunciated: “The land must not be sold permanently, because the land is mine and you are but aliens and my tenants” (v. 23). Naturally this custom, if observed, would govern the buying and selling prices of land. The duty to buy back temporarily alienated land, and thus keep it in the clan, rested with the “redeemer kinsman” (v. 25; see REDEMPTION). Another passage (27:16-25) shows that such “reversion” in the Jubilee Year was even intended to be true of land dedicated to God, so strongly was this legal principle felt. This provision prevented the accumulation of large landed estates to the detriment of the poor.

The custom of LEVIRATE LAW by which a husband's brother (or failing that, a husband's nearest male relative) was bound to marry his brother's childless widow, was doubtless connected with this desire to keep land in the family. There is detailed evidence of the persistence of this custom in the book of RUTH (where land inheritance rights were also involved, Ruth 4:5; the legal basis is in Deut. 25:5-10). By the date of Ruth, apparently the transference of the loosened sandal had lost its original meaning and corresponded to the transference of the land. The presence of ten witnesses

Egyptian leather sandals stitched with papyrus twine (late 2nd millennium B.C.). By the time of Ruth, the transfer of land was confirmed with the loosened sandal (Ruth 4:7-8).

(Ruth 4:2) is an interesting legal point; witnesses also appear essential in the land transference recorded in Abraham's day (Gen. 23:10) and Jeremiah's time (Jer. 32:10), where there is a full deed of purchase.

It seems certain that this simple agrarian system broke down under the twin impacts of industrial development and rapid urbanization from the time of Solomon onward. The increased importance of trade and consequent high rates of interest bore hard on the farmers. To judge from Amos and Hosea, many became landless laborers, and were even enslaved for debt, with their lands first mortgaged and then permanently alienated. But the example of Naboth in the northern kingdom of Ahab's day (1 Ki. 21:3) shows the persistence with which some Israelites still clung to the old ideas long after Solomon.

From Jeremiah's day there is full and detailed record of a land transaction (Jer. 32:6-15, apparently a "redemption," though with no marriage involved) mentioning witnesses and documents, both sealed deeds and open deeds, containing terms and conditions of purchase. Such deeds were stored, like the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, in earthenware jars (32:14). The probable nature of the documents can be seen from such of the ELEPHANTINE papyri as deal with property transfers. Jeremiah's action presupposes that the Jews would return to their ancestral properties after the EXILE (32:15) and, to judge from Ezra and Nehemiah, many did. No doubt the old legal forms of land tenure were resumed. This was possible because, unlike northern Israel, Judah had not been "settled" by foreign farmers, but had apparently remained fallow during the exile. However, Judah seems to have learned little from the punishment of the exile; for the same agrarian troubles appear almost at once (high interest, mortgages, slavery for debt, and alienation of land, Neh. 5:1-13).

VII. Attitude to law in the OT

A. In early days. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that not only did observances like the sabbatical year or the Year of Jubilee quickly become a dead letter, but that most of the law was treated in the same way. True, archaeology shows that images appeared very slowly and late in early Israelite settlements in Canaan (presumably under Canaanite influence), so that the basic aniconic principle lasted for a time; in fact, images of Israel's God have never been discovered by archaeologists.

Even that principle began to crumble as the very national fabric of Israel seemed to break up in the days of the judges. See JUDGES, PERIOD OF. Some such declension was known by the authors of Josh. 24:31 and Jdg. 2:10-13. GIDEON's family openly worshiped symbols of BAAL and ASHERAH (6:25); he himself made a golden "ephod" (prob. an idol) in Ophrah with the spoils of victory (8:27). The book of Judges contains also the remarkable story of how an image was stolen from EPHRAIM and carried off by the men of DAN to their new northern sanctuary (chs. 17—18).

But this declension does not prove that the law was not known, still less that it did not exist; for Gideon knows that Yahweh alone is King in Israel (Jdg. 8:23). JEPHTHAH will not take Yahweh's name in vain (11:35); and SAMSON is a NAZIRITE (13:5). Even the darkest pages of Judges (the "holy war" against BENJAMIN in ch. 20) corresponded to an article of the old law, as recorded in Deut. 13:12-16. At least one of the yearly feasts of Yahweh was still being kept at SHILOH (Jdg. 21:19), and pious farmers like ELKANAH went up regularly to worship there (1 Sam. 1:3). Indeed, the whole story of SAMUEL shows how the daily life of the simple Israelite was bound in a nexus of religious custom that stemmed from Israel's law, however little he might know of its detailed prescriptions. The same could be said for the idyllic picture of the country life in the book of Ruth.

B. The prophetic period. A generation ago most OT scholars considered that Israel's PROPHETS were from the beginning sharply opposed to her PRIESTS. The prophets were held to be great moral and ethical innovators, and thus foes of the entire sacrificial system of the law. Such scholars usually considered that the law did not contain any moral teaching, except perhaps general principles. Passages like Hos. 6:6 and Amos 5:21-24 were adduced to show the prophetic opposition to sacrifice (and indeed to all outward forms of religion), while Amos 5:25, like Jer. 7:22, was sometimes used to deny that even Israel's sacrificial system was truly Mosaic in date.

But Amos 2:4 distinctly says that God's punishment will come on Judah "because they have rejected the law of the LORD and have not kept his decrees," and 5:21-22 mentions by name several ritual ordinances of the law. Hosea gives the reason for God's rejection as "you have ignored the law of your God" (Hos. 4:6). The true prophetic attitude seems thus to be that expressed by SAMUEL to SAUL in 1 Sam. 15:22, "To obey is better than sacrifice." No man could say that this statement came from an enemy of the law; Samuel was a sacrificing priest, whose initial rift with Saul took place on a question of the propriety of a "layman" sacrificing (ch. 13:12-13).

The prophetic attitude is not a rejection of the law, but an emphasis on the moral basis that had always underlain it. Amos and Hosea, the first of the "writing prophets," certainly show knowledge of the Torah, the former perhaps mostly of the "history of salvation" (Amos 2:9-10) and the sacrificial system (5:21-25); the latter is well aware of the ethical law (Hos. 4:1-2, apparently referring to the Ten Commandments; cf. 12:9; 13:4) and the covenant (8:1). Hosea seems to know some written law (8:12), a tradition which, as seen above, goes back through Samuel (1 Sam. 10:25) and Joshua (Josh. 8:32) to Moses himself (Exod. 24:4).

The pendulum has swung completely to the other extreme. With the view that prophets in Israel were “cultic prophets,” usually organized in bands at Israelite sanctuaries, and possibly identified with the Levites, and that they had a definite place in the liturgical life and worship of Israel, such opposition to the priesthood as that postulated above becomes unreal. While this is certainly overemphasized, it is a useful corrective to the older view. It is true that Jeremiah and Ezekiel were priests, and that Isaiah received his call in the temple (Isa. 6:1); but all three reserved their prophetic freedom to criticize sharply any leaning on outward observances to the exclusion of the spirit of the law. This was thoroughly Mosaic.

C. In later days. The great change in Israel’s attitude to the Torah is marked not so much by a date as by an event, the Babylonian EXILE. In a foreign land, the law took on a new importance, by which Israel was distinguished from the countless other small racial groups of a polyglot empire. The exile was realized as the final result of failure to keep and obey the law, a lesson brought home by all the preexilic prophets. The law was certainly read in the returned community at Jerusalem (Neh. 8). As far as could be, it had become the state law of this tiny group; religious leaders like Ezra and political leaders like Nehemiah enforced it wherever they could. This was possible not only because of the preference of the imperial Persian government to rule subject peoples according to their own laws; it corresponded to a new will and purpose in Israel herself.

The number of references to “law” in Ezra and Nehemiah is remarkable, and it is undoubtedly no accident. Not since the old wilderness days had Torah held such a central place in Israel’s life; its prestige was enhanced by the dying of the voice of prophecy (Zech. 13:3-4), and the fact that priests could apparently no longer give guidance by the use of Urim and Thummim (Neh. 7:65). Even such prophetic voice as still existed was raised in defense of the law; for Mal. 4:4 closes the OT with the words, “Remember the law of my servant Moses, the decrees and laws I gave him at Horeb for all Israel,” followed by the promise of the “second Elijah.”

It must have seemed to many as if the great promise of the new covenant (Jer. 31:33) had been fulfilled already, as though God had already written his law on human hearts (see COVENANT, THE NEW). The bitter experiences of the returned community give the lie to this; both Ezra and Nehemiah found, as Moses no doubt had, that the human heart is still the same (Ezra 9:3; Neh. 5:6). The returned exiles paid service to the law, but it was only lip service. For the fulfillment of the promise through Jeremiah, one must wait until PENTECOST and NT times. The hand of the law was not only an iron hand on Israel; it soon became a dead hand, stifling with its legalism the inner spiritual life. What it became for the PHARISEES can be seen from the NT; but even then PAUL insists that it is not the Torah that is at fault, but only fallen sinners (Rom. 7:7-12). I. Synoptic Gospels. The word nomos G3795 occurs only eight times in Matthew (Matt. 5:17-18; 7:12; 11:13; 12:5; 22:36, 40; 23:23), nine times in Luke (Lk. 2:22-23, 24, 27, 39; 10:26; 16:16-17; 24:44), and not at all in Mark. In every passage except Lk. 2:23, it is used with the definite article. Generally nomos refers to the PENTATEUCH; however, when combined with hoi prophetai ("the prophets"), it broadens so as to give the phrase the meaning of the whole OT. More specifically nomos signifies both the law (TORAH) and the Pentateuch. As law in terms of commandments it denotes both what we should do and not do (Matt. 5:19). With the possible exception of Matt. 12:5, it is never used in the synoptics for the whole OT.

Stone cups from the 1st cent. Jesus rebuked certain teachers and Pharisees who misused the law. He said, "First clean the inside of the cup and dish, and then the outside also will be clean" (Matt. 23:26).

Throughout his public ministry, Jesus severely criticized the scribal misuse of the law. He utterly denounced those who would interpret it mediatorially, setting it forth as a means whereby a person could gain acceptance with God (cf. the parables of Lk. 15). He further opposed the Pharisaical externalization of the law, by which one would have supposed that a person's relationship to God was determined simply by an outward conformity to its stipulations. In contrast to these errors, Jesus insisted that people's relationship to his own words and deeds determined their relationship to God. Not the law but Jesus himself was the mediator between God and sinners.

Jesus also criticized that use of the law whereby it served to protect disobedience to God. Keeping individual commandments is no necessary evidence of a readiness to give oneself completely to Jesus Christ. Again, Jesus warned against those who would obey the law in order to gain recognition from others (Matt. 23:5-12). To those whose obedience was motivated by a desire for the approval of men he declared, "they have received their reward in full" (6:2).

Jesus not only condemned the wrong use of the law, he also confirmed its validity and pointed the way to its right use. Although he negated it mediatorially he affirmed it ethically. Those who have become the recipients of his forgiving mercy find in the law a pattern for right conduct. The SERMON

ON THE MOUNT, for example, has been appropriately called “A Pattern for Life,” the life of the disciple. Jesus cannot accept as good any motive or action not governed by the will of God revealed in the law. There is no other acceptable standard of goodness.

Jesus’ way of dealing with the sinner shows his recognition of the law’s validity. He forgives sins and rejects those who as his professed followers practice lawlessness (anomia G490, Matt. 7:23). To be lawless is to be loveless (24:12 NASB). Concretely, the law demands love for God and neighbor (Mk. 12:28-31; Matt. 22:40). True discipleship to Jesus is evidenced in loving acts of obedience to the law.

II. Early Christian community. When the early Christians first began the move out to a largely GENTILE world, conflict arose concerning the law. The first clear record of this controversy is that found in Acts 15 and Gal. 2 (although some scholars believe that these two passages deal with different historical circumstances; see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM).

The following information concerning this issue may be set forth from Gal. 2. First, there was essential agreement between PAUL’S message and that proclaimed by the early Christian community (2:2, 6). Second, despite essential agreement, there were some practical questions about which there would yet be controversy (2:11-14). One concrete question was how far Jewish Christians could go in respect to living together in fellowship with Gentile Christians who did not keep the law. In particular, this matter might also have raised the question as to whether they could have fellowship in the LORD’S SUPPER.

According to Acts 15, the Apostolic Council concluded three things: (1) that the law is not to be kept as a means of acceptance before God, (2) that only faith in Jesus brings salvation to both Jews and Gentiles, (3) that the law is still applicable to Jews within this new theological perspective. It is important to understand here that the obedience rendered to the law by Jewish Christians was rendered out of love to God for his redeeming grace. Fulfillment of the law was not regarded as a presupposition for belonging to the KINGDOM OF GOD.

In the further unfolding of beliefs in the early church, conflicting views persisted despite the council’s pronouncement. The radical party (JUDAIZERS) insisted that the Gentile Christians must keep the law, including circumcision, if they expected to belong to the redeemed community. From Paul’s writings, especially his epistle to the GALATIANS, we learn that these Judaizers attempted to promote their view with great zeal among Pauline churches. Among the means employed to support their teaching were efforts to discredit Paul’s apostleship (Gal. 1) and to expose his view of the law as leading to antinomianism (Rom. 5:20—6:1).

The orthodox party (represented by JAMES, PETER, and those of the community who followed them) seems to have followed the decisions laid down by the Jerusalem Council. Those of this position believed that the law was to be obeyed by Jewish Christians and that such obedience would enable them to have an effective witness to the Jewish world. They did not believe that obedience made them righteous before God, and they were prepared to accept believing Gentiles into their fellowship without requiring them to keep the law. In mixed congregations, Gentile Christians were advised to observe such points of the law as would make the fellowship of Jewish Christians defensible before the eyes of the Jewish world (Acts 15:19-21).

III. Paul’s writings. Though Paul’s use of nomos is not uniform, his starting point is to employ it predominantly for the Mosaic law (Rom. 7:22, 25; 8:7; 1 Cor. 9:9; et al.). Paul does not seem to make a significant distinction between the Decalogue and the rest of the legal material in the OT. The second use of nomos refers to the Pentateuch (Gal. 4:21). The two words “Law and Prophets” are taken together to refer to the whole OT (Rom. 3:21), and “Law” can refer to the OT generally (cf. 1 Cor. 14:21, a quotation from Isaiah). Paul combines verses from all parts of Scripture (Rom. 3:10-18) under the rubric of the law (v. 19).

Paul also saw law as the living will of God, not expressed exclusively in the Mosaic law (Rom. 2:14). In the context of this passage the apostle argues that there are no people who do not have a law of some kind. Sometimes Paul uses nomos in a figurative sense, generally with a word of explanation, such as in 3:27, where he distinguishes “the law of works” from “the law of faith.” Here the word nomos means “principle” (cf. NIV, NRSV). Paul’s point is that the “principle” of faith, not works, describes the basis on which human boasting is excluded. Likewise, it would seem best to take nomos figuratively in 7:21. Sometimes Paul uses nomos to denote some governing principle of conduct which comes from some source (the latter indicated by the genitive). This usage is found in such passages as Rom. 7:25; 8:2; Gal. 6:2. In the latter two passages “the law of the Spirit of life” and “the law of Christ” are in sharp contrast to the OT law.

It is most important to note that the demanding will of God is ultimately a matter of personal communication, not abstract formulation. In Rom. 3:19 the law is referred to as if it were personal, “whatever the law says, it says to those who are under the law”; one might substitute the word “God” here for the word “law.” (Cf. Rom. 4:15; 7:1; 1 Cor. 9:8.)

Paul’s concept of the law is decisively determined by the CROSS of Christ. From this perspective he both negates and affirms the law. The negation of the law as a consequence of the cross is stated clearly in Gal. 2:21, “I do not set aside the grace of God, for if righteousness could be gained through the law, Christ died for nothing!” In this and similar statements in other of his writings, the apostle repudiates the law as the basis for JUSTIFICATION. The law is the mediation of God’s will for fallen human beings, but precisely because of their fallenness they are totally unable to keep it.

The apostle also affirms the law by teaching that it prohibits that which is sinful (Rom. 6:15). He strongly emphasizes the negative character of the law, stressing that it is God’s word directed against sin, though all the negatives may be summed up in the one positive of love (3:19). Through the law the sinfulness of SIN is exposed. The law shows it to be rebellion against God. Though sin is always there, it comes to life through the law (7:8-9). It is the law which first makes sin real rebellion (5:20). Law drives sinners to Christ by revealing the enormity of their sin; it completely unmasks them before a Holy God. They are shut up by the law under sin (Gal. 3:22-23). Properly understood, then, the law prevents us from attempting to secure a righteous standing before God in any other way than by faith in the redeeming work of Jesus Christ.

God’s eternally abiding standard of acceptance before him is that of obedience to his will. The story of God’s GRACE centers just in this, that that obedience which sinners are unable to render has been rendered by another in their place. Paul states, “For just as through the disobedience of the one man the many were made sinners, so also through the obedience of the one man the many will be made righteous” (Rom. 5:19). Through faith in Christ, his obedience is accounted as ours.

The second affirmation of Paul regarding the law is found in such a passage as Rom. 8:4, where he states that Christ fulfilled the law in our place precisely “in order that the righteous requirement of the law might be fully met in us” through the dynamic of a new power, even that of the HOLY SPIRIT. Though the Christian is not under the law as a means of acceptance with God, he nevertheless seeks to obey the will of God in conformity to the pattern provided in the law. The gift of justification leads to a recognition of the task of obedience. (For further discussion of Paul’s view of the law, including recent debate, see PAULINE THEOLOGY IV.)

IV. Hebrews. In this epistle nomos is used almost without exception to refer to the OT law, and more specifically to those laws that pertain to the priestly ministry and the priesthood. The law is viewed from a different perspective in this epistle from that found in the thought of either Jesus or Paul. While in the teaching of Jesus and Paul the law is primarily expressive of the will of God as regulatory of human conduct, in Hebrews it expresses that upon which the OT priesthood is based. The theme of this epistle is not the relation of law and gospel, but the relation of the priestly ministry of the OT to that of Christ's.

The author of Hebrews argues that though the OT priesthood finds its strength and authority in the law, it cannot bring perfection (Heb. 7:18-19). This can be achieved only by the distinguished High Priest, even Christ. For Paul the law is weak because people do not do it, for the author of Hebrews it is weak because people do it. Paul and the author of Hebrews agree, however, that the true purpose of the law is to point the sinner to Christ in order that through him he may find access to God. It is only through the high-priestly ministry of Jesus that we may approach the Holy God.

V. James. This author employs nomos in only three passages. In Jas. 1:25, nomos would seem to be best understood as pointing to that total evangelical message as it makes claims upon the conduct of the believer. In contrast to the OT law, it is a perfect law of liberty.

In Jas. 2:8-11, nomos means "commandment" in the strict sense. The crucial question here is whether it is used for the whole of the OT law with all its commandments or only for the summary of this law in the law of love. The statement in v. 10 ("whoever keeps the whole law and yet stumbles at just one point is guilty of breaking all of it") might suggest that the whole of the OT law is intended, but the context would seem to argue against this interpretation. The writer states (v. 8) that if one really fulfills the law of love he does well (note the summary of individual commands, vv. 9-11).

The last passage is Jas. 4:11-12. The "law of freedom" is the will of God conceived of in terms of its validity for the individual. From the Christian standpoint the law of liberty is that which binds the individual not to specific commandments but to the obedience of love. This conception of law does not force the freedom of obedience into a schema after the matter of law. It should be clearly understood that James agrees with the teaching of both Jesus and Paul that law is to be interpreted in terms of the obedience of faith.

VI. John's gospel. John uses nomos fourteen times. The meaning is the usual one, the Pentateuch, though it is also used more generally for the whole of the OT. Sometimes it is used to denote a specific commandment (Jn. 7:19, 23) or a legal ordinance (7:51). John does not use nomos to suggest principally that which is regulatory of human or Christian action; rather he views it as meaning revelation (1:17), set in comparison or contrast to Jesus. John's point is that it is only in Jesus that God is most adequately revealed. Only in him is there a full manifestation of God's grace and truth. Throughout this gospel the Torah is contrasted as word of revelation with the Son who is the perfect revelation. This is the distinctive contribution of John as respects the meaning of the law, though he does in a few instances view it as also regulative of human action (13:34-35).

lawgiver. This English term is used sometimes (e.g., Isa. 33:22 NIV) to render a Hebrew word for "leader, ruler," mēḥōqēq (poal ptc. from ḥāqāq H2980, "to hew out" or "to decree"). The KJV uses it also in several places where the Hebrew term appears to mean "scepter," which is a symbol of a ruler's authority (Gen. 49:10 et al.). In the NT, it is the rendering of Greek nomothetes G3794, which James applies to God (Jas. 4:12). The concept is expressed also in other ways. For example, the fourth gospel describes MOSES as the one through whom the law was given, thus as God's instrument and agent (Jn. 1:17; 7:19). The same function of delivering the law of God to the people was ascribed by STEPHEN and by PAUL to the intermediary agency of angels (Acts 7:53; Gal. 3:19; cf. Heb. 2:2). See ANGEL; LAW (OT).

lawyer. The common Greek term for "lawyer" is nomikos G3788 (see Tit. 3:13). In the NT it occurs primarily with reference to those learned in the law of Moses, both written and oral, of which they were the official interpreters (Matt. 22:35; in these instances the NIV translates "expert in the law"). The term is used synonymously with nomodidaskalos G3791 ("teacher of the law") and with grammateus G1208 (see SCRIBE), as a comparison of the following passages shows: Matt. 22:35; Mk. 12:28; Lk. 5:17, 21; 10:25; 11:44-46. In this sense, the word is found once in Matthew (Matt. 22:35) and six times in Luke (Lk. 7:30; 10:25; 11:45-46, 52; 14:3).

Since every detail of Jewish life was expected to be regulated by the law, and since it was impossible for an ordinary Jew to become familiar with the multitude of legal requirements and to apply them in the new situations of daily life, it was absolutely necessary for some men to devote themselves to a study of the law. Those who did were the lawyers. Among the leading duties of the lawyers were the following: to study, interpret, and expound the law; to teach the law in the schools and in the synagogues; to decide questions of law; to act as judges in the courts.

As depicted in the Gospels, the lawyers regularly showed themselves to be unsympathetic to Jesus, and they joined the PHARISEES in opposing him. They rejected the teaching of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Lk. 7:30). Jesus denounced them in severe language for putting unbearable burdens upon men, refusing to help them in their need, and for actually hindering those who sought the truth (11:45-52). They opposed Jesus for healing on the SABBATH day (14:3). During Passion Week one tried to embarrass Jesus by means of a difficult question (Matt. 22:35).

Lazarus. laz'uh-ruhs (Λάζαρος G3276, from Heb. לָאָזָר, abbreviated form of לֵאזָרָא H540, “God has helped”). Friend of Jesus, whom he raised from death; brother of MARTHA and MARY. Although the name was common among the Jews, he is the only historical personage in the NT bearing the name (however, see LAZARUS AND DIVES). He is mentioned only in Jn. 11 and 12.

The home of Lazarus was in BETHANY, near Jerusalem (Jn. 11:1, 30; 12:1), located SE of the MOUNT OF OLIVES. Jesus was a close friend of the Bethany household. He was entertained in their home more than once, probably often (Matt. 21:17; Lk. 10:38-41; Jn. 11). His love for all three was well known (Jn. 11:5, 36); to that love the sisters appealed in informing Jesus of Lazarus's sickness (11:3). Jesus called Lazarus “our friend” (11:11), indicating his friendship with the twelve disciples.

Illustration of Jesus before the tomb of Lazarus.

While the characters of Martha and Mary are distinctly drawn, nothing is known of the character and temper of Lazarus. Not a word from him is recorded. He appears in the gospel story, not for any shining qualities of character, but solely because of Christ's miracle restoring him to life and the impact that the restoration produced. His resuscitation after being dead four days caused many Jews to believe in Jesus (Jn. 11:45), but caused the SANHEDRIN to agree to put Jesus to death (11:47-53).

When Jesus returned to Bethany before the final PASSOVER, his friends there gave him a banquet; Lazarus was among those at table with him (Jn. 12:1-8; Mk. 14:3). The enthusiastic testimony of eyewitnesses of Lazarus's resurrection caused many from Jerusalem to flock to Bethany to see Lazarus as well as Jesus (Jn. 12:9). Their witness also caused the ovation Jesus received at the triumphal entry (12:17-18). The fact that Lazarus was a living witness to the power of Christ led the priests also to plot his death (12:10).

The narrative of the resurrection of Lazarus—longest gospel account of a miracle (Jn. 11)—is vivid, restrained, and perfectly coherent. It is the climax of the signs in John's gospel. This miracle has been vigorously assailed. Varied rationalistic attempts have been made to break the obvious meaning of the Johannine record. It has been claimed that Lazarus was in a trance, that it was a deliberate fraud arranged by Martha and Mary, with the connivance of Jesus; that it was an embellishment as professed history of Jesus' parable in Lk. 16:19-31. Such proposals are unconvincing and illustrate the credulity of unbelief.

Its historicity has been questioned because of the silence of the synoptics. This is an admitted difficulty. But the synoptics do not pretend to give all the deeds of Jesus; except for the final Passover, their story is Galilean. The enthusiasm at the triumphal entry in the synoptics is without explanation without some such event as the resurrection of Lazarus. The synoptics may have omitted the story to shield the members of the Bethany household.

Others admit that an actual event lies behind the account, but deny a literal resurrection. They see it as a symbolical portrayal of Christ's power to raise people from spiritual death in a life of sin. But the simple scriptural account gives no hint that the story was intended as an allegory. From the reactions of Christ's contemporaries, whether friend or foe, it is clear that they did not so demythologize the event. The miracle was intended by Christ to strengthen the faith of his disciples, challenge the nation to accept or reject him, and to foreshadow his own impending death and RESURRECTION.

Lazarus and Dives laz'uh-ruhs, di'veez. Traditional title of Jesus' parable of "Lazarus and the rich man" (Lk. 16:19-31). The name Dives comes from the Latin word for "rich" (the first words of the parable, "There was a rich man," are translated in the Latin VULGATE as "Homo quidam erat dives"). In the narrative, however, the rich man remains indefinite and unnamed. The use of the name Dives is found early in English literature, probably due to the use of it in cathedral dramas enacting the story (e.g., "Lazar and Dives liveden diversly, and diverse guerdon hadden they thereby," in Chaucer, The Summoner's Tale 11.759-60). Other names for this anonymous rich man were current among the Syrian and Coptic rite churches, but they were not adopted in the W.

The central issue concerning the story has been the use of a name for the poor man—the only such ascription in all of our Lord's parables. This is especially important as the story takes place on two levels and in two universes of discourse, the life on this earth and the life of the world to come. The traditional orthodox position has been to assume that Jesus' narrative about the condition of the two men after death was based upon his divine OMNISCIENCE. However, some commentators judge that if this is so, it is out of character with the normative nature of Jesus' parabolic discourse. In the history of Lukan exegesis some have thought that here is a veiled allusion to characters living and well known in the apostolic age (e.g., TERTULLIAN thought that HEROD and JOHN THE BAPTIST were meant).

The major theme of the story is its condemnation of the self-righteous rich and its assurance that God's revelation is effective in calling men to repentance. The decisions of this life are thus eternally binding. It is probable that this is a singular usage of the omniscient power of Christ as it logically connects a group of typical parables to a definite prophetic statement in Lk. 17. The proposal of various writers that the evangelist here adopted the name of the more familiar Lazarus whom Jesus raised from the dead (Jn. 11) has no grounds to support it. (See E. W. Bullinger, The Rich Man and lead (metal). A very soft METAL, more than eleven times as dense as water (cf. Exod. 15:10; Heb. ōperet H6769), fusible with a melting point of 327°C; it forms alloys with SILVER (cf. Ezek. 22:18, 20) and TIN (solder). It can be inlaid to form letters (cf. Job 19:24) or patterns, particularly when heated, since above 300°C it is plastic. If perfectly pure, lead is silvery white in color. However, the metal is usually gray to bluish gray. Native lead is of rare occurrence. The main ore is galena (lead sulphide), which usually is found associated with minerals of zinc and generally contains up to 0.1 percent silver. Most workable lead deposits occur as veins or lodes cutting across or replacing sedimentary rocks, particularly limestone and dolomite.

The discovery of lead antedates recorded history. It is produced from lead ore simply by roasting in an oxidizing atmosphere, and it is possible that this was the first metallurgical process practiced by man. Lead coins were used in ancient Egyptian times as was lead in the glazing of pottery and the making of solder. The Hanging Gardens of Babylon are said to have been floored by lead sheets soldered together to retain moisture. The Phoenicians worked the lead deposits of Rio Tinto, Spain, and traded in the metal (Ezek. 27:12), possibly from Cornwall as well as from Spain. In Greek times lead was mined and smelted at Laurion, Greece, and by the time of the Roman civilization, the use of lead was widespread. (See J. R. Partington, A Textbook of Inorganic Chemistry, 6th ed. [1950], 833-34; Collier's Encyclopedia [1964], 14:401-4; Encyclopedia Britannica, 15th ed. [2002], 21:467-70.)

Leah lee'uh (לֵאָה H4207, possibly “wild cow” [but not in a pejorative sense; cf. RACHEL, “ewe,” and see DDD, 505-6]). The eldest daughter of LABAN, granddaughter of BETHUEL, and wife of JACOB (Gen. 29:16). ABRAHAM’S brother NAHOR, who had remained in the homeland in HARAN, had eight children, of whom one was Bethuel (22:22). Bethuel, in turn, had two children who are named in the Bible: REBEKAH (24:15) and Laban (24:29). Rebekah married ISAAC and bore Jacob, while Laban begat two daughters, Leah and Rachel. Therefore, Leah and Jacob were first cousins.

Leah is described as “tender eyed” (Gen. 29:17 KJV), which may mean that her eyes were weak (cf. NIV). She was contrasted in appearance with her sister Rachel, who was beautiful to behold. Laban craftily gave his eldest daughter first in marriage to Jacob, although Jacob had bargained for Rachel (29:23). Jacob, resenting the deception, evidently made Leah feel unloved (29:30). To compensate for this, the Lord favored her by giving to her four sons, while her sister remained barren. Her sons were REUBEN, SIMEON, LEVI, and JUDAH. Leah hoped to gain Jacob’s favor over her sister by these sons (29:32). Later Leah claimed two other sons, GAD and ASHER, by her handmaid ZILPAH (30:10, 12). The evidence of Leah’s craving for Jacob’s love and of her feeling spurned by him is seen in her bargain with Rachel for the privilege of lying with her own husband (30:14-18). In this period, ISSACHAR and ZEBULUN were born. In all, she bore him six sons and one daughter named DINAH.

When faced with a decision between staying with her father or going to Canaan with her husband, Leah showed her willingness to leave her homeland and go with Jacob (Gen. 31:14). Still Jacob favored Rachel, putting Leah ahead of her in the caravan to keep Rachel as far as possible from ESAU, whom he feared (33:1-2). Possibly the burial of the two wives of Jacob is more significant than anything else. Rachel, whom he had seemingly favored throughout his life, was buried in a tomb near BETHLEHEM. The place is still marked today. But Leah was buried in the family burial site at MACHPELAH, where Jacob himself chose to be buried (49:31). Thus perhaps Leah won out in the end over her sister.

Leah certainly was favored as far as God is concerned. Judah, the fourth son, was ultimately the one through whom Israel's greatness came. Both David and the Christ were of the line of Judah. (See A. Edersheim, Bible History [1890], 1:125-28, 143; G. von Rad, Genesis [1961], 284ff.; C. Pfeiffer, Patriarchal Age [1961], 55, 72, 78, 81, 83, 110; J. Bright, A History of Israel, 4th ed. skins of animals is one of the most ancient materials used for clothing, shoes, and other purposes, and it is strange that the specific term “leather” is not found more often in the Bible. Most of the time, particularly in the OT, the term “skin” (ôr H6425) is used to speak of the articles made from animal hides. Once in the OT the term is used figuratively: “I have escaped by the skin of my teeth” (Job 19:20 NRSV)—a phrase which to this day describes a narrow escape from danger or a predicament.

The first clothes worn by humans were made of skins with the animal hair left on (Gen. 3:21). Later leather was widely used throughout the ANE and also by the early Hebrews. This is apparent from the test used to determine leprosy in humans or their clothing: “When there is a leprous disease in a garment...or in a skin or in anything made of skin, if the disease shows greenish or reddish in the garment...it is a leprous disease and shall be shown to the priest” (Lev. 13:47-49 NRSV). Some scholars believe that “leprosy in garments” was the result of green or badly tanned skin that was infected with decay (cf. NIV, “mildew”). Such garments, both of wool and of skin, were to be burned. People who either killed others or touched anyone who had been killed were to purify “every garment as well as everything made of leather, goat hair or wood” (Num. 31:19-20).

Even when textiles largely replaced leather as clothing, it was still used for some articles. The most common items were caps, hats, capes, skirts, aprons, and girdles. ELIJAH is said to have worn “a garment of hair and with a leather belt around his waist” (2 Ki. 1:8). JOHN THE BAPTIST also wore a garment of camel’s hair and a leather belt around his waist (Matt. 3:4; Gk. adj. dermatinos G1294). In describing the sufferings of the saints, the writer of Hebrews says that they “went about in sheepskins [mēlōē G3603] and goatskins [aigeios derma G128 + G1293], persecuted and mistreated” (Heb. 11:37).

Besides being used for clothing, leather was used to cover the TABERNACLE in the wilderness (Exod. 26:14; Num. 4:6). Complete hides of goats, properly tanned, with the holes sewn up, served as water and wine containers profusely in the ANE. Fermenting WINE could not be placed into old skins but into new and more flexible containers (Matt. 9:17; Jdg. 4:19). Early writing materials were of carefully tanned fine leather, particularly of kids or lambs. It became known as vellum and PARCHMENT. Paul asks Timothy to bring some type of parchment or articles made of parchment (membrana G3521) to him in prison (2 Tim. 4:13). Parchment, however, should not be confused with PAPYRUS, the most common writing material of ancient times.

It was the ARMY, especially in ASSYRIA, that truly appreciated leather. It used the corselet with or without mail. Some soldiers wore leather kilts. Many helmets were of leather, although the best were of coarse metal with a leather undercap. Frequently the soldier’s boot made of leather came halfway up the leg. The dagger and the sword were carried in a sheath made of leather. The common foot soldier carried a leather shield, the archer a leather quiver and the slinger a leather sling. See ARMOR, ARMS. Tents and the cordage used on the march were often of leather. Individual soldiers crossed rivers on inflated skins, and baggage went on rafts supported in the same way. Riding saddles and pack saddles were of leather. CHARIOTS used much leather, including the tires as well as the harness and whips.

Leather was a fine upholstery used on chairs, thrones, and beds. The ancients had few materials for containers to hold dry materials such as grain, and fewer still for liquids. POTTERY and leather were their only ordinary containers. Goatskins were the containers for water in dry areas and also for carrying large quantities of water in the cities. The rich women of the city carried leather handbags as vanity cases with toilet articles. The desert shepherd carried his food in a leather pouch. Ropes and thongs of many kinds were made of leather. Most percussion instruments used a high grade of leather.

Leather came from various kinds of animals: oxen, donkeys, sheep, goats, kids, and rams (Gen. 27:16; Exod. 25:5). Skins of lizards, badgers, leopards, and crocodiles also were used in OT times. Some scholars believe that a tough-lasting SANDAL was made from a special kind of skin, perhaps from a porpoise (Ezek. 16:10).

In the early nomadic life, each family tanned its own hides. In later times certain men took up the business of tanning (e.g., SIMON in JOPPA, Acts 10:6). Generally the TANNER cured leather by soaking it in large vats, scraping off all of the fat, blood, and hair with sharp knives or stones, and then laying it out to dry. Afterward it was oiled and rubbed until it became tough and pliable. The tanner used lime or juices of plants and fruits, sometimes bark from trees, animal and vegetable oils, to tan and preserve the hide as well as dye it in various colors. The ancients were very capable tanners, and it is surprising how durable and long-lasting their products were. No doubt the most expert tanners were employed to manufacture the sturdy shields for the army (2 Sam. 1:21; Isa. 22:6).

leaven. A general term for agents that produce fermentation and cause dough to rise. It usually refers to yeast (the term used consistently by the NIV), which is a specific fungus of the genus Saccharomyces. The Hebrew term for “leaven” or “yeast” is šēōr H8419, which occurs five times (Exod. 12:15, 19; 13:7; Lev. 2:11; Deut. 16:4), while hāmēs H2809 (from a root meaning “bitter, sour”), occurring eleven times, refers to leavened bread or anything that has yeast in it; on the other hand, massâ H5174, used over forty times (almost always in the plural massôt, even today usually called matzoth) refers to unleavened bread, that is, bread made without yeast (note the use of all three terms in Exod. 12:15). In the NT, the Greek noun zymē G2434 occurs eleven times (cf. 1 Cor. 5:6 and Gal. 5:9, which also use the cognate verb zymoō G2435, “to leaven”); azymos G109, always in the plural, and almost always with reference to the Feast of Unleavened Bread, occurs nine times (Matt. 26:17 et al.).

I. Literal. BEAD was made to rise by putting a piece of sour dough (from a previous batch of dough) in the flour, bringing on fermentation of the whole. Leavened bread was a regular part of the diet of ancient Israel (Hos. 7:4). Bread made in haste without allowing it to rise is the unleavened bread often mentioned in Scripture (Gen. 19:3; Exod. 12:15; Jdg. 6:19; 1 Sam. 28:24; et al.). The haste to depart from Egypt left no time for bread to rise, therefore the people carried with them dough and kneading troughs (Exod. 12:34, 39).

In memorial of the exodus and its hurried flight (Exod. 12:11, 39; Deut. 16:3), Israel was commanded to cast out leaven from the house annually, on the fourteenth day of the first month (ABIB), and to eat unleavened bread (“the bread of affliction,” Deut. 16:3) for seven days—the fourteenth to the twenty-first day—as the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Exod. 12:14-20; 13:4-7; 23:15; 34:18; Num. 28:17; 2 Chr. 35:17; cf. Matt. 26:17; Mk. 14:1, 12; Lk. 22:1; Acts 12:3; 20:6; see FEASTS). The penalty for the native or sojourner who ate that which was leavened in this period was to be cut off from the congregation (Exod. 12:15-30; 13:7).

This prohibition of leaven was interpreted to prohibit that which is fermented from grain rather than that from the grape (m. Pesahim 3:1). There is no mention in the MISHNAH of wine lees as leaven. The prohibition of leaven did not prohibit the drinking of wine at PASSOVER. The rabbis ruled that the poorest man in Israel was entitled to four cups even if it had to be supplied by charity (m. Pesahim 10:1).

The use of leaven and HONEY were prohibited in cereal offerings and blood offerings made by fire (Lev. 2:11; 6:17; 7:12; 8:2, 26; 10:12; Exod. 23:18; 29:2, 23; 34:25; cf. Amos 4:5); but the use of leaven was permitted in peace offerings (which the people consumed, Lev. 7:13) and in the wave loaves of the FIRSTFRUIT offering (23:17). Leviticus is not explicit that the SHOWBREAD should be unleavened, but we are informed by JOSEPHUS that it was (Ant. 3.6.6 §142).

II. Figurative. The significant thing about leaven is its power, which may become a symbol of either good or evil. Jesus, in the parable of the leaven (Matt. 13:33; Lk. 13:21), used the working of yeast to teach the pervasiveness of the KINGDOM OF GOD, which eventually transforms the world. The small bit of leaven—the Word—has power to accomplish this great result. The final point of the comparison is the whole lump permeated by the leaven. This parable is one of a pair with the parable of the grain of mustard seed. PHILO JUDAEUS (Spec. Leg. 2.184-85) seems also to use leaven as a symbol of something good. On the other hand, some (e.g., Scofield Bible), insisting that leaven in Scripture is always a symbol of evil, attempt to make the parable a picture of the true teaching being mingled with corrupt and corrupting false doctrine, resulting in the final apostasy of the professing church. One's approach to this issue is ordinarily determined by a prior decision on the question of whether the NT outlook for the kingdom is optimistic or pessimistic.

Jesus used leaven as a symbol of undesirable teaching when he warned against “the yeast of the Pharisees and Sadducees” (Matt. 16:6, 11-12). The parallel in Lk. 12:1 reads: “Be on your guard against the yeast of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy.” This interpretation turns aside any possible misunderstanding that Jesus is warning against the bread of the Pharisees as the rabbis warned against the “leaven or meat” of the Samaritans, which is interpreted by some rabbis to be a warning against mixed marriages (Str-B, 1:541-42). Another passage in the Gospels has a warning against “the yeast of the Pharisees and that of Herod” (Mk. 8:15; some MSS, “Herodians”). Leaven as a symbol of the undesirable is paralleled in the rabbis, who called the evil desire (yēser hārā') “the yeast in the dough” (b. Ber. 17a; cf. Gen. Rab. 34:10).

PAUL uses leaven as a symbol of the pervasiveness of evil (1 Cor. 5:6) and makes an allegory on the casting out of leaven at Passover. Here malice and evil are the leaven that need to be replaced by sincerity and truth so that the festival may be celebrated (vv. 7-8). Paul also uses leaven as a symbol of evil that has power to influence the whole, as he cites the proverb, “a little leaven leavens the whole lump” (1 Cor. 5:6; Gal. 5:9 RSV). (See H. Windisch in TWNT, 2:904-8; J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus [1955], 89-90.)

J. P. LEWIS

Lebana. See LEBANAH.

Lebanah li-bay'nuh (לבנה H4245 [the Bomberg ed. has לבנה in Neh. 7:38], “white” or “full moon”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from Babylon (Ezra 2:45; Neh. 7:48 [most versions “Lebana”]; 1 Esd. 5:29 [KJV, “Labana”]).

Lebanon leb'uh-nuhn (לבנון H4248, “white [mountain]”). The name of a mountainous region in PHOENICIA just inland from the coast (called simply har hallēbānōn, “Mount Lebanon,” in Jdg. 3:3; NIV, “the Lebanon mountains”). Its area corresponds roughly to that of the modern state of Lebanon, but the latter includes also the strip of land on the coast as well as the BEQA' Valley and the western slopes of the ANTILEBANON range.

I. Lebanon in history and in the Bible. The history of Lebanon is inseparable from that of Phoenicia. Here will be noted only the role of the cedars of Lebanon as an object both of military plunder and of peaceful trade. Both Mesopotamia and Egypt imported CEDAR wood from Lebanon. The Egyptian tale of Wenamon tells of an envoy sent to barter for cedar wood for Egypt.

In the Bible, Lebanon has meaning both for nationalistic ideology and in literature. Nationalistic ideology in Deuteronomy and Joshua from the beginning made Lebanon part of the Promised Land (Deut. 1:7; Josh. 1:4; cf. also Jdg. 3:3). MOSES prayed to see the “good land beyond the Jordan—that fine hill country and Lebanon” (Deut. 3:25); moreover, the Phoenician coast as far as Byblos (i.e., “the area of the Gebalites; and all Lebanon to the east,” Josh. 13:5; see GEBAL) were included among the promised, but unconquered, territories. In their historical context, SOLOMON’S building activities in the Lebanon (1 Ki. 9:19; 2 Chr. 8:6) probably refer to the eastern slopes of the Lebanon adjacent to the Beqa<sup>c</sup> into which the empire of DAVID and Solomon extended. It is unlikely that the Hebrew empire ever extended into Phoenicia proper or far into the Lebanon range.

Lebanon’s place in literary allusion is far more significant. There are literary motifs based upon the greatness of Lebanon and its cedars, motifs utilizing Lebanon as a romantic symbol, and motifs of prosperity and stability. A single trip into one of the high, rugged valleys of the Lebanon should be sufficient to demonstrate that the Lebanon range is a fitting symbol of rugged grandeur and greatness. Thus God’s greatness is expressed poetically when the Lebanon “skips” at God’s voice (Ps. 29:6) or by the fact that it is God who planted Lebanon’s mighty cedars (104:16). God’s destructive powers can destroy these same cedars (Isa. 10:34), which fittingly symbolize arrogant people (Ezek. 31:3).

The inaccessibility of the mountains may have been aided by the luxurious wealth of Phoenicia in making the Lebanon a symbol of the romantic, the exotic, and the mysterious. Solomon's carriage was of "wood from Lebanon" (Cant. 3:9). The bride's romantic beauty was extolled by summoning her as if from the Lebanon (and from the Antilebanon and Mount HERMON also; 4:8). Her garments were the scent of Lebanon (4:11; possibly a pun on "Lebanon" and lēbōnâ H4247, "frankincense"). The Palace of the Forest of Lebanon was named to exploit the romantic connotation of the term (1 Ki. 7:2).

Prosperity and stability are symbolized by the statement that the righteous will "grow like a cedar in Lebanon" (Ps. 92:12; cf. 72:16). Hosea describes the restored Israel as rooted and fragrant like the Lebanon (Hos. 14:5-7).

II. Description. The Lebanon range extends from the Litani Gorge northward to the valley of the Nahr el-Kebir (the classical Eleutheros River), although the modern state extends some 15 mi. farther to the S. In general, the mountains are separated from the sea by a coastal plain seldom more than a mile wide. Ridges jutting to the sea and rugged stream beds interrupt the coastal plain, which is well-watered and quite productive. The plain of SIDON in the S and the valley of the Nahr el-Kebir provide more spacious agricultural areas.

Turning to the Lebanon range proper, its western face consists of a complicated system of ridges, highland plateaus, deep valleys, and foothills leading from the peaks to the coastal plain. Seasonal rains are adequate to make the highland plateaus and terraced hillsides quite productive. There are many villages on these western slopes. By contrast the eastern face tilts rather directly to the Beqa(, and sparse rainfall limits their usage for grazing of sheep and goats. Some of the major peaks of the Lebanon are Jebel Akkar in the N, Jebel Makhmal (with the summit, Qurnet es-Sauda, c. 11,000 ft.), Jebel Mneitreh (from which the Dog River flows), Jebel Sunnin (which is visible from Beirut), Jebel Kneisseh, Jebel Baruk, Jebel Niha, and Jebel Rihan.

The Beqa(, classical COELESYRIA, is the valley between the Lebanon and the Antilebanon. Its rainfall is limited so that it depends largely on streams and springs flowing from the mountains for agriculture. It is very fertile, particularly in the vicinity of Zahleh, Shtoura, and BAALBEK. Its rivers are the Nahr el-<sup>(A)</sup>Asi (classical ORONTES) flowing N and the Litani (classical Leontes) flowing S. The latter has been harnessed for Lebanon's major electrical power and irrigation work. The slopes of the Antilebanon are similar in appearance and usage to the eastern slopes of the Lebanon.

Lebanon produces a wide variety of crops. The plains and some of the plateaus and valleys are good for growing grain. The coastal plain and mountain terraces produce a wide variety of garden vegetables, nuts, and fruits. Among these, the olive and the vine still retain their age-old importance. In regions too high or too steep for agriculture, the forests flourish. Original growth included pines, myrtles, and the famous cedars of which only a few hundred remain until the present. In past decades, much reseeded of barren slopes with pine trees has been carried out. (See further P. K. Hitti, Lebanon in History from the Earliest Times to the Present [1962]; R. Fedden, The Phoenix Land [1965]; K. S. Salibi, The Modern History of Lebanon [1965]; M. K. Khayat and M. C. Keatinge, Lebanon: Land of the Cedars [1967]; M. J. Strazzulla, Ancient Lebanon: Monuments Past and Present [2004].)

Lebanon, House (Palace) of the Forest of. See FOREST.

Lebaoth li-bay'oth (לְבָאוֹת H4219, "lionesses"). One of the "southernmost towns of the tribe of Judah in the Negev toward the boundary of Edom" (Josh. 15:32; cf. v. 21). The site is unknown. Lebaoth is thought to be the same as BETH LEBAOth (19:6), apparently later known as BETH BIRI (1 Chr. 4:31).

Lebbaeus li-bee'uhs (Λεββαῖος G3304 [not in NIV], corresponding to the Heb. or Aram. name לֵבִי, "heart"). According to the KJV (following the majority of Greek MSS and some ancient versional evidence), one of the twelve disciples was "Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddaeus" (Matt. 10:3; both in this passage and in Mk. 3:18, CODEX BEZAE and some Latin witnesses read Lebbaeus only instead of Thaddaeus). See THADDAEUS.

Leb Kamai leb'kuh-mi' (לֵב קָמַי H4214, "heart of my adversaries"). NRSV Leb-qamai. In an oracle against BABYLON, God announces that he will stir up a destroying spirit (or wind) against "the people of Leb Kamai" (Jer. 51:1; KJV, "them that dwell in the midst of them that rise up against me"). It is generally thought, however, that the term is a code for CHALDEA. See ATBASH.

Lebo Hamath lee'boh-hay'muhth (לְבָא חֲמַת H4217, "entrance of Hamath"). Also Lebo-hamath. A place on the S border of the territory controlled by HAMATH, regarded in the OT as the ideal N border of the Promised Land of Israel. However, it was only under DAVID and SOLOMON, and later under JEROBOAM II, that the territory of Israel extended so far (Num. 13:21; 34:8; Josh. 13:5; Jdg. 3:3; 1 Ki. 8:65; 2 Ki. 14:25; 1 Chr. 13:5; 2 Chr. 7:8; Amos 6:14). EZEKIEL prophesied that some day it would be the boundary of the ideally restored Israel (Ezek. 47:16-17, 20). The KJV and other versions, taking the term as a general description, render it "the entrance of Hamath" or the like, but it is now generally thought to be the actual name of a particular region or city.

The precise location of Lebo Hamath has been debated. It was somewhere between the LEBANON and ANTILEBANON Mountains, in the BEQA<sup>(A)</sup> Valley, through which the road to Hamath lay. Among places that have been suggested for its location are the ORONTES Valley between ANTIOCH and SELEUCIA, a part of the valley of COELESYRIA, and the territory of RIBLAH. It is now generally identified with modern Lebweh, a town about 45 mi. N of DAMASCUS.

S. BARABAS

Lebonah li-boh'nah (לְבוֹנָה H4228, “frankincense”). A town in the hill country of EPHRAIM, mentioned only once when the writer of Judges gives the location of SHILOH, which is said to be “east of the road that goes from Bethel to Shechem, and to the south of Lebonah” (Jdg. 21:19). Lebonah is probably to be identified with modern el-Lubban, about 3 mi. WNW of Shiloh, 10 mi. SSW of SHECHEM, and 10.5 mi. N of BETHEL.

Lecah lee'kuh (לֶכָּה H4336, meaning unknown). TNIV Lekah. Son of Er and great-grandson of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:21). Many believe, however, that Lecah is the name of an otherwise unknown town founded by Er (according to the view that “father” here and in some other genealogical passages means “founder” or “chief citizen”).

lectionary. A book of biblical lections (i.e., lessons, readings) used for worship services. The term is used especially of Greek MSS in which Scripture portions are written, not in the order in which they appear in the Bible, but according to the schedule set for the church calendar. They are of great value in NT textual studies. See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (NT).

ledge. This English term is used to render several Hebrew words, such as karkōb H4136, referring to a rim half way between the base and the top of the ALTAR in the TABERNACLE (Exod. 27:5; 38:4), and (āzārā H6478, used of two ledges forming part of the altar described in Ezekiel’s vision of a future temple (Ezek. 43:14, 17, 20; 45:19).

leech. The probable rendering of Hebrew (ālûqâ H6598, a word of uncertain meaning that occurs only once (Prov. 30:15; KJV, “horseleach”). Leeches (Hirudinea) are found in many places. In the wet tropics they live on land, sometimes in great numbers, but in most regions they are confined to water. They feed mostly on blood, which is sucked until the leech’s body is grossly distended. Leeches normally fasten on the skin, but some can invade the throat and nasal passages after being imbibed with water, possibly with fatal results. Both men and animals are attacked. Since early times physicians have used leeches to “let blood,” and until about the mid-19th cent. great numbers still were being used, especially to remove blood from swellings. Today they are approved as medical devices for removing pooled blood, thus helping heal skin grafts and restore blood circulation in blocked veins. (Some commentators have identified the Heb. term with an Aram. word referring to a blood-sucking, vampire-like demon, but the only bats known to feed on blood are found in Central and South America. See further FFB, 47-48.)

leek. A vegetable (Allium porrum) related to the ONION, mentioned only once as one of the foods that the Israelites missed on their trek to the Promised Land (Num. 11:5; it is uncertain whether the Hebrew term here, hāsîr H2946, derives from the same root as the common term for GRASS, hāsîr H2945). Leeks always have been considered important vegetables. In Saxon times in England, a vegetable garden was called a “leac tun.” Leeks have a slight medicinal value. (See FFB, 159-60.)

in Egypt, and both were eaten. Can it be that the vegetable or salad that was missed so much was really fenugreek, which was sold in Egyptian markets in bundles? In Cairo today, this salad plant is bought as “Halbeh.” See also FLORA (under Leguminosae and Liliaceae); GARLIC.

lees. A term used by the KJV and other versions for the dregs that settle at the bottom of wine jars and wine skins. It renders Hebrew šēmārîm (pl. of šemer H9069), which occurs in four passages (Ps. 75:8 [here the KJV has “dregs”]; Isa. 25:6 [NIV, “aged wine”]; Jer. 48:11; Zeph. 1:12). WINE gained strength and flavor by being allowed to remain on the lees, and such wine was regarded as superior to the newly fermented product. The word is used in the OT only in a figurative sense.

left-handed. This description is used only regarding warriors from the tribe of BENJAMIN. They include EHUD, one of the judges (Jdg. 3:15); seven hundred soldiers who “could sling a stone at a hair and not miss” (20:16); and a group of ambidextrous relatives of SAUL who joined DAVID in ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:2).

leg. Several Hebrew terms may be rendered “leg,” such as kerāʿ H4157, found in OT passages dealing with sacrificial rituals and referring to the shank or splint-bone (Exod. 12:9; Lev. 1:9, 13; et al.); it is also used of the bending hind legs of locusts that were permitted for food (Lev. 11:21), and it formed the basis for an illustration of divine judgment (Amos 3:12). The word regel H8079, which normally means “foot,” refers once to the legs of GOLIATH (1 Sam. 17:6; the bronze greaves the giant wore normally protected the leg between the knee and the ankle rather than the foot). A term used to describe the upper leg of men (Deut. 28:35 et al.) as well as sacrificial animals (Exod. 29:22 et al.) is šôq H8797, which strictly means “thigh.”

The narrow part of the THIGH was considered one of the choicest pieces of the sacrificial animal, and was reserved for the use of the priests. Animal bones from the upper portion of the right foreleg have been recovered from the debris of a Canaan-ite temple at LACHISH, destroyed c. 1220 B.C. by the invading Hebrews when apparently in use as a sanctuary. These bones evidently comprised the remains of the priestly perquisites, suggesting that the rest of the sacrifice had been eaten by the worshipers outside the sanctuary or in some adjoining room. There was little to indicate that the bones had been burned, and presumably the meat had been cooked by boiling (cf. 1 Sam. 2:15). This evidence provides an authentic historical background for the ritual prescriptions (Lev. 7:32 et al.).

In the NT the word skelos G5003 occurs only in Jn. 19:31-33, and denotes the entire limb from the hip downward. In Rev. 10:1, pous G4546, which normally means “foot,” clearly refers to the leg.

legion. The major unit in the Roman army, consisting of several thousand soldiers. Both the English term and the Greek (legiōn G3305) are borrowings from the Latin legiō (genitive legiōnis). In the NT the word is used only in the Gospels and with reference to angels and demons (Matt. 26:53; Mk. 5:9, 15; Lk. 8:30; see M. W. Newheart, “My Name Is Legion”: The Story and Soul of the Gerasene Demoniac [2004]).

The word was thought by Roman tradition to be traceable to the age of the patrician army under the legendary founder, Romulus. Supposedly the whole of the Roman forces was collectively called legiō and consisted of 300 celeres, “knights,” and 3,000 pedes, “infantry.” When the army expanded under the Tarquinian rulers, the army was divided to keep this same ratio of men in each regiment, which was then called a legiō. The battle array of the legiō was similar to that of the Greek phalanx, which had been developed by Epaminondas of Thebes c. 370 B.C. However, the phalanx was abolished by M. F. Camillus sometime during his dictatorship in the 4th cent. B.C.

The basic organization was maintained until the time of G. Marius (157-86 B.C.), who reorganized the Roman legions by abolishing the old citizen recruited militia, which had been associated with the propertied classes. In its place he instituted the mercenary system with its paid professionals volunteering regardless of social class. With this new force, Marius won several spectacular campaigns including the bloody Jugurthine War. At this time the legion consisted of about 300 knights and about 4,200 infantry. In the last century of the republic, the army was divided among the CONSULS, each of whom was assigned two legions of about 5,000 men. In the empire, the army was a standing body of mercenaries drawn from all parts of the Roman world. They were bound to the particular emperor by the oath (sacramentum) and were at his every command.

By the end of the 1st cent. A.D., the legion contained about 6,000 men when up to full strength. More often than not, they were under this figure by as much as 33 percent, so that ideally the statement of Christ in Matt. 26:53 would involve in excess of 144,000 of the heavenly beings. If the notion of double legions is accepted, it seems that such speculations are unwarranted by the context. The legion was subdivided into ten COHORTS, and these were divided into six centuries or “hundreds” each, the officer in charge of this last division being the CENTURION, mentioned often in the NT (Matt. 8:5 et al.). Over the whole legion there was the tribuni militum, “military tribune,” with his subordinate the lēgatus, “lieutenant-general.”

The feeding and clothing of such a force was accomplished by quartering the troops on the citizenry in foreign regions or by foraging and in time of conflict by booty. The pay for an infantryman was 120 denarii per year, which was raised by Julius CAESAR to about 225 denarii, and the hope of booty including the sale of slaves heightened morale. The number of legions varied throughout the centuries, but under AUGUSTUS (27 B.C.–A.D. 14) it was set at twenty-five, each with a definite base usually on the border of the empire. (See further J. Pfitzner, Geschichte der römische Kaiserlegion [1881]; H. M. D. Parker, The Roman Legions, 2nd ed. [1958]; O. Hiltbrunner, “Militar,” Kleines Lexikon der Antike [1961], 317-20; L. Lehabim li-hay’bim. See LEHABITES.

Lehabites li-hay'bits (להבים H4260). Also Lehabim. One of the people groups descended from MIZRAIM (Egypt), son of HAM (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chr. 1:11). Nothing is known about them, but many scholars suggest that the word is either a textual corruption or an alternate form of lûbîm, “Libyans” (cf. LXX Labiim in Gen. 10:13). See LIBYA; NATIONS.

Lehem. See JASHUBI LEHEM.

Lehi lee'hi (לחי H4306, “cheek, jawbone,” possibly in the fig. sense of “border”). An unknown site in JUDAH where SAMSON slew a thousand PHILISTINES with the jawbone of a donkey (Jdg. 15:9, 14, 19; cf. v. 17). Samson had been bound and delivered to the Philistines by his fellow tribesmen, who hoped thereby to avoid retaliation for his raids. The Spirit came upon him, however, so he broke the bonds, seized a jawbone, and struck down the Philistines. There has been much debate regarding the identification of Lehi. One popular proposal (partly based on a slight sound similarity with siagōn, the Gk. word for “jawbone” [cf. LXX in Jdg. 15:14, 19]) is Khirbet eṣ-Ṣiyyaj, which lies some 4 mi. E of TIMNAH (cf. 14:1-2). The evidence for this and other identifications, however, is very ambiguous. M. Lubetski (in ABD, 4:274-75) argues, on the basis of Akkadian lītu (a term used to indicate real estate limits), that Lehi is a general term denoting the entire borderline between Judah and Philistia.

Lekah lee'kuh. TNIV form of LECAH.

Lemuel lem'yoo-uhl (למואל H4345, “belonging to God”). The reputed author of Prov. 31, who repeats his mother's teachings about good government, the dangers of sex and wine, and (if his sayings include vv. 9-29) the virtues of a noble wife. Rabbinic tradition equates Lemuel with SOLOMON, but modern scholars reject this view. Some translations, such as RSV and NJPS, understand the Hebrew term maśśā' H5363 (“oracle,” v. 1) as a proper name, making Lemuel king of MASSA.

A. K. HELMBOLD

lend. See BORROW, LEND.

lentil. A leguminous plant (Lens esculenta), one of the earliest crops grown. It is first mentioned (Heb. ādāšîm H6378) when JACOB made a red lentil stew for his brother ESAU (Gen. 25:34). Lentils were brought to DAVID and his men when they were hungry (2 Sam. 17:28). A field of lentils was the scene of a battle between the Israelites and the Philistines (23:11). EZEKIEL was instructed to use “wheat and barley, beans and lentils, millet and spelt” for making bread (Ezek. 4:9).

Lentils are annuals, bearing small white and violet flowers, shaped like a sweet pea. These are followed by small flat pods, inside which are found the lentils, the size of small peas (the name Lens was given because they are like miniature convex lenses). These, when boiled, turn to a brownishyellow or chocolate-red shade. Both these colors are often called “red” in the Middle East. Even today, lentils are made into red-colored stews and soups; they are often flavored with garlic. (See FFB, 134, fig. on 133.) See also FLORA (under Leguminosae); FOOD.

Lentulus, Epistle of len'chuh-luhs. A short document of uncertain date but hardly earlier than the 13th cent. and probably written in Italy. It is especially known because of its description of Jesus: "A man in stature middling tall, and comely, having a reverend countenance, which they that look upon may love and fear." The description follows closely the traditional portraits: hair parted in the middle, waving over his shoulders, brow smooth and calm, face without blemish or wrinkle, beard full and forked. The theme was popular from an early period (cf. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 7.18.4). In the earliest MSS the document professes to quote Roman annals, but in later forms it appears as a letter addressed to the Senate by Lentulus, a Roman official in Judea in the time of TIBERIUS. (See M. R. James, The Apocryphal New Testament [1924], 477-78.)

leopard. A large spotted carnivore of the lion family (Felix pardus). Leopards grow to a head and body length of about five feet, with a tail of two to three feet. The background color varies from deep chrome to pale gray or sandy, with rosettes of almost black spots. It was once widely distributed in Africa and warm parts of Asia, including most of Palestine and neighboring countries. The larger, darker specimens usually live in forest regions, while the smaller, paler ones inhabit open steppe or near-desert. The leopard takes a variety of prey, from antelopes and deer down to small birds. It has now been exterminated from many parts of its former range, both to protect stock and to obtain its skin, and it is generally rare. (See FFB, 48-49.)

That the Hebrew term nāmēr H5807 means "leopard" is confirmed by the proverb still current in English, "Can...the leopard [change] its spots?" (Jer. 13:23). Several passages refer to their preying nature (Jer. 5:6; Hos. 13:7) or to their speed (Hab. 1:8), "Their horses are swifter than leopards." The leopard is very fast for a short dash, but this passage could refer to the cheetah, or hunting leopard, which is rather similar and was known in Palestine (it was once tamed and trained there, as it still is in India). The prophetic passage in Isa. 11:6 is hard to comment on biologically, especially since it includes the statement that "the lion will eat straw like the ox" (v. 7). In the book of Revelation, John says he saw a beast that "resembled a leopard (partialis G4203)" (Rev. 13:2).

letter. This English word is used in various senses to translate several different terms in both Testaments. The Hebrew ḥiggeret H115 (2 Chr. 30:1, 6; Neh. 2:7-9; 6:5, 17, 19; Esth. 9:26, 29), meaning an official or commercial communication, refers to a tablet of a specific small size with a clay envelope upon which the addresser and addressee were noted and on occasion some of the contents were indicated. The term is derived from Akkadian egertu, and its use in postexilic writings may reflect the influence of Neo-Assyrian and Neo-Babylonian culture.

The most common Hebrew term for written materials of all types is sēper H6219, which can refer to annals (Gen. 5:1; Num. 21:14; 1 Ki. 11:41; et al.), law codes (2 Chr. 17:9), prophecies (Nah. 1:1), as well as letters (Isa. 37:14 et al.). The specific rendering “letter” is largely a matter of context, and for this reason there are wide variations in the versions (in Jer. 36:2, 4 the term appears with the noun mēgillā H4479, “scroll, roll,” as a secondary indication of the meaning). Cognates of this term, which could be applied to inscribed texts as well as to those written with ink, are found throughout the ANE languages. Two Aramaic terms that can be translated “letter” are ništēwān H10496 (a Persian loanword referring to an official document or decree, Ezra 4:7, 18, 23; 5:5; 7:11) and pitgām H10601 (“word, reply, decree,” also from Persian, Ezra 4:17; 5:7, 11; 6:11; Dan. 3:16; 4:17; cf. Heb. pitgām H7330 in Eccl. 8:11 and Esth. 1:20).

In considering the matter of written communication among the peoples and rulers of antiquity, it must be remembered that although by all the evidence now known literacy was low, yet those with position and wealth could avail themselves of the service of a SCRIBE, either slave or free, and so letters were commonplace. The vast royal correspondences from MARI, ancient center of Babylonian trade c. 1700 B.C., and TELL EL-AMARNA, the capital city of the pharaoh AKHENATEN c. 14th cent. B.C., demonstrate the importance of such correspondence. In the past, great doubt was cast upon the historical reliability of the Hebrew text by various European and American schools of biblical criticism. However the discoveries of ancient letters of the type often alluded to and occasionally quoted in the OT has forced a major reconsideration of the more radical critical views.

In antiquity letters—messages set down on some material and sent by carrier from one location to another—consisted of three types. These were clay tablets (used with CUNEIFORM signs), sherds and fragments of pottery inscribed with inked letters (see OSTRACA), and sheets of PARCHMENT that had been scraped and dried and then been inked. Apparently all three of these were known in biblical times and are mentioned in the OT. Engraving cuneiform wedges (or in some areas hieroglyphic signs) was the common method in Sumer, Akkad, Babylon, Persia, and Egypt, and such a practice is mentioned in Job 19:24.

After the introduction of the Phoenician ALPHABET, the system of inscribed potsherds or ostraca became widespread, and even in Egypt memoranda and messages were dispatched in this fashion. The excavation of such ancient Hebrew letters at LACHISH concerning the siege of the city, written in the time of JEREMIAH, proved that such were also known to the Jews. Undoubtedly ostraca are involved in the stories of NABOTH (1 Ki. 21:8) and HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 19:14), as well as in the other references in the annals of the First Commonwealth. The parchment type of letter is not expressly distinguished in the OT, but the discovery of the ARAMAIC papyri from the Jewish colony at ELEPHANTINE (C. 5th cent. B.C.) and the BAR KOKHBA letters (A.D. 132-135) written on parchment support the assumption that such letters were known at least after the Persian era.

In the NT, two Greek terms are translated “letter.” One of them is gramma G1207 (from which the word grammateus G1208, “scribe,” is derived). It can mean “letter” in the sense of a written communication (Acts 28:21) or “note” (Lk. 16:6-7), but more common is the meaning “letter [of the alphabet], written character” (cf. 2 Cor. 3:6-7; Gal. 6:11). Paul uses it in the sense of “written code,” contrasted with pneuma G4460, “Spirit/spirit” (Rom. 2:27, 29; 7:6). The plural can mean “letters” in the sense of “education, learning” (Jn. 7:15; Acts 26:24), and it can also be applied to the Scriptures (2 Tim. 3:15).

The other term translated “letter” in the NT is the familiar epistolē G2186, which occurs more than twenty times. In all occurrences the term refers to a written message, an EPISTLE. It is used of Christian documents written in Greek (e.g., Rom. 16:22; 2 Cor. 7:8; 2 Pet. 3:1), as well as Jewish documents probably in Aramaic (Acts 9:2). Of special interest is PAUL’s figurative use when he tells the Corinthians that he does not need letters of recommendation because the Corinthian believers themselves are “a letter from Christ,” “known and read by everybody,” “written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tablets of stone but on tablets of human hearts” (2 Cor. 3:1-3). Letushim li-too’shim. See LETUSHITES.

Letushites li-too’shits (לְטוּשִׁים H4322, possibly “sharpened ones”). Also Letushim. A people group descended from DEDAN, grandson of ABRAHAM and KETURAH (Gen. 25:3). Neither this tribe nor the related ASSHURITES and LEUMMITES have been identified, but they probably inhabited parts of N ARABIA.

Leummim lee-uh’mim. See LEUMMITES.

Leummites lee-uh’mits (לְאֻמִּים H4212, possibly “hordes” or “tribesmen”). Also Leummim. A people group descended from DEDAN, grandson of ABRAHAM and KETURAH (Gen. 25:3). See LETUSHITES.

Levant luh-vant’. A modern name applied to the countries that border the E end of the Mediterranean Sea: Turkey, Syria, Lebanon, Israel, and Egypt.

Levi lee’vi (לֵוִי H4290, by popular etymology related to לָוָה H4277, “to join, attach” [Gen. 29:34], but actual derivation disputed [suggestions include S Arabian lw], meaning “priest” or “one pledged for a debt,” and Arab. lawā, “to give oracles”]; gentilic לֵוִי H4291, “Levite”). (1) Third son of JACOB and LEAH, and ancestor of the tribe bearing his name (Gen. 29:34; 35:23; Exod. 1:2; 1 Chr. 2:1). When SHECHEM the HIVITE assaulted DINAH, her brothers Levi and SIMEON led in executing vengeance by killing all the males and pillaging the city of Shechem (Gen. 34:25-31). In his final “testament,” Jacob strongly disapproved of Levi’s and Simeon’s cruelty on that occasion (Gen. 49:5-7). Some scholars see a connection between this violent act and the role of Levi’s descendants in killing 3,000 rebellious Hebrews under order of MOSES at the episode of the golden calf (Exod. 32:26-28; see CALF, GOLDEN), but God's blessing was invoked upon them for their obedience (v. 29).

Levi's three sons, GERSHON, KOHATH, and MERARI, were born before the exodus from Egypt (when Num. 26:59 mentions that JOCHEBED was born to Levi, the reference must be to the tribe, not to the son of Jacob). The descendants of Levi are called Levites, but because they were especially chosen to assist the priests (3:6-10; cf. also vv. 45-51), this term took on the sense of a religious office, almost meaning "ministers." Although AARON was a descendant of Levi (through Kohath), he and his progeny were granted the office of the priesthood and thus were distinguished from the Levites. The tribe of Levi did not receive a share of the territory in Canaan, for the Lord himself was their inheritance (18:20). See LEVITICAL CITIES; PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

(2) One of the men who assisted in the matter of the Israelites who had married foreign women (1 Esd. 9:14; KJV, "Levis"); the parallel passage (Ezra 10:15) has "Shabbethai the Levite" for "Levi and Shabbethai." See JAHZEIAH.

(3) Son of Melki, included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:24).

(4) Son of Simeon, included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:29).

(5) Son of Alphaeus; he was a TAX COLLECTOR (publican) who later became one of the twelve apostles (Mk. 2:14-17; Lk. 5:27-32). In the Gospel of Matthew he is always called MATTHEW instead of Levi (Matt. 9:9-13; Lk. 5:27-32). The name does not appear in any of the formal lists as a variant of Matthew.

Leviathan li-i'uh-thuhn (לִיָּאָתָן H4293, possibly "twisting one"). There can be no doubt that this name is basically the same as that found in Ugaritic documents for Lotan (Litan), the sea-monster killed by BAAL (ANET, 137-38); it is there called "the crooked serpent" (cf. Isa. 27:1), and possibly "the seven-headed" (cf. Ps. 74:14). All five occurrences of the term in the OT (Job 3:8; 41:1; Pss. 74:14; 104:26; Isa. 27:1) are in poetic passages and belong to "dead mythology," that is, old mythic concepts employed without suggestion that they are still believed. For Canaanite mythology, Lotan belonged to the forces of chaos personified by the sea and its monsters, which were conquered by the gods of order. See MYTH.

Because Leviathan is merely poetic imagery, there is no absolute consistency in the OT use of the term. Yahweh is the defeater of chaos in Ps. 74:14, a passage uniting God's power at the creation and in the exodus. Chaos and its forces are God's creation, amenable to his will (Ps. 104:26). The use in Isa. 27:1 is part of the eschatological chs. 24-27; it refers to the future forces of lawlessness in terms of past chaos. In Job 3:8 there is a reference to black magic, which can threaten the settled world order, while in 41:1 Leviathan seems to be the CROCODILE (cf. the use of RAHAB (MONSTER), another mythological figure, 26:12). In Isa. 30:7, it is so depicted that some traits of the chaos monster are seen in it: if man finds it hard to deal with earth's monsters, how much more with those of God's primeval creation? (See J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea: Echoes of a Canaanite Myth in the Old Testament [1985]; ABD, 4:295-96; DDD, 956-64.)

levirate law. A law of MOSES which states that if two brothers live together, and one of them dies without leaving a male heir, his brother shall marry his widow, and the first son of the union shall take the name of the brother who died (the term derives from Latin lēvir, "husband's brother"). If the brother refuses to marry the widow, she shall bring him before the elders of the city, and in their presence remove a sandal from his foot and spit in his face. The purpose of the law obviously was to provide an heir for the dead brother (Deut. 25:5-10; cf. also Gen. 38:1-11; Ruth 4:1-12). (See M. Burrows in JBL 59 [1940]: 23-33; D. W. Manor in Near East Archaeological Society Bulletin 20 [Fall 1982]: 33—52; R. Ahroni in Jewish Law and Current Legal Problems, ed. N. Rakover [1984], 67-76.) See also MARRIAGE III.F.

S. BARABAS

Levis lee'vis. KJV Apoc. form of LEVI (1 Esd. 9:14).

Levite lee'vit (לֵוִי H4291). A descendant of LEVI (Exod. 6:25 et al.); see PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

Levitical cities. Forty-eight cities were allotted to the Levites by MOSES and JOSHUA (Num. 35:1-8; Josh. 21; see PRIESTS AND LEVITES). A parallel passage (1 Chr. 6:54-81 [Heb. 6:39-66]) also gives a list of the Levitical cities, but it is smaller than the one in Joshua and it presents considerable differences in the names (cf. the chart in ISBE rev. [1979-88], 110). Some of the discrepancies simply reflect spelling or textual variations (it is usually thought that the Chronicler depended on Joshua's list, but that the latter was in a textual form different from that preserved in the MT). In other cases there may have been change to a new city due to the unsuitability of the original one, and a few of the older ones were perhaps no longer in use.

The tribe of LEVI did not receive any part of the land of CANAAN as an inheritance (Num. 18:20-24; 26:62; Deut. 10:9; 18:1-2; Josh. 18:7). As compensation, they received the tithes of Israelites for their support (Num. 18:21), and forty-eight cities were allotted to them out of the inheritance of the other tribes. Of these cities, the priests received thirteen, all of which were within the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 21:4); and six were CITIES OF REFUGE, to which a person who had accidentally killed someone could go for protection (Num. 35:9-34; Deut. 4:41-43).

The Levitical cities were made up by taking four cities from each of the twelve tribes. The apparent purpose of thus dispersing the Levites throughout the land was to enable them, as the official representatives of the Hebrew faith, to instruct the people throughout the land in the law and in the worship of Yahweh. The description of the measurements of the cities and the pasture lands connected with them as given in Num. 35:4-5 is difficult to understand and has given rise to many different interpretations.

The Levites were not the sole possessors or occupiers of these cities. They were simply allowed to live in them and have fields for the pasture of their herds. These cities did not cease to belong to the tribes within which they were located. The Levites could sell their homes, but could redeem them at any time, and if they failed to do so the homes automatically returned to them in the JUBILEE YEAR. Their fields, however, could not be sold (Lev. 25:32-34).

The Levites did not live only in Levitical cities. They appear to have been regarded, in some respects at least, as belonging to the tribe within which they resided, even if it did not happen to be a Levitical city; hence the statement in Jdg. 17:7, “Now there was a young man of Bethlehem in Judah, of the family of Judah, who was a Levite; and he sojourned there” (RSV). Thus also ELKANAH, the father of SAMUEL, who undoubtedly was a Levite, is called an Ephraimite (1 Sam. 1:1). The Levites are never regarded as a thirteenth tribe.

These cities were allocated to the Levites by anticipation, to be occupied by them only to the extent that they required them and the Israelites possessed them. It is unlikely that the Levites ever dwelt in all of them, or even most of them, for some of the cities did not belong to Israel until long after the time of Moses and Joshua. Levitical cities mentioned in Jewish history after the time of Joshua are Beth Shemesh (1 Sam. 6:13-15), Jattir (1 Sam. 30:27), Anathoth (1 Ki. 2:26; Jer. 1:1; 32).

Leviticus, Book of li-vit'i-kuhs. The third book of the Bible and traditionally one of the five books of MOSES (the PENTATEUCH or TORAH). Its Hebrew title is the first word, wayyiqra', "and he called." The English title is derived from the VULGATE's Leviticus (an adjective meaning "the Levitical"), which in turn is derived from the title prefixed to the SEPTUAGINT, Leuitikon (an adjective qualifying biblion, "book"), despite the fact that the book nowhere refers to the special functions of the Levites (see PRIESTS AND LEVITES). The designations given to it in the MISHNAH—"priests' law," "priests' book," "law of offerings"—better indicate its scope. But a study of the material shows that many of its regulations are addressed to the congregation of Israel as well as to MOSES and AARON.

I. The unity of the book. Many scholars—literary critics, who regard the book as essentially the product of the so-called "priestly" writer, as well as form and tradition critics, both of whom see numerous sources behind it—view Lev. 17-26 as a separate body of material designated the Holiness Code (H) by A. Klostermann in 1877 (cf. his later work, Der Pentateuch: Beiträge zu seinem Verständnis und seiner Entstehungsgeschichte [1893], 368ff.).

A. Arguments for recognition of H. Several arguments have been advanced for the existence of an independent Holiness Code. First, critics allege that Lev. 17-26 is marked as a separate law code both by its beginning (17:1-2) and by its ending (26:46). Second, various writers have given lists of words and phrases that are peculiar to this section, and which show the author is nearer to EZEKIEL than to any other book in the OT. Because of this connection between H and Ezekiel, some claim Ezekiel is the author of H; many others conclude that the two are roughly contemporary and that possibly H originated among the exiles in Babylon. Third, their analysis reveals that the code contains much exhortatory material akin to DEUTERONOMY. Fourth, they claim the laws of this code are derived from another collection because they are much wider in scope than those in the preceding chapters. Finally, they note that reference is made in these chapters to matters that have already been dealt with (cf., e.g., 19:6-8 with 7:15-18; 20:25 with ch. 11; and 23:26-32 with ch. 16).

B. Arguments against the recognition of H. These arguments are readily refuted, and others can be advanced demonstrating that Lev. 17-26 is part and parcel with the rest of the legislation attributed to Moses in this book. First, the introductory formula in 17:1 is similar to others found in the book (passim) and appears to be a stereotyped way of introducing a fresh element in the revelation. In fact, this argument is so weak that C. A. Simpson ignored the issue when he suggested for reasons of his own that ch. 17 may have come from another source than chs. 18-26 (HDB rev., 581).

Second, the concluding statement in Lev. 26:46 might be referred better to the whole book than arbitrarily limited to these chapters. This suggestion is confirmed by noting that the curses and blessings formulae in ch. 26 more properly belong to the entire COVENANT enacted on SINAI. Korošec and Mendenhall demonstrated that the Sinaitic covenant is similar in its form to the HITTITE international treaties (see TREATY). In this connection they noted that such covenants typically include the curses and blessings formulae (G. E. Mendenhall in BA 17 [1954]: 50-76). By viewing Exod. 19—Lev. 26 as a unity, all six elements typically found in these Hittite treaties are present in the Sinaitic covenant. By denying this unity one is left with the anomaly that some of these elements are present in one code and others are present in later codes. Thus Mendenhall conceded that the last three out of the six elements are lacking in the Decalogue (see TEN COMMANDMENTS). Moreover, by separating Lev. 17-26 the critic produces the anomaly that the blessings and curses are now found in a code that is much later and lacks the other unifying elements. By accepting the biblical claim, on the other hand, one possesses an integer similar in structure to these Hittite covenants.

Third, there is no valid reason why the scope of legislation should not be expanded from laws governing the cult to other rules regulating the social, moral, and religious life of the people in whose midst Yahweh reigned.

Fourth, the change to sermon style in Lev. 18-20 is appropriate to the subject matter. In these chapters Yahweh prohibits the Israelites from conforming to the corrupting practices of their pagan neighbors. Because of the temptation to conform to their degraded practices, Moses is not content simply to explain what the laws of God are, but he earnestly enjoins them upon the conscience of the people, and urges them to take with utmost seriousness God's call to a holy life. In a word, the change in subject matter readily accounts for the change in style and vocabulary.

Fifth, regarding the connection with Ezekiel, G. Henton Davies admitted that "it cannot be shown with certainty that H preceded Ezekiel or vice versa" (IDB, 3:119-20). Assuming that Lev. 17-26 preceded Ezekiel, why should it be surprising that Ezekiel reflects this material, which is foundational for the theocratic state?

Sixth, the connection of material found throughout the book argues for its homogeneity; for example, the ban on blood (Lev. 3:17; 7:26-27; 17:11), regulations regarding impurity (7:21; chs. 11-15), and the distinction between clean and unclean (10:10; ch. 11; note that 20:25 clearly alludes to the law concerning the clean and unclean animals in ch. 11 and clearly integrates the commandments of chs. 18-20 with chs. 11-15). Moreover, there are doublets within H itself (e.g., 17:12 = 19:26a; 19:27-28 = 21:5; 19:30 = 26:2; 19:31 = 20:6; 19:34 = 24:22). The distinctive emphasis on Israel's HOLINESS because of Yahweh's holiness found in 21:1—22:16 is stated earlier in 11:44-45; 19:2; 20:7.

II. Authorship and date. The question of the author and date of Leviticus is bound up with two prior considerations: the attitude of the scholar to the nature of Holy Scriptures, and the method employed in deciding these issues. Because of these factors, four distinct views can be presented. (For further discussion, see PENTATEUCH.)

A. The view of the literary critic. The dominating view is that Leviticus is part of P (the Priestly Code). This opinion on the date and origin of P since the days of Julius Wellhausen was well expressed by R. H. Pfeiffer: "The Priestly Code is a fifth century midrash, or historical commentary, on the embryonic Pentateuch (JED), including a series of narratives often illustrating legal precedents, and a codification of ritual laws based on earlier codes" (Introduction to the Old Testament [1948], 88).

The conclusion that P was later than the other strands is ultimately based on a wish to view the history of OT religion and literature in terms of the evolutionary philosophies of the age. For example, Wellhausen laid down the principle that the sense of sin in Israelite sacrifice was a decidedly late development (Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel [1957, orig. 1883], 81), but this understanding was refuted by R. J. Thompson (Penitence and Sacrifice in Early Israel Outside Levitical Law

In this view of the worship area at Arad (looking E), a broad room, the “holy of holies,” and an altar are visible. The book of Leviticus carefully defined the worship life of God’s people, including the sacrifices they were to make.

[1963]). Moreover, according to Wellhausen legal codes must be regarded as a late phenomenon in Israel’s history of religion. This view has been discredited by the discovery of several ancient collections of laws since the recovery of HAMMURABI’S stela in 1901-1902. (For Ur-Nammu laws, cf. S. N. Kramer and A. Falkenstein, Orientalia 23 [1954]: 40-48; for those of Lipit-Ishtar, Eshnunna, Hammurabi, and the Middle Assyrian and Hittite laws, see the translations with bibliographies in ANET, 159-198.) Significantly, the most striking parallels between the so-called P laws and these laws are found in the so-called H (cf. G. L. Archer, Survey of Old Testament Introduction, rev. ed. [1994], 261).

B. The view of the form critic. According to FORM CRITICISM, the book of Leviticus has come into existence in successive stages. For Martin Noth only Lev. 8-10 can be judged as primary and belonging to P. The remaining content of the book for him did not belong to the original or expanded P narrative. He said: “There are such striking departures in numerous details from P’s account, especially with regard to the cultic personnel, and such notable differences in language, that one is led to this conclusion: the non-narrative parts of the book have been fitted into the narrative framework as a later addition and have their own independent history” (Leviticus [1965], 13). According to these critics the cultic and ritual regulations must ultimately be traced back to an oral stage. To quote Noth: “At the back of such compositions there lies most probably a form that was oral, handing on the relevant rules from one generation to another; and in the course of this oral ‘tradition’ new material must certainly have been added to the old” (ibid., 15). Even when fixed in writing, there was always the possibility of expansion and fresh additions. For form critics, dates must be approximate, and the final form contains both ancient and more ancient material. It is as important for them to fix the place of origin as it is to fix the date.

Having settled upon the history of these units of laws, these critics then seek to identify the combinations of laws of like character or similar theme into larger collections. This method is highly subjective and undisciplined. Significantly, after attempting to trace the history of the collections in Leviticus, G. Henton Davies admitted: “But the arguments which prompt such divisions may be countered by other considerations, and this suggests that the precise analysis of these laws into intermediary sections is unwise" (IDB, 3:117). Moreover, the theory of oral tradition is contradictory to observed scribal practices in the ANE. The religious rituals and incantations from the 3rd millennium B.C. texts in the pyramids of Unis, Teti, and Pepi (5th-6th dynasties) at Saqqara, as well as the Sumerian religious texts, divine hymns, and mythological texts from Ur, Nippur, and elsewhere, point to a custom of preserving at an early stage those sources of information or procedure that were of importance to a particular profession (cf. R. K. Harrison, Introduction to the Old Testament [1969], 592).

C. The view of the tradition critic. Ivan Engnell in his introduction to the OT (Gamla Testamentet, 1 [1945]), and in articles in Svenskt Bibliskt Uppslagsverk, did not regard P as the youngest of the "sources" of the Pentateuch, but as a complete work consisting of Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers. This work is the product of the "P-circle." In spite of the ancient traditions contained in P, Engnell found it necessary to date the work of the P-circle rather late, in the exilic or postexilic period, possibly even in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah.

But A. Kapelrud, who also recognized only a P-circle and a D-circle, contradicted Engnell by concluding that the work of the P-circle must have been completed before 550 B.C. He reasoned that so-called Second Isaiah used the work (particularly Gen. 1-2) in such a way that the prophet not only knew these chapters as we have them in MT, but he also supposed that his audience knew the passages. He concluded: "That must mean that P had got its final form not later than 550 B.C." ("The Date of the Priestly Code," Annual of the Swedish Theological Institute 3 [1964], 58-64). The only reason he advanced for dating it not earlier than 550 B.C. was that it could not be demonstrated to his satisfaction that Jeremiah and Ezekiel explicitly quote the P work, but surely this negative evidence does not lead necessarily to the conclusion that it was nonexistent in their times.

D. The view of the faithful. The Holy Spirit has convinced the faithful that Jesus of Nazareth is Lord and Christ and that the Scriptures he revered are the Word of God. His faith rests on the Spirit's convincing work; he rejoices in all truth; and he recognizes error by its inconsistency with Scripture.

Although the author of Leviticus is not named, a comparison of Exod. 40:1, 17 with Num. 1:1 suggests that these laws belong to the first month of the second year after the exodus. Moreover, the context for these laws is clearly the revelation given by Yahweh to Moses at Sinai. Thirty-eight times it is stated that Yahweh spoke to Moses at Sinai. However, the statement in Lev. 16:1 that the law for the Day of Atonement was given after the death of NADAB and ABIHU recounted in ch. 10 shows that the material is not arranged chronologically but logically (cf. J. S. Wright in EvQ 25 [1953]: 14). Although a later writer may have set this Mosaic material into its present order, there is no reason for thinking that Moses himself did not arrange the laws. If this historical setting for all the laws and narratives is the creation of a later writer's imagination, as the critics imply, one cannot escape the implication that he was immoral, using deceitful means to accomplish a righteous end. The work is morally tarnished according to their views and should be renounced as such.

The evidence suggests that their implied allegation is false. To this writer's knowledge there is no hard evidence dictating either that the book is late or that these laws did not come to Moses, the founder of the theocratic state. On the contrary, much evidence supports the claim of Scripture.

It will do little good to point out isolated details in these laws that show their early origin because the form critic and the tradition critic can fit these details into their theories. But if one examines the book as a whole against a Late Bronze environment, one finds that almost every major section of the book has analogues in the ANE literature from this time and earlier.

Thus the sacrifices mentioned in Lev. 1-7 have their analogies in UGARIT. For example, an offering analogous to the minḥâ H4966, “the cereal gift” (Lev. 2:1), is mentioned in a sacrificial tariff from Ugarit (CIS, 1:145); a propitiatory peace offering appears to have been known there also (D. M. L. Urie in PEQ no vol. [1949]: 75ff.). Votive and tributary offerings were familiar throughout the ANE (cf. T. H. Gaster in IDB, 4:148ff.). On the other hand, one should caution that the sacrificial system found in the Ugaritic texts lacks convincing correspondence with the Mosaic system (cf. A. De-Guglielmo in CBQ 17 [1955]: 196).

Even more compelling is the priestly nature of the material. In antiquity all forms of education were under the supervision of the priesthood, a tradition that was established by the Sumerians (J. Kaster in IDB, 2:27ff.). In this connection it is important to recall that this professional literature was put into writing at an early date. In addition, highly organized medical material of various kinds are known both in Babylonia and Egypt from at least the 2nd millennium B.C. onward. On this basis Harrison concluded regarding Lev. 11-15: “There is no a priori reason why the hygienic code of Leviticus cannot be confidently credited to its attributive author...there is no specific element in the prescriptions that requires a date later than the end of the Amarna period” (Introduction, 594).

Also, it is important to recall that the legal codes with striking parallels to material in so-called H are found in writing from a time before Moses. Furthermore, with regard to the FIRSTFRUITS in Lev. 23:9-14, note that similar offerings have been attested from Mesopotamian, Hittite, S Arabic, and Aegean sources (Harrison, Introduction, 601). Finally, recall that the curses and blessings formulae of Lev. 26 find their parallel in ancient Hittite treaties.

Taking all this material into account, one gains the impression that the content of Leviticus is very old. In short, in contrast to the speculative theories of the critics, the hard facts support the scriptural claim for the book from its beginning to its end, throughout each of its major divisions.

III. Purpose. Leviticus is a collection of enactments enabling the holy Yahweh to live in residence amid his unholy subjects. Cautioning the people to keep this covenant, Yahweh concludes that if they keep it: “I will put my dwelling place among you, and I will not abhor you. I will walk among you and be your God, and you will be my people” (Lev. 26:11-12). For this reason Yahweh legislates the cultic, civil, social, moral, and economic life of his redeemed people. Exodus concluded with the account of the completion of the TABERNACLE. From the tabernacle, rendered glorious by the divine Presence, issues the legislation contained in Leviticus.

As Yahweh draws near to the people in the tabernacle, so the people draw near to Yahweh in the prescribed offerings (Lev. 1-7), and through the prescribed priesthood (chs. 8-10). Moreover, Yahweh demands cleanness (chs. 11-15), and provides for their pollution through the Day of Atonement (ch. 16). To enjoy his fellowship, his people and priests must be holy in all particulars in contrast to their pagan neighbors (chs. 17-25). Blessings and curses will be determined by their response to the law (ch. 26). The laws concerning devoted property (ch. 27) stand apart from the prerequisite standards for Yahweh’s residence among the people.

IV. Outline

1. The laws concerning sacrifices (Lev. 1-7)
  1. The laws addressed to Israelite worshipers through Moses (1:1—6:7)
    1. The laws for the sweet savor offerings (chs. 1-3)
      1. The law of burnt offering (ch. 1)

- (1) Introduction (1:1-2a)
- (2) Of the herd (1:2b-9)
- (3) Of the flock (1:10-13)
- (4) Of fowls (1:14-17)

2. The law of cereal offering (ch. 2)

- (1) In its uncooked form of fine flour with oil and frankincense (2:1-3)
- (2) In its cooked form (2:4-10)
- (3) The prohibition of leaven, and the direction to use salt in all cereal offerings (2:11-13)
- (4) The oblation of firstfruits (2:14-16)

3. The law of peace offering (ch. 3)

- (1) Of the herd (3:1-5)
- (2) Of the flock: sheep (3:6-11), goats (3:12-16), perpetual statute concerning blood and suet (3:17). [Apart from this last verse, these laws of the sweet savor offerings consist of a decalogue of instructions.]

2. The laws for the nonsweet savor offerings (4:1—6:7)

1. The law of sin offering (ch. 4)

- (1) Introduction (4:1-2)
- (2) For the anointed priest (4:3-12)
- (3) For the whole congregation (4:13-21)
- (4) For a ruler (4:22-26)
- (5) For one of the common people: a goat (4:27-31), a lamb (4:32-35)

2. The law of the guilt offering (5:1—6:7)

- (1) For three kinds of offenses (5:1-13)

- (a) For any person [lamb or goat] (5:1-6)
- (b) For poorer people [fowls] (5:7-10)
- (c) For the poorest [cereal] (5:11-13)

- (2) For deceit in holy things (5:14-16)
- (3) For unknown sins (5:17-19)
- (4) For crimes against a neighbor (6:1-7) [Again, this section may be analyzed as a decalogue.]

2. The laws addressed mainly to the priests (6:8—7:38)

1. The law of the burnt offering (6:8-13)
2. The law of the cereal offering (6:14-18)
3. The offering of the priests (6:19-23)

4. The law of the sin offering (6:24-30)
5. The law of the guilt offering (7:1-10)
6. The law of the peace offering (7:11-21)
7. Exposition of 3:17: law prohibiting eating fat or blood (7:22-27)
8. Selected portions for the priests: wave breast and heave thigh (7:28-34)
9. The priest's portion for the anointing (7:35-36)
10. Conclusion (7:37-38)
2. Historical interlude: the institution of the priesthood (chs. 8-10)
  1. The account of the consecration of Aaron (ch. 8)
  2. Aaron's first offering for himself and the people (ch. 9)
  3. Legislative narrative concerning the priests (ch. 10)
3. The laws concerning purity and impurity (chs. 11-15)
  1. The law of food and clean and unclean animals (ch. 11)
    1. Land animals (11:1—8)
    2. Water animals (11:9-12)
    3. Birds (11:13-19)
    4. Winged creeping things (11:20-23)
    5. The carcass of land animals making unclean (11:24-28)
    6. Specific unclean creeping things on earth (11:29-31)
    7. Things unclean by contact (11:32-38)
    8. Dead clean beasts (11:39-40)
    9. General unclean creeping things on earth (11:41-43)
    10. Concluding summaries (11:44-47)
  2. Purification following childbirth (ch. 12)
  3. Diagnosis and treatment of leprosy (chs. 13-14)
    1. Infection of various parts of the body (ch. 13)
    2. The law of the leper in the day of his cleansing (14:1-32). [The priest is mentioned in ten verses, each of which begins one of the ten sections of this law (vv. 3, 4, 5, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 19, 20).]
    3. The law for leprosy in a house (14:33-57)
  4. Ritual for bodily excretions (ch. 15)
4. The law for the Day of Atonement (ch. 16)
  1. The occasion (16:1)
  2. The ceremony (16:2-28)
    1. The law for Aaron (16:2-25). [Dividing the text according to the mention of Aaron there are eight divisions: vv. 2, 3-5, 6-7, 8, 9-10, 11-19, 20-22, 23-25.]
    2. The law for the man who lets the goat go to Azazel (16:26)
    3. The law for the man who burns the sin offering without the camp (16:27-28). [If this analysis is correct, once again there is a decalogue.]
  3. Instruction for annual repetition of the ceremony (16:29-34) V. The law for sacrifice (ch. 17)
    1. The place for sacrifice (17:1-9)
    2. Eating with blood prohibited (17:10-14)
    3. Eating of carcasses forbidden (17:15-16)
5. Laws commanding holiness and nonconformity with pagan practices (chs. 18-20)

1. Sexual laws (ch. 18)
  1. Introduction (18:1-5)
  2. Twenty enactments (vv. 17 and 23 contain two) against consanguineous and illicit marriages and unnatural lusts (18:6-23)
  3. Concluding exhortations (18:24-30)
2. Mixed moral and ceremonial laws (ch. 19)
3. Miscellaneous laws (ch. 20)
6. Laws for the priesthood (chs. 21-22)
  1. Laws for the personal purity of the priests (ch. 21)
  2. Laws for the eating and offering of sacrifices (ch. 22)
7. Cultic laws for the people (chs. 23-25)
  1. Laws of the sacred calendar (ch. 23)
  2. Law for the tabernacle and camp (ch. 24)
  3. Laws for the land (ch. 25)
    1. The sabbatical year (25:1-7)
    2. Year of Jubilee (25:8-23)
    3. Redemption of land (25:24-34)
    4. No usury for the landless (25: 35-38)
    5. Slavery and the landless (25:39-55)
8. Blessing for obedience and curses for disobedience to the code (ch. 26)
9. Appendix: Laws of vows and gifts (ch. 27)

V. Selected studies

A. *The laws governing the sacrifices in chs. 1—7. For what follows see also the article on SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

1. The burnt offering (Lev. 1). The motive behind the “[whole] burnt offering” (Lev. 1:3) is exhibited in the clause, “When any of you brings an offering [or gift, cf. v. 10] to the LORD&H;” (v. 2). The gift consisted of an animal and served to secure to the offerer the good pleasure of Yahweh (v. 3). The expression “that he may be accepted” (RSV) is never used in connection with the sin offering, whose peculiar function was to obtain the pardon, rather than the gracious favor of Yahweh. Accordingly, like the other two “sweet savor” offerings, it was voluntary. An example of its use is seen when the king offers up a burnt offering before going to battle (1 Sam. 7:9; 13:9; Ps. 20).

Reconstruction of the altar of incense.

2. The cereal offering (Lev. 2). The motive behind this sacrifice is identical with the first as seen in the clause: “When someone brings a grain offering...” (Lev. 2:1). The wording is almost identical with 1:2, except the gift is qualified by minḥâ H4966, “cereal, grain gift.” Elsewhere this word is used for both bloody and nonbloody offerings (cf. Gen. 4:3-4), but under the law it is restricted to the bloodless offering. Again, the motive is not prompted through a divine demand but through an instinctive desire to commune with God. W. Eichrodt said: “Just as an inferior brings a present to his superior, or a client to his patron, or a vassal to his lord, as the normal expression of his subjection and fealty, so the pious worshiper makes an offering to God. Naturally, only something valuable, the surrender of which involves an act of renunciation on the part of the giver, is suitable for such an offering. Hence food—and that only at its best—accords admirably with this idea of a gift, because it is essential to life” (Theology of the Old Testament [1961], 1:144).

3. The peace offering (Lev. 3). The first verse of this chapter should be rendered: “If his gift is a sacrifice of well-being...”; the word translated “sacrifice” (zebah H2285) denotes the concept of sacral communion. The peace offering is the only sacrifice eaten by the lay worshiper (Lev. 3:17; 7:26; 17:1-7) and the only animal sacrifice that does not make atonement (cf. 1:14; 4:20, 26, 31, 35; 5:16, 18, 26; 16:24). According to 7:12 and 7:16, the sacrifice was offered for “thanksgiving” (NIV, “as an expression of thankfulness”) or as “a votive offering” (NIV, “the result of a vow”) or “a freewill offering.”

The word translated “thanksgiving” (tôdâ H9343) would be rendered better by “acknowledgement” (cf. C. Westermann, The Praise of God in the Psalms [1965], 25-30). Eichrodt concluded: “The toda springs spontaneously from man’s need to give public and material expression to his gratitude for some deliverance or marvelous benefit” (Theology, 147). The vow (nēder H5624) springs from the spontaneous conviction that it is right to give a gift only to one’s benefactor. “A real element in the vow,” said Eichrodt, “is the spontaneous conviction that God’s gifts require from men not merely words, but deeds of gratitude, and that for a person praying to make his readiness for such an act explicit is to express a right attitude of mind and to show a real awareness of God’s graciousness in answering his prayer” (ibid., 145). Finally, the “freewill offering” (nēdābâ H5607) expresses one’s homage. Eichrodt commented: “The nedaba is an example of a free act of homage, which views man’s humble recognition of and submission to his divine Lord, and was a common practice on the occasion of the regular visits to the sanctuary at the time of the great annual festivals (Exod. 23:15; 34:20)” (ibid., 145). Thus the basic motive prompting this sacrifice is that of appreciation.

4. The sin offering (Lev. 4). The term “sin offering” (ḥaṭṭā’t H2633), presented in connection with the inadvertent transgression of some commandment (Lev. 4:2; Num. 15:22-29 [contrast vv. 30-31]; cf. Ezek. 45:20), designates the sacrifice that made ATONEMENT, that is, paid the price to appease the wrath of God (see below). Throughout the ritual, the ransom price demanded was blood.

5. The guilt offering (Lev. 5). The guilt offering made compensation for the damage done through sin. Eichrodt said: “A breach of trust between human beings involved the payment of compensation. The same obligation toward God was expressed in the guilt offering or the sacrifice of reparation (’ašam). Moreover, the proper legal compensation had to be made either directly to the injured fellowcitizen, or to the sanctuary at the same time as the sacrifice...” (Theology, 161).

B. The laws of purification (chs. 11-15)

1. The clean and unclean animals (Lev. 11). The categorizing of animal species into CLEAN and unclean is unique in the annals of ANE literature in its avoidance of magical considerations (see also UNCLEANNES). R. K. Harrison wrote: “The system of therapeutics and preventive medicine...was grounded upon an empirical basis, in marked contrast to the contemporary peoples, who were dominated by a priori magical considerations and as a result tended invariably to spiritualize pathological phenomena in terms of the activity of demons” (Introduction, 603). The foods classified as clean are known to be beneficial in contrast to the unclean known to be noxious. These dietary regulations issue from Yahweh’s design for his people. The word šeqeš H9211, “abomination, something detestable” (v. 10 et al.), is a technical term designating that which is culticly unacceptable (cf. Dan. 9:27) in contrast to the much more frequent term for “abomination,” tô’ēbâ H9359, which can designate that which is repugnant to one’s sensibilities (e.g., Gen. 43:32).

2. The laws governing leprosy (Lev. 13-14). Several scholars have argued convincingly that the affliction diagnosed in Lev. 13-14 is not exactly the same as Hansen’s disease (as modern medical practitioners prefer to designate leprosy; see DISEASE). Regarding the description of diagnostic techniques and quarantine regulations derived from clinical procedure recorded in Leviticus, Harrison said: “The Hebrew of chapter 13 is technical, suited to a professional textbook for the priest-physician. The language is like that of the Egyptian medical texts, and it is obscure to the modern Biblical student as most advanced texts are to beginners in other fields of knowledge” (Introduction, 608).

C. The Day of Atonement (Lev. 16). A crucial word in Leviticus as a whole and foremost in Lev. 16 is kipper (piel of kāpar H4105), “to make atonement.” Some scholars define its original meaning as “to wipe away, expiate” on the basis of the Babylonian and Assyrian parallels (J. Milgrom in JBL 90 [1971]: 151). Others define its meaning as “to cover” on the basis of its Arabic parallel (BDB, 497). L. Morris has demonstrated on the basis of usage that it means “to pay a ransom price.” In its noncultic use he concluded that the verb means “to avert a ransom...Thus extra-cultic kipper denotes a substitutionary process...In each case the essence of the transaction is the provision of an acceptable substitute” (The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross [1965], 166). He found the same nuance in its cultic use: “...the verb kipper carries with it the implication of a turning away of the divine wrath by an appropriate offering. This meaning accords well with the general usage of exilaskomai, and it seems clear that the verb is used so often to translate kipper precisely for this reason” (ibid., 170). He also noted that the atonement paid is always out of proportion to the price paid: “There is always an element of grace” (ibid., 167). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

D. The law governing blood (Lev. 17). The significance of BLOOD (dām H1947) in the scriptural sacrifices has been understood in two ways. Some argue that by “the blood” is meant LIFE rather than death so that the essential element in sacrifice is the presenting of life. Accepting this understanding, G. Henton Davies said: “The blood is the life, and sacrifice is surrendered life, and so involves surrendered time, surrendered property, and surrendered self (laying on of hands)” (IDB, 3:120). This interpretation is based on the narrow base of Lev. 17:11. But L. Morris demonstrated through an exhaustive word study that “blood” in Scripture denotes death. He properly rejected the above interpretation and concluded: “dam [blood] in the Old Testament signifies life violently taken rather than the continual presence of life available for some new function, in short, death rather than life, and that this is supported by the references to atonement” (Apostolic Preaching, 121). He argued that nep̄s H5883, “life” (17:11), more probably means “life yielded up in death.”

VI. Text. The book of Leviticus presents relatively few and minor textual problems. One of the significant discoveries among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS is a fragment of Leviticus in paleo-Hebrew script, dated by S. Birnbaum to the 5th cent. B.C., and to the Maccabean era by F. M. Cross, Jr. (The Ancient Library of Qumran [1961], 34). This document demonstrated the fidelity of the MT in Leviticus by its agreement with the traditional text (note also D. N. Freedman and K. A. Matthews, The Paleo-Hebrew Leviticus Scroll (11 QpaleoLev) [1985]). See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (OT).

VII. Relationship to the NT. The Lord Jesus Christ said in Matt. 22:40 that the entire Law and Prophets depend on Deut. 6:5 and Lev. 19:18. The second injunction, “Love your neighbor as yourself,” is repeated elsewhere (Matt. 19:19; Mk. 12:31; Lk. 10:27; Rom. 13:9; Gal. 5:14). When he cured the leper he instructed him to carry out the law regarding leprosy (cf. Lev. 14). In the SERMON ON THE MOUNT to his disciples he demanded the righteousness obtained by these laws (cf. Matt. 5:18-20, 44-45).

The apostles saw much in Leviticus as a type, a divinely inspired picture, of their doctrines (see TYPOLOGY). For example the priests and sacrifices connected with the tabernacle shadowed the work of Christ in connection with heaven (cf. Heb. 3:1; 4:14-16; chs. 9-10); the presence of God in Israel (Lev. 26:12) prefigured the templehood of Christian believers (2 Cor. 6:16). The apostles also insisted that these enactments were not binding on the church but had been superseded in Christ and through the indwelling Holy Spirit (cf. Acts 9:9-16; 15:1-21; Gal. 2:11—3:5; 1 Tim. 4:1-5; Heb. 9:10).

lex talionis leks'tal-ee-oh'nis. Also ius talionis. This Latin phrase (meaning literally “the law of that [same] kind”) refers to a principle of retaliation whereby a person suffers the same harm that he or she has inflicted on someone else. The concept is expressed in the Bible as early as Gen. 9:6, “Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed,” but especially in Exod. 21:23-25, “But if there is serious injury, you are to take life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burn for burn, wound for wound, bruise for bruise” (cf. Matt. 5:38). The principle expresses not only the validity of legal retaliation but also, and perhaps primarily, the requirement of equity and proportionality in the administration of punishment. The lex talionis therefore does not justify personal VENGEANCE or excessive retaliation. (See B. S. Jackson in VT 23 [1973]: 273-304; S. E. Loewen-stamm in VT 27 [1977]: 352-60; C. Carmichael in Hebrew Annual Review 9 [1985]: 107-26; R. Westbrook in RB 93 [1986]: 52-69; J. F. Davis, Lex Talionis in Early Judaism and the Exhortation of Jesus in Matthew 5:38-42 [2005].)

libation. The pouring of a liquid offering as a religious ritual. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

liberalism. In a religious sense, this term (or better, Classical Liberalism, also known as Modernism) refers to a movement that arose in Protestant circles in the middle of the 19th cent. and was prominent through the first decades of the 20th. It was characterized by an emphasis on free intellectual inquiry, suspicion (or rejection) of orthodox theology, and confidence in the natural goodness of human beings. The label liberalism is often used more broadly to describe any departure from historical Christian thought, especially with regard to the INSPIRATION and authority of the Bible. In a less careful sense, the term liberal is sometimes applied loosely to scholars who use the methods of “higher criticism” or who otherwise do not appear to follow traditional views. See BIBLICAL CRITICISM.

libertine. A person who emphasizes liberty in moral questions and acts without ethical restraints; also, a freethinker who rejects religious authority. The term is used by the KJV with reference to freedmen who composed a synagogue in NT times (Acts 6:9). See FREEDMEN, SYNAGOGUE OF THE.

liberty. The condition of being free from slavery or forced subjection, whether physically, materially, or spiritually. In the OT the concept of liberty is used basically to refer to the physical freedom of SLAVES. Thus the Hebrew noun děror H2002 is used in Lev. 25:10 for proclaiming liberty for Hebrew slaves in the JUBILEE YEAR (cf. Jer. 34:8-9, 14-17; Ezek. 46:17). In an important prophetic passage it describes a part of the Messiah's spiritual ministry of salvation as he will "proclaim freedom for the captives" (Isa. 61:1; cf. Lk. 4:16-21).

A different term, the adjective ḥopšî H2930, "free," is used also to indicate liberty granted to Hebrew bondslaves in the seventh year (Exod. 21:2, 5; Deut. 15:12-13, 18) and liberty to a male or female slave because of an injury inflicted by a master (Exod. 21:26-27). Job 3:19 speaks of a slave's freedom from his master after death, and in a more general sense the oppressed are spoken of as being set free (Isa. 58:6). In the area of material liberty, this adjective speaks of freedom from taxes and other types of obligations (1 Sam. 17:25). In one instance, the adjective rāhāb H8146 ("broad") is used as a noun ("wide or open place") figuratively of the psalmist's freedom in living a godly life since he has sought the Lord's precepts (Ps. 119:45). (See NIDOTTE, 1:986-89; 2:238042.)

In the NT there is reference to the physically free (Gk. eleutheros G1801), as opposed to the slave (1 Cor. 7:21-22), where the Christian who has his political and social freedom is enslaved to Christ and the Christian slave is free in Christ (cf. Gal. 3:28). The NT lays greater stress on spiritual liberty, with the one through whom spiritual freedom is obtained being clearly set forth. Christ's interpretation of Isa. 61:1 makes clear that he as the promised Messiah will bring to sinners deliverance from sin (the Greek is aphesis G912 in Lk. 4:20); this notion is amplified by PAUL (e.g., Rom. 6:18; Gal. 5:1). In Jn. 8:32, 36, Christ and his word of truth are set forth as the means by which the sinner is really made free. Paul teaches that the authority of the life-giving HOLY SPIRIT has made the sinner free from the authority of sin (Rom. 8:2), and it is this same Spirit who frees us so that we may know the Lord and his Word (2 Cor. 3:1-17).

Having been liberated by Christ from the penalty of sin, believers are challenged to employ this liberty properly in Christian living. They are not to use it as an excuse to satisfy unchristian sinful desires; rather, they are to serve others by LOVE (Gal. 5:13; cf. vv. 19-21 and 2 Pet. 2:19). The world should see that the believer's freedom in Christ does not result in sin but issues in good works (1 Pet. 2:15-16). The Christian is to consider the conscience of another in his use of Christian liberty (1 Cor. 10:29). A divine means by which the believer's life is influenced to godly living is the perfect law of liberty, the Word of God (Jas. 1:25; 2:12). Finally, at the SECOND COMING of Christ the Christians will be given a glorious freedom from the effects of sin (Rom. 8:21). (See J. E. Frame in JBL 49 [1930]: 1-12; H. D. Betz, Paul's Concept of Freedom in the Context of Hellenistic Discussions about the Possibilities of Human Freedom [1977]; NIDNTT, 1:715-21; ABD, s.v. "Freedom," 2:855-59.)

Libnah lib'nuh (לִבְנָה H4243, possibly "white[ness]" or "poplar" or "storax tree"). (1) A stopping place of the Israelites between Rimmon Perez and Rissah on their wilderness journey (Num. 33:20-21; it is thought by some to be identical with LABAN, Deut. 1:1). The site is unknown.

(2) A Canaanite city located in the SHEPHELAH, conquered by the Israelites under JOSHUA (Josh. 10:29-32). The conquest of Libnah was an important factor in solidifying the territorial holdings of the Israelites in the campaign in S Palestine. Libnah is cited in the list of conquered Canaanite cities (12:15) and was one of the cities included in the territory allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (15:42). It later became one of the LEVITICAL CITIES, towns assigned exclusively to the priests and Levites for their places of residency in Palestine (21:13; 1 Chr. 6:57).

Libnah successfully revolted against Judah in the reign of JEHORAM, indicating the weakening hold of Judah on her outlying cities (2 Ki. 8:22; 2 Chr. 21:10). Judah apparently regained control of Libnah, however, for it appears as one of the fortified cities attacked by SENNACHERIB in his campaign against Judah during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 19:8; Isa. 37:8). It was during this siege that the Assyrian forces were decimated by a plague (2 Ki. 19:35-36). Libnah was the home of Hamutal, the mother of ZEDEKIAH (2 Ki. 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1).

The identification of ancient Libnah is debated. The town was evidently not far from LACHISH (Josh. 10:31) and in the same district as ETHER, KEILAH, and MARESHAH (15:42-43). One early proposal was modern Tell eṣ-Ṣafī, about 10 mi. due N of Lachish (cf. NEAEHL, 4:4:1522-24, s.v. “Zāfit, Tel”). The white limestone cliffs that dominate the site (leading the Crusaders to give to it the name Blanchegarde) may explain the origin of the name Libnah, and archaeological excavations have yielded evidence of the Assyrian presence there. This identification, however, would seem to place the town outside the district of Ether (cf. Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 86). A more widely accepted suggestion is Tell Bornat, about 5 mi. NE of Lachish. Other proposals include Tell Judeideh, less than 2 mi. E of Tell Bornat (Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 379-81, but see MORESHETH-GATH) and Khirbet Tell el-Beida (an additional 2.5 mi. E, but see ACZIB #2).

Libnath. See SHIHOR LIBNATH.

Libni lib’ni (לְבִנִי H4249, “white”; gentilic לְבִנִי H4250, “Libnite”). (1) Son of GERSHON, grandson of LEVI, and ancestor of the Libnite clan (Exod. 6:17; Num. 3:18, 21; 26:58; 1 Chr. 6:17, 20). Some believe that the name Libnite is derived from the town of LIBNAH (see ABD, 4:322-23). See also LADAN #2.

(2) Son of MAHLI, grandson of MERARI, and great-grandson of Levi (1 Chr. 6:29).

library. A library is a collection of books, large or small, purposely brought together by, and in the possession of, an individual or an institution (as contrasted with an accumulation of books for commercial purposes). Often a library possessed by an individual ultimately becomes part of an institution more or less public, such as the J. Pierpont Morgan Library of New York. While BOOKS frequently are mentioned in the Bible, nowhere is there a reference to a library of books existing in Israel. SOLOMON, however, did complain, “Of making many books there is no end” (Eccl. 12:12), indicating that he was well acquainted with an existing body of literature.

There are numerous individual allusions in the Bible to the writing of books and to the places where they were deposited. The books of MOSES are mentioned more frequently than any others. As early as Israel’s victory over AMALEK, Moses was commanded, “Write this on a scroll as something to be remembered” (Exod. 17:14). Though nothing is said as to where it should be deposited, it is interesting to note that the next verse reads, “Moses built an altar.” This incident antedated the building of the TABERNACLE. Soon after the giving of the Decalogue, “Moses wrote down everything the LORD had said” (Exod. 24:4); then, apparently on the next day, “he took the Book of the Covenant, and read it to the people” (v. 7; the NT adds the comment that Moses “sprinkled the scroll and all the people,” Heb. 9:19). Again, it is here recorded that Moses built an altar.

In the great code of DEUTERONOMY there is a famous passage that Israel’s future king should “write for himself on a scroll a copy of this law, taken from that of the priests” (Deut. 17:18). The PRIESTS AND LEVITES were definitely acknowledged as the keepers of these sacred volumes. There is a similar statement toward the end of the Pentateuch: “After Moses finished writing in a book the words of this law from beginning to end, he gave this command to the Levites who carried the ark of the covenant of the LORD: ‘Take this Book of the Law and place it beside the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God’” (31:24-26). See BOOKS II.

JOSHUA referred to these Mosaic writings (Josh. 8:31, 34; 23:6), as did EZRA centuries later (Ezra 6:18). Much of the Pentateuch came to be called “the Book of the Covenant,” and was the volume lost for an undefined length of time and discovered by HILKIAH in the temple (2 Ki. 22:8-10; 23:2, 21; 2 Chr. 34:14-15). Permission must have been granted to borrow these volumes or to copy them, for JEHOSEPHAT (870-848 B.C.) had earlier sent certain Levites to teach “throughout Judah, taking with them the Book of the Law of the LORD” (2 Chr. 17:9).

In an even earlier period, when the Israelites had enthusiastically received SAUL as their anointed king, SAMUEL “explained to the people the regulations of the kingship. He wrote them down on a scroll and deposited it before the LORD” (1 Sam. 10:25). Both JEREMIAH and ISAIAH were admonished frequently to write in books certain warnings sent of God (Isa. 30:9; Jer. 25:15; 30:2; 36; 51:60).

From these allusions one thing seems clear: these writings commanded by God were in some way identified with the ARK OF THE COVENANT, and later with the tabernacle, and generally were under the care of the priests and Levites. This would seem naturally to imply that there was a library in the TEMPLE in Jerusalem, but of this the Scriptures say nothing. The famous German scholar E. Sellin supposed that there were temple archives also at Ophrah, Dan, Shiloh, Shechem, and Gibeon.

For many generations there was no record of the book of Moses or of any other biblical books. After the destruction of Jerusalem, DANIEL, far away in Babylon, “perceived in the books the number of years that, according to the word of the LORD to the prophet Jeremiah, must be fulfilled” (Dan. 9:2 NRSV). Perhaps Daniel had memorized these passages, but it is more likely that he had a copy of Jeremiah with him or accessible to him.

In the middle of the 5th cent. B.C., when some of the Jews returned from captivity, the people asked Ezra to read to them from “the Book of the Law of Moses” (Neh. 8:1-3; cf. 13:1). This passage indicates not only that Ezra possessed a copy of the law of Moses, but also that the people knew that he had it.

In spite of all these references to the writing of the books and sometimes of the assignment of them to the care of the Levites, there is no specific reference to a library, nor even a hint that there must have been extensive collections of books in Israel. Not only were there copies of the literature which is now included in the OT, but these Scriptures refer also to other books not included in the CANON, such as the Book of the Wars of the LORD (Num. 21:14), the Book of Jashar (Josh. 10:12-13); the records of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer (1 Chr. 29:29); and the records of the seers (2 Chr. 33:19). Besides all these, there must have been collections of treaties, genealogies, business transactions, etc. The first eleven chapters of 1 Chronicles demand an extensive collection of genealogical records.

There is, however, a remarkable reference in the OT to a library in PERSIA. When the enemies of Israel complained to DARIUS about the Jews, they asked that a search be made in the king's treasure house in BABYLON concerning the decree of CYRUS permitting the building of the second temple (Ezra 5:17). Then "King Darius issued an order, and they searched in the archives [lit., the house of the books] stored in the treasury at Babylon" (6:1; see also 4:15). Jerome translated "the house of the books" by bibliotheca, a clear reference to an official library. The book of Esther states that the story of Mordecai "was recorded in the book of the annals in the presence of the king" (Esth. 2:23; cf. 1 Esd. 6:21, 23). When the king was not able to sleep, "he ordered the book of the chronicles, the records of his reign, to be brought in and read to him" (Esth. 6:1). There is a final reference to what is probably a more extensive record of "the book of the annals of the kings of Media and Persia" (10:2).

The NT gives no hint of actual collections of books, but from our Lord's experience in the synagogue at NAZARETH (Lk. 4:17) it is clear that the synagogues then, as today, had copies of the OT writings.

The fact that no libraries or archives of Israel have thus far been found is more amazing in consideration of the fact that vast collections of records, narratives, and other texts were amassed by Israel's neighbors. Few have been found that could be called Israelite. In the 1930s eighteen OSTRACA in a Hebrew script from about 588 B.C., relating to the siege of LACHISH, were discovered. They related to the siege of the city, but were really emergency correspondence, not a library. that could be dated about 1450 B.C. before the arrival of Israel. Farther N, at Ras Shamra, 40 mi. SW of ANTIOCH, was found a large collection of texts and letters, mostly religious, from the middle of the 2nd millennium B.C. (see UGARIT). In MARI (SE Syria) 20,000 tablets of the 18th cent. B.C. came to light, and 370 clay tablets of the 14th cent. were found at TELL EL-AMARNA in Egypt. More recently, a very extensive collection of tablets, dating to the 24th cent., was discovered in EBLA.

Probably the greatest collection of tablets yet found—c. 25,000 in number—is the library of SARGON (722-705 B.C.), now in the British Museum. In the Royal Library of ASHURBANIPAL (662-626), some 20,000 tablets representing 10,000 different texts also rest there. It was called by Sir Frederic Kenyon “the first great private collection of books known to history” (The Bible and Archaeology [1940], 4). More than 3,500 tablets, inscribed during the first half of the 2nd millennium, were unearthed at Nuzi. In the temple area at NIPPUR (50 mi. SE of Babylon), some 50,000 tablets dating from the 4th and 5th centuries B.C. were found. E. C. Richardson (Biblical Libraries: A Sketch of Library History from 3400 BC to AD 150 [1914], 1) wrote, “The fact is that there were thousands or even tens of thousands of collections, containing millions of written books or documents in Biblical places in Biblical times.”

The large libraries of the Greek and Roman world were gathered after the close of the OT period. Most of the SEPTUAGINT probably was produced at the great library of ALEXANDRIA in the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C. The libraries of the early church, such as the one used by ORIGEN at CAESAREA in the 3rd cent. A.D., do not belong within the biblical period, and are consequently outside the scope of this article.

In the year 1947 occurred what has been designated as “the greatest manuscript discovery of all times.” For the most part, the thousands of tablets found in different libraries of the ANE do not relate directly to Israel or to the OT records. From the caves in the hills at the NW end of the Dead Sea, however, were recovered a large number of complete and fragmentary scrolls dealing with the literature of the intertestamental period, and containing specimens from every book of the OT except Esther. This body of MSS was gathered or produced by the pious men of the QUMRAN community between 200 B.C. and A.D. 50. Some of these documents had never been seen before, or at least not in entirety: the Manual of Discipline, the Damascus Document, the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness, etc. The greatest treasure was the great Isaiah Scroll, which is remarkably close to the Hebrew text of ISAIAH that has been used by Jews and Christians alike for centuries. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

Libya lib'ee-uh (לִיבִיָּה H4275, occurring only in the pl. לִיבִיִּים, “Libyans” [לְבִיִּים in Dan. 11:43]; Λιβύη G3340 [in LXX, Λίβυες, “Libyans”]). A country in N Africa, the immediate western neighbor of EGYPT. Greek writers often identified Libya with Cyrenaica (see CYRENE); sometimes the name was used more broadly of the whole N African coastal zone.

Many believe that the LEHABITES listed in the Table of NATIONS (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chr. 1:11) are to be identified with the Libyans. The usual Hebrew term, lûbîm, like Greek Libyē, derives from the name of a particular people, the Libu (Rbw) in Egyptian records from RAMSES II (13th cent. B.C.) onward. The oldest Egyptian terms for Libyan peoples are Tjehenu and Tjemehu (from the 3rd millennium); fresh tribal names including the Libu appear in the New Kingdom. The Libu predominated in an invasion of Egypt that was vigorously repelled by MERNEPTAH, as reported on the “Israel Stela” and other texts (J. H. Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt, 5 vols. [1906], 3:§§569-617). Under Ramses III (c. 1190) and later, the Libu were less prominent, but their name persisted in titles like “Great Chief of the Libu” in the 22nd-23rd dynasties, c. 945-715 (cf. J. Yoyotte in Mélanges Maspero, 1:4 [1961], 142-51).

In the OT, the Lubim appropriately feature in the forces of the pharaoh SHISHAK (himself of Libyan extraction) when he invaded Palestine (2 Chr. 12:3), and also in those of ZERAH defeated by ASA (cf. 16:8). Along with Put (see below), the Lubim were reckoned as part of the strength of THEBES by Nahum (Nah. 3:9). Libya and CUSH are also subordinate to Egypt (Dan. 11:43), as happened so often in their history. The MT reading kûb (see CUB) in Ezek. 30:5 is often emended to lûb on the basis of the SEPTUAGINT and the Syriac (cf. NIV and NRSV, “Libya”; some also would read lûbîm for lûdîm in Jer. 46:9, but see LUD). In the NT, we read that visitors from “the parts of Libya near Cyrene” were present in Jerusalem at Pentecost (Acts 2:10).

It should be noted that PUT (Heb. pûṭ H7033), which occurs separately in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:6; 1 Chr. 1:8), reappears in the 7th and 6th cent. prophets, associated with Lubim in Nah. 3:9 and possibly in Jer. 46:9 (but see previous paragraph). Ezekiel has Put alongside Persia, Cush, and Lud, in prophecies against Tyre and Egypt, as a source of warriors (Ezek. 27:10; 30:5; 38:5)—a common role of Libyans in the 1st millennium B.C. It is conceivable that pûl in Isa. 66:19 may be a scribal error for pûṭ (cf. LXX Phoud, thus NRSV, “Put,” and NIV, “Libyans”).

The name Put occurs in Egyptian as Pywd (in a text of Osorkon II, c. 860 B.C.) and Pwd (in amuletic papyri) for Libyans alongside Syrians, Nubians, and Egyptians (see Jacquet-Gordon, JEA 46 [1960]: 16-17, 20 on line 16; cf. I. E. S. Edwards, Hieratic Papyri in the British Museum, 4th Series, 1 [1960], 10 and n. 23; 122 s.v.). In Egypt under the Persians, the names Putiya (Old Persian) and Puṭa (Akkadian) are equivalent to Egyptian Ta-Tjemehu, “Libya,” as well as to Hebrew Put (see G. Posener, La première domination perse en Égypte [1936], 186—87). The origin of the term remains uncertain; with Posener (ibid., 186 n. 1), it may derive from Egyptian Pedjtiu > Pidate (TELL EL-AMARNA tablets), originally “bowmen, foreigners,” and then applied specifically to Libyans. (See further O. Bates, The Eastern Libyans [1914]; W. Hölscher, Libyer und Ägypter [1937]; A. H. Gardiner, Ancient Egyptian Onomastica [1947], 1:114*-123*, nos. 238-242 [valuable surveys of the Egyptian data]; F. Colin, Les peuples libyens de la Cyrenaïque à l'Égypte [2000].)

lice. Plural form of louse, a term applied to various wingless insects that live exclusively by sucking blood. Lice have been closely associated with humans since antiquity, and their preserved bodies have been found in Egyptian mummies. They are still abundant in parts of the Middle E and flourish in dirt and over-crowded conditions. Lice are vectors of serious diseases, including typhus fever, and have been responsible for many deaths as well as general ill health and discomfort. Each species of louse lives on a different host, sometimes on just one part of a host; few groups of animals are preyed upon, but these include cattle.

JOSEPHUS (Ant. 2.14.3 §300) describes the third plague in Egypt as consisting of lice (Gk. phthair), an identification followed by the KJV and some modern scholars. However, the Hebrew word in the biblical text (kēn H4031, Exod. 8:16-18; Ps. 105:31; LXX sknips) probably refers to GNATS. Lice breed only on the host and would not spread in the pattern given in the narrative. Also, the priests had worked out a system of personal hygiene—including shaving hairy parts of the body and frequent washing of clothes—that probably made them immune to lice. See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

G. S. CANSDALE

licentiousness. Disregard of accepted moral rules and standards; lack of moral restraint, especially in sexual conduct. The term is used by the NRSV and other versions to render Greek aselgeia G816 (e.g., Rom. 13:13, where NIV has “debauchery”). See LASCIVIOUSNESS.

Lidbir, Lidebir lid’bihr, lid’uh-bihr. See DEBIR (PLACE) #3; Lo DEBAR.

lie. A false statement presented as TRUTH; the sin of speaking or acting in such a way as to leave a false or misleading impression, especially with the intent to deceive. Various biblical terms are used in this sense, such as Hebrew šeqer H9214 and kāzāb H3942, both of which occur in Prov. 6:19 (lit., “A witness of falsehoods breathes out lies”); other terms include kahaš H3951 (Hos. 11:12 et al.) and šāw H8736 (Isa. 59:4 et al.). In the NT the noun pseudos G6022 and its cognates are common (e.g., Rom. 9:1; 1 Tim. 4:2; 1 Jn. 2:21), but terms related to this concept include several verbs that can mean “to deceive” (e.g., apatatō G572, Eph. 5:6; dolioō G1514, Rom. 3:13; planaō G4414, Matt. 24:5; paralogizomai G4165, Col. 2:4). (See NIDOTTE, 2:619-21; NIDNTT, 2:457-61, 470-74.)

Lying is everywhere condemned in the Scripture. SATAN is designated as the source of lies: The devil does not hold “to the truth, for there is no truth in him. When he lies, he speaks his native language, for he is a liar and the father of lies” (Jn. 8:44). The emissaries of Satan are denoted as using lies delivered through human agents (1 Tim. 4:2). On the other hand, it is impossible for God to lie (Heb. 6:18). In the final analysis, it is SIN against God (Acts 5:4).

In the OT lying is condemned in the TEN COMMANDMENTS (Exod. 20:16; Lev. 19:11-12). Later, OT references apply lying to IDOLATRY (Isa. 44:20; Jer. 10:14) and heathen worship (see Rom. 1:25). This is the greatest lie confronted in the course of the old covenant. The messages of false prophets and diviners are as deceitful lies (Isa. 9:15; Jer. 14:14; Ezek. 13:6-7). The paramount lie in the NT is the denial that Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn. 2:22). Simple honesty is a cardinal virtue of the follower of Christ, and lying is the basic sin denoting the opposite (Col. 3:9).

No doubt can be entertained that the Scriptures bear uniform testimony to the wrong of lying. Several problems arise, however, as to the degree of condemnation of untruth under certain circumstances. Sometimes even good men become enmeshed in lies, for example, ABRAHAM (Gen. 20:2), DAVID (1 Sam. 21:2), PETER (Matt. 26:72). This is no more excusable in their lives than in any life, but in their case it was the exception rather than the pattern. On the other hand, one notes that no word of condemnation is leveled at RAHAB for lying about the whereabouts of the Hebrew spies (Josh. 2:3-6; cf. Heb. 11:31; Jas. 2:25). MICAIAH explained to AHAB that God sent a lying spirit to speak lies through the false prophets (1 Ki. 22:23). PAUL wrote that God will cause the deceivers to be deceived in the last days (2 Thess. 2:11), but one should note that (1) God, who does not lie, allows others to use lies and at times applies this to further his own plans; (2) those who are used in this way are people who have already committed themselves to such a role in life.

These examples, however, point up ethical questions relevant to present conditions. Is there such a thing as a lie of expediency? Does the situation sometimes remove the stigma of sin from the lie? Can a physician in all good conscience give temporary relief to dying patients by telling them they will recover? Can a husband seek to protect his wife and family from the assaults of a marauding criminal by lying about their whereabouts? Do the conditions of war justify the soldiers’ or the spies’ use of untruth or the government’s misrepresentation of the facts to the world or to its own people?

Those who maintain that truth is relative, shifting with the change of time and place, are naturally inclined to deny anything absolute about the condemnation of lying. Each instance, they insist, must be judged upon its own merits, whether it is acceptable or to be condemned. The law of LOVE and the impulse of self-defense can justify untruth in some situations is their claim. Contextual ethics (e.g., Dietrich Bonhoeffer, “What Does It Mean to Tell the Truth?” in Ethics [1955]) and koinonia ethics (cf. Paul L. Lehmann, Ethics in a Christian Context [1963], 124ff.) oppose the absolutist’s position (see Immanuel Kant, “On a Supposed Right to Lie from Altruistic Motives,” in Kant’s Ethical Writings, ed. Lewis E. Beck [1949]); but to do so, they attempt to assume the place of God in judging the intentions and principles involved in each situation.

The Scripture does teach the existence of absolutes, but under extenuating circumstances it allows for a middle ground between absolute right and absolute wrong where only God can declare the wrong or right of a deed. It seems obvious that he would take into consideration: (1) Is the statement of an untruth deliberate? (2) Is it given with a calculated intent to deceive? (3) Is it intended deceit for the malicious purpose of bringing misery upon another or for the selfish end of one’s own advantage? (4) Are the character and intent of the one to whom untruth is directed basis for such measures in defense? (5) Can the polite untruth demanded by etiquette be differentiated from the morally unjustifiable lie? It is impossible to say that lying is ever right, but certainly the situation may make it less wrong on some occasions than others.

The penalties for lying are severe. At times there is the recoil of the evil upon the liar (Deut. 19:19; cf. GEHAZI and the leprosy of NAAMAN, 2 Ki. 5:20-27). The liar disqualifies himself from worshipful approach to God (Ps. 24:4). The liar forfeits any promise of eternal salvation (Rev. 21:27; 22:15).

lieutenant. This English term is used by the KJV to render Hebrew ʾāḥašdarpān H346, which refers to a SATRAP (Ezra 8:36; Esth. 3:12; 8:9; 9:3; in the Aram. sections of Daniel, the KJV has “prince,” Dan. 3:2-3, 27; 6:1-7).

life. It is apparent that the biblical concept of life moves in the framework of the grand cosmic conceptions of CREATION, FALL, REDEMPTION, and eschatological THEODICY. The idea frequently occurring in the Bible proves to be that of eternal life, with its special implications of a “quality of life” with rich ethical associations, as well as the implications of endless duration through the ages to come (see ETERNAL and ETERNITY).

  1. The delivering over of the kingdom
  2. Life triumphant in the eternal state of perfection

I. The biblical idea of renewal and eschatological theodicy

A. Basic orientation of immortality vs. biblical resurrection. Careful discussion by James Orr (The Christian View of God and the World, 3rd ed. [1897], 165-211) has made clear the uniqueness of the biblical concept of IMMORTALITY over against supposed pagan parallels. The biblical form of immortality is not merely the survival of the SOUL, but life of the whole person in body and soul. “It is said we have no doctrine of Immortality in the Old Testament. But I reply, we have immortality at the very commencement—for man, as he came from the hands of his Creator, was made for immortal life. Man in Eden was immortal. He was intended to live, not to die...it is not an immortality of the soul only that the Bible speaks of—that is left for the philosophers—but an immortality of the whole person, body and soul together. Such is the Christian hope, and such...was the Hebrew hope also” (ibid., 202-3).

Alexander Heidel, writing fifty years later than Orr, emphatically reiterates the latter’s findings. “In Mesopotamia man was thought to have been created mortal, so that death was the natural result of his constitution; in Israel he was believed to have been created for never-ending life, wherefore death was something unnatural...Even the latest Babylonian and Assyrian records reveal nothing of a resurrection of the flesh, a doctrine so clearly set forth in Daniel and Isaiah...These differences set the eschatology of the Mesopotamians and that of the Hebrews as far apart as the East is from the West" (The Gilgamesh Epic and Old Testament Parallels, 2nd ed. [1949], 137-223, esp. 222-23).

Thus the matrix of the biblical theology of life is already cast in the created constitution of human beings and the hope of a heavenly and gracious redemption from sin and death. There is a straight line from Eden and the fall to the appearance of the last ADAM and his redemptive work. Redemptionlife must include the historic, space-time death, resurrection, and second advent of Christ, as well as the impartation of benefits to sinners in individual renewal and resurrection.

B. The death and resurrection of Jesus Christ as the basis of redemption-life. For the present purpose it is convenient to refer to the inspired philosophy of history given in Heb. 2. The divine purpose of redemption and triumph is found in the promise of Ps. 8 that all things will be put under man in the "inhabited earth" that is to come. To that end, the majestic Son of God, crowned with glory and honor, tasted death for everyone. Through death and the inseparable resurrection, he brought to nought him who had the power of death, and delivered those held in bondage. Having made the one sacrifice for sins forever, he resumed his place of sovereign sway at the right hand of God and now "waits for his enemies to be made his footstool, because by one sacrifice he has made perfect those who are being made holy" (Heb. 10:12-15).

C. The palingenesia of the individual

1. Life as connected with regeneration. This life which is connected with recovery from sin is basically an ethical and spiritual conception. The death that is its opposite is a death in trespasses and sins. Life involves palingenesia G4098, that is, REGENERATION, "a profound renovation and reorientation of personal nature and ethical alignments and loyalties, a new birth." A regenerate person is in the KINGDOM OF GOD (Col. 1:13), but there is also a future aspect of the kingdom into which he will enter (Jn. 3:3, 5; Matt. 7:21). These two aspects of the kingdom are called "life": the one who believes in Christ has life (1 Jn. 5:12) and he will enter into life (Mk. 9:43), which is the kingdom (9:47).

The HOLY SPIRIT imparts life in the new birth (Jn. 3:3-8; 1 Cor. 12:13). He will also make alive our mortal bodies (Rom. 8:11) that we may enter into "life" or "the world to come." It is the presence and work of the Spirit also which constitutes the kingdom: "The kingdom-making power is associated with the Spirit" (G. Vos, Biblical Theology: Old and New Testament [1948], 413). His work in the new birth admits one to the kingdom, and his work in the resurrection (and transformation of the living, 1 Cor. 15:51-54) prepares the regenerate to inherit the kingdom (v. 50). The two stadia of the kingdom correspond to the two stadia of life. They run parallel, and one is involved in the other. These events of the impartation of life and the entrance into life are gifts of God's grace (Rom. 6:23) and are based wholly on the redeeming work of Christ (Jn. 20:31; 1 Pet. 1:3-5; Tit. 3:5-8). This kingdom relationship in life through the Spirit is also a relationship to the new covenant or promise (Gal. 4:24, 28-29; Heb. 8:10-12; 9:15). The two stadia of life or the kingdom may also be thought of as present heirship (because we are sons, Gal. 3:29), and the resulting future entrance into the inheritance (Matt. 25:34; Acts 20:32; 1 Cor. 15:50; 1 Pet. 1:3-4; 1 Jn. 3:2-3; Rev. 21:7).

2. The transition from death to life in the Pauline epistles. The Pauline epistles show a special interest in the analysis of the transition from death to life in the individual experience. The impartation of faith and life by the Spirit takes place in the context of “calling” (or “effectual calling,” in the language of the Westminster Confession of Faith). A classic statement of the order of the divine purposes is Rom. 8:29-30: the elect are called and justified, and, with logical certainty, will be glorified. This same point in the application of redemption passes under Paul’s eye in Gal. 3:22-26. Before faith came, we were under the curse and penalty of the law, being shut up unto faith as the only hope for a person in his helplessness and guilt. There are striking parallels to these details in Rom. 7, if this chapter is read as the experience of a sinner under conviction, keenly recognizing the holiness of the law, and yet finding himself in bondage and without the liberating power of the Spirit of life.

In Eph. 4:1 Paul refers to effectual calling, while in 2:12-13 and 18 he speaks of access to the presence of God by faith, echoing in substance the words of Christ in Jn. 14:6 that he is the way of access to the Father. The whole concept seems to be drawn from the vivid application of the imagery of the access to the TABERNACLE set forth in classical fullness in Heb. 10:19-22. Another Pauline passage, Rom. 5:2, seems to reflect the same concept of having obtained access by faith into the grace wherein we have taken our stand, while Phil. 3:8-10 analyzes Paul’s experience at the point where faith rests upon Christ in saving knowledge. In Col. 2:10-13 he describes the life-giving operation of the Spirit in OT and NT terms of CIRCUMCISION and BAPTISM, and a rising in new life. The letters to the Thessalonians lay emphasis on election, issuing in effectual calling (compactly stated in 2 Thess. 2:13-14), and Tit. 3:4-7 links together beautifully the life-giving work of the Spirit and the gracious JUSTIFICATION which is its necessary complement, and which makes the believer an heir according to the hope of eternal life.

3. Palingenesia in the NT. The last-mentioned passage (Tit. 3:5) introduces the striking word palingenesia, which is the organizing principle of the entire concept of redemption-life. The word occurs only here and at Matt. 19:28. Each of these occurrences serves as an organizing center for the two stages of the restoration of life. In the Titus context, the clear connotation is the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit in the soul of the individual. In the Matthew passage, the word refers to the time of resurrection and release of the creation from its groaning and will be further discussed below. “In one of the only two passages in which [the word] occurs in the NT (19:28) it refers to the repristination not of the individual, but of the universe, which is to take place at the end: and this usage tends to stamp upon the word the broad sense of a complete and thoroughgoing restoration. If in Tit. 3:5 it is applied to the individual in such a broad sense, it would be coextensive in meaning with the anakainōsis by the side of which it stands in that passage and would differ from it only as a highly figurative differs from a more literal expression of the same idea. Our salvation, the Apostle would in that case say, is not an attainment of our own, but is wrought by God in his great mercy, by means of a regenerating washing, to wit, a renewal by the Holy Spirit” (B. B. Warfield, Biblical Doctrines [1929], 454).

4. Johannine testimony to the transition from death to life. Johannine passages speak equally clearly of this momentous transition from death to life. In Jn. 5:24, Jesus posits FAITH as the inseparable concomitant of life; thus John comments, “He who has the Son has life; he who does not have the Son of God does not have life” (1 Jn. 5:12). In the Gospel of John, many of the personal confrontations of Christ with inquirers portray vividly the immediate circumstances of the impartation of faith and life, and this moment is actually the climax or turning point of the story. Examples are the royal official (Jn. 4:50) and the Samaritan woman (4:25, 26). In other instances the faith and assurance of believers are dramatically increased: Martha (11:23-27), John (20:8, 9), Thomas (20:27-29), and Peter (21:15-17). Always the emphasis falls on the interconnection of faith and life as in the climactic summary, “that by believing you may have life” (20:31).

5. The manifestation of life in good works. After the initial impartation of life and faith, the life and conduct of the believer come under close scrutiny in the Bible. It is constantly assumed that effectual calling will issue in good works. This intense ethical concern with practical HOLINESS and heart-conformity to the law of God is never blurred. The normal transition in the Pauline epistles is from a statement of doctrine to the ethical application and exhortation: Rom. 12:1-2 is typical of the whole series. The contrast of the works of the flesh and the fruit of the Spirit is clear in Gal. 5. The purpose of Christ’s death is that we might be delivered from this present evil world (1:4; cf. 6:14). This triumph is actualized by the Spirit (5:5, 25).

The standard of ethical conduct is the law of God (Gal. 5:14; Rom. 13:8-10). The liberating power of the Spirit operates so that the righteousness of the law may be fulfilled in those who walk according to the Spirit (8:2-4). Thus, the “perfect law that gives freedom,” the “royal law” (Jas. 1:25; 2:8) with sovereignty over every area of life, becomes a light and guide to the Christian. The law was “for life” (Rom. 7:10): that is, not to give life but to function as a rule and guide in a personality where the life-giving, liberating power of the Holy Spirit is operative. The present ethical manifestations of life by the enablement of the Spirit are constantly oriented toward a goal of perfection.

The Egyptian Tree of Life is depicted in this wall painting from the Beni Hasan tombs (Egypt, early 2nd millennium B.C.).

The present progress and the consummation are thus expressed by Paul: “May the Lord make your love increase and overflow for each other and for everyone else, just as ours does for you. May he strengthen your hearts so that you will be blameless and holy in the presence of our God and Father when our Lord Jesus comes with all his holy ones” (1 Thess. 3:12-13). Entire SANCTIFICATION and perfection in holiness are eagerly anticipated at the PAROUSIA of Christ (5:23) and the resurrection of believers.

6. The ethical nature of the new life. The life imparted to those dead in trespasses and sins is ethical and holy in every sense. Death came because man had corrupted the holy character God had given. For the Spirit of holiness to make his abode with sinners and lead them supernaturally to the triumphant issue envisioned in the Scripture, it was necessary that the Lamb of God should take away the sin of the world. The awesome spectacle of the Son of God bearing the sins of men and women surely shows that holiness is not compromised when God forgives the sinner. Justice is satisfied. The blood of Christ purges the conscience from dead works and gives peace. The life thus righteously purchased and bestowed by the Holy Spirit manifests itself in a conflict with sin and a striving for holiness without which no one shall see the Lord (Heb. 12:14). The resurrection is anticipated especially because it means the perfection of holiness, the entire SANCTIFICATION of the whole person. Heaven is not simply eternal existence, but there will appear a shining perfection of all God intended us to be: "his servants will serve him. They will see his face, and his name will be on their foreheads" (Rev. 22:3-4).

7. The palingenesia of the individual in the OT. The question of the spiritual state and privileges of believers before the cross has been widely discussed. It would probably be conceded by all that "the believing Israelite was born anew (cf. John 3:3, 5, with Luke 13:28)" (Scofield Reference Bible, 768 n. 1). This statement represents the understanding of Bible-believing people. The principal point gained here is that a new birth is admittedly characteristic of the redeemed of all ages. Discussion may continue concerning the content of the faith of believers before the cross, their spiritual privileges, and the fullness of their relation to the Holy Spirit. If it be conceded that all believers are born anew, it probably will also be admitted that such regenerate life could and can be sustained only by the constant presence and work of the Holy Spirit.

Further, it is the belief of this writer that in elaborating the scheme of recovery from sin and death, the apostolic writers of the NT look upon the OT as fully spiritually normative for themselves. Paul finds the blessedness of justification in the experience of ABRAHAM and DAVID (Rom. 4, quoting Gen. 15:16 and Ps. 32:1-2). Having reinforced the call to holiness of life (2 Cor. 6:14-18) with a mosaic of promises and exhortations drawn from the OT (Isa. 52:11; 43:6; Hos. 1:10), Paul says, "Since we have these promises, dear friends, let us purify ourselves" (2 Cor. 7:1). The author of Hebrew joins together God's ancient people and Christians, for we, too, are his house (Heb. 3:2, 6). Jesus brings Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and all the prophets together in the kingdom of God, into which all the regenerate will enter (Lk. 13:28). Abraham "was looking forward to the city with foundations" (Heb. 11:10; 13:14; 11:40). It is the same city to which all aspire (13:14), for God has planned something better for all of us (11:40) than the opprobrium, persecution, and scorn of the world.

The OT has its own terminology for the renewal of the heart. CIRCUMCISION of the heart is required in Deut. 10:6; its ethical bearing is indicated in the resulting love for Yahweh with all the soul and with all the heart. Ezekiel links the work of the Spirit to the renewal of the heart, promising a "new heart" and ability to walk in God's law (Ezek. 36:25-27). Jeremiah's great prophecy of a new covenant is climaxed by the promise that God will write his law on the heart even as he forgives sins. See COVENANT, THE NEW. It is noteworthy in this latter passage that Jeremiah is rebuking his generation (Heb. 8:8) as is implied in the words, "No longer will a man teach his neighbor, or a man his brother, saying, 'Know the LORD'..." (Jer. 31:34). The implication is that Jeremiah was teaching and exhorting his self-righteous and rebellious generation. The inference is clear that the forgiveness and the writing of the law on the heart was contemplated as available to faith in Jeremiah's day.

The heroes of faith acknowledged that they were "aliens and strangers on earth" (Heb. 11:13). The simple exegesis of the following verses shows that they must have had a heavenly homeland in view, a city prepared by God. As G. Vos so well said, "It requires the assurance of the eternity of religion in the individual soul to secure the permanence of religion as such” (Pauline Eschatology [1952], 364-65). Christ said, “Because I live, you also will live” (Jn. 14:19). The presence of supernaturally imparted life in the soul carries the demand for and proof of eternal life with the soul’s Savior. Hence the principal concern of the biblical thought with eschatology and especially resurrection. Vos eloquently says, “We encounter [in the Psalter] the ideas of peace, universalism, paradise restored, the dwelling of Yahweh’s presence in the land, the vision of God, the enjoyment of glory, light, satisfaction of all wants, the outlook beyond death towards an uninterrupted contact with God and a resurrection” (ibid., 332).

The weightiest argument for the fullness of a supernatural renewal in OT believers is drawn from the efficacy of the cross of Christ. Whatever blessings of the goodness of God a sinful race has experienced must come because of the cross of Christ. Because it is the one sacrifice that actually atones for sin, it is absolutely unique: there is no other sacrifice for sin. If we grant that people in all ages have received countless blessings because of the one act of grace on Calvary, there is no reason why the Holy Spirit, because of the certainty that the atonement would be made, could not have applied its benefits in all ages from the beginning.

D. The palingenesia of creation at the resurrection and the age to come

1. Life in the intermediate state. Although spiritual life is imparted to believers in this life, physical DEATH still comes. The Bible has its adequate assurance for the believer: “to die is gain” (Phil. 1:21), and there is the calm assurance that “the Lord will rescue me from every evil attack and will bring me safely to his heavenly kingdom” (2 Tim. 4:18). Paul preferred “to be away from the body and at home with the Lord” (2 Cor. 5:8), though this state was less desirable than having the resurrection body (Phil. 3:20-21) and being “clothed upon” with immortality. Through this “intermediate state” the soul, made perfect in holiness, and enjoying communion with Christ, is preserved until the hour of resurrection. The swift tableau John gives of the souls beneath the altar (Rev. 6:9-11) clothed in white robes would suggest that God has made death itself the occasion of an advance in their perfection and holiness. Here are “the spirits of righteous men made perfect” (Heb. 12:23) awaiting the resurrection.

2. Life as related to resurrection. The concept of the RESURRECTION of the dead in Christ is necessary to the completion of the biblical scheme of our entire deliverance from sin and death. Through resurrection or instantaneous transformation of the living at the parousia (1 Cor. 15:51-52), believers are prepared to inherit the kingdom (15:50). So keenly is the resurrection felt to be related to full attainment of life that it is referred to as “coming to life” (Rev. 20:4) or “making alive” (Rom. 8:11). Modern alternative conceptions of resurrection as simply “spiritual” or “the persistence of the personality through death” do not approach the historic concreteness of the biblical view. Nor do they really solve the problem of death, the radical and unnatural rending apart of soul and body. For the healing of that stupendous rent in our being there is needed, as Christ said, the power of God in the resurrection of the dead (Matt. 22:29).

3. Palingenesia of creation. The palingenesia, then, of the individual issues in the resurrection. At this point in the analysis, Rom. 8:18-25 opens a further vista. Paul here logically connects with the resurrection of believers the deliverance of the creation itself. Since human beings are connected with the creation through their physical bodies, it is appropriate that when the BODY is made immortal, the creation should be raised to share the same glory and liberty, and itself experience a palingenesia.

The use of the word palingenesia in Matt. 19:28 provides a firm parallel from which to draw additional details about the creation's renewal. It is a time when the SON OF MAN shall sit on the throne of his glory. This statement, taken with Matt. 25:31 and Rev. 3:21, clearly distinguishes a special future reign of Christ from his present sharing of his Father's throne. His present session as contemplated in Ps. 110:1 (quoted in Matt. 22:44 et al.) is a continuation or resumption of his sovereign rule. The present imperative (kathou, "sit") may indicate, "maintain your place at my right hand," thus leaving room for the future reign in his own glorious throne. The parallel in Lk. 22:28-30 speaks of his "reign."

A further parallel (1 Cor. 15:25) touches this same point. This debated passage is minutely examined by G. Vos (The Pauline Eschatology, 235-46). His conclusion is that the "end" follows the parousia so closely that there is no room for a "kingdom." He thus concludes that the reign (for Christ must reign, 15:25) must have begun at Christ's resurrection and cannot be pushed into the future. We confidently dissent from Vos, though grateful for his masterly handling of eschatological issues generally. He has not accurately stated the three items in the series, nor has he dealt adequately with the resurrection of the unrighteous dead, who must be accounted for in accordance with the Pauline schema of a resurrection of the just and unjust (Acts 24:15), and the Johannine sequence of Rev. 20. When there are fitted into this picture the parallels of Matt. 19:28 and Rev. 20:4-6—where those who have come to life reign and judge (1 Cor. 6:2), and the defeat of the last enemy, death, is linked with the emptying out of Death into the lake of fire (Rev. 20:13-14)—the conclusion is irresistible that a third stage of resurrection is demanded (1 Cor. 15:24), following a reign of Christ which is the palingenesia of creation.

The conclusion is that an extended period of time when Christ and immortal saints reign is an integral part of the whole process of palingenesia, of renewal and fulfillment of the creation-purpose that humanity redeemed should have dominion through Christ, thus fulfilling the promise of Ps. 8.

II. Life in the eternal state

A. *The delivering over of the kingdom. At the "end" (1 Cor. 15:24, 28) the Son delivers the kingdom to the Father, and death has been completely banished. The death contemplated in 1 Cor. 15:26 is to be distinguished from John's "second death." The unrighteous dead do not have part in the palingenesia, yet the unnatural separation of soul and body is mended ere they are handed over to their final doom. It is suggested that Satan's authority over death is done: Christ, the source of all life, in the sovereign exercise of judgmental authority, raises all the dead to life (Jn. 5:21-29) and thus shows that he has life "in himself" (5:26).

B. *Life triumphant in the eternal state of perfection. The Bible scheme of recovery from sin and death thus reaches its goal as the redeemed enter, through resurrection and a triumphant palingenesia, into the everlasting kingdom of Christ, which is eternal life. Running through the splendid imagery of the heavenly scenes of the eternal state is the clear note: "And so we will be with the Lord forever" (1 Thess. 4:17). "Now the dwelling of God is with men, and he will live with them. They will be his people, and God himself will be with them and be their God" (Rev. 21:3).

The biblical keynote of life is never lost. The unrighteous enter their final doom, which is the second death (Rev. 21:8). The righteous enter into life, having their names written in the Lamb's book of life (21:27). They have access to the river of water of life and the TREE OF LIFE (22:1-2, 14). The light falls on the intensely ethical and personal features of the life of the redeemed. “No longer will there be any curse. The throne of God and of the Lamb will be in the city, and his servants will serve him. They will see his face, and his name will be on their foreheads” (22:3-4). (See further NIDOTTE, 2:108-13; TDNT, 2:832-75; NIDNTT, 2:474-83.)

light. This term (Heb. <sup>ו</sup>ôr H240, Gk. phōs G5890) often refers to physical illumination or brightness, but special interest attaches to its figurative, theological uses.

I. Introduction. According to the earliest biblical record concerning “the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 1:1), light was created by God and was therefore separate from him. He thereby challenged the DARKNESS, which engulfed the existing chaotic condition and which obstructed any possible ordered progress. This act opened the way to the great creative and growth processes that followed. To the prophets, God was the source of both light and darkness, of both good and evil (Isa. 45:7). Nevertheless, throughout the Bible light represents that which is compatible with God and darkness is symbolic of the evil forces that are opposed to God. Among the final scriptural references to the affairs of man on earth, BABYLON, the epitome of godlessness, is consigned to darkness (Rev. 18:23), while God’s people (the city of God) are bathed in the light of his GLORY (21:23). In this city, the new Jerusalem, “There will be no more night. They will not need the light of a lamp or the light of the sun, for the Lord God will give them light” (22:5).

Light is superior to darkness (Eccl. 2:13) and is able to limit its scope and effects. This is especially evident in the NT. Light will triumph because darkness cannot overcome it (Jn. 1:5). Yet there is no indication in the Bible that darkness, literally or symbolically, will be finally or completely destroyed. The contest between light and darkness, between good and evil, is found outside the Bible in ZOROASTRIANISM and to a marked degree in the Manual of Discipline of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

II. Artificial light. The Bible briefly recognizes the necessity of artificial light because human activities do not always conform to the schedule of day and night, and natural light is not always sufficient for human needs (Exod. 25:6; Matt. 5:15; Lk. 15:8; Acts 20:8). A light was kept burning continually at night before the veil in the wilderness TABERNACLE (Exod. 27:20-22; Lev. 24:2) as an emblem of the presence of God, “a lasting ordinance among the Israelites for the generations to come” (Exod. 27:20-21; cf. Lev. 24:1-4; 1 Ki. 7:49; 2 Ki. 4:7; 1 Macc. 1:21; 4:49).

III. Miraculous light. There are six references to miraculous light in the Bible, three in each of the Testaments: the BURNING BUSH by which God made himself known to MOSES (Exod. 3:2); the light that illuminated the Israelite homes while the Egyptians were left in darkness (10:23); the PILLAR OF FIRE in which God manifested himself as leader of Israel (13:21; a cloud in this incident is also said to be the vehicle of God’s presence to his people); the light that accompanied the announcement of the birth of Jesus (Lk. 2:9); the light that engulfed Saul of Tarsus on the Damascus Road (Acts 9:3; 22:6; 26:13; see PAUL); and the light by which Jesus was transfigured (Matt. 17:2; see TRANSFIGURATION).

IV. Natural light. The poetry of the Hebrews is replete with references to light as opposed to darkness, which held a certain dread for them and power over them (Job 12:24, 25; Isa. 59:10; Jer. 13:16). Because God made both light and darkness, both are under his control. To those who trust him there is no fear of either the “terror” or the “pestilence” customarily associated with the darkness of night (Ps. 91:5-6). The reason is as simple as FAITH: “The LORD is my light and my salvation” (27:1). God “wraps himself in light as with a garment” (104:2), and darkness or dark clouds are “under his feet” (18:9). God also uses darkness. When nature is unfavorable or destructive, it is because God has covered himself with darkness (18:11-15). Morning is greeted with joy (30:5), for which the watchman has waited eagerly (130:6). This preoccupation with light and darkness can be attributed to the absolute control of the lives of the Hebrew people by the alternation of day and night, rather than to some religious motive. The religious emphasis they placed upon this natural phenomenon arose from the concept of God as creator of all things. So light very easily became the symbol for God and his concern for mankind, his highest creation.

V. Figurative uses

A. Revelation. God is known by human beings only because he has chosen to reveal himself, and this REVELATION is primarily for redemptive purposes. Light stands for the HOLINESS of God, the totality of his righteous character. “God is light” (1 Jn. 1:5) and the “Father of lights” (Jas. 1:17), whose dwelling is “in unapproachable light” (1 Tim. 6:16). The psalmist thought of God as being covered with light (Ps. 104:2), and the self-manifestation of God, both creatively and redemptively, is light for the guidance of mankind (119:105). “In your light we see light” (36:9). God’s TRUTH and light are identified (43:3) as are his LOVE and light, for he is also manifested as love (1 Jn. 4:8). Light is identified with God as he has made himself and his will known to us (Isa. 10:17; 51:4; Hos. 6:5). Christ the Son of God is light (Lk. 2:32; Jn. 1:4, 9). It is only as men and women are enlightened that they can comprehend Christ, and God through Christ (Lk. 10:22). Light is synonymous with revelation, and enlightened believers themselves become light (Ps. 34:5; Eccl. 8:1; Matt. 5:14).

The CREATION of light (Gen. 1:3) suggests that one should look for the revelation of God in his activity more than in his verbal communication. What God has said supports what he has already done. The act of creating natural, physical light becomes prophetic of the entire sweep of God’s self-revelation, both in nature and in redemption (2 Cor. 4:6). Revelation is light. Agents of revelation become light. The SUN, created apart from light as such (Gen. 1:16), came about by an act of God, and it has as its function to reflect the manifold GLORY of God in all of his creation (Ps. 19:1-6).

God’s goodly favor toward the righteous is a lighted lamp in the darkness (Ps. 18:28). Hebrew orthodoxy held that LIFE always would be indicative of this principle. JOB had looked for reward because of his charitable regard for the afflicted, but only evil came to him: “when I looked for light, then came darkness” (Job 30:26). Yet Isaiah believed that eventually things would work out that way, that light would “break forth like the dawn” (Isa. 58:8). In anticipation of the coming restoration the prophet cried out, “Arise, shine, for your light has come, / and the glory of the LORD rises upon you” (60:1).

In the poetic parallelisms of the book of Job, light is synonymous with life (Job 3:16-20). In the fourth gospel Jesus is both life and the giver of life; also he is both light and the giver of light (Jn. 1:4-9). Christ, the LOGOS, the preexistent Son of God, is the source of all mankind’s illumination, moral, intellectual, and spiritual (cf. 1:9). In Daniel’s praise of the name of God who revealed to him the secret of the king’s dream, the wisdom thus received was light (Dan. 2:22; 5:11-14). Jeremiah gives God’s creation of natural light as the guarantee that God will keep his promise concerning the new covenant (Jer. 31:35, 36). To Paul the light of the gospel was the counterpart of the light of creation (2 Cor. 4:4-6). He would agree, however, with the book of Hebrews that the glory of God revealed in Christ is greater than that revealed in creation (Heb. 1:3).

B. Character. In the thought of Jesus, moral excellence is the product of the light he himself possessed, and it gives soundness and character to all of one’s life (Matt. 6:22-23; cf. Lk. 11:34-36). The followers of Christ are lights because of the moral character they possess; and this display sheds light upon and reveals hidden defects in the lives of those around them (Matt. 5:14-16; Lk. 8:16; 11:34-36). People of light as opposed to people of darkness are aware and sober and prepared even for the apocalyptic DAY OF THE LORD (1 Thess. 5:4-8; cf. Rom. 13:11-14).

When Moses came down from Sinai after receiving the tablets of the commandments, his face shone so that the people were afraid (Exod. 34:29; cf. 2 Cor. 3:12-18). The revealed will of God is light to the heart, the soul, and the mind (Ps. 19:7-10). “The unfolding of your words gives light”

(119:130; cf. v. 105). Light is given for a purpose (Eph. 5:8), and walking in the light is a walk of fellowship with God (1 Jn. 1:6), based upon pardon and cleansing (1:9). Both Isaiah and Paul saw that God's plan of redemption is light to be lived by (Isa. 62:1; Col. 1:12). If light is not followed, darkness ensues (Matt. 6:23) and judgment follows (Jn. 3:19; 12:48). Rejection of revealed light indicates an inner disposition that is contrary to the truth revealed (3:20), but a favorable response brings about a change in that disposition (1 Jn. 1:9). Paradoxically, John also says that acceptance of revealed light indicates an inner quality of character or disposition that is compatible with the light (3:21). Different personalities respond variously to light prior to actual acceptance or rejection.

The kingdom of Christ is a kingdom of light (Col. 1:12). God's people have been called out of darkness into light (1 Pet. 2:9). Christians are "the people of the light" (Lk. 16:8; Jn. 12:36; 1 Thess. 5:5). He who has been enlightened (Gk. phōtizō G5894) by the gospel has "tasted the heavenly gift" (Christ), has been a partaker of the Holy Spirit, has "tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the coming age" (Heb. 6:4-5). The Christian life is an enlightened life, evincing knowledge and wisdom in regard to Christ and his work of salvation, both in the present and in the far-flung future (Eph. 1:17-21). The gospel does not make everything in one's environment light, but it does serve as a shaft of light through the darkness.

C. Influence. As a consequence of being enlightened, God's people themselves are lights (Matt. 5:14; 6:22-23). Israel as the servant of God was destined to be "a light for the Gentiles" (Isa. 42:6; 49:6). "Nations will come to your light, / and kings to the brightness of your dawn" (60:3). Such prophetic statements have found their complete fulfillment in Christ (Lk. 2:32; Acts 26:23), also in Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13:47). This imposed parallelism between Jesus and the two men is rather astounding except that we read in the words of Jesus not only "I am the light of the world" (Jn. 9:5; 12:46) but also "You are the light of the world" (Matt. 5:14). Those who have entered the kingdom of God have lamps that shed light, and in the truest sense they are themselves lamps set on a stand—lighted cities on hills—where all may see and be guided by their lights (5:14). They are "children of light" (Eph. 5:8) who walk in love. To them Jesus said, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father who is in heaven" (Matt. 5:16).

lightning. The common biblical words for "lightning" are Greek astrapē G847 (Matt. 24:27 et al.) and Hebrew bārāq H1398 (Exod. 19:6 et al.; cf. also lēš H836 in Exod. 9:23-24, ōr H240 in Job 37:3, bāzāq H1027 in Ezek. 1:14, lappîd H4365 in Exod. 20:18). Lightning is used figuratively in various contexts: to symbolize God's awful and glorious majesty (Rev. 4:5; 11:19); to describe the brightness of Christ's countenance (Matt. 28:3); as an indication of Christ's quick and unexpected coming (Matt. 24:27; Lk. 17:24), the accompanying destructive judgments on the wicked (Rev. 8:5; 16:18), and the Lord's fighting for his people (Zech. 9:14).

Lightning refers generally to any and all of the various forms of visible electrical discharge produced by thunderstorms, that is, a flash of light in the sky caused by an electrical current. See THUNDER. The current may flow between a cloud and the earth, between two clouds, or between the charged surfaces of the same cloud. The electrical conditions of the earth's surface and atmosphere in normal fair weather and in stormy weather differ. The earth has a negative surface charge. In fair weather the electric potential of the atmosphere increases with elevation at the rate of about 100 volts per meter. The earth (negative) and atmosphere (positive—including upper atmosphere or ionosphere) thus form a vast electrical condenser. In a rapidly developing rainstorm, clouds become positively charged at the top and negatively charged below. Clouds consist of an immense number of tiny water droplets, each with a charge on its surface. Meteorologists believe that the clouds become charged due to the differential falling rates of large and very small drops.

Thunderclouds form at the tops of large, moist, rising air currents. Large drops in the cloud, which for some reason become negatively charged, fall due to gravity, whereas the smaller drops, which become positively charged, can be carried by updrafts to the top of the cloud. (A similar situation has been observed to exist in the spray droplets from a waterfall.) The large drops falling through the rising air currents in the cloud may split into smaller droplets and be carried upward again. The small drops will grow in size while traveling upward due to condensation and accretion. The cloud thus acts as a huge electrostatic machine with a continual process of charging taking place. Some flashes are several miles long with estimated cross-sections of four to six inches. Sheet lightning is merely the scattering of light, or reflection by clouds, of distant flashes.

lign aloes. See ALOES.

figure. A precious stone. The term is used by the KJV to render Hebrew lešem H4385, which probably refers to the JACINTH (Exod. 28:19; 39:12).

Likhi lik'hi (לִּיחִי H4376, perhaps “[Yahweh] takes”). Son of SHEMIDA and descendant of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 7:19). The precise genealogical connection is not specified in 1 Chronicles, but elsewhere (Num. 26:32) Shemida seems to be regarded as a son of GILEAD. Some have suggested that Likhi is a scribal error for HEKEL, another son of Gilead (Num. 26:30).

lilies of the field. See LILY.

Lilith lil'ith (לִּילִית H4327, derivation uncertain). This name is used by the NRSV and some other versions as a transliteration of a Hebrew word that occurs only once in a passage describing the terrible desolation that will befall EDOM (Isa. 34:14). The term is associated, probably by popular etymology, with Hebrew laylâ H4326, “night.” Because most (or perhaps all) of the other creatures mentioned in the context are real animals or birds thought to inhabit waste solitudes, this word has been rendered variously as “screech owl” (KJV), “night hag” (RSV), “night-jar” (NEB), “night creatures” (NIV).

Its rendering as a proper name, “Lilith,” reflects a derivation from Akkadian lilītu (itself derived from Sumerian lil, “storm-wind”), which was the name of a female demon or lesser deity about whom little is known. In the TALMUD (e.g., b. Šabb 151b; b. ʿErub. 100b), Lilith is described as a longhaired witch who seizes people sleeping in a house alone. Later Jewish traditions develop these and other ideas in some detail (cf. R. Patai, The Hebrew Goddess [1967], 217-45). It must not be assumed that the prophet himself believed in the existence of Lilith. More likely, in a highly imaginative passage in which he describes the awful desolation of Edom, he simply mentions some creatures, real and unreal, which in the popular imagination are said to inhabit unpeopled solitudes. (See ABD, 4:324-25; DDD, 520-21.)

lily. Perhaps there is no flower about which more has been written or more conjectures made than the lily (Lilium candidum; Heb. šûšan H8808). It would seem that lilies were plentiful in the time of SOLOMON, but the cutting down of the forests and the subsequent soil erosion caused the plants to disappear. They have now been introduced again into Palestine, and are growing well.

When we read, “My lover has gone down to his garden, / to the beds of spices, / to browse in the gardens / and to gather lilies” (Cant. 6:2), does that mean that he went down to pick madonna lilies (Lilium candidum) to put in vases in the palace, or was he harvesting the bulbs of the lilies which in the E are considered delicious? The Hebrew verb for “browse” is rāâ H8286, which normally means

The red anemone is one of the flowers linked to the biblical “lily.”

“graze, pasture [a flock]” (cf. KJV, “feed”). It could therefore easily be that “my lover” was feeding off lily bulbs, and if this is so, then the lily referred to was probably the tiger lily, Lilium tigrinum. In the case of the “lily of the valleys” (2:1), the plant may well be the Hyacinthus orientalis, which is common in Palestine; the flowers are fragrant and of a deep blue color, and in the spring, because of this hyacinth, the fields round about the Lake of Galilee can look blue.

It is only fair to consider seriously the madonna lily or Lilium candidum. It certainly was grown in Palestine, and Linnaeus, the greatest European botanist, stated that it was a Holy Land plant. The trouble was that in the 18th and 19th cent., the botanists were unable to find madonna lilies in their explorations. It was therefore wondered whether this lily was ever there. At last, in 1925, students of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem found a madonna lily growing wild in the N of Palestine, and more were found subsequently. Remember that the madonna lily is related to the lilies of the E—far more so than to the Mediterranean lilies.

Another plant which has been considered as the Bible lily is the Anemone coronaria. It can be seen now on the MOUNT OF OLIVES in abundance. The Lord must have seen thousands of them when he was preaching on the shores of Galilee. This anemone is much admired today—the petals may be red, purple, blue, rose, or white—the stems being 12-15 in. high. The brilliant colors of the flowers would certainly surpass “Solomon in all his glory.” Lilium chalconicum is considered still another possibility. It grows round about the Lake of Galilee, but is by no means as common as the anemone.

However, Jesus’ reference to “the lilies of the field” (the Gk. noun is krinon G3211) is followed up by a comment about “the grass of the field, which is here today and tomorrow is thrown into the fire” (Matt. 6:28-30; Lk. 12:27-28; see GRASS). The fact that the plant was to be made into hay makes the writer believe that the lily referred to was the camomile, Anthemis palaestina, which has thin, scented leaves, and bears small white daisies. This plant is common in Palestine, and can be cut and dried as for hay. It is in flower at the time of hay-making, and would probably, therefore, have been growing around the feet of our Lord at the time he spoke. He was undoubtedly referring to some wild flower, and not to a tall lily. (See further FFB, 134-36.)

lily-work. This term is used by several Bible versions with reference to the architectural ornamentation on the tops of the free-standing pillars, Jakin and Boaz, at the vestibule of Solomon’s TEMPLE (1 Ki. 7:19, 22 [NIV, “in the shape of lilies”]; note also the description of the molten sea, 2 Chr. 4:5). It is thought likely that this lily-work was modeled after the Egyptian LOTUS, which was the staple ornament not only in Egyptian art, but also was widely used, as archaeological remains show, in Assyria, Persia, and Palestine. See FLORA (under Nymphaeaceae); JAKIN (PILLAR).

S. BARABAS

lime. A white caustic alkaline earth (calcium oxide or quicklime). The term also is loosely used to refer to calcium hydroxide (slaked lime) or calcium carbonate (limestone, CHALK, MARBLE). Calcium oxide is obtained by heating calcium carbonate to dull redness, 550°C (cf. Isa. 33:12; the Heb. term is śîd H8487). Carbon dioxide is given off and, if it is swept away in a current of air, as in a kiln, dissociation proceeds until the reaction is practically complete. The calcium oxide that is left looks like white ash (cf. the NEB rendering of 33:12). With the addition of water to quicklime, heat is evolved, clouds of steam are given off and the lime combines with the water, cracks, and after addition of sufficient water, crumbles down to a fine, dry, white powder (calcium hydroxide or slaked lime).

The chief use of lime is in the preparation of mortar, for building purposes, made from a thick paste of slaked lime together with three to four times as much sand as quicklime originally taken. In the hardening of the mortar there is no combination between the lime and the silica of the sand, the hardening consisting of the evaporation of the moisture, or by its absorption by the bricks and a slow reaction of the lime with atmospheric carbon dioxide producing calcium carbonate. (Note that śîd is rendered “plaster” in Deut. 27:2, 4.) The burning of bones produces a grayish-white ash, composed mainly of calcium phosphate, which resembles lime in appearance (cf. Amos 2:1). (See J. R. Partington, A Textbook of Inorganic Chemistry, 6th ed. [1950], 754-55.)

D. R. BOWES

line. This English term, with its different senses, is used variously to render a number of Hebrew words, especially qāw H7742, referring to a “measuring line,” such as builders use (2 Ki. 21:13; Jer. 31:39; Ezek. 47:3; Zech. 1:16; sometimes used figuratively, as in Isa. 28:10, 17; 28:1; 34:11). The Greek word kanōn G2834, “[measuring] rod, ruler,” is rendered “line” by the KJV in a passage where PAUL refers to a person’s sphere of work or “territory” marked out by God (2 Cor. 10:16).

S. BARABAS

Linear A, Linear B. See LANGUAGES OF THE ANE III.

linen. A fabric woven from yarn made of the fine fibers of the stalk of the FLAX plant. The term also designates clothes and garments made of linen. Hebrew terms that can be rendered “[fine] linen” include šēš H9254 (Gen. 41:42 et al.), bad H965 (Exod. 28:42 et al.), and bûṣ H1009 (1 Chr. 15:27). The NT uses Greek sindōn G4984 (Matt. 27:59 et al.), byssos G1116 (Lk. 16:19; byssinos G1115 in Rev. 18:12 et al.), othonion G3856 (Lk. 24:12 et al.), and linon G3351 (Rev. 15:6). In some contexts these terms can be differentiated, but they often are used interchangeably. The term “fine linen” in the Bible refers to sheer, often almost translucent material of the expensive finely woven linen worn by royal and wealthy people or the priests of the temple.

The flax plant was common in Egypt, being cultured extensively in the fertile NILE Valley. Egyptian linen and WEAVING was considered the best of ancient times, so much so that some could not distinguish the fabric from SILK. Flax also was introduced into Palestine early and was grown in the Jordan Valley near JERICO (Josh. 2:6) and also in GALILEE. The flax stalk grew quite tall and was cut or pulled out by the roots near full growth, dried for a time in the sun, then pounded vigorously to separate the fine fibers, washed, and bleached. The yarn, so fine at times as to be almost invisible, was then ready for the weaver.

Linen weavers were known in MOSES’ day before the entrance into Canaan and were considered a gift of God to the people (Exod. 35:35; 38:23). Later we are informed of a guild of linen textile manufacturers at BETH ASHBEA (1 Chr. 4:21). Generally women did the spinning and weaving in the home; already during the exodus women were adept at this ancient art: “Every skilled woman spun with her hands and brought what she had spun—blue, purple or scarlet yarn or fine linen” (Exod. 35:25).

In biblical times linen was used for many purposes. It was popular material for clothing of many kinds and for sheets, curtains, sails of ships, for wrapping scrolls, etc. Fine linen always was used for the garments of the priests. Regarding AARON it is said, “Weave the tunic of fine linen and make the turban of fine linen. The sash is to be the work of an embroiderer. Make tunics, sashes and headbands for Aaron’s sons, to give them dignity and honor. After you put these clothes on your brother Aaron and his sons, anoint and ordain them. Consecrate them so they may serve me as priests. Make linen undergarments as a covering for the body, reaching from the waist to the thigh” (Exod. 28:39-42). The tunic, headdress, and other articles of clothing the priests wore also were made of fine linen (39:27-29). Some of the fine linen woven in Palestine was the best in the world, even preferred by some to the linen manufactured in Egypt. The weavers in Palestine were able to make linen almost as fine as silk. It was so sheer and thin that it was diaphanous and cool in hot weather. The shirt people wore close to the body was made of fine linen. The material was also bleached white and the priests appeared in glittering white apparel.

Fine linen also was used much for dress in religious services, as in the case of the child SAMUEL (1 Sam. 2:18) and the singers in the temple (2 Chr. 5:12). Kings and other royal persons also wore much fine linen (2 Sam. 6:14). The Scriptures say that angels were dressed in white fine linen, as well as the multitudes of the redeemed with Christ in heaven (Ezek. 9:2; Rev. 19:14). Since fine linen with its extreme whiteness was used in a figurative sense for purity and righteousness of life (Rev. 19:8), one can easily understand why white garments are worn in special religious or significant ceremonies today such as weddings. When people used fine linen for ordinary purposes it was a sign of luxury and wealth (Isa. 3:23; Ezek. 16:10). This is the type of linen JOSEPH wore as prime minister in Egypt: “Then Pharaoh took his signet ring from his finger and put it on Joseph’s finger. He dressed him in robes of fine linen and put a gold chain around his neck” (Gen. 41:42).

Linen material was used for the curtains, the veil, and other items in the TABERNACLE (Exod. 26:1-37). The “twisted” (KJV, “twined”) linen mentioned here was made from yarn of which each thread was composed of many delicate strands. The Egyptians were experts in work of this kind, and HERODOTUS (Hist. 3.47) says that Amasis, king of Egypt (564-526 B.C.), sent someone a corselet, each thread of which consisted of 360 separate strands, all of them clearly visible.

Fine linen is such splendid cloth that sometimes translators of the Bible have rendered the term “silk.” When the Lord speaks of punishing Israel, he includes the taking away of the finery of clothing, including linen garments (Isa. 3:18-23). In the same vein, the Lord speaks of his blessings to Israel in terms of beautiful cloth and clothing, “I clothed you with an embroidered dress and put leather sandals on you. I dressed you in fine linen and covered you with costly garments...your clothes were of fine linen and costly fabric and embroidered cloth” (Ezek. 16:10, 13). DAVID and the Levites wore garments made of this fine linen when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:27).

In the parable of LAZARUS AND DIVES, the latter is described as dressed in fine linen, considered the clothing of wealthy people (Lk. 16:19). It is possible that linen was also used for fishing nets (Isa.

19:8-9) and for drapes and beautiful hangings (Esth. 1:6). Linen material also was dyed in many brilliant colors.

The material was cheaper and less durable when the linen yarn or flaxen yarn was mixed with other yarn such as wool and cotton. The Hebrew word šaʿatnēz H9122 signified garments or cloth made of two types of thread. God forbade the Israelites to wear garments made of such materials (Lev. 19:19; Deut. 22:11). Silk would have been difficult to obtain and very costly; it had to be imported by caravan from the Far E.

The use of linen for clothing among the people of the ANE was adopted by the Greeks. The Greek sindōn is the term used to describe the fine costly linen in which the body of Jesus was wrapped: “Joseph took the body, wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, and placed it in his own new tomb that he had cut out of the rock” (Matt. 27:59-60). Both John and Luke speak of linen cloths or clothes as the material in which Jesus’ body was wrapped (Jn. 19:40; Lk. 23:53). The word used here is the plural of othonion, which refers to linen bands, large linen sheets torn into strips, used to wrap the body in a neat fashion. For centuries preceding, the Egyptians used strips of linen sheets to wrap Egyptian mummies. The Greek word linon is used to describe a linen garment (Rev. 15:6); this material may have been made of hemp as well as flax (the word is also used of the rag wick of ancient lamps, Matt. 12:20; Isa. 42:3). Without a doubt linen ranked with wool as one of the most common fabrics in the ancient world.

linguistics. The scientific study of the nature of language. The discipline of comparative linguistics—the identification and analysis of languages that are genetically related—arose at the end of the 18th cent. and grew vigorously during the 19th. This approach was historical (or diachronic) in character: it focused on etymological connections among languages and sought to explain their evolution. In the 20th cent., however, a new (synchronic) approach developed that sought to explain the structure of language as such, without recourse to past developments. Known as modern or general linguistics, this discipline focused on the inner workings of human speech as it functions at any given time among those who use it.

Prominent names in the early development of modern linguistics include the Swiss scholar Ferdinand de Saussure (Cours de linguistique générale [1916]), the Danish Otto Jespersen (Language: Its Nature, Development and Origin [1922]), and the American Leonard Bloomfield (Language [1933]). The significance of general linguistics for the INTERPRETATION of the Bible was first explored systematically by James Barr (The Semantics of Biblical Language [1961]), and the last decades of the 20th cent. saw a vigorous attempt to integrate the two disciplines. (See further J. P. Louw, Semantics of New Testament Greek [1982]; P. Cotterell and M. Turner, Linguistics and Biblical Interpretation [1989]; M. Silva, God, Language, and Scripture: Reading the Bible in the Light of General Linguistics [1990], reprinted in FCI, 193-280; id., Biblical Words and Their Meaning: An Introduction to Lexical Semantics, rev. ed. lintel. The head-piece of a DOOR, carrying the weight of the structure above it. The term is used by some Bible versions to render Hebrew mašqôp H5485 (Exod. 12:22-23). The Israelites were commanded to mark the top as well as the sides of the doorframe with the blood of the paschal lamb when the PASSOVER was instituted.

Linus li'nuhs (Λίνοϛ G3352). A Christian who, along with others (CLAUDIA, EUBULUS, and PUDENS), was a friend of the apostle PAUL during his second Roman imprisonment and who sent greetings to TIMOTHY (2 Tim. 4:21). The 2nd-cent. church father IRENAEUS (Ag. Her. 3.3) says that this Linus was given the office of the episcopate of the church in ROME by the apostles PETER and Paul (Linus's successor, Irenaeus says, was Anacletus [Anencletus], and after him, in the third place from the apostles, Clement was given the bishopric). EUSEBIUS (Eccl. Hist. 3.2) similarly asserts that, after the martyrdom of Paul and of Peter, this Linus was the first who obtained the episcopate at Rome and that he served as bishop for twelve years (ibid., 3.13). Numerous church writers have recorded the type of tradition found in Irenaeus and Eusebius, and of course some elaboration has occurred. The APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS (7.46) refers to Linus as the son (possibly the husband) of Claudia. (On "Early Roman Succession," see J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, Part I, S. Clement of Rome [1890], 1:201-345.)

lion. The Greek word for "lion" (leōn G3329) occurs six times in the book of Revelation (Rev. 4:7 et al.) and three times in other NT books (2 Tim. 4:17; Heb. 11:33; 1 Pet. 5:8). In the OT, however, there are well over one hundred references to lions, and several different Hebrew terms are used. The most general terms are lārî H787, which occurs over thirty times (e.g., Num. 23:24b), and its alternate form, laryēh H793, found almost forty times (e.g., Jdg. 14:8-9). Another common term, occurring thirty times, is kēpîr H4097, which refers specifically to a "young lion" (e.g., Jdg. 14:5; note that this particular animal is also referred to with the more general term in vv. 8-9). A lion's cub is gûr H1594 (e.g., Deut. 33:22; cf. also gôr H1596, Jer. 51:38 and Nah. 2:12 [MT 2:13]), but this term can be applied to other animals (cf. Lam. 4:3). The word lābî' H4233 refers specifically to a "lioness" (e.g., Num. 23:24a; alternate form lēbiyyā' H4234 only in Ezek. 19:2). Less frequent terms, which perhaps had special nuances, are layiś H4330 (e.g., Isa. 30:6) and šahal H8828 (e.g., Job. 10:16). This lexical richness, suggesting that lions were well known throughout the OT period, is exploited in a number of passages (cf. Gen. 49:9; Job 4:10-11; Nah. 2:11-13). The majority of references are figurative, yet it is clear that lions were sometimes common enough to be of some danger to both humans and stock.

The two giant cats—lion and tiger—are usually regarded as African and Asiatic respectively, but this is not wholly correct. The tiger's range is from the borders of Europe, in the Caucasus Mountains, to NE and SE Asia. The lion's main home is now in Africa S of the Sahara, yet it still has a small outlier in the Kathiawar Peninsula of NW India. The position was once very different. Lions lived in most parts of Africa, including Egypt and the N coast, outside the deserts, swamps, and jungles. In prehistoric times there were still lions in parts of Europe. During the reign of DAVID, lions were found more or less continuously from Greece through Asia Minor to India.

The African lion was generally reckoned to be long-maned, while the Asiatic or Persian form short-maned, but there is much variation and the black mane is found in individuals rather than in races. Thus the lion and tiger overlapped for much of their range, but the lion kept to grassland and dry open forest; the tiger to the dense forest and jungle, where its striped coat served as camouflage.

Up to the 1900s humans had reduced the tiger's numbers more than its overall range, but by 1971 the tiger was on the danger list. Today the lion is confined to warm regions and shows less variation in color, size, and habitat than the tiger.

The lion began to lose ground as soon as humans made settlements and kept flocks and herds that needed protection. The cultivable parts of Egypt were occupied early and its lions disappeared many centuries before Christ. Elsewhere in Africa the pressure did not build up until recent years. The Cape lion was lost about 1865, and the Barbary lion of the N coast, in the early 1920s. Lions were extinct in Greece about the end of the 1st cent. A.D. and in Palestine during the time of the Crusades, the last probably being killed near Megiddo in the 13th cent. Lions were reported in Syria by Burton as late as 1851; they still survived in Persia and Iraq in the 20th cent., but these too had vanished before 1930.

The lion is the only plain-colored large cat, but the young, born in litters of two to five, have more or less obvious dark markings, sometimes not losing them until two years old. Unlike the rather solitary tiger, the lion is sociable and lives in family groups, called prides, so it is not surprising that Hebrew plural forms occur nearly fifty times. Lions normally feed on fairly large game, often combining in the hunt for it. They feed to capacity and then rest before killing again (cf. Num. 23:24, "like a lion that does not rest till he devours his prey").

Although there are occasional incidents in which humans are killed by lions, such events are unusual and are often provoked by the victims, for the habitual man-eating lion is rare. Such evidence as the biblical record provides suggests that this pattern was true also at a time when lions were fairly familiar objects of the countryside. (1) In the case of the disobedient prophet (1 Ki. 13:24-25), it is interesting that the body was not eaten, for this is typical of the chance encounter where, on the human level, it can be said that the lion panics and kills. (2) The death of one of the sons of the prophets is a rather similar incident (1 Ki. 20:35-36). (3) The punishment of the pagan settlers in Samaria is stated clearly to have been God's judgment (2 Ki. 17:25-26). A modern parallel is seen in the notorious man-eaters of Tsavo, a group of lions that terrorized the labor force building the Kenya Railway (cf. P. Caputo, Ghosts of Tsavo: Stalking the Mystery Lions of East Africa [2002]). Numerous OT literal and figurative passages imply that lions often were common enough to be a potential danger to domestic stock.

The picture in the NT is so different that it seems reasonable to assume the lion had become rare. On the other hand, Diodorus Siculus, who wrote of events around the beginning of the Christian era but is not always reliable, reported that the NABATEANS had fertile plantations in the S NEGEV, where flocks had to be continually protected against lions and other beasts of prey (Bibl. Hist. 3.43). Of nine NT mentions, seven are purely figurative; one refers back to the prophets, and the single current one is 2 Tim. 4:17, where PAUL states that he was rescued from the lion's mouth. Some commentators see in this passage a reference to the devil (cf. 1 Pet. 5:8) or to NERO; others to a lion in the amphitheater, since by this time lions were being imported in great numbers for the games, mostly from the Upper Nile. Julius CAESAR gave shows involving 400 lions; Nero organized fights between cavalry, bears, and lions, and one of the standard sentences for Christians refusing to conform was being thrown to the lions.

Not all ancient rulers regarded lions in this brutal way. The book of Daniel pictures them being kept in captivity (Dan. 6:7; Aram. ʾaryēh H10069). In Egypt, 1,000 years earlier, lions were trained to help in the hunt; RAMSES II is reported to have had a tame lion that accompanied him to battle. At Nimrud (CALAH) lions regularly were bred by ASHURNASIRPAL II (883-859 B.C.). Lion hunting was a favorite pastime of these Assyrian kings, as is illustrated dramatically in reliefs on ASHURBANIPAL's palace at Nineveh c. 650 B.C. It is possible that a similar motive impelled these Assyrian kings as is found in African tribes today, whose young men kill lions in single combat and so are thought to acquire some of the lion's attributes.

The figurative mentions of the lion in OT are too many to analyze fully, but most commonly it is metaphorical for strength, as SAMSON asked, "What is stronger than a lion?" (Jdg. 14:18). Hence one of Christ's messianic titles—the Lion of the tribe of Judah (Rev. 5:5)—refers back to Gen. 49:9, where JUDAH is described as a lion's cub. (See further H. B. Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible, 9th. ed. [1898], 115—21; G. Loisel, Histoire des ménageries de l'antiquité à nos jours [1912]; G. S. Cansdale, Animals and Man [1952]; B. A. Strawn, What Is Stronger Than a Lion? Leonine Image and Metaphor in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East [2005]; FFB, 50-51; ABD, 6:1143.)

lip. The fold of flesh that surrounds the opening of the mouth. The diverse usage of the Hebrew and Greek terms for "lip" illustrates the manner in which a primary organ of the body was employed to describe a number of widely variant phenomena. The Hebrew word šāpâ H8557 (cf. Akkadian šaptu) meant basically the physical lips of the mouth (e.g., 1 Sam. 1:13) or the lips as the organ of speech (e.g., Exod. 6:12; Ps. 106:33). By metonymy the lips became understood as the language or manner of speaking of individuals and nations alike (Gen. 11:1; Prov. 17:7), as well as the gossip of casual conversationalists (Prov. 17:4; Ezek. 36:3). It was used of an unknown language only once in the OT (Ps. 81:5).

The extension of the term by metaphorical usage naturally suggested the brink or shore of the sea or the bank of a river (Gen. 22:17; 41:3; Dan. 12:5, et al.). By further derivation the word was used to designate the border or edge of something, as with a garment or curtain (Exod. 26:4, 10; 28:26; et al.). The brim of the "molten sea" or cast bronze laver that occupied a conspicuous position in the courtyard of the Solomonic temple is described in 1 Ki. 7:23-26. It was employed also to describe the border of the altar mentioned in Ezek. 43:13, a reference in which Babylonian constructional terms for the design and building of ZIGGURATS occurred. Despite these extensions of meanings, however, the primary application of the term was to the human lips.

Another closely related Hebrew word, šāpām H8559, referred to the upper lip or the mustache (2 Sam. 19:4), and usually in the oriental sense of covering it with the hand or with some garment similar to a veil indicating shame or grief (cf. Lev. 13:45 [NIV, "lower part of his face"]; Mic. 3:7). Under special circumstances this procedure did not need to be observed—as in the case of EZEKIEL, who was forbidden to indulge in the customary mourning rites, having been informed that his wife was about to die (Ezek. 24:17, 22).

Because the ancients were deficient in their knowledge of the physiology of the nervous system, they assigned emotional and ethical qualities to bodily organs, including the lips. The lips not merely spoke but rejoiced (Ps. 71:23), quivered fearfully (Hab. 3:16), preserved knowledge (Prov. 5:2), offered praise (Ps. 63:3); and besides being righteous (Prov. 16:13) they could be lying (Ps. 120:2), uncircumcised (Exod. 6:12, 30), perverse (Prov. 4:24), and so on. Literary parallelism with the tongue or mouth was common in poetry (Pss. 34:13; 51:15). The close association between the thoughts and the lips was stressed in Prov. 16:23.

In the NT the Greek word cheilos G5927 was used both literally and metaphorically in the same sense as in the OT, almost always in quotations from the SEPTUAGINT (Matt. 15:8; Mk. 7:6; Rom. 3:13; 2 Cor. 14:21; 1 Pet. 3:10; cf. also Heb. 11:12; 13:15).

literature, the Bible as. The term literature includes many aspects. Broadly it means a body of written works such as that of a people or nation in a certain period (e.g., Elizabethan literature) or throughout their entire history (e.g., English literature); more narrowly it may refer to writing that relates to some specific field of knowledge or endeavor (e.g., biblical literature, medical literature). The term also has an essential qualitative meaning relating to writing that is notable for excellence. Thus it denotes the written expression of what Matthew Arnold called “the best that has been known and said in the world.”

5. The phenomenon of biblical unity

I. The claim of the Bible to literary greatness. The Bible has the highest claim to classification as great literature. It not only illustrates Thomas De Quincey’s distinction between “the literature of knowledge” (that which aims to teach) and “the literature of power” (that which aims to move); it also fuses these two elements into living unity. It sets before its readers a wealth of knowledge, some of it of a nature obtainable only through divine REVELATION. At the same time, it moves its readers as does no other writing. In its effect upon human history and in its ability to reach people of all kinds, the Bible has no close competitor. More widely circulated and read than any other book, it is unique in world literature

II. The literary study of the Bible. The forty or so persons who wrote the Bible over a period of at least thirteen centuries varied greatly in literary ability. The literature called biblical includes the thirty-nine canonical books of the OT (plus twelve books of the APOCRYPHA in some communions) and the twenty-seven canonical books of the NT. These writings range in style from highly symbolic writing (as in the Apocalypse) through poetry of various kinds, many different forms of narrative, and closely reasoned discussion (as in certain epistles), to writing that is traditional and pedestrian (as in the genealogies and parts of the historical books). It is with this diversity of expression that the literary study of the Bible is concerned.

A. In relation to inspiration. Such study must take into account the divine INSPIRATION of Scripture, although its “God-breathed” character (theopneustos G2535, 2 Tim. 3:16) as the written Word must never be used to obscure or submerge its human aspect. To concentrate on the inspiration of Scripture to the neglect of its human quality, or to do the opposite, is as wrong as to consider the deity of Christ apart from his humanity or vice versa. Many theologians see an analogy between the fusion of the divine and human elements in the Bible and the union of God and man in the person of JESUS CHRIST.

B. Hermeneutical implications. Scholarly consideration of the Bible as literature has an essential place in the broad discipline of biblical studies. It goes beyond aesthetic insight, important though such insight is. It has hermeneutical implications, being directly related to the primary obligation of understanding the meaning of the written Word. Without a grasp of the basic literary characteristics of the Bible, the interpreter of its meaning is handicapped. For scholars to know the original languages, to make careful use of the grammatical-historical method of interpreting the text, to compare Scripture with Scripture, and to be competent in the findings of lower and higher criticism is not enough. Unless they are also alert to the literary aspects of the biblical text, they will be crippled in their hermeneutics and their theology may suffer. See INTERPRETATION.

In a posthumous essay entitled “Modern Theology and Biblical Criticism,” C. S. Lewis said of radical theologians, such as Rudolf Bultmann and Alec Vidler, “Whatever these men may be as Biblical critics, I distrust them as critics. They seem to me to lack literary judgment, to be imperceptive about the very quality of the texts they are reading.” Lewis had little patience with the critic who insists that certain incidents in the gospel records are legend or romance. Referring to the Gospel of John, regarded by some critics as “spiritual romance” or “a poem not a history,” he speaks of the extraordinary reality of its dialogues and narratives and then says: “I have been reading poems, romances, vision-literature, legends, myths all my life. I know what they are like. I know that not one of them is like this” (C. S. Lewis, Christian Reflections, ed. W. Hooper [1967], 154-55). In a generation before Lewis, Richard G. Moulton made a similar point in his valuable work, The Literary Study of the Bible (1899). Referring to the marked contrast between Mic. 7:7-10 and the preceding context, he quoted Julius Wellhausen as taking this change of mood as evidence for the introduction of new material into Micah and thus saying that “between v. 6 and v. 7 there yawns a century.” As Moulton dryly remarked, “What really yawns between the verses is simply a change of speakers” (“Preface to the Second Ed.,” ix).

III. Some important literary characteristics of the Bible. These may be placed under two heads: those relating to the whole Bible or to large sections of it, and those relating to specific forms of literature or modes of expression within it.

A. General literary characteristics

1. Universality. Chief among the general literary characteristics of the Bible is its universality. No book reaches all kinds of people in all kinds of circumstances as does Scripture. To educated or uneducated, rich or poor, civilized or primitive, it communicates its message. Wherever people can read it, or, lacking ability to read, wherever they are taught it, there are some whose hearts it touches. According to the dictum of literary criticism that calls that great which on the basis of repeated examination is acknowledged as such by people of different nations, languages, and occupations throughout long periods of history, the perennial and universal appeal of Scripture clearly establishes its supremacy. (Cf. the Greek treatise by Longinus, On the Sublime 7.3-4, for the classic formulation of this dictum.) As A. S. Cook said of the Bible, it possesses “a universality which has placed it at the foundation, or head, or both, of all modern literatures” (The Cambridge History of English Literature [1907], 4:31).

The thought forms of the Bible are different from those developed by Greek philosophy (esp. Aristotelianism), which have influenced civilization so profoundly. The biblical mode of thought is intuitive. It is more elemental than that of the Western world. By the same token it is more universal. For Scripture speaks directly to the human heart in the higher logic epitomized by Pascal’s aphorism, “The heart has its reasons, which reason does not know...It is the heart which experiences God, and not the reason” (Pensées, trans. W. F. Trotter [1931], nos. 277-78).

2. Sublimity. A second general characteristic of the Bible is its sublimity of thought and expression. Sublimity is a literary quality essential to ultimate greatness. No book reaches loftier heights than Scripture. Coleridge, the great poet and critic, said that “after reading Isaiah, or St. Paul’s Epistle to the Hebrews, Homer and Virgil are disgustingly tame to me, and Milton himself barely tolerable” (quoted by R. M. Frye, The Bible: Selections from the King James Version for Study as Literature [1965], xxxi). Were the Bible not preeminent in sublimity, it would be strange, for as Longinus said, “Sublimity is the echo of a great soul” (On the Sublime, 9.2), and the chief biblical authors like Moses, David, Isaiah, Jeremiah, John, and Paul were indeed “great souls.” And other biblical writers such as the minor prophet Habakkuk, the authors of certain non-Davidic psalms, and the author of Hebrews also attain sublimity. Indeed, this quality in Scripture is the echo not just of great human souls but of the Spirit of God.

3. Integrity. Integrity in its root sense of wholeness is a third general quality of the Bible. To speak of its literary integrity is another way of referring to the unique commitment of the Bible to TRUTH. Of all books it is the most truth-telling. Its portrayal of humanity is unsparingly honest. Frankness pervades it even to the extent of plain statement of the sins of its great characters like ABRAHAM (Gen. 20:1-18), MOSES (Num. 20:7-13), DAVID (2 Sam. 11:1—12:23), and PETER (Matt. 26:69-75). No other writing so searchingly probes the innermost motives of human conduct. (Cf. esp. Christ’s teaching in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT and in his parables.) In its manner of expression, Scripture, though varied, is never pretentious. And side by side with what PAUL called “the depths of God” (1 Cor. 2:10 NRSV) are passages of utmost directness of expression. The reason for this is the “high seriousness” of the biblical writers. Whatever else they were, these authors were in earnest. It is this earnestness that is so profoundly reflected in John Bunyan, that most biblical of writers, who said, “God did not play in convincing of me, the devil did not play in tempting of me...wherefore I may not play in my relating of them, but be plain and simple, and lay down the thing as it was” (preface to Grace Abounding, ed. R. Sharrock [1966], 3-4).

Truth in Scripture is not just a formal matter of correspondence with external reality. It is truth of heart and spirit as well as truth in fact. As The Jerusalem Bible says of the great verities that provide the foundation for the plan of salvation and that are set forth in the first eleven chapters of Genesis, “All these are truths which have their bearing upon theological doctrine and which are guaranteed by the authority of scripture; but they are also facts, and the certainty of the truths implies the reality of the facts” (“Introduction to the Pentateuch,” 9).

B. Specific literary forms and modes of expression. Ancient writings in general use picturesque speech—simile, metaphor, metonymy, hyperbole, acrostic, puns (and other kinds of humor), irony, satire, proverbs, etc. Literatures contemporaneous with the Bible contain lyric, didactic, liturgical, and dramatic poetry, epic, law, history, genealogy, biography, shorter narrative, prophecy, apocalypse, parable, sermon and other rhetorical discourse, and epistolary writing. Though the Bible uses such literary devices and forms, there is no reflection in it of a self-conscious “art for art’s sake” attitude. All is subservient to the main purpose of the writers in communicating truth about God and his ways with man. “Neither of the two collections of books that make up the Bible is arranged from the point of view of art, but from that of religious value; they are collections not of national belles-lettres but of Sacred Writings” (HDB, 4:3).

1. Some examples of biblical use of literary forms. Limitations of space prevent discussion of the many literary devices and forms mentioned above, certain of which are treated in separate articles. However, examples of some of the important literary forms are as follows: lyric poetry (Exod. 15:1-18; Jdg. 5; Isa. 5:1-7); many psalms that may be classed as devotional lyrics or hymns (e.g., Pss. 1; 19; 23; 46; 90; 139; and the SONG OF SOLOMON, which is also dramatic); dramatic poetry (JOB, Song of Solomon); liturgical poetry (Pss. 120—134); didactic poetry (Ps. 119; cf. also WISDOM Literature); epic (Gen. 1-11; 37-50; the epic form is not necessarily incompatible with historicity); law (Exod. 20-23; the book of LEVITICUS; other parts of the PENTATEUCH); history (SAMUEL, KINGS, CHRONICLES, ACTS OF THE APOSTLES); genealogy (1 Chr. 1:1—9:44; Matt. 1:1-17; Lk. 3:23-38); biography (1 Sam. 16:1—1 Ki. 2:11; also biographical passages in the NT); shorter narrative (RUTH, ESTHER); Wisdom Literature (PROVERBS, ECCLESIASTES); prophecy (ISAIAH, JEREMIAH, AMOS; Matt. 24); apocalypse (Dan. 7-12; ZECHARIAH; REVELATION, BOOK OF); parable (Ezek. 17:1—10; Lk. 15); sermonic and other rhetorical discourse (Deut. 1:1—4:40; Matt. 5-7; Acts 7); epistolary writing (ROMANS to JUDE; Acts 15:23-29).

2. The Bible's transcendence of literary forms. A second observation about the kinds of literature within Scripture is that although the biblical writers employed literary forms of their times, they not infrequently transcended them. Just as the NT writers deepened and enlarged the meaning of familiar words like “love,” “word,” “life,” and “grace,” so the authors of both OT and NT books brought special dimensions to their writing of history, poetry, drama, and other kinds of literature.

In much of its narration the Bible achieves a living presentation of reality and power of expression unsurpassed elsewhere. The story of JOSEPH (Genesis), that of SAMSON (Judges), the extended account of DAVID (1 and 2 Samuel) are of epic quality. Among shorter narratives, the intricate story of ESTHER, the idyl of RUTH, and the vividly terse book of JONAH reach perfection. Of the latter, the English novelist Charles Reade, author of The Cloister and the Hearth, said, “Jonah is the most beautiful story ever written in so small a compass. It contains 48 verses and 1,328 English words. One does not get far in an English novel of 1,328 words. There is growth of character, a distinct plot worked out without haste or crudity. Only a great artist could have hit upon a perfect proportion between dialogue and narrative” (quoted by C. A. Dinsmore, The English Bible as Literature [1931], 256). Even more remarkable for succinctness are the PARABLES of Christ, which bring profound truth to life in the plainest of words.

While poetic passages in the Bible follow the forms of its times (see HEBREW POETRY; POETRY, NEW TESTAMENT), it rises to a kind of universality no other poetry has achieved (e.g., Ps. 23; Isa. 40; and Paul's hymn of love in 1 Cor. 13). As for poetic drama, JOB, called by Tennyson “the greatest poem of ancient or modern times,” is preeminent in spiritual depth.

The opening of Genesis is not the only ancient COSMOGONY, yet in universal appeal and lasting relevance, it stands far above all others. PROPHETS and interpretations of DREAMS and visions were not peculiar to the Hebrew people, but no other nation had prophets of the order of ELIJAH and ELISHA, ISAIAH and JEREMIAH, and others. The concept of a God who cares so much for his people that he enters into personal dialogue with them in the “I-Thou” relationship set forth in both Testaments is distinctive. What R. G. Moulton aptly called “the prophetic rhapsody”—in which various literary forms are united as exalted communication between God and the prophet (or people)—mingles with lofty odes (e.g., Isa. 40-66; the book of Habakkuk), and has no real counterpart anywhere (Literary Study, 404-56).

As for the NT, here the epistolary form is lifted to new heights in books like ROMANS, EPHESIANS, and HEBREWS. Finally, APOCALYPTIC writing reaches its summit in the Apocalypse (see REVELATION, BOOK OF).

3. The Gospels—a unique literary genre. On a different level, however, from such instances in which the Bible transcends its literary forms are the NT GOSPELS. Here the message actually leads to a new and inimitable literary genre. Consider what the Gospels really are. In biographical material they are too incomplete to be classed as “lives” in the literary sense. Though their context and contents are certainly historical, they are more than history. To understand the special genre of a gospel, one must see the problem the four evangelists faced in dealing with the unparalleled event of the INCARNATION. How to tell the truth about Jesus the God-man in such a way as neither to slight his DEITY nor obscure his full humanity, and how at the same time to present him in living reality was their incredibly difficult task. That they solved it in the kind of memoir known as a NT gospel, and that they did this not once but four times while presenting in their own individual styles differing yet complementary portrayals of Jesus from the pages of which he stands out in his unique reality as the living Son of God—this is nothing less than a major literary miracle. As James Iverach said, to do this was “the greatest problem ever set to literature, and how the evangelists presented and solved it is found in the Gospels” (ISBE [1929], 2:1286).

Frye’s comment is also apposite: “This task [that of the evangelists in writing the Gospels] had at least one further implication of great literary importance: on the basis of the New Testament, we cannot ‘identify’ ourselves with Christ as in other literary works we can identify ourselves with, say, Macbeth or Cordelia—or even as we can identify with such other Biblical characters as Ruth and David, or Martha, Peter, and even Pilate. The inherent intent of the New Testament is to present Christ as sui generis, uniquely human and divine” (The Bible, 456). That the evangelists—and the other NT writers also—succeeded in this great purpose of presenting Christ “as sui generis, uniquely human and divine,” while indeed a literary miracle, is at the same time an unmistakable evidence of their divine inspiration.

C. Chapter and verse divisions. A major factor relating to understanding the literary forms of the Bible and thus linked to the comprehension of its contents is the way in which it has been and still is being printed. The chapter divisions, first made in the Latin and carried over into English versions, stem from Stephen Langton (d. 1228), or perhaps from Hugues de St. Cher (1262). The OT verse divisions are ancient, going back probably to the Masoretes (c. A.D. 500-1000; see MASORAH), and were used in the Latin translation of Pagninus (1528). The first English version to use them was the Geneva Bible (1560). The NT verse divisions first appeared in the Greek Testament of Robert Stephanus (1551 ed.), and their initial appearance in English was in 1557 in a NT translated by William Whittingham. (Cf. Josiah H. Penniman. A Book about the English Bible [1931], 370.)

While chapter and verse divisions are unquestionably essential for reference, the resulting sharp breaks in the Bible as commonly printed, except in the newer versions, have certainly been a hindrance to the general reader's understanding of its meaning. These divisions are by no means consistently logical and have therefore led to a kind of piecemeal reading of the Bible that has obscured both its precise meaning and its literary structure. Yet, an impressive indirect tribute to the unquenchable vitality of Scripture is its survival of the way it is commonly printed.

Detail of the Gutenberg Bible open to the beginning of the book of Daniel.

The manner in which newer versions minimize through skillful typography the prominence of chapter and verse divisions, while at the same time retaining them for reference, is an immense help to the reader. Again, the practice of older versions not to make any distinction between the printing of prose and poetry has placed the reader under a handicap. The differentiation in newer versions between prose and poetry, though not without problems, also contributes greatly to the understanding of Scripture.

D. The Bible as a translated book. Literary study of the Bible must take into account that for the vast majority of its readers, it is a translated book. Few books, however, are so translatable as the Bible. This is particularly true of the OT, the vocabulary of which is so concrete and elemental, and so much of which is poetical. That Hebrew poetry depends not on rhyme but on parallelism of thought is of much aid to the translation. "Versification of this kind has the advantage that it can, without much loss, be translated into any language" (Émile Legouis and Louis Cazamian, A History of English Literature [1929], 378). And the Koine (common dialect) in which the NT is written, with its colloquial flavor and at times, as in the Johannine writings, a Hebraic cast, also lends itself to translation (see GREEK LANGUAGE).

IV. The influence of the Bible

A. On the literature of the English-speaking people. No influence in literary history has been more pervasive than that of the Bible. Directly or indirectly, it has affected most world literatures, but in none is its influence deeper and more extensive than in that of the English-speaking people. Many translations, among them the fragmentary Anglo-Saxon versions (c. 8th to 10th centuries) and the Wycliffite versions (1380-88), those of Tyndale (1525-31) and Coverdale (1535), and the Geneva (1560) and Bishops' (1568) Bibles, contributed to this influence and led up to the KJV of 1611.

1. The King James Version. It is the KJV that is so inextricably woven into the fabric of English and American literature. Moreover, this version, by common critical consent the greatest English classic, has left its impress not just upon the literature but upon the ordinary language of the people. Everyday speech and writing are studded with echoes of its diction, such as "clear as crystal," "root of all evil," "arose as one man," "the fat of the land," "thorn in the flesh," and "a soft answer." All great writers in English—in fact, lesser writers also—have in some way been affected by it, and its influence lives on.

One reason for this lasting influence is the condition of the English language in the first decade of the 17th cent., when the KJV was translated. After the comparative sterility of the 15th cent., during which the transition from Middle English was going on, there was the glorious creative outburst of the Elizabethan period, when Shakespeare, Spenser, Jonson, and Donne were writing. The language of the KJV, which was made in the early years (1604-11) of the reign of James I, was that used by men like these. Still fresh and flexible, open to new impressions, it was remarkably fitted for the subtle work of translation. This was a time of great English translations—North's Plutarch, Florio's Montaigne, and Chapman's Homer, for example—and of these the KJV is the climax.

2. Newer versions. Though its influence lives on, the KJV no longer stands alone, because in recent times the outburst of English translations of the Bible has far exceeded even that of the years from Tyndale's NT (1525) to 1611. It is no disparagement of the KJV to point out that this host of newer translations follow the lead of Moffatt (NT, 1913; OT, 1924), Goodspeed (NT, 1923), and others earlier in the 20th cent. who deliberately worked outside the KJV tradition. This new development, in which Roman Catholics as well as Protestants are active, evidences the living influence of the Holy Scriptures. See VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE, ENGLISH.

B. On other literatures. The literary influence of the Bible, so marked among the English-speaking people, extends also to other literatures and people. The nature of that influence has been and still is governed by the quality of the translations and ecclesiastical attitudes toward freedom to read them.

Consider several examples. In Martin Luther's translation, the German-speaking people have a classic version comparable in greatness to the KJV. The influence of Luther's Bible on the German language and literature and indeed upon the whole people has been crucial. As Roland H. Bainton says, "Their language was so far fashioned by his hand that the extent of their indebtedness is difficult to recognize...And for sheer richness and exuberance of vocabulary and mastery of style he is to be compared only with Shakespeare" (Here I Stand: A Life of Martin Luther [1950], 384).

At the opposite pole is the Hispanic world. For the literature of both Spain and Latin America exhibits a great dearth of biblical influence—the result of ecclesiastical restrictions upon the translation, circulation, and reading of the Scriptures that have made a strong common version impossible. On the other hand, in the literatures of other traditionally Catholic countries, biblical influence, though less marked than in those of the predominantly Protestant countries, is much greater than in Hispanic literature. French literature, for instance, owes much to the profoundly biblical Pascal and reflects a less restrictive Catholicism than that of Spain and South America. To turn to Russian literature, there is a mystical and biblical strain (cf. Dostoevski and esp. Tolstoi), despite the absence of the central place of the Scriptures in Greek Orthodoxy.

C. The educating power of the Bible. An aspect of the continuing influence of the Bible that is in a different category from its effect upon great literature of the world is its educating power among illiterate peoples. The Scriptures are at the center of the missionary enterprise, and the history of missions is indissolubly united with Bible translation. When the pioneer missionary has gone to a primitive people and has reduced their language to writing, he or she has done so for the specific purpose of giving them the Bible in their own tongue. Thus the key to literacy and enlightenment has been placed, and continues to be placed, in the hands of multitudes who would otherwise have remained illiterate. The educational as well as spiritual implications of this are enormous—especially in view of the fact, as reported by the United Bible Societies, that by 1973 the whole Bible had been translated and published in 255 different languages and dialects and at least one book of the Bible had been translated and published in 1,500 languages and dialects. As of 2005, those figures had increased to over 420 for the complete Bible, and about 2,380 for at least some part of the Bible (out of approximately 6,500 languages spoken in the world today).

V. The phenomenon of biblical unity. Finally, no competent student of the Bible as literature can fail to be impressed by the phenomenon of its unity. That the sixty-six books comprising the two Testaments, and which were written by many authors over the period of nearly a millennium and a half, should be related together in living, organic unity, is a unique feature of the Bible. “One increasing purpose,” said A. S. Cook, “runs through the whole, and is reflected in the widening and deepening thought of its writers; yet it is a purpose which exists germinally at the beginning and unfolds like a bud. Thus, all the principal books are linked and even welded together, and to the common consciousness form, as it were, but a single book, rather to biblion than ta biblia” (The Cambridge History of English Literature, 4:29).

What is the “one increasing purpose” that, as Professor Cook said, “runs through the whole” and binds the more than sixty books from Genesis to Revelation in such astonishing unity? The Bible itself leaves no doubt that its unity is essentially Christological. What makes it one book is the unfolding of God’s sovereign purpose in JESUS CHRIST. From the protevangelium (Gen. 3:15), where he is seen at the dawn of history as the coming Deliverer, on through the OT presentation of him in type and prophecy as the MESSIAH, to his entrance into history as SON OF MAN and SON OF GOD, set forth in the Gospels, expounded in the Epistles, and revealed in his glorious, future manifestation in the Apocalypse, the Bible is centered in him.

What Paul said of Christ’s cosmic significance, that “in him all things hold together” (Col. 1:17), applies to Scripture as to all else. Moreover, it was validated by the risen Lord himself when, “beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, he explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself” (Lk. 24:27). The crowning literary characteristic of the Bible is its unity, and this points directly to its inspiration.

litter. This English term, in its meaning of an enclosed BED or COUCH used to carry a person, is used by some Bible versions to render the common Hebrew word mittâ H4753, “bed,” in Cant. 3:7 (NIV, “carriage”), and the rare term sāb H7369, “covered cart or wagon,” in Isa. 66:20 (NIV, “wagons”; this Heb. term is used in only one other passage, Num. 7:3). According to 2 Macc. 9:8, ANTIOCHUS was carried in a litter (Gk. phoreion) after he had fallen from his chariot and severely injured himself.

Little Apocalypse. A term applied sometimes to Isa. 24-27, but more frequently to Jesus’ eschatological discourse recorded in Mk. 13 and parallels. See ESCHATOLOGY III.B; JESUS CHRIST VI.B.2.

Lives of the Prophets. See PROPHETS, LIVES OF THE.

living creature. The usual translation of Hebrew nepeš hayyâ (H5883 plus the adjective hay H2645, thus “alive soul, alive being”) or simply the noun hayyâ H2651 (“animal”). In Genesis and Leviticus, it is a nontechnical expression referring to animals (Gen. 1:21 et al.; Lev. 11:10, 14; see ANIMAL; BEAST; FAUNA). By using it technically, Ezekiel referred to the CHERUBIM (Ezek. 1:5, 13-15, 19-22). The four living creatures in his vision each had four faces (man, lion, ox, eagle).

In the NT, the corresponding Greek term, zōon G2442 (“living being, animal”), refers simply to animals a few times (Heb. 13:11; 2 Pet. 2:12; Jude 10), but the special sense occurs only in Revelation, where it is applied to the four living creatures in the heavenly scene, always present in and around the throne of the Lamb (Rev. 4:6-9 et al.). Each had six wings (four in Ezekiel) and further differed from the OT description where the ox was replaced by an eagle, each creature having a single identity. The earliest interpretation was made by IRENAEUS (A.D. 170), who held that they represented four aspects of the work of Jesus, which in turn characterized in each instance one of the Gospels: the lion symbolized power (John); the calf as an animal of sacrifice symbolized priestly character (Luke); the man symbolized incarnation (Matthew); and the eagle symbolized the gift of the Holy Spirit (Mark). Subsequent interpretation most often has followed AUGUSTINE’S identification of Matthew’s gospel represented by the lion, Luke by the calf, Mark by the man, and John by the eagle.

Livy li’vee. Titus Livius was born in N Italy, probably in 59 B.C. Not much is known of his personal life, but at some point he went to ROME and was befriended by AUGUSTUS. Although he wrote some philosophical works, he is best known as the author of an extensive History of Rome (the actual title was Ab urbe condita libri, “Books from the Foundation of the City”). Only 35 of the original 142 books have survived, but summaries (Periochae) of the work were composed by later writers, and these have been preserved (other fragmentary remains are also available). Livy depended primarily on previous literary histories, a feature that lessens somewhat the value of his record, but he is our primary (sometimes the only) source for much important information, and his writing style is regarded highly. Livy died in the city of his birth, Patavium (Padua), in A.D. 17 (according to some, A.D. 12). (See further P. G. Walsh, Livy: His Historical Aims and Methods [1961]; T. J. Luce, Livy: The Composition of His History [1977]; C. S. Kraus, Latin Historians [1997]; J. D. Chaplin, Livy’s Exemplary History [2000]; J. P. Davies, Rome’s Religious History: Livy, Tacitus and Ammianus on Their Gods [2004].)

lizard. A general term for reptiles (cold-blooded vertebrates) of various kinds other than snakes. Palestine has many lizards and they are the most conspicuous vertebrates other than birds. Some forty species have been identified, from the desert or land monitor, which reaches a length of over 4 ft., down to species of about 2 in., and they belong to a number of different families. Most languages commonly have at least one general name for such a group, and this is known by most people; also individual names for conspicuous or important genera or species, but these are less widely known.

Six of the eight Hebrew words in the list of unclean animals “that move about on the ground” (Lev. 11:29-30) are generally thought to refer to lizards. Since each of these terms occurs only once, some scholars believe it is not possible to identify the species referred to (cf. FFB, 52). Several comments may be made, however. The first item, sab H7370 (NIV and NRSV, “great lizard”) is not unlike Arabic ʿabb, the name given to spiny-tailed lizards of genus Uromastix that are eaten by BEDOUINS. These reach a length of well over 1 ft. and are heavily built; they live in all types of desert and are partly vegetarian. The second term, ʾānāqâ H652, is identical in form to a Hebrew word meaning “groan,” and this connection has led many scholars to identify this creature as the gecko (Hemidactylus turcicus), the only lizard that makes a vocal sound; it is commonly found in houses in Palestine (see FFB, 34-35).

Grey lizard from Israel.

A third term, kōah H3947, derives from a root meaning “strength”; the expression “land crocodile” (cf. NRSV) is meaningless, unless it refers to the land monitor (cf. NIV, “monitor lizard”; the Vulgate stellio is interesting in that the most common large lizard in Palestine, seen on roadsides and old ruins, has the Latin name Agamastellio). The fourth word, lēṭṭā H4321, has been variously understood as referring to the gecko (HALOT, 2:528) or the wall lizard (NIV), or as a general label (cf. NRSV). Also difficult is ḥōrneṭ H2793, often thought to be the skink (NIV), also known as the sand lizard (NRSV), which has a cylindrical body and small legs. The last item is tinšemet H9491, generally identified as the CHAMELEON (the same word form is used in Lev. 11:18 and Deut. 14:16 of a bird, probably some kind of OWL).

An additional term, īēmāmīt H8532, occurs in Prov. 20:38 and is translated “lizard” in most modern versions (though the KJV rendering “spider” has been supported by some scholars). Because the text says that this creature “can be caught with the hand,” some think it refers to the gecko. If the above suggestions are correct, this list covers most of the major families of Palestine lizards, but it must be emphasized that they are largely conjectural. (See H. B. Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible, 9th ed. [1898], ch. 9.)

loaf. See BREAD.

Lo-Ammi loh-am'i (לֹא אִמִּי H4204, “not my people”). Also Lo-ammi. A symbolical name given by the prophet HOSEA to his second son and third child by his wife GOMER (Hos. 1:9). His firstborn son was called Jezreel, which means “Yahweh sows,” an allusion to scattering or destruction (vv. 4-5); see JEZREEL (PERSON) #2. A previous daughter was given the name LO-RUHAMAH, meaning “not pitied/loved” (v. 6). The names given to the children were symbolic of the fact that Israel, because of its disobedience, had forfeited the compassion and protection of Yahweh. Nevertheless, the passage immediately promises a reversal of this judgment: “Yet the Israelites will be like the sand on the seashore, which cannot be measured or counted. In the place where it was said to them, ‘You are not my people,’ they will be called ‘sons of the living God’” (1:10 [Heb. 2:1]). And again, “Say of your brothers, ‘My people,’ and of your sisters, ‘My loved one’” (2:1 [Heb. 2:3]).

loan. See BORROW, LEND.

lock. In the sense of a device for securing doors, see BOLT; DOOR. In the sense of a length of hair, see BRAID; HAIR.

locust. This term is applied to a large number of grasshopper species that often migrate in immense swarms, destroying vegetation and crops.

I. Difficulty of identifying species. The Greek term for locust is akris G210 (from which the insect’s family name, Acrididae, is derived). The most common Hebrew term is ’arbeh H746, which is used, for example, of the eighth plague in Egypt (Exod. 10:4 et al.), but at least eight other Hebrew words are rendered “locust” or “grasshopper” in one or more English versions. This rich vocabulary is evidence of the importance of these insects in the life of the Israelites.

There is little uniformity of translation among the English versions, and in some cases even within the same version. The terms are found in many different books and contexts, yet these provide almost no information. One possible exception is hāgāb H2506, which is used three times as a measure of smallness (e.g., Num. 13:33, “we seemed like grasshoppers”), once described as good for food, and only once as a potential danger to crops (2 Chr. 7:13). This could thus be a smaller grasshopper, perhaps nongregarious, of which there are many species (though some have suggested that the root from which the word is derived may indicate a swarming species). SOLOMON refers to the extraordinary coordinated mass movements of swarming locusts (Prov. 30:27), which is almost the only direct biblical comment on their biology and habits.

II. Are the Hebrew names species or phases? Four insects are listed in Lev. 11:22: ’arbeh H746 (“locust”), sol’ām H6155 (NIV, “katydid”; NRSV, “bald locust”), hargōl H3005 (usually rendered “cricket”), and hāgāb H2506 (usually rendered “grasshopper”); they may represent separate species. From the striking description of the locust plagues in Joel 1:4, it seems at first that an additional three different insects are mentioned: gāzām H1612 (NRSV, “cutting locust”; NJPS, “cutter”), yeleq H3540 (NRSV, “hopping locust”; NJPS, “grub”), and hāsîl H2885 (NRSV, “destroying locust”; NJPS, “hopper”); but it is equally probable that these are all names for various phases of the migratory locust (cf. NIV, “great locusts...young locusts...other locusts”). Two other terms, both used collectively for swarms of locusts, are gōbay H1479 (Amos 7:1; Nah. 3:17) and sēlāsāl H7526 (Deut. 28:42, perhaps cicadas or crickets).

Most of these Hebrew words may refer to the various attributes of locusts and may therefore be virtually synonymous. A similar usage is common today in some countries (e.g., in Ghana a ground squirrel can be a serious farm pest and is also eagerly killed for food; it has a precise name in each language, but is more often referred to as traveler, road-crosser, peanut thief, etc.). If such is true generally of “locust” in the Scriptures, there is no point in trying to identify words that may be largely nicknames.

III. Description of locust family. In Europe locusts are often the larger members of the family and grasshoppers the smaller, but the criterion is sometimes that locusts swarm and migrate, while grasshoppers are more or less solitary. In America the connotation is different and the words are nearly interchangeable; even cicadas, of another insect order, may be called locusts. The name strictly belongs to a number of large insects of the family Acrididae (Greek akris) of the order Orthoptera (straight-winged).

The main characteristic of locusts is that from time to time they multiply at a frightening rate and move in huge swarms, often over great distances. Their antennae are short and the female has a short, stubby ovipositor. Locusts are entirely vegetarian, which is a reason they were allowed the Israelites as food, and they eat a wide range of green stuff. Much research work has been done on this major pest, and it is now known that all locusts exist in two phases, solitary and gregarious, with intermediate forms. These differ in appearance, and within each phase there is variation in color, size, and proportions. Swarming is in part a physiological response to conditions and is a way of colonizing new areas.

IV. Species now found in Palestine. The migratory locust (Locusta migratoria), in many races, is found in most warm parts of the world except America. The other two likely to do damage in Palestine are the desert locust (Schistocerca gregaria) and the Moroccan locust (Dociostaurus maroccanus). Eggs are laid in small packets near the surface of the soil; hatching sometimes depends on moisture, and the eggs of some species, such as the South African brown locust, can survive for three and one half years in dry ground, but hatch in ten days if the soil is damp. The young that emerge have the same general shape as adults, but no wings, and they pass through five or six molts, growing larger after each and gradually acquiring wings. The narrow forewings are like parchment, while the hind-wings, which are folded like a fan when at rest, are broad and membranous, sometimes with a color pattern.

V. Locust control. In their early stages locusts move only by crawling or hopping, being known as hoppers. These are less mobile and thus easier to destroy, and control organizations aim at forecasting swarm formation and movement in order to eliminate them. Many swarms fly out to sea or into true desert and so destroy themselves. Numbers can be astronomical; a desert locust swarm that crossed the Red Sea in 1889 was estimated to cover 2,000 sq. mi. Such swarms are like dark clouds and contain countless millions. Wind is the main factor in determining the direction taken by a swarm. Locusts usually approach Palestine from the Arabian deserts to the SE, but they may also come from other directions. Locusts have always been a scourge, especially in the Middle E, but modern materials, and communications based on a degree of cooperation rare in that area, have greatly reduced the damage done annually.

VI. Locusts in the Bible. Locusts appear mainly in three settings.

A. *The eighth plague. The rendering “locust” is amply confirmed by the details in the narrative (Exod. 10): the complete stripping of all crops and green stuff; swarms dense enough to hide the sun; their arrival with the east wind (10:13) and then being carried away by a “very strong west wind” (10:19). Some see the locusts as part of a logical sequence, for the unusually heavy winds that began the series would create conditions likely to cause mass breeding and swarm formation. The divine element is seen in the complete control of the situation, with the swarms coming and going according to God’s will. It is ironic that the cause of this devastating plague, with its long-lasting effects, should also have been a useful source of food to the Israelites on their desert journey.

B. *Locust as a destroyer. From antiquity the locust has been almost synonymous with destruction. Joel 2:25 KJV, “the years that the locust hath eaten,” is now a proverb. Soon after the Bible was translated into English by Tyndale (1546), a greedy, devouring man was known as a locust. To the inhabitants of Palestine and many lands to the NE, locust swarms were classed with drought and pestilence as utter calamities against which they could do nothing. It is not surprising that on nearly half the occasions where the words are used, it is in this connection. Many commentators see in Joel 1 the accurate description of an actual plague, but some take it as largely figurative. In at least three cases, apart from the plague, locusts are sent or threatened by God as a direct punishment for wrongdoing. In a list of the curses that will result from disobedience in Canaan, we read, “Swarms of locusts will take over all your trees and the crops of your land” (Deut. 28:42; see also 2 Chr. 7:13; Amos 5:9).

C. *Locust as food permitted to Hebrews. The regulations about food in Mosaic law were not arbitrary rules such as one finds in food taboos among primitive tribes today, but divinely inspired keys for easy recognition of safe and harmful kinds. Where distinction was hard, the good was forbidden along with the bad, as in Lev. 11:20: “All flying insects that walk on all fours are to be detestable to you.” These would include beetles, cockroaches, crickets, etc., many of which feed on or live among carrion and domestic rubbish and are therefore liable to transmit filth diseases. All these must be avoided. Insects are, of course, six-legged, and “all fours” must be here regarded as a technical term for creeping or running as opposed to jumping, which characterizes the grasshopper tribe. So v. 21, “There are, however, some winged creatures that walk on all fours that you may eat: those that have jointed legs for hopping on the ground” (the hind pair of legs is greatly enlarged, and when at rest they reach far above the body).

VII. Value of locusts as human food. Except for termites in some areas, locusts are more important than any other insect as a source of food, and they have been used as such since antiquity. Stone carvings in the palace of ASHURBANIPAL (8th cent. B.C.) show locusts on sticks being carried to a royal banquet. Diodorus of Sicily (2nd cent. B.C.), among other Greek historians, refers to acridiphagi, or locust-eaters, of Ethiopia (Bibl. Hist. 3.2). Locusts are permitted food for Muslims, and tradition has it that Muhammad himself used to eat them. Some African tribes still largely depend on locusts for their protein for much of the year; after eating as many as possible roasted and boiled, they preserve large quantities by drying or grinding into flour.

Until recent years, the nomads of Algeria tried to store about 450 lbs. per tent. The recent influx of oil wealth into N Africa and other Arab lands has changed many old habits, but in poorer areas locusts are still a welcome and valuable addition to an often marginal diet. It is not stated directly that the Israelites ate locusts in the desert, but this can reasonably be assumed. The food laws were first given at Sinai, early in the journey, and, as for locusts, this permission probably codified a practice of long standing. Their routes must have crossed the lines taken by many swarms, and though the desert would offer no green food at most seasons, locusts cannot fly indefinitely and would be compelled to land at intervals, thus coming within reach of the travelers.

Locusts are a useful source of protein, fat, and calories; they also have a fair amount of mineral salts, but are not rich in vitamins. Dried locusts contain more than 50 percent protein and a variable amount of fat—up to 20 percent. When JOHN THE BAPTIST lived on “locusts and wild honey” (Matt. 3:4), he was enjoying a crude but fairly balanced diet; the honey would be basically sugar, but with some pollen and perhaps bee grubs as well, which would increase the protein content. (See H. B. Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible, 9th ed. [1898], 306-18; F. S. Bodenheimer, Insects as Human Food [1951]; FFB, 53-54; ABD, 6:1150.)

Lod, Lydda lod, lid'uh (𐤋𐤕 H4254; Ἀδδδα G3375 [LXX, Λοδ]). A town said to have been built, along with ONO, by a Benjamite named SHEMED (1 Chr. 8:12); it is listed with Ono and HADID among the towns to which the Jews returned after the EXILE (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:35). Its earliest mention is in the annals of the Asiatic towns and possessions held by Egypt from the time of THUTMOSE III (1502-1448 B.C.). These lists appear on the wall of the Amon temple at Karnak. Lod must have been in the area assigned to the tribe of BENJAMIN after the conquest, but it is not specifically mentioned in the Pentateuch or in the records of the conquest or the judges.

Lod is identified with modern el-Ludd, some 11 mi. SE of JOPPA. Its strategic position—on the two highways that led from Egypt to Babylon and from Joppa to Jerusalem—made it a prize of war throughout the centuries. In the Hellenistic period it came to be known as Lydda. During the era of Syrian rule it was part of SAMARIA, and it is mentioned a number of times by JOSEPHUS, who states that Julius CAESAR granted the town to the Jews and to the heirs of John Hyrcanus (Ant. 14.10.6 §208; see HASMONEAN). During the period of political instability after Caesar's assassination, when Octavius and Antony were struggling for supremacy of the empire (36-31 B.C.), Antigonus, an Asiatic ally of Antony, quartered his troops in Lydda. By the close of the 1st cent. B.C., Lydda had grown to be a fair-sized town. Josephus reports that the Roman governor of SYRIA, Quadratus, traveled to Lydda to mediate the war then raging between the Jews and the Samaritans. He found Lydda, "a village that was in size not inferior to a city" (20.6.2 §130, LCL trans.). PETER cured a man with palsy there (Acts 9:32-35, the only NT reference to the town).

The earliest mention of Lydda occurs on the wall of the Temple of Amon at Karnak (15th cent. B.C.).

After the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, it became a center of Christian activity in N Palestine. It had been a center of rabbinic studies for a period even before the Roman overthrow of the rebellion. The town became known as Diospolis by the 3rd Christian cent. and was the center of a trade in purple dye. It was the site of the death of St. George, who was martyred there in 303. During the 4th cent. it was the episcopal seat of the Syrian church, and it served as the meeting place of the council that tried Pelagius for heresy in 415. The story of St. George so fascinated King Richard of England when he traveled there during the Third Crusade that George was ultimately made patron saint of England by edict of King Edward III. During the Renaissance and early modern period it was an Arab town, but has passed into the state of Israel. It is presently called Lod in Hebrew, but nearby its name is attached to the giant Lydda Airport so that again it serves travelers between E and W as in the days of Thutmose III. (See NEAEHL, 3:917.)

Lo Debar loh-dee'buhr (לוֹ דְבָרַי H4274 [2 Sam. 9:4-5], לֹא דְבָרַי H4203 [2 Sam. 17:27], לֹא דְבָרַי H4203 [Amos 6:13], by popular etymology, "nothing"). Also Lo-debar. A town or city-state in TRANSJORDAN that was the home of MAKIR son of Ammiel (2 Sam. 9:4-5; 17:27). JONATHAN's lame son, MEPHIBOSHETH, lived in Makir's house, and from that place DAVID summoned him to the palace (9:1-13). AMOS plays on the sound of the name Lo Debar (suggesting "nothingness") when he says, "But you have turned justice into poison / and the fruit of righteousness into bitterness—/ you who rejoice in the conquest of Lo Debar / and say, 'Did we not take Karnaim by our own strength?'" (Amos 6:13). The conquest of the city, likely a place of pagan sacrifice and heathen idolatry, was apparently a subject of great satisfaction to the corrupt Israelite monarchy. On the basis of this passage, it is thought that Lo Debar (perhaps a vassal state under David) was lost in the Israelite wars with the Arameans and regained under JEROBOAM II (see also KARNAIM).

Some scholars think its original name was Lidbir (Lidebir), which may have been a town on the N boundary of the tribe of GAD in GILEAD (Josh. 19:26 NJPS; cf. NRSV mg.). See DEBIR (PLACE) #3. In any case, the location of Lo Debar is uncertain. It is often identified with Umm ed-Dabar, some 10 mi. SSE of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee. Others argue that the site should be sought N of the YARMUK River, which served as the boundary of GILEAD; if so, a likely candidate is Tell Dober, less than 2 mi. S of the Sea of Galilee (cf. ABD, 4:345-46).

lodge. This English verb is used often by the KJV, mainly as the rendering of Hebrew lîn H4328, "remain [through the night]" (Gen. 24:23 et al.), and Greek aulizomai G887, "to lie in the courtyard, to pass the night" (Matt. 21:17 et al.). The term is found less frequently in modern versions, which prefer such expressions as “stay” and “spend the night.” As a noun, “lodge” occurs in the KJV as the rendering of mēlûnâ H4870 (Isa. 1:8; NIV, “hut”; NRSV, “shelter”).

log. A Hebrew term used of the smallest liquid measure of capacity, about two-thirds of a pint. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES III.A.3.

logia loh’jee-ah. The Greek term logia (pl. of logion G3359) is used in nonbiblical literature for the utterances of deities. Such usage is also found in the SEPTUAGINT (e.g., Ps. 12:6 [Heb. 12:7, LXX 11:7] for Heb. ʾimtrâ H614) and occasionally in the NT (Acts 7:38; Rom. 3:2; cf. Heb. 5:13; 1 Pet. 4:11). In the church fathers the term begins to be used for the sayings of Jesus (e.g., POLYCARP, Philippians 7.1) and in the present day is generally restricted to this usage.

However, the use of the term by PAPIAS (as quoted by EUSEBIUS, Hist. Eccl. 3.39.16) has been the subject of extensive discussion. Papias reports that Matthew compiled the Logia in the Hebrew dialect (Hebraidi dialektō ta logia synetachato). It seems that this term as used by Papias included some narrative material in addition to sayings of Jesus proper. Similarly, the content of “Q” (the material common to Matthew and Luke) apparently included narrative material and sayings—although it may have been an oral tradition rather than a written one. See GOSPELS III.B.1.

The existence and circulation of collections of Logia or sayings may be the source of possibly two AGRAPHAS (sayings ascribed to Jesus in the NT, but not found in the Gospels)—Acts 20:35 and 1 Thess. 4:16-17. Luke may also have used such collections in his research in the preparation of his gospel (Lk. 1:1—3).

In modern times, actual collections of sayings dating from the early church have been discovered. Near the end of the 19th cent., B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt began uncovering a vast collection of Greek papyri (see PAPYRUS) near ancient OXYRHYNCHUS on the NILE in Egypt. One of the first fragments found contained seven sayings of Jesus. This fragment is page 11 of a book and thus seems to be a part of a large collection of sayings. The document (POxy 1) is to be dated not later than about the middle of the 3rd cent., and the collection undoubtedly goes back at least to the 2nd cent. Each saying is introduced by the words, “Jesus says.” In 1903 two more Greek papyri containing sayings ascribed to Jesus were found (POxy 654 and 655), also dating from the 3rd cent. Some of the sayings are found in the canonical Gospels, others only in the church fathers, and others were unknown prior to the discovery.

Included in the phenomenal discovery of Gnostic papyri in 1945 near modern NAG HAMMADI were two documents entitled Gospel of Thomas and Gospel of Philip. These are collections of sayings of Jesus in Coptic. The Gospel of Thomas contains 114 sayings and appears to be a 4th or 5th cent. Coptic version of a Greek original of about the middle of the 2nd cent. Strikingly close or substantial parallels to the sayings in the three Oxyrhynchus Papyri are found in the Gospel of Thomas. In comparison with the canonical sayings, this book shows some of the heretical tendencies of the Gnostic community where it circulated. The Gospel of Philip, a collection of 127 sayings purported to be revelations imparted by Jesus to a group (Hebrews) including Philip and dated about A.D. 400, is more heretical and esoteric than the Gospel of Thomas.

These discoveries reflect the early church’s interest in the Logia of Jesus. That the early Christians thought it was appropriate to edit and interpret these dominical sayings is already evident in the way Jesus’ teaching is reported in the inspired, canonical Gospels. In addition, there is the problem of translation from Aramaic to Greek in some cases. Nevertheless, although the identification of the ipsissima verba of Jesus (the exact words he spoke) is often doubtful, the canonical Gospels certainly contain the ipsissima vox (the very voice) of Jesus; that is, they faithfully transmit the Lord's teaching (cf. J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, Part One: The Proclamation of Jesus [1971], 29—37). See also APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT I; Gnosticism; Jesus Christ IV.E; Philip, Gospel of; Thomas, Gospel of.

Logos loh'gohs. A transliteration of the Greek term logos G3364, which has a wide range of meanings, including “word, statement, conversation, speech,” as well as “thought, opinion, reason,” etc. In the Johannine writings, the term occasionally has a special Christological significance (e.g., Jn. 1:1-3, 14; 1 Jn. 1:1; Rev. 19:13).

I. In Greek literature

A. Classical writers. The term logos appears in Homer (Iliad 15.393) and Hesiod only in a nontechnical sense. Heraclitus of Ephesus (c. 500 B.C.) was among the first to use it in a distinctive philosophical sense. To Heraclitus the Logos is the continuum in an ever-changing cycle of renewal, the divine soul of the world. In a universe of flux the one stable factor is the Logos. In his thought, “all human laws are nourished by the divine law. Though this Word (Logos)—this fundamental law—existeth from all time, yet mankind are unaware of it” (“Fragment,” 94). There was in Heraclitus no concept of a transcendent God; only an immanent “law” or “reason” in the world, the Logos. He recognized, however, that the world is a unity and that basic to all human institutions is a spiritual, all-pervasive principle with which they must deal.

Anaxagoras placed greater stress on the Creator's transcendence and thought of the Logos as intermediary between God and creation, the regulative principle in the cosmos, thus anticipating the Stoics. Plato made little direct contribution to the concept, but his doctrine of Ideas lent itself to later refinements of the doctrine. Platonic DUALISM, with its contrast between the ideal and the expression of the idea in a phenomenal world, has a parallel with thought and its verbalization which is the central idea in Logos. Also the world-soul which the Creator imparted to the cosmos (Timaeus 34) reappears in Jewish and Christian literatures of the early centuries (e.g., Wisdom of Solomon; Epistle of Diognetus). Aristotle reacted against Plato's dualism by stressing a monistic view of the universe, the transcendence of God and his noninvolvement in human affairs.

B. The Stoics. The STOICS, led by Zeno (c. 300 B.C.), revived the tenets of Heraclitus, especially the idea that the basic element in the cosmos is fire, or “seminal reason” (logos spermatikos), manifest in all of nature. They believed that Heraclitus and Socrates were “saved” because they adhered to this concept. Later Stoics distinguished between this germinal logos, the source of ideas, and its uttered expression (logos prophorikos), but agreed that the two are essentially one. Men, they said, participate in each other because of common participation in the common Logos. In the words of a later thinker, the “Logos is the soul of the world, it pervades the universe as honey fills the honey comb, and links time with eternity” (Cicero, De natura deorum 2.20).

The early Stoics believed the Logos to be an all-permeating fiery vapor, materialistic in nature. The later Stoics often resorted to allegorization, such as interpreting HERMES, messenger of the gods, as the Logos. But their Logos was a pantheistic world-soul, a materialistic abstraction rather than a hypostasis, hence had little in common with the biblical usage of the term. It did, however, help prepare the world for Christianity by its emphasis on the importance of the individual and the basic unity of all mankind, a variety in unity. It helped thoughtful persons to distinguish habitually between thought and the expression of thought in words. Most of all, it helped prepare the Greek world for the acceptance of a mediator between God and man. It also provided Christians with a means of explaining divine revelation via a unique Son.

II. In Jewish authors

A. The OT background. The Hebrew term behind the SEPTUAGINT was usually dābār H1821, “word.” Often it appears in the expression “the word of God.” In the CREATION story (Gen. 1), God spoke and the world came into existence as a result. “By the word of the LORD were the heavens made” (Ps. 33:6). The word alone was the effective agent in creation: “For he spoke, and it came to be; / he commanded, and it stood firm” (33:9). Sometimes the word was regarded as possessing an entity and intrinsic authority apart from its source. Thus, ISAAC could not reverse his blessing of the FIRSTBORN, even though based on a misunderstanding (Gen. 27:37). In the same genre, perhaps, was the “law of the Medes and the Persians,” which could not be altered, once it was uttered or written (Esth. 8:8).

The same term, dābār, was used to express the manner in which God’s PROVIDENCE sustains the universe after its creation. In Pss. 147:18 (“He sends his word, and melts them”) and 148:8 (“lightning and hail, snow and clouds, / stormy winds that do his bidding”) the immanent word of God is seen as controlling nature. “His word,” says the psalmist, “runs swiftly,” both in nature and in the realm of moral law (147:15, 19). Sometimes the word was regarded as quasi-personal in nature: “so is my word that goes out from my mouth: / It will not return to me empty” (Isa. 55:11). God’s word can also be a means of condemnation (Hos. 6:5) or of deliverance (Ps. 107:20).

The kinship between word and SPIRIT is indicated in Ps. 33:6, where the parallelism states, “By the word of the LORD were the heavens made, / their starry host by the breath [rûah H8120] of his mouth,” a passage prized by early defenders of Trinitarian doctrine. The kinship between deed, word, breath, and Spirit is obvious: the deed is the result of the word, the spoken word requires breath, and the same Hebrew term lies behind both “breath” and “Spirit.” God’s word in Hebrew thought was more than an expression of his thought; it was also an expression of his will in nature, in human life, and in history.

Preeminently, however, the “word of God” in the OT is a means of divine REVELATION. This is particularly true of the prophetic literature. Prior to the kingdom period, divine revelation was regarded as conveyed by DREAMS, by sacred LOTS (interpreted by the priest), and by the lawgiver. In the postexilic period APOCALYPTIC vision was a common mode of revelation. In the kingdom period the more prevalent mode of divine self-disclosure was by “the word of the LORD” (Amos 7:16).

God “sent a message [dābār] against Jacob” (Isa. 9:8) as a means of divine revelation through his prophets. The initiation of this phase of divine revelation was via SAMUEL, so much so that he was recognized as Yahweh’s official spokesman (1 Sam. 3:1—4:1). For the Major Prophets this word or audition was almost irresistible; in the words of Jeremiah, it was like “a fire shut up in my bones. I am weary of holding it in” (Jer. 20:9; cf. Ezek. 33:7; Amos 3:8; Mic. 3:8). The audition (“word of God”) was often equated with “vision” (cf. 1 Sam. 3:1; Isa. 1:1).

In the Major Prophets the “word of God” was the oracular disclosure of the mind of Yahweh. Later God’s word was the equivalent of God’s total revelation, the TORAH. It was a self-contained body of instruction, a way of life. “Your word,” said the psalmist, “is a lamp to my feet” (Ps. 119:105); by it the young man would be able to “keep his way pure” (119:9). God’s word in such contexts is the equivalent of God’s LAW; it is parallel with and yet in contrast to the Logos of Jn. 1:17.

B. Wisdom Literature. Closely related to the concept of the word is that of WISDOM (hokmā H2683), which is a form of divine revelation, often elusive (Job 28) and always invaluable. It comes not as a result of human achievement, but always as a gratuitous self-disclosure of God (28:12-28); it is a gift of grace (Dan. 2:21). It was given to craftsmen as manual skill for fabricating the TABERNACLE (Exod. 36:1); to JOSHUA was given “the spirit of wisdom” as essential to leadership (Deut. 34:9).

Best representative of this gift was SOLOMON, who was commended and rewarded because of his discriminating preference for wisdom as a means of service. This laid the foundation for the third most important portion of the OT, the Wisdom Literature. The sopherim (SCRIBES) and wise men came to be the most highly esteemed type of leadership in the nation. While Solomon was the most famous of them, the pioneer seems to have been AHITHOPHEL, a man whose judgment was considered on a par with the disclosures of prophet or priest (2 Sam. 16:23). In the book of Proverbs wisdom is the cardinal virtue, the possession of which assures God’s favor.

Wisdom was sometimes personified. In what is probably the closest literary approximation to the prologue of John’s gospel, wisdom appears in the role of a young woman, entreating young men, in competition with a prostitute (Prov. 1:20; 5:3; 7:10; 8:1-3; 9:4). Wisdom is personified as eternally existent and as sharing in the work of creation (Prov. 8:22-31; cf. Jn. 1:3; 5:17; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2). Another eloquent personification of wisdom is attributed to Jesus ben Sirach (c. 180 B.C.; see ECCLESIASTICUS). Probably under the influence of Prov. 8, he wrote of Wisdom, “I came forth from the mouth of the Most High, and covered the earth like a mist...Those who eat me will hunger for more, and those who drink me will thirst for more.

The Wisdom of Solomon (1715 ed.). The author of this apocryphal book artfully brings together the notions of Logos and wisdom.

Whoever obeys me will not be put to shame” (Sir. 24:3, 21-22; cf. Jn. 4:14; 6:35; 7:16; 17:8; Rom. 10:11).

In what is sometimes considered the first important attempt to achieve a synthesis between the Hebrew and Greek emphases, the author of the WISDOM OF SOLOMON (c. 100 B.C.?) thinks of wisdom as personalized. Wisdom is conceived as the quasi-personal agent in creation—“by your wisdom [you] have formed man” (Wisd. 9:2). The similarity and the contrast to the Johannine prologue are apparent in one notable passage, “your all-powerful word leaped from heaven, from the royal throne, into the midst of the land that was doomed, a stern warrior carrying the sharp sword of your authentic command” (Wisd. 18:15-16). The parallel is not with the incarnate word of Jn. 1:14 but rather with the conquering Word of Rev. 19:13. In this writer the Logos and Wisdom are personalized and are practically identical. Wisdom, like the “advocate” of 1 Jn. 2:1, is the believer’s guide, defender, and deliverer. In alluding to JOSEPH the writer says, “When a righteous man was sold, wisdom did not desert him, but delivered him from sin” (Wisd. 10:13; cf. Gen. 39:10-15; Isa. 63:9; 1 Cor. 10:4).

The re-creating energy of the immanent Word-Wisdom is eloquently set forth by this author. “Wisdom,” he says, “penetrates all things. For she is the breath of the power of God...in every generation she passes into holy souls and makes them friends of God” (Wisd. 7:24-27). Wisdom is described as God’s breath, emanation, reflection, mirror, and image (7:25-26; cf. Col. 1:15; Heb.

1:3). While this author comes closer than his predecessors to a personification of the Logos, he does not place God so far above the earth that no direct connection is possible. Because the God of the Bible is a living God, not the static deity of the Greek philosophers, there was no need of a second God to mediate between Creator and creature. Communication was by the Word.

By some writers the rabbinic concept of the word (Aram. mêmrā<sup>1</sup>, from mêmar) is viewed as the equivalent of the Logos. In the TARGUMS, the Memra was viewed as the intercessor before God and as the helper of the righteous. However, as G. F. Moore (in HTR 15 [1922]: 41-59) points out, Memra is a buffer word, not a mediating idea or person. It seems unlikely, therefore, that this term was any influence on Johannine usage of the term Logos.

C. Philo of Alexandria. The Hebraic and Hellenic concepts converged in PHILO JUDAEUS, the Jewish philosopher of ALEXANDRIA at the time of Christ. In Philo's voluminous writings may be traced the Greek emphasis on the Logos as reason and the Hebrew emphasis on communication by word and deed. Philo fused the all-pervasive energy stressed by Heraclitus, the metaphysical dualism of Plato, the transcendental monism of Aristotle, and the individualism characteristic of the Stoics. For him the Logos was common to these traditions and also to the OT. Under a great variety of titles, this impersonal Logos served an intermediate functionary between the remote God and the material universe.

Influenced by the Platonic doctrine of ideas, Philo spoke of the Logos as the realm of idea or pattern, yet his Hebrew heritage helped him see the Logos as also the embodiment or expression of the ideal. He speaks of the Logos as God's "firstborn son" and "ambassador" and as high priest. Common to all these various facets of the concept in Philo is the role of the Logos as intermediary between God and the world. This same emphasis on the transcendence of God and the nature of matter as evil reappeared, decades after Philo, in the various Gnostic systems of the 2nd cent. A.D. Philo differentiated between the logos endiathetos (ideas in God and reason in man) and logos prophorikos (the ideas projected in speech), as did the Stoics before him. The apparent complexity of the cosmos is therefore unified by the Logos or reason behind the phenomena. Like the Stoics and other Greeks, Philo would have recoiled at the idea of the Logos becoming incarnate; his Logos was a personification, never a person as in John. (The concept of word is not prominent in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS.)

III. NT usage

A. Synoptic Gospels and Acts. The seed in the parable of the soils is identified as the logos, "word" (Mk. 4:14)—in this instance the preaching of Jesus or the proclamation of God's truth (cf. Jn. 17:8). This is in harmony with the prevailing OT view that the word of God is the preaching of the prophets. It is also the revelation of the gospel of the Son of God; this word is the good news concerning Christ (Matt. 13:19, 21-23; Mk. 2:2; 4:14, 33; Lk. 5:1; 11:28; Acts 10:36), which includes also the preaching of the apostles (Acts 4:1-2, 29, 31; 6:2, 4, 7; 8:4, 14, 25; 10:36, 44; 11:1, 19). The term appears in Mk. 8:32, where after Peter's confession of faith Jesus began a new phase of his instruction, that of his approaching decease, and spoke the logos openly. The significance is that the word of the gospel culminates in the death and the resurrection of the Messiah.

The total Christian message is often termed "the word" (Lk. 1:2, 4; Acts 1:1; 2:41; 4:4; 6:2, 4, 7), especially as this message centers in Christ. Thus, the apostles asked and received boldness to "speak the word of God," that is, to preach the gospel, with courage (Acts 4:29, 31). The apostles determined to give priority to the ministry of the word (6:2, 4). The Samaritans were the first, other than Jews, to embrace “the word of God” (8:4, 14, 21, 25). CORNELIUS was among the first Gentiles to respond to “the word” (10:29, 36, 44). The message Paul brought to Jews and Gentiles of Asia Minor and Europe was the same “word of God” or “good news,” as at ANTIOCH OF PISIDIA (13:5, 7, 15, 26, 49), later at EPHESUS (19:10, 20) and BEREIA (17:11, 13). It is obvious that the authors of the Synoptic Gospels and Acts found it natural to regard the teachings of Jesus and the good news of the Christian preachers as in a continuum with the message of the OT prophets.

B. Pauline epistles. PAUL’S usage is perhaps less distinctive than that of Luke-Acts and John. He continues the equating of the logos with the gospel. His presentation of Jesus Christ is essentially the same as that of John, but unlike John he does not link the person of Christ with the logos in any technical sense. When describing God’s word, that is, the gospel message, he employs this term in a manner consistent with the Gospels (Rom. 9:6; 2 Cor. 1:18; 2:17; 4:2; 5:19; 6:7). Whether he was familiar with Philonic literature is debatable. Several passages in his epistles reveal Paul’s awareness of the issues in Alexandrian speculation. The letter to the COLOSSIANS reflects Paul’s concern with an incipient Gnosticism which stressed the contrast between Creator and creature and the necessity for intermediate beings. Paul insisted on the sole adequacy of Christ—he is the fullness (plērōma G4445) of the deity (Col. 2:9; see PLEROMA). The believers have their fullness in Christ alone without angels or other mediators (2:10-15). For Paul the gospel is good news concerning Jesus the Christ (1 Cor. 1:23; 2 Cor. 4:1-6; Gal. 3:1), who is both the power and the wisdom of God (1 Cor. 1:24; Eph. 3:10-12).

Paul’s CHRISTOLOGY, moreover, is essentially the same as that of the fourth gospel and the epistle to the Hebrews. Paul repeatedly speaks of the uncreated Christ becoming incarnated—he voluntarily impoverished himself for others (2 Cor. 8:9), and he made himself nothing (Phil. 2:5-11) by assuming the “form of a servant.” He existed with God the Father from eternity (Rom. 10:6; Gal. 4:4) and is re-creating man in his image or moral likeness (1 Cor. 2:16; 15:49; 2 Cor. 3:18; Eph. 4:24; Phil. 2:5; Col. 3:9). Although Paul does not employ the term logos in a technical Christological sense, his corresponding term is eikon G1635—God’s image or likeness (Col. 3:10 et al.). See IMAGE OF GOD.

C. Hebrews. This anonymous epistle states that “the word of God is living and active” and that “it judges the thoughts and attitudes of the heart” (Heb. 4:12). The author is familiar with Alexandrian exegesis and nomenclature, as evidenced by the use of such concepts as angels, shadow, substance, pattern, and the paradox of seeing the invisible. The similarity to the prologue of John’s gospel is especially apparent in the opening verses. Christ is present as the Son who is the effulgence of God’s glory and who bears the stamp of God’s nature—a relationship as intimate as that between die and matrix—also as God’s heir and agent in creation (Heb. 1:1—3; cf. Jn. 1:1—3). By such language the author seeks to set forth the closest possible relationship to the Father without losing the Son’s identity.

The logos in this letter is the apostolic preaching (Heb. 2:2-4), the illumination of the Spirit (4:2), the teaching of dedicated leaders (5:13; 13:7), and the epistle itself (13:22). In no Christian document is the paradox of Jesus’ deity and humanity expressed more emphatically than here (1:1—3; cf. 2:14-18; 5:7-9). Although the relationship of the Son to the Father is essentially the same as set forth in Paul and in John, the term logos is not used to describe this relationship to the extent that it is in Philo and in John. The term occurs eleven times in the epistle as a designation of divine revelation, but is not explicitly related to the embodiment of that revelation in the Son.

D. Johannine literature

1. Epistles and Apocalypse. In the Apocalypse the messianic warrior with the “sword” in his mouth is called the logos of God (Rev. 19:13). It appears to be a symbolic presentation of the preaching of the good news, stated in numerous other places, as indicated above.

John’s first letter speaks of the “word of life,” in language strikingly similar to Jn. 1:1—18. In this context the expression could refer either to the preaching of the good news or to the incarnate Christ; it probably includes both. The former is consistent with the NT as a whole; the latter is consistent in the Johannine prologue, which it so closely resembles in other respects. (The best texts do not include the phrase “the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost” in 1 Jn. 5:7, but it at least reflects the sentiments of many in the ancient church.)

2. The fourth gospel. The term logos occurs forty times in this gospel but only in Jn. 1:1—3, 14 is the term explicitly equated with the Christ. With this term, however, is linked TRUTH (alētheia G237), “your word is truth” (17:17). Elsewhere Jesus says, “I am the way and the truth and the life” (14:6). Since “things equal to the same thing are equal to each other,” the conclusion is clear—Jesus is the Logos. This, of course, is consistent with the prologue, where the identification is explicit and emphatic.

a. The relation of the Logos to the Father. The author goes back of the Genesis account to origins in eternity—“In the beginning was the Word.” The Word was “with God” (pros ton theon—in God’s presence, implying movement toward God and yet distinct from God); the language expresses perpetual intercommunion or fellowship. He is one with God in essence, yet distinct personally—“the Word was God.” The relationship to God is as intimate as language can describe it and still retain individual identity. The thought is essentially that of Paul (Col. 1:15-20; cf. 1 Cor. 15:24) and of the author of Hebrews (Heb. 1:1-3). This usage marks an advance over the thought of the Pauline corpus and the letter to the Hebrews in that it was a successful synthesis of the prophetic doctrine of divine revelation, the later personification of wisdom, and the Alexandrian emphasis on reason and truth. The prologue expresses Christian revelation on a Hebraic background, using contemporary idiom to make it more appealing.

b. The relation of the Logos to the world is that of Co-creator to creation. The relation to the cosmos is not spelled out in the detail one sees in Paul (Col. 1:15-20 et al.), but it is embraced in John's allinclusive affirmation—"Through him all things were made" (Jn. 1:3a). The following statement reiterates and emphasizes this point: "no single thing was created without him" (1:3b NEB). Just as the word of God spoke into existence every created thing in the Genesis account, so John affirms the same of the Logos. It is astonishing that the first-generation Christians who had known Jesus of Nazareth "after the flesh" could have become convinced that he was also the One who had caused the universe itself to have come into existence. The difference between Creator and creation is brought out by the contrast in the verbs "being" and "becoming." "The eternally existing One caused to come into existence in time everything else that exists."

c. The relation of the Logos to mankind is the main concern of John, as of the other evangelists. "The Logos became flesh" (Jn. 1:14) was an idea abhorrent to the Gnostics, as to holders of metaphysical dualism generally. Some hold with R. Bultmann that John's ideas are borrowed mainly from pagan ideologies, especially Iranian Gnostic systems, but the evidence is insufficient and the theory is rendered untenable by recent archaeological discoveries.

The Word is equated with the truth and with light in Johannine thought. As is characteristic of the fourth gospel, abstract ideas become concrete and personalized in Christ. The good news in this book becomes a person. Hence, the doctrine of the RESURRECTION becomes identified with Jesus—"I am the resurrection and the life" (Jn. 11:25). The same is true of "the way" (14:6), the manna from heaven (6:31, 50), the truth, and the word. What in the rest of the NT is the message of God's good news, in the fourth gospel is the person of Christ. Yet this gospel is not different in its emphasis; it only makes the link between messenger and message more complete, expressed in an idiom that transcends national and sectarian boundaries and becomes universal in its appeal. The message becomes incarnate and personalized in Jesus of Nazareth, not only for a season but for all time. Boldly drawing upon contemporary nomenclature and yet defying one of the basic convictions of prevailing dualism, the evangelist declares that the eternal Logos became flesh in history (1:14) in what is perhaps the most characteristic affirmation of the gospel.

IV. Early Christian literature. At the close of the 1st cent., the Logos doctrine was the antidote to Gnostic dualism and docetic heresies (e.g., 2 Jn. 7). The apologists—including Justin, Tatian, Theophilus, and Athenagoras—sought to demonstrate that orthodoxy was opposed to pagan theosophies and yet at the same time was in agreement with elements of truth in such pagan ideologies as Stoicism, especially as represented by EPICTETUS. JUSTIN argued that Christ is the Spermatic Logos who issued from the Father as divine revelation. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA emphasized the immanence of the Logos concept, that Christ was in the world before the historic incarnation preparing mankind for his advent. Additional strength was afforded this doctrine by Athanasius during the Trinitarian controversy. However, the Nicene Creed did not include the term, and later the Synod of Sirmium (A.D. 451) condemned the doctrine of endiathetos and prophorikos logos. The idea still holds its appeal for idealists and certain mystics.

In general, the Logos doctrine serves to indicate the power of the gospel to gather up and transform contemporary concepts that contain elements of truth. A weak and uncertain gospel would have avoided any use of alien symbols for fear of losing its distinctiveness. In much the same spirit Clement of Alexandria could refer to himself as a "Christian Gnostic." The genius of the author of the fourth gospel is that he did not disdain the use of a term that promised to extend the appeal of the Truth.

loins. The Hebrew and Greek terms normally rendered “loins” in the KJV and some other English versions refer to the lumbar region or the hips in general. The Hebrew word motnayim H5516 (dual in form), often rendered “waist” in the NIV, describes the mid-portion of the back (Exod. 28:42) around which a belt could be fastened (2 Ki. 1:8) or a sword hung (2 Sam. 20:8). It was regarded as the thickest part of the body (1 Ki. 12:10), and the area where sackcloth was worn (Gen. 37:34; 1 Ki. 20:32). Throughout the ANE it was customary for the lower garments to be gathered or tied up around the hips when a person began to run (1 Ki. 18:46). In conformity with the Hebrew custom of assigning emotional qualities to organs of the human body, the loins were regarded as the locale of a man’s physical strength (Nah. 2:1). They were deemed liable to attack by such noxious influences as disease or calamity (Ps. 66:11; Isa. 21:3), or to that kind of enervation that would “make their loins tremble” (Ps. 69:23 RSV) or would “ungird the loins” (Isa. 45:1 RSV).

A less frequent Hebrew word, also occurring in the dual form, hālsāyīm H2743, is used in a similar fashion to denote the mid-body area, with the same general range of meanings. However, it also symbolized the functions or organs of generation, and was used in this manner of a man’s offspring as “those who come out of his loins” (cf. Gen. 35:11 KJV). A third term translated “loins” is kesel H4072, used always in the literal sense of physical tissue (Lev. 3:4 et al.).

The NT writers follow the general usage of the OT, but employ one word, osphys G4019, to cover the various meanings of the Hebrew terms. It indicates the waist (Matt. 3:4; Mk. 1:6), the place where garments were tied, but it is normally used in metaphors (Lk. 12:35; Eph. 6:14; 1 Pet. 1:13), including expressions that refer to “offspring” (Acts 2:30; Heb. 7:5, 10).

Lois loh’is (Λωίς G3396). The grandmother of TIMOTHY; she was probably the mother of Timothy’s mother, EUNICE (2 Tim. 1:5). The family lived at LYSTRA (Acts 16:1). Lois, a devout Jewish believer, likely was converted to Christianity during PAUL’S first missionary journey (Acts 14). Paul speaks of the unpretending faith of Timothy, and adds that this faith first dwelt in his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice.

S. BARABAS

longsuffering. This English term, used rarely in modern Bible versions, occurs in the KJV seventeen times. In four OT passages (e.g., Exod. 34:6) it is the rendering of the Hebrew phrase ’erek ’appayim (from ’ārēk H800, “long, slow” and ’ap H678, “anger”), which the KJV also translates “slow of anger” (e.g., Ps. 103:8). The rest of the occurrences are in the NT, where the term renders Greek makrothymia G3429, “patience, forbearance” (e.g., Rom. 2:4; the cognate verb, makrothymeō G3428, is found in 2 Pet. 3:9 et al.).

God’s longsuffering is that divine attribute (Exod. 34:6; Num. 14:18; Pss. 86:15; 103:8, 9; Joel 2:13) which delays the punishment of wicked and rebellious persons (Rom. 9:22; 1 Pet. 3:20). Divine justice would long ago have swept the ungodly into perdition, but Yahweh is “full of compassion, and gracious, longsuffering, and plenteous in mercy and truth” (Ps. 86:15 KJV). The purpose of God’s longsuffering is to lead sinners to REPENTANCE (Rom. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9, 15); but when the wicked despise his patience (Rom. 2:4) and abuse it (Neh. 9:28-31; Eccl. 8:11; Matt. 24:48-49) they are punished (Neh. 9:30; Matt. 24:50-51; Rom. 2:5). The longsuffering of God is not infinite (Gen. 6:3; Jer. 44:22); it is tempered with justice (Prov. 1:24-27; 29:1; Isa. 42:14; Rev. 2:21-22). The divine longsuffering is illustrated by the song of the vineyard (Isa. 5:1-7) and by two parables, namely, the wicked husbandmen (Matt. 21:33-41), and the barren fig tree (Lk. 13:6-9). Examples include God’s treatment of (1) the antediluvian world (1 Pet. 3:20); (2) Pharaoh (Rom. 9:17, 22); (3) heathen nations (Acts 14:16), especially (4) the Amorites (Gen. 15:16); (5) Manasseh (2 Chr. 33:10-13); (6) Israel (Neh. 9:31; Ps. 78:38; Isa. 30:18; 48:9, 11; Jer. 7:13, 23-25; 11:7; Ezek. 20:17; Matt. 19:8; 23:37; Acts 17:30); (7) Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37); and (8) Paul (1 Tim. 1:16). Christians ought to imitate God’s longsuffering (Rom. 15:5) and plead it in prayer (Jer. 15:15). In the NT longsuffering is a virtue that enables the disciple to carry his cross patiently (2 Cor. 6:6; Eph. 4:2; 2 Tim. 4:2). See PATIENCE.

loom. An apparatus for weaving thread or yarn into cloth (Jdg. 16:14; Isa. 38:12). In Bible times three types of looms were in use. One was the horizontal loom, also called the ground loom, because it was laid out horizontally on the ground. It could be operated only in a stooping position. The other two types of loom were upright and were operated from a sitting or a standing position. They differed in that in one type the threads of the warp hung from a crossbeam and were kept taut with weights attached to their lower ends; while in the other type the ends of the warp were attached to a revolving cloth beam, and therefore a much longer web could be woven. See WEAVING.

loop. The TABERNACLE was covered with ten linen curtains, each measuring twenty-eight cubits by four. These were sewn along their length into two sets of five, which were draped over the frame of the tabernacle structure. Along one side of each set of curtains fifty loops (Heb. lulāôt H4339) of blue thread were sewn. Fifty gold clasps were attached to one side of the other set of curtains, and thus the two halves of the curtain were joined. The outer covering was made of goatskin in the same way, also with clasps and loops (Exod. 26:4-5, 10-11; 36:11-12, 17).

lord. The English word lord (or capitalized, Lord) is used to translate various terms in the OT. As a title of men, it can designate governmental, religious, and military officials. The common Hebrew word ba'al H1251 (“owner, husband,” etc.) can be used in this sense (e.g., Isa. 16:8 NRSV; NIV, “rulers”), as can Wore H123 (Gen. 42:20 et al.), seren H6249 (e.g., Jdg. 13:3 KJV) and the rare term gēbîr H1484 (only Gen. 27:29, 37). When applied to deity, the title ba'al came to be identified directly with a specific Canaanite god (see BAAL). In contrast, ādōn is used of the true God (e.g., Josh. 3:11), esp. in the form ādōnāy H151 (lit., “my lords”; Gen. 15:2 et al.). Most English Bible versions use the form LORD (i.e., in small caps) to render God’s special covenant name, Yahweh. See GOD, NAMES OF.

The Greek word kyrios G3261, which can also refer to human beings in positions of authority, is used by the SEPTUAGINT to render the Hebrew words applied to the true God. In the NT it occurs as a designation of the sovereign God in relationship to his creation (Matt. 1:20; 11:25; Lk. 4:18). But it is also the supreme title given to Jesus. “Jesus is Lord” was perhaps the earliest creedal statement formulated and recited (prob. chiefly at BAPTISM, Acts 8:16; 19:5) by the early Christians. Although found often in Paul’s writings (Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 7:22; 12:3; 2 Cor. 4:5), this title was by no means original with him (but neither was it borrowed by him from the Hellenistic MYSTERY RELIGIONS, as suggested by W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, 4th ed. [1935]). PETER knew and used it (Acts 1:21; 2:36).

The early ARAMAIC-speaking church, too, had worshiped Jesus as Lord, and its Aramaic prayer, MARANATHA, “Our Lord, come,” still stands in the text as witness to this fact (1 Cor. 16:22). Indeed, if Phil. 2:6-11 is a primitive Christian hymn, as some have claimed, then PAUL was the recipient of an earlier tradition about the Lordship of Jesus rather than the originator of a new title to describe his own understanding of him. This title stood also in the tradition Paul had received concerning the LORD’S SUPPER (1 Cor. 11:23).

By referring to Jesus as Lord, the early church declared him as standing above the human level—an object of prayer (Acts 7:59, 60; 1 Cor. 12:8; 16:22) and trust (Acts 5:14; 9:42; 11:24; cf. also the fourth gospel), sharing with God in his sovereign rule (2:34), and ultimately sharing with God in his nature. For being conscious that the Greek OT regularly used kyrios to designate Yahweh, early Christians, even Jewish Christians, chose that term as the supreme title to convey their understanding of Jesus. By it, therefore, they intended to identify him with the God of the OT. This intent is seen most clearly in those NT passages where OT texts originally referring to Yahweh are now boldly quoted as referring to Jesus (Rom. 10:13; Heb. 1:10; 1 Pet. 2:3; 3:15). See CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST.

The use of this title also meant that Jesus was master, worthy to receive power, glory, and blessing (Rev. 5:12). It meant he possessed all authority (Matt. 28:18), and was the One before whom every knee must bow in submission (Phil. 2:10), the universal sovereign (Rom. 10:12; 14:9; Phil. 2:11), King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev. 19:16). Especially was he Lord to the CHURCH (Jn. 20:28; Rom. 5:1; 2 Tim. 1:8). The term slave quite naturally, therefore, became a common designation of early Christians (Rom. 14:4; 1 Cor. 7:21-24). They served him (Rom. 12:11), ordered their lives in a manner worthy of him (1 Cor. 11:27), and paid him obeisance, OBEDIENCE being the only proper response of slave to master (Heb. 5:9). The will of this exalted Master was often communicated to the church through the revelatory word of his apostles and prophets (1 Cor. 14:37; Rev. 2; 3).

The ideas of firmness and strength inherent in this term were also important to the early church. When a Christian, therefore, called Jesus “Lord,” he meant further that he had a foundation upon which to build his life. This idea is conveyed frequently by the phrase en kyriō (Rom. 8:39; 1 Cor. 7:22). See UNION WITH CHRIST.

The death, resurrection, and exaltation of Jesus were revelatory events. They alone brought the church to the unquestioned realization that Jesus was indeed the Lord (Matt. 28:18; Jn. 20:28; Acts 2:36; Rom. 10:9; Phil. 2:9-11; cf. also the frequent application of Ps. 110:1 to Jesus in Matt. 22:44; Mk. 12:36; Acts 2:34; Heb. 10:12-13). Hence, when kyrios is applied to Jesus in the Gospels prior to Easter, its meaning is generally limited to “sir,” a title of respect, or to “master,” in the sense of “rabbi” (Mk. 10:51, with Matt. 20:33 and Lk. 6:46; 18:41; Jn. 13:13; but contrast Matt. 7:21 and Mk. 12:35-36, where Jesus applies to himself the title in a more profound sense).

It is worth recalling, however, that the Gospels are postresurrection documents, whose writers wrote from the perspective of Easter. To them Jesus was a teacher par excellence, but more than that, he was their sovereign Lord. Perhaps, then, the evangelists chose kyrios as a title even for the historical Jesus because it could reflect both the superficial understanding of the masses who saw in him only a Jewish RABBI, and at the same time the later and more profound perception of the believing community who recognized in him God become man.

Although the church hailed Jesus as Lord, it also recognized that this role of his was a delegated one. They understood that he would bring all enemies under his feet and then surrender his lordship and subject himself to the One who subjected all things to him so that the triune God might be supreme (1 Cor. 15:27-28). Lord, day of the. See DAY OF THE LORD; LORD’S DAY.

Lord of hosts. The phrase “LORD of hosts” is used by the KJV and other Bible translations as a literal rendering of Hebrew yhwh sēbā’ôt, which occurs well over two hundred times in the OT as a designation of the true God (it is esp. frequent in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Zechariah, and Malachi). The first word in the phrase is the divine name Yahweh (see GOD, NAMES OF). The second word is the plural form of the Hebrew noun sābāʾ H7372, which means “army” but also is applied to the stars (e.g., 2 Ki. 17:16) and to the heavenly attendants (1 Ki. 22:19). See HOST OF HEAVEN. In over sixty instances (mostly in Isaiah) the SEPTUAGINT renders the phrase with a transliteration, kyrios sabaōth (used twice in the NT, Rom. 9:29 [a LXX quotation]; Jas. 5:4). In a few instances (e.g., 1 Ki. 18:15), the LXX has kyrios ton dynamēōn (“Lord of the forces”), but in over one hundred passages it renders the phrase, with minor variations, as kyrios pantokratōr, “Lord Almighty,” and this understanding has been followed by the NIV.

The exact reference of the Hebrew phrase has been debated for centuries. A military reference is clear in some contexts, as when DAVID exclaimed that he was coming against GOLIATH “in the name of the LORD of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel” (1 Sam. 17:45 NRSV; cf. also Isa. 13:4; 31:4). But many other passages are more general in character. The initial use of the concept of the “hosts” is found in Gen. 2:1, where it refers back to the totality of created beings in the “heaven and the earth.” This would include all those self-conscious creatures that were brought into being under the creation ordinances of God. One use of the title “LORD of hosts” (Isa. 45:13) follows immediately upon a reference to the divine CREATION of the earth as well as the heavens and their hosts (v. 12). In Ps. 89:7-8, the title is in parallel with “the council of the holy ones,” apparently based upon the concept of the “great congregation,” that is, the gathering together of all the powers of the universe, heavenly and earthly, sacred or profane, at the command and summons of the Almighty (cf. Job 1:6).

Lord’s Day. This expression (Gk. hē kyriakē hēmera) is found in the Bible only in Rev. 1:10, where John states, “On the Lord’s Day I was in the Spirit,” when he received a divine commission to write the book of Revelation. The adjective kyriakos G3258, however, also occurs in 1 Cor. 11:20 in the expression, “the Lord’s Supper.” As will be shown, “the Lord’s Day” is used frequently in other early Christian writings to designate Sunday, the first day of the week, observed from the time of the apostles as a day of Christian worship.

5. Conclusion

I. The origin of the Christian Sunday. Many people believe that the origin of the Christian Sunday is identical with the origin of the Hebrew SABBATH, and that the Sabbath was changed either by Jesus himself or by his apostles from the seventh to the first day of the week (Wilbur F. Crafts, The Sabbath for Man [1885], 376; R. L. Dabney, The Christian Sabbath [1882], 6-8; J. P. Hutchinson, Our Obligations to the Day of Rest and Worship [1916], 100). This belief has persisted even though no passage of Scripture can be found that teaches that the Hebrew Sabbath has been transferred from one day of the week to another.

The origin of the Christian Sunday is not as simple as those who hold this view would have us believe. The change from Sabbath to Sunday was gradual. Millgram describes it as follows: "The change from the Sabbath to Sunday was the result of a long historic process which is tied up with the formative years of Christianity. This process coincided with the drift of early Christianity from a messianic movement among the Jews to a religion of the Gentiles. When Christianity was predominantly Jewish, the Sabbath was the official Christian day of rest and worship. When Christianity finally became predominantly Gentile, the Sabbath was abandoned and Sunday became the official day of rest and worship. This change was not sudden. It was a slow process of more than three centuries' duration (A. E. Millgram, Sabbath: The Day of Delight [1944], 364).

In this process, which took place when Christianity was emerging from the confinement of JUDAISM, it was inevitable that JUDAISM should contribute a great deal to a Christian institution such as Sunday. During this period Christianity was also entering into conflict with paganism, which, especially in later ages, made its influence felt on the institutions of Christianity. At the same time, as the distinction between Christianity and Judaism, and between Christianity and paganism, came to be realized, it was certain that the observance of Sunday would contain some elements of a distinctively Christian character.

A. The contribution of Judaism. Christianity stands in debt to Judaism in at least three regards: (1) Judaism gave to Christianity its sacred Scriptures; (2) Judaism provided in the synagogue service a pattern for Christian worship; and (3) Judaism presented in the Hebrew Sabbath an example of a weekly day of rest and worship.

1. The Jewish Scriptures. The Jews regarded the writings now known as the OT as an authoritative divine REVELATION, and the Sabbath as a divine institution that rested upon the authority of that revelation. Jesus and the apostles likewise accepted the OT as the Word of God (Matt. 5:17-19; Jn. 10:35; Rom. 3:31; 4:3; 2 Tim. 3:16; Heb. 1:1; 2 Pet. 1:21). Cotton asks the question, "How could Christianity, which accepted the Old Testament as authoritative, dare to set aside the Sabbath which was established as an institution within the very ten commandments, and set up as a kind of substitute the first day of the week to be observed as a sacred day?" (Paul Cotton, From Sabbath to Sunday [1933], 8). The answer to this problem lies in the interpretation the Christians gave to those Scriptures. PAUL, for example, following the principles set forth by Jesus and the Hebrew prophets, held that it was the spirit (or Spirit) and not the letter of the Scriptures that was applicable to the Christian believer (2 Cor. 3:6). This interpretation of the OT Scriptures enabled the early Christians to hold them as authoritative, and at the same time to regard the Hebrew Sabbath as no longer binding on them.

2. The Jewish synagogue. In every place where there was a sizable Jewish community, the SYNAGOGUE was the center of Jewish worship. Jesus made regular use of the synagogue to teach and preach (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; Mk. 1:21, 39; 6:2; Lk. 4:15-27, 44; 13:10; Jn. 18:20). The apostle Paul made it a practice to begin his ministry in any particular place by preaching in the synagogue (Acts 13:5, 14-47; 14:1; 17:1-3, 10; 18:4-7; 19:8-9). It was natural, then, that the weekly services in the Jewish synagogue should become a pattern for the Christian assemblies on the Lord's Day.

The general arrangement of the synagogue was followed in the Christian meeting places. The sexes were separated and the leader took his place on a raised platform in the center at one end of the building (A. Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2 vols., 8th ed. [1900], 2:434-39; Cotton, From Sabbath to Sunday, 91, 95). The order of worship, including the reading of the Scriptures, the singing of psalms, the preaching of a sermon, and the offering of prayers, was much the same in the Jewish synagogue and the Christian assembly. The Christian practice of reading the Scriptures consecutively week by week was borrowed from Judaism. Even the Christian postures in prayer were borrowed from the Jews. The close parallels between the features of worship in the Jewish synagogue and the Christian assembly become all the more significant when it is remembered that Sunday was the weekly day for Christian worship just as the Sabbath was the weekly day for Jewish worship.

3. The Jewish Sabbath. The Sabbath held a distinctive place in the life of the Jewish nation. The religious rites of the Jews centered on this one day. The early Christians had been reared in the traditions of Judaism. It was natural that many of these traditions should be retained and incorporated in the life of Christianity. Jews who had been accustomed to observe the Sabbath by resting from their ordinary labors and by worshiping in the synagogue would find it very difficult not to maintain the custom of observing a weekly day of rest and worship.

At first, Jewish Christians apparently observed both the seventh and the first day of the week. Later, however, when the Christian church became more Gentile in character, and when it was realized that Christianity was distinct from Judaism, the great majority of Christians observed only the first day of the week, but they transferred to it many of the features of the earlier institution, which had held such an important place in the heritage they had received from Judaism.

The character of the Jewish Sabbath was imitated in the Christian Sunday. Like the Sabbath, Sunday was regarded as a day of joy and festivity, and fasting was forbidden (Cotton, From Sabbath to Sunday, 92-93). The Sabbath began and closed with appropriate celebrations. Similarly, the early Christians met on Sunday early in the morning, and again in the evening to worship and to take food together (cf. esp. the letter of PLINY the Younger to the Emperor TRAJAN, in H. Bettenson, Documents of the Christian Church, 2nd ed. [1963], 4-5).

The Sabbath was, to the Jew, a memorial of God's rest after the six days of CREATION and a weekly reminder of the Israelites' deliverance from Egyptian slavery (Gen. 2:3; Exod. 20:11; Deut.

Ethiopian Christians worshipping at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

5:15). To the Christian, Sunday was a memorial of THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST, a weekly reminder of the work of Christ and of his redemption from the bondage of sin. The most prominent feature of the Hebrew Sabbath was rest from all kinds of work. Although this feature of the Jewish sacred day was the last to be carried over into the Christian Sunday, as early as the beginning of the 3rd cent. there are indications that Christians abstained from work on the Lord's Day (Tertullian, On Prayer 23; see ANF, 3:689).

The fact that Sunday became a weekly day of rest and worship for the Christians (as opposed to a monthly or yearly observance) can be explained only by the weekly recurrence of the Jewish Sabbath. The Christian Sunday, both in its initial and more developed form, owed much to the Jewish Sabbath.

B. The influence of paganism. Paganism exerted little influence on early Christianity. Christianity took root not in the soil of paganism, but of Judaism. Judaism and Christianity alike stood in marked contrast to the ethics and ideals of the pagan world. In three respects, however, paganism influenced the origin and development of the Christian Sunday: (1) it gave to the Christian institution the name by which it is most commonly called; (2) it promoted the observance of Sunday by its adoption of the seven-day week; and (3) it prepared for the adoption of Sunday as the official weekly religious day by the prominence accorded to Sunday in the pagan religions.

1. The name "Sunday." This name for the first day of the week originated from the naming of the days of the week by the ancient Babylonians after the sun, moon, and five planets that were then known (R. J. Floody, Scientific Basis of Sabbath and Sunday [1906], 3; W. Rordorf, Sunday: The History of the Day of Rest and Worship in the Earliest Centuries of the Christian Church [1968], 24-25). Sunday was named in honor of the sun or the god of the sun. Although both Jews and Christians avoided the use of this pagan name in the 1st cent. of the Christian era, Christians began to use the name as early as the 2nd cent. (Justin Martyr, First Apology 67; see ANF, 1:186).

2. The adoption of the seven-day week. Although the Jews had observed a seven-day week for many centuries and there is some evidence that a seven-day planetary week was observed by the Babylonians, there is no conclusive evidence that such a week existed among the Romans until the 1st Christian century. The Roman historian Dio Cassius (Roman History 37.18-19), writing at the beginning of the 3rd cent., states that the planetary week (1) originated in Egypt, (2) was of relatively recent date, and (3) had by his time spread everywhere (cf. Rordorf, Sunday, 27, who also cites evidence from Pompeii). It would have been difficult, if not impossible, for Christians to have observed a weekly day of rest and worship if the Roman empire had not adopted the seven-day week.

3. The prominence of Sunday in pagan religions. One of the numerous oriental religions that became popular in the Roman empire at the beginning of the Christian era, especially among the Roman soldiers, was MITHRAISM, a religion that was imported from PERSIA. Mithra was the god of the sun. Consequently, Mithraism regarded Sunday as a sacred day. The veneration of this day by the adherents of this pagan religion no doubt contributed to the selection of Sunday by the Emperor Constantine as the imperial rest day. His edict, issued in the year 321, ordered all judges, city people, and craftsmen to rest on “the venerable day of the sun” (Bettenson, Documents, 26). Although the prominence given to Sunday in Mithraism and in other pagan cults did contribute to the acceptance of that day by the pagans as a national rest day, it did not account for the observance of the first day of the week as a day of worship by the early Christians.

The use of the name Sunday, the adoption of the seven-day week, and the association of Sunday with pagan religions all helped to make the observance of the Lord’s Day more acceptable to the pagans, but in no way did paganism produce or modify the essential character of the Christian institution.

C. The distinctive Christian elements

1. Consciousness of a distinction from Judaism. The Christian Sunday, although manifesting a number of features borrowed from the Sabbath of Judaism, nevertheless was from the beginning a distinctive Christian institution. The first day of the week was observed because it was the day on which Jesus rose from the dead. The resurrection of Jesus, denied by Judaism, was foundational to the Christian movement. It was inevitable that Christians, even those who were Jews by race, would come to sense an essential difference between Christianity and Judaism. This consciousness of a distinction from Judaism demanded a separate day for WORSHIP.

The distinctiveness of Christianity from Judaism may be seen in (1) its universal character, (2) its internal character, and (3) its personal character. While Judaism was the religion of one people, even though other peoples were attracted to it, Christianity quickly became a universal religion transcending all racial bounds. The Hebrew prophets spoke of Israel’s mission to the world (e.g., Isa. 42:6; 54:5), but Judaism was so closely intertwined with the social, economic, and political life of the Jewish people that it never became a universal religion. The emphasis on the observance of the law in normative Judaism tended toward an external observance of legal precepts, including those having to do with the Sabbath. The teaching of Jesus and of Paul and the other apostles, on the other hand, was that God demanded an internal righteousness effected by the HOLY SPIRIT in one’s heart (Matt. 5:20; Mk. 7:21-22; Rom. 8:4, 9). Again, while Judaism emphasized the individual’s personal relationship with God, it was tightly bound up with the national life of the Jewish people and was expressed in an elaborate system of worship. Christianity, on the other hand, at least in its early forms, was intensely personal. Christian believers from all races and strata of society formed a new community, based not on racial or national ties, but on personal faith in Jesus Christ. He was the One whom they worshiped as Lord on the day of the week which they came to designate as the Lord's Day.

2. The supernatural designation of Sunday. All four Gospels indicate that Jesus rose from the dead on the morning of the first day of the week (Matt. 28:1; Mk. 16:2; Lk. 24:1; Jn. 20:1). The resurrection of Christ on this day was reason enough for the Christians to observe it. Six of the eight appearances of Christ after his resurrection recorded in the Gospels took place on Sunday: (1) to MARY Magdalene (Jn. 20:11-18); (2) to the women who had brought spices to anoint his body (Matt. 28:7-10); (3) to the two disciples on the road to EMMAUS (Lk. 24:13-33); (4) to Simon PETER (24:34); (5) to the ten disciples when THOMAS was absent (Jn. 20:19-23; cf. Lk. 24:36-49); and (6) to the eleven disciples when Thomas was present (Jn. 20:24-29). These appearances of Christ on Sunday were sufficient to designate it as a day of peculiar significance.

If the CRUCIFIXION of Christ took place on Friday, as is traditionally held, then PENTECOST also occurred on Sunday that year. This Jewish festival received its name from the fact that it took place fifty days after the Passover. The latter was observed annually on the fifteenth of Nisan (Millgram, Sabbath, 339). Since the Jews were commanded to count the fifty days "from the day after the Sabbath...to the day after the seventh Sabbath" (Lev. 23:15-16), and since the fifteenth day of Nisan, which was the first day of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (23:6), was considered a Sabbath, the feast of Pentecost would occur on Sunday only when this special Sabbath coincided with the regular weekly Sabbath. (The use of the plural form sabbatōn in Matt. 28:1 seems to support this view.) If Pentecost did occur on Sunday that year, then the outpouring of the HOLY SPIRIT also occurred on the Lord's Day (Acts 2:1-4).

These supernatural events, the resurrection of Christ, his appearances to his disciples, and the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost, would serve to mark the first day of the week as a special day for the Christian. Jesus, when questioned about his authority, quoted an OT passage: "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone; the LORD has done this, and it is marvelous in our eyes" (Ps. 118:22-23; Matt. 21:42). Peter, in his address before the Jewish Sanhedrin, quoted part of the same passage and applied it to the resurrection of Christ (Acts 4:11). Athanasius, in the 4th cent., added the succeeding verse and applied it to the resurrection day: "This is the day the LORD has made; let us rejoice and be glad in it" (Ps. 118:24; Athanasius, Commentary on Ps. 118, cited in J. A. Hessey, Sunday: Its Origin, History, and Present Obligation [1889], 69).

II. The history of the Christian Sunday in the early church

A. The apostolic period (A.D. 29-100). The NT is the only source of information concerning the observance of Sunday in the apostolic period, and it has little to say about it. This may be because its observance only gradually displaced that of the Jewish Sabbath and did not become prevalent until the close of the apostolic period. There are, however, three unmistakable references in the NT to the Christian observance of Sunday (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:1-2; Rev. 1:10).

1. Paul's command to the Corinthian church. The apostle PAUL, writing to the CORINTHIANS (c. A.D. 55) "about the collection for God's people"—a contribution that he had undertaken to gather from the churches in the four provinces where he had labored, for the relief of the poverty-stricken Christians in Jerusalem—gave them the following command: “Do what I told the Galatian churches to do. On the first day of every week, each one of you should set aside a sum of money in keeping with his income, saving it up, so that when I come no collections will have to be made” (1 Cor. 16:1-2; cf. Acts 24:17; Rom. 15:25-28; 2 Cor. 9:1-5). As early as the 2nd cent., a collection for the poor was a regular part of the worship service on the Lord’s Day (Justin Martyr, First Apology 67; see ANF, 1:186). This custom may have had its origin from Paul’s command to the Corinthian church.

Even though Paul’s words seem to mean that each individual was to lay aside his contribution at home (Gk. par’ heautō) on the first day of the week, it is clear that the apostle regarded Sunday as an appropriate day for the laying aside of that which was to be given to the poor. The verb translated “saving it up” (thēesaurizō G2564) is derived from a noun meaning “treasure box or chest” (thāsauros G2565), which some think might refer to the treasury or church box where the collection was to be deposited. If so, the money set aside was brought on that day to the church when it assembled for worship (J. Moffatt, The First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians [1938], 271). Paul points out to the Corinthians that he had given the same instructions to the churches of Galatia. While this passage does not expressly say that there was an assembly of the church on that day, it does indicate that Sunday was viewed as an appropriate day for the performance of religious duties, and therefore regarded in some sense as a sacred day (G. C. Findlay in EGT, 2:945).

2. Paul’s visit at Troas. Paul’s stay at TROAS, recorded in Acts 20:5-12, took place about two years after the writing of 1 Corinthians, as the apostle was on his way to Jerusalem, bearing the contributions of the Gentile churches to the poverty-stricken Christians in the Jewish capital. Paul and his companions arrived in Troas after the close of the Feast of Unleavened Bread and remained there for seven days (v. 6). On Sunday evening the church gathered “to break bread” and Paul gave a farewell address to them which lasted until midnight (v. 7). After the miraculous resuscitation of EUTYCHUS, Paul broke bread with them and continued to converse with the believers until daybreak (vv. 8-11).

This passage is significant because it relates what seems to have been a customary weekly assembly of the Christians on the first day of the week for the purpose of breaking bread and listening to an exposition of the Word of God. Even though Paul was in Troas seven days, this is the only assembly reported. It would seem that Paul remained a full week, even though he was in a hurry to get to Jerusalem, in order to meet with the believers on Sunday. The “breaking of bread” refers to a simple meal that was taken together by members of a local church in token of their fellowship with one another and in memory of Christ’s last supper with his disciples (Acts 2:42, 46; 1 Cor. 10:16-21; 11:20-34; Jude 12). The meal was followed by the eating of the bread and the drinking of the wine in obedience to the Lord’s command and in remembrance of his death (Matt. 26:26-28; Mk. 14:22-24; Lk. 22:19-20; 1 Cor. 11:23-26). The assembly at Troas also included a public discourse. It is evident that the protraction of the address until midnight, or to daybreak, was not the usual practice. It is implied, however, that preaching had become a regular part of the Christian worship on the first day of the week.

Some have held that the service described in Acts 20:7-12 was on Saturday, rather than Sunday, evening (A. T. Robertson, Word Pictures in the New Testament, 6 vols. [1930-33], 3:338-39). However, since Troas was a Gentile community, it is quite probable that Sunday evening is meant. This becomes almost certain when the expression used here is compared with its use in Jn. 20:19, where “the first day of the week” cannot possibly refer to Saturday evening, but must refer to Sunday evening. Thus this passage provides a connecting link between the first meeting of Jesus with his disciples on the evening of the resurrection day (Jn. 20:19-23; Lk. 24:36-43) and the established custom of the church of the 2nd and 3rd centuries of assembling together for worship on the first day of the week. It is significant that the meeting of Jesus with the disciples on the first Lord's Day, the meeting of Paul with the disciples at Troas, and the meeting of the disciples in succeeding generations, each took place on Sunday evening; each was observed by the breaking of bread; and each was characterized by a discourse on the Holy Scriptures.

3. John's vision on Patmos. The first vision of the book of Revelation, written during the latter part of the reign of NERO (c. 66) or of the reign of DOMITIAN (c. 95), was given to John "on the Lord's Day" (Rev. 1:10; see REVELATION, BOOK OF). Although some have argued that this is merely an alternative designation for the DAY OF THE LORD, used repeatedly in the OT and NT for the day of judgment (cf. A. Deissmann in EncBib, 3:2815; F. J. A. Hort, The Apocalypse of St. John, I-III [1908], 13), most scholars conclude that it is a reference to Sunday (H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John, 3rd ed. [1909], 13; R. H. Charles, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Revelation of St. John, ICC, 2 vols. [1920], 1:23). This conclusion is established by the subsequent, frequent use of "the Lord's Day" in early Christian writings to refer to Sunday (e.g., Didache 14.1; Ignatius, Magnesians 9.1; Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 7.12; Tertullian, On Idolatry 14).

It is remarkable that John received this vision of the risen Lord on the day that had become hallowed by the resurrection of Christ and his appearances to his disciples. As John fell before the "Living One," who had been "dead" but was "alive for ever and ever" (Rev. 1:18), he became an example for all those who, in succeeding generations, kept the Lord's Day as the day of the week sacred to the memory of that same risen, living Christ.

B. The Ante-Nicene period (100-321)

1. From Ignatius to Irenaeus. IGNATIUS, a disciple of the apostle John, and the bishop of ANTIOCH OF SYRIA, wrote to the Magnesians in the early years of the 2nd cent., describing Christians with a Jewish background as those who "have come to the possession of a new hope, no longer observing the Sabbath, but living in observance of the Lord's Day, on which also our life has sprung up again by him and by his death" (Magn. 9.1-3).

The DIDACHE, a manual of Christian worship written during the first quarter of the 2nd cent., contains the following instructions regarding worship on the Lord's Day: "But every Lord's day do ye gather yourselves together, and break bread, and give thanksgiving after having confessed your transgressions, that your sacrifice may be pure" (Did. 14.1).

In the pseudonymous Epistle of Barnabas, written in the early part of the 2nd cent. (see BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF), the author interprets certain OT passages (Gen. 2:2-3; Ps. 90:4; Isa. 1:13) to mean that God will bring the present world to an end at the conclusion of six days of a thousand years, each by ushering in the seventh day, or thousand years, of rest at Christ's SECOND COMING, after which God will make a beginning of another world on the eighth day. The writer then concludes: "Wherefore we keep the eighth day with joyfulness, the day on which Jesus rose again from the dead" (Barn. 15.9).

PLINY the Younger, Roman governor of PONTUS and BITHYNIA, wrote a letter to the Emperor TRAJAN around 112, in which he asked for an imperial ruling with regard to the treatment of Christians against whom accusations had been made. He says: "But they declared that the sum of their guilt or error had amounted only to this, that on an appointed day they had been accustomed to meet before daybreak, and to recite a hymn antiphonally to Christ, as to a god, and to bind themselves by an oath, not for the commission of any crime but to abstain from theft, robbery, adultery and breach of faith, and not to deny a deposit when it was claimed” (Bettenson, Documents, 4-5). Although Pliny does not state that the appointed day for the Christians’ accustomed meeting was Sunday, his description of its observance is so accurate that it is certain that it was the Lord’s Day.

JUSTIN MARTYR, around the middle of the 2nd cent., describes the order of worship in the Christian assembly “on the day called Sunday.” It included the reading of the Scriptures, a sermon, prayers, the celebration of the Lord’s Supper, and an offering. Justin then proceeds to give two reasons why Christians assemble for worship on Sunday: (1) because it was the day on which God began his work of creation; and (2) because it was the day on which Jesus Christ rose from the dead (First Apology 67). In his Dialogue with Trypho (ch. 19), Justin explains why Christians do not observe the Jewish Sabbath by asserting that true Sabbath observance under the new covenant consists in turning from sin. Later (ch. 41) he states that the command to circumcise children on the eighth day “was a type of the true circumcision, by which we are circumcised from deceit and iniquity through him who rose from the dead on the first day after the Sabbath, our Lord Jesus Christ” (ch. 41).

Other early testimonies include Dionysius, Bishop of Corinth, who in a letter to the church of Rome (c. A.D. 170) writes, “Today we have passed the Lord’s holy day, in which we have read your epistle” (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. 4.23.11); and IRENAEUS, Bishop of Lyons (c. A.D. 178), who wrote to the bishop of Rome with regard to the controversial question whether Easter should be celebrated on Sunday and commented, “The mystery of the Lord’s resurrection may not be celebrated on any other day than the Lord’s day” (Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. 5.24). All of these citations show that throughout the 2nd cent. Sunday was observed as a day of Christian worship in commemoration of the resurrection of Christ. There is no indication that Sunday was observed during this time as a day of rest or that its observance was in any way connected with the observance of the Jewish Sabbath.

2. From Clement of Alexandria to Peter of Alexandria. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, at the close of the 2nd cent. and the beginning of the 3rd, was the first of the patristic writers to apply the spiritualizing method of ALEXANDRIA in support of the observance of Sunday. A passing reference in Plato’s Republic to an eighth day is interpreted to mean that Plato spoke prophetically of the Lord’s Day (Stromata 5.14). Later on in the same work, he speaks of a Christian as a true Gnostic: “He, in fulfillment of the precept, according to the Gospel, keeps the Lord’s day, when he abandons an evil disposition, and assumes that of a Gnostic, glorifying the Lord’s resurrection in himself” (7.12). In thus spiritualizing both Sunday and the Sabbath, he implies that the Lord’s Day bears some analogy to the Hebrew Sabbath.

TERTULLIAN, the great apologist of the first quarter of the 3rd cent., in writing to Christians, insisted that “We have nothing to do with sabbaths or the other Jewish festivals, much less with those of the heathen. We have our own solemnities, the Lord’s day, for instance, and Pentecost” (On Idolatry 14). In writing to pagans, however, Tertullian contrasts the Christian observance of Sunday with the pagan rites connected with the worship of the sun, and suggests that there is a resemblance between the Christian observance of Sunday and the Jewish observance of Saturday as a day of rest (Ad nationes 1.13). His most famous statement is found in another work addressed to Christians, where he says: “We, on the day of the Lord’s resurrection, ought to guard not only against kneeling, but every office of solicitude, deferring even our businesses lest we give any place to the devil” (De oratione 23). Tertullian, then, was the first Christian writer to urge the cessation of labor on Sunday. He did not, however, base it on the Sabbath command, but on the need to preserve the Lord's Day as a day of worship.

ORIGEN, Clement's successor in the school of Alexandria, lived during the first half of the 3rd cent. Like his predecessor, he gave a spiritual interpretation to the observance of Sunday. In his famous defense of Christianity, he writes: "If it be objected to us on this subject that we ourselves are accustomed to observe certain days, as for example the Lord's day...I have to answer that to the perfect Christian, who is ever in his thoughts, words, and deeds serving his natural Lord, God the Word, Synagogue at Korazin (2nd-3rd cent. A.D.). Worship in the synagogues influenced both the style and setting of early Christian worship.

all his days are the Lord's, and he is always keeping the Lord's day" (Against Celsus 22). In spite of Origen's idealistic interpretation, he does bear witness to the Christian observance of the Lord's Day. The Syriac document of the DIDASCALIA APOSTOLORUM, or The Teaching of the Apostles, probably written in the second half of the 3rd cent., affirms that the Lord's Day was appointed by the apostles as a day of Christian worship. The statement reads: "The Apostles further appointed: On the first day of the week let there be service, and the reading of the Holy Scriptures, and the oblation: because on the first day of the week our Lord rose from the dead, and on the first day of the week he ascended up to heaven, and on the first day of the week he will appear at last with the angels of heaven" (ANF, 8:668). Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, in a synodical epistle from the third council of Carthage (A.D. 253), speaks of the Jewish practice of CIRCUMCISION on the eighth day as prefiguring the Christian observance of the Lord's Day (Epistles 64.4). Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, bears witness to the observance of Sunday at the beginning of the 4th cent. He writes: "We keep the Lord's Day as a day of joy, because of him who rose thereon" (The Canonical Epistle, canon 15). He concludes the testimony of the 3rd-cent. Christian writers to the continued observance of Sunday as a day of Christian worship based on the resurrection of Christ and the apostolic tradition.

III. The history of the Christian Sunday in the medieval church

A. The early medieval period (321-590). In 321 the Roman Emperor Constantine issued an edict that introduced a new era in the history of the Christian Sunday. Before this time Sunday had been observed by Christians as a day of worship, and, to some extent, also as a day of rest. It now became an officially recognized and prescribed day of rest. The edict permitted people living in the country to “attend to agriculture,” but commanded that “all judges, city-people and craftsmen shall rest on the venerable day of the Sun” (Bettenson, Documents, 26).

1. Christian writings. EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Caesarea, argued in his Ecclesiastical History (5.23) that the decision to celebrate Easter on Sunday was based on apostolic tradition. He extolled Constantine for his pious observance of the Lord’s Day and states that the emperor’s appointment of Sunday as a day of rest for all his subjects was “to lead all mankind to the worship of God” (Life of Constantine 4.18). Although Eusebius does not base the observance of Sunday on the Sabbath commandment, he does draw an analogy between the Lord’s Day and the Hebrew Sabbath (Commentary on the 91st Psalm [i.e., 92nd in Heb. Bible]).

Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria at the same time as Eusebius, applies the words of Ps. 118:24, “This is the day the LORD has made; let us rejoice and be glad in it,” to the Lord’s Day (Hessey, Sunday, 69). In another work he declares that the Sabbath, the end of the old creation, has deceased, and the Lord’s Day, the commencement of the new creation, has set in (The Sabbath and Circumcision, quoted in Hessey, Sunday, 68-69).

EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Constantia, Cyprus, in the latter half of the 4th cent., contrasts the Sabbath of the law with “the Great Sabbath,” which is Christ himself (Against Heresies 30.32). He asserts that the Lord’s Day and the observance of Wednesday and Friday as fast days were established by the apostles (Expos. fid. cathol. 22).

Gregory, Bishop of Nyssa, and Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, speak of both the Hebrew Sabbath and the Christian Sunday as allegorical of rest from sin. Gregory calls them “sister days” (De castig. quoted in Hessey, Sunday, 72). Ambrose prohibited fasting on the Lord’s Day (Epistles 13, quoted in William B. Trevelyan, Sunday [1902], 26).

AUGUSTINE, Bishop of Hippo, writing at the close of the 4th cent., condemns the practice of the MANICHEANS of fasting on the Lord's Day (Ep. 36, To Casulanus 11). In another epistle he distinguishes between the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Sunday, but sees them both as typical days, the Sabbath of the repose of the dead, and Sunday of the resurrection of the dead (Ep. 55, 12-13). Similarly, CHRYSOSTOM, Bishop of Constantinople, warns Christians against sabbatizing with the Jews (Comm. on I Cor., hom. 43), but maintains that Christian as well as Jewish ordinances have a spiritual interpretation (Comm. on Matt., hom. 39).

JEROME, at the beginning of the 5th cent., describes the activities of certain Egyptian Christians on Sunday: "Every Lord's day they spend their whole time in prayer and reading" (Letter 22). Paula and her companions, however, are described as follows: "On the Lord's day only they proceeded to the church beside which they lived, each company following its own mother-superior. Returning home in the same order, they then devoted themselves to their allotted tasks, and made garments either for themselves or else for others" (Letter 108).

The APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS, a manual of church order written about this time, provides valuable information concerning the status of Sunday observance at the beginning of the 5th cent. After giving directions concerning daily worship, it enjoins Christians: "And on the day of the Lord's resurrection, which is the Lord's day, meet more diligently, sending praise to God that made the universe by Jesus, and sent him to us, and condescended to let him suffer, and raised him from the dead" (2.7.59). Fasting and labor were forbidden on both the Sabbath and Sunday (5.3.20; 8.4.33). Sunday has begun to be associated with other Christian festivals and with the Jewish Sabbath, which is observed in a similar way; and Sunday observance is now being enforced by ecclesiastical rules.

2. Church councils and legislation. During the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries a number of church councils and imperial laws sought to enforce the proper observance of Sunday. The Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) passed a canon to make uniform the custom of standing for prayer on the Lord's Day (20th Canon). The Council of Gangra (c. 350), condemned fasting on the Lord's Day and those who despised the House of God and frequented schismatic assemblies. The Council of Laodicea (363), commands Christians not to observe Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, but Sunday as the day of rest. In 368, Theodosius the Great made an edict, repeating Constantine's permission of the manumission of slaves on Sunday and prohibiting trials before arbitrators, so that the sacred rites of religion should not be violated "on the day of the Sun, which our fathers rightly named the Lord's day" (quoted by Hessey, Sunday, 84).

The Fourth Council of Carthage (436) threatened excommunication for anyone who left church during the preaching, forbade fasting on the Lord's day, and discouraged attendance at the Games or the Public Circus on Sunday (Hessey, Sunday, 82). In 425, Theodosius the Younger had passed a law forbidding all games on Sunday and on other church festivals; in 469, another law was passed, forbidding the celebration of the games on Sunday even if that was the emperor's birthday (Hessey, Sunday, 83-84). In 538, the Third Council of Orleans forbade all agricultural work on Sunday, but condemned the practice of abstinence from journeys or of preparing meals as Judaistic (Trevelyan, Sunday, 46). The Second Council of Macon in 585, however, prohibited work and commanded worship on Sunday on the authority of the OT Sabbath regulations (Hessey, Sunday, 87-88).

During the period between Constantine and Gregory the Great, Sunday became a legalized day of rest, enforced by ecclesiastical and secular law; worship on the Lord's day was enjoined by church councils and imperial edicts; a number of other festivals came to be observed; and Sunday came to be less sharply distinguished from the Hebrew Sabbath.

B. The later medieval period (590-1517)

1. Christian writings. Among Christian writers during this period, the observance of Sunday gradually came to be based on the OT Sabbath commandments. As Christianity became more and more legalistic, it became quite natural for Christians to justify their legalism from the OT laws. So it was that, as Paul Cotton observes, “the Christian Sunday became a fixed and established institution with all the authority of the Roman government and the Hebrew Scriptures behind it” (From Sabbath to Sunday, 155).

Gregory the Great, who became Bishop of Rome in 590, wrote in most emphatic language against Sabbatarianism, which he called a doctrine of Antichrist (Epistles 11.3). Similarly, Theodulphus, Bishop of Orleans in the 8th cent., pled for the observance of Sunday in accordance with its character as a day of Christian worship, not on the grounds of the Hebrew Sabbath law (Hessey, Sunday, 93).

The pleas of such men went unheeded. Alcuin, at the close of the 8th cent., based the observance of Sunday on the same foundation as the observance of the Hebrew Sabbath. He asserts: “Christian custom has transferred the observance of the Sabbath to the Lord’s Day” (Homily 18, post Pentec.). Bernard of Clairvaux in the 12th cent. grounded both the Lord’s Day and other holy days on the fourth commandment (Hessey, Sunday, 89–90). Peter Alphonsus, in the same century, was the first to use the term “Christian Sabbath” of the Lord’s Day (Hessey, Sunday, 90).

Thomas Aquinas in the 13th cent. was the first to apply the distinctions of moral and ceremonial law to the observance of Sunday. He distinguished in the fourth commandment the moral element of an obligatory stated worship of God from the ceremonial element of the seventh day, and said: “The observance of Sunday under the new law follows the keeping of the Sabbath, not in consequence of a legal precept, but from the decision of the Church and the custom of Christians” (S. E. Warren, The Sunday Question [1890], 109). Tostatus, Bishop of Avila in the 14th cent., laid down a whole series of ordinances based on the regulations concerning the manna in Exod. 16:31-35, including prohibitions against hiring a musician, cooking a feast, washing dishes, traveling to places other than a shrine, or working for profit on the Lord’s Day (Hessey, Sunday, 91–92).

2. Church councils and legislation. Both church councils and secular rulers imposed restrictions on the observance of Sunday similar to those imposed on the observance of the Jewish Sabbath. The Council of Clovishoff, held in England in 747, forbade traveling on the Lord’s Day (Hessey, Sunday, 89). The Constitutions of Egbert in 749 forbade all work on Sunday under severe penalties (Hessey, Sunday, 89). In France, Charlemagne promulgated a decree in 789 that prohibited all ordinary labor on Sunday as a breach of the fourth commandment (Charles Huestis, Sunday in the Making [1929], 115). The exemption granted by Constantine to agricultural labor was repealed by the Emperor Leo Philosophus in 910, but he based his prohibition, not on the fourth commandment, but on apostolic appointment of Sunday (Hessey, Sunday, 94). The Archbishop of Canterbury, in the 14th cent., ordered “abstinence from secular works...on the sacred day of the Lord,” but warned the people not to meet before Saturday evening for fear that they “partake in the Jewish profession” (ibid.).

There developed in the later medieval period an ecclesiastical Sabbatarianism. Sunday became known as the Christian Sabbath; its observance was grounded on the fourth commandment or on the canons of the church; and its observance was enforced by severe ecclesiastical and secular restrictions. Other holy days with similar restrictions were imposed on the people, with the result that neither they nor the Lord's Day were observed as days of worship, but rather deteriorated into mere holidays devoted to idleness and dissipation (Warren, The Sunday Question, 121).

IV. The history of the Christian Sunday in the modern church

A. The Reformation Period (1517-1648)

1. The teaching of the Reformers. Martin Luther maintained that the believer in Christ was not subject to laws or ceremonies; for the believer all time was holy, so there was no need of festivals such as Sunday or the Sabbath. He realized, however, the benefits to be derived from a weekly day of rest and worship. In the Larger Catechism, he taught that the working classes needed a weekly day of rest so that there might be time for worship, but he insists that "no day is better or more excellent than another." In his Table Talk, he speaks out against making Sunday observance rest on a Jewish foundation: "If anywhere the day is made holy for the mere day's sake—if anywhere anyone sets up its observance on a Jewish foundation, then I order you to work on it, to ride on it, to dance on it, to feast on it, to do anything that shall remove this encroachment on Christian liberty."

Ulrich Zwingli shared Luther's view that the worship of God should not be tied down to any one day. He wrote: "If we would have the Lord's day so confined to a certain time, that it shall be thought wicked to transfer it to another time...this day, so scrupulously limited to a certain day, would impose on us a ceremony. For we are in no way bound to time, but time ought so to serve us, as to make it lawful, and permitted to each church, when necessity urges...to transfer the solemnity and rest of the Lord's day or sabbath to some other day" (Warren, The Sunday Question, 124-25).

John Calvin regarded the Hebrew Sabbath as typical of the entire rest and peace granted to Christians under the gospel. It was a part of the "shadow of things to come" (Col. 2:17 KJV) fulfilled in Christ, who is the body, the whole essence of the truth. He concludes: "This is not contented with one day, but requires the whole course of our lives, until being completely dead to ourselves, we are filled with the life of God. Christians, therefore, should have nothing to do with a superstitious observance of days" (Institutes of the Christian Religion 2.8). Calvin, however, saw the advisability of setting apart one day in seven as a day for Christian worship, but treats the observance of Sunday as a matter of expediency, and not an adherence to a shadowy ceremony.

John Knox agreed substantially with the opinions of Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin regarding the observance of Sunday. He did, however, advocate a greater strictness in keeping Sunday as a day of worship (Book of Discipline). All of the Reformers insisted that Sunday observance should not be based on the OT Sabbath commandment or in any way connected with the Hebrew Sabbath. The observance of Sunday was to be maintained as a matter of expediency, for it afforded rest for the body and an opportunity for united worship of God, especially in view of the fact that the day had been previously chosen for these purposes.

2. Creedal statements. The creedal statements produced in the post-Reformation period are significant, for they represent not simply the opinions of individual men, but the views of various groups with respect to the nature and obligation of Sunday observance.

The Confession of Augsburg, produced by Luther and Melancthon in 1530, says in part: "For they that think that the observation [sic] of the Lord's Day was appointed by the authority of the Church, instead of the Sabbath, as necessary, are greatly deceived. The Scripture...has abrogated the Sabbath. And yet, because it was requisite to appoint a certain day that the people might know when they ought to come together, it appears that the Church did for that purpose appoint the Lord's day" (Philip Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, 3 vols., 6th ed. [1919], 3:69).

The Second Helvetic Confession, prepared by Henry Bullinger and edited by Theodore Beza in 1566, was a formulation of the faith of the Reformed churches in Switzerland. In an article relating to the observance of Sunday, it reads: "Although religion be not tied unto time, yet can it not be planted and exercised without a due dividing and allotting out of time. Every church, therefore, does choose unto itself a certain time for public prayers, and for the preaching of the Gospel, and for the celebration of the sacraments. In regard hereof, we see that in the ancient churches there were not only certain set hours in the week appointed for meetings, but that also the Lord's Day itself, ever since the apostles' time, was consecrated to religious exercises and to a holy rest; which also is now very well observed by our churches" (Schaff, Creeds, 3:899).

In an entirely different vein, the Westminster Confession of Faith (1643) states: "As it is of the law of nature, that, in general, a due proportion of time be set apart for the worship of God; so, in his word, by a positive, moral, and perpetual commandment, binding all men in all ages, he hath particularly appointed one day in seven for a Sabbath, to be kept holy unto him; which, from the beginning of the world to the Resurrection of Christ, was the last day of the week; and from the Resurrection of Christ was changed into the first day of the week, which in Scripture is called the Lord's Day, and is to be continued to the end of the world as the Christian Sabbath" (Schaff, Creeds, 3:658-59).

3. Puritanism. The Westminster Confession was the product of English Puritanism, which arose in England in the 17th cent. as a protest against the polity and practices of the Church of England that the Puritans regarded as contrary to Scripture. Since they held that only what was specifically commanded in Scripture should be believed or practiced, and since they did not find any command in the NT to observe the Lord's Day, they boldly identified it with the Sabbath of the fourth commandment and enforced its observance with all the rigor of the ancient Hebrew Sabbath (H. R. Gamble, Sunday and the Sabbath [1901], 121-22). A book entitled The True Doctrine of the Sabbath, written by Nicholas Bownd in 1595, was very influential in promulgating the Puritan doctrine of Sabbatarianism. He not only based the observance of Sunday on the fourth commandment, which he regarded as moral and perpetual, but he set forth specific prohibitions of various kinds of labor on the Lord's Day.

The Puritan teachings affected other countries besides England. They were accepted by the Church and the Parliament of Scotland. They were introduced into Holland and became a part of the Synod of Dort held in Holland in 1618. Finally, the Puritans brought their Christian Sabbath to America, where it became the prevailing view for centuries.

B. The modern period (1648 to the present)

1. Sunday on the continent of Europe. Even though the Synod of Dort had adopted the view of the Puritans that Sunday was the Christian Sabbath, and persons such as J. L. Mosheim advocated the view that Sunday was an institution entirely distinct from the Sabbath and that it had been founded by the apostles of Christ under divine guidance, these views were never widely accepted on the continent of Europe. The view that prevailed was a purely ecclesiastical one, that is, that the observance of Sunday was based solely on the authority of the church. E. W. Hengstenberg, for example, maintained that the Sabbath was a Jewish institution that had been abrogated by Christ. The Sabbath may have suggested Sunday as a weekly day of worship. Sunday, however, was not instituted by Christ or by his apostles; it arose simply from the spontaneous feeling of the early church, guided by the Holy Spirit (Hessey, Sunday, 181-83).

The practical result of such a subjective view of the basis of obligation to observe Sunday was a widespread desecration of the Lord's Day on the continent of Europe. The teachings of the Reformers regarding Christian liberty, in spite of their exhortations to keep the day as a day of worship, led in many cases to antinomianism in practice as well as in principle. For a brief time at the close of the 18th cent., France abolished Sunday as a weekly day of rest. In other places Sunday was treated much like any other day. For the most part this condition has prevailed to the present time.

2. Sunday in England and Scotland. Due to the teachings of the Puritans in these countries, a fuller consideration of the subject of Sunday observance took place, which resulted in a more wholesome and Christian observance of the day, especially during the 17th cent. and the early part of the 18th. After a period of spiritual and moral decline in the first half of the 18th cent., the evangelical revival under John Wesley and George Whitefield brought about a better observance of the Lord's Day. During the century following the evangelical revival, Sabbatarian and ecclesiastical views of Sunday observance vied with each other. Bishop Hessey's monumental work in the middle of the 19th cent. was an attempt to reconcile these two opposing views by basing the observance of the Lord's Day neither on the authority of the OT Sabbath command nor on the authority of the church, but on the authority of Christ and the teaching and practice of the apostles. In spite of such efforts to recover a proper observance of the day, there was a manifest decline in church attendance and in any spiritual observance of the day during the 20th cent.

Nearly the same state of affairs has been characteristic of Scotland, where for more than two centuries the Christian Sabbath of the Puritans was taught and enforced with a great deal of rigor. By the beginning of the 20th cent., a widespread reaction set in to these Puritan teachings and practices.

3. Sunday in the United States. The Puritans who came to America established their Christian Sabbath as an integral part of their social and religious life. To insure the due observance of their sacred day, they enacted laws, which came to be known as "Blue Laws," laws even stricter than those formulated by the ancient Jews to enforce the observance of their Sabbath. Beginning at sundown on Saturday evening, all forms of work or recreation were strictly forbidden under pain of severe penalties. Although such restrictions were regarded by many as altogether too strict, to those who gladly accepted them, the Sabbath must have been a welcome respite. As Alice M. Earle expresses it, "Sweet to the Pilgrims and to their descendants was the hush of their calm Saturday night, and their still, tranquil Sabbath—sign and token to them, not only of the weekly rest ordained in the creation, but of the eternal rest to come. The universal quiet and peace of the community showed the primitive instinct of a pure, simple devotion, the sincere religion which knew no compromise in spiritual things, no half-way obedience to God's Word, but rest absolutely on the Lord's Day—as was commanded. No work, no play, no idle strolling was known; no sign of human life or motion was seen except the necessary care of the patient cattle and other dumb beasts, the orderly and quiet going to and from the meeting, and at the nooning, a visit to the churchyard to stand by the side of the silent dead. This absolute obedience to the letter, as well as to the spirit of God's Word, was one of the most typical traits of the character of the Puritans, and appeared to them to be one of the most vital points of their religion" (The Sabbath in Puritan New England [1893], 258).

The influence of Puritanism on American religious life cannot be overemphasized. The Christian Sabbath of the Puritans, so much a part of their religious life, worked itself into the hearts and minds of the American people and became a standard of the ideal Sunday of America for many generations. Beginning in the 19th cent., however, a marked reaction set in to the strict Sunday of the Puritans, especially to the laws that had been enacted to enforce its observance. This natural and inevitable reaction was augmented by the importation to America of the Continental Sunday. Crafts and Waffle, both writing in 1885, decry the growing desecration of the Lord's Day at that time. A report made in 1917 to the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ noted that while Sunday was being observed as a day of rest, its observance as a day of worship was declining (Christian Cooperation and World Redemption, 149). In 1933, R. H. Martin wrote: "America faces the peril of losing the Christian Sabbath. The holy day of our fathers is fast becoming a day for secular business and amusements, and little is being done to save it" (The Day: A Manual on the Christian Sabbath [1933], preface).

In spite of the efforts of individuals such as R. H. Martin, and of organizations such as the Lord's Day Alliance, to promote the due observance of Sunday as a day of rest and worship, the reaction to the strict observance of Sunday so characteristic of the Puritans has continued, and the observance of the day has continued to become more lax. This neglect of Sunday observance may be correlated with a general decline in spiritual matters. Even when renewed interest in spiritual things has been manifest, there does not seem to be any stricter observance of the Lord's Day. Sunday has, rather, become a day of business and recreation, with only an hour or two in the morning set aside for worship, and that only by devout Christians.

V. Conclusion. Many different views have been held regarding the nature of the Lord's Day and the Christian's obligation to observe it. These may be comprehended under three general classifications: Sabbatarian, ecclesiastical, and utilitarian.

The Sabbatarian view holds Sunday to be a Christian Sabbath and its observance to be based on the fourth commandment of the Decalogue. Its proponents, however, maintain that it is not the seventh day that is important in the Sabbath command, but the principle of one day in seven. Otherwise, the command is held to be moral and binding on all people. To be consistent, others have insisted that, if this command is binding on all people in all ages, then the seventh day should be observed. This is the view of Seventh-day Adventists and Seventh-day Baptists.

The purely ecclesiastical view holds that the Christian is to observe Sunday solely on the authority of the church. A modified ecclesiastical view is that Sunday was established by Christ through his apostles. They point to the NT references to the practice of observing the Lord's Day as a weekly day of worship in the early church.

The Reformers and modern dispensationalists have insisted that the Christian is not under obligation to observe any day, but for expediency it is good to observe the day.

The biblical view seems to incorporate some of each of these views. Christianity did have its roots in Judaism. It was, therefore, to be expected that Sunday would borrow many of its features from the Hebrew Sabbath. The divine institution of the Sabbath at the close of creation indicates the human need for a weekly day of rest. The fourth commandment was given specifically to Israel and applies in the strictest sense only to that nation. It does, however, contain principles that are moral and eternal. It recognizes the duty of man to worship his Creator, for which stated times for worship are needed. Jesus regarded the Sabbath as a provision for human need and not as a burdensome legal requirement. Neither he nor his apostles even enjoin the Sabbath on their followers. According to many expositors, Paul clearly indicates that the Sabbath was part of the old covenant that was done away in Christ. There is not the slightest hint that Christ or the apostles changed the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week.

The NT shows that the first day of the week was made especially significant by the resurrection of Christ and his appearances to his disciples on that day. Other NT references to the first day of the week indicate that it was observed as a day of Christian worship in NT times. References in the writings of the early church fathers show its continued observance as a day of worship in the centuries following the NT age. Only gradually did it also become a day of rest, and this not before the 4th Christian century.

No specific command is given in the Bible to observe Sunday as a day of rest and worship. While ideally the Christian should observe every day as holy, and should need nothing except expediency and love to lead him to worship God, antinomian views have failed to motivate most people to observe regular times for worship. This writer believes that a true devotion to the Lord Jesus Christ will lead a Christian to observe the Lord's Day as a day when he turns from his ordinary weekday activities to worship the Lord in commemoration of Christ's resurrection from the dead and to engage in Christian service for his Lord.

Lord's Prayer. The traditional name given to the prayer Jesus taught his disciples, as recorded in Matt. 6:9-13 and Lk. 11:2-4. Without a doubt this is the most widely known passage from the Bible and has been included in almost all of the Christian catechisms and liturgies since the days of the APOSTOLIC FATHERS. So familiar is it that in many languages it is usually known by its first line (e.g., Lat. Pater noster, Ger. Unser Vater, Dutch Onze Vader, Spanish Padre nuestro).

I. The parallel texts. The text of the prayer is given in Matthew's narrative of the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, which Jesus preached to a large crowd on the N shore of the Sea of Galilee. There is strong indication that the original language of the prayer was ARAMAIC. The version of the prayer given by Luke is not set in the same historical situation but included in that portion traditionally known as the Perean Period after Jesus' departure from Galilee. The Lukan version is shorter and incorporated in a general discourse on prayer (Lk. 11:1-13). There is no question that the Lord's Prayer was repeated by Jesus on any number of occasions, so the older critical argument against the authenticity of either passage is totally without merit.

A large number of MSS, including the late Greek minuscules of certain groupings and some VULGATE texts, end the prayer in Matthew with "Amen." Other phrases of an expanded doxology also are found, most of which appear to have begun as interpolations and insertions from liturgies. Sahidic versions of Upper Egypt (3rd cent. A.D.) and the DIDACHE read, "because yours is the kingdom." Four or five lesser versions omit the rest of the ending, but almost all the Vulgate and late Greek MSS continue with, "and the power and the glory unto the ages. Amen." This full doxology has been incorporated into almost all later translations of the text of the prayer.

Strangely enough, few extensive critical alterations in the body of the Matthew text have been proposed. However, there are a number of readings extant in the MSS that show attempts to bring the shorter Lukan version into agreement with the Matthean. The argument as to which form was original is without much validity, since each recorded his remembrance and the two are sufficiently similar to have been certainly repeated in variant forms. Many attempts have been made to justify and unite the two strands of the tradition, but so far unsuccessfully. The liturgical emphasis in the prayer has been overdone by a number of writers, but such a motivation does exist in many of the ancient prayers in both OT and NT. There is no doubt that the prayer was repeated as a devotional exercise and used in the corporate worship, and the two forms must have been dominant in various localities. Whether this is sufficient explanation for the two texts to exist seems irrelevant. The fact is that they did and that they were recorded in the inspired word.

II. Organization and outline

A. Introduction. The address or invocation of the prayer follows in both cases a discourse on PRAYER by Jesus. The early church seems to have adopted certain mixed liturgical phrases in Aramaic and Greek (cf. Rom. 8:15). Although there is evidence of the familiar form of address to God in Jewish prayer, it is more likely that Jesus here utilized the common piety of the people. The specific sense in which God's FATHERHOOD is interpreted has been a source of some debate. The three primary opinions are that the address refers to God's creative fatherhood (Deut. 32:6 et al.), to God's special relationship to Israel (Jer. 3:4 et al.), or to God's fatherhood by virtue of redemption (Isa. 63:16). Suffice it to say that none of these forms of address appears to have been popular within rabbinic Judaism until after the Christian era began.

The additional phrase "who is in heaven" is characteristic of the qualifying usage of both Judaism and the Gospel of Matthew. It is quite probable that the usual form of the prayer as remembered in the early church was simply "Father," and Jesus may have used this simple vocative frequently. The Aramaic ABBA is found in early Christian liturgies. The MSS are practically unanimous in supporting the reading “Father.” At one stroke the dual errors of pantheism and deism are rejected and the Christian’s worship is directed toward a personal, objective, and living God. The phrase in Matthew does not detract from the force of this expression but simply qualifies it in the minds of the Jewish hearers.

B. First petition. “May your name be held in reverence” refers back to the giving of the COVENANT name Yahweh (Exod. 3:13-14; see GOD, NAMES OF) and to the third commandment of the Decalogue (20:7). God’s name in the Bible is not merely his appellation but the characteristic REVELATION of himself to people. All the perfections and attributes he has disclosed in his covenant and his working in history are summarized in the knowledge of his name. To defile or deface, subvert or dishonor the divine name is to reject the SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD. In this and the two subsequent petitions the passive voice of the verbs is employed while the later petitions switch to the active. Appeals and exhortations for the “blessing of the name” were commonplace in Jewish prayers of the time. Although an eschatological aspect is involved, it is not the foremost one. The hallowing or sanctifying of the name implies no supernatural practice but simply refers to the recognition in every area of life in the cosmos of the sovereign presence and HOLINESS of God. The petition places no limit of time or space in which God’s name is to be kept holy—the universality of the prayer is immediate and all encompassing.

C. Second petition. “May your kingdom come.” Few biblical concepts are as all-pervasive as the KINGDOM OF GOD. The divine kingship in the OT has been carefully studied in contemporary theological works. The same importance is attached to it in the comprehension of the gospel narratives. Jesus was above all the heavenly exemplar, the King of the Jews, and as such his position as the final ruler of the house of David is emphasized repeatedly in the NT (Matt. 21). The wish invites the eschatological fullness, the final completion of the coming of the kingdom. The reference is to the messianic kingdom. It was brought to effect in Christ and will be completed wholly at the PAROUSIA.

The assertion that this was a specifically Jewish notion is without warrant, for God is rarely summoned as Israel’s king either in or out of the rabbinical tradition. What the Jewish liturgies seek is the reformation and triumph of the Davidic kingdom. In some few versions and MSS the text of Luke is altered to read, “may your Holy Spirit descend upon us and cleanse us.” The earliest substitution of this reading dates from the 3rd cent. Such an emphasis of the catharsis of the Spirit was popular during the high Middle Ages (e.g., St. Joachim of Floria, c. 1202), and the future often was portrayed as the Age of the Holy Spirit, a time of cleansing, renewal, and reformation of the monastic institution. Such interpolations were derived from liturgical phrases introduced into the text as glosses.

D. Third petition. “May your will be done.” The will of God is the goal of Christian ETHICS and the norm of Christian OBEDIENCE. The will of God is revealed only in the Scriptures as inspired and pertains to the creation law order which God has ordained. The complete fulfillment of God’s will on earth is an eschatological end. The perceptive teaching of the Scripture on God’s will must be applied and reapplied in each situation by the people of God.

E. Fourth petition. “As in heaven so upon earth.” This is a continuation and extension of the third request, and details the cases in which God's word and will are active. The idea of HEAVEN as a location is inextricable from the doctrine that it is the place and status where God's will is carried out perfectly in all respects. Thus earth, the sphere of human activity, would become the total environment of God's will. (The third and fourth petitions are lacking in Luke's version.)

F. Fifth petition. "Our daily bread, give us this day," is based on a common Semitic ideal, the royal or divine provision for the needs of the subjects (this and the remaining petitions have active rather than passive verbal forms). The term epiousios has been found only once in secular classical texts (F. Prei-sigke, Sammelbuch griechische Urkunden aus Ägypten [1915-1950], 5224, 20), and even that occurrence is doubtful. The word's etymology is disputed, and at least four major interpretations have been proposed: (1) "necessary for existence, needful for life" (as early as ORIGEN and CHRYSOSTOM); (2) "for this current day" (first proposed by A. Debrunner); (3) "for the following day," referring to a "daily" ration (H. Grotius and many after him); (4) "for tomorrow, the future" (as early as Cyril of Alexandria). The last of these derives the term from eimi, "to go, come" (rather than from eimi, "to be"), thus "the coming bread," and is popular among scholars who stress the eschatological thrust of Jesus' teaching in general and of the Lord's Prayer in particular (e.g., J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, Part One: The Proclamation of Jesus [1971], 199-201, who interprets the petition as a request for receiving the bread of the time of salvation now, in the midst of a world enslaved by Satan).

The old rendering "required for our food," or the like, is to be preferred. The purpose of the petition is to relieve anxiety about material concerns and to rest in God's provision alone. The passage may also allude to the "bread of life," with its eschatological implications—the desire for participation in the heavenly feast as an integral part of the request. However, although there must be some fulfillment of this petition in the parousia, there is also the simple day-by-day providence of God which is in view. Both views gain some credence from the material of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, in which the communal meal fills a central role. (See further TDNT, 2:590-99; E. M. Yamauchi in WTJ 28 [1966]: 145-56; BDAG, 376-77.)

G. Sixth petition. "And forgive us our wrongs as we forgive those who have wronged us." The Lukan version specifically has "sin" (hamartia G281) rather than the Semitic usage of "debt" (opheilēma G4052, reflecting the moral sense of Aram. ḥōbā'). This request is clearly in opposition to any concepts of either sinless perfection or neutrality; the doctrine of total DEPRAVITY is one of the most maligned by modern culture, but it is the very basis of both prayer and redemption. There is some evidence in the versions that the secondary FORGIVENESS (from God) is in the future, but it does not greatly alter the meaning of the text. Although there is not the least comparison of degree between the two forgivenesses, they are related, and in this sense God's mercy is to be reciprocated by human compassion. Such sensitive moral relationships are simply avoided in the DSS and rarely mentioned in the later rabbinic literature. The concurrence of divine and human forgiveness involves sin and not mere intrusion. The importance of the two activities is made plain in a number of passages. (The translation "trespass," found in some liturgical forms of the Lord's Prayer, is totally without warrant in the Greek text.)

H. Seventh petition. "And lead us not into hard trials but deliver us from evil," has in view the humility of entrustment to God's perseverance. The difficulties of the passage have caused a number of variants, including the rendering, "Let us not fall to temptation," found in certain ancient versions.

The key term is Greek peirasmos G4280, which means the sorest kind of testing or trial; nowhere, unless qualified, does it denote a solicitation to evil (Heb. 3:8). The text can be compared to Jas. 1:13, where the subject is not testing, but TEMPTATION. The notion at the heart of the petition is that of escape from such difficulty, deliverance from such trials. In this sense it is similar to Rom. 8:23 and other passages. Since this deliverance from the presence of evil, whether moral or physical, was based upon an eschatological state and would signify the satisfaction of all the other petitions, it logically comes at the end of the prayer. In the second phrase (found only in Matthew), tou ponērou, “the evil,” can easily be read in the sense of “the evil one” (so NIV; cf. Jn. 17:15).

I. Doxology and Close. “Because yours is the kingdom and the power and the glory unto the ages. Amen.” This addition is found in no ancient commentator or exegete. It is totally and completely an intrusion from liturgical sources. There is also the singular fact that the Gospels contain no doxologies ascribed to Jesus and they are foreign to either Jewish or Aramaic prayers. It was probably an ancient response of the congregation. In both the Didache and the early 3rd and 4th cent. liturgies, a number of doxological phrases were said in the prayers, the congregation answering aloud antiphonally to the deacon or presbyter. For the reason that it is so much a part of the heritage of the church throughout the ages, it is not a detraction to the text as long as it is an acknowledged gloss of later origin. In both Matthew and Luke, the passages that follow continue points of issue raised in the prayer. The whole was not then a spiritual exercise but an instruction given to be followed.

III. The Biblical theology of the prayer. It has been stated repeatedly that the prayer is an epitome of all of Jesus’ teachings. The assumption is that Jesus was teaching his disciples about his faith and conception of God. This does not take into consideration that there is no evidence that Jesus was actually praying this prayer. The context clearly indicates that he was teaching it. Jesus’ messianic consciousness was such that he saw himself in a peculiar and unique relationship to the Father. This is made clear in his prayer in Jn. 17. In effect, this latter passage is “the Lord’s Prayer,” Jesus’ intercession for the disciples, while the prayer of Matt. 6 and Lk. 11 was to be used by those who believed in him and the heavenly Father.

In this light the true eschatological meaning of the seven petitions becomes clear. Many modern authors have missed this central point by assuming a dialectic tension between Jesus’ messianic expectation of the future and his immediate concern for the present. In such a tension the believer’s prayer becomes an existential involvement, but this interpretation is totally unwarranted by the text. Life in the Christian covenant is an experiential and daily affair, but its basis and bounds are in Christ and it seeks to follow and expound its faith as revealed in the Word of God, of which this prayer is a part. This belief means that the prayer is more than an epitome of our Lord’s message, and more vital and significant than a mere set of propositions. It is a vehicle and means to the throne of God. Through it and by it we approach God’s majesty and he provides for his children.

Of special importance is the fact that the pronouns of the prayer are plural. The church which prays this prayer is to be a community, a body of believers. The prayer was not formulated for singular, personal devotion; it was to be an act of corporate worship. The needs of the church and of its members are made more certain in regard to the coming of the kingdom. The character of the prayer is totally determined by the person and work of Christ in redemption, for it is by his act of atonement that any or all of the petitions are granted. The theme of the prayer is Christocentric. There are no tensions in its petitions as it summarizes its motives in the will of God—past, present, and future.

IV. Its place in the church. The Jewish synagogue and temple services were filled with rich liturgies; the Psalms, laws, and many responses were said in unison and antiphonally. There is much evidence that the early church kept this system of worship and added to it the prayers and phrases of the NT. There are many doxologies and liturgical phrases incorporated into the texts of the epistles (Jude 24-25).

How early the divine offices or stated prayers became fixed in the history of the church is conjectured, but certainly by the 4th cent. there was a clear set of hourly devotions. The prayer books from the early medieval period show the repetition of the Lord's Prayer at all six of the stated "hours": matins, lauds, terce, sext, none, and vespers. The wealth and welter of conflicting rituals led the Franciscans to shorten and condense as well as collate the services in the Breviary, and its companion the Missal for the communion. But the prayer was central in both. The Lutheran liturgy followed the custom of the Lollards and the Bohemian Brethren in merely translating the prayer from Latin into the colloquial speech.

The Reformed churches that followed Calvin and the Swiss Reformation dispensed with much of the medieval liturgy but retained the Lord's Prayer in a French version. Among the Reformed churches it was removed from the liturgy, but placed in the catechism. It is discussed and demonstrated in questions 86 to 129 of the Heidelberg Catechism, and was an integral part of the Reformed doctrine of prayer. Although numerous revisions of creeds and standards have been effected in more recent times, the need for a common statement of conviction has forced the acceptance of a more common liturgy. Many ecclesiastical bodies have been forced to come to terms with mutual liturgies when the central cohesion of doctrine failed. The result has been a new interest in prayer. However, most recent studies lean heavily upon psychoanalytic insights and approach corporate worship as phenomena of group dynamics. Such attempts are far from the purpose of the Scriptures.

(A vast number of devotional, homiletic, and exegetical commentaries have been written on the text and numerous word studies are available; also commentaries on the catechisms in which the Lord's Prayer is included. Notable works include M. Margoliouth, The Lord's Prayer No Adaptation of Existing Jewish Petitions [1876]; H.J. Van Dyke, The Lord's Prayer [1891]; R. Lord's Supper. This expression is found only once in the NT (kyriakon deipnon, 1 Cor. 11:20), where it refers not only to the special Christian rite of breaking the bread and drinking the cup, but also to the love feast that accompanied it. The expression "breaking of bread," which occurs frequently in Acts, may be another way the NT had of referring to the Lord's Supper. Certainly it became so in subsequent years of the church's history. But later names for this observance, such as COMMUNION and EUCHARIST, are not used in the NT in any technical sense. The former, however, is derived from 1 Cor. 10:16, where Paul spoke of the koinōnia G3126 of the body and blood of Christ; the latter from Jesus' act of thanksgiving before he offered the cup to his disciples (eucharisteō

I. The Last Supper. This institution, by whatever name it was called, began with that Last Supper Jesus had with his friends before his death. The principal texts dealing with this subject are: Matt. 26:26-29; Mk. 14:22-25; Lk. 22:14-20; and 1 Cor. 11:23-26.

A. *Was the Last Supper a Passover meal? The Lord's Supper has been a subject of much recent scholarly debate, with the center of this debate being its relation to the PASSOVER meal. No consensus has been forthcoming. The problem arises from the differences existing between the Synoptic Gospels' account of the Last Supper and John's dating of Christ's CRUCIFIXION, on the one hand, and from the description of the supper itself and of the events surrounding it by the first three evangelists, on the other.

Seemingly the Synoptic Gospels claim that Jesus celebrated the Passover with his disciples and that the Last Supper grew out of the Passover meal (Matt. 26:17-29; Mk. 14:12-25; Lk. 22:7-20). John, however, has been understood to say that the Last Supper took place "before the Passover Feast" (Jn. 13:1-2, 21-30), and that Jesus, therefore, did not eat the Passover with his disciples, but was himself the supreme paschal sacrifice, put to death simultaneously with the slaughter of the Passover lambs (cf. Jn. 18:28; 19:12-14).

Some scholars assume the correctness of the Johannine account and explain the Last Supper of the synoptic narratives as an ordinary meal, or as a special meal such as those commonly shared by members of a religious association (rabbinic ḥăbûrâ), but not a Passover. They assume that the synoptics mistakenly linked it with the Passover because of the paschal nature of the supper. These scholars understand the words of Jesus, "I have eagerly desired to eat this Passover with you" (Lk. 22:15), to be an expression of intense desire on his part but not the satisfaction of a realized experience. They note that the synoptics never use the technical term for unleavened bread when they describe the Last Supper. Nor do they mention the lamb or the bitter herbs. The Gospels speak of a common cup shared by all the disciples, while, allegedly, only individual cups were used at the Passover. They refer to one or two cups of wine only, whereas the Passover ritual included four. It is also pointed out that Paul, although he writes about the Last Supper, does not describe it as a Passover in 1 Cor. 11:23-26, and that the early church celebrated the Lord's Supper once a week, or oftener, rather than once a year only, as might be expected had the Last Supper originated as the annual Passover meal (see below). Other objections to the Last Supper being a Passover meal have to do with events in the gospel narrative which seemingly could not have taken place on the festival day, Nisan 15, such as the session of the SANHEDRIN and condemnation of Jesus on the same night that the Passover meal was to be eaten. (A. H. McNeile, The Gospel according to St. Matthew [1915], 377ff.; G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy [1945], 50-52.)

Other scholars, however, side with the synoptics and assert that the fourth gospel is theologically motivated rather than historically accurate. John wished to present Jesus as the Passover lamb par excellence, put to death coincidentally with the other Passover lambs. Certainly the synoptic writers intended to say that the Last Supper was a Passover meal. This is most clearly presented in Luke, where the preparations for the supper are located precisely on the day on which the Passover lamb (pascha G4247) had to be sacrificed (Lk. 22:7). These evangelists also note that the Last Supper took place in the evening (Mk. 14:17), that Jesus and his disciples reclined at dinner (Matt. 26:20) in a day when Jewish people regularly sat at table for ordinary meals, that there was a dipping ceremony (Matt. 26:23), and that the Supper concluded with the singing of a hymn (Mk. 14:26)—all of which are important characteristics of the Passover ritual (see below and J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus [1955], 14-60, who gives detailed and convincing evidence for the Last Supper being a Passover meal).

Serious attempts have been made to harmonize the synoptic accounts with that of John so as to allow each to preserve its particular theological emphasis, and at the same time to be historically accurate. One of the more fruitful attempts is that based on information concerning Jewish calendars (see J. van Goudoever, Biblical Calendar [1959]). Apparently in Jesus' day there were two dates for celebrating the Passover. The people of Qumran as well as other groups followed an unofficial calendar according to which killing of the lambs and the Passover supper regularly fell on a Tuesday afternoon and evening, a time deliberately different from the date of the Passover according to the official calendar (Nisan 14-15 in both calendars).

If this is so, then it is possible that the high priest and the people ate the paschal lamb on the evening of the day of Christ's death, a Friday (paraskeuē G4187, as the Johannine account has it, Jn. 19:14 et al.), whereas Jesus and his disciples had already eaten it on the Tuesday before (as the synoptics relate, Mk. 14:12; Lk. 22:7), in each case on the 14th-15th of Nisan (Exod. 12:6; Lev. 23:5). Jesus' reason for celebrating the Passover in this way, apart from the possibility that he may have opposed the establishment at Jerusalem, may have been his desire to observe this ancient ritual of the Passover on a legal day before bringing it to an end by his death on the day of the official Passover. This explanation of the Passover provides additional time (which the synoptic writers telescope) between the Last Supper and the crucifixion—a factor that helps resolve some of the difficulties of the passion narrative, such as how the death of Jesus could take place on the same day as that of his trial, when Jewish law forbade this from happening. (See A. Jaubert, The Date of the Last Supper [1965], 102, 121.) See CHRONOLOGY (NT) I.B.5.

B. The words Of institution. Assuming that the Last Supper was a Passover meal, then Jesus' words, instituting the new Christian supper, were spoken in a context of the Passover ritual and should be interpreted accordingly. The liturgy of the Passover began with the presiding person pronouncing a blessing (the kiddush) over the first cup of wine, which at the Passover meal was always red. This then was drunk by him and the others present, and was followed by bitter herbs dipped into haroseth, a fruit sauce, and eaten. Next came the explanation of the feast when the food for the main meal was brought in. The son first asked his father why this night differed from other nights, and he replied by saying that the Passover lamb is eaten because God passed over the house of our fathers in Egypt (Exod. 12:26-27), the unleavened bread because our fathers were redeemed from Egypt (12:39), and the bitter herbs because the Egyptians embittered the lives of our fathers in Egypt (1:14).

Afterwards the family or group sang the first part of the HALLEL (Ps. 113 or both 113 and 114). Then came the drinking of a second cup followed by the president's taking unleavened bread and blessing God with these words: "Blessed art thou who bringest forth bread from the earth." He then broke it and handed it to the guests. Then came the meal proper, followed by another prayer from the president, a thanksgiving for the meal pronounced over a third cup of wine, "the cup of blessing" (cf. 1 Cor. 10:16). After supper the second part of the Hallel was sung, which ended with Ps. 118. Finally, a fourth cup of wine was taken to celebrate God's kingdom, and this concluded the liturgy. (See A. J. B. Higgins, The Lord's Supper in the New Testament [1952], for this summary; cf. also m. Pesahim 10:5; Str-B, 1:988-90; 4:41-76; D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism [1956], 331.)

1. The form of the words of institution. It is not possible to know exactly what our Lord said when he selected out the bread and the cup of wine after supper from the Passover ceremony for special consideration and reinterpretation. The principal texts relating these words do not agree in every detail (see the texts above). But the bread-saying takes the following form when all of the sources are woven together: "Take [Matthew, Mark], eat [Matthew], this is my body [Matthew, Mark, Luke, Paul], which is given for you. Do this for my remembrance" [Luke's longer text, Paul]. The saying over the cup also is recorded variously by the different writers: "All of you drink from it, for [Matthew] this [Matthew, Mark, Luke, Paul] cup [Luke, Paul] is my blood of the covenant [Matthew, Mark; 'is the new covenant in my blood,' Luke, Paul], which is poured out [Matthew, Mark, Luke] for many [Matthew, Mark; 'for you,' Luke], for the remission of sins [Matthew]. Do this as often as you drink it for my remembrance" [Paul]. These cup-words are then immediately followed in Matthew and Mark by Jesus' promise never again to drink of the fruit of the vine until he drinks it new with his disciples in the kingdom of God. The same eschatological hope is found also in Paul, though worded differently, and he too places it after the cup-saying. Luke, on the other hand, couples the promise not to drink of the fruit of the vine with another similar promise not to eat again of the Passover until its real meaning is fulfilled in the kingdom, and places both of them before the sayings spoken over the bread and the cup.

There seem, then, to be essentially two accounts that are independent of each other: one represented by Mark, and the other by Paul. Which is the older is difficult to know and perhaps unnecessary, for there are "primitive" elements in both. And in spite of all the minor differences between the accounts, they are nevertheless in substantial agreement with one another. It is sufficient to say that each inspired writer was free to select and arrange the same traditional material so as to present adequately the theological significance of the Last Supper as he was led to understand it.

2. The meaning of the Last Supper. The Lord's Supper, composed of bread and wine, is a symbol of our Lord's body and blood, a symbol of his death: "This is my body given...This is my blood poured out." One is not compelled by the present context nor usage elsewhere to give to the verb estin ("is") the meaning of "is equivalent to." Often it conveys merely the idea of "represents," or "means" (as in the interpretation of the parables, Matt. 13:38; cf. also Jn. 10:9, 14). Besides, it would have been almost impossible for Jesus to have equated the bread with his body and the wine with his blood and then to have asked his Jewish disciples to eat and drink. It is much more likely that his disciples saw him in the tradition of the OT prophets, and interpreted his words and actions accordingly. As those ancient prophets predicted future events by symbolic dramatic deeds (1 Ki. 21:11; Jer. 19:1-11; Ezek. 4:3), so Jesus broke the bread and took the cup as an acted parable to denote his coming death and point out its meaning.

Around this basic idea of the Lord's Supper as a symbol of the death of Christ there cluster several ideas. (a) First, the Lord interpreted his death as a substitutionary, vicarious self-giving event, universal in its scope: "This is my body given for you"; "this is my blood poured out for many." (Note: "many" is not to be understood as a limiting expression meaning, "some, but not all." Rather, it is a Semitic way of contrasting the many with the one, resulting in the meaning, "all"; cf. Matt. 20:28 with 1 Tim. 2:6, and Rom. 5:18 with 5:19. For other approaches see, e.g., T. R. Schreiner, Romans, BECNT [1998], 290-92; BDAG, 849a.)

(b) He further interprets his death as the means of ratifying the new covenant spoken of by Jeremiah (Jer. 31:31-34). This is observed in his words, "my blood of the covenant" (Mk. 14:24), which are almost identical with those of Exod. 24:8, where the ratification of the old covenant with Israel is recorded. But the addition of the pronoun "my" indicates that Jesus placed his blood in counterposition to that of the covenant-inaugurating animal of the OT, and that he viewed his death as bringing the old covenant to an end by fulfillment, and as the supreme sacrifice needed to introduce the new and give it permanent validity. See COVENANT, THE NEW.

(c) There are also elements in this Last Supper account which indicate that Jesus interpreted his death as the consummate act of the SERVANT OF THE LORD described by ISAIAH. This is particularly clear in Matthew, who adds the words, "for the forgiveness of sins," to the saying about Jesus' blood poured out (Matt. 26:28; cf. Isa. 53:12, "because he poured out his life unto death, / and was numbered with the transgressors. / For he bore the sin of many, / and made intercession for the transgressors").

(d) Perhaps the most obvious meanings attached to the Last Supper are those associated with the Passover. The Passover in Jesus' day was in reality a celebration of two events: it looked back in commemoration of Israel's deliverance from the oppression of Egypt (Exod. 12:14, 17; m. Pesahim 10:5); and it looked forward in anticipation of the coming messianic kingdom (m. Pesahim 10:6; cf. Rabbi Joshua ben Hananiah, Mekilta on Exod. 12:42; Exodus Rabbah on Exod. 15:1; see Higgins, The Lord's Supper, 47). These two themes are prominent in the narrative of the Last Supper. Selecting only two elements from the liturgy of the Passover—the unleavened bread and the cup after supper—Jesus seemed to say, "As Israel was spared from death at the hand of the destroying angel, and delivered from servitude to Pharaoh by the death of the passover lamb and the sprinkling of its blood, so you are spared from eternal death and freed from slavery to sin by my body broken and my blood poured forth." Hence, the original meaning of the Passover had now been superseded. Christ is the true paschal Lamb (1 Cor. 5:7), and by his death becomes the author of a new exodus, the Redeemer of an enslaved people. Such, at least, was the understanding of the early church, an understanding most beautifully expressed in a recently discovered sermon of Melito, Bishop of Sardis (d. c. A.D. 190):

For this one, who was led away as a lamb, and who was sacrificed as a sheep,
by himself delivered us from servitude to the world

as from the land of Egypt, and released us from bondage to the devil and from the hand of Pharaoh, and sealed our souls by his own spirit, and the members of our bodies by his own blood.

This is the one who covered death with shame and who plunged the devil into mourning as Moses did Pharaoh.

This is the one who smote lawlessness, and deprived injustice of its offspring as Moses deprived Egypt.

This is the one who delivered us from slavery into freedom, from darkness into light,
from death into life,
from tyranny into an eternal kingdom, and who made us a new priesthood and a special people forever.
This one is the passover of our salvation.

(Homily, 67-68)

The other theme of eschatological expectancy is also here. It is found in Jesus' promise not to eat the Passover or drink the fruit of the vine until the KINGDOM OF GOD shall have arrived. This promise is not a word of despair but a note of joy. Jesus sees beyond the darkness of Calvary to that time when he would share with his disciples the messianic banquet and enjoy with them the life of the age to come (cf. Isa. 25:6-8). "Thus Jesus offered his disciples in the Supper a full participation in the atoning benefits of his own self-offering on the cross—deliverance from the bondage of this world, remission of sins, incorporation in the new people of God, an inner obedience of the heart to the will of God, and the joy and benediction of his presence and fellowship in the age to come" (Massey H. Shepherd).

C. The problem of the Lukan text. There are questions concerning the correctness of the Greek text in all accounts of the Last Supper. (For complete information concerning these variants see the chapter on textual data by F. G. Kenyon and S. C. E. Legg in R. Dunkerley, ed., The Ministry and the Sacraments [1937], 272-86.) But the most difficult textual problem in these accounts is that posed by the chief witness of the "Western" text, CODEX BEZAE (D), supported also by some Old Latin and Syriac texts, which omits Lk. 22:19b-20 (a few of the texts rearrange the order of 22:17-20 so that v. 19 [or only v. 19a] comes before v. 17). The case for this shorter text is best set forth by B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort (The New Testament in the Original Greek: Introduction and Appendix [1882], appendix, 63-64): (1) Since the chief characteristic of the "Western" text is to interpolate—i.e., include everything that looks authentic whether it is or not—the shorter text of Luke, therefore, must be very early, most likely original, for it is not found in the chief witnesses of this kind of text. (2) It is almost impossible to believe that these verses would have been stricken from the Lukan text at a later date. (3) It is conceivable, however, that they could be interpolated into Luke at a later time from 1 Cor. 11:23-24 and Mk. 14:23-24 to eliminate the cup-bread order which exists when these verses are omitted.

There are some modern scholars who follow Westcott and Hort in rejecting the genuineness of the longer reading (see H. Chadwick in HTR 50 [1957]: 257-58; R. Bultmann, The History of the Gospel Tradition [1963], 286 n.), and some modern translations (e.g., NEB) remove these verses from the text and give them a place in the margin. But the majority of scholars consider that the shorter text is secondary. It is difficult to believe that a later interpolation could find its way into all Greek MSS with the lone exception of Codex D. One notes too that the longer reading is cited by the church fathers as early as A.D. 150 (Justin, 1 Apology 66). The omission of Lk. 22:19b-20 can be explained as due to a mechanical error on the part of a copyist, or to a desire to keep secret the inner meaning of Christian worship (although this is hard to believe since there is no evidence for the omission of v. 19a), or to avoid the inconsistency of having a second cup. (See further E. Schweizer, The Lord's Supper according to the New Testament [1967], 18-20; H. Schürmann in Bib 32 [1957]: 364-92, 522-41 [a very detailed textual analysis, concluding that the longer text is definitely original]; B. M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament, 2nd ed. [1994], 148-50. For a recent defense of the shorter text, see B. D. Ehrman, The Orthodox Corruption of Scripture: The Effect of Early Christological Controversies on the Text of the New Testament [1993], 198-209.)

The interpretation of the Last Supper according to the shorter text of Luke would be quite different from that of the other synoptic writers and from that of Paul, omitting the cup-saying, preserving only the idea that the Last Supper was a foretaste of the coming eschatological banquet, and raising the question about whether the Lord's Supper always had been observed by the Christian church from the beginning in just the same way as it is presented by Mark and Paul (see below).

II. The Lord's Supper

A. *The scarcity of materials. Apart from 1 Corinthians and the Synoptic Gospels, the rest of the NT is virtually silent on the subject of the Lord's Supper. There is no teaching on it anywhere else, although there are possible allusions in several books (Jn. 6:22-59; Acts 2:46; 20:7, 11; Heb. 6:4; 13:10; 2 Pet. 2:13; Jude 12). This paucity of material raises questions: Did the early church feel a need for liturgical secrecy? Was indeed the Lord's Supper central to the worship-life of the early church? Was there really general agreement in the apostolic age about the relation of the Last Supper to the death of Christ? These questions are not easy to answer, but suffice it to point out that if there had not been problems at CORINTH, one of which was disorders at the Lord's Supper, Paul himself might never have mentioned the subject. In other words, one should be careful about reading too much into silence. In this case the silence could mean that the Lord's Supper was so well-known and so central that mention of it was totally unnecessary except where disorders called for clarification.

B. *When was the Lord's Supper observed? One might expect that if the Lord's Supper grew out of a Passover meal, it would be celebrated only once a year, on the 14th-15th of Nisan. A study of early church history seems to support this speculation. EPIPHANIUS, for example, observed that the EBIONITES, an early Jewish-Christian sect, celebrated the Eucharist as an annual feast, like the Passover, in memory of Christ's death (Haer. 30.16.1). And Christians in Asia Minor in the 2nd cent. held a special Eucharist as a parallel to the Passover and at the same time as the Jewish Passover (see Higgins, The Lord's Supper, 56 n. 1).

The statement of the early chapters of Acts about the disciples "breaking bread" every day (Acts 2:42, 46) need not refute this idea. For it has been pointed out that the meals in Acts are very much like religious meals found elsewhere in Judaism (K. Stendahl, ed., The Scrolls and the New Testament [1957], 84-86), and their emphasis is quite different from that of the Last Supper as recorded in the Gospels. Whereas the Lord's Supper was a remembrance of Christ's death, these daily meals were joyful fellowships that celebrated his resurrection and continued presence in the church, and also anticipated the eschatological kingdom. They, thus, may not have originated in or been connected with the Last Supper, but may have had their source and meaning in the postresurrection meals that Jesus had with his disciples (Lk. 24:30-43; Jn. 21:1-14; Acts 1:4; 10:41; see O. Cullmann, Early Christian Worship [1953], 14-16).

Hence, in the early Jerusalem church it is probable that there were originally two kinds of fellowship meals: (1) the "breaking of bread," which occurred daily, and (2) the Passover, which occurred annually, each with its own peculiar emphasis. Only the latter "was directly related to the Last Supper, and only in it was the meal a specific remembrance of Messiah's death" (E. E. Ellis, The Gospel of Luke [1966], 250). Eventually, however, these two meals were combined into one new feast when the church moved outside of Jerusalem and the Jewish influence ceased to play a dominant role in the development of Christian worship. The joyful fellowship meal of Acts 2 became the agape-element of the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 11:20-21), and the annual Passover meal became the Eucharist-element (11:23-26). By this time the new supper was celebrated neither daily nor annually, but weekly—on the first day of the week, the day of resurrection, possibly at night, pointing back to the Passover meal, which was partaken of in the evening (Acts 20:7; cf. 1 Cor. 16:2; Rev. 1:10; Did. 14.1).

C. How was the Lord's Supper observed? This question, too, is difficult to answer, for little is said about it in the NT. But from 1 Cor. 11:20-34 it is possible to reconstruct the following order: (1) there was a full-blown dinner or love-feast to which participants brought their own food, and at which it was possible for some to be hungry or drunk (vv. 20-22). This practice was probably a carry-over from the Last Supper, when a complete meal took place between the bread and cup sayings. (2) Then came a period of self-examination (v. 28). The form this examination took is nowhere stated in the NT. It may have been strictly personal, or it may have involved individual public confession in the church, or corporate confession as part of a liturgical prayer (cf. Did. 6.14; 14.1). (3) Finally, there was the Lord's Supper proper, involving only the bread and wine, which recalled the death of the Lord Jesus (vv. 24-26). Acts 20:7-11 indicates that a sermon may have preceded the action outlined above and formed part of the liturgy of the Lord's Supper, but there is no indication what that sermon was about. There are no traces in the NT of Eucharistic prayers as are found in the later literature of the early church (Did. 9-10), nor is there evidence here for FOOTWASHING forming a part of the ceremony of the Lord's Supper.

D. Paul's understanding of the Lord's Supper. The Lord's Supper has been celebrated continuously by the church from the time of Jesus to the present day. Yet Paul's account of it is the earliest in the NT by several years. He says of it that he "received [it] from the Lord" (1 Cor. 11:23). This may mean that Paul learned of the events of the Last Supper and its real meaning in the same way he had earlier received the content of the gospel: not from man, nor by human teaching, but through revelation of Jesus Christ (Gal. 1:12).

Hans Lietzmann (Mass and Lord's Supper [1958], 204-8) made use of this interpretation to set up his antithesis between the Eucharist as celebrated in Jerusalem and the Eucharist as celebrated in the Pauline churches. The Jerusalem-type, he said, was a breaking of bread with no wine used. It was a continuation of the fellowship meals that the historical Jesus had shared with his disciples. It had no connection with the Last Supper and was marked not by any remembrance of Christ's death, but by a joyous ecstasy over his spiritual presence, and an expectancy of his return shortly. The idea of sacrifice was absent. Lietzmann saw the other type of celebration as coming from the Last Supper and from a special revelation to Paul in which he received new insight into the real meaning of the meal —a memorial of the sacrificial death of the Lord. By this revelation the original meaning of the Eucharist was radically transformed.

But Lietzmann's thesis is open to the following objections: (1) The "breaking of bread" in Acts, though certainly a Christian meal, may not have been Eucharistic in character (see above). (2) Paul's statement, "I received from the Lord what I also passed on to you," can also be interpreted to mean that he understood himself to be a person handing on in unaltered fashion that which had come to him as unaltered church tradition. The words he uses here for "receive" and "pass on" (respectively paralambanō G4161 and paradidōmi G4140) are equivalents of rabbinic terms for the normal course of reception of tradition and its transmission (Higgins, The Lord's Supper, 25–26). Paul may have meant, then, that he received the story of the Last Supper and its meaning from the Lord through the apostolic witness. For the Lord was not simply a remembered historical figure but a living Presence in the church guiding the community into all truth (Jn. 16:13), and seeing to it that this truth was transmitted accurately to each succeeding generation. If this is what Paul meant, he cannot be charged with changing the meaning of the early Eucharist. He was authoritatively handing on what had been practiced in the church from its inception. (3) Eduard Schweizer has pointed out that from the start of Eucharistic celebration the two elements of eschatological joy, coupled with a sense of Christ's presence at the table and a hope for his return, and of the proclamation of his death as the means of salvation, belonged together (Schweizer, The Lord's Supper, 25). Paul combines both of these ideas in a single sentence: "You proclaim the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor. 11:26).

Illustration of Jesus celebrating the Lord's Supper in the upper room.

Paul's understanding of the Lord's Supper, therefore, is in essence identical with the traditional understanding of it, and what was said earlier about the meaning of the Last Supper will also apply here. But the disorders at the Lord's table in Corinth have given the apostle opportunity to provide teaching on the subject that appears nowhere else in the NT.

1. The Lord's Supper as a memorial feast. There is one word of the Lord in Paul (and Luke) which does not appear in Mark (and Matthew). It is, "do this in remembrance of me" (1 Cor. 11:24, repeated in v. 25). Paul therefore understands that the purpose of the Lord's Supper is to commemorate the death of the Lord Jesus, and that this purpose originated with the Lord himself. (J. Jeremias's view of this saying as meaning "that God may remember me" by bringing in the kingdom at the parousia has been convincingly answered by H. Kosmala, NovT 4 [1960]: 81-94.) Here again is seen a parallel between this new feast and the feast of the Passover. As the Passover was basically a remembrance celebration calling to mind the mercy and greatness of God in delivering his people from Egypt (Exod. 12:14; 13:8-10), so the Lord's Supper is designed to constantly remind the Christian of God's greatest act, that of deliverance from sin through the death (not the teachings) of the Lord Jesus.

But the biblical idea of "remembering" is more profound than our modern conception of it. It meant for the biblical writer more than simply having an "idea" about something that happened in the past. It also involved action, a physical response to the psychological process of recollection. For when the dying thief asked the Savior to "remember" him he meant more than have an idea of me in your mind; he meant, "Act toward me in mercy. Save me!" There was, then, this closeness of relation between thought and act. Thus when the Jew celebrated the Passover, he did more than just think about what happened to his forefathers. He in a sense reenacted that event and himself participated in the exodus. He was at one with his past (see B. S. Childs, Memory and Tradition in Israel [1962]).

There may also be this dimension to the word "remembrance" as used in 1 Cor. 11. When the Christian partakes of the Lord's Supper he not only has an idea in his mind about a past event, but in a sense he "recalls" that event and in such a way that it can no longer be regarded wholly as a thing "absent" or past, but present, and powerfully present. In the Lord's Supper, then, and uniquely in the Lord's Supper, the death of Christ is made so vivid that it is as if the Christian were standing beneath the cross. See MEMORIAL; REMEMBER.

2. The Lord's Supper a sacrifice? Did Paul regard the Lord's Supper as a sacrifice? Some interpreters answer this question in the affirmative, proposing to give to the words "do this" the meaning "offer this sacrifice." It is true that early on Christian writers began to call the Eucharist a sacrifice (Did. 14.1; cf. Ign. Phil. 4.1), and the church a place of sacrifice or altar (Ign. Eph. 5.2).

But Paul did not so understand the Lord's Supper, nor can his words "do this" be so construed: (a) the ordinary meaning of the verb "do" (poieō G4472) in the NT, the SEPTUAGINT, and Greek literature generally is opposed to such a translation. (b) The Greek church fathers, some of whom may have thought of the Eucharist as a sacrifice, never understood these words to mean "offer a sacrifice." (c) Finally, the witness of the LXX is also against this interpretation, for it never translates any of the many OT words for sacrifice in their frequent occurrence by the verb poieō (see A. Plummer, The Gospel According to Luke, 5th ed. [1922], 497-498). The words simply mean "perform this function." They are a command to remember.

3. The Lord's Supper as a proclamation. Paul also understood the Last Supper to be a proclamation: "For whenever you eat this bread and drink this cup, you proclaim the Lord's death" (1 Cor. 11:26). The verb "proclaim" found here (katangellō G2859) is used elsewhere in the NT of heralding the gospel (1 Cor. 9:14), and of making known one's faith (Rom. 1:8). Hence, it would seem that its action is directed manward rather than Godward. In performing the rite, the celebrant proclaims to all the Lord's death as victory. The Lord's Supper therefore becomes the gospel, a “visible word,” as AUGUSTINE put it.

This idea of the Lord’s Supper being gospel is helpful in understanding the Lord’s presence in the observance. In the NT, proclamation has the character of event. As Schweizer puts it, the word is never “merely” something spiritual intended for the intellect. Christ himself comes in the word: “he who hears you hears me, and he who rejects you rejects me” (Lk. 10:16). In a similar way he comes in the Lord’s Supper. Christ’s presence is brought about not “magically by a liturgically correct administration of the sacrament...It comes to pass where the Lord’s Supper is understood as gospel, whether this gospel is believed or rejected...This means, therefore, that the real presence in the Lord’s Supper is exactly the same as his presence in the word—nothing more, nothing less. It is an event, not an object; an encounter, not a phenomenon of nature; it is Christ’s encounter with his Church, not the distribution of a substance” (Schweitzer, The Lord’s Supper, 37-38).

4. The Lord’s Supper as communion. The words of Paul in 1 Cor. 10:16 are not easy to translate, especially the expressions “communion of the blood of Christ” and “communion of the body of Christ” (KJV). The word translated “communion” (koinōnia) may also be translated “fellowship,” meaning a group of people bound together in a COMMUNION or FELLOWSHIP by what they have in common with each other. And the preposition “of” does not exist in the Greek, but is an interpretation of the genitive case. It may also be interpreted to mean “brought about by” or “based upon.” Translated in this way Paul is saying, “The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not (does it not represent) the fellowship which is brought about by the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the fellowship brought about by the body of Christ?” The Lord’s Supper, then, is understood to witness to the fact that Christians belong to a special family which includes the Son and the Father (cf. 1 Jn. 1:3) and is marked by unity and love. It is a communion which required the death of Christ to create, and which is so close that it is as though believers were one body: “For we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread” (1 Cor. 10:17 KJV). Perhaps, then, this was the great disorder in Corinth that prompted what little teaching there is on the Lord’s Supper. The Corinthians’ sin was that they did not discern or recognize the body (1 Cor. 11:29), that is, they failed to understand the oneness of the body of which each person was a part.

In Paul’s day a fellowship meal preceded the breaking of bread and drinking of the cup. It was not an unimportant part of the Lord’s Supper, and Paul had no desire to abolish it. What he was concerned to do, however, was to correct its abuses. For instead of symbolizing the unity its name intended, the fellowship meal at Corinth was the occasion for manifesting the opposite. The freemen despised the slave class, going ahead with the meal before the latter had opportunity to arrive (1 Cor. 11:21). The wealthy scorned the poor, feasting to the point of gluttony while the latter went hungry (vv. 21 –22). Thus eating and drinking “in an unworthy manner” (v. 27) may have meant for Paul partaking of the Lord’s Supper while holding each other in contempt and neither party striving to live up to the unity which took the Lord’s death to bring about.

The word communion has still another meaning: “participation in.” Hence, 1 Cor. 10:16 may be translated as the RSV does: “The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a participation in the blood of Christ?” If this is so, then perhaps Paul understood the cup and bread to symbolize the Christian’s participation in the death of Christ. Perhaps by borrowing his vocabulary from the MYSTERY RELIGIONS he showed that the Redeemer and the redeemed are so intimately bound up with each other that what happened to the Redeemer happened also to the redeemed. Thus when Christ died, the Christian died also, and partaking of the Lord’s Supper symbolizes this participation in the body and blood of the Savior. Such a description of the Supper is Paul’s way of stating what Christ already had said: “I am the living bread that came down from heaven. If anyone eats of this bread, he will live forever...I tell you the truth, unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you have no life in you” (Jn. 6:51, 53).

The Lord’s Supper, though of great importance to Paul, is not all-important. There are no magical qualities to it. It has no more power to communicate life and maintain it than did the spiritual food and drink provided Israel in the wilderness (1 Cor. 10:1-13). It cannot in and of itself debilitate or bring about death in spite of the fact that Paul says that many who eat and drink unworthily are weak and ill and some have died (11:30). Such sickness and death result from the judgment of the LORD (11:32), not from any magical power of the Supper. The importance of the Supper exists solely in the Person it points to, and whose redemptive acts it proclaims.

E. The Lord’s Supper in the fourth gospel. There is no specific reference to the Lord’s Supper in the fourth gospel. John describes a final meal Jesus had with his disciples (Jn. 13), when he taught them the importance of humble service to others by himself washing their feet. But there is no bread or wine here, nor words of interpretation. Many, however, see the Johannine Eucharist in Jesus’ discourse on the bread of life (ch. 6). It is here that Jesus says, “For my flesh is real food and my blood is real drink. Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me, and I in him” (6:55-56). If this is so, it would appear that for John the Lord’s Supper is spiritual food (cf. v. 63), which nourishes and strengthens the life of the Christian (cf. Did. 10.4).

But perhaps John’s primary aim was not to discourse on the Lord’s Supper but on the meaning of FAITH. Certainly this is a subject that is continually being put forward in his gospel. What does it mean to have faith in Christ? When Jn. 6:47, “he who believes has eternal life,” is juxtaposed with v. 54, “Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life,” it would seem that John, in searching for the way to answer this question, has at last found the model he needs. To believe on Christ is analogous to eating his body. As one would take food and eat it so that it is assimilated into the system and becomes one’s very life, so faith is a similar appropriation of Christ, with the result that he is at the very center and is the energizing force of the Christian’s life. But then, this is the very thing that the Lord’s Supper is designed to remind us of in any case.

Lo-Ruhamah loh’roo-hah’muh (לֹא רַחֲמָהּ H4205, “she has not received compassion” or “she has not been loved”). Also Lo-ruhamah. A symbolical name given by the prophet HOSEA to his daughter and second child by his wife GOMER (Hos. 1:6). See LO-AMMI.

Lot lot (לוֹט H4288, derivation uncertain; לוֹט G3397). Son of Haran and nephew of ABRAHAM (Gen. 11:27, 31; 12:5). Born in UR of the Chaldees, Lot migrated to the city of Haran with his grandfather, TERAH, and Abram and Sarai. See HARAN (PERSON); HARAN (PLACE). Later, with Abram and Sarai, he migrated into Canaan. The biblical data regarding his life can be listed under five major episodes.

(1) When Lot's father died in Ur, Lot chose to accompany the portion of the family that was migrating from MESOPOTAMIA into CANAAN. Perhaps (as suggested by J. O. Boyd in ISBE [1929], 3:1930), a childless uncle and a fatherless nephew would find a mutual bond. In Canaan, stops were made and altars erected to sacrifice to Yahweh at Byzantine chapel built over the "cave of Lot," on the SE side of the Dead Sea (view to the SW). Lot associated himself with the cities of the plain traditionally located in this area.

SHECHEM and BETHEL before the wanderers finally settled in the NEGEV (Gen. 11:27-32; 12:4-10; 13:1). By inference from 13:1, it seems evident that Lot accompanied Abram and Sarai when they went down into Egypt to escape the famine in Canaan. This detail is attested in later tradition and is mentioned in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (Genesis Apocryphon 20.11, 33-34). After the return from Egypt, Abram and his entourage, including Lot, settled near BETHEL.

(2) As flocks and herds multiplied, strife arose between Lot's and Abram's herdsmen over grazing and watering places. In addition to this struggle, Abram and Lot were faced also with the problem of relationships with the Canaanites and Perizzites who still possessed the land (Gen. 13:7b). At Abram's suggestion, Lot was given the choice of whatever territory he wanted. He chose "the plain of the Jordan" that "was well watered," a description usually interpreted to include the area around the place where the JORDAN River enters the DEAD SEA, extending 25 mi. N of the Dead Sea. At this period, Lot was still a nomad (13:12) and wandered as far as SODOM. He chose an area where wickedness was rampant (13:13). (See L. R. Helyer, "The Separation of Abram and Lot: Its Significance in the Patriarchal Narratives," JSOT 26 [1983]: 77-88.) In the choice Abram maintained the more spiritual outlook (13:14-18). There is archaeological evidence that the plain of the Jordan was well populated as early as the 2nd millennium B.C. (J. P. Free, Archaeology and Bible History [1956], 56).

(3) This area near the Dead Sea became a target for a series of raids by four eastern kings

(chieftains?). In one of these raids, KEDORLAOMER conquered the king of Sodom and his four allies (Gen. 14:1-16) at the Valley of SIDDIM. Sodom and Gomorrah were plundered, and Lot was taken captive. When Abram heard of his nephew's plight, he armed his retainers and pursued the invaders as far as DAMASCUS, and in a surprise attack rescued Lot and his goods.

(4) Lot was not content to dwell on the plain of the Jordan, but gradually entered into the orbit of the chief city of the Dead Sea area, Sodom. Eventually, he moved into the city and there settled down. Because of the great wickedness in the city, Yahweh had determined to destroy it. En route to Sodom, three angels stopped to see Abraham and tell him of Yahweh's intentions. Abraham prayed that the city might be spared, but not even ten righteous men were found in it, so it was doomed. Two of the angels proceeded to Sodom to warn Lot. In typical eastern fashion Lot welcomed them into his home. Officially, Lot was merely a sojourner in the city, and when he attempted to protect his visitors from the sensual lusts of the Sodomites, he was accused of seeking to rule (Gen. 19:9). To protect his guests, he was willing to give his daughters over to the foul desires of the Sodomites.

The men of the city, however, persisted and tried to take Lot's visitors by force. The angels smote the men with blindness as they attempted a forced entry into Lot's house. The angels warned Lot of the impending destruction of Sodom and persuaded him to leave the city while there was still time. Lot had no influence with his prospective sons-in-law when he sought to persuade them to leave the city, and they perished (Gen. 19:14). Even Lot was slow to leave until escorted from Sodom by the angels (19:15-16). His wife accompanied him, but when she looked back at the smoking city, she was turned into a pillar of salt (19:26; Lk. 17:29). Evidently, Lot was attached to the comforts and culture of Sodom (Gen. 19:16-22). His deliverance was credited to the fact that God remembered (i.e., had mercy on) Abraham. That Lot was saved by divine intervention is stated in Wisd. 10:6-8; Lk. 17:28-29; 2 Pet. 2:7-8. (See J. Penrose Har-land, "The Destruction of the Cities of the Plain," BA 6 [1943]: 41-52, reprinted in The Biblical Archaeologist Reader, ed. D. N. Freedman and G. E. Wright [1961], 59-75.)

(5) Lot's final disgrace followed his leaving Sodom. At first, obtaining permission from the angels, he and his daughters stopped at ZOAR, near the SE end of the Dead Sea. This city did not share the ill repute of the other four CITIES OF THE PLAIN. Out of fear of further "fire and brimstone," Lot left Zoar and lived in a cave in MOAB with his daughters (Gen. 19:30-38). His daughters despaired of finding husbands, so to carry on Lot's line they devised a plan whereby they might become pregnant. On successive nights they made Lot drunk with wine, and each daughter, in turn, slept with him incestuously. From these unions Moab and BEN-AMMI were born (Deut. 2:9, 19; Ps. 83:8), from whom the Moabites and Ammonites (see AMMON) were supposedly descended. Some see in this unsavory story an etiological legend to explain the origin of these peoples. There is no reason, however, why the events may not have happened as recorded in Genesis. From the Moabites came RUTH, the ancestress of David and Christ.

Despite Lot's failings, the NT calls him "a righteous man" (2 Pet. 2:7-8).

A. K. HELMBOLD

Lotan loh'tan (לֹטָן H4289). First son of SEIR the HORITE; he was a clan chief of EDOM (Gen. 36:20-22, 29; 1 Chr. 1:38-39). Because the name Lotan may derive from LOT, some have speculated that Abraham's nephew was the ancestor of this Edomite tribe (see ABD, 4:374-75).

Lothasubus loh-thah'suh-buhs (Λωθασουβος). One of those who stood on EZRA's side at the reading of the law (1 Esd. 9:44; called HASHUM in Neh. 8:4).

lots. Objects used for DIVINATION or for making a choice. In the history of the Bible, the casting of lots was used to determine the will of God. The method is not clearly defined. Some scholars believe that the URIM AND THUMMIM (Exod. 28:30; Deut. 33:8; Ezra 2:63) were objects, possibly two small round pebbles signifying “yes” or “no,” that were placed in the EPHOD of the high priest. When the priest reached blindly into the ephod and took out one stone, the question was answered either affirmatively or negatively by the stone he found in his hand. There were, however, many instances recorded where lots were cast without the use of the Urim and Thummim.

Numerous passages in the OT indicate that the casting of lots was customarily employed for making important decisions. AARON, on the Day of Atonement, chose by lot one of the goats for a scapegoat to bear the sins of the people into the wilderness (Lev. 16:7-10, 21-22). The division of the land of Palestine after the conquest was accomplished by lot (Josh. 14:2; 18:6; 1 Chr. 6:54). The service of the TEMPLE, including the musicians (1 Chr. 25:7-8), the gatekeepers (26:13-16), and the supply of wood fuel for the altar, were regulated by casting lots (Neh. 10:34). The guilt of suspected criminals was established by lot (Josh. 7:14; 1 Sam. 14:42). The principle underlying this usage is stated in Prov. 16:33: “The lot is cast into the lap, / but its every decision is from the LORD.” (Regarding the Feast of Lots, see PURIM.)

The same usage persisted in NT times. The soldiers at the foot of the cross cast lots for the clothing of Jesus (Matt. 27:35), thus fulfilling an OT prophecy (Ps. 22:18). Within the church, the successor of JUDAS ISCARIOT among the apostles was selected by lot (Acts 1:26). In the latter instance the choice was preceded by prayer. There is no explicit indication that this procedure was approved by God, and it never appears in the later activities of the church. The guidance of the HOLY SPIRIT seems to have been manifested in other ways.

lotus. This English term is usually applied to the Nelumbo nucifera (a large aquatic plant with pinkish flowers) and to similar plants, such as the Egyptian water lily (Nymphaea lotus; see LILY-WORK). In modern Bible versions, however, the word is used as the rendering of Hebrew se'ēlīm H7365, which occurs only in Job 40:21-22 in a description of the BEHEMOTH: “Under the lotus plants he lies, / hidden among the reeds in the marsh. / The lotuses conceal him in their shadow [šēl H7498]; / the poplars by the stream surround him.” The plant in view is apparently Zizyphus lotus, a deciduous small tree, bearing 3-veined leaves (elliptic-oblong in shape) and tiny flowers, followed by yellow, roundish fruits. The tree gives good shade (cf. KJV, “shady trees”) and is well known in Palestine. See FLORA (under Rhamnaceae).

love. A deep feeling of affection and solicitude for someone. Love is fundamental in true religion, harmoniously binding deity and worshipers. The revelation of deity as the God of love is a distinctive of the Hebrew and Christian religions. More than members of other religions, Christians consciously enjoy a mutual love between themselves and God.

The highest expression of love in the OT was commanded by MOSES in the Shema (“Hear,” Deut. 6:4-5), quoted by Jesus (Matt. 22:39), and still today repeated twice daily by devout Jews. It is essentially the first commandment stated positively, which Jesus called “the great commandment.” The Shema was a call to Israel to “Love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength.” Later, the PROPHETS—notably Hosea, Jeremiah, and Isaiah—declared God’s “steadfast” and “everlasting love” for his people. Finally, God’s supreme and immeasurable love was manifested in JESUS CHRIST. Consequently, it was revealed that God’s love through his chosen people includes all mankind. Jesus condensed the TEN COMMANDMENTS by stressing two other commandments with “love” as the verb in both (cf. Deut. 6:5; Lev. 19:18). Then he said, “All the Law and the Prophets hang on these two commandments” (Matt. 22:40). And Paul said that “love is the fulfilling of the law” (Rom. 13:10).

Love is a dominant and indispensable virtue in both the OT and the NT. Through its impelling influence, the good news of God’s care for human beings has ceaselessly expanded toward the remote corners of the world for two millennia. From the prophets of the OT to the preachers of today, the note of love has been sounded. Love in divine-human as well as interhuman relationships is at the heart of Christian life and teachings. Hymns, songs, literature, and poetry have been inspired and vitalized by the theme of love. PAUL declared love to be the greatest of the Christian graces (1 Cor. 13:13). JOHN THE APOSTLE stated that God himself is love, and that love emanates from God (1 Jn. 4:7-8). Jesus showed that love was the identifying badge of divine sonship (Matt. 5:44-45). Love is also a prerequisite to being a good citizen, a good neighbor, or a good husband or wife or parent.

I. Definition

A. Terminology. Love is an abstract quality and is therefore indefinable in precise terminology. It finds expression in both nouns and verbs, which occur throughout the Bible. Love is defined in one dictionary as “an emotion, sentiment, or feeling of pleasurable attraction toward, or delight in something, as a principle, or a person, or a thing, which induces a desire for the presence, possession, well-being, or promotion of its object”; it is also described as “strong feeling of affection...devoted attachment...great tenderness.”

The term love in the OT is usually the rendering of the Hebrew verb ’āhab H170 or its cognate noun ’ahābā H173. The word is used for various types of love in the OT. Some examples of its use are: (a) sensuous, both legitimate and illicit, as shown respectively in JACOB’s feelings for RACHEL (Gen. 29:30), and AMNON’s LUST for TAMAR (2 Sam. 13:4); (b) covenantal love between DAVID and JONATHAN (2 Sam. 1:26); (c) and spiritual love existing between God and Israel (Deut. 4:37; Mal. 1:2). In addition, the English word can be used to represent a variety of Hebrew terms, such as ḥesed H2876 (“favor, grace, kindness”), and other expressions. (See further NIDOTTE, 1:277-99; 2:211-18.)

In the NT, Greek phileō G5797 denotes an inclination prompted by sense and emotion. It means “to love” in the sense of being friendly, “to delight in or long for, to love to do, or to do with pleasure,” and even “to kiss” (the cognate noun philia G5802 occurs only in Jas. 4:4, but note Philadelphia G5789, “brotherly love,” and other compounds). This verb can also be used of divine love, however (Jn. 5:20; 16:27). Another verb, agapaō G26, properly denotes a love founded on admiration, veneration, and esteem. It means “to have a preference for, wish well to, regard the welfare of” (Matt. 5:43-44). It is to be full of good will both in thought and deed (Lk. 7:40-47). (This verb is used in a negative context in 2 Tim. 4:10; outside the NT, it is used of sexual love on a few occasions.) The noun form, agapē G27 (first attested in the SEPTUAGINT and rarely found outside the Bible), is defined as “affection, good will, love, benevolence,” as seen in numerous references (Jn. 15:13; Rom. 13:10; 1 Jn. 4:18). It is distinctively a biblical and ecclesiastical word, and the one commonly used in the spiritual sense. It is employed in expressing God’s love to human beings (Jn. 3:16); human love for God (2 Thess. 3:5; 1 Jn. 2:5; 3:17); and spiritual love among human beings (Jn. 15:12-13; Rom. 13:8; Gal. 5:14). (Both the verb and the noun, however, can be used in negative contexts; e.g., LXX 2 Sam. 13:15 [lust]; LXX Isa. 1:23 [greediness]; Jn. 12:43 [vainglory]; 2 Tim. 4:10 [apostasy]; et al.)

AGAPE acquired special significance as the name applied to the love feasts of early Christians. This feast was a common meal in connection with and prior to the celebration of the LORD’S SUPPER. It was truly a love feast expressing and fostering mutual love. Therein poorer Christians mingled with the wealthier and partook in common with the rest of the food provided by the wealthier. This feast is mentioned by name or referred to in substance by three NT writers (Jude 12; cf. 1 Cor. 11:20-22; 2 Pet. 2:13).

Because there is of necessity some overlapping in the meanings of agapaō and phileō, they are in some instances used interchangeably (cf. Jn. 14:23 and 16:27). The use of the two verbs in 21:15-17 is thought by some to mark a semantic distinction, but others dispute this interpretation (see D. A. Carson, The Gospel according to John [1991], 676-77). One distinction may be seen in application. The verb phileō does not occur in commands to love, possibly because love as an emotion cannot be commanded. Contrarily, love as a choice may be commanded; hence, Jesus instructed his disciples, “Love [agapate] your enemies” (Matt. 5:44). (See further NIDNTT, 2:538-51.)

B. Attributes. Though love itself is an attribute (of God), it in turn consists of attributes. It is through these attributes, functional characteristics, and fruits, that love is portrayed in the Bible rather than through definitive terms. From the earliest patriarchal records (Gen. 24:12), the durability and permanence of love is portrayed in the continual recurrence of the word ḥesed, rendered “steadfast love” by the NRSV (see LOVINGKINDNESS; MERCY). It occurs in nearly every book in the OT, totaling well over two hundred times, and is particularly frequent in the Psalms and the later writings. It is repeated twenty-six times in Ps. 136. This is a thanksgiving psalm for the Lord’s great deeds on behalf of his people, in which the response is, “For his steadfast love endures for ever” (NRSV). The same quality appears in Jeremiah when God promises joyful restoration from Babylonian exile, declaring to Israel, “I have loved [’āhab] you with an everlasting love [’ahābā]; / I have drawn you with loving-kindness [ḥesed]” (Jer. 31:3; here the NRSV has “faithfulness”). PAUL likewise subscribes to the eternal quality of love in declaring that “Love never fails” (1 Cor. 13:8a).

Another attribute of love is power. The maiden in the love song declares that “love is strong as death” (Cant. 8:6); and then with fire as a metaphor says, “Many waters cannot quench love; / rivers cannot wash it away” (v. 7). The power of love between the sexes sometimes forces one into unconventional ways, as in the case of SAMSON’S love for the PHILISTINE women (Jdg. 14-16). The power of love holds the family together, binds church members together, and tethers believers to God.

Charity, in the broad sense of giving, is a primary quality of love. Certainly, giving is Godlike. “For God so loved the world that he gave” his dearest and best to save sinners (Jn. 3:16). Likewise, Jesus so loved people that he willingly died for them (Eph. 5:2). The Christian philosopher Thomas Aquinas said that CREATION itself sprang from God’s love of giving. Love separates the givers from the getters. Consequently, eleven disciples left all that they had to give themselves to Jesus and his work, whereas JUDAS ISCARIOT grabbed thirty pieces of silver. The reward of the former was membership in the infinite kingdom of love; the reward of the latter, an untimely and ignominious death.

Other characteristics of love are compassion, tenderness, and sympathy. An old hymn says, “Love drew salvation’s plan...love brought God down to man.” Love puts one in the other’s place. Modern psychology has popularized the word empathy, but its meaning is as old as the Christian era, as God in Christ projected himself into human life. Jesus’ own love was expressed in compassion and sympathy as “he bore the sin of many” (Isa. 53:12), and as he wept with those who mourned (Jn. 11:35).

The fullest biblical commentary is Paul’s ode on love, 1 Cor. 13. It appears as the climax to his discussion on SPIRITUAL GIFTS in the preceding chapter (12:1-11). All these, he says, are worthless without love. Even if we have gifts of tongues, prophecy, faith, and make the supreme sacrifice, without love we gain nothing (13:1-3). Paul then lists the attributes and characteristics of love: “Love is patient, love is kind. It does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud. It is not rude, it is not self-seeking, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs. Love does not delight in evil but rejoices with the truth. It always protects, always trusts, always hopes, always perseveres” (13:4-7). In the succeeding verses he says, “Love never fails” (v. 8a); points up the perfection and maturity of love (vv. 10-11); and concludes, “And now these three remain: faith, hope and love. But the greatest of these is love” (v. 13). Paul was a beneficiary of God’s love, and was therefore keenly aware of its necessity and effectiveness in his ministry as Christ’s emissary.

II. The love of God. To experience love is to experience God; to know love is to know God. God is inseparable from his nature. It is significant that Paul wrote both of “the God of love” and “the love of God” (2 Cor. 13:11, 14). The former signifies the nature of God, and the latter, the expression of that nature. Both claim our noblest response. (On the attributes of God, see GOD, BIBLICAL DOCTRINE OF, III.C.)

A. Attribute of God's nature. Love is a part of the nature of God and has its ultimate origin in him. Every expression of love, therefore, whether divine or human, emanates from God. "God is love" (1 Jn. 4:8b), and consequently all love has its roots in the Godhead. To love is to be like God. The essence of God's nature is portrayed by John as "life" (Jn. 1:4), "spirit" (4:24), "light" (1 Jn. 1:5), "truth" (1:6), and "love" (4:8).

Although love is an eternal attribute of God, which always benefits his creatures, it was through the long process of revelation that people became more aware of this significant fact. It was not until the decline of the northern kingdom that the love of God, in Hosea's prophecy, was presented as a dominant theme (Hos. 11:1). Later, at the fall of the southern kingdom, Jeremiah portrayed the Lord as a God of love, compassion, and tenderness, not only to the Jews but to all mankind (Jer. 31:3). In the dark days of the Babylonian exile, Isaiah sang, "I will recount the steadfast love of the LORD...his mercy, according to the abundance of his steadfast love" (Isa. 63:7 RSV).

B. Expression of God's nature. The love of God may be seen in all his creative works. At times and places, law and power are more in evidence in nature, but God's love is undergirding all (Rom. 1:20). Love is manifested in beauty and orderliness, and in the balance and sustenance of natural life. Nature in turn becomes an instrument of God's love for us in providing food in plants (Gen. 1:29-30) and in fish, birds, and animals (9:2-3). God's promise to NOAH after the flood summarizes his loving care for men and women through natural laws: "As long as the earth endures, seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night will never cease" (8:22). God's love also transcends the area of ecology.

ENOCH and Noah experienced the personal love of God. ABRAHAM achieved divine favor and was chosen as the fountainhead of God's immeasurable redeeming love (Gen. 12:2; 22:15-18). Subsequently, God progressively revealed his love to the world until it reached its fullest measure in the gift of Jesus Christ. Early in his ministry, Jesus revealed to NICODEMUS, a ruler and teacher of Israel, that "God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life" (Jn. 3:16). Luther called this verse "the Gospel in miniature." It reveals both the extent and power of God's love. It reveals the FATHERHOOD OF GOD and his compassionate care for his children on earth. Jesus' entire ministry expressed God's love.

C. Extension of God's nature. Christ is the foremost object of God's love (Jn. 17:24), yet long before Christ made his appearance in history God was manifesting his love. When MOSES returned from Mount Sinai with the two new tables of stone, God disclosed himself as "abounding in love and faithfulness, maintaining love to thousands, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin" (Exod. 34:6-7). Subsequently, it became increasingly evident that Israel was the object of God's love.

Even in Israel's apostasy, God revealed to the prophet HOSEA his undying love for his chosen people. Divine compassion that would not let Israel go was realistically portrayed through HOSEA in the domestic drama of a faithful husband's love to an unfaithful wife (Hos. 1:2-3; 3:1-5). The prophet related God's consoling promise, "I will heal their waywardness / and love them freely, / for my anger has turned away from them. / I will be like the dew to Israel; / he will blossom like a lily" (14:4-5). When there was valid reason to reject Israel, God revealed himself as a husband whose persistent love ultimately reclaims his wayward wife. This advance in revelation portrays more of the love of God, and more of its availability to human beings. It becomes more intimate, more personal, and consequently more vital in human affairs.

In Judah's darkest hour—her beloved city ravaged, her sacred temple destroyed, her nobility deported to Babylon, and her land desolate and waste—God supported his people with his hand of love. Just before this dark hour, JEREMIAH acknowledged to God, “You show love to thousands” (Jer. 32:18). He delivered God's promise that restoration would occur and that his people would again sing their former song of praise, “Give thanks to the LORD Almighty, / for the LORD is good; his love endures forever” (33:11; cf. Ps. 136:1). “For I will restore the fortunes of the land as they were before, says the LORD” (Jer. 33:11).

God's love was never confined to the Hebrews, but was from their progenitor mediated through them (Gen. 12:3). In due time Jesus could declare that “salvation is from the Jews” (Jn. 4:22b). He said that “God so loved the world,” not just Israel; that he provided eternal life for all who would believe (3:16). As God was fully revealed in Jesus Christ, his nature of extending and comprehending love became manifest. Henceforth it would be known that God loved Gentiles and Jews, sinners and righteous, aliens and neighbors, rich and poor, black and white—all people everywhere (Matt. 28:19; Acts 1:8), not just the favored ethnic or religious groups. In three parables—the lost sheep, the lost coin, and the lost son (Lk. 15:3-32)—Jesus illustrated God's love for an individual, its searching mission accomplished, and the consequent joy in heaven. This lends credence to Paul's assertion, “Love never fails” (1 Cor. 13:8).

III. The love of Christ. The love of Christ is unique in that Jesus is both the personification and mediator of God's love. From this approach may be seen the donation, degrees, and demands of love.

A. The donation of love. Christ is the gift of God's love to us, and sufficient for all our needs: life, liberty, healing, happiness, fellowship with others and with God. Paul admonished the Roman Christians, “Let no debt remain outstanding, except the continuing debt to love one another” (Rom. 13:8). Love therefore is a personal product of supreme value, and a debt that every Christian owes his brother; but love is a free gift from God, unmerited by sinners. God does not owe it, but we do, because we are placed under obligation by the free gift from God to share it with others. When Jesus sent the Twelve on their initial tour of home missions, he said to them, “Freely you have received, freely give” (Matt. 10:8b).

Jesus specifically declared to his disciples his mediation of God's gift of love: “As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you. Now remain in my love. If you obey my commands, you will remain in my love, just as I have obeyed my Father's commands and remain in his love” (Jn. 15:9-10). Jesus' fourfold ministry of preaching, teaching, healing, and redeeming was God's love in action, as well as an expression of Jesus' own love (Matt. 4:23; 20:28; cf. 10:7-8).

B. The degrees Of love. There are degrees of love as there are varieties of love. “For God so loved” implies degree, in this case the fullest degree. Sinners who love only those who love them (Matt. 5:43-48) limit their love to small degrees. Jesus admonished his disciples to do better than that. An example of degrees of love was pointed out by Jesus as he sat at table in the house of Simon the Pharisee. During the meal, a sinful woman poured ointment on Jesus, at the same time weeping and wiping his feet. The Pharisee inaudibly scorned the act because Jesus allowed a sinful woman to touch him. In response Jesus told Simon a parable of two debtors, with unequal debts, whose creditor forgave both, and asked Simon which one would love most. Then Jesus contrasted Simon's limited love with that of the woman, declaring, “Her many sins have been forgiven—for she loved much. But he who has been forgiven little loves little” (Lk. 7:47).

The postresurrection scene at the seaside provides another example of the degrees of love. Here Jesus asked PETER, “do you love me more than these?” (Jn. 21:15). The question recalled Peter’s former boast when he implied that he loved Jesus more than the other disciples did (Mk. 14:29).

The Gospels record that Jesus stated the measure of love: “Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind”; and “Love your neighbor as yourself” (Matt. 22:37-40). The law then was summarized in the expression of love as stated in these two commandments (cf. Deut. 6:5; Lev. 19:18). To these Jesus added a NEW COMMANDMENT of love by which his disciples were to be bound in spiritual brotherhood: “My command is this: Love each other as I have loved you. Greater love has no one than this, that he lay down his life for his friends” (Jn. 15:12-13). That was the supreme measure of love, the highest degree possible to human beings. Soon afterward Jesus laid down his life for his friends and challenged them to comparable devotion.

C. The demands of love. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, “Christ’s love compels us” (2 Cor. 5:14). Christians are controlled, constrained, and motivated by the love of Christ. As Jesus faced the cross, he said, “The man who loves his life will lose it” (Jn. 12:25). Jesus was ready to lose his life to save it and others. Thus he also said, “But I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to myself” (Jn. 12:32). Paul felt the pull of that love on the cross, and he saw its effects in Christian converts. Love like that could not end at the cross; it would find response in the hearts of people and make demands upon their lives.

The love of Christ placed Paul “under obligation both to Greeks and to barbarians, both to the wise and to the foolish” (Rom. 1:14 RSV). Throughout this masterful treatise, Paul made it clear that his impelling drive to share his spiritual blessings came out of his experience in Christ. His rejoicing, endurance, and hope, even in suffering, were “because God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, whom he has given us” (5:5). This love he traced through Christ from God, climaxed in the CRUCIFIXION. “But God demonstrates his own love for us in this: While we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (5:8). All the commands of the Decalogue could not be as effective as this one act of supreme love. Paul was willing to live for it and to die for it. It was his drive and demand, in work and in death. “We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him” (8:28). Triumphant he asked, “Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?”; and answered that no power or person “will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord” (8:35-39).

For clarity it may be seen that “the love of Christ compels” in three areas of the believer’s life: his faith, his manner of life, and his ministry. All are evident in NT Christians, particularly in the boldness and persistence of the apostles in their preaching. Paul said, “Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel!” (1 Cor. 9:16). Peter and the other apostles deliberately disobeyed the Jewish council’s order not to preach, and then boldly defied the council in court, declaring, “We must obey God rather than men!” (Acts 5:29). STEPHEN—a deacon, not an apostle—was so impelled by Christ’s love that he gave his life after preaching one sermon to the SANHEDRIN (7:2-60). Thousands of men and women since have followed the examples of these early Christians for the love of Christ.

IV. Human love. When John exhorts his readers to “love one another,” the reason he gives is that “love comes from God...God is love” (1 Jn. 4:7-8). Divine love is therefore the source of human love. Love is that essential, benevolent, and desirable reciprocal bond that binds a person pleasingly and favorably to the beings dearest to him or her—family, friends, and God. After listing a number of interpersonal virtues, Paul admonished, “And over all these virtues put on love, which binds them all together in perfect unity” (Col. 3:14). Such love finds expression in numerous ways in the home, community, and church.

A. *Family love. Human love in the FAMILY forms a bond between husband and wife, between parents and children, and among siblings. A distinctive of the Hebrew race was its emphasis on family ties. Beginning with Abraham and increasing in importance, the home was sacred and held in highest esteem (Exod. 20:14, 17). Jacob’s family, in spite of shortcomings, made an indelible impact on the history of the family. Hebrew records of genealogy is another example. Through Jesus’ life and teachings, family love was enhanced and became a cherished Christian heritage. The holy family, Jesus’ presence at a marriage, his parables related to marriages, his elevation of womanhood, and his tenderness for children formed a precedent for strong family love.

Matrimonial love was ordained of God (Gen. 2:18-25), and in three recorded biblical instances God specifically revealed in it his purpose to bless mankind. In the beginning God created “male and female” for the purpose of companionship, love, and increasing the human race (1:27-28; 2:18-24).

God also chose the matrimonial love of Abraham and Sarah to produce a chosen people through which all nations could be blessed (12:1-3; 17:15-16). Also, God chose the home of Joseph and Mary to bring his own Son into the world to redeem it (Lk. 1:30-33; 2:47). Other examples confirm God's blessings on sexual love in marriage: Jacob and his wives Rachel and Leah (Gen. 29:20, 30, 32); Ruth and Boaz (Ruth 2-4); and David and Bathsheba (though tainted at first), whose son Solomon perpetuated the royal lineage (2 Sam. 11; 1 Ki. 1:28-30).

Therefore, matrimonial sexual love is legitimate, essential, and desirable. It has played a major role in human society from the beginning. The love lyrics in the SONG OF SOLOMON reflect the normal impassioned courtship love of young adulthood as a prelude to marriage. After marriage, man is told to “Enjoy life with your wife, whom you love” (Eccl. 9:9). Paul encouraged matrimonial love and compared it to the love-bond between Christ and his CHURCH. Consequently, he commanded: “Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ loved the church” (Eph. 5:25). To this he added the instruction, “In this same way, husbands ought to love their wives as their own bodies. He who loves his wife loves himself. After all, no one ever hated his own body, but he feeds and cares for it, just as Christ does the church” (vv. 28-29).

Reciprocally, he commanded that “the older women...train the younger women to love their husbands and children” (Tit. 2:3-4). Jesus emphasized the sacredness and joy of the marriage bond both in his teachings (Matt. 5:31-32; 19:3-9) and by his presence at the marriage at CANA, where he performed his first miracle (Jn. 2:1-11). Paul recommended love as the unifying bond of the entire household, mentioning wives, husbands, children, fathers, and slaves (Col. 3:18-22). Jesus metaphorically spoke of the spiritual family, with God as the heavenly Father (Jn. 14:23).

B. Friendship love. There is an interhuman bond of love in which neither sex nor spirit is dominant. It exists between man and man, woman and woman, and man and woman (often called “platonic love”). One well-known classic example stands out in biblical history—that of JONATHAN and DAVID, one the king’s son, the other the king’s servant. When David’s life was threatened by King SAUL, he informed his friend Jonathan (natural heir to the throne) of his father’s intention. Jonathan then jeopardized his own life and his royal inheritance to save David: “And Jonathan had David reaffirm his oath out of love for him, because he loved him as he loved himself” (1 Sam. 20:17). Later, in David’s lamentation over the death of Saul and Jonathan, he expressed, “I grieve for you, Jonathan my brother; you were very dear to me. Your love for me was wonderful, more wonderful than that of women” (2 Sam. 1:26).

Another biblical story of friendship love, hardly less known and loved, is that between RUTH and her mother-in-law NAOMI. Ruth, a young Moabite widow, voluntarily left her native land to go with Naomi, an Israelite, back to her home in BETHLEHEM in Judea. Her deep devotion is expressed in the well-known verse: “Don’t urge me to leave you or to turn back from you. Where you go I will go, and where you stay I will stay. Your people will be my people and your God my God. Where you die I will die, and there I will be buried. May the LORD deal with me, be it ever so severely, if anything but death separates you and me” (Ruth 1:16-17).

Jesus set a beautiful example of personal human friendship. There were specific ones of whom it was said Jesus loved. John refers to himself as “the disciple whom Jesus loved” (Jn. 21:20). Earlier, in recording the sickness of LAZARUS and his subsequent death, John had quoted MARY and MARTHA as saying in their message to Jesus, “Lord, the one you love is sick” (11:3). To this he added his own comment, “Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus” (v. 5). It is common in human experience to have an inner circle of friends who are best loved. Jesus had his, and thereby endorsed friendship.

C. Spurious love. Love that is limited to selfish interest of a worldly and temporal nature is spurious. It expresses itself in a number of ways. One is extramarital sex indulgence, the prostitution of honorable members of the body by spurious love (1 Cor. 12:23-24). Two of the Ten Commandments, seventh and tenth, forbid adultery and sexual lust respectively (Exod. 20:14, 17). Jesus speaks strongly against illicit sexual desires (Matt. 5:28). In the Wisdom Literature, men are warned against the enticing flattery and seduction of a harlot or adulteress who says, “Come, let’s drink deep of love till morning; let’s enjoy ourselves with love! My husband is not at home; he has gone on a long journey” (Prov. 7:18-19). In the unfaithfulness of Hosea’s wife, the heartbreaking effects of Israel’s apostasy is illustrated (Hos. 3:1). With vivid metaphor, Ezekiel drew a sordid picture of Judah’s apostasy: “Then the Babylonians came to her, to the bed of love, and in their lust they defiled her” (Ezek. 23:17).

Spurious love also takes the form of greed for material things—houses, lands, money, all kinds of worldly possessions. Jesus called these things MAMMON, and uttered strong warnings against their influence. He said, “No one can serve two masters. Either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve both God and Money [mamōnas G3440]” (Matt. 6:24). He often warned against riches and, in two parables—the rich farmer (Lk. 12:16-21) and the rich man and Lazarus (16:19-31)—against the fatal consequences of being a slave to riches. Summarily, Paul said, “For the love of money is the root of all kinds of evils” (1 Tim. 6:10). Later he wrote to Timothy, “Demas, because he loved this world, has deserted me” (2 Tim. 4:10).

Jesus pointed out that even love for one’s family could be selfish. “Anyone who loves his father or mother more than me is not worthy of me; anyone who loves his son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me” (Matt. 10:37). Moreover, the one “who loves his life loses it” (Jn. 12:25; cf. Rev. 12:11).

A fourth type of spurious love is vainglory. It is most prevalent and most tempting, making its appeal to the ego. It can destroy the effectiveness of religion by replacing God with self, as did the Jewish leaders in Jesus’ day. Jesus called them hypocrites who “love to pray standing in the synagogues and on the street corners to be seen by men” (Matt. 6:5). His renunciation was strong: “Woe to you Pharisees, because you love the most important seats in the synagogues and greetings in the marketplaces” (Lk. 11:43). He warned against the scribes for the same conduct plus their love for “the places of honor at banquets” (20:46).

To these may be added the love of pleasure and the love of wine (Prov. 21:17; Isa. 47:8), and anything else that may come under the heading of “the world or anything in the world. If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him” (1 Jn.2:15).

D. Spiritual love. The highest form of human love is spiritual. In the godly person it is both spontaneous and commanded. Jesus defined the bond of believers in a love sequence. “As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you. Now remain in my love. If you obey my commands, you will remain in my love, just as I have obeyed my Father’s commands and remain in his love” (Jn. 15:9-10). With God and his kingdom as the focal attraction of human love, all other objects of love may properly and acceptably fall into subordinate categories. The kingdom of God and his righteousness, however, are to be sought first for a person to keep his love in proper perspective (Matt. 6:33).

Love on a lower plane is based on emotion and therefore prompted by feeling, whereas spiritual love can be commanded. Consequently, in NT righteousness, Jesus could and did make a threefold command to love. The believer must love God completely, his neighbor as himself, and his Christian brother as Christ loves him (Lk. 10:27; Jn. 15:12).

As Paul discussed various activities of the Christian life, he concluded by pointing out “the most excellent way” (1 Cor. 12:31b) with his immortal classic on love (1 Cor. 13). In it he virtually personified love, and this portrayal may very well be a picture of Jesus Christ. It is at once the greatest of the spiritual gifts, the attributes of Christ, and the example of perfection for Christians. It lacks jealousy, boastfulness, arrogance, rudeness, selfishness, and irritability; it rejoices in the right, bearing all things, believing, hoping, enduring; and never fails in any endeavor, nor ends in time or circumstance. This is spiritual love—excellent and eternal—and attainable by human beings through the love of Christ.

On the same high plane, John emphasized brotherly love of believers. He is persuasive in his logical presentation: God’s love is seen in sending his Son for the expiation for our sins; to love one another is the primary authentication that we know God, whom no man has ever seen; the testimony of the Holy Spirit, combined with our confession that Jesus is God’s Son, insures our dwelling in God and God in us; and this perfected love allays any fear of judgment in us; and finally that love originates with God, and that love for a brother is essential to love for God (1 Jn. 4:7-21). According to the enlightening quality of love, John wrote, “Whoever loves his brother lives in the light, and there is nothing in him to make him stumble” (2:10). Thus Jesus, Paul, and John show the necessity, nature, and rewards of man’s spiritual love.

V. The legacy of love. Love may be viewed from many standpoints, but no comprehensive view is possible without citing the benefits and blessings of God’s love. Hosea stated the phrase, “fruit of unfailing love” (Hos. 10:12). It suggests the legacy of love. The multiple expressions of God’s love may be summarized in five legacies to man.

A. A person—the Son of God. Jesus Christ is God’s preeminent gift to human beings, since through him all others were and are administered. He is love in person, offering the rich legacies of love. He makes available not only eternal life, but abundant life with joy, gladness, peace, assurance of God’s daily care, and hope (Matt. 5:12; 6:25-33; Jn. 10:10; 14:27). The person, works, and teachings of Jesus constitute the world’s richest legacy. He set the perfect example of ethical love. In his brief and busy ministry, he supplied human need in tenderness and love: “he went about doing good and healing all who were under the power of the devil” (Acts 10:38). Finally he mediated God’s love in its deepest expression by his voluntary death on the cross (Matt. 20:28; Jn. 10:17-18). He helped people live, and he gave life beyond death. Beyond the grave he gave them hope: “Because I live, you also will live” (Jn. 14:19b). He showed the world the immortality of love. Paul, like other believers, got the message and boldly asked, “Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?” (Rom. 8:35). Triumphantly, he answered his own question with the assurance that neither invisible powers “nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord” (v. 39). The crowning gift of God’s love is his Son.

B. A power—the Spirit Of God. Someone has said that in the OT God was for man; in Jesus Christ God was with man; and in the Holy Spirit God was in man (cf. Jn. 14:17b). God not only sent Jesus, he sent his HOLY SPIRIT to dwell in those who love Jesus and keep his commandments (v. 15). “Whoever has my commands and obeys them, he is the one who loves me. He who loves me will be loved by my Father, and I too will love him and show myself to him” (v. 21). Thus Paul could rejoice in suffering, “because God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, whom he has given us” (Rom. 5:5). In turn, Paul says, “The fruit of the Spirit is love...” (Gal. 5:22; cf. Col. 1:8).

Jesus identified the Holy Spirit as God’s legacy to believers who love Christ and keep his commandments; a legacy given in response to Jesus’ prayer. “And I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Counselor to be with you forever—the Spirit of truth. The world cannot accept him, because it neither sees him nor knows him. But you know him, for he lives with you and will be in you” (Jn. 14:16-17). This is a unique legacy for believers only, imparting to them Christ’s life, uniting them to God, and giving peace of heart and guidance of mind (vv. 18-31). In Christ’s service, the Holy Spirit is the source of power for the believer in sustaining him, in his preaching the gospel, and in his warfare against Satan (Acts 1:8; Rom. 15:13; 1 Cor. 2:4).

C. A province—the kingdom of God. The initial note in the preaching of JOHN THE BAPTIST and of Jesus was, “the kingdom of heaven is near” (Matt. 3:2; 4:17). In his teaching, Jesus sought, primarily through parables, to portray the image of the kingdom. It is in essence a spiritual kingdom (Lk. 1:33; 13:29; 17:21; Jn. 18:36) whose citizens are bound together by bonds of God’s love.

In his SERMON ON THE MOUNT, sometimes called the Magna Charta of the kingdom of God, Jesus enumerated both the blessings to be received (Matt. 5:3-11) and the blessings to be given. Disciples were not only to receive the legacy of love, but they were also to convey it. It is not enough to “love those who love you”: “Love your enemies...that you may be sons of your Father” (5:44-46). Jesus commanded the strongest kind of love for binding together members of the kingdom (Jn. 15:12-13). Paul wanted the Laodiceans and other believers to be “united in love” (Col. 2:2); and his prayer for the Philippians was that their love “may abound more and more” (Phil. 1:9). Similarly, Peter commanded believers: “Love the brotherhood of believers” (1 Pet. 2:17; cf. 3:8; 2 Pet. 1:7).

D. A portrait—the nature of God. In all the various aspects of God’s self-disclosure, the most far-reaching and fruitful knowledge that ever came to human beings was the revelation that “God is love,” demonstrated fully and magnificently in Jesus Christ. The portrait of God as a loving Father was revealed by Christ (Jn. 17:20-26). John was deeply impressed with this revelation of God. He exclaimed, “How great is the love the Father has lavished on us, that we should be called children of God!” (1 Jn. 3:1; cf. Jn. 1:12; Rom. 8:15). The writer, in his masterful sermon (1 John), portrays God so dominantly as love that other attributes are hardly seen. Thus Christ and the early Christians bequeathed to the church a glowing portrait of the God of love.

E. A permanence—the City of God. The final legacy of love is an eternal dwelling place with God. From that night in old Jerusalem when Jesus told NICODEMUS that God’s love purchased eternal life for sinners (Jn. 3:16) to the closing scenes envisioning the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:10—22:5), the NT shows that our eternal home is a gift of God’s love. Jesus told his disciples that he was going to prepare a place for them, and return to take them home with him (Jn. 14:2-3). Paul said, “Now we know that if the earthly tent we live in is destroyed, we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven, not built by human hands” (2 Cor. 5:1).

Venus de Milo, one of the best-known pieces of ancient Greek sculpture (c. 130 B.C.), is thought to depict Aphrodite, Final transaction, however, is made and possession secured when we reciprocate with love. “No eye has seen, / no ear has heard, / no mind has conceived / what God has prepared for those who love him” (1 Cor. 2:9; cf. Isa. 64:4). James gave the same conditional promise: “Blessed is the man who perseveres under trial, because when he has stood the test, he will receive the crown of life that God has promised to those who love him” (Jas. 1:12). Again, “Has not God chosen those who are poor in the eyes of the world to be rich in faith and to inherit the kingdom he promised those who love him?” (2:5). Furthermore, our assurance of eternal heritage lies in love on earth, “We know we have passed from death to life, because we love our brothers” (1 Jn. 3:14). Paul gave the assurance that “In love he predestined us to be adopted as his sons through Jesus Christ” (Eph. 1:4b–5). The ultimate destiny of the disciple’s journey is his “Father’s house” (Jn. 14:2), and the way is paved with love.

VI. Conclusion. The final word on love cannot be said, but a treatise may well be concluded with some scriptural highlights on the subject. Paul admonished believers to “Follow the way of love” (1 Cor. 14:1). There are three obvious reasons for doing so.

First, love is the essence of harmony. Without love there would be universal chaos. By it all other attributes of God are harmonized; by it all heavenly beings are in harmony; and wherever it prevails on earth there is harmony. “Above all, love each other deeply, because love covers over a multitude of sins” (1 Pet. 4:8). Love is spiritual healing of frictions and fractures in interpersonal relations. It makes possible the boundless reach of God’s kingdom on earth. Love holds together and harmonizes various human elements. It binds the brotherhood. In the love of God (Jude 21) is peace and harmony. Without love, human beings are beastly, greedy, suspicious, selfish, murderous, and always at enmity with others. With love they build homes, churches, and communities, and live in harmony with God and others.

Second, love is the essence of life. “Anyone who does not love remains in death” (1 Jn. 3:14b). To love is to give, and to give is to live. Whoever loses himself in the love of God finds his life in the greatness of God (Mk. 8:35). Without love one does not risk the outward reach, but is driven by fear into the suffocating bonds of self until he dies. However, “There is no fear in love. But perfect love drives out fear” (1 Jn. 4:18). It alleviates all fear of punishment here and hereafter. It releases the life-giving forces in believers and enables them to grow toward Christian maturity. Love is an essential ingredient for human sustenance, and all people all the time need it.

Finally, love is the essence of occupational service. All occupations grow out of supply and demand in such areas as food, clothing, shelter, health, education, and spiritual welfare. The supply of God’s love is abundant, and the demand is great. Agents are needed to deliver the goods. This constitutes an occupation in which there is no threat of unemployment. Every Christian is employed in the business of sharing love. Jesus closed his earthly ministry with this emphasis. Someone must take his love to the unlovely and the unloved, and keep his own supplied. At his postresurrection appearance by Galilee, after breakfast Jesus gave Peter a second test on love. Peter had failed the first in thinking that the sword was more powerful than love. Things were different now. Love had broken the bonds of death, to which he was witness. In reminiscence of his former boast of love (Mk. 14:29) and subsequent denial (Jn. 18:17, 25–27), Jesus asked him, “Simon son of John, do you love me more than these?” (Jn. 21:15). The question was repeated three times, providing the opportunity for three affirmative answers, to revoke the three denials. He passed the test, and Jesus gave him a special threefold assignment to express his love: “Feed my lambs...Take care of my sheep...Feed my sheep” (vv. 15-17). And this is the assignment of love for all Christians until the Lord of love comes again!

love feast. See AGAPE.

lovingkindness. This term, apparently coined by Miles Coverdale in his translation of the Bible (1535; see VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE, ENGLISH) and rarely found in modern versions, is used by the KJV almost thirty times to render Hebrew ḥesed H2876, a theologically significant word that has a broad range of meaning. It signifies an attitude—either divine or human—born out of mutual relationship, for example, between relatives, friends, master/subject, host/guest. Primarily it is not a disposition but a helpful action; it corresponds to a relationship of trust. As exercised by a sovereign, it protects his dominion; it gives people security in their mutual dealings. (See NIDOTTE, 2:211-18.)

The term ḥesed also denotes “kindness” or “help” received from a superior. The meaning fluctuates: “[covenant] obligation,” “loyalty,” “love,” “grace.” Frequently it is associated with FORGIVENESS and is almost equal to MERCY (Exod. 20:6; 34:6, 7; Mic. 7:18). However, the principal connotation is “loyal love”—a love that is associated with the COVENANT (Deut. 7:12; 1 Sam. 20:8). Human beings could always rely upon the divine ḥesed. (The sense “covenant loyalty” was argued by N. Glueck Ḥesed in the Bible [1967; German orig. 1927] and has been widely accepted; this view has been criticized by S. Romerowski in VT 60 [1990]: 89-103.)

When the term refers to God, it indicates in general the divine love flowing out to sinners in unmerited kindness. On the divine side it comes to designate particularly GRACE. In a religious sense the ḥesed of God always signifies his merciful and faithful aid. The psalmist sees Yahweh as One whose ḥesed has been “from of old” (Ps. 25:6). He exclaims, “How priceless is your unfailing love! / Both high and low among men / find refuge in the shadow of your wings” (36:7). This divine faithfulness is extolled especially in Ps. 136. In Ps. 40 the faithfulness of God seems to imply the giving of Jesus Christ—the most convincing proof of divine mercy, kindness, and lovingkindness that could be given to a lost world (vv. 10-11). In Ps. 51 David prays, with a deeply penitent heart, for the remission of sins and expects God to grant it “according to your unfailing love” (v. 1). He is continually praising Yahweh for his love, which is good (69:16) and “better than life” (63:3). God’s lovingkindness is that steadfast love that will not let Israel go. This essential and distinctive quality of God, however, should also characterize God’s people (Hos. 4:1; 12:6; Mic. 6:8). See also FAITH, FAITHFULNESS; GOOD; LOVE.

Lozon loh’zon (Λοζων). Ancestor of a group of “Solomon’s servants” who returned from Babylon with ZERUBBABEL and his associates (1 Esd. 5:33; possibly the same as DARKON in the parallel passages, Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

Lubim loo’bim. See LIBYA.

Lucas loo’kuhs. KJV alternate form of LUKE (Phlm. 24).

Lucifer loo’si-fuhr. KJV rendering of Hebrew hēlēl H2122 (“shining one”), which occurs only once, in an oracle against the king of BABYLON (Isa. 14:12). The name comes from the VULGATE (Latin lucifer, “light-bringing”; cf. LXX, eōsphoros) and is applied to the MORNING STAR, that is, Venus (see ASTRONOMY II.D.). Some Latin church fathers, associating this passage with Lk. 10:18 (cf. also 2 Cor. 11:14), applied the name to SATAN, and this usage became common.

Lucius loo’shuhs (Λούκιος G3372 [Apoc. Λεύκιος], Lat. Lucius, from lux, “light”). (1) A Roman CONSUL who, in response to an embassy sent to Rome by SIMON MACCABEE, wrote a letter to PTOLEMY Euergetes of Egypt (1 Macc. 15:16-21) and other ANE rulers (15:22-23) supporting Simon in his struggles with the SELEUCIDS. That his title is imperfectly reproduced is evident in that only his praenomen is given and a date and mention of the senate are lacking. His identification is problematic. Some recent scholars think that the reference is to Lucius Caecilius Metellus Calvus, who was the consul in the year 142 B.C. This proposal assumes that there is textual or chronological confusion in the passage (see HJP, rev. ed. [1973-87], 1:195-97; J. A. Goldstein, I Maccabees, AB 41 [1976], 492, 496).

(2) A man from CYRENE, named third among the five “prophets and teachers” in the church at ANTIOCH OF SYRIA (Acts 13:1). This Lucius was apparently one of the Hellenistic Jewish Christians who had boldly preached to the Greeks in this city (11:20-21), where he remained to minister in the church.

(3) One of three “relatives” of PAUL (the others being JASON and SOSIPATER) who sent greetings to the Christians in Rome (Rom. 16:21). According to many scholars, however, the Greek term syngenēs G5150 here means “kinsman” (cf. RSV) and should be understood in the sense of “fellow-Jew” (cf. 9:3). It is possible, moreover, that this description applies only to Jason and Sosipater. The Lucius mentioned here is thought by some to be the same as #2 above, but that identification is not probable. (See C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, ICC, 2 vols. [1975-79], 2:805.)

Inscriptional evidence shows that Loukas (LUKE) was used as an alternative form for Lucius or Lucanus, and this fact has been used to support a proposed identification of the author of the third gospel and Acts with either of the above companions of Paul. The suggested identification of Luke with #3 is as old as ORIGEN, whereas the fact that Cyrene was famous for its medical resources has been appealed to as support in identifying Luke with #2. Many believe that either identification is ruled out by Col. 4:12-14, which indicates that Luke was a Gentile rather than a Jew. Others argue that Rom. 16:21 is ambiguous regarding the ethnic identity of Lucius #3. (See A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East [1927], 435ff.; MM, 381; H. J. Cadbury in BC, 5:489-95; id., The Book of Acts in History [1955], 155-56; ABD, 4:396-97.)

D. E. HIEBERT

lucre. This English term is used by the KJV once in the OT to render Hebrew beṣaʿ H1299, “gain, profit,” in a passage where the term has a negative connotation (1 Sam. 8:3; NIV, “dishonest gain”; NRSV, “bribe”). In the KJV NT it is always qualified by “filthy” as the rendering of aischrokerdēs

Gl53 (“shameful gain”) or a cognate expression (1 Tim. 3:3 [TR], 8; Tit. 1:7; 1 Pet. 5:2). The term lucre can mean simply “profit,” but the rendering “filthy lucre,” which goes back to Tyndale’s translation, has given the word itself a bad name. A pejorative connotation, however, is already found in Middle English and even in the Latin term from which the word comes (lucrum, which could mean “avarice”).

Lud luhd (לוד H4276). Son of SHEM and grandson of NOAH (Gen. 10:22; 1 Chr. 1:17). Earlier in the Table of NATIONS, however, the Ludites (KJV “Ludim,” Heb. lûdîm) are said to be descendants of MIZRAIM or EGYPT (Gen. 10:13; 1 Chr. 1:11 [Ketib, lûdiyyîm]). Since the Table of Nations is basically ethnographic in character and concerned chiefly with the origin and classification of certain of the nations of the ancient world, Lud and Ludim are to be regarded as eponymous ancestors of two different nations (one Semitic and the other Hamitic) that continued to bear their names.

The identification of Ludim/Ludites with Lydia is ruled out on the basis of the close geographical and ethnic association of Ludim with Egypt. It is probably better to regard it as a nation now unknown, as are the ANAMITES and NAPHTUHITES, which also descended from Mizraim. Lud, on the other hand, is almost certainly Lydia in several passages. The Assyrian inscriptions refer to the Lydians as Luddu, a cognate of Hebrew Lud. JOSEPHUS (Ant. 1.6.4) equates Lud in Gen. 10:22 with Lydia, and HERODOTUS speaks of Lydus, who was the traditional progenitor of the Lydians. Lud appears in association with TARSHISH, TUBAL, and GREECE (Isa. 66:19), nations that were located along the N shores of the Mediterranean Sea. Since Lydia was in the same general area, its identification with Lud in this passage seems to be warranted. See LYDIA (PLACE).

In Ezek. 30:5 Lud probably refers to Ludim, the African nation (but see NIV). It occurs in association with ETHIOPIA and LIBYA in an oracle directed against Egypt. Some have suggested that Lud in this context may refer to Lydian mercenaries who were employed in the army of Egypt from the time of Psammetichus I, but the context seems rather to require the name of a place. In an oracle against TYRE, Ezekiel refers to mercenaries from Lud (27:10). The passage is of little help in locating Lud geographically because it is associated with PERSIA and PUT, widely separated nations. It is quite probable, however, that Lydian mercenaries are intended, for their prowess in battle was lauded by Herodotus (Hist. 1.79), while the Assyrian Annals (Ashurbanipal, Rassam Cylinder) speak of Lydian mercenaries. In Jer. 46:9 a reference is obviously to the African Ludim because of its association with Ethiopian Put (but see NIV).

Egyptian inscriptions from the 13th to the 15th cent. B.C. refer to a people called Luden located near Mesopotamia. This information has led some to infer that the Lydians were displaced from their original home in Mesopotamia by the Assyrians and migrated to ASIA MINOR.

Ludlul bēl nēmeqi. The first line and title of the greatest hymn to MARDUK, the god of BABYLON, yet discovered. The line means, “Let us praise the god of wisdom.” The poem on four tablets, all in damaged condition, tells the personal lament of a pious man who is smitten by disease and later restored. It is in the most erudite dialect and form of Middle Babylonian and written in CUNEIFORM. The superficial similarity to the theme of the biblical book of JOB has brought the text to the attention of Bible students. It contains some of the finest self-conscious insights into the mood and philosophy of ancient paganism extant from the ANE. Of special interest are the lines expressing the suppliant's despair, "Who has learned the plan of the heavenly gods, Who knows the scheme of the Nether World, Where have mortals comprehended the way of the gods?" Such depths of agnostic melancholy are not equaled in ancient documents. (See W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature [1960], 21–62; W. White, A Babylonian Anthology [1966], 30–34; ANET, 596–600.)

Luhith loo'hith (לֹחִית H4284, "platform, terrace, shelf"). A city of MOAB, associated with HORONAIM (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:5). Refugees from ruined Moab are described as fleeing to ZOAR by the ascent of Luhith and in the way to Horonaim. Luhith may therefore have been on a hill. EUSEBIUS placed the town between Areopolis (i.e., Rabbath-Moab) and Zoar, but the precise location is unknown. One possibility is modern Katrabba, about 6 mi. E of the south tip of the DEAD SEA.

Luke look (Λουκᾶς G3371, a name used in inscriptions as an affectionate form of Loukios [see Lucius]; on the possible connection with other names, such as Lucanus, Lucianus, and Lucilius, see A. Plummer, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to Luke, ICC, 5th ed. [1922], xviii, and J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel according to Luke I-IX, AB 28 [1981], 42–43).

I. Identity. Luke is mentioned by name only three times in the NT—all by PAUL while in prison (Col. 4:14; 2 Tim. 4:11; Phlm. 24). Although Luke never mentions his own name in his writings, his identity was certainly known to THEOPHILUS and, no doubt, to the reading public of that day. Luke does identify himself in a measure in the "we" sections of ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. All the leading associates of Paul (mentioned in the epistles) are eliminated from possible authorship by data in Acts, except TITUS and Luke. Since no case can be made for Titus, Luke implies his own authorship. This inference is supported by unanimous early tradition. There are, then, valid autobiographical references by Luke, particularly in Acts. His personality shows through in his gospel (see LUKE, GOSPEL OF). Luke was a Gentile, not "of the circumcision" (Col. 4:10–14). His skill in the use of Greek, along with his viewpoint and attitudes (e.g., hoi barbaroi, Acts 28:2, 4) mark him as such. He was a physician, a traveler, a missionary, and a writer.

II. Background. Luke probably was born in ANTIOCH OF SYRIA (so say JEROME, De vir. ill. 7, and EUSEBIUS, Eccl. Hist. 3.4.7). He shows unusual interest in this city (Acts 6:5; 11:19–27; 13:1; 14:19, 21, 26; 15:22–23, 30, 35; 18:22). Even W. M. Ramsay conceded that he was born in Antioch of a Macedonian family (St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, 14th ed. [1925], xxxviii). Some think he was the brother of Titus (2 Cor. 8:18; 12:18). If so, this connection would help answer the silence of Acts about Titus. D. Hayes conjectures that Paul may have known Luke at the university of TARSUS in student days (The Most Beautiful Book Ever Written [1913], 21). He also suggests that Luke may have known the family of the Latin poet Lucanus, the nephew of GALLIO and SENECA—a possible cause of Gallio's leniency toward Paul in Acts 18:12–17 (ibid., 7–12). Some have thought Luke may have been a freedman. Names with contractions ending in -as were particularly common among slaves. Greek and Roman masters often educated slaves as physicians and later freed them for their services (ibid., 46). It is even conjectured that he may have been born in the household of Theophilus, who was possibly a wealthy government official in Antioch (Lk. 1:3).

III. Medical missionary. If the reading of CODEX BEZAE in Acts 11:27-28 (which includes the pronoun “we”) is correct, Paul may have known Luke in Antioch. At least by the time of Paul’s visit to TROAS on the second journey, Luke joined the apostle and was with him intermittently until Paul’s final imprisonment in Rome. The beloved physician not only bolstered Paul’s frail health and perhaps added years to his life, but he also practiced medicine at times in their journeys. The word for “cured” in Acts 28:9 (from therapeuō G2543) can mean “medically treated.” Luke shared the labor and the rewards. Luke also shared the call and labors of preaching (16:10-13). Perhaps he should be regarded as the first trained medical missionary.

IV. The historian. Luke was an able and deliberate historian, writing more than one-fourth of the volume of the NT—more than any other man. Modern research has vindicated the quality of his work. In legend, Luke was a painter. In fact, he was the recorder of truth that supplied the inspiration and subjects for religious art.

I. Background. The Gospel according to Luke has been called the most beautiful book ever written (E. Renan, Les évangiles et la seconde génération chrétienne [1877], 283). At its heart is the perfect life, Christ’s teachings, redemption through him, and the lives of those who cluster around him. In this book and its counterpart, the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, more knowledge is given of the apostles and leaders of the primitive church than is found in any other document. This author, in fact, wrote more pages of the NT than any other person.

The Greek style of this gospel is generally recognized as among the best in the NT. Though there are, of course, reflections of Semitic sources, the book is not a mere collection or compilation of fragments. It is a connected treatise by a capable and well-informed person. Whatever the author borrowed from oral or written tradition, he made it his own and cast it in his own style.

That the author had sources is evident. He made no claim of being an eyewitness of the things he described. Rather, he affirmed that the things recorded were delivered to him and to his contemporaries “by those who from the first were eyewitnesses and servants of the word” (Lk. 1:2). These words, however, also contain an important claim. While Luke was not in the apostolic group during the earthly ministry of Jesus, he does insist that the sources of his information were persons who had seen that which transpired from the beginning. Barring specific information to the contrary, the passage seems to imply not only that Luke wrote during or near the time of the apostles, but also that they were the obvious source of much of his information. In any case, he was no sketchy or casual inquirer. He had “carefully investigated everything from the beginning” so as to be able to write “an orderly account” (v. 3).

The majority of modern scholars have held that Luke had access to two main literary sources, Mark and “Q,” to which he added certain materials from a source peculiarly his own, called “L.” As the documentary theory was being developed in the 1860s by H. Holtzmann (Die synoptischen Evangelien: ihr Ursprung und geschichtlicher Character), it was not the canonical Mark, however, which was considered a source but rather an early form in which the material was cast as a protogospel that came to be called Ur-Marcus. It was B. H. Streeter, in 1924, who sought to show that Matthew and Luke used Mark (The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins, 157). The hypothetical document called “Q” has usually been described as a body of sayings or teachings of Jesus, much after the pattern of WISDOM Literature. Some identify it with the LOGIA that PAPIAS attributed to Matthew. In general, it is held to consist of the “double tradition,” that is, the material found in both Matthew and Luke but not in Mark. See GOSPELS III.B.

On this view of sources, there was relatively little demand for originality laid upon the writer of the third gospel. The written documents furnished most of the content, much of the order, and a model for much of the form. Deviation from the models would be largely a matter of preference and of style rather than of necessity. He would be more of an editor than an author.

In spite of the repeated insistence that the documentary view no longer needs to be proved (e.g., J. Moffatt, Introduction to the Literature of the New Testament [1925], 180) and that “it is the one absolutely assured result of a century of learned discussion...that St. Mark’s is the oldest Gospel which we possess” (A. E.J. Rawlinson, St Mark [1925]), there have always been dissenting voices. Germany had its Hilgenfeld, Zahn, and Schlatter. Sanday’s famous seminar at Oxford had its dissentients, Allen and Bartlet. The voice of objection has not ceased in the United States from the days of E. D. W. Burton in 1904 (Some Principles of Literary Criticism and their Application to the Synoptic Problem) to the present. In 1964, W. R. Farmer wrote a major volume (The Synoptic Problem: A Critical Analysis) “to demonstrate that the idea of Markan priority is highly questionable.” The debate was thus reopened but has reached no new consensus (cf. D. A. Black and D. R. Beck, eds., Rethinking the Synoptic Problem [2001]).

Meanwhile, it is possible to think in broader and more flexible terms of Luke’s sources than would be indicated by the documentary hypotheses. Luke may well have interviewed persons related to the household of Jesus. Reports directly from eyewitnesses are probable, especially during Luke’s stay in Palestine while PAUL was in prison in CAESAREA. Personal acquaintance with some of the apostles and other leaders of the early church is almost certain. He obviously had access to the information accumulated by Paul. IRENAEUS (Against Heresies 3.1.1) says that Luke “recorded in a book the gospel preached by” Paul. Could not Luke have used a multiplicity of oral and written sources, possibly including another of the Synoptic Gospels, treated in the context of his own familiarity with the places and events of Palestine, governed by a strong historical sensitivity, influenced by a Gentile breadth of insight and viewpoint, and guided and inspired by the Spirit of God? How else could he have produced such a masterpiece? One thing is certain: he used his sources, but he was no slave to them.

II. Unity. Not only is the unity of the third gospel assured; there is also general agreement that its sequel, the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, is by the same author. On the basis of the same addressee (Lk. 1:3; Acts 1:1), the specific reference to the former in the latter (Acts 1:1), and the obvious similarities of style, method, and materials, it is common to refer to the two books as one compound volume of Luke-Acts.

The same distinctive literary excellence characterizes the whole. Renan called this the “most literary of the Gospels.” It is the Greek of the educated man, characterized by a rich vocabulary, striking contrasts, breadth of interest, depth of insights, and intelligent concern for all types of people. His GENTILE orientation is never narrow. It includes every son of Adam. The poor, the helpless, the infirm, and the sin-sick occupy his thought. He is ever a missionary and evangelist, as is his Lord.

A. Plummer says the author is the most versatile of all the NT writers (A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to Luke, ICC, 5th ed. [1922], xlix). Though a learned Gentile (see LUKE), he is sufficiently oriented in Hebrew society that he can be as thoroughly Hebraistic in describing it as he is Greek in describing his own culture. Accordingly, when Luke uses distinctly Semitic sources, as in the first two chapters of the gospel, he makes them so completely his own that they in no way mar the unity of the whole. With apparent ease, Luke moves from the classical Greek models of the prologue to a SEPTUAGINT type of Greek strongly flavored with Semitisms in the infancy narratives and on to a good literary Koine Greek in the body of the writing (see GREEK LANGUAGE). There is no awkward piecing together of unrelated fragments. As A. B. Bruce says, “It does not matter what documents Luke used, he exercised his own judgment in using them” (EGT, 1:48). No part of Luke-Acts is without the distinctive and unifying stamp of the author’s own genius and style.

Another mark of unity is the consistent historical interest and insight. Luke is called the first church historian. As D. Hayes says, “Mark and Matthew wrote memoirs. John wrote a philosophy of religion...Luke the Gentile set himself to write a historical gospel, following Gentile models at certain points and connecting his account with Gentile history throughout” (The Synoptic Gospels and the Book of Acts [1919], 215). He alone of NT writers names the Roman emperors and uses a great many proper names to correlate times and events. From beginning to end, he is bent on relating the gospel to the world, to the empire, to all nations, and to all times. Luke raised sacred history from Israelitish nationality to universal humanity. The pattern is consistent throughout Luke-Acts.

A great deal has been said about the medical language of Luke. Whatever can be proved concerning the authorship of the gospel by it, a strong case can be made for the unity of Luke-Acts. Whether the author spoke as a physician or as an informed layman, there is a consistent pattern peculiar to these writings. No other NT book approaches the frequency of reference to medical needs, facts of diagnosis, descriptive details of the diseases and cures, psychological accompaniments, and marks of recovery. Nor does any other book contain so abundant casual use of medical vocabulary and reference to interests more particularly common to physicians. Whatever the reason, the phenomenon exists so persistently as to amount to a signature of the same author on the whole.

III. Authorship. The author never mentions his own name, but there was no difference of opinion in the early church as to his identity. No possibility was ever mentioned of questioning that the author was Luke the beloved physician, traveling companion and joint missionary with Paul. Plummer compares the certainty of the authorship of the third gospel with that of the four great epistles of Paul (Commentary on Luke, xvi). Irenaeus quotes from nearly every chapter of the gospel, often referring to Luke as the author. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, who had received the tradition handed down from father to son from the apostles (Stromata 1.1), quotes the gospel frequently and definitely assigns it to Luke. TERTULLIAN works through most of the gospel in his treatise against MARCION, often calling it Luke's. The MURATORIAN CANON not only refers to Luke but also calls him medicus.

Even A. Jülicher, who in modern times rejected the Lukan authorship, admitted that the ancients universally accepted it. Upon those who reject Luke as the author there rests the burden of explaining the universal voice of the church fathers in his favor. Certainly the name of Luke was not selected as a pseudonym to give prominence to the book. His name was quite unknown except as it was enhanced through his writings. As Renan says, "Luke had no place in tradition, in legend, in history" (Les apôtres [1866], xvii). The only reason for so universal an association of the name with the documents seems to be that Luke wrote them and thus became known.

Though Luke's writings are the source of more knowledge of the apostles, deacons, and evangelists of the early church than are the writings of any other person, Luke tells little or nothing directly about himself. He makes one reference to himself by a pronoun in the gospel (Lk. 1:3) and uses the pronouns "we" and "us" a number of times in Acts. Paul alone of NT writers refers to him by name (Col. 4:14; 2 Tim. 4:11; Phlm. 24). These references and the reflections of the author in his writings have made possible a fairly rich and authentic acquaintance with Luke. Legend has, of course, greatly elaborated the data and has led to the production of many imaginative biographies of Luke.

The strongest internal evidence for authorship stems from the "we" sections in Acts (Acts 16:10-17; 20:5—21:18; 27:1—28:16). The author was apparently a companion of Paul. The third-person phrasing in 20:4 eliminates, as possible authors, the names of Timothy, Sopater, Aristarchus, Secundus, Gaius, Tychicus, and Tro-phimus. Silas cannot be easily fitted into the "we" sections. There is neither external nor internal evidence for Titus. For the remaining person of Paul's associates, namely Luke, there are both kinds of evidence. The rest of Luke-Acts is by the same author as the "we" sections if style, vocabulary, and the usual marks mean anything. Therefore, it is reasonable that Luke should be considered the author of the third gospel.

W. Hobart devoted more than three hundred pages to a study of The Medical Language of Luke (1882). He considered four hundred terms that were used by Luke alone among writers of the NT or that were used more frequently by him than by others and that were found also in the Greek medical writers. The evidence seemed overwhelming that Luke was a physician. H. J. Cadbury argued that the data proved only that Luke was an educated man (The Making of Luke-Acts [1927]), and most recent scholars now consider the evidence ambiguous. Even when proper allowance is made for lay use of medical language, however, A. von Harnack's explicit statement of the case stands (Luke the Physician [1909]). He proves that Luke was a physician not only by his vocabulary but also by a variety of traces throughout his writings such as points of view, preference for the healing miracles, tendency to diagnose diseases, interests characteristic of physicians, and ways of reporting anecdotes. It is true that a few isolated instances prove little. But the overwhelming mass of data appears conclusive that the author was indeed a physician, presumably Luke, the only physician known to belong to Paul's missionary party.

IV. Date. The question of date is closely related to that of sources and of the order in which the Synoptic Gospels were written. If the popular view of the priority of Mark is correct and if, as is widely held, Mark's gospel was written near the time of the death of Peter and Paul (A.D. 68), Luke must have been written rather late. Streeter bridges the gap by positing a Proto-Luke—a combination of Q and the bulk of the material peculiar to the third gospel—to which Luke later added the infancy stories and materials from Mark (The Four Gospels, 217-18). The idea of a Proto-Luke is, however, challenged by some scholars (e.g., H. F. D. Sparks in JTS 44 [1943]: 129-38). Even if it should be necessary to concede that Luke wrote after A.D. 68, it is almost certain that he had been collecting sources for some years.

If, however, as a growing number of scholars believe, it is not necessary to accept the priority of Mark, or if Mark wrote earlier than the late 60s, a more natural date for Luke becomes possible. Luke says plainly (Acts 1:1) that his gospel was written before Acts. If the reason for the abrupt ending of the Acts account of Paul's life, and for the silence concerning the outcome of the Roman trial should, as many think, be simply that Acts was written while Paul was still in prison in Rome, this book must have been written early in the 60s. Then the gospel must have been written in the early 60s as well, or even in the late 50s. The fact that Luke spent two or more years in Palestine, while Paul was in prison in Caesarea, means that he was within easy walking distance of the places and people that could furnish all the data he needed. He would also have had the leisure to write at this time. On this basis, a date of A.D. 58 would be a good approximation, being near the end of Luke's residence in Palestine and before the strenuous events described in the latter part of Acts.

The objection that Luke is so commonly third in the lists of the Gospels is more apparent than real. Ancient lists appear not to have been arranged always according to date of writing. There was a strong tendency to list the two apostles, Matthew and John, first. Others, it is thought, put Mark second because he was writing as a disciple of Peter, the prominent apostle. In any case, the ancient lists present no uniform order. ORIGEN frequently cites the Gospels in the order Matthew, Luke, and Mark. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, before Origen, puts the Gospels that contain the genealogies first on the basis of the tradition he had received from the primitive elders (Euseb., Eccl. Hist. 6.14). Luke also stood in the second place in Ambrosiaster's list, in the Catalogue of the Sixty Canonical Books, in the Old African Latin codex, and in the cursives 90 and 399. If Luke was not an early gospel, it is remarkable that it, not being written by an apostle, was ever listed in second place, especially by such notable leaders. The preponderance of evidence tends toward A.D. 58, in the absence of any compelling reason for rejecting an early date.

V. Place of origin. JEROME, in the preface to his commentary on Matthew (see PL, 26:18), said that Luke wrote the gospel in ACHAIA and BOEOTIA, but the source of his information is not known. Modern guesses as to the origin of the gospel vary considerably. Plummer lists the following: Rome (Holtzmann, Hug, Keim, Lekebusch, Zeller), Caesarea (Michaelis, Schott, Thiersch, Tholuck), Asia Minor (Hilgenfeld, Overbeck), Ephesus (Köstlin), and Corinth (Godet). Then he adds, significantly, that there is no evidence for or against any of them. In the absence of any need to think otherwise, Hayes (The Synoptic Gospels, 203) conjectures that Luke made his first considerable gathering of material in Palestine while Paul was in prison in Caesarea.

If one accepts a relatively late date of the actual writing, one of the places mentioned above can be chosen according to the time and circumstances imagined. Or, if Acts was written during Paul's imprisonment in Rome, Luke was written either before Paul and Luke left Caesarea or soon after they arrived in Rome. As abundant as Luke's sources of information must have been among his apostolic acquaintances and others over a period of time, there is no reason why he could not have written the gospel before leaving Caesarea, unless one is bound by an opinion on the relationship between Luke and Mark that would make this view unacceptable. Wherever the gospel was written, there can be little doubt that it reflects much material that was collected personally in Palestine, and that the handling of the material reflects a broad Gentile background which includes both wide missionary vision and experience in sharing the gospel with the whole world.

VI. Destination. Both Luke and Acts are addressed, ostensibly, to an individual named THEOPHILUS. That the reference is indeed to a person and not simply to lovers of God everywhere is made clear from the epithet "most excellent" (Lk. 1:3; Acts 1:1), which Luke ascribes also to the governors FELIX and FESTUS (Acts 23:26; 24:3; 26:25). The name Theophilus was common among Jews and especially among Gentiles (Plummer, Commentary on Luke, xxxiii). According to the CLEMENTINE LITERATURE, Theophilus was a wealthy citizen of Antioch. The title in Luke and its absence in Acts may indicate that he held a position in the government before being established as a Christian believer. This wealthy Christian may have been Luke's literary patron, furnishing him the financial backing necessary for the publication of his two books (Hayes, The Synoptic Gospel, 194).

It is difficult, however, to believe that the writer of the gospel had only one reader in view. The book is too admirably suited to the whole Gentile world. While Matthew wrote with a Jewish point of view and Mark adapted that viewpoint to the action-conscious Romans, Luke wrote from a Gentile standpoint in the best Greek for the broad Greek-speaking world. Luke explained Jewish commonplaces to his Gentile readers, for example, that Nazareth was in Galilee (Lk. 1:26) and that the Feast of Unleavened Bread was called the Passover (22:1). The outlook is broad. The GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST goes back to Adam (3:38). He is King not just of the Jews (Matt. 2:2). The good tidings are for all the people (Lk. 2:10). Prophecies are emphasized that include all flesh (3:5-6). Illustrations are given of God's ancient concern for Gentiles (4:25-30). Throughout the gospel, the Gentiles "belong" in God's plan of redemption and in the concern of Jesus. The companion of Paul shared the missionary vision and the arduous labors in order that all might know and believe. He wrote the Gentile gospel to the Gentile world in particular, and to the whole world in general.

VII. Occasion. The immediate occasion may well have been Luke's interest in the influential Theophilus, who had apparently made some move toward the Christian faith. The manner in which he is addressed places his needs in focus. If Luke was also of Antioch, and especially if his associations with Theophilus were particularly significant, Luke may have been greatly concerned that a full authentic account be presented to this discriminating leader. If further motive was necessary, Luke's missionary experience probably had taught him that a multitude of other discerning persons could use the same persuasive gospel.

The interruption of Paul's itinerant ministry by a prolonged imprisonment in Jerusalem and Caesarea provided the needed leisure. Luke's loyalty to Paul and perhaps Paul's recurrent need of a physician did not permit distant solitary campaigns. They did permit Luke to "carefully investigate all things" and "to write an orderly account" so that the reader or readers might "know the certainty of the things" they had been taught (Lk. 1:3-4). After participating in Paul's second and third missionary journeys, Luke did not find the data of the gospel new to him. He was in an excellent position to verify, arrange, and record the truths he had received from a variety of sources. The many attempts of others (1:1) seemed inadequate. With his superior scientific training and greater command of the Greek language, Luke no doubt felt an urge from God to do what others had only attempted. There had to be a better instrument for reaching the Gentile mind, especially among the cultured and influential.

Coin minted under Archelaus, ruler of Judea during Jesus' childhood (4 B.C. to A.D. 6).

VIII. Purpose. Though none of the Gospels reflects an aim to be complete and comprehensive in recording all the historical details of the life, ministry, and death of Jesus, history was definitely a specific aim of Luke in his work. He made no attempt to probe the silent years of Jesus' childhood and early maturity or to chronicle every event that could be reported. He did specifically investigate everything with care in order to give a perfectly reliable account of those important events and facts that constitute the gospel of Jesus Christ (Lk. 1:1–4), the historic foundations of the faith. Plummer observes that “Luke begins at the very beginning, far earlier than any other Evangelist; not merely with the birth of Christ, but with the promise of the birth of the forerunner. And he goes on to the very end: not merely to the Resurrection but to the Ascension” (Commentary on Luke, xxxv). Luke also has an unusually high proportion of material peculiar to himself, including many of the most beautiful treasures we possess (ibid.). Fullness of historically relevant data was an achieved goal.

While none of the Gospels is without historical interest, there is a new dimension in Luke's. He followed Gentile models at certain points and connected his accounts with Gentile history throughout. He has been called the first church historian. He did not write with a narrow controversial goal. His aim was not to depreciate the Twelve in the interests of Paul, nor to vindicate Paul, nor to reconcile the Judaizers with Paul's disciples (ibid., xxxvi). The document is no party paper under the cover of fictitious history. It is a carefully prepared research treatise on the facts of the gospel for the conversion and confirmation of readers in the salvation that is in Jesus Christ. The purpose is a gospel—a sure, historical gospel.

IX. Canonicity. The case for the Lukan authorship of the third gospel already has been discussed. While Luke was not one of the apostles, he was the companion of Paul and apparently was thought, in some sense, to have spoken for Paul. Tertullian said, “For even Luke's form of the gospel men usually ascribe to Paul” (Against Marcion 4.5). Irenaeus said, “Luke also, the companion of Paul, recorded in a book the Gospel preached by him” (Against Heresies 3.1.1). The general acceptance accorded the gospel in antiquity seems to indicate that any demand for apostolicity was met in the association with Paul and in the apostolic community. As H. N. Ridderbos says, "Apostolic authority and apostolic tradition in the New Testament must not be bound to the person of the apostle" (The Authority of the New Testament Scriptures [1963], 35). What is apostolic is not limited to the viva vox of the apostles nor to their writings. It acquires its own "unper-sonal" existence. The apostolic witness, authorized by Christ and inspired by the Holy Spirit, belongs to the depositum custodi, the treasure with which the church is entrusted (1 Tim. 3:15; 4:6, 12; 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:14; 2:2). The apostolic and canonical significance of a book for the church depends in large measure on whether its content is a part of the basic apostolic tradition (ibid.).

That the third gospel was recognized early as authoritative is beyond reasonable question. Plummer said that it already had been recognized as authoritative before the middle of the 2nd cent. (Commentary on Luke, xvi). No abrupt shift is observed in the use or acceptance of the gospel. As soon as it appears, its authority seems to be assumed. No question is raised. As more time elapses since apostolic times, words of explanation are introduced to identify Luke and to clarify his relationship with Paul and the apostolic church. Such references were noted above in the section on authorship. The notes of Tertullian, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and the Muratorian Fragment come from the end of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd centuries, but the sources directly known to them cover easily an earlier half century. Particularly in the case of Clement of Alexandria, the claim is made that the tradition was handed down first from the apostles and then from father to son (Stromata 1.1).

Is there evidence from the period between the apostles and these writers of the existence and use of Luke's gospel? There is. As Plummer says, "We obtain a very imperfect idea of the early evidence in favor of the Third Gospel when we content ourselves with the statement that it is not attributed to Luke by any one before Irenaeus and the Mura-torian Fragment" (Commentary on Luke, xv). Justin Martyr cites a variety of particulars that are found only in Luke (1 Apol. 34; Trypho 78, 88, 100, 103, 106). His pupil Tatian used the gospel in the DIATESSARON. Celsus knew the third gospel with its genealogy extending to the first man (Origen, Contra Celsum 2.32). The Clementine Homilies contain similarities that appear to be allusions (3.63, 65; 11.20, 23; 17.5; 18.16; 19.2). Marcion adapted this gospel to his purposes. Indeed, if Luke's gospel had not been in such common use for a long time, how could a scholar of Origen's breadth have listed it among the number of "those four Gospels admitted by all the churches under heaven"? F. Godet presents a good case for allusions by Clement of Rome in the 1st cent. to Luke's second document, Acts (A Commentary on the Gospel of Luke, 2 vols. [1893], 1:8-9). In the NT itself, he finds John's narrative alluding, even in expression, to Luke's and sees the long ending of Mark as "scarcely anything but an abridged reproduction of Luke's" narrative (ibid., 11).

Since no question of debate is raised to indicate a shift of attitude between the time of writing and the universal acceptance of the third gospel as reflected in the latter part of the 2nd cent.; since these early Christian leaders clearly believed that they had an original and firm tradition; since this belief is supported by various evidences of the existence and broad use of the document throughout the early church; and since no voice is raised against the authority of this Gentile nonapostle, it is reasonable to assume that the third gospel's position in the canon was firm and original. See CANON (NT).

X. Text. The third gospel has no lack of textual materials. The five primary uncials (Ⲁ Ⲃ Ⲅ Ⲇ Ⲉ A B C D) are the chief witnesses for the text. All of these but C (CODEX EPHRAEMI RESCRIPTUS) contain the whole gospel complete, while C has one long gap between Lk. 12 and 19 and a number of shorter gaps throughout the book. Of the complete MSS, B (CODEX VATICANUS) is, of course, king of the uncials, and Ⲛ (CODEX SINAITICUS) is next in rank. Where these two agree, the support for a reading generally is considered very strong. As Plummer indicates, “the Western element which sometimes disturbs the text of B is almost entirely absent from the Gospels” (Commentary on Luke, lxxii).

These primary uncials are reinforced by a number of others (including L, Δ, R, T, X, Ξ, and W). To these are added several hundred minuscules that contain the whole or part of the Gospels. Though these vary in importance, many of them are of considerable value. A variety of early Latin (from N Africa and Europe), Coptic (Egypt), and Syriac versions also are very useful. Many of these translations reflect texts that antedate the oldest uncials (which come from the 4th cent.) and represent wide geographical areas. Finally, the quotations from the church fathers reflect ancient text types that furnish a basis for comparison.

Relatively late discoveries have enriched the resources of the critic. Codex W (Washingtonensis), purchased in 1906 by Mr. Freer, could be listed as a sixth primary uncial. It contains only the four Gospels, but it comes from the late 4th or 5th cent.; its text of Luke is part Alexandrian and part Byzantine in type. The Koridethian Manuscript (Θ), an uncial of the four Gospels, was published in 1913. It is mostly Byzantine except in Mark, where it is akin to two groups of minuscules with which it has been grouped into the Theta or Caesarean family. Among the papyri, P<sup>45</sup> (CHESTER BEATTY Papyrus I), dating from the 2nd or 3rd cent., has been outstanding. Originally the codex contained all four Gospels and Acts, but the discovery c. 1930 included only certain leaves—seven in the case of Luke. In 1961, Papyrus BODMER XIV-XV(P<sup>75</sup>) was published. It contains most of Lk. 3-24 in its present form and is comparable to P<sup>45</sup> in many ways.

Godet mentions five or six thousand variant readings in the documents of Luke and says that “in general they are of very secondary importance and involve no change in the matter of Gospel history” (Commentary on Luke, 48). The critic’s task is simplified by the tendency of certain MSS to go habitually together in opposition to others until two principal forms are established—often the older uncials grouping against the minuscules and the less ancient uncials. The exact scholar finds no substitute for careful analysis and exegesis in each instance. Even so, it is still proper to speak of the general agreement of the text with the most ancient versions and with the quotations of the fathers of the 2nd and 3rd centuries, and to speak of the general uniformity of the MSS in which the Greek text has been preserved. As Godet says, “A text so universally diffused could only proceed from the text which was received from the very first” (ibid., 46). See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (NT).

XI. Special problems. Since Luke’s interest is so specifically historical, the most serious questions to be raised concerning his writings are charges of inaccuracy in reporting facts. These charges and detractions take four main forms: (1) the inference that a theological interest has displaced any genuine concern for historical accuracy; (2) the charge that Luke’s facts are wrong as compared with secular history; (3) the assertion that Luke and Paul contradict each other in their reporting of facts and events; and (4) the theory that the speeches and songs allegedly reported by Luke are his own compositions, in which he uses the literary device of putting his own ideas into the minds and mouths of others. A fifth problem has historical overtones—the matter of alleged theological differences between Luke and Paul. These last would be serious only if they made impossible the traditional relationship between these men.

Many have been disturbed by the fact that nearly all that is known about Jesus is from the writings of theologians or at least of people who were committed believers in Jesus as the Christ. It is argued that the theological judgment about Jesus was the mother of the narratives of the Gospels rather than that the facts narrated demanded the theological conclusions. In other words, it is alleged that the Gospels are not sober historical witnesses to Jesus of Nazareth but are simply the theological opinions of the early church as embellished and illustrated by such items of fact, legend, and mythology as could be used to present their views. The impossibility, on this view, of distinguishing fact from myth or legend has led many to despair of ever recovering the historical Jesus. On the other hand, the major effort of Formgeschichte (see FORM CRITICISM) is to peel back the layers of theology in order to come as close as possible to the truth.

Of course, the whole assumption that theology and HISTORY are at odds is an unproved hypothesis of doubt. None of the apostles would have admitted such a bipolarity. They considered themselves witnesses of evident facts that had compelled them and many others to believe that Jesus is indeed the Christ. The “works” of Jesus were not inventions of the apostles and evangelists to illustrate their faith; their faith was, in part, dependent upon these “works” and “signs” (Lk. 5:24; Jn. 5:36). To say that Luke had a definite theological interest is not to say that the history has been conformed to the theology. Rather, as D. Guthrie says, “Luke brings out the theological significance of history” (New Testament Introduction: The Gospels and Acts [1965], 88).

Luke exposed himself to attack in the matter of reliability as a historian by the fact that he, more than any other evangelist, followed historical models, related the narrated events to major details of the empire and of world affairs, and claimed to give special effort to providing a reliable account. The chief point of attack in the gospel is the enrollment by order of AUGUSTUS in the time of QUIRINIUS (Lk. 2:1-3). Critics have denied that Augustus ever issued a decree ordering a universal CENSUS, that such a decree would have affected King Herod’s Palestine, that Quirinius was governor when Jesus was born, that Jesus was born at the time of a census, and that a Roman census would have proceeded on a tribal basis.

Sir William M. Ramsay and others accepted the challenge. Particularly as a result of Ramsay’s Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? (1898), the reputation of Luke for accuracy is greatly improved. Though no contemporary sources have certified this enrollment, the probabilities now lie on the side of Luke’s account. Quirinius was twice the imperial legate in SYRIA. His first term seems to have been as military governor or legate at the same time that Varus was busy as governor over the internal affairs of Syria around 7-5 B.C. (ibid., 243ff.). It has been discovered that a general census was taken by the Romans every fourteen years. Luke distinguishes this “first” census from the well-known decree of A.D. 6 (Acts 5:37). This would imply a date of about 8 B.C. for the beginning of the first census. Where there was resistance, enrollment took a long time (e.g., forty years in Gaul; see E. Stauffer, Jesus and his Story [1960], 21-32). Perhaps HEROD followed the Jewish tribal custom to avoid resistance, even at the cost of two or three years' delay in the first census. E. F. Harrison suggests that the first census may have taken fourteen years, so that this first enrollment may have had its beginning date near the time of the birth of Christ and its end at the better known A.D. 6. To accomplish this task in so short a time may have been worthy of note (Introduction to the New Testament [1964], 194).

This rock inside the Church of All Nations (Jerusalem) is the traditional location of Jesus' struggle in prayer at the Garden of Gethsemane (Lk. 22:39-46).

In any case, the probabilities are against Luke's having been careless of a point so easily checked when he was affirming to a prominent leader his own care for accuracy, and was using historical detail to substantiate his central message. Ramsay well inquires how, if Luke made such a glaring error in the facts surrounding the birth of Christ, did these inaccuracies escape the attention of the enemies of the gospel in Roman times? The probabilities, historically, lie on the side of Luke's accuracy. It is even possible that the most striking result in a century of NT research is the relative vindication of the historical accuracy of the author of Luke-Acts and his present standing as the first real church historian.

The charge of contradiction between Luke's writing and that of Paul applies more to Acts than to the gospel. According to Acts, for example, Paul appears to have visited Jerusalem three times after his conversion (Acts 9:26; 11:30; 15:2). Galatians mentions only two occasions (Gal. 1:18; 2:1). The problem is created by the assumption that Paul is listing all of his visits to Jerusalem and not just those in which he had contact with the apostles. Or, if Galatians was written before the COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, as some think, there is no problem. Others point to Paul's circumcision of TIMOTHY (Acts 16:3) and his refusal to circumcise TITUS (Gal. 2:3), but Timothy was part Jewish and Titus was not. Luke tends to record Paul's concessions to Jewish practice and wishes, while Paul insists that he never sacrificed the principle of freedom in the gospel. Suffice it to say that no direct contradiction has been proved—only reflections of a different interest in the significance of the events.

The question of the origin of the recorded speeches is more often in relation to Acts than in the gospel. However, the words attributed in Lk. 1-2 to Mary, Elizabeth, Zechariah, Simeon, and Anna, as well as the discourses of Jesus himself, are notable exceptions. It is true that one option lying before the evangelist was to follow Thucydides and make the speakers speak in a way which seemed to be demanded by the occasion, though adhering as closely as possible to the general sense of what was actually said (History of the Peloponnesian War 1.22.1). That some Greeks used Thucydides' method without his conscientious care is admitted. Others were severely critical of speech invention and regarded the historian's task as recording what was actually said (R. M. Grant, A Historical Introduction to the New Testament [1963], 141).

There is no evidence that Luke departed from his careful historical method when he introduced speeches. Where it is possible to check (as between Mk. 13 and Lk. 21), the results are favorable to correct reporting. The intimate details concerning Mary, the prophetic utterances, and the hymns of praise are not invented to express Luke's reaction; they are set forth only because they illumine the significance of an event—the event about which the book is written—the coming of the Christ. Even the variations between the SERMON ON THE MOUNT (Matt. 5-7) and the Sermon on the Plain (Lk. 6:17-49) may indeed indicate only what they claim to present—two separate sermons of the Christ rather than the sermons of two evangelists. Is it not likely that Jesus, as other rabbis, repeated his principal teachings from time to time in different forms to suit a variety of occasions?

The fifth problem, that of the theological differences between the Acts and Paul, is related to the question of the authorship of Luke-Acts. It has been asserted that Luke's record of Paul's teaching differs so radically from Paul's own presentation that the author must not have been acquainted with Paul. In Acts there is no hint of the theological tension reflected in Galatians, where law is seen as leading into bondage from which Christ has freed sinners. Guthrie well says, however, that there is no ground for demanding that Luke must present Paul's theology in his historical book in precisely the same form as Paul presents it in his practical and didactic letters. Paul himself accommodated to circumstances. He circumcised Jewish Timothy but rejected circumcision as a means of salvation (Rom. 2:25). He agreed to concessions to Jewish culture patterns for the Gentiles who looked to Jerusalem for guidance (Acts 15:25-29), but later, in the distant mission fields, he demanded no such conformity (Rom. 14:2-3). It is really no harder to establish theological harmony between Luke and Paul than to demonstrate consistency in Pauline thought and action.

XII. Content. In a unique sense the third gospel depicts Jesus as the divine Redeemer who came to seek and to save those who were lost. The account begins before the annunciations to ZECHARIAH and to MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS, and ends with the ascension into heaven. Set in the context of full deity, the perfect humanity of Jesus is revealed in more detail than in any other gospel. Luke gives the fullest account of the birth, childhood, growth, and domestic and social life of Jesus, but emphasizes that he came as Savior and Redeemer. Christ is depicted not so much as the Messiah of the OT as the Redeemer of the whole world. Time and again the point is stressed that the kingdom is open to all races and conditions of people—Samaritans and pagans as well as Jews; poor as well as rich; outcasts, publicans, and sinners as well as respectable people; and to women as well as to men. It is the universal gospel of the Savior of all.

It is also the gospel of the HOLY SPIRIT. The Holy Spirit is the secret of Christ's own ministry (Lk. 4:18). The human spirit throbs with prayer, praise, joy, forgiveness, weeping, love, friendship, wisdom, understanding, glory, and authority. Notices of time and place are more frequent here than in the other Gospels. Biographical interest is more intense, but the uniting theme is Christ's saving purpose throughout.

Whatever may be said about sources or independence, Luke shares the "triple tradition" with Matthew and Mark and the "double tradition" with Matthew in the sense of using in his own way the general bodies of material to which they all had access and in which they were all interested. To these Luke adds significant materials peculiar to himself, arranging the whole "in order," sometimes chronologically and sometimes logically. The first two chapters, recording the birth of JOHN THE BAPTIST, the annunciation, the adoration of the shepherds, the circumcision of Jesus, his presentation in the temple, and the visit to Jerusalem at the age of twelve, are strongly Semitic in character. Ramsay makes a good case for Mary herself as the source of Luke's information (Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 73-91). The long section that extends from Lk. 9:51 to 18:14, as well as a shorter passage in 19:1-28, are also peculiar to Luke. Together they contain sixteen of the twenty-three parables in Luke and many of the most interesting events in the life of Christ. The so-called Perean ministry occupies a prominent part in this section. The book may be outlined briefly as follows:

1. Prologue (Lk. 1:1-4)
2. Nativity narratives (1:5—2:52)
3. Preparation for the ministry (3:1—4:13)
  1. Mission of John the Baptist (3:1-20)
  2. Baptism of Jesus (3:21-22)
  3. Genealogy of Jesus (3:23-38)
  4. Temptation of Jesus (4:1-13)
4. Galilean ministry (4:14—9:50)
  1. Early Galilean ministry (4:14—7:50)
  2. Later Galilean ministry (8:1—9:6)
  3. Journey northward (9:7-50)
5. Late Judean and Perean ministry (9:51—19:27)
  1. Way to Jerusalem (9:51—11:54)

2. Mighty words and works (12:1—19:27)
6. Passion and triumph (19:28—24:53)
  1. Closing ministry in Jerusalem (19:28—21:38)
  2. Betrayal, trial, and death (chs. 22-23)
  3. Resurrection and appearances (24:1-49)
  4. Ascension (24:50-53)

XIII. Theology. Luke is first of all a historian of the gospel events and only secondarily a theologian (cf. E. F. Scott in HTR 19 [1926]: 143-44). The gospel as he knows it is full of theological data and implications, but he reports it as he received it rather than as an inventor or theoretician (J. M. Creed, The Gospel According to St. Luke [1930], lxxi). It is important to treat the “theology” of Luke in the light of this basic informality and not to impose one’s own systems of theology upon it.

Luke may be called a Paulinist in the sense that he shares with great conviction Paul’s position as the great apologist for the Gentile mission. Everything points to the fact that the gospel is for all. Otherwise, little or nothing is said in the Gospel of Luke that bears directly on the Pauline controversies. Christ must indeed have suffered, which the prophetic Scriptures had foretold, but no further theology of the cross is elaborated to explain redemption. Luke does not mention the death of the Son of Man as “a ransom for many” (as Mk. 10:45) or refer to the cup as the “blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many” (14:24). He is content with the implicit force of the reported events and the portrait of the Redeemer.

The KINGDOM OF GOD holds its central place in the gospel as the “reign of God,” which also has its eschatological aspect with the sudden return of the Son of Man (Lk. 17:22-23 and 21:35-36). Jesus is the Christ, the Son of Man, the Redeemer, the Lord. The facts of his heavenly origin, his virgin birth, his divine person, his works, and the outcome of his passion speak for themselves. No elaborate CHRISTOLOGY need be added. He is Savior.

In the same informal way, Luke reveals an implicit “theology of the Spirit.” Christ ministered in the power of the Spirit (Lk. 4:18) and promised the same to his followers (24:49)—a promise that was noted as fulfilled in the beginning of Acts (Acts 2:4) and which became a dominant theme of that book.

lunatic. Meaning “insane,” this term derives from the Latin luna (“moon”), indicating a person under the influence of the moon. The common idea that an individual could be affected mentally by the moon is reflected also in the Greek verb selēniazomai G4944, “to be moon-struck” (from selēnē G4943, “moon”; thus KJV “lunatick” in Matt. 4:24 and 17:15). The insanity contemplated was thought to have recurring periods that corresponded to the lunar phases. The verb seems to be distinguished from daimo-nizomai G1227 (Matt. 4:24), and modern versions interpret it as a reference to epilepsy. However, the same symptoms described in Matt. 17:15 are attributed to spirits or demons elsewhere (cf. Mk. 9:17; Lk. 9:39). The word tended to be used inexactly, and while it included epilepsy it did not necessarily exclude demon-possession. See DEMON; DISEASE (under epilepsy); MADNESS.

R. K. HARRISON

lust. This term (as a noun or verb), referring to an intense desire, most often has a negative connotation, being used especially of unrestrained sexual craving (see SEX). English Bible translations use the term variously to render a number of words and expressions, in particular Greek epithymia G2123. This Greek noun (as well as the cognate verb epithymeō G2121) can refer to DESIRE in a neutral or even positive context (e.g., Lk. 22:15; Phil. 1:23; 1 Thess. 2:17), but in the NT it is so frequently joined with such terms as “evil” (e.g., Col. 3:5) that the word by itself takes on a negative nuance (“covetousness, sinful passion,” etc.). Another significant term is pathos G4079, which in extrabiblical Greek has a broad semantic range (“incident, experience, suffering, emotion”), but which is used in the NT only in negative contexts (Rom. 1:26; Col. 3:5; 1 Thess. 4:5; see PASSION). The consequences of evil lust are not only privation of good, but also enslavement, suffering, and death.

Iustration. Purification by means of a propitiatory sacrifice or certain ceremonies. The word is not found in the English Bible, but other terms referring to PURIFICATION are found in both Testaments often. Ceremonial cleansing was an important part of Israelite religious life, for people regarded as ceremonially unclean were kept from the altar in the sanctuary and were kept from fellowship with their coreligionists.

The law of Moses made clear distinctions between CLEAN and unclean. UNCLEANNES was primarily ceremonial defilement, not moral, and was contracted in several ways, some of them avoidable, some unavoidable, and provision was made for purification. A person was rendered ceremonially unclean in the following ways: (1) contact with a dead body, especially a human corpse (Num. 19:11-22); (2) leprosy (Lev. 13:14); (3) seminal emissions and childbirth (Lev. 12; 15); (4) eating the flesh of an unclean fish, bird, and animal (Lev. 11; Deut. 14:3-21); (5) physical defects or impairments (Lev. 21:16-24).

Israelites who had contracted uncleanness were required to separate themselves from the congregation, the length of time depending upon the nature of the uncleanness (Lev. 12; 15:11-13). Usually this was seven days; in the case of the birth of a male child it was forty days, and of a female child, eighty days. The mode of purification was bathing the body and washing the clothes in water (15:8, 10-11), but for the more serious forms of uncleanness sacrifice was necessary (12:6; 15:29-30). People rendered unclean by leprosy (Lev. 14) or by touching a corpse (Num. 19) were sprinkled with water mingled with blood or ashes. The penalty of refusing to be purified was execution (19:20).

In the NT there are references to ceremonial purification in connection with childbirth (Lk. 2:22), leprosy (17:11-19), and the Passover (Jn. 11:55; 18:28). In contrast with the PHARISEES, Jesus emphasized moral rather than ceremonial purity (Mk. 7:1-23). Although PAUL made clear that Christ repealed all the Levitical regulations on unclean meats and practices (Rom. 14:14, 20; 1 Cor. 6:13; Col. 2:16, 20-22), he himself, in order that his message might more readily be received, underwent the rite of purification (Acts 18:18).

Luz luhz (לֹז H4281, “almond tree”). (1) The earlier Canaanite name of the city better known as BETHEL (Gen. 28:19; 35:6). It was changed to the latter (meaning “house of God”) by JACOB after the Lord appeared to him in a dream during his flight from home, and it became a holy place in the later history of Israel. According to the citations in Genesis, Luz is indistinguishable from Bethel, but JOSHUA, in delineating the S boundary of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH, speaks of it as going out “from Bethel to Luz” (Josh. 16:2), apparently regarding the two as distinct locations. It is possible that this reflects a distinction between the city and the nearby holy place. More probably, however, the reference is not to the city of Bethel but to a mountain range closely associated with the city which is mentioned as the previous boundary point (v. 1) and from which the line went out to Luz (the city of Bethel). In Josh. 18:13, which records the delineation of the boundary of the territory of BENJAMIN, Bethel and Luz are regarded as identical. The city continued to be known as Luz to the Canaanite inhabitants until the time of the judges (Jdg. 1:23).

(2) A town built in the land of the Hittites by a former inhabitant of Luz #1, apparently named after the Canaanite city (Jdg. 1:26). The expression “land of the Hittites” probably refers to SYRIA, but the term HITTITE is ambiguous, and some think that the phrase may designate the hill country W of Bethel (cf. Num. 13:29). The location of this town is unknown.

LXX. Abbreviation for SEPTUAGINT.

Lycaonia lik’uh-oh’nee-uh (Λυκαονία G3377; cf. Λυκαονιστί G3378, “in Lycaonian [language]”) A region in south central ASIA MINOR. Although its borders are not well defined, Lycaonia had GALATIA to the N, CAPPADOCIA to the E, CILICIA to the S, and PISIDIA to the W. It consisted for the most part of a high, treeless plateau, the land being fertile enough and productive where there was water, but good mainly for raising sheep and goats (Xenophon, Anabasis 4.2.23). The people who inhabited the region have been described as warlike and energetic. They emerge in about the 6th cent. B.C., already speaking a language of their own, and during the long rule of PERSIA in Asia Minor maintained themselves free from Persian domination. After the fall of PERSIA and the death of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, the region fell under control of the SELEUCIDS and so remained until 190 B.C., when the Romans handed Lycaonia over to PERGAMUM. When King ATTALUS died in 133 B.C. and the Pergamene kingdom was dissolved, the region was administered by the Romans as part of their settlement in Asia, and from 25 B.C. onward became part of Galatia or Galatia-Cappadocia.

The leading cities of Lycaonia were LYSTRA and DERBE. ICONIUM was evidently a Phrygian city

(see PHRYGIA), for when the Jews stirred up trouble for PAUL and BARNABAS there, they fled to the Lycaonian cities for safety (Acts 14:5-6). As everywhere else in the Seleucid realm, the process of hellenization went on (see HELLENISM), but slowly in Lycaonia, for the people are described as being backward. The GREEK LANGUAGE was no doubt understood in the cities, but the people still retained their own speech, which they used in response to the miracle Paul worked upon the cripple in Lystra (14:11). They then proceeded to get ready to sacrifice to Paul and Barnabas as though they were gods, an act from which Paul barely restrained them. This whole incident indicates the strong hold of pagan religion upon the populace of the region.

The book of Acts speaks of aggressive groups of Jews both in ANTIOCH OF PISIDIA and in Iconium (Acts 13-14), but says little about any such groups in Lystra and Derbe. In fact, it was Jews from Antioch and Iconium who came and stirred up the people at Lystra against Paul and Barnabas (14:19-20). There must have been some Jews living in the Lycaonian cities, for TIMOTHY came from Lystra, and his mother was Jewish. Indeed, Paul decided to circumcise Timothy because of the Jewish element in the place (16:1-3).

In all, Paul made three visits to Lycaonia. The first was on his first missionary journey, accompanied by Barnabas, and they preached there with some success (Acts 14:21-22). On his second journey, Paul returned to the region with SILAS, found Timothy at Lystra and added him to the company, and ministered to the Christians in the cities there (16:1-5). When he set out from ANTIOCH OF SYRIA on his third journey, he again went through the region, encouraging and strengthening the churches (18:23). (See A. H. M. Jones, Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces, 2nd ed. [1971], ch. 5.)

Lycia lish'uh (Λυκία G3379). A mountainous country in SW ASIA MINOR. This territory of about 3,500 sq. mi. protrudes southward into the Mediterranean Sea bounded on the NW by CARIA, on the N by PHRYGIA and PISIDIA, and on the NE by PAMPHYLIA. Lycia was shut in by rugged mountain ranges, and since the land jutted out into the sea, it would not have any important trade routes. Its climate rapidly fluctuated between the extremes of temperature. Its mountainous slopes afforded much excellent timber for the building of houses and ships, and were also suitable for grazing and for vineyards and olive farms. The valleys provided space for the cultivated grains.

Its main contact to the outside world was through its seaports, the main two being PATARA and MYRA. On the return of the third missionary journey, PAUL's ship stopped at Patara (Acts 21:1; some MSS also include another stop at Myra) and then sailed to PHOENICIA. On his journey to ROME, Paul's ship went along the coast of CILICIA and Pamphylia, and at Myra he and the other prisoners were put on another ship that had come from ALEXANDRIA and was sailing for Italy. Due to prevailing W winds, it was common for Alexandrian grain ships to travel N along the Syrian coast and then move slowly E along the coasts of Cilicia and Pamphylia. Myra was a natural place for the grain ships (cf. Acts 27:38) to harbor and to be serviced before their journey to Italy; and hence it would not be unusual for the centurion to find one here for Paul and the other prisoners.

The traditions on the origin of the Lycian population would seem to point to an immigration from CRETE. In the 6th cent. they were the only people of W Asia Minor not subject to Croesus. However, they were not strong enough to withstand the Persian invasion in 546 B.C., though they did retain their national unity under the Persians. Although they were temporarily in the Delian confederacy in 446, it was not until the arrival of ALEXANDER THE GREAT in Lycia in the winter of 334/33 that the country finally came under the Greek influence. Upon the death of Alexander, Lycia became a part of Antigonus's domain, but it was invaded in 309 by Antigonus's enemy, PTOLEMY I of Egypt.

Egyptian control over Lycia continued until it was conquered by ANTIOCHUS III in 197 B.C. Antiochus was defeated by the Romans in the battle of Magnesia, and so in 189 the Romans placed Lycia under RHODES. The Lycians bitterly resisted the Rhodian rule, and after several complaints to Rome, the senate finally granted freedom to Lycia in 167 (cf. Appian, The Syrian Wars 44). This freedom was not revoked until A.D. 43 by CLAUDIUS when he established the province of Lycia-Pamphylia under a praetorian legate (Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 60.17.3; Suetonius, Claudius 25.3). In A.D. 69 VESPASIAN detached Pamphylia from Lycia and combined Pamphylia with the Galatian province, at which time Lycia probably became a free country.

The existing Jewish community in many of the cities of Lycia is evident from a letter sent by the Romans c. 139 B.C. to the confederate cities that they should not harm the Jews (1 Macc. 15:23). Evidence for Christianity in the first two centuries is lacking.

Lydda lid'uh (Λύδδα G3375). A town about 11 mi. SE of JOPPA where the apostle PETER healed a paralytic named AENEAS (Acts 9:32-35, 38). See LOD.

Lydia (person) lid'ee-uh (Λυδία G3376). A business woman from THYATIRA; she lived in PHILIPPI and was PAUL's first convert there (Acts 16:12-15, 40). Her name, while common for women (cf. Horace, Odes 1.8.1; 3.9.7ff.), may be an adjectival form, "the Lydian [woman]," as indicating her origin, since Thyatira was in the region of Lydia. See LYDIA (PLACE). She is identified as "a dealer in purple cloth." Like all of Lydia, Thyatira was noted for its dyeing industry and production of purple dyed garments, which were highly prized and costly. She doubtless was the agent in Philippi of a local firm in her native city. Her trade implies that she was a woman of some means. If a widow, she may have been carrying on the business of her deceased husband.

Lydia is further described as "a worshiper of God," the usual designation for a Jewish PROSELYTE. She probably had accepted the Jewish faith in her native city, for it had a strong Jewish colony. At Philippi she faithfully participated in the SABBATH services at the place of prayer by the riverside. After listening to Paul's message there she was converted. After Lydia and her household (presumably her servants and their dependents) were baptized, she urged Paul and his coworkers to make her home their headquarters. That all this occurred on the first Sabbath need not be assumed. Her home apparently became the meeting place of the local church (Acts 16:40). Lydia's own hospitality doubtless did much to foster the unique financial relations between Paul and the Philippian church (Phil. 4:15-16).

Lydia is not mentioned in the Philippian letter. The omission has been accounted for in several ways: that she had left Philippi; that she had died; that Lydia was not her personal name, but she was one of the two women mentioned in Phil. 4:2. The suggestion that she was the “loyal yokefellow” of 4:3, or even Paul’s wife, is sheer fancy. (See W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller [1909], 214-15; B. Witherington III, Women in the Earliest Churches [1988], 147-49.)

D. E. HIEBERT

Lydia (place) lid’ee-uh (Λυδία). A large territory in NW ASIA MINOR.

I. Geography. Lydia’s borders are difficult to define accurately. It was bounded on the N by MYSIA, on the S by CARIA, on the E by PHRYGIA, and on the W by the AEGEAN SEA. The S boundary may have gone as far as the Maeander River (Strabo, Geogr. 12.8.15). The E boundary is confusing, for there is a dispute whether Catacecaumene, an inland volcanic area on the upper Hermus River, was a part of Lydia or Mysia (ibid., 13.4.11) and because some of the territories were claimed by both of these regions (ibid., 12.8.3; 13.4.12). It is a land mostly of fertile river valleys with the Hermus River in the N and the Cayster valley, which is between the Tmolus and Messogis mountain ranges, in the S part of Lydia. SARDIS served as Lydia’s capital.

II. History. The earliest reference to Lydia is in Gen. 10:22 (cf. also 1 Chr. 1:17), where it refers to LUD as a son of SHEM; expounding on that passage, Lydia.

The artificial mound in this picture contains Lydian tombs dating to the 4th cent. B.C.

JOSEPHUS refers to the Lydians as Lud's descendants (Ant. 1.6.4. §144). HERODOTUS (Hist. 1.7) does not preclude a Semitic origin of the Lydians. In Isa. 66:19 Lud is listed with TUBAL (in Asia Minor), GREECE, and "the distant islands" (or "coastlands"), a context that would fit with the location of Lydia. In Ezek. 27:10 and 30:5 Lud is listed as an ally with TYRE and with EGYPT respectively. Lydia is mentioned also in the Neo-Babylonian annals.

The age of prosperity and strength for Lydia came with the Mermnad dynasty founded by Gyges (c. 685-657/52 B.C.), who murdered King Canduales and married his widow (Herodotus, Hist. 1.8-12). Gyges gradually subdued the coastal cities of Miletus, Smyrna, and Colophon and sent offerings to Delphi (ibid., 1.14-15). Gyges made a pact with ASHURBANIPAL (669-633) of ASSYRIA against the CIMMERIANS. Gyges defeated the Cimmerians and broke his alliance with Ashurbanipal and in fact made an alliance with Psammeti-chus I (c. 663-609) to help liberate the Egyptians from the Assyrian control. The Cimmerians made another attack on Lydia resulting in Gyges's death. It was not until Alyattes (c. 610-560), the fourth in the Mermnad dynasty, that the Cimmerians were finally driven out (ibid., 1.16). Alyattes made war against Cyaxares the Mede and finally established peace in 585, whereby the Halys River served as a border between Lydia and Media. Hence, Lydia had extended its borders. In the peace agreement, Alyattes's daughter Arvenis and Cyaxares's son Astyages were married, and from them a daughter was born named Mandane, who became the mother of CYRUS the Great (ibid., 1.74).

The best known and last king of Lydia was Croesus (c. 560-546 B.C.), son of Alyattes. He was friendly to the Greeks and encouraged hellenization (see HELLENISM), as seen by his contributions to Greek shrines, especially Delphi, and in the rebuilding of the temple of ARTEMIS in EPHEBUS. However, with the rise of the Persian power, Croesus thought he could expand his borders and invaded Persian territories. It was a bad move, for Cyrus then attacked Lydia, captured Sardis, and overthrew Croesus in 546 (ibid., 1.75-86). Lydia lost its political independence and was a satrapy of Persia until the invasion of Asia Minor by ALEXANDER THE GREAT in 334. After Alexander's death, Lydia was under Antigonos for a while and then under the SELEUCIDS. When ANTIOCHUS II was defeated at Magnesia in 190, the Romans presented it to their ally EUMENES II, king of PERGAMUM (Appian, The Syrian Wars 38, 44; Polybius, Hist. 21.45; Livy, Hist. 28.39; 1 Macc. 8:8). In 133 B.C., Attalus III, son of Eumenes II, bequeathed Pergamum to Rome. Therefore, Lydia formed a part of the Roman province of ASIA and remained so until it became a separate entity in Diocletian's reign (c. A.D. 316).

III. Inhabitants. The origins of the Lydian people are obscure, but as already noted there seems to have been an early Semitic influence. During Antiochus III's reign (223-187 B.C.), many Jews were settled in Lydia (Jos. Ant. 12.3.4 §§147-49). The Anatolian influence was quite strong early, with more Greek influence from the reign of Croesus reign onward. There was a constant tension between Greek and Anatolian influences. Inscriptions from the 4th cent. seem to indicate that the Lydian language was an idiom of the Indo-European family, but by the beginning of the Christian era Greek was the common language (Strabo, Geogr. 13.4.9, speaks of an ancient writing; see also LANGUAGES OF THE ANE IV).

IV. Industry. Lydia was rich in natural resources. It is told that during Croesus's reign gold was washed down the Pactolus River, and Strabo mentions the existence of gold mines that were exhausted in his day (Geogr. 14.5.28). Lydia was known for its rich fertile land, producing olives, figs, grapes, and grain. Its best known industry was the manufacture of textile fabrics; along with this THYATIRA was well known for its dyeing processes (cf. Homer, Iliad 4.141), and its guild of dyers was known to be prosperous. One of those in the industry was the Thyatiran woman who was converted to Christianity at PHILIPPI by Paul (Acts 16:14). See LYDIA (PERSON). One significant achievement of the Lydians was their invention of coinage (Herodotus, Hist. 1.94). The first Lydian coinage had alloys mixed with gold, and the gold content varied between 36 and 53 percent. Such significant variance shook the public confidence in coinage, and so this may be the reason for Croesus' introducing coinage of pure gold and pure silver. The new invention was accepted by the Greek cities of the coast and then by the whole world.

V. Importance in the NT. As noted above, Lydia the seller of purple was Paul's convert in Europe at Philippi (Acts 16). Also in Lydia is Ephesus, the place where Paul spent nearly three years (ch. 19). Moreover, out of seven churches addressed by John in Rev. 2-3, five of them were in Lydia (see EPHESUS, SMYRNA, THYATIRA, SARDIS, PHILADELPHIA). However, the NT writers never address the above churches as being in Lydia, but rather in Asia, in accordance with the Roman provincial classification.

lye. KJV, "nitre." An alkaline substance used for cleansing purposes; it refers either to sodium carbonate, found in certain places as an incrustation on the ground or in certain saline lakes, or to potassium carbonate, which was obtained by leaching wood ashes or other vegetable matter. Both possess excellent detergent qualities. The term is used by the NRSV to render Hebrew neter H6003

(Jer. 2:22 [NIV, “soda”]; the Hebrew term occurs also in Prov. 25:20) and bōr H1342 (Job. 9:30 [NIV, “soap”]; Isa. 1:25 [NIV differently]). See SOAP.

Lysanias li-say’nee-uhs (Λυσανίας G3384). The TETRARCH of ABILENE at the beginning of JOHN THE BAPTIST’s ministry (Lk. 3:1), probably in A.D. 26. JOSEPHUS referred to a Lysanias who in 40 B.C. succeeded his father Ptolemy to the throne of Chalcis; he was put to death by Mark Antony in 36 B.C. at the instigation of CLEOPATRA, upon whom the dominion was bestowed (Ant. 14.13.3; 15.4.1). Josephus also recorded that among the regions assigned to Agrippa I (see HEROD VII) was the “tetrarchy of Lysanias” (18.6.10; 19.5.1). Some scholars hold that there was no one named Lysanias who later ruled in those parts and that Luke therefore was guilty of a gross chronological blunder in naming Lysanias as a ruler in A.D. 26. Such an inference seems very improbable in view of Luke’s established general accuracy.

It seems a necessary assumption that Josephus referred to two different men named Lysanias. One of them, the son of Ptolemy, bore the title of king, given him by Antony (Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 49.32); but Josephus, in agreement with Luke, also mentioned a tetrarch. Their territory was not the same. The first, with his capital at Chalcis, ruled over a considerable area that included Abila, but was not called Abilene. CLAUDIUS bestowed upon Agrippa II “the tetrarchy of Lysanias” but took from him Chalcis (Jos. Ant. 20.7.1; War 2.12.8); Josephus thus expressly distinguished Chalcis from the tetrarchy of Lysanias.

An inscription discovered at Abila established that there was a later “Lysanias the tetrarch” (CIG, 4521). The inscription related to the dedication of a temple contains the words, “on behalf of the salvation of the Lords Imperial and their whole household” by “Nymphaies, a freedman of Lysanias, the tetrarch.” The mention of “the Lords Imperial” may refer to the joint rule of AUGUSTUS and TIBERIUS (A. R. C. Leaney, A Commentary on the Gospel according to St. Luke [1958], 48-50), placing the inscription as late as A.D. 11; more probably, the reference is to Tiberius and his mother Julia (W. M. Ramsay, The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the New Testament [1915], 297-300), thus giving a time between A.D. 14 and 29. Clearly this establishes a tetrarch Lysanias at the very time that Luke mentions. Why Luke should mention the tetrarch Lysanias while omitting the ruler of DAMASCUS is not clear. For further details, see ABILENE.

Lysias lis’ee-uhs (Λυσίας G3385). (1) A prominent Syrian general and official who served under ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes and Antiochus V Eupator. He is given considerable attention in 1 and 2 MACCABEES and in JOSEPHUS (e.g., 1 Macc. 3:32-38; 6:17; 7:1-4; 2 Macc. 10-11; Jos. Ant. 12 §§295-98, 313-15, 361, 367). (2) See CLAUDIUS LYSIAS.

Lysimachus li-sim’uh-kuhs (Λυσίμαχος). (1) One of the Diadochi (Successors) of ALEXANDER THE GREAT. He was granted the province of THRACIA in 323 B.C. After SELEUCUS I defeated Antigonus in 302, Lysimachus received the northern parts of ASIA MINOR, which made him extraordinarily wealthy. Some years later he invaded and occupied MACEDONIA. He lost his life in battle in 281.

(2) Son of a certain Ptolemy, mentioned at the end of the Greek text of ESTHER (Add. Esth. 11:1). According to this passage, in the fourth year of the reign of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, Dositheus, who said that he was a priest and a Levite, and Ptolemy his son brought the letter about Purim (to Egypt), which they said had been translated by Lysimachus, son of Ptolemy of Jerusalem (see H. B. Swete, An Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek [1902], 25, 258; R. H. Pfeiffer, History of New Testament Times [1949], 310-11).

(3) Brother of MENELAUS, high priest in the days of ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes, who served in Menelaus's stead in the priesthood for a time (2 Macc. 4:29; 39-41). He is said to have committed many sacrileges with the consent of Menelaus, so that the people were aroused against him. When the multitude rose against him, and were filled with rage, Lysimachus armed about 3,000 men and began first to offer violence. The people retaliated, defeated the forces of Lysimachus, and killed him beside the treasury.

Lystra lis'truh (Λύστρα G3388, construed both as fem. sg. and neut. pl.). A town in the central region of S ASIA MINOR (Acts 14:6, 8, 21; 16:1-2; 2 Tim. 3:11). Lystra is an ancient village of the district of LYCAONIA that was c. 24 mi. S of ICONIUM (in PHRYGIA). Lystra was built upon a small hill suddenly rising c. 100-150 ft. above the surrounding plain located on the E of the mountain ranges that form the Pisidian triangle (see PISIDIA). It was not located on any significant road or trade route; in fact, it was located c. 8-10 mi. from the great trade route. It is probable that the territory of Lystra was bounded in the N by Iconium, in the W by the mountains, and in the S by Isauria Vetus. The borders of the territory of Lycaonia are difficult to determine, especially in the E, because of the absence of towns in the area. It is thought that the territory of Lycaonia was not any larger than 100 sq. mi. The plain surrounding Lystra was fertile, with two small rivers passing by the village's mound.

The history of Lystra is quite unknown. Lycaonia was under Persian control and later under Greek control (first under the SELEUCIDS [c. 280-189 B.C.] and second under the Attalids [c. 189-133 B.C.; see ATTALUS]), and finally under the Romans. In 36 B.C. Lycaonia was given to Amyntas, king of Pisidia, who was then made king of GALATIA. When in 25 B.C. Amyntas was killed in a campaign against the Homonadeis, the greater part of his kingdom, which included Lystra, was taken over by the Romans and made the province of Galatia. In 6 B.C. the Homanadenses were subdued, and AUGUSTUS planted five more military colonies around Homonadeis, one of which was Lystra.

Some scholars have been puzzled to know the reason why Rome made such an insignificant town as Lystra a Roman colony; a possible explanation is that it was located on the eastern side of the mountains and thus could be made a strong fortress in order to keep in check the mountain tribes S and W of it. Since it was the most eastern of the fortified cities, it would help in the pacification of Pisidia and Isauria as well as serve as a base for another attack from the E. Both Lystra and DERBE were under the direct control of Rome until c. A.D. 37/38, when it was put under the control of the client king Antiochus IV of Commagene. In A.D. 72 Antoninus Pius returned these two cities to the Roman provincial rule of CILICIA.

In becoming a Roman colony, Lystra sent (in the 2nd cent.) a statute of concord to its sister colony of ANTIOCH OF PISIDIA. When Lystra had become a colony, she acquired some Roman settlers, most of whom were veterans. Also, under the Roman influence roads were built during Augustus's rule; one of them went from Iconium through Lystra and then on to Derbe and Laranda and finally into Cilicia.

Regarding Lystra's inhabitants, the Roman element was a small group of the local aristocracy of soldiers; they were the ruling class. There were also the Greek-educated residents, called the Hellenes, who were not a racial group but an educated and generally well-to-do segment of the population. TIMOTHY, whose father was a Hellene and his mother a Jew (Acts 16:1), probably belonged to the educated and upper income bracket. Finally, the majority of the population was made up of the uneducated Lycaonians, who were a small Anatolian tribe. The Roman aristocracy spoke Latin, the educated were able to speak Greek, and the Lycaonians used their own vernacular (14:11), which continued to be spoken until the 6th cent. A.D.

On the first missionary journey, PAUL and BARNABAS arrived at Lystra (c. A.D. 49), having fled the hostility of the Jews at Iconium (Acts 14:6). Upon arrival at Lystra, Paul healed a man who had been lame from birth and the crowd concluded that the apostles were the gods HERMES and ZEUS (vv. 6-18). On an earlier occasion, the same two gods, as the local legend relates, had come to that region to visit an aged and pious couple, Philemon and Bucis (Ovid, Metamorphoses 8.626-724). Afterward the Jews from Antioch of Pisidia and Iconium came and influenced the people against Paul and consequently stoned Paul dragging him out of the city as dead. Probably it was this visit of Paul during which Timothy was converted and undoubtedly helped to establish the infant church at Lystra (2 Tim. 3:10-11). Paul and Barnabas went on to Derbe but later on their return visited Lystra (Acts 14:19-23). On his second missionary journey Paul traveled through SYRIA and CILICIA (c. A.D. 50) and revisited the churches and Derbe and Lystra (Acts 15:41—16:2). A visit to Lystra on the third journey (c. A.D. 53) is implied in Acts 18:23.
