T. Benj.     Testament of Benjamin (etc.)
T. 12 Patr. Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs
Zad. Frag. Zadokite Fragments

Other Christian, Jewish, and Greco-Roman texts are referred to by their standard abbreviations. See, e.g.,

The SBL Handbook of Style (1999), ch. 8, appendix F, and appendix H.

Woman harvesting wheat near Bethehem.

H. An abbreviation used to designate the Holiness Code (the legal corpus found in Lev. 17-26). See LEVITICUS, BOOK OF I; PENTATEUCH III.

Haahashtari hay'uh-hash'tuh-ri (הַחַשְׁתָּרִי H2028, a gentilic form meaning “the Ahashtarite[s]”). Son of Ashhur by Naarah and a descendant of JUDAH, although the precise genealogical connection is unclear (1 Chr. 4:6). The term is probably a family name reflecting descent from an otherwise unknown person presumably named Ahashtar.

Habaiah huh-bay'yuh. See HOBAlAH.

Habakkuk, Book of huh-bak'uhk (חִבְקִיק H2487, possibly the name of a garden plant, or derived from חִבַּק H2485, “to clasp, embrace”). The eighth book of the Minor Prophets. The name Habakkuk was interpreted by JEROME, in his prologue to the book, to mean “wrestler” (quia certamen ingreditur cum Deo, “because he wrestled with God”). Luther favored this derivation, which has been adopted by some later commentators. “It is certainly not unfitting, for in this little book we see a man, in deadly earnest, wrestling with the mighty problem of theodicy—the divine justice—in a topsy-turvy world” (L. E. H. Stephens-Hodge). More recent scholars relate this name to the Akkadian word for a plant, ḥambaqūqu, but the derivation remains uncertain.

Several legends attached themselves to the prophet Habakkuk. According to a Jewish tradition, he was the son of the Shunammite woman (see SHUNEM), who was told by ELISHA, “At this season, in due time, you shall embrace [ḥōbeget] a son” (2 Ki. 4:16 NRSV); but this identification is excluded on account of the difference in time (Elisha ministered more than a century before Habakkuk). According to a second tradition, Habakkuk must be identified with the watchman referred to in Isa. 21:6; the correspondence of this passage with Hab. 2:1 is, however, superficial, and does not fit the same age and situation. In BEL AND THE DRAGON, an apocryphal addition to the book of DANIEL, it is told that the prophet Habakkuk had to bring food to Daniel in the lions’ den (Bel 30-42 [LXX Dan. 14:30-42]). This interesting story, engraved on a fresco in the CATACOMBS in Rome, is also a fiction. Daniel’s experience in the lions’ den was about seventy years after the time of Habakkuk’s activities.

We know nothing about Habakkuk apart from his name and the fact that he was called “the prophet” (Hab. 1:1; 3:1). This does not justify the charge raised by some scholars that he was an ecstatic. See PROPHETS AND PROPHECY. From Hab. 3:19b, some have deduced that the prophet “evidently was a member of the Temple choir, hence a Levite” (T. Laetsch, The Minor Prophets [1956], 313). The fact is, however, that the musical allusions in ch. 3 form a minor and superficial part of the prophecy, and could easily have been added to adapt this chapter for liturgical purposes (J. Ridderbos). Although nothing definitive is known of the prophet, he speaks forth in his books in such a way that one could recognize in him a man dedicated to his task to bear the sins and anxieties of his people, and to wrestle with God in prayer and through faith. The testimony of PAUL is applicable to him: “I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith” (2 Tim. 4:7).

I. Unity. A consistency of theme runs throughout the book, and accordingly most traditional scholars maintain that the prophecy must be conceived of as a whole. This does not exclude the possibility that separate passages were written down on different occasions (Van Katwyk, Aalders). According to critical scholars, the book is of composite authorship. They contend that Hab. 1:5—11, the raising up of the Chaldeans (Babylonians) to devastate the land, more or less interrupts the sequence of thought between the lamentations in 1:2-4 and 1:12-17. Some scholars (Wellhausen, Giesebrecht) delete these verses; others (Budde, Rothstein) put them after 2:4; while H. Schmidt (ZAW 62 [1949-50]: 52-63) suggests that 1:2-4, 12-13a, and 3:17-19 are lamentations of an individual that were added later to the scroll of Habakkuk. Conservative scholars recognize the difficulty in connection with 1:5-11, but contend that the problem can be solved by interpreting it as referring to an actual historical event (Young), or even by allowing a lapse of time between the announcement of the coming of the Babylonians and their threatening of Judah shortly after CARCHEMISH in 605 B.C. (Van Katwyk, Aalders).

Another disputed passage is Hab. 3. This psalm is certainly somewhat different in style from the rest of the book, but this is hardly sufficient reason to deny Habakkuk’s authorship. Because of the superscription, the postscript, and the word Selah in vv. 3, 9, 13, the opinion was long current that this psalm passed from some liturgical collection of hymns into the book of Habakkuk. According to Robert Pfeiffer, the musical terms denote a late origin for this chapter, presumably in the 4th or 3rd cent. B.C. Gleason Archer rightly observes that such an argument assumes the validity of the supposition that the musical terms in the Davidic psalms are late, and that despite Amos 6:5 and similar references, King DAVID had nothing to do with music or song since he was a man of war. This inference, of course, is unacceptable “for those who take seriously the Biblical tradition that David was very much concerned with the writing and singing of psalms”; it follows that such musical terms constitute no evidence of late authorship (A Survey of Old Testament Introduction, 3rd ed. [1994], 396).

Some critical scholars reverse the argument and assume that the hymn in Hab. 3, on account of its general character, was borrowed from the book of Habakkuk for the liturgy (Duhm, Cannon, Sellin, Mowinckel). The fact that this chapter is introduced and concluded with musical terms is no reason for denying it to Habakkuk (Young, Aalders, Archer). The theme of ch. 3 is the same as that of the preceding chapters and there are also important similarities in language (cf. Young). In addition, the passage is ascribed specifically to “Habakkuk the prophet” (3:1). The absence of the third chapter in the Habakkuk Commentary found among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (1QpHab) is not an argument against the unity of the book, since the Qumran commentaries in general present no continued development of thought (cf. Millar Burrows, The Dead Sea Scrolls [1955], 321-22). W. F. Albright’s contention (in Studies in Old Testament Prophecy, ed. H. H. Rowley [1950], 1-18) that “The Psalm of Habakkuk,” although forming a substantial unit with the rest of the book, contains reminiscences of the myth of the conflict between Yahweh and the primordial DRAGON (Sea or River), is interesting, but presupposes “some thirty-eight corrections of the Masoretic text,” and is, therefore, hardly convincing.

II. Date. There is considerable division of opinion with regard to the date of the book of Habakkuk. The only clear historical reference is found in Hab. 1:6: “I am raising up the Babylonians.” The neo-Babylonian or Chaldean empire came to prominence during the reign of NABOPOLASSAR (625-605 B.C.), and more so later when his son NEBUCHADNEZZAR (605-562) defeated the Egyptians at the battle of Carchemish in 605, and reestablished BABYLON as the seat of world power. The raising up of the Babylonians is described in v. 5 as a marvelous work of the Lord, so wholly unexpected as to seem unbelievable to the people in their day. According to some scholars, this fact effectually disposes of the possibility of dating Habakkuk’s activity as beginning in JEHOIAKIM’S rule, when the Babylonians already had gained the world supremacy by destroying NINEVEH in 612 (Laetsch, Eissfeldt, Gemser). They, accordingly, prefer a date either during the last years of MANASSEH’S reign (689-641), or preferably in the early years of JOSIAH (639-609).

The majority of scholars, however, maintain that Hab. 1:6 has reference to the Babylonians as an actual threat to Judah, and since such a threat seemed first to materialize at the battle of

The bricks used in the buildings of Nebuchadnezzar II (605-562 B.C.) usually have inscriptions with the king's names and titles. Habakkuk's prophecy that God would carry out his judgment through the Babylonians (Hab. 1:6-13) may be a reference to Nebuchadnezzar's campaign against Judah.

Carchemish, Habakkuk's activity must have been during the reign of Jehoiakim (Young, Archer, Ridderbos). Albright (in Studies, ed. Rowley, 2) ranges himself emphatically with this point of view, "seeing no valid reason why the book should not be treated as a substantial unit and dated between 605 and 589 B.C., i.e., between Nebuchadnezzar's decisive victory over Necho at Carchemish and the beginning of the last invasion of Judah before the end of the First Temple." This point of view is substantiated by 1:2-4, where the national depravity of the people of God is being denounced. This implies a time after the death of Josiah (609), and corresponds with the description given in Jer. 22 of the reign of Jehoiakim (608-597).

By changing the name "Babylonians" (Heb. kaš-dîm H4169, "Chaldeans") in Hab. 1:6 to read "Kittim" (kittiyyîm H4183, "Cypriots," i.e., "Greeks"), some scholars bring the date of the prophecy down to the time of Macedonian conquest, c. 330 B.C. (Duhm, Torrey, Procksch). According to Paul Haupt (John Hopkins University Circular [1920], 680ff.), the book must be dated in 161 B.C., just after the victory of Judas MACCABEE over NICANOR. This emendation, however, has no textual support.

III. Canonicity and text. The canonicity of the book of Habakkuk was never seriously questioned; it always has retained the eighth place among the twelve so-called Minor Prophets. According to Albright, "the text is in better state of preservation than often supposed, though its archaic obscurity made it somewhat enigmatic even to the earliest translators" (in Studies, ed. Rowley, 2). He, however, proposes some thirty-eight corrections of the MT of Hab. 3 (ibid., 10). Although some words or phrases are not easy to translate (1:3, 9; 2:5, 7, 10, 15, 19; 3:9, 11, 13, 14, 16), there is hardly any reason for altering the Hebrew text, as it is done in the RSV (1:9; 2:4, 15, 16, 17; 3:13, 14). Apart from a number of orthographical variations, the Habakkuk Commentary from Qumran has substantially the same text as that of the first two chapters of our book.

IV. Background. Habakkuk prayed and prophesied in times of crisis. Shortly before he began his ministry, the international scene was shocked by events of far-reaching import: the Assyrian empire was crushed, never to regain its power; the Egyptians, after slaying Josiah, king of Judah (609 B.C.), were themselves utterly defeated (605). The new world power, concentrated in Babylon and executed by the vigorous Nebuchadnezzar, was stretching itself across the breadth of the earth to seize habitations not their own. Within a period of approximately twenty years, the Babylonians swept over Judah in successive waves, and ultimately destroyed the country and took its inhabitants away into captivity in the years 597 and 587.

Internally, the people of God were caught up in the crises of religious and moral bewilderment. The pious King Josiah was succeeded by Jehoiakim, who “did evil in the eyes of the LORD, just as his fathers had done” (2 Ki. 23:37). The situation of depravity is described in Hab. 1:2-4 (cf. Jer. 22). The last two kings of Judah, JEHOIACHIN (597) and ZEDEKIAH (597-587), maintained the status quo, and ultimately were taken captive by the Chaldeans. In these times of national and international crisis, Habakkuk “contended with God” (Walter Lüthi).

V. Content. The book may be subdivided into six sections.

Hab. 1:1—4. The prophet cries to God because of the violence, inequity, strife, contention, and injustice he sees around him, and asks how long God would suffer it to go on unpunished. Some critics refer this passage to a heathen oppressor: the Babylonians (Giesebrecht), the Assyrians (Budde, Gemser), or even the Egyptians (G. A. Smith, who compares 1:2-4 with 2 Ki. 23:33-35). We agree with Archer (Survey, 396) that there is no good evidence in the text of Hab. 1:2-4 that heathen invaders are referred to; the manipulation of the law courts to favor the wealthy points to a domestic evil.

Hab. 1:5-11. God answers that he is raising up the Babylonians as his instrument of judgment, describing the fierceness of their armies and their contempt for any obstacle placed in their way.

Hab. 1:12-17. This answer plunges Habakkuk into a greater perplexity: How can a righteous God use the wicked Babylonians to punish his people, which in spite of its apostasy, is still more righteous than they are?

Hab. 2:1-4. The prophet waits upon the Lord. The answer, linked up with the history of God’s divine providence, comes in the assertion that the pride of the Babylonian will be his downfall and the faith of the believer will be his salvation.

Hab. 2:5-20. A taunt-song is addressed presumably to the Babylonian king, consisting of a series of five woes against aggression (vv. 6b-8), self-assertion (vv. 9-11), violence (vv. 12-14), inhumanity (vv. 15-17), and idolatry (vv. 18-20).

Hab. 3:1-19. This psalm, voiced by the prophet, but on behalf of his people, is the “amen of faith” to the revelation of God. The prophet describes the divine manifestation in terms of a stormy theophany (3:2 – 15), with allusions to the mighty deeds of God in the history of the deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The impression created by this theophany is awe-inspiring (3:2, 16a). No matter what may befall them, the prophet and his people shall trust in God (3:16-19).

VI. Theology. The content of this book is characterized as an oracle or burden (Heb. maššā<sup>1</sup> H5363; cf. Isa. 13:1; 14:28; et al.) that Habakkuk the prophet saw. Its purport, therefore, is to represent the word of God. It is evident, however, that the prophecy of Habakkuk has a unique form. It consists partly of lamentations that the prophet addresses to God (1:2-4, 12-17; 2:1; 3:1-19), and partly of prophetic utterances (1:5-11; 2:2-20). Archer (Survey, 397) rightly observes that, with the possible exception of Daniel, no other biblical author employs this particular technique. We may, however, assume that the whole content of Habakkuk’s book is meant as REVELATION, as the imparting of God’s message to his people.

On the material side, the content of this prophecy is characterized by the following features:

A. The prophet's orientation toward God. He calls him "LORD" (Hab. 1:2, 12; 2:2, 13-14, 16, 20; 3:2, 8, 18-19), "my God" (1:12; 3:3, 18-19), "my Holy One" (1:12; 3:3), and "O Rock" (1:12); he acknowledges him as the supreme Judge (1:2-4), as the God of the everlasting covenant (1:12), as the sovereign Ruler of all nations (1:5, 17; 2:12; 3:6, 12) and of all nature (3:3-11), the God who answers prayer (2:2), delivers his people (2:3; 3:13, 16, 18-19), determines the course of history (2:3; 3:2), and fills the earth with the knowledge of his glory (2:14).

B. The prophet's reaction against sin. Habakkuk is well aware of the sins of his people, of their political oppression, social wrongs, and prevailing manipulation of the law courts (Hab. 1:2-4). He not only observes it, but he testifies against it, and cries out to God to correct it. He also is conscious of the sins of the world power, its covetousness (1:6, 8, 9, 13-17), haughty self-assertion (1:7, 11, 16; 2:4), idolatry (2:18-19), and violence (1:17; 2:5-17).

C. The objective and subjective aspects of the prophet's message. Habakkuk called forth the judgment of the Lord first upon Judah and subsequently upon the Babylonians. This is the objective aspect of his message. In the course of time both prophecies of judgment were fulfilled. The oppressing nobilities first were taken into captivity in the two preliminary deportations of 605 and 597 B.C., and this was followed by the major deportation in 587. God indeed was not an inactive onlooker on the scene of his people. With these calamities the waiting time for the righteous remnant began (Hab. 2:2-3; 3:2). At the appointed time, the Babylonians were judged (539), and the captives of Judah were later allowed to return to the Promised Land.

The subjective aspect of Habakkuk's message is that the righteous shall live by his faith. Apart from ISAIAH (cf. Isa. 7:9; 28:16), no other prophet stressed the significance of faith and prayerful trust in such a way as did Habakkuk. Though the land may be stripped bare by the subsequent judgments of God, yet he will rejoice in the Lord (Hab. 3:17-18). The central theme of Habakkuk's prophecy, namely, that the righteous shall live by his faith (2:4), is taken up in the NT and applied in significant contexts (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38-39).

Habazziniah hab'uh-zi-ni'uh (חַבְאֲזִינִיָּה H2484, possibly “Yahweh has made me abundant [or joyful]”). KJV Habaziniah. Grandfather of JAAZANIAH, who was the leader of the RECABITES (Jer. 35:3).

Habbacuc. KJV Apoc. form of HABAKKUK (Bel 33-39).

habergeon hab'uhr-juhn. A sleeveless coat of mail. The term is used by the KJV a few times (Exod. 28:32 et al.). See ARMOR IV.B.

Habiru, Hapiru hah-bee'roo, hah-pee'roo. The Akkadian term ḫabiru (which can also be transliterated ḫapiru) appears in cuneiform texts dated from the 20th to the 18th centuries B.C. in southern MESOPOTAMIA, in ASIA MINOR, and in the HARAN and MARI areas. They are frequently mentioned in the TELL EL-AMARNA letters (14th cent. B.C.). In Egyptian texts they are called ʿapiru, and the Ugaritic form is ʿapiruma. Many scholars note the similarity of these forms with the Hebrew name ʿibrî H6303 and conclude that the Habiru are identical with the biblical Hebrews (see HEBREW PEOPLE).

This statue of King Idrimi of Alalakh (c. 1570-1500 B.C.) contains a cuneiform inscription in which he mentions his time spent in Canaan with the Habiru.

The Habiru covered a geographical area much wider than that in which the biblical Hebrews moved. It may be reasoned that the people who were usually known as Israelites were at times identified as Habiru, but that this term included many other peoples of similar status as the Israelites. Note that EBER (ʿēber H6299, Gen. 10:24-25), for whom the Hebrews are traditionally named, lived eight generations before JACOB (Israel) for whom the Israelites are named. In this sense all Israelites are ibrîm (“Hebrews”) but all Hebrews need not be Israelites.

In the nonbiblical literature of the ANE, the Habiru appear as landless individuals who live outside the established social order. They appear as mercenaries in texts from BABYLON. At Nuzi they sold themselves into slavery in order to earn a living. Letters from Abdi-Hiba of Jerusalem to Akhenaten of Egypt complain that the Habiru were posing a threat to the status quo in Canaan. Some scholars see in these references the Canaanite version of the conquest of Canaan under JOSHUA.

The root from which the names Eber and Hebrew are derived conveys the idea of “crossing over.” This fact has been interpreted geographically, with the thought that Eber and the Hebrews came from the region beyond the EUPHRATES River (according to others, the JORDAN). Perhaps the word was coined by the settled inhabitants who looked upon the newcomers, wherever they appeared, as “people who had crossed over” or trespassers (the Akkadian term means “fugitive” or “refugee”). The word would thus lose any ethnic significance and could be applied to any group of people who did not have land or social status within the established social order. The word gypsy has had a comparable history in more recent times. (If the root of Habiru/ Hapiru is pr, “dust,” the term may have been used figuratively to indicate a low social class.)

Once ABRAHAM is named “the Hebrew” (Gen. 14:13). To his fellow prisoners, JOSEPH was “a young Hebrew” (41:12). The term Hebrew is typically used in contexts in which the biblical people—Israelites as they came to be called—identify themselves to, or are addressed by, foreigners. In such contexts, this presumably familiar name appears to have been a useful means of identification. The term Habiru thus includes the biblical Hebrews or Israelites. It includes many other peoples as well, however. (See further M. Greenberg, The Hab/piru [1955]; J. Bottéro in Dialogues d’histoire ancienne 6 [1980]: 201—13; O. Loretz, Habiru-Hebräer: Eine soziolinguistische Studie... [1984]; N. P. Lemche in ABD, 3:6-10; SacBr, 88-89.)

Habor hay’bor (חַבּוֹר H2466). A tributary of the EUPHRATES River, flowing through the district of GOZAN, to the banks of which SHALMANESER and SARGON transported the exiled Israelites (2 Ki. 17:6; 18:11; 1 Chr. 5:26). The river originates in the mountains of SE Turkey and is now known by the name Khabur.

Hacaliah hak’uh-li’uh (חַכְלִיָּה H2678, perhaps “wait for Yahweh” [if vocalized חַכְלִיָּה]). KJV Hachaliah; TNIV Hakaliah. Father of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 1:1; 10:1).

Hachilah. See HAKILAH.

Hachmoni hak’moh-ni. See HACMONI.

Hacmoni hak’moh-ni (חַכְמֹנִי H2685, possibly “wise”; if gentilic, “Hacmonite”). Also Hachmoni; TNIV Hakmoni. (1) Father of JASHOBEAM; the latter was a chief officer among DAVID’S mighty men (1 Chr. 11:11). However, the Hebrew expression “the son of Hacmoni” should perhaps be understood as “the Hacmonite” (cf. NIV). In the parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:8), Jashobeam is called “Josheb-Basshebeth, a Tahkemonite,” probably the result of a copyist’s mistake.

(2) Father of Jehiel, who was in charge of David’s sons (1 Chr. 27:32); it is possible, though less likely, that here too the term should be taken as a gentilic, and the phrase rendered, “Jehiel the Hacmonite.”

Hadad (deity) hay’dad. Also Adad (Akk. form), Adda (in EBLA). Although not mentioned in the Bible, this ancient Semitic god was worshiped in PALESTINE, SYRIA, and MESOPOTAMIA from about the time of ABRAHAM on (in SUMER he was known as Ishkur). Hadad was considered the son of DAGON (Dagan) in UGARIT, and he is frequently mentioned in the Ras Shamra texts as the proper name of BAAL, a storm-god who manifests himself in thunder, lightning, and rain (the name Hadad prob. means “thunderer”). Since storms are often destructive, he is asked in prayers and hymns to restrain his destructive propensities; but since storms are also bringers of beneficial rains, he is looked upon as a principle of life and fertility. He is the Baal of the FERTILITY CULTS of UGARIT and CANAAN. The thunder is his voice. He is the dying and rising god, like TAMMUZ of Mesopotamia. He is also a warrior god and is represented as a warrior standing on a bull, carrying a mace and a thunderbolt, with the horns of a bull on his helmet. He was worshiped as a warrior god particularly by the Assyrians. (See WARRIOR, DIVINE.) The monolith of SHALMANESER calls him “the god of Aleppo.” The name Hadad functions as a divine element in such compound names as BEN-HADAD, HADADEZER, and HADAD RIMMON. See also HADAD (PERSON). (Cf. N. Wyatt in UF 12 [1980]: 375-79; J. C. Greenfield in DDD, 716-26; A. R. W. Green, The Storm-God in the Ancient Near East [2003].)

Hadad (person) hay’dad (𐤠𐤏𐤃 H2524 [only #1 below, Gen. 25:15; 1 Chr. 1:30], possibly “sharp, fierce”; 𐤠𐤏𐤃 H2060, probably “thunderer,” and perhaps an abbreviation of a compound name that included a theophoric element; see HADAD (DEITY)). (1) Son of ISHMAEL and grandson of ABRAHAM (Gen. 25:15 [KJV, “Hadar,” following the Bomberg ed. of the Heb. text]; 1 Chr. 1:30 [“Hadar” in a few Heb. MSS]).

(2) Son of Bedad and a king of EDM who is said to have defeated MIDIAN; his capital was Avith (Gen. 36:35-36; 1 Chr. 1:46-47). His dates are unknown.

(3) Another Edomite king of uncertain date; his capital was Pau, and the text includes a reference to his wife, Mehetabel daughter of MATRED (Gen. 36:39 [“Hadar” in most Heb. MSS]; 1 Chr. 1:50-51 [“Hadar” in a few Heb. MSS]).

(4) An Edomite prince who was an adversary of SOLOMON (1 Ki. 11:14-22, 25). After JOAB defeated the Edomites and occupied their country, Hadad was taken to Egypt as a young boy. There PHARAOH welcomed him and later gave him his wife’s sister in marriage, so Hadad’s son was brought up in the court of Egypt. After the death of DAVID, Hadad returned to Edom and attempted to stir up the Edomites against the rule of Solomon, apparently with some success. A. Lemaire (in Biblische Notizen 43 [1988]: 14-18) emends “Edom” (ʾdm) to “Aram” (ʾrm), making Hadad a descendant of HADADEZER, and argues that this proposed reading makes for a more coherent literary tradition. (See further J. R. Bartlett in PEQ 104 [1972]: 26-37 and in ZAW 88 [1976]: 205-26; E. A. Knauf in ABD, 3:11-12.)

Hadadezer hay’dad-ee’zühr (הַדַּדְעֶזֶר H2061, “Hadad is help”). KJV Hadarezer (following many Heb. MSS). Son of REHOB and king of ZOBAB in ARAM, whose kingdom in the time of DAVID extended as far eastward as the EUPHRATES and as far southward as AMMON. There are three accounts in the OT of conflicts between him and David (though some scholars argue that these passages refer to only one or two distinct battles). In each, Hadadezer was defeated, and finally he was made tributary. The first is 2 Sam. 8:3-8, in which it is said that as Hadadezer went to restore his power at the Euphrates, David dealt him a severe defeat, and when the Arameans of DAMASCUS came to help him, David killed 22,000 of them. The second account, found in 2 Sam. 10:5-14, records that the Ammonites formed a league of Aramean rulers to protect them from the wrath of David, whom the Ammonites had insulted by shaving off the beards of his ambassadors (vv. 1-6). David sent JOAB against them, and they were badly beaten. The last passage, 2 Sam. 10:15-18, relates a defeat of the army of Hadadezer at HELAM under their commander SHOBACH, after which Hadadezer made peace with Israel and became subject to them. After these wars, David put a garrison in Damascus and received a tribute from Hadadezer. (See M. F. Unger, Israel and the Arameans of Damascus [1957], 42—48; W. Pitard, Ancient Damascus [1987], 90-94.) See HADAD (DEITY) and HADAD (PERSON). It should be noted that the Hadadezer (Adad-ʾidri) of CUNEIFORM texts refers to BEN-HADAD II.

Hadad Rimmon hay’dad-rim’uhn (הַדַּדְרִמּוֹן H2062; Aramean and Akkadian deities, respectively, both probably meaning “thunderer”). KJV Hadadrimmon; NRSV Hadad-rimmon. The prophet ZECHARIAH predicted, “On that day the weeping in Jerusalem will be great, like the weeping of [or for] Hadad Rimmon in the plain of Megiddo” (Zech. 12:11). The name is thought by some to refer to a place (JEROME actually identified it with Maximianopolis, a village near JEZREEL), possibly alluding to the mourning that took place after the death of JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:29-30; 2 Chr. 35:20-25). Others understand Hadad Rimmon to be a dying-and-rising vegetation god whose worship involved annual ritual mourning. See HADAD (DEITY) and RIMMON (DEITY).

S. BARABAS

Hadar hay'dahr (הָדָר H2076 [not in NIV], “splendor”). This name, a textual variant of “Hadad,” occurs twice in the KJV (Gen. 25:15; 36:39; in the latter passage, NRSV has “Hadar” as well). See HADAD (PERSON).

Hadarezer hay'duhr-ee'zuhr. KJV form of HADADEZER.

Hadashah huh-dash'uh (הַדָּשָׁה H2546, “new”). A town in the lowland of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:37). Hadashah was in the same district as LACHISH and EGLON, but its location is unknown. The suggestion that it should be identified with ADASA (1 Macc. 7:40; cf. ABD, 3:13) cannot be sustained, either linguistically or geographically.

Hadassah huh-das'uh (הַדַּסָּה H2073, “myrtle”). The Hebrew name of ESTHER (Esth. 2:7). Hadassah was apparently her original name, that is, given to her at birth, even though she was more commonly known by the Akkadian (or Persian) name, Esther. The older view that Hadassah is the Hebrew form of the Akkadian word for “bride” (ḥadaššatu, a term applied to the goddess ISHTAR) has been generally abandoned.

Hadattah. See HAZOR HADATTAH.

Hades hay'deez (ᾍδης G87, etymology disputed, perhaps from the negative particle a and the verb ἰδεῖν, “[that which is] not seen,” “the invisible one”). In Greek mythology, the god of the netherworld (see GREEK RELIGION AND PHILOSOPHY I.A); the term was then applied to the underworld itself, that is, the abode of the DEAD.

I. Pagan background. According to Homer, Hades was the name of both the underworld where the departed spirits dwell and the god of that underworld, also called Pluto (Pluton), the son of Chronos and Rhea. Its original genitive form, Hadou, that is, “of Hades,” may reflect the idea that the netherworld belongs to the god Hades. This place, according to Greek mythology, was approached by crossing the River Styx, and at its entrance three judges decided the fate of the soul. (See T. Gantz, Early Greek Myth [1993], 70-73, 123-28.)

II. OT equivalent. Hades is the Greek term used by the SEPTUAGINT to render Hebrew SHEOL (in every instance except 2 Sam. 22:6). In the OT, Sheol was the place where the dead existed. The Hebrew concept was quite similar to that of the other peoples of the ANE. Sheol was a gloomy underworld where the godly and the ungodly dwelt together, with little distinction between them, on a level of existence far below that of life on earth. Toward the end of the OT period, there emerged a few inklings of hope for the rescue of God's people from Sheol, expressed by JOB, by DAVID, and by DANIEL (Job 19:25-27; Pss. 16:9-11; 17:15; Dan. 12:2).

III. Intertestamental developments. The literature of the intertestamental period reflects the growth of the idea of the division of Hades into separate compartments for the godly and the ungodly. This aspect of ESCHATOLOGY was a popular subject in the APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE that flourished in this period. Notable is the pseudepigraphical 1 Enoch (written c. 200 B.C.; see ENOCH, BOOKS OF, I), which includes the description of a tour supposedly taken by ENOCH into the center of the earth. There Enoch sees four hollow places, one is for the saintly martyrs, the next for ordinary righteous people, a third for the wicked who were insufficiently punished in this life, and the final one for sinners who suffered a violent death, which apparently was a sufficient punishment for leaving them in this intermediate state forever. In another passage in Enoch, he sees at the center of the earth two places—PARADISE, the place of bliss, and the Valley of Gehinnom (HINNOM), the place of punishment.

The above illustrates that there was a general notion of compartments in Hades that developed in the intertestamental period, but that there was diversity of details regarding these compartments. Some scholars interpret this division into compartments as the result of foreign influences, such as that of Persian ZOROASTRIANISM with its pronounced DUALISM; but a more likely explanation is that the OT faith (with its strong emphasis on the justice of God leading to the blessings of the godly and the punishment of the ungodly, and with its teaching that the true meaning of life is fellowship with God) could not conceive of a common fate for the wicked and the righteous as the final word on the subject.

Whatever the original sources of this development of distinct sections in Hades, it was confirmed by the teachings of Christ. The apocalyptic literature, however, included detailed and grotesque descriptions of the nature of existence in the compartments of Hades inhabited by the damned which go far beyond a legitimate development of the faith of the OT (cf. Sib. Or. 2.283-310 [English trans. in OTP, 1:352-53]).

IV. NT usage. The Greek word hadēs is used only ten times in the NT (eleven times if one includes the textual variant in 1 Cor. 15:55, but the more reliable MSS have thanate, “O death”). The term is translated “hell” in the KJV, but the same rendering is used for geenna G1147 (see GEHENNA), which refers to the place of eternal punishment. The NRSV maintains the transliteration “Hades” throughout, whereas the NIV uses several renderings.

In Matt. 11:23 (and in the parallel passage, Lk. 10:15) Hades is used to describe the tragic fate awaiting unrepentant CAPERNAUM. That city will be “brought down to Hades” (NIV, “to the depths”) in marked contrast to being “exalted to heaven.” Apparently Hades is here considered to be a place of punishment. Christ promises that the “gates of Hades” will not prevail against his CHURCH (Matt. 16:18). Although this text has usually been interpreted otherwise (no doubt because of the influence of the rendering “hell” for Hades), the promise probably means that even death itself will not be able to prevent God’s people from sharing in the victory of Christ.

Hades is also the place to which the rich man went when he was buried, in contrast to ABRAHAM’S BOSOM, to which poor Lazarus was transported by angels when he died (Lk. 16:23; NIV, “hell”). This passage (a parable by Jesus) gives far more information about Hades than any other in the NT, but to what extent the language is parabolic and to what extent it is to be taken literally is a question upon which commentators are not agreed. Hades is described here as a place of “torment” in which the wicked dwell in flames, a condition that produces “agony” and specifically a desire to have one’s tongue cooled by water (v. 24). Furthermore, although presumably in a disembodied state, the rich man could “lift up his eyes” (KJV) to see those on the other side of the “great chasm”; and he believed that Lazarus could “dip the tip of his finger in water.” In the parable, conversation is possible between the inhabitants of Abraham’s bosom and of Hades, although no one can cross from one realm to the other. See LAZARUS AND DIVES.

Hades is mentioned twice by PETER in his sermon on the day of PENTECOST (Acts 2:27, 31; NIV, “grave”). In the first instance, Peter quotes Ps. 16:10, where Hades is a translation of Sheol, and in the second instance he applies this Psalm as a prophecy of the RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST; because he rose from the dead, Christ was not detained in Hades, and thus the prophecy was fulfilled.

Finally, the word Hades is used four times in the book of Revelation. Jesus describes himself as possessing “the keys of death and Hades” (Rev. 1:18). In 6:8 John sees a pale horse whose rider is named Death, “and Hades was following close behind him.” These terms are coupled two additional times: at the final judgment, “death and Hades gave up the dead that were in them” and then “death and Hades were thrown into the lake of fire” (20:13-14). This last reference apparently teaches that Hades is a temporary place that will be destroyed at the end of the world.

As one considers these instances of NT usage, there appears to be some variation in the way the term Hades is used. Sometimes it seems almost to be equated with death itself, and therefore to be the condition into which both the godly and the ungodly enter. Elsewhere it appears to be the temporary abode of the ungodly prior to the final judgment, whereas the godly go immediately to be with the Lord in glory. G. Vos seeks to solve this problem by distinguishing between Hades as a place and as a state. According to him, only the ungodly go to the place called Hades, whereas the godly go into the state of disembodied existence, which is designated by the same word.

Other passages of the NT are sometimes interpreted as referring to Hades, although they do not mention the word itself. According to Eph. 4:9, Christ “descended into the lower parts of the earth” (KJV), and this statement was interpreted by the church fathers and some later commentators as describing a DESCENT INTO HADES by Christ after his death. However, other commentators claim that this passage simply speaks of Christ’s coming down from heaven to earth (cf. NIV). Another passage, 1 Pet. 3:19, says that Christ “went and preached to the spirits in prison”; this verse too has been interpreted by some to refer to a descent of Christ into Hades at his death. (Cf. further G. Bartle, The Scriptural Doctrine of Hades [1869]; J. P. Lange, A Commentary on the Holy Scriptures: The Revelation of John [1874], 364-77; W. O. E. Oesterley, Immortality and the Unseen World [1921]; J. Jeremias in TDNT, 1:146-49; DDD, 382-83; OCD, 661-62.)

V. The early church. Whereas the ante-Nicene fathers were somewhat vague in their statements on the subject, later theologians were in rather general agreement that believers who died before Christ were kept in Hades until Christ, after his crucifixion, descended to their abodes and brought them up to paradise, which was considered to be either a higher part of Hades or the lower regions of heaven. That part of Hades where the OT believers dwelt before Christ rescued them was later named the Limbus Patrum. According to the fathers, after Christ’s descent into Hades, believers at death went directly to paradise, which was, however, not the highest heaven where the vision of God could be enjoyed, but was rather a place of preparation and further development, which in later Roman Catholic theology became “purgatory.” The phrase “he descended into hell [Hades]” was used in Arian creeds about the middle of the 4th cent., but was not added to the APOSTLES’ CREED until much later. See also CREED III. A; HELL.

H. BUIS

Hadid hay’did (חַדִּיד H2531, possibly “sharp”). A town listed with LOD and ONO as having been resettled by hundreds of Jews after the EXILE (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37); those returning were “descendants of the Benjamites from Geba” (Neh. 11:31-35). Hadid may have been settled first during the divided monarchy when the tribe of BENJAMIN spread to the W. It is probably to be identified with ADIDA (1 Macc. 12:38; 13:13) and with the modern el-Haditheth, about 3.5 mi. ENE of Lod (Lydda).

Hadlai had'li (הַדְלַי H2536, prob. “stout,” fig. “successful”). Father of AMASA; the latter was a leader in the tribe of EPHRAIM during the reign of PEKAH king of Israel (2 Chr. 28:12).

Hadoram huh-dor'uhm (הַדּוֹרָם H2066, possibly “HADAD is exalted”). (1) Son (or descendant) of JOKTAN son of EBER (Gen. 10:27; 1 Chr. 1:21). Some scholars identify the name with Dauram, a locality in Yemen; Hadoram thus may have been the name of a S Arabian tribe (see ABD, 3:16).

(2) Son of Tou (Toi) king of H AMATH; he was sent by his father with presents to DAVID “to greet him and congratulate him on his victory in battle over Hadadezer, who had been at war with Tou” (1 Chr. 18:10). In the parallel passage (2 Sam. 8:10), he is called JORAM; some consider this name a textual corruption, but others interpret it as the Israelite equivalent (that is, using an abbreviated form of Yahweh rather than the pagan name Hadad; cf. A. Malamat in JNES 22 [1963]: 1-17, esp. 6-7).

(3) A variant form of ADONIRAM (2 Chr. 10:18).

Hadrach had'rak (הַדְרַחַּ H2541, meaning unknown). TNIV Hadrak. A locality N of Israel against which ZECHARIAH prophesied (Zech. 9:1). Grouped with DAMASCUS, HAMATH, TYRE, and SIDON, Hadrach is probably the same as the Ḥatarikka mentioned in some Assyrian inscriptions. It is identified with Tell Afis, about 28 mi. SW of ALEPPO.

Hadrak had'rak. TNIV form of HADRACH.

Hadrian hay'dree-uhn. Emperor of ROME, A.D. 117-138. Publius Aelius (Traianus) Hadrianus was born, probably in Spain, in the year 76. Before he was ten years old, his father died, and the future emperor TRAJAN (a relative) became one of his guardians. His military career began during the reign of DOMITIAN, and after Trajan became emperor, Hadrian held several posts, including the governorship of SYRIA. Shortly before Trajan died, he reportedly adopted Hadrian, although it was rumored that Trajan's wife had staged the adoption after his death. In any case, Hadrian was recognized as emperor by the army and thereafter by the senate.

Hadrian's two decades of rule were uneven. He was a cultured man, devoted to Greek literature and showing great interest in philosophy, science, and architecture. The famous Hadrian's Wall, marking the frontiers of the empire in Britain, signaled an end to Roman expansion. In the year 130 Hadrian visited JUDEA and took several steps, such as banning CIRCUMCISION, that provoked Jewish sensibilities. A revolt was inevitable, and BAR KOKHBA rose against Rome in 132. By 135 the rebellion had been crushed, Jerusalem made into a Roman colony named Aelia Capitolina, and the nation of Israel brought to an end (see WARS, JEWISH). Hadrian died three years later. (See further A. R. Birley, Hadrian: The Restless Emperor [1997]; E. Speller, Following Hadrian: A Second-Century Journey through the Roman Empire [2003]; D. Danziger and N. Purcell, Hadrian's Empire: When Rome Ruled the World [2005]; OCD, 662-63.)

Haeleph hay-ee'lif (הַאֵלֶפֶּחַ H2030, “the ox”). A town in the tribal territory of BENJAMIN listed between ZELA and JERUSALEM (Josh. 18:28; KJV, “Eleph”). Following a SEPTUAGINT variant (Sēelaleph in CODEX ALEXANDRINUS), some scholars join Haeleph with the preceding word and identify Zela-Haeleph with the Zela mentioned elsewhere (2 Sam. 21:14). In any case, the location of the city is unknown.

hag, night. See LILITH.

Hagab hay'gab (חִגַּב H2507, “locust”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:46; 1 Esd. 5:30 [KJV, “Agaba”]; not mentioned in the parallel list, Neh. 7:48, probably because a scribe inadvertently skipped “Akkub Hagab” after writing the similar name “Hagabah”).

Hagaba, Hagabah hag'uh-buh (חִגְבָּא H2509 [חִגְבָּא in Bomberg ed. at Neh. 7:48], “locust”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:45 [“Hagabah”]; Neh. 7:48 [most English versions, “Hagaba,” but see NJPS]; 1 Esd. 5:29 [KJV, “Graba”]). The common English spelling “Hagaba” in Nehemiah derives from a printed edition of the Hebrew Bible published in 1524-25 (cf. BHK), but is not supported by the MSS (curiously, the form is regarded as prob. correct by L. W. Batten, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, ICC [1913], 98).

Hagar hay'gahr (חַגָּר H2057, meaning uncertain). KJV NT Agar. The concubine of ABRAHAM and the mother of ISHMAEL. To understand the story of Hagar, it is necessary to begin ten years before she appears upon the scene, to the time when God called Abraham to leave his own country for a new land. God then promised that even though Abraham was old (seventy-five years) and childless, he would make of him a great nation (Gen. 12:1-3). After ten years of fruitless waiting for the promised son, SARAH offered to Abraham her personal Egyptian maid, Hagar (prob. acquired during their brief stay in EGYPT, Gen. 12:10-20), as a concubine in the hope of producing a son by her. The code of HAMMURABI and the Nuzi tablets (which come from the region of the patriarchs although from a slightly later period) show it was customary for a childless wife to provide her husband with a concubine. If a son was born of the union, he was regarded as the child of the wife. Apparently both Abraham and Sarah were convinced that God would not give them children by Sarah, but that God's promise could be fulfilled by a son through Hagar.

Abraham followed Sarah's suggestion. Hagar conceived but then began to show contempt and disdain for her mistress in various ways, causing distress to Sarah. Bitter feelings and wounded pride caused Sarah to blame Abraham for doing what she herself had suggested (Gen. 16:5). He replied that Sarah could do anything she wanted with Hagar,

Hagar was sent out into the wilderness of Beersheba. (View to the SE.)

her maid. Sarah decided to humble Hagar, probably by having her do menial work and live with her servants. Hagar refused to accept correction and fled from her mistress.

It may be that Hagar decided to go back to her own country, Egypt, for the angel of the Lord appeared to her not far from its border and told her to return to her mistress and submit to her. He also comforted her by adding that she would bear a son, whom she was to call Ishmael (meaning “God hears”); and he told her what kind of man he would be—a wild and lawless one, quarrelsome even with his own kindred, and that she would have innumerable descendants. Hagar’s son was born when Abraham was eighty-six years old.

Fourteen years later, when Abraham was one hundred years old, and Sarah ninety, God gave them a son whom they named ISAAC. The day the child was weaned (among the Jews this was two or three years after birth), at a great feast made to celebrate the occasion, Sarah became incensed when she saw Ishmael, now a lad about seventeen years old, mocking Isaac (Gen. 21:9; the NRSV has “playing with,” but the context and Gal. 4:29 indicate the meaning “mocking”; indeed, the NRSV renders the same Heb. word “jesting” in Gen. 19:14 and “insult” in 39:14, 17). Sarah told Abraham to send Hagar and Ishmael away. Abraham loved Ishmael and was therefore very unwilling to do this, but God told him to do what Sarah asked, and Abraham obeyed.

Hagar and Ishmael left the home of Abraham and went into the wilderness of BEERSHEBA. When the water they had with them gave out, Hagar placed her exhausted son in the shade of some bushes and waited for him to die. The angel of the Lord spoke to her, indicating that God had heard his cry, and showed her where there was a spring of water. He also assured her that God would make of him a great nation. Ishmael lived in the wilderness of PARAN and became an expert hunter, and his mother got for him a wife from the land of Egypt. (Some scholars believe that Hagar represents an Arabian tribal confederacy, possibly to be connected with the country of Agarrum/Gerrha in E Arabia; cf. ABD, 3:18-19.)

In Gal. 4:22-31 PAUL applies the story allegorically, suggesting that Hagar the bondwoman and her son represent the old covenant, while Sarah and Isaac typify the grace and freedom of the new covenant. See ALLEGORY; COVENANT, THE NEW.

S. BARABAS

Hagarene, Hagarite, Hagerite hag’uh-reen, hag’uh-rit, hay’guh-rit. KJV forms of HAGRITE.

Haggadah hah’gah-dah’, huh-gah’duh (הַגָּדָה or הַגָּדָה [Aggadah], from הִגַּד H5583 hiphil, “to tell, narrate”). Also Haggada, Aggada(h); pl. haggadoth, aggadoth. Traditional Jewish literature that is not legal in character; it may also refer to a specific story or lesson. Its counterpart is HALAKAH. Whereas the latter denotes authoritative rabbinic teaching in respect to the Mosaic law, especially as deposited in the MISHNAH, Haggadah is didactic discourse mainly concerned with edification. It is usually based upon homiletical exegesis and has a moral purpose in view, but the word often functions as a catch-all term to include anything nonhalakic. (See G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim, 3 vols. [1927-30], 1:161-63. On the origins of the term, the classic study is W. Bacher in JQR 4 [1892]: 406-29.)

The TALMUD consists of both parts: the homiletical narrative and the legal decisions supported by tradition. The midrashic literature (see MIDRASH) is mainly haggadic in the sense that it consists of homiletical exegesis reinforced by anecdotes, legends, and sayings from a variety of sources. In some pious circles there was the tendency to treat haggadic material with the same respect as the halakic teaching, an attitude criticized by Maimonides. Though part of the Jewish tradition, Haggadah has no binding authority. Many Jewish scholars hold that the haggadic literature was aimed mainly at the populace, but Montefiore believes that it was intended “for the inner smaller circles of students and disciples and for the delectation of the Rabbis themselves” (C. G. Montefiore and H. Loewe, A Rabbinic Anthology [1938], xvii). In modern usage, the Haggadah refers to a book that contains the story of the EXODUS and the PASSOVER ritual. (See further H. L. Strack and G. Stemberger, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash [1992], 57—58 et passim.)

Haggai, Book of hag’i (חגי H2516, “[born] on a feast day”). The tenth book of the Minor Prophets.

I. Background. Haggai prophesied in the period following the return of the exiles from BABYLON about 538 B.C. The conquest of Babylonia by CYRUS the Persian one year earlier made it possible for captive elements within the Babylonian population to look for liberty from enslavement. That this expectation was fully justified is indicated by the celebrated Cylinder of Cyrus, a cuneiform text that recorded the Persian conqueror’s general permission to the racial minorities—previously carried captive by the Babylonian regime—to return to their homeland and begin life afresh. The cylinder reads in part, “(As to the region) from...as far as Ashur and Susa, Agade, Eshnunna, the towns Zamban, Me-Turnu, Der as well as the region of the Gutians, I returned to (these) sacred cities on the other side of the Tigris, the sanctuaries of which have been ruins for a long time, the images which (used) to live therein and established for them permanent sanctuaries. I (also) gathered all their (former) inhabitants and returned (to them) their habitations” (ANET, 316).

The prospect of a return to a desolate and impoverished land was by no means attractive to all of the Jews who had been in exile in Babylonia, particularly for those whose faith in the God of Israel had been shattered by the calamity of captivity. In addition, the opportunity of returning to Palestine to rebuild the ruins of the past had little practical appeal to those Jews who had managed to take advantage of the generous and rather naive Babylonians to build up prosperous commercial enterprises. In consequence, only those Jews who had caught a vision of service to God and man in the light of the promised covenant (Jer. 31:31-35; Ezek. 18:1-32) were seriously interested in the challenge inherent in restoring the years that the locusts had eaten. The enthusiasm that this remnant must have experienced at the thought of personal liberty was no doubt tempered by the sober realization that great hardships and difficulties lay ahead in the land of their forebears.

Those exiles who returned were led by descendants of the house of DAVID, the most prominent of whom were SHESHBAZZAR (possibly from the Babylonian form Sin-aba-ušur or Šamdš-aba-ušsur) and ZERUBBABEL (Babylonian Zēr-Bābili). Sheshbazzar was cited as the “prince of Judah” (Ezra 1:8), and he bore the title of “governor” (5:14), presumably indicating that he was the first ruler of the Persian province of Judah. In 537 B.C., the first year of the return to Palestine, the altar of burnt offering was rebuilt, some of the ancient ceremonial rites were restored to public worship, and most important of all, the repatriated exiles laid the foundation of a new TEMPLE in the midst of ruined JERUSALEM (cf. Ezra 5:16).

As indicated above, a great many Jews who had managed to establish successful careers or business ventures in Babylonia were reluctant to abandon them for the prospects of a bleak and unpromising future in Palestine. It can be inferred, therefore, that the bulk of those who did return to Judea were sustained more by religious zeal than by material possessions. Although the sight of the ruined sanctuary in Jerusalem may well have evoked a good deal of initial compassion, the most pressing consideration for repatriates of limited means would be that of gaining as good a living as possible from the environs of the capital city. This preoccupation with the desperate struggle for existence amid unpromising surroundings seems to have taken almost all the available time and energy of the returned exiles. More seriously than this, the book of Haggai seems to indicate that the state of shock that must have accompanied these conditions had sapped the spiritual zeal of the repatriates, making them apathetic about restoring the ruined sanctuary to something of its former grandeur. Certainly there is no evidence in the prophecy of Haggai that anything more than the laying of the foundation of the new structure had been accomplished in a decade of life in Judea.

It has sometimes been supposed that, since Haggai was not mentioned until about 520 B.C. (Ezra 5:1), he had returned as an adult to Palestine with a fresh group of exiles at this period. However, there is no indication in his prophecy that such was actually the case, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary it is legitimate to suppose that Haggai was still a child when he returned to Judea with his parents in 537.

II. Unity. The book of Haggai comprises four short oracles delivered by the prophet himself; written in the third person, they are associated with the restoration of the temple in 520 B.C. They were delivered respectively in the first day of the sixth month (Hag. 1:1), the twenty-first day of the seventh month (2:1), and the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month (2:10, 20), in the reign of DARIUS I. It has been suggested by some writers that the work proceeded from two different hands, one of which compiled the narrative material while the other assembled a small collection of oracles. Other scholars, however, have denied that the prophecy constitutes an editing of diverse sources, and have argued, from the obvious closeness of the writer to events that occurred in Judea in the time of Darius I, for the unity and historicity of the prophecy.

III. Authorship. The name Haggai may have been derived from the word for “festival,” suggesting that his birth coincided with some Israelite feast. The name of his father is unknown, and there is no information available concerning the family background of the prophet or the social situation from which he came. The historical activities of Haggai are corroborated by references in Ezra (Ezra 5:1; 6:14), and his prophecy, along with that of ZECHARIAH, is of great importance as a source of information relating to the period between the return from exile and the work of EZRA and NEHEMIAH.

Those who rebuilt the temple at the time of Haggai may have harvested stone for the building from this quarry N of Jerusalem.

Some scholars have argued that, because the extant prophecy appears as résumés of addresses, the book as it stands cannot have come from the hand of Haggai, but instead was the work of a disciple or group of disciples. However, the extant form of the oracles suggests that they were written down from memory shortly after being delivered, and since the prophetic ministry of Haggai was of such short duration, it is highly unlikely that he had attracted disciples before his work was actually committed to written form. There is no element in the prophecy as it now stands that points to diversity of authorship. Indeed, the weight of internal and external evidence supports the contention that the prophet Haggai was himself the author of the work attributed to him, and that he furnished a narrative of contemporary events involving himself in an objective manner.

IV. Date. Fortunately it is possible to assign a precise date to the book without difficulty, because the various oracles are related to the reign of Darius I (522-486 B.C.). The first address, given on the first day of the sixth month, placed the beginning of the prophetic activity of Haggai in August-September of 520. His fourth oracle was delivered on the ninth day of the fourth month (November-December), shortly after the prophet Zechariah commenced his ministry.

V. Place of origin. The oracles of Haggai consistently presuppose a background of life in Judea in the period following the return of the exiles. Since the various utterances were connected with the site of the ruined temple (shortly to be restored), with the civil governor, and with the priests of the cultus, there can be no doubt that the place of origin of the prophecies was Jerusalem itself. No other location in Judea can be considered as an acceptable substitute.

VI. Destination. The words of the prophet were meant primarily for local consumption. The first oracle in particular exhorted the repatriates to rebuild the house of God in Jerusalem, whereas the second (Hag. 2:1-9) comprised a message of encouragement to the laboring populace, promising them that the fruit of their striving would attract greater honor than its renowned predecessor. The involving of the priests in the argument of the third utterance (2:10-19) again bespeaks a local situation, as does the assurance given to Zerubbabel, the civil governor of Judea, in the fourth oracle (2:20-23). From the nature of the prophetic and historical situation, it is evident that the utterances of Haggai were meant for the populace of Judea.

VII. Occasion. The specific occasion that gave rise to the various prophecies was that associated with the reconstruction of the temple about 520 B.C. on the ruins of the former site in Jerusalem. Haggai's oracles convey the impression that the enormity of the difficulties confronting the repatriated exiles had weakened their initial spiritual vision, and that whatever energies they possessed were being spent in an urgent attempt to survive physically. However, the first oracle spoke of the "paneled houses" of the returned Jews (Hag. 1:4), implying that once the bare necessities of life had been met, a spirit of apathy toward the rebuilding of the temple had set in.

As time passed without any attempt at reconstruction, the inhabitants of Jerusalem became even more dispirited, particularly when the traditions concerning the splendor and majesty of the Solomonic temple were recalled, no doubt by some elderly members of the populace who had seen it as children. The purpose of the prophecy, therefore, was to combat apathy and depression by giving inspired leadership for the actual reconstruction, along with a promise from God that the glory of the new temple would exceed that of the former. Along with these emphases came the reminder that the Jews needed to observe spiritual priorities strictly if they were to expect material prosperity and divine blessing.

VIII. Purpose. The principal aim of the oracles was to stimulate the lethargic repatriates to the rebuilding of the temple and to reorganize community life on a proper footing in terms of spiritual priorities. Because of their attitudes, the Jews of Judea were in serious danger of losing the vision of a theocratic community in which the revealed will of God would be mediated to the populace by means of a consecrated priesthood. The restored community was not meant to be just another agglomeration of citizens living in free association, but a brotherhood of the spirit, bound to one another and to God through loyalty to the divine covenant, and living as a witness of the ability of God to liberate the captive and restore the penitent to a proper place in society. In a time of considerable upheaval in the Persian empire (see PERSIA III), it was the responsibility of Haggai to assure the citizens of Jerusalem and Judea that obedience to the will of God would ensure them a period of peace and prosperity. As far as the civil and religious rulers were concerned, Haggai was at pains to make clear their place in the larger purpose of God for the theocracy by showing that God had chosen them and fitted them for their special tasks.

IX. Canonicity. The prophecy was included from the beginning in the twelve short compositions known as the Minor Prophets. Chronologically, the book of Haggai was the earliest of the three postexilic prophecies—Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi—that dealt with the period of the restoration of the temple, and there has never been any question as to the legitimacy of its place in the canon of Hebrew Scripture. This was doubtless due in no small measure to the influence of Ezra, who attested directly to the work of Haggai. See CANON (OT).

X. Text. The Hebrew text of Haggai is in good order, although there are some corruptions (Hag. 1:7, 9, 10, 12; 2:6, 15, 17), as well as the possibility of textual dislocation (2:15 – 19), which may have arisen from the confusion of dates (1:15 and 2:18). The SEPTUAGINT text contains an addition in Hag.

2:9, and in other respects is an aid to the reconstruction of the MT. See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (OT).

XI. Content. The prophecy can be outlined as follows:

- A. The first oracle and response: a reminder to put first things first (Hag. 1:1-15).
- B. A message of encouragement about the destiny of the temple (2:1-9).
- C. An argument from the ritual law to show that the labor of the people will be blessed (2:10-19).
- D. A special promise to Zerubbabel relating to his personal safety (2:20-23).

XII. Theology. Whereas the prophecy is historical rather than religious in character, it stands firmly in the theological tradition of EZEKIEL with regard to the development of the priestly commonwealth. This is clearly indicated by the way Haggai related the prophetic ESCHATOLOGY of salvation to the constructing of the second temple. Haggai has occasionally been criticized for upholding the “superficial view” of material prosperity automatically following the careful observance of the mechanics of cultic worship. It should be noticed, however, that like Ezekiel, who also paid punctilious attention to the minutiae of ritual worship, Haggai stressed the correct motivation of the human spirit.

This emphasis upon priorities was a consistent element in his theology. He saw God as a wholly righteous and moral being who demanded from his covenant people complete obedience and spiritual loyalty. If they manifested his moral and ethical characteristics, they would be true witnesses to his power and would be rewarded with peace and prosperity while other nations were in the grip of turmoil. Seeking the kingdom, in the truest sense, would insure that all other necessities would be added to them, whereas a prime emphasis upon material possessions would only result in individual and community deterioration.

So far from being deficient in spirituality, Haggai furnished in his third oracle the most succinct statement to be found anywhere in the OT concerning the fact that evil is far more penetrating and diffusive than goodness. His insight constituted a lesson for the priests, whose forebears had been responsible morally and spiritually for the calamity of the exile by condoning idolatry, but it was also equally applicable to the general populace. By employing a question relating to ritual procedure, Haggai was able to make clear that even a small amount of evil requires an enormous amount of operative goodness to offset its deleterious effects.

Haggadolim hag’uh-doh’lim (הַגְּדוֹלִים H2045, “the great ones”). Father of ZABDIEL; the latter was a chief officer among the priests that settled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:14; KJV renders, “Zabdiel, the son of one of the great men”). Some scholars emend the word to haggādōl, “the great [one],” and interpret it to mean, “the high priest” (cf. 3:1 et al. and see ABD, 3:23).

Haggeri hag’uh-ri. KJV form of HAGRI.

Haggi hag’ee (חגי H2515, “[born] on a feast day”; gentilic חגיית H2515, “Haggite”). Son of GAD and eponymous ancestor of the Haggite clan (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:15).

Haggiah ha-gi’uh (חגייה H2517, “feast of Yahweh”). Son of Shimei and a descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 6:30).

Haggite hag’it. See HAGGI.

Haggith hag’ith (חגיית H2518, “[born] on a feast day”). One of DAVID’S wives and the mother of ADONIJAH, who was born in HEBRON when David’s capital was there (2 Sam. 3:4; 1 Ki. 1:5, 11; 2:13; 1 Chr. 3:2).

Hagia hay’gee-uh. See AGIA.

Hagiographa hag’ee-og’ruh-fuh. A term meaning “Sacred Writings” (from Gk. hagios G41 and graphē G1210) and applied to the third division of the Hebrew Bible, after the Law (the PENTATEUCH) and the Prophets (which includes Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, as well as Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets). Also known simply as the Writings or KETUBIM, this section consists of the following books: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1-2 Chronicles (in the TALMUD, the book of Ruth is put in the first place, prob. to provide the prehistory of David and to serve as an introduction to the Psalter of David, which follows).

This threefold division was already adopted about the middle of the 2nd cent. B.C., as appears from the prologue of ECCLESIASTICUS, which speaks of the Law, the Prophets, “and the other books of our fathers.” JOSEPHUS, at the end of the 1st cent. A.D., knew of a similar division, though in the last section he places only four books (Apion 1.8 §§38-41). It will be noted that according to the Jewish tradition, the book of DANIEL is not counted among the prophetic writings. Some argue from this fact that for Josephus the third division consisted of “hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life.” It is suggested that the four books were Psalms, Song of Songs, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes (cf. H. St. J. Thackeray in his edition of Apion for LCL, note on p. 179) and that the missing books in Josephus’s list were distributed differently from the present order. In this case, Daniel may have been among the Prophets.

In the NT, in at least one passage, the threefold division occurs: “the Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms” (Lk. 24:44). Whether the Psalter stands for the hagiographic literature as a whole is difficult to say. Otherwise, hē graphē (sing.) and hai graphai (pl.) each includes the whole of the OT, though occasionally reference is made to “Moses” or “the law of Moses” (Matt. 8:4; Lk. 2:22; Jn. 7:23; Acts 13:39; et al.); to the Prophets (Rom. 16:26); or to David, meaning the Psalter (Heb. 4:7). See CANON (OT).

Hagri hag'ri (הַגְּרִי H2058, perhaps “wanderer”). The father of MIBHAR, who was one of DAVID’S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:38; KJV, “Haggeri”). The parallel passage has “Bani the Gadite” (bānī haggādī, 2 Sam. 23:36), but some MSS of the SEPTUAGINT have huios Agēri (= ben-hagri, “the son of Hagri”), and this reading is adopted by the NIV (cf. further ABD, 4:805, s.v. “Mibhar”). P. K. McCarter (II Samuel, AB 9 [1984], 493-94) further emends the text so that Igal son of Nathan is described as “the commander of the army of the Hagrites.” See also HAGRITE.

Hagrite hag'rit (הַגְּרִי H2058, possibly “wanderer” or “descendant of Hagar”; pl. הַגְּרִיִּים in 1 Chr. 5:10, 19-20, but הַגְּרִי in Ps. 83:6). The name of an ARABIAN tribe living in the region E of GILEAD (some think the tribe may have been Aramean; see ARAM). In the time of King SAUL, the Israelites twice inflicted a crushing defeat upon them in war and seized their lands (1 Chr. 5:10, 19-22; KJV, “Hagarites”). DAVID appointed Jaziz the Hagrite to look after his flocks (1 Chr. 27:30-31; KJV, “Hagerite”). A psalm of ASAPH makes mention of them along with MOAB, EDOM, and the ISHMAELITES, all of whom were enemies of Israel living in TRANSJORDAN (Ps. 83:6; KJV, “Hagarenes”). The ethnological relationship of the Hagrites with HAGAR (Gen. 16) is uncertain. The Hagrites and other Arab tribes are mentioned in an inscription of TIGLATH-PILESER III (745-727 B.C.). (See further I. Eph'al, The Ancient Arabs: Nomads on the Borders of the Fertile Crescent, 9th-5th Centuries B.C. [1982], 61 et passim; N. Naaman in *VT*38 [1988]: 71-79.)

Hahiroth. See PI HAHIROTH.

Hai hi. KJV alternate form of AI (only Gen. 12:8; 13:3).

hail, hailstones. Hail is frozen raindrops, though hailstones are often much larger than any single raindrop, sometimes reaching three or four inches in diameter and a pound or more in weight. It usually falls in the spring or summer during severe thunderstorms, when raindrops are carried upward by rising air currents and freeze in the cooling air. When the hailstones fall, they often cohere, forming solid masses, which can do great damage to crops and even endanger life.

Hailstones are not common in PALESTINE, but they are not unusual and can be very severe. Occasionally they take place in EGYPT. Hail is often mentioned in the Bible, and always as an instrument of God’s judgment. A severe hail (Heb. bārād H1352) was the seventh plague in Egypt (Exod. 9:18-34). It probably took place at the beginning of February, when the flax was in bloom and the barley in the ear (v. 31). Wheat, which does not ripen until about a month later, escaped (v. 32), to become later the prey of the locusts (Exod. 10:12-15). The AMORITES were smitten by hailstones at BETH HORON, so that more died from the hailstones than were smitten with the sword by the Israelites (Josh. 10:11). The Scriptures often speak of hail as a means of punishing the wicked (Isa. 28:2, 17) and as a symbol of God’s anger, both in the OT (Ezek. 38:22; Hag. 2:17) and in the NT (Gk. chalaza G5898, Rev. 8:7; 11:19; 16:21).

hair. Although all mammals have hair (e.g., goats, 1 Sam. 19:13; camels, Mk. 1:6), the term is usually applied to human beings (Heb. śē'ār H8552 or śa'ārā H8553; Gk. thrix G2582). The ancients usually wore the hair long, although priests, warriors, and young boys often were shaved. Boys left a side lock. Recall the long hair of SAMSON and ABSALOM. Because the hair was shaved in an initiation to a divinity in ARABIA, the cutting of hair was an abomination to the Jews (Jer. 49:32). The NAZIRITE knew that the whole body, including the hair, belonged to God, so a razor never touched his skin until his service was ended (Num. 6:18; Jdg. 16:17). Captive women shaved their heads for purification, as did the lepers (Lev. 14:8). Priests kept their hair at a moderate length (Ezek. 44:20), but were forbidden to make tonsures (Lev. 21:5).

BALDNESS, except in leprosy, was not derided (Lev. 13:40) unless it was given as a curse (Isa. 3:24). Since the head held the spirit, the hair was not to be cut in times of danger, for it was considered the source of strength. By NT times, long hair was thought to be degrading to a man, but to a woman it was a source of pride (1 Cor. 11:14). Mary wiped the Lord's feet with her hair. In the SONG OF SOLOMON the hair is the veil (Cant. 4:3). Loss of hair to a woman was shameful (1 Cor. 11:6). Women were warned against elaborate hair dressing (1 Pet. 3:3).

The braided hair (a wig) on the mummy of Nedjmet, an Egyptian queen of 11th cent. B.C.

An assurance of safety was Jesus' word that the hairs of the head are numbered (Matt. 10:30). DAVID felt his sins were more than the hairs of his head (Ps. 40:12). Gray hair was honored and gained in a righteous life (Prov. 20:29; Heb. śēbâ H8484), while white hair meant a glorious presence as of Christ himself (Rev. 1:14). Hair seldom was dyed in Palestine, but HEROD is said to have dyed his black (Jos. Ant. 16.8.1 §233). Hair standing up is a sign of fear (Job 4:15) caused by the contraction of small muscles attached obliquely to each hair. Tearing or pulling out hair expressed deep sorrow (Isa. 15:2) or mourning for the dead, and putting ashes on the head showed shame and grief, like TAMAR'S desecration (2 Sam. 13:19). Anointing the head was a sign of joy (Ps. 23:5) and prosperity, but only the purest could be anointed with the sacred oil (Exod. 30:32). Good marksmen could "sling a stone at a hair and not miss" (Jdg. 20:16).

Hakeldamah huh-kel'duh-muh. See AKELDAMA.

Hakilah huh-ki'uh (חִכִּילָה H2677). A hill in the wilderness of Judah, S of JESHIMON, where the strongholds of HORESH were located; there DAVID took refuge when SAUL pursued him (1 Sam. 23:19; 26:1). Saul pitched his camp on the hill (26:3). It is described as being within the wilderness of ZIPH (23:19), which is a few miles SE of HEBRON. The site has not been identified.

S. BARABAS

Hakkatan hak'uh-tan (חַקְטָן H2214, “the little one”). Father of Johanan and descendant of Azgad; Johanan was one of the family heads who returned to Jerusalem with EZRA (Ezra 8:12; 1 Esd. 8:38 [KJV, “Acatan”]). According to some, the phrase yôhāān ben-haqqātān should be rendered “Johanan the younger.”

Hakkore. See EN HAKKORE.

Hakkoz hak'oz (חַקִּיז H2212, “the thorn”). KJV Koz (except in 1 Chr. 24:10). The head of a priestly family at the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 24:10). His descendants returned from the Babylonian captivity, but could not serve because they were unable to document their claim to priestly rank (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63; 1 Esd. 5:38 [KJV, “Accoz”]). One of his descendants, MEREMOTH, was involved in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:4, 21).

S. BARABAS

Hakmoni hak'moh-ni. TNIV form of HACMONI.

Hakupha huh-kyoo'fuh (חַקִּיפָא H2979, “crooked”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from exile with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53; 1 Esd. 5:31 [KJV, “Acipha”]).

Halachah. See HALAKAH.

Halah hay'luh (חֲלָה H2712). One of the places to which kings of ASSYRIA deported Israelites on the capture of SAMARIA (2 Ki. 17:6; 18:11; 1 Chr. 5:26). Halah was apparently on the way to GOZAN, but its location is uncertain. Among various proposals, one that has gained favor is Ḥalahḥu, the name of a town and a district NE of NINEVEH (cf. ABD, 3:25). The name Halah occurs also as a conjecture in the NRSV (Obad. 20, where MT haḥēl-hazzeh, “this company,” is emended to ḥālah zeh).

Halak, Mount hay'lak (חֲלָק H2748, “smooth” or “bare”). A mountain in the NEGEV described as rising toward SEIR; it formed the southern limit of the conquests of JOSHUA (Josh. 11:17; 12:7). Many scholars identify it with Jebel Halaq, on the NW side of the Wadi Marra, and some 28 mi. SE of BEERSHEBA.

Halakah hah'lah-kah' (חֻלְקָה, “walk, practice, ruling, law,” from חָלַק H2143, “to go, walk, behave”). Also Halacha(h), Halakhah; pl. halakot(h), halakhot(h). This term in rabbinic studies can refer either to a specific legal ruling (in which case the word is usually lowercased) or to the general literary category of legal material, contrasted with HAGGADAH. The concept thus encompasses all the laws, ordinances, and legal decisions of the rabbis that determined the Jewish way of life—religious, social, political, and civil. It was believed by the PHARISEES and their followers that God had given to MOSES on Mount SINAI not only the written law that was embodied in the PENTATEUCH, but also a large mass of oral law which he communicated to the Jewish people and which the rabbis passed on until it was written down in the MISHNAH. See also MIDRASH.

The object of the Halakah, which involved the interpretation and the reinterpretation of the Mosaic law through a long succession of Jewish teachers from the time of EZRA onward, was to state in detail and to apply to all possible cases the principles laid down in the TORAH, and to surround it with a hedge so as to prevent transgression (cf. m. 'Abot 1.1). These authoritative legal rulings were ostensibly the result of biblical exegesis, though some scholars argue that the Halakah developed more or less independently of Scripture and that proof texts were added subsequently to justify the decisions. The importance given to the oral law ("the tradition of the elders") had the tendency of pushing into the background Scripture itself, and it is not surprising that Jesus denounced its excesses (Mk. 7:1-13). (See G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim, 3 vols. [1927-30], 1:135-60; S. Safrai in The Literature of the Sages: First Part, ed. S. half-shekel tax. The RSV rendering of didrachmon Gl440 (Matt. 17:24; NIV, "two-drachma tax"). See DIDRACHMA.

half-tribe of Manasseh. The part of Manasseh that settled in GILEAD and BASHAN E of the Jordan (Deut. 3:13 et al.). See MANASSEH, TRIBE OF. Like the tribes of REUBEN and GAD, the half-tribe of Manasseh was obliged to help the main body of the Hebrews in the conquest of Palestine (Josh. 1:12-18). Its clans included the descendants of MAKIR (Num. 32:39-40), who is referred to as "the ancestor of the Gileadites" (Josh. 17:1; lit., "the father of Gilead"), and the descendants of the Judahite HEZRON, who married the daughter of Makir (1 Chr. 2:21-23). The history of the half-tribe closed when they were led into captivity by TIGLATH-PILESER of Assyria (2 Ki. 15:29; 1 Chr. 5:26).

Tribe of Manasseh.

Halhul hal'huhl (חַלְחֻלִּי H2713, derivation uncertain). A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH, listed first in a district of six towns (Josh. 15:58). It is identified with modern Ḥalḥul, 4 mi. N of HEBRON.

Hali hay'li (חָלִי H2718, “adornment”). A town in the tribal territory of ASHER, listed between HELKATH and BETEN (Josh. 19:25). The site is now identified with Khirbet Ras Ḥali (or a location nearby), some 11 mi. SSE of Acco.

Halicamassus hal'uh-kahr-nas'uhs (Ἀλικαρνασσός). City and trading center on the coast of CARIA, in SW ASIA MINOR, opposite the island of Cos. Situated on the Ceramic Gulf astride a magnificent, natural harbor that extended on each side to fortified promontories, the city early gained great commercial importance. The surrounding country was unusually fertile and noted for its abundant olive, fig, and almond orchards.

The city was founded by Dorian colonists, but it was excluded from the confederacy of Carian states because of an ancient dispute, according to HERODOTUS (Hist. 1.144). It was conquered by the Persians, who allowed the city semi-autonomous rule. Because it sided with the Persians, ALEXANDER THE GREAT burned the city after a long siege, a catastrophe from which it never fully recovered. It was renowned as the birthplace of the historians Herodotus and Dionysius, and as the site of King Mausoleus's tomb, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world (from it the word mausoleum is derived).

Halicarnassus was one of the free cities to which the Romans sent letters in 139 B.C., proclaiming the friendship of Rome for the Jews and defending their rights (1 Macc. 15:23). According to JOSEPHUS (Ant. 14.10.23), the people of the city passed an ordinance in the 1st cent. B.C. that Jewish men and women should be allowed to build prayer chapels by the sea, as was their custom, to observe the SABBATH, and to perform their sacred rites. (See C. T. Newton, Travels and hall. This English term is used variously in Bible translations to render several words. For example, Samuel is said to have “brought Saul and his servant into the hall” (Heb. lîâska H4384, 1 Sam. 9:22; KJV, “parlor”) and given him a place at the head of about thirty persons who had been invited. The nature of this room is not defined, but the Hebrew word here is also used in the OT for a chamber connected with a sanctuary (1 Chr. 9:26; 23:28; Jer. 35:2, 4; Ezek. 40:17, 38, 44-46; et al.; also for a scribe’s room in the royal palace, Jer. 36:12, 20-21). It was evidently a place where worshipers ate sacrificial meals; benches would be placed on three of the walls, while the fourth opened to a courtyard.

Among the buildings SOLOMON erected after the completion of the TEMPLE was “the Hall of Pillars” (NRSV for ’ûlām hā’ammûdîm, 1 Ki. 7:6; NIV, “a colonnade”), the purpose of which is not stated. Apparently, one went through it to reach “the throne hall, the Hall of Justice” (NIV for the phrases ’ûlām hakkissê and ulām hammišpāt, v. 7; KJV, “a porch for the throne... even the porch of judgment”), where Solomon sat in judgment on cases brought before him. His own palace was “set farther back” and “was similar in design” (v. 8). The exact position of these various buildings relative to each other is a matter of dispute. (See D. Ussischkin in BA 36 [1973]: 78-105.)

The royal palace in SUSA, the winter capital of the Persian kings, included a structure called “the king’s hall” (Esth. 5:1; however, the Heb. is bêt hammelek, “the house of the king,” which is rendered “the king’s palace” earlier in the same verse). In an inscription in which DARIUS the Great tells about the building of this palace, he recorded that wood was brought from Lebanon, Gandhara, and Carmania; gold from Sardis and Bactria; lapis lazuli and carnelian from Sogdiana; turquoise from Chorasmia; silver and ebony from Egypt; ivory from Ethiopia, Sind, and Arachosia; ornamentation for the walls from Ionia; and stone columns from Elam. Stonecutters came from Ionia and Sardis, goldsmiths from Media and Egypt, carpenters from Sardis and Egypt, brickmakers from Babylon, and wall decorators from Media and Egypt. The walls were decorated with panels of beautifully colored glazed bricks, many of the designs being executed in relief. The king's audience hall, in which King XERXES met ESTHER, was a huge room 193 ft. square, with 36 pillars supporting the roof. (See A.T. Olmstead, History of the Persian Empire [1948], 166—71.)

The banquet hall (Aram. bêt mišiěyā', Dan. 5:10) where King BELSHAZZAR saw the handwriting on the wall was in BABYLON, which for centuries was one of the great cities of antiquity. HERODOTUS, who visited the city after its conquest by CYRUS, describes it as a great square 42 mi. in circuit, surrounded by a rampart 300 ft. high and 75 ft. broad with 100 gates of brass. Its famous hanging gardens were regarded by ancients as one of the seven wonders of the world. The city had three royal palaces, the largest of which contained the throne room (Herodotus, Hist. 1.178-83; cf. also the descriptions by Diodorus Siculus, Bibl. Hist. 2.7, 9-10; Strabo, Geogr. 16.1.2, 5; Q. Curtius Rufus, Hist. of Alexander, 5.1).

The author of the Acts of the Apostles says that when Jews in EPHESUS rejected and opposed PAUL'S message, he left the synagogue where he had been teaching for three months and went to the "lecture hall" of TYRANNUS, where the apostle taught daily for two years (Acts 19:9; Gk. scholē G5391, KJV, "school"). This hall was probably a part of some GYMNASIUM, which normally included not only areas for exercise and sports, but also gardens and halls that were made use of by teachers, poets, and philosophers for giving recitations and lectures. Ephesus had at least five such gymnasiums. By some arrangement Paul obtained the use of the hall and taught there every day from late morning until the end of the afternoon.

Other relevant Greek terms include gamos G1141, "wedding" (rendered "wedding hall" in Matt. 22:10), aulē G885, "courtyard" (Mk. 15:16 et al.; KJV, "hall," identified as the PRAETORIUM), and akroatērion G211, "place of hearing, auditorium" (Acts 25:23; NRSV, "audience hall"). The last reference may indicate a room used for various purposes and apparently served as a "hall of justice." It was located in the palace that HEROD the Great had built in CAESAREA; the Roman governors used it as their headquarters in Palestine. (See also J. Finegan, Light From the Ancient Past [1959], 224, 242-44.)

S. BARABAS

Hallel hal'el (הלל, from הלל H2146, piel, "to praise"). Rabbinic term for several groups of psalms of praise. The expression Great Hallel usually denotes Ps. 136, though it can refer to Pss. 120-136. "Hallel" can be applied also to Pss. 146-148, but the most significant group is the Egyptian Hallel, Pss. 113-118. These psalms were recited in Jewish homes during the course of the PASSOVER observance and in public temple and synagogue services for the FEASTS of Unleavened Bread, Pentecost, Tabernacles, and Dedication. As an expression of joy, it was most appropriate for the great joyful feasts listed above. Modern Judaism has several musical settings for this Hallel. It doubtless played its customary role in the Lord's last Passover observance with his disciples, and the hymn with which the meal ended was probably either the last part of the Egyptian Hallel (Pss. 115-118) or the Great Hallel (Ps. 136). (See A. Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah [1886], 1:230, 2:159, 533; EncJud, 7:1198-99.)

hallelujah hal'uh-loo'yuh (הללה [from הלל H2146, piel, “to praise”] and יה H3363 [short form of Yahweh]; ἀλληλουία G252). A Hebrew expression that is invariably translated “Praise the LORD”; the corresponding Greek term in the NT is transliterated “hallelujah” (KJV, “alleluia”). In the OT text, the expression consists of two words, often hyphenated but never joined as one word. It may be that the Jews became accustomed to considering it a compound, even though it was never written as such. When it was borrowed by Greek and other languages, however, it was treated as one word. Hallelujah, like AMEN, has practically become a universal word. It is an acclamation of PRAISE of the highest order, praising God in man’s most elegant expression in reverence, awe, and humility. Its use is limited altogether to songs of praise, appearing only in Psalms and Revelation.

Hallelujah functions as a liturgical interjection and an exclamation. As such, it is not grammatically connected with accompanying sentences, but it has vital spiritual and worshipful connections where found. Its common use was as a call to praise God at the beginning of songs and as a shout of spiritual exultation at the end. Some scholars point out that in occasional instances where it appears at the end of a Psalm, it properly belongs at the beginning of the following Psalm (see Ps. 104 and 117). In one instance, the hallelujah follows the DOXOLOGY when it logically should precede it (Ps. 106).

The expression is used sparingly in the OT, occurring only twenty-four times, and that only in the Psalms. In the Hebrew mind it probably held a certain sacred distinctiveness that restricted its frequent use. It is strictly a religious term and consequently limited to personal and congregational worship. The most prominent use of “Praise the LORD” was in the major Hebrew FEASTS, Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. Psalms 105 and 106, now comprising a pair, were composed for use at one of these festivals, and at some time in their history acquired the ritual shout, “Hallelujah,” employed both at the beginning and end. (Note the rearrangement suggested earlier.)

One group of psalms constitute, in Jewish liturgical tradition, the so-called Egyptian HALLEL (Pss. 113-118). These were sung not only at the three major festivals, but also at the feast of DEDICATION. At the PASSOVER, Pss. 113 and 114 were sung before the meal, and 115-118 were sung afterward (thus prob. by Jesus and his disciples at the Last Supper, Matt. 26:30). These are all “Hallelujah” hymns, with the call to “Praise the LORD” obviously intended for the beginning. It is an appropriate and effective summons to WORSHIP. During the reigns of DAVID and SOLOMON, pilgrimages to Jerusalem for celebrating the great festivals were significant national events. Anyone who has attended a mass rendition of the “Hallelujah Chorus” may visualize the ancient Hebrew songs of praise at these great feasts. All five psalms concluding the Psalter (Pss. 146-150) begin and end with “Hallelujah.”

This exclamation was not limited to congregational use, however, but found expression also in personal praise. In Ps. 111:1 the soloist sang, “Praise the LORD. / I will extol the LORD with all my heart / in the council of the upright and in the assembly.” Note also Ps. 146:1-2: “Praise the LORD. / Praise the LORD, O my soul. / I will praise the LORD all my life; / I will sing praise to my God as long as I live.” In this passage, only the first instance of “Praise the LORD” translates Hebrew halēlû-yāh (the second instance reads, halēlî napšî 'et-yhwh). The liturgical interjection apparently retained its distinctiveness even here. Moreover, the great psalmists dared to use it personally when their hearts overflowed with thanksgiving and consequent praise to the Lord.

In the NT, “hallelujah” appears four times, all in one chapter (Rev. 19:1, 3, 4, 6). As the Hebrew Psalter closes with God’s chosen people singing “hallelujah,” so also the NT closes with God's redeemed in heaven singing "hallelujah." John heard in the heavenly choir "what sounded like a great multitude, like the roar of rushing waters and like loud peals of thunder, shouting: 'Hallelujah!' For our Lord God Almighty reigns" (v. 6).

G. B. FUNDERBURK

Hallohesh huh-loh'hesh (הלוחש H2135, "the whisperer"). Father of SHALLUM; the latter was "ruler of a half-district of Jerusalem" in the time of NEHEMIAH and repaired a section of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:12; KJV, "Halohesh"). This Hallohesh is probably the same man listed among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (10:24).

hallow. To render or treat as holy, to sanctify or consecrate. This English term is used over thirty times in the KJV but is less common in modern versions. It occurs seven times in the NRSV, while the NIV uses it only in the context of the LORD'S PRAYER (Matt. 6:9; Lk. 11:1). See CONSECRATION; DEDICATE; HOLINESS; SANCTIFICATION.

Halohesh. KJV form of HALLOHESH.

Ham (person) ham (חם H2769, possibly "warm, hot"). Also Cham (some older English versions). Second son of NOAH and brother of SHEM and JAPHETH (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18, 22; 10:1, 6, 20; 1 Chr. 1:4, 8). Ham had four sons, CUSH, MIZRAIM (Egypt), PUT, and CANAAN (Gen. 10:6). His descendants were spread abroad in many lands. From him and his brothers came all the nations of the earth. In the Table of NATIONS (Gen. 10:6-10), Ham is mentioned as the ancestor of the Egyptians and of the peoples who were under the control of EGYPT in NE Africa, ARABIA, and CANAAN (with the exception of NIMROD). His name serves also as the patronymic of his descendants (Pss. 78:51; 105:23, 27; 106:22; possibly also 1 Chr. 4:40 [NIV, "Hamites," supplied also in v. 41], but this reference may allude to an otherwise unknown place). The term Hamitic was commonly used in the past to designate a group of languages in N Africa, including Egyptian, that are related to the Semitic languages (the label Hamito-Semitic is seldom used today by scholars, who prefer the term Afroasiatic; See LANGUAGES OF THE ANE I.B).

After the flood Noah became intoxicated, and he lay in a drunken stupor in his tent. Ham entered the tent and then told his brothers what he had seen. Shem and Japheth took a robe and walking backward into the tent, so as not to look upon their father's nakedness, let it fall across their father to cover him. When Noah awoke from his stupor and learned what had happened to him and what his son Ham had done, he cursed Ham's son Canaan and said that his descendants would be the slaves of the descendants of Shem and Japheth. The story does not make clear why Noah should curse Canaan. Various explanations have been given, one of the most likely being that Canaan had done something not mentioned in the story that deserved cursing.

Ham (place) ham (חם H2154). The name of a city whose inhabitants, the ZUZITES, were subdued by KEDORLAOMER and his allies in the time of ABRAHAM (Gen. 14:5). The site is usually identified with modern Tell Ham in N Jordan, about 3 mi. SSW of Irbid (BETH ARBEL).

Haman hay'muhn (המן H2172, possibly from Old Pers. hamanā, "illustrious," or humayun, "the great"). KJV Apoc., Aman. Son of Hammedatha and prime minister of PERSIA under XERXES (Esth. 3:1 et al.). He is also called the AGAGITE, a name that links him with the king of the Amalekites that SAUL was told to destroy (1 Sam. 15). Haman became the bitter enemy of MORDECAI, the uncle of ESTHER, because Mordecai, being a Jew, would not prostrate himself before him like the other subjects of the king (Esth. 3:2). He therefore determined in revenge not only to kill Mordecai but also to exterminate all the Jews in the Persian empire, and received from Xerxes a decree to do this (3:8-9). When Mordecai heard of this plot, he urged Esther, who was the queen of Xerxes, to intercede in behalf of her people (ch. 4). At a banquet to which she invited the king and Haman, Esther exposed Haman's purpose to slaughter her people. The king left the room in a rage and Haman threw himself on the queen's couch to beg for his life. Xerxes returned and, thinking that Haman was assaulting Esther, ordered his execution on the very gallows Haman had prepared for Mordecai (ch. 7). The Feast of PURIM celebrates the deliverance of the Jews from Haman's plot to kill them. (See T. C. Thornton in JTS 37 [1986]: 419-26.)

Hamath hay'math (חמַתַּי H2828, possibly "fortress"; gentilic חמַתִּי H2833, "Hamathite"). KJV also Hemath (1 Chr. 13:5; Amos 6:14). A city of SYRIA (ARAM) c. 120 mi. N of DAMASCUS. Built on both banks of the ORONTES River, Hamath was surrounded by hills and had a warm and humid climate. The city was founded in the Neolithic period and destroyed c. 1750 B.C., probably by the HYKSOS, although there are no findings from the Hyksos period. THUTMOSE III (1502-1448) conquered the city, and during the time of Egyptian control of Syria the city prospered. Sometime before 900 B.C. it became the HITTITE capital of a small kingdom; many Hittite inscriptions have been found.

SHALMANESER III (c. 860-825 B.C.) invaded the Hittite country as far as the Mediterranean. To resist him, a league that included DAMASCUS, Israel, Hamath, and twelve kings of the coast was formed. A battle was fought at Qarqar in 854 B.C., but it must have ended indecisively, since both sides claimed the victory. Three years later Shalmaneser III was again stopped by the league, but in the eleventh year of his reign he plundered many towns of the kingdom of Hamath, although he was stopped again. He returned in the fourteenth year of his reign, and this time he conquered and broke the power of the league.

TIGLATH-PILESER III (745-727 B.C.) conquered Hamath and compelled it to pay tribute. SARGON II conquered and destroyed the city in 720 B.C. He transported peoples from a number of different territories in his kingdom, including Hamath, and settled them in the cities of SAMARIA, replacing the Israelites he had taken into captivity. These people brought with them their pagan gods (2 Ki. 17:24, 30). Among the places to which he transported Israelites was Hamath (Isa. 11:11). After Sargon's time the city seems to have become subordinate to Damascus (Jer. 49:23). There are a number of references in the OT to the Assyrian conquest of Hamath (2 Ki. 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 10:9; 36:19; 37:13; Amos 6:2). Amos calls the city Hamath the Great (Amos 6:2).

The Babylonian Chronicle records that at Hamath NEBUCHADNEZZAR overtook the Egyptians fleeing from CARCHEMISH (605 B.C.). Jeremiah and Zechariah declared that the city was doomed (Jer. 49:23; Zech. 9:2); these prophets classed the city with Arpad, Damascus, Tyre, and Sidon. Ezekiel prophesied that the land of Israel would some day extend N to Hamath (Ezek. 47:16, 17; 48:1). Later, during the Seleucid period, ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes renamed the city Epiphania (Jos. Ant. 1.6.2). Jonathan MACCABEE met the army of DEMETRIUS in the region of Hamath (1 Macc. 12:25; KJV, "Amathis").

The modern city of Hama (Ḥamah), with a population of about 65,000, is built around the tell of the ancient city. Harald Ingholt conducted excavations at Hamath in 1931-38. He discovered twelve strata of occupation from the Arabic period down to the Neolithic stratum (Rapport préliminaire sur sept campagnes de fouilles à Hama en Syrie (1932-38) [1940]; updates in ABD, 3:33-36; NEAEHL, 2:561-62). See also HAMATH ZOBAB; LEBO HAMATH.

Hamath, entrance of. This (or a similar) expression is used by some Bible versions to render Hebrew lēbō' ḥāmāt H4217, which is better regarded as a place name, LEBO HAMATH (Num. 13:21 et al.).

Hamathite hay'muh-thit (חַמְתִּי H2833). The Hamathites are listed as a nation descended from CANAAN (Gen. 10:18; 1 Chr. 1:16). Presumably, they were early settlers of the city of HAMATH. See also NATIONS II.A.

Hamath Zobah hay'math-zoh'buh (צֹבָה nan H2832, possibly “fortress of Zobah”). A city conquered by SOLOMON, apparently near TADMOR in the region of HAMATH (2 Chr. 8:3). Some have identified Hamath Zobah with the city of Hamath itself, while others have conjectured that it is a different city also called Hamath, but situated in the territory of ZOBAB, an Aramean kingdom (see ARAM) that Assyrian records say reached as far as the EUPHRATES and in the 10th cent. was a threat to ASSYRIA. It is also possible that the double name simply indicates the extent of Solomon's conquests, that is, the combined regions of Hamath and Zobah. Finally, some have thought that the Hebrew text is corrupt (CODEX VATICANUS reads Bai Zōba, reflecting the name Beth Zobah, otherwise unknown).

Hammath (person) ham'ath (חַמַּת H2830, possibly “hot [spring]”). A man included in the genealogy of CALEB and described as the father of the house of RECAP; he was the ancestor of the KENITES

Hammath and Hamath.

(1 Chr. 2:55; KJV, “Hemath”). Some scholars connect, or even identify, Hammath with the city of the same name; see HAMMATH (PLACE). Others interpret the word as a common noun (cf. ḥām H2767, “father-in-law”) and understand the verse to say that the Kenites were related by marriage to the ancestor of the Recabites (see NEB).

Hammath (place) ham’ath (חַמַּתִּי H2829, “hot [spring]”). A fortified city in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:35). It is probably the same as HAMMON #2 (1 Chr. 6:76) and HAMMOTH DOR (Josh. 21:32). When JOSEPHUS mentions that HEROD Antipas built the city of TIBERIAS, he adds, “There is a hot spring not far from it in a village called Ammathus [Ammathous]” (Ant. 18.2.3 §36; cf. War 4.1.3 §11). Hammath is generally identified with the modern Ḥammam Tabariyeh, famous for its hot baths, c. 2 mi. S of Tiberias on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee. Archaeological work, however, has uncovered remains dating back only to the Roman period. (See M. Dothan, Hammath Tiberias, 2 vols. [1983-2000]; NEAEHL, 2:573-77. For a discussion of the “double list” of Levitical cities, see Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 116, 301-5).

Hammedatha ham’uh-day’thuh (חַמְדָּתָא H2158, possibly from Pers. amadāta, “strongly made,” or haomadāta, “given by [the deity] Hama” [ABD, 3:38]). The father of HAMAN, who was the chief minister of XERXES and a bitter enemy of the Jews (Esth. 3:1, 10; 8:5; 9:10, 24; KJV Apoc., “Adamatha” and “Adamathus,” Add. Esth. 12:6; 16:10, 17).

Hammelech ham’uh-lek. The KJV rendering of hammelek in two passages (Jer. 36:26; 38:6). Modern versions translate it correctly as “the king”; however, the designation “son of the king” apparently refers to a minor royal official with police duties (see R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel [1961], 119-20).

hammer. ANE craftsmen had available for use a wide variety of specialized hammers suited for different purposes. Hammer marks on building stones and other evidences indicate that the type of hammers available in the ancient world corresponded roughly to the types still used in the Near E today. The Hebrew term maqquebet H5216 refers to a relatively small tool used for driving nails and pegs (Jdg. 4:21; cf. also hal#277; mût H2153, 5:26), dressing surfaces of building stone (1 Ki. 6:7), and decorating wooden idols (Jer. 10:4; metal idols, Isa. 44:12). Another term, paṭṭîš H7079, is once used for the large sledge hammer used to crack boulders (Jer. 23:29) and once for a blacksmith’s hammer (Isa. 41:7); it is also used figuratively of Babylon’s earthshaking role as the “hammer of the whole earth” (Jer. 50:23).

A. BOWLING

Hammolecheth. See HAMMOLEKETH.

Hammoleketh ha-mol’uh-keth (חַמְלֶכֶת H2168, “the queen”). Also Hammolecheth. Daughter of MAKIR by his wife MAACAH and granddaughter of MANASSEH; she is described as the sister of GILEAD and as having given birth to three children (1 Chr. 7:18). A few scholars, however, have thought that the text refers to her rather as the sister of Manasseh. It has also been suggested that the word is not a proper name but a description of her role as a person of authority (“she who reigns”). Neither of these views has gained favor.

Hammon ham’uhn (חַמּוֹן H2785, possibly “hot [spring]”). (1) A town included in the boundary description of the tribe of ASHER (Josh. 19:28). The location of Hammon has been debated, but most scholars identify it with modern Khirbet Umm el-ʿAwamid in Lebanon, near Ras en-Naqurah and about 14.5 mi. NNE of Acco.

(2) A Levitical town in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI; it was assigned to the Levites descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:76). This Hammon is generally identified with Hammath (Josh. 19:35) and Hammoth Dor (21:32), on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee. See further HAMMATH (PLACE).

Hammoth Dor ham’uhth-dor’ (חַמּוֹת דּוֹר H2831, “hot [spring] of Dor”). A Levitical town in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI; it was assigned to the Levites descended from GERSHON (Josh. 21:32). Hammoth Dor is probably an alternate name for Hammath (Josh. 19:35) and Hammon (1 Chr. 6:76), on the W shore of the Sea of Galilee. See further HAMMATH (PLACE).

Hammuel ham’yoo-uhl (חַמוּאֵל H2781, perhaps “god of Ham” or “Hammu is God” or “God protects”). KJV Hamuel. Son of Mishma and descendant of SIMEON through Shaul (1 Chr. 4:26).

Hammurabi ham’uh-rah’bee (Akk. ḫammu, from Amorite ʿAmmu [“Sun” or “kinsman” or “nation”] + rabi [“great, vast”] or rapi [“healing”]; possible meanings are “[the god] Hammu is great,” “vast nation,” “the [divine] kinsman heals”). Also Hammurapi. This name was borne by two kings of ALEPPO in the 18th and 17th cent. B.C. (cf. the list in CANE, 2:1202) and by other individuals, but special importance attaches to the sixth king of the first dynasty of BABYLON, who is the subject of the present article. (Hammurabi is not mentioned in the Bible, although some have thought that he should be identified with AMRAPHEL, Gen. 14:1, 9.)

I. Political events. Hammurabi was son and successor of Sin-muballit and father of Samsuiluna. The widely accepted date for his reign is 1792-1750 B.C. (suggested alternatives include 1728-1686 [W. F. Albright] and 1642-1626 [A. Goetze]). He inherited a small kingdom centered on Babylon itself. According to the date-formulae of documents from his time and his own account of events given in the prologue to his laws, he captured the cities of Uruk and Isin in his seventh year, destroyed Malgum, warred against Emutbal, and attacked Rapiqum. The same sources state that between his 11th and 30th regnal years he was preoccupied mainly with local affairs and the rebuilding of religious shrines, despite an uneasy truce with the neighboring city-states of Assyria and Eshnunna.

The lively correspondence from this period found at MARI throws interesting light on the relative powers and is based on information from ambassadors at the court of Babylon. An emissary of Zimri-Lim, king of Mari, wrote him saying, "There is no king who is strong by himself. Ten to fifteen kings follow Hammurabi, the governor of Babylon, a like number Rim-Sin of Larsa, a like number Ibalpiel of Eshnunna, a like number Amutpiel of Qatana, and twenty follow Yarimlim of Yamhad." In his 29th year Hammurabi won an outstanding victory over a coalition holding the E of the River TIGRIS, and the way was open for the attack, made two years later, against his old rival Rim-Sin, king of Larsa and Emutbal, to gain control of the southern cities. The balance of power was now drastically changed.

ASSYRIA was soon subdued, and in this 38th year the Babylonians crushed Eshnunna by inundation due to diverted waterways. The next year his forces marched against the desert peoples to the NW and rendered the great city of Mari, about 250 mi. from Babylon, impotent by the destruction of its walls. This was to prove the northernmost limit of Babylonian conquest at this time. The period till his death in his 43rd year of reign was much occupied with resettling his new frontiers. An abundance of administrative letters and contracts reveal something of the strong character of this king, who was engaged in personal control of matters of war, diplomacy, and business, yet fond of good food, hunting, and fine buildings.

II. Economic conditions. At this time numerous contracts attest the increase in private trading, though the palace (state) played a dominant part in external dealings. The hold over the economy formally exercised by the temple was weakened by the use of manpower in cooperative projects such as harvesting and irrigation; and by royal decree fixing the prices of staple commodities, power centered in the person of the king. Access to his presence was freely accorded, and out of the many decisions made there arose a collection of legal judgments commonly called the Laws of Hammurabi.

III. Lawgiver. An 8-ft. high diorite stela surmounted with a portrait of the king receiving a scepter and ring (symbols of justice and order) from the sun-god Shamash, the divine law-giver, was found in 1901 at SUSA. It had been taken there in 1160 B.C. by the Elamite Shutruk-nahhunte following a successful raid on Babylon. Fragments of other stelae and tablets bearing copies of the same text show that the monument once stood in the Esagil temple of MARDUK in Babylon with copies at other centers. The prologue tells how the king had received a divine call to "make justice to shine forth in the land, to destroy the evil and the wicked, that the strong might not oppress the weak...to give light to the land." (For an English translation of the text, see ANET, 163-80.)

The increasingly diverse elements within the empire required the clear definition of the rights of an individual. Manifold personal indebtedness and a large measure of dependence on slave labor provided both the reason and means of doing this. By stating the wages of agricultural and technical workers and by decreeing release from slavery or debt, the king could largely guide the whole life of the nation. This was done by a periodical decree of "righteousness" (mesharum). In his first full regnal year, as dated by one such decree, Hammurabi made a public pronouncement of the standard of law that would govern the religious and economic life of his peoples. This action has been compared with the so-called “reforms” by the Hebrew kings who, by restating allegiance to the law in the opening year of their rule, “did the right [yāšār] in the eyes of the LORD.” Hammurabi’s laws may well date from the beginning of his reign in part, but their final edition and compilation was undertaken toward the end of his reign, when he made a report to his god on his stewardship and exercise of “wisdom.”

Two hundred eighty-two paragraphs or judgments remain, phrased in the form of a summary of the evidence followed by the brief decision. It was decided that “if a son has struck his father they shall cut off his hand” (§195). The laws are not comparable to a modern law code, the cases being grouped according to subject, though in only a few cases are they worded as general ordinances having universal application. Because of their specific reference to cases judged by the king, sometimes of an unusual nature (though background detail often is lacking to confirm this), the application of these laws rarely is reflected in the contemporary court cases or legal contracts. The latter were enacted before local judges or magistrates, some of whom sat at the city gate or “ward.”

Some of the cases are similar to those recorded by earlier rulers (e.g., Lipit-Ishtar of Isin, or Bilalama [?] of Eshnunna). A few bear close resemblance to Hebrew laws, though in general the Hammurabi statutes do not deal with religious affairs. Punishments included ordeal by immersion in the river, the LEX TALIONIS, fines, restitution by labor or in kind, and death. Penalties might vary according to the class of the offender, the Babylonians being at this time divided for this purpose into “freeman” (awēlum), “state-dependent” (muškenum), and “slave” (wardum). The laws may be analyzed as follows:

Various offenses and crimes (§§1—25). These include false witness (cf. Deut. 5:20; 19:16-19); a charge of sorcery (cf. Deut. 18:10; Exod. 22:18); action to be taken against a corrupt judge (cf. Exod. 23:6-9; Lev. 19:15; Deut. 16:18-19). The death penalty imposed for theft or receipt of stolen property from a temple or palace (§6) contrasts with the allowance of restoration in Exod. 22:1; Lev. 6:2. The penalty for dereliction (§7) is death or restoration of the stolen property thirtyfold or tenfold (according to the status of the accused), whereas the Hebrew equivalent law requires that restoration be twofold (Exod. 22:1-4, 7) and if necessary that the thief be sold (into slavery?) to provide the means of restitution. Kidnapping (§14) is punishable by death as in the Hebrew law (Exod. 21:16; Deut. 24:7). Death is prescribed also for the theft of fugitive slaves, robbery, and looting.

Property (§§26-99) is covered with special reference to crown-tenants, absconding fief-holders, and tenant farmers. Loans of money or seed against an anticipated crop, pledges, and distraint played a dominant part in a precarious agricultural existence. However, the man who planted trees was allowed four years for them to bear fruit before repaying capital (§60). Hebrew practice was similar, save that any firstfruits in the fourth year had to be dedicated to God (Lev. 19:23-25).

Commercial law (§§100-126) related to partnerships and agencies, as well as to sales and carriage of merchandise including liquor. Cases of deposit, distraint, and slavery figure prominently, for Hammurabi legislated for an urban community that subsisted on a large body of slave labor, and debtors were more severely treated than in the Hebrew pastoral groups (cf. Exod. 23:1).

Marriage (§§127-61) cases concerned the rights of both parties, dowry settlements, bridal gifts, divorce, and matrimonial offenses. Adultery with a married woman resulted in the death penalty for both parties (as Deut. 22:22); in the case of rape, the man was executed (as 22:25). Both the Babylonian (§131) and Hebrew (Num. 5:13-22) laws sentenced the adulterous wife to trial by ordeal. A husband captured abroad (§§133-35) had his marriage safeguarded, as was the intent of the Deuteronomic prohibition of military or merchant service in the first year of married life (Deut. 24:5). The common reference to concubinage (§§144-47) and protection for the girl against divorce or reduction to slavery, except for offenses against the first wife, throw light on patriarchal practices (Gen. 16:2, 4; 21:8-14). The Babylonian laws forbid a man to put away his sick wife (§148; some interpret Deut. 24:1 as allowing for divorce in these circumstances). Incest was treated with equal severity in both societies.

Children (§§162-77). The firstborn had special rights and portion (as Deut. 15:21).

Special cases concerning women and priestesses in cloisters (§§178-84), whose support was weakened by the increase in state and private ownership of land, reveal a situation applicable to N Babylonia only at this time.

Adoption (§§185-94) included the granting of “sonship” to apprentices and the legal force of oral depositions both to adopt and disown. Violence by an unruly son was met by cutting off the offending limb (cf. Exod. 21:15).

Assault and damage to persons and property (§§195-208). This section includes harm to pregnant women (Exod. 21:22-23), a surgeon’s liability in an eye operation, builders of faulty constructions, and hire of boats.

Agricultural work and offenses (§§241—67) includes a case requiring the owner of a goring ox to have been warned before further action can be taken (as in Exod. 21:28-32).

Rates and wages (§§268-77) for seasonal workers, craftsmen, hire of beasts, carts, and boats emphasize the divergences between the urban community for which these judgments were given and the conditions in early Israel.

An appendix concerning slaves (§§278—82) includes matters concerning their purchase and sale.

While similar judgments in both the Hebrew and Babylonian laws may arise from similar circumstances and a common ANE tradition, they should not be overstressed in the light of the overriding religious purpose and expression in the Hebrew legislation. Hamonah huh-moh’nuh (הַמֹּנָה H2164, “roaring” or “horde”). The name of a city in the symbolical valley of HAMON GOG, where the defeated armies of GOG will be buried (Ezek. 39:16). The Hebrew clause in the MT (wəgam šsem-îr hă’mônâ, lit., “and also the name of the city [is] Hamonah”) is problematic. The NRSV and other versions read šām H9004, “there,” instead of šem (construct of šēm H9005, “name”); the NIV apparently accepts the MT vocalization (“a town called Hamonah”) but then supplies the phrase “shall be there” to clarify the meaning (TNIV similarly, “near a town called Hamonah”). Some scholars emend the text by omitting the phrase altogether (see summary of views in ABD, 3:42).

Hamon Gog hay’-muhn-gog’ (הַמִּין גֹּג H2163, “horde of Gog”). The name of “the valley of those who travel east toward the Sea”; this place will be named Hamon Gog because there the forces of GOG will be destroyed and buried (Ezek. 39:11, 15). The valley is said to be “in Israel” and—if the NIV rendering “toward the Sea” is correct—probably located W of the Dead Sea (perhaps alluding to the ESDRAELON Valley). However, the NRSV translates, “the Valley of the Travelers [ hāōbĕrîm] east of the sea” (cf. also TNIV), which suggests a place in TRANSJORDAN (unless “the sea” refers to the Mediterranean). If so, the allusion may be to the ABARIM mountain range in MOAB. Given the symbolic nature of the passage, it is likely that the prophet does not intend a specific known site. See TRAVELERS, VALLEY OF.

Hamor hay’mor (חמור H2791, “[male] donkey”). The father of SHECHEM; he is called a HIVITE (Gen. 33:19; 34:2 et al.). When JACOB returned from PADDAN ARAM, he bought a piece of ground from the sons of Hamor (this plot of land would later become the burial place of JOSEPH, Josh. 24:32; regarding the apparent discrepancy in Acts 7:16 [KJV, “Emmor”], see MACHPELAH). DINAH, Jacob’s daughter, was violated by Shechem, and in revenge the sons of Jacob slew Hamor, Shechem, and all the males of the city (Gen. 34). During the period of the judges, the inhabitants of the city of Shechem were called “men of Hamor” (Jdg. 9:28); they suffered a severe defeat from ABIMELECH, a ruler of the Israelites.

Hamran ham’ran. See HEMDAN.

Hamuel. KJV form of HAMMUEL.

Hamul hay’muhl (חמול H2783, possibly “spared” or “pitied”; gentilic חמולי H2784, “Hamulite”). Son of PEREZ, grandson of JUDAH, and ancestral head of the Hamulite clan (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:21; 1 Chr. 2:5).

Hamutal huh-myoo’tuhl (חמוטל H2782, possibly “my father-in-law is dew [or protection]”; cf. ABITAL). The mother of JEHOAHAZ and ZEDEKIAH, kings of Judah; she was the daughter of a certain Jeremiah of Libnah and the wife of King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 23:31; 24:18; Jer. 52:1).

Hana hay’nuh. See HANAN.

Hanael han’ay-uhl. See ANAEL.

Hanameel huh-nam’ee-uhl. KJV form of HANAMEL.

Hanamel han’uh-mel (חנמיאל H2856, “God is gracious”). KJV Hanameel. Son of Shallum and cousin of JEREMIAH the prophet (Jer. 32:7-9). Hanamel owned a field in ANATHOTH, and when Jerusalem was besieged, he asked Jeremiah, as nearest relative, to buy it (cf. Lev. 25:25). God had forewarned Jeremiah about this request, so the prophet bought the field to show his confidence that “Houses, fields and vineyards will again be bought in this land” (Jer. 32:15).

Hanan hay’nuhn (חנן H2860, “[God or Yahweh] is gracious”; short form of ELHANAN, HANANEL, HANANIAH, or JOHANAN [cf. also BAAL-HANAN and BEN-HANAN]). (1) Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN; listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:23; cf.

v. 28). His genealogical connection is unclear.

(2) Son of Azel and descendant of King SAUL (1 Chr. 8:38; 9:44).

(3) Son of Maacah, included among DAVID'S mighty men (1 Chr. 11:43).

(4) Son of Igdaliah; Hanan is described as "the man of God" (although this epithet perhaps applies to Igdaliah), and his sons occupied a chamber in the temple into which JEREMIAH brought the family of the Recabites (Jer. 35:4; see RECAB). According to some scholars, the phrase "sons of Hanan" refers to a prophetic guild.

(5) Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned to Palestine after the EXILE (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:49; called "Hana" in 1 Esd. 5:30 NRSV [KJV, "Anan"]).

(6) A Levite who helped EZRA instruct the people in the law (Neh. 8:7); he is probably the Hanan listed among the Levites who sealed the covenant (10:10). Some believe he is also the same as #9 below.

(7-8) Two leaders of the people who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:22).

(9) Son of Zaccur; NEHEMIAH appointed him as assistant to those who were in charge of the temple storerooms (Neh. 13:13). See also #6 above.

S. BARABAS

Hananeel huh-nan'ee-uhl. KJV form of HANANEL.

Hananel, Tower of han'uh-nel (חֲנַנֵּל H2861, "God is gracious"). KJV Hananeel. The name of a tower on the N wall of JERUSALEM, between the FISH GATE and the Tower of the HUNDRED, not far from the SHEEP GATE (Neh. 3:1; 12:39). The Tower of Hananel must have been a significant landmark, for it is mentioned in two prophetic passages that deal with the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Jer. 31:38; Zech. 14:10). Its precise location is uncertain, though some scholars believe that in the time of HEROD it was replaced by the Tower of ANTONIA (cf. M. Avi-Yonah in IEJ 4 [1954]: 239-48, esp. 242). See also NEHEMIAH.

Modern reconstruction of the Antonia Fortress, possibly built on the location of the Tower of Hananel. (View to the NW from the temple court.)

Hanani huh-nay'nz' (חֲנַנִּי H2862, "[Yahweh] is gracious"; short form of HANANIAH). (1) Father of the prophet JEHU (1 Ki. 16:1, 7; 2 Chr. 19:2; 20:34). Described as "the seer," Hanani rebuked King ASA for relying on the Arameans; the king "was so enraged that he put him in prison" (2 Chr. 16:7-10).

(2) Son of HEMAN, DAVID'S seer (1 Chr. 25:4). Hanani and his thirteen brothers were set apart "for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal" (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the eighteenth lot (v. 25).

(3) One of the descendants of IMMER who agreed to put away their foreign wives in the time of EZRA (Ezra 10:20; 1 Esd. 9:21 [KJV, "Ananias"]).

(4) A brother (or relative) of NEHEMIAH who brought news to SUSA of the distressing condition of the Jews in Palestine (Neh. 1:2). He was subsequently made one of the governors of Jerusalem (7:2).

(5) A musician who took part in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem after the return from exile (Neh. 12:36). Some have suggested that this Hanani is the same as #3 or #4 above.

S. BARABAS

Hananiah han'uh-ni'uh (חנניה H2863, "Yahweh is [or has been] gracious"; cf. JEHOHANAN; JOANAN; JOHN). A popular Jewish name, especially after the EXILE. It is possible that some of the references in EZRA and NEHEMIAH treated separately in this article speak of the same individual.

(1) Son of ZERUBBABEL and father of Pelatiah and Jeshaiiah (1 Chr. 3:19, 21).

(2) Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN; listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:24; cf. v. 28).

(3) Son of HEMAN, DAVID'S seer (1 Chr. 25:4). Hananiah and his thirteen brothers were set apart "for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbal" (v. 1). When lots were cast to determine the duties of the Levitical singers, he, along with his sons and relatives, received the sixteenth lot (v. 23).

(4) A royal official under King UZZIAH of Judah; under his direction, Jeiel the secretary and Maaseiah the officer mustered the army (2 Chr. 26:11).

(5) Son of Azzur and a false prophet who opposed JEREMIAH (Jer. 28). A native of GIBEON, Hananiah prophesied that King JECONIAH and the Jewish captives in Babylon would soon return to Jerusalem, bringing with them the vessels of the temple that NEBUCHADNEZZAR had carried away. In reply, Jeremiah told him that he would die within the year because he had made the people believe a lie. Jeremiah's words were fulfilled when Hananiah died in the seventh month of that year.

(6) Father of a certain Zedekiah; the latter was one of the high officials of Judah under King JEHOIAKIM (Jer. 36:12).

(7) Father of Shelemiah and grandfather of Irijah (Jer. 37:13); the latter was captain of the guard and arrested JEREMIAH on the charge of intending to desert to the Babylonians.

(8) One of the companions of DANIEL; his name was changed to Shadrach by the Babylonians (Dan. 1:6-7; 1 Macc.2:59 [KJV, "Ananias"]; 4 Macc. 16:21; 18:12). See SHADRACH, MESHACH, ABEDNEGO.

(9) One of the descendants of Bebai who agreed to put away their foreign wives in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:28; 1 Esd. 9:29 [KJV, "Ananias"]).

(10) A perfume-maker who helped Nehemiah rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8).

(11) Son of Shelemiah; he helped repair the wall above the HORSE GATE (Neh. 3:30). This Hananiah may be the same as #10 above.

(12) Commander of the citadel in Jerusalem. Described as "a man of integrity" who "feared God more than most men do," he was appointed joint ruler of the city along with Hanani, Nehemiah's brother (Neh. 7:2).

(13) A leader of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:23).

(14) Head of the priestly family of Jeremiah in the days of JOIAKIM the high priest (Neh. 12:12). He is probably the same priest who played the trumpet at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (v. 41).

(15) Ancestor of a Levitical family that returned from the EXILE (1 Esd. 8:48 [KJV, “Channuneus”; LXX v. 47, Chanounaios]; not mentioned in the parallel passage, Ezra 8:19).

S. BARABAS

Hananiel huh-nan’ee-uhl. See ANANIEL.

hand. The usual Hebrew term for “hand” (yād H3338; Gk. cheir G5931) can refer to the fingers where rings are worn (Gen. 41:42) and to the wrist on which ABRAHAM’S servant put the bracelets for REBEKAH (24:22; NRSV, “arms”). Generally the hand suggests power (Exod. 14:30), while the use of the word “finger” implies dexterity (Ps. 8:3), so possibly the laying on of the hand was considered a means of passing the spirit from the strong one to the recipient.

The shield was held by the left hand, but a friend stood on one’s right hand to guard him on his stronger side, which an enemy was most likely to assail (Ps. 16:8; Heb. yāmîn H3545, “right”). The accuser also stood at one’s right hand (109:6). The right hand was the point of most danger and honor, although to be on either side of Christ in his kingdom was a desirable place (Mk. 10:37; Gk. dexios G1288, “right,” and aristeros G754, “left”). The left hand was inclined to evil (Eccl. 10:2; Heb. šēmōʿl H8520, “left”), and the rejected goats were sent to the left at the glorious throne (Matt. 25:31). “On the right hand” indicated S and “on the left hand” the N (cf. Gen. 14:15).

Parts of the hand were sometimes cut off in war and brought home as symbols of victory (Jdg.

1:6). The hand also was cut off after a shameful act (Deut. 25:12; cf. the metaphorical use in Matt. 5:30). A mark on the hand was a reminder of the successful exodus from Egypt (Exod. 13:16) or a sign of ownership (Isa. 44:5). The reference to those “who cannot tell their right hand from their left” (Jon. 4:11) may allude to the innocence of children or to the poor moral sense of the Ninevites.

In idioms, the hand portrayed many activities. It could stand for the whole person as in “their hand also is with David” (1 Sam. 22:17 NRSV); “hand for hand” gave justice (Exod. 21:24); to “shake the fist” promised judgment (Isa. 10:32); to “lay the hand on” meant to injure or kill (Gen. 22:12); to “slack the hand” was to avoid duty (Josh. 10:6 KJV); to “bury the hand” is a sluggard’s inertia (Prov. 19:24); to “lay your hand upon your mouth” commanded silence (Job 21:5 NRSV); and to put one’s hand on the head displayed grief from injustice (2 Sam. 13:19). Washing hands could imply innocence or a shirking of responsibility, for which PILATE became infamous (Matt. 27:24). Hands were smitten together in both joy and anger (Num. 24:10) and in spiteful triumph (Nah. 3:19), and one kissed his own hands in pride (Job 31:27 NRSV). A job is begun when one “puts his hand to” it (Deut. 12:7; Lk. 9:62). One risks his own life if he puts it in his hands (1 Sam. 19:5). Hands were lifted up to bless a multitude (Lev. 9:22), and were stretched out to ask for help (Ps. 143:6). Likewise “to lift holy hands” means to beseech in prayer (1 Tim. 2:8).

Laying hands upon the head of children to give a blessing was done by both Israel and Jesus (Gen. 48:13; Matt. 19:13). Jesus also raised the daughter of JAIRUS by taking her hand (Matt. 9:25). The HOLY SPIRIT was received by the laying on of hands (Acts 8:17; 1 Tim. 4:14), but sins were transferred to a sacrificial animal in like fashion (Lev. 16:21). The Egyptians had a similar custom.

The Lord God says, “I will stretch out my hand against” the wicked (Ezek. 25:13) and to help his people (Deut. 3:24; 4:34). Jesus demonstrated his identity by showing the print of the nails in his hands (Jn. 20:27). Christian ASSURANCE is guaranteed by no one’s being able to pluck the believer out of the Father’s hand (10:29). The Lord Jesus, who committed his spirit into the Father’s hands (Lk. 23:46), is now sitting at the right hand of God (Ps. 110:1).

R. L. MIXTER

handbreadth. This term (Heb. ṭōpah H3256) indicates a measurement of about three inches based on the width of the hand at the base of the four fingers (cf. Vulg. quattuor digitis in Exod. 25:25; note also Jer. 52:21). Three handbreadths equaled a span, and six handbreadths a cubit, but the long cubit had an extra handbreadth (Ezek. 40:5). The term is used to describe equipment in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:25; 37:12) and temple (1 Ki. 7:26; 2 Chr. 4:5; future temple, Ezek. 40:43; 43:13), and metaphorically for the brevity of man’s life (Ps. 39:5). See also WEIGHTS AND MEASURES I.D.

M. R. WILSON

handicraft. Most industrial products of the biblical world were produced by skilled craftsmen, though some industries, notably mining and quarrying, used unskilled, forced labor. Craft clans probably held a traditional claim to certain industries (e.g., the KENITES; see also GE HARASHIM), although individual skilled craftsmen such as BEZALEL and OHOLIAB (Exod. 36:1) are mentioned. OT craftsmen usually were free men or members of free craft clans, but by NT times “factories” manned by dozens of slaves competed with free craftsmen. Some typical crafts of the Bible are the following: carpenter, dyer, fuller, jeweler, mason, perfumer, potter, sculptor, seamstress, smith, and weaver. See CRAFTS.

A. BOWLING

handkerchief. This English term is used once to render Greek soudarion G5051 (from Lat. sudarium, “face-cloth,” Acts 19:12). The reference is probably to “sweat rags” tied by PAUL about his head while active as a leather worker; these were brought to sick people in EPHESUS for healing purposes. The Greek term can also refer to the cloth used as a face or head covering (Jn. 11:44; 20:7; KJV, “napkin”), and more generally of any “piece of cloth” (Lk. 19:20). Marriage contracts of the 2nd-3rd centuries include a soudarion in the bride’s dowry.

M. R. WILSON

handle. This English term, as noun or verb, is used variously in Bible translations to render several words and expressions, such as the Hebrew noun kātēp H4190 (1 Ki. 7:34; NRSV, “support”), the Hebrew verb nûp H5677 (Isa. 10:15 NRSV; NIV, “use”), and the Greek verb psēlaphaō G6027 (Lk. 24:39 KJV; NIV, “touch”). Some passages include the term “handle” as a part of an idiom (Prov. 16:20 KJV; Mk. 12:4 KJV; 2 Tim. 2:15).

handmaid. Term used by the KJV to render words that are better translated “maidservant” (NIV) or “slave-girl” (NRSV) or simply “servant” (cf. Gen. 16:1; Jdg. 19:19; Acts 2:18). These terms are sometimes used by women with reference to themselves as an expression of humility (e.g., Ruth 2:13; 1 Sam. 11; Lk. 1:38). See also MAID.

handpike. See ARMOR, ARMS IV.A.

hands, laying on of. A ceremony of ancient origin with different meanings, depending upon its occurrence in various contexts.

I. In relation to sacrificial procedures. The prescriptions of the Mosaic law required worshipers who brought burnt and sin offerings for sacrifice to God to lay their hands upon the animal victims before the latter were killed (Exod. 29:10; Lev. 1:4; 4:4, 24, 29, 33; 8:14; Num. 8:10, 12). It should not be assumed that this symbolic act implied a general transference of guilt from the worshiper to the victims, since this only occurred with the imposition of hands on the scapegoat on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:21; see ATONEMENT, DAY OF). Instead, it seems probable that the act of imposition consecrated the victim for its special task.

II. In relation to punishment. A blasphemer had the hands of witnesses laid on him before being taken away to be stoned (Lev. 24:14).

III. In association with blessing. JACOB blessed the children of JOSEPH in this way (Gen. 48:14), as Christ also blessed the children (Matt. 19:15; Mk. 10:13, 16). The invoking of a benediction upon a group involved outstretched arms, such as the priestly benedictions (Lev. 9:22) or the occasion of Christ’s ascension (Lk. 24:50).

IV. In relation to healing. In the NT, the concept behind the practice seems to have been that of transferring spiritual vitality to produce a wholeness of personality in the recipient that manifested itself in physical or mental healing. Such instances included the healing of JAIRUS’S daughter (Mk. 5:23), where Christ finally “took her by the hand” (5:41); the commission to the disciples that included healing (16:18); the healings occurring at CAPERNAUM (Lk. 4:40), and the restoration of the hopelessly crippled woman (13:13). In the same way, ANANIAS laid hands on PAUL to enable him to recover his sight (Acts 9:12, 17), and Paul in turn healed the father of PUBLIUS in MALTA (28:8), who seems to have been suffering from dysentery and perhaps an accompanying malaria. Healings of a general nature are described as occurring through the “hands of the apostles” (5:12 KJV), that is, through apostolic agency.

V. Gift of the Spirit. The imposition of hands also conveyed the gift of the HOLY SPIRIT (Acts 8:18-19; 19:6). The resultant manifestations of spiritual vitality were often of the external variety, such as the ability to speak in TONGUES. The denominations that justify their postbaptismal confirmation rites by reference to such passages (Heb. 6:2) clearly misunderstand the significance of the practice in the early apostolic age.

VI. Ordination rites. A special blessing was envisaged, as with the ordination of JOSHUA by MOSES as his successor (Num. 27:18, 23; Deut. 34:9). At the ceremony, Joshua was commissioned to his new task and was not given the gifts of leadership or wisdom, which he already possessed. In effect, his ordination attested to his special qualities of spirit, giving him formal authority to exercise the functions of leadership among the Israelites. The same principle applied to the Seven (Acts 6:6) and the commissioning of Paul and BARNABAS (13:3). The imparting of a SPIRITUAL GIFT is implied by Paul (1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6). Paul’s advice to TIMOTHY involved the restoration of penitents to leadership (1 Tim. 5:22).

Hanes hay’neez (𐤇𐤍𐤏 H2865). An Egyptian city, mentioned with ZOAN (Tanis), in a pass age that condemns those who look for protection from PHARAOH (Isa. 30:4). It is probably to be identified with Heracleopolis Magna, capital of the northern part of Upper EGYPT, about 50 mi. S of MEMPHIS and just S of the Fayum. It was a city of great importance in the 25th and 26th dynasties (c. 715-600 B.C.) and during the reign of Psammetichus I (c. 660-610). It has, however, also been identified with Heracleopolis Parva in the eastern NILE delta.

S. BARABAS

hang. Death by hanging is mentioned several times in the Bible (e.g., Esth. 2:23 et al.). In the case of AHITHOPHEL (2 Sam. 17:23) and JUDAS ISCARIOT (Matt. 27:5), it was self-inflicted. In some passages, however, the terms used denote impaling, gibbeting, or CRUCIFIXION. This often was done to the corpse after death (Gen. 40:19, 22; 41:13; Deut. 21:22; Lam. 5:12) but not always. Ezra 6:11 indicates that a living man was to be impaled and left to die. PAUL asserts that Jesus became a curse by being hung upon a tree (Gal. 3:13, quoting from Deut. 21:23), his point being that Jesus bore the accursed death due to sin vicariously, so that those who deserved it could be set free.

W. A. ELWELL

hangings. This English term is used in the KJV and other versions to render two different words in the OT. Hebrew qela' H7846 (cf. Exod. 27:9-22; 38:9-18; NIV, “curtains”) refers to long, heavy drapes intended to serve as walls for the court of the TABERNACLE, which measured 100 by 50 cubits (c. 150 x 75 ft.). They were hung from a rod supported by twenty pillars on the longer sides, ten pillars on the W side, and six pillars on the E side (in which was the gateway, 20 cubits in width). The hangings were to be 5 cubits (7.5 ft.) in height and woven of a finely twisted linen, unspecified as to color.

The other term, māsāk H5009, “screen,” was a heavy drape used as the door of the outer court (where it measured 20 cubits in width); a similar curtain screened off the entrance into the Holy Place of the tabernacle itself. Both of these were gorgeously embroidered with threads of BLUE Reconstruction of curtain surrounding the tabernacle.

(bluish purple, a dye obtained from the murex shell), PURPLE (a deeper purple tinged with dark red, also derived from murex dye but of much higher quality and cost), and SCARLET (“crimson worm,” which was a dye obtained from the Coccus ilicis, a worm taken from the bark of the ilex tree; its dried body yielded a powder producing a brilliant and indelible scarlet hue). These were embroidered on the finely twisted linen fabric mentioned above. It was suspended from a rod supported by four pillars filleted with silver and based on sockets of bronze (Exod. 27:16-17). The screen at the entrance to the Holy Place was supported by five pillars of ACACIA overlaid with GOLD (26:37), and attached with golden hooks. Possibly it was somewhat wider than the screen to the court. The responsibility for caring for these various hangings and drapes of the tabernacle and its court was entrusted to the Levitical family of GERSHON (Num. 3:25-26).

G. L. ARCHER

Haniel han'ee-uhl. KJV alternate form of HANNIEL.

Hannah han'uh (חַנָּה H2839, “grace, favor” or “[Yahweh] has been gracious”; see JOANNA, JOHANAN). Favorite wife of ELKANAH and mother of SAMUEL (1 Sam. 1-2). Hannah was childless and was consequently unmercifully taunted by Elkanah’s other wife, PENINNAH, who had children. Hannah prayed for a son year after year, vowing that if her prayers were answered she would give him to the Lord. One day, during the annual pilgrimage to SHILOH with Elkanah, as she prayed in the tabernacle the high priest ELI observed her lips moving and mistakenly took her to be a drunken woman. She denied the accusation and explained to him that she had been silently praying for a son.

In due time Hannah bore a son and named him Samuel. When the boy was weaned, she fulfilled her vow and took him to Shiloh, where she gave him to the Lord. In a beautiful psalm of praise to God (1 Sam. 2:1-10)—which has many echoes both in the Song of DAVID at the end of the books of Samuel (2 Sam. 22) and in the MAGNIFICAT of the Virgin Mary (Lk 1:46-55; see MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS)—Hannah exulted in the power of Yahweh, who raises up the poor and needy, and casts down the rich. (See J. T. Willis in CBQ 35 [1973]: 139-54.) Hannah was in the habit of bringing to Samuel a little robe on her yearly visits to Shiloh. She later became the mother of other sons and daughters.

Hannathon han'uh-thon (חַנְתָּוֹן H2872, apparently from חַן H2834, “charm, favor”). A town on the N border of the tribal territory of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:14). Located on a major highway, Hannathon is mentioned both in the TELL EL-AMARNA Tablets (14th cent. B.C.) and in the annals of TIGLATH-PILESER III (747-727 B.C.). It is identified with modern Tell el-Bedeiwiye, about 2 mi. W of NAZARETH.

Hanniel han'ee-uhl (חַנְיָאֵל H2848, “God was gracious” or “favor of God”). KJV also Haniel (1 Chr. 7:39). (1) Son of Ephod; he was a leader from the tribe of MANASSEH, chosen to assist in the distribution of the land (Num. 34:23).

(2) Son of Ulla and descendant of ASHER, included among the “heads of families, choice men, brave warriors and outstanding leaders” (1 Chr. 7:39-40).

S. BARABAS

Hanoch hay'nok (חֲנוֹךְ H2840, possibly “dedicated” or “initiated” [see ENOCH]; gentilic חֲנוֹכִי H2854, “Hanochite”). TNIV Hanok. (1) Son of MIDIAN and grandson of ABRAHAM by KETURAH (Gen. 25:4; 1 Chr. 1:33 [KJV, “Henoch”]). The name may be related to a location in ARABIA (cf. F. V. Winnett in Translating and Understanding the Old Testament, ed. H. T. Frank and W. L. Reed [1970], 192-93; I. Eph'al, The Ancient Arabs: Nomads on the Borders of the Fertile Crescent, 9th—5th Centuries B.C. [1982], 231-33). Because the names of Hanoch and two of his brothers (EPHAH and EPHER) are also borne by men in three Hebrew tribes (respectively Reuben, Judah, and Manasseh) that were geographically close to Midian, some have speculated that certain Midianite clans may have been incorporated in Israel (cf. J. Skinner, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Genesis, ICC, 2nd ed. [1930], 351).

(2) Eldest son of REUBEN, grandson of JACOB, and ancestor of the Hanochite clan (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:5; 1 Chr. 5:3).

Hanok hay' nok. TNIV form of HANOCH.

Hanukkah hah' nuh-kuh (חֲנֻכָּה H2853, “dedication”). See DEDICATION, FEAST OF.

Hanun hay' nuhn (חֲנָיִן H2842, “favored”). (1) Son and successor of NAHASH, king of the Ammonites (2 Sam. 10:1-4; 1 Chr. 19:1-6; see AMMON). Upon the death of Nahash, DAVID sent a message of condolence to Hanun. This gesture was misinterpreted, and the messengers were grossly insulted and dishonored. The result was a war that David waged against Hanun, and the Ammonites lost their independence. David appointed the brother of Hanun, SHOBI, in his place (2 Sam. 17:27).

(2) Son of Zalaph; after the return from EXILE, he assisted in repairing the VALLEY GATE in JERUSALEM and about five hundred yards of the wall (Neh. 3:13, 30). According to some scholars, these passages refer to two different men (for a full discussion, see D. V. Edelman in ABD, 3:52-54).

hapax legomenon hah' pahks-luh-gohm' uh-non (ἁπαξ λεγόμενον, “once said”). Pl. hapax legomena. This phrase is used with reference to words that occur only once in a specific document or in a larger body of literature. Because surviving Greek literature is extensive, relatively few words in the NT are not attested elsewhere. Ancient Hebrew, however, has survived almost exclusively in the books of the OT, and thus there is a large proportion of Hebrew hapax legomena, as well as many terms that occur only two or three times. When there is only one context (or very few) where a word appears, determining its meaning can be difficult. In addition to paying very careful attention to that context, scholars make use of other information, such as the word's likely etymology, cognate terms in related Semitic languages, the rendering of the word in the ancient versions, and interpretative comments in rabbinic literature. (See F. E. Greenspahn, Hapax Legomena in Biblical Hebrew [1984].)

Hapharaim haf' uh-ray' im (חֲפָרַיִם H2921, “two pits”). KJV Haphraim (some editions). A town on the frontier of the tribal territory of ISSACHAR, listed after SHUNEM (Josh. 19:19). SHISHAK (c. 918 B.C.) mentions a Hapharaim in his list of conquered towns, but this may be a different location. Biblical Hapharaim has been identified with Khirbet el-Farriyeh (prob. too far W to be included within the boundaries of Issachar), eṭ-Ṭaiyibeh (c. 7 mi. NW of BETH SHAN), and 'Afulleh (6.5 mi. ENE of MEGIDDO and 2 mi. W of Shunem; see the discussion in Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 421-24).

Hapiru. See HABIRU.

happiness. The English terms happiness and happy are used variously in Bible translations to render several words (see JOY). Of special interest is the Greek noun makarismos G3422, which is used only three times in the NT, all by PAUL (Rom. 4:6, 9; Gal. 4:15; the cognate adjective makarios G3421, “happy, blessed,” occurs frequently, Matt. 5:3 et al.). This noun is most often rendered “blessing” and indicates the state of being happy. In Romans, Paul describes happiness as the state of the just: “In the same sense David speaks of the happiness of the man whom God ‘counts’ as just... ‘Happy are they’, he says, ‘whose lawless deeds are forgiven... happy is the man whose sins the Lord does not count against him’” (Rom. 4:6-8 NEB). Nor is being a Jew a sole requisite for “this happiness,” as seen in ABRAHAM’S righteousness by faith (v. 9). The other use of “happiness” is that of an emotional experience of delight or joy in the presence of a person loved, as the Galatians’ happiness in having Paul with them (Gal. 4:15). See also BEATITUDES; BLESSEDNESS.

G. B. FUNDERBURK

Happizzesz hap’uh-zez (הפצִיז H2204, apparently piel form of פָּצַץ H7207 [polel, “to shatter”] with definite article). The leader of a priestly family whom DAVID appointed by lot as the head of the eighteenth division for temple duties (1 Chr. 24:15; KJV, “Aphses”). The name Happizzesz may be a clan designation, possibly connected with the town of BETH PAZZEZ.

Happuch. See KEREN-HAPPUCH.

Hara hair’uh (הָרָא H2217, derivation uncertain, perhaps related to הָרָא H2215, “mountain”). One of the places to which TIGLATH-PILESER, the king of Assyria, exiled the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh in 734-732 B.C. (1 Chr. 5:26). It is mentioned along with HALAH, HAVOR, and the river GOZAN—all places in N MESOPOTAMIA. Several identifications have been proposed (cf. ABD, 3:57), but the name Hara is omitted in the SEPTUAGINT, and it is also missing in the Hebrew text of the parallel passages (2 Ki. 17:6; 18:11), which instead have “the towns [ārê] of the Medes” (LXX, orē, apparently reading Heb. hārê, “mountains”). Many scholars believe that the text in Chronicles is corrupt, and several emendations have been suggested.

Haradah huh-ray’duh (הַרְדָּה H3011, “[place of] fear”). A camping station in the wilderness journeys of the Israelites (Num. 33:24-25). The name suggests that some otherwise unknown incident here may have caused anxiety among the people. It was located between Mount Shepher and Makheloth, but none of these sites can be identified.

Haran (person) hair’uhn (הָרָן H2237, possibly “mountaineer” [if derived from הָרָא H2215] or “sanctuary” [if related to a South Arabian name]; the place name Haran renders a different Hebrew word). (1) Son of TERAH, brother of ABRAHAM and NAHOR, and father of LOT and two daughters, Milcah and Iscah (Gen. 11:26-31). Haran died in UR before his father Terah set out to go to CANAAN.

(2) Son of CALEB by his concubine Ephah, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:46).

Haran.

(3) Son of SHIMEI and descendant of GERSHON; he was one of the Levites who headed the families of LADAN (1 Chr. 23:9).

Haran (place) hay'ruhn (הָרָן H3059, from Akk. ḫarrānu, “road” [i.e., crossroads]; Χαρράν G5924). Also Harran; KJV NT Charran. A city of MESOPOTAMIA situated c. 24 mi. SE of Urfa (EDESSA) on the river Balikh, a tributary of the EUPHRATES. It was an important commercial center because of its location on one of the main trade routes between Babylonia and the Mediterranean: CARCHEMISH lay some 50 mi. W, and GOZAN about the same distance E. The place name Haran is to be distinguished from HARAN (PERSON), which renders a different Hebrew word.

Excavations show that Haran flourished from at least the 3rd millennium B.C. It was conquered by SHALMANESER I in the 13th cent. B.C., and is mentioned by TIGLATH-PILESER I (c. 1115 B.C.) in a prism inscription. For a long time it was an Assyrian provincial capital, but was destroyed because of a rebellion in 763 (an event apparently referred to in 2 Ki. 19:12). It was restored by SARGON II. The last king of Assyria, Ashur-urbanit, made Haran his capital in 612, after the destruction of NINEVEH by the Babylonians, but he was forced to abandon the city in 610 (see ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA). In ancient times, and until about the 11th cent. A.D., Haran was the center of various forms of the worship of Sin, the moon-god. In Hellenistic and Roman times it was known as Carrhae. The city was then successively ruled by Nestorian Christians, Moslems, and Crusaders; today it retains the name Harran as a small Arab village in SE Turkey.

Haran was the city in which TERAH and ABRAHAM settled after leaving UR (Gen. 11:31-32), and from which Abraham set out when he journeyed to CANAAN (12:1). NAHOR, Abraham's brother, settled in Haran, and hence it is called the “city of Nahor” in the story of ISAAC and JACOB (24:10; 27:43). LABAN, the kinsman of Isaac and Jacob, lived in Haran, and it was there that Jacob stayed during his long sojourn in Mesopotamia (28:10; 29:4). Jacob fled to Haran to escape ESAU'S anger (27:43), and there he met his brides (29:10-11). Ezekiel speaks of the merchants of Haran as trading with

Beehive homes from the early part of the 20th cent. now cover the village of Haran, a region once inhabited by Abraham and his ancestors. (View to the S.)

TYRE (Ezek. 27:23). (See S. Lloyd and W. Brice in Anatolian Studies 1 [1951]: 77-111; J. N. Postgate, “Ḫarrān,” Reallexikon der Assyriologie 4 [1975]: 122-25; O. R. Gurney in Ancient Anatolia, ed. R. Matthews [1998], 163-76.)

Hararite hair’uh-ri’t (חַרְרִי H2240 [with orthographic variations], possibly “mountain dweller”). An epithet applied to two (or three) of DAVID’S heroes. SHAMMAH son of Agee, who was one of the Three, achieved a great victory over the PHILISTINES (2 Sam. 23:11). His name appears also in the list of the Thirty, but as the father of a certain Jonathan (2 Sam. 23:32b-33a [following the Lucianic MSS of the LXX]; 1 Chr. 11:34 has SHAGEE instead of Shammah). Another Hararite included in the list of the Thirty is AHAM son of Sharar (2 Sam. 23:33b; 1 Chr. 11:35 has “Ahiam son of Sacar”). The term Hararite may refer to a clan or, more probably, a location; if the latter, it may indicate a specific town (one suggestion is AROER) or some general mountainous area (cf. English hillbilly).

Harbona hahr-boh’nuh (חַרְבוֹנָה H3002 and חַרְבוֹנָה H3003, from Pers. kherbân, “donkey driver”). KJV also Harbonah. One of the seven EUNUCHS sent by Ahasuerus king of PERSIA (i.e., XERXES, who reigned 486-465 B.C.), to bring Queen VASHTI to a royal feast (Esth. 1:10). It was Harbona who later suggested that HAMAN be hanged on the same gallows that Haman himself had erected for MORDECAI (7:9).

harbor. The sheltered part of a body of water. The term is used to render Hebrew mēzah H4651 (Isa. 23:10, in an oracle concerning TYRE and TARSHISH) and Greek limēn G3348 (Acts 27:12, with reference to FAIR HAVENS; in the NIV and other versions, the rendering “ports” in v. 2 is a contextual translation of the Greek word for “places”).

hardening, spiritual. Both the OT and the NT use a variety of terms in several combinations to express the idea of stubborn human resistance to God. The Hebrew verb qāšâ H7996 (“to be heavy, hard”) and its cognate adjective can be used with SPIRIT (e.g., Deut. 2:30, parallel verb āmās H599, “be strong”), NECK (2 Chr. 30:8; see STIFF-NECKED), HEART (Exod. 7:3), FACE (Ezek. 2:4, Heb.), and FOREHEAD (Ezek. 3:7 NRSV; here coupled with the adjective ḥāzāq H2617, “firm, hard”), each combination standing for the opposition of the entire self.

Of special interest are the statements that God hardened PHARAOH’S heart (Exod. 7:3; 10:1 [here kābād H3877]; 14:4) and that Pharaoh hardened his own heart (Exod. 9:34-35; 13:15). Paul appeals to the SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD in discussing Pharaoh (Rom. 9:18, Gk. verb sklērynō G5020), although the factor of human responsibility through repeated warnings is clearly involved (cf. 1 Sam. 6:6; Rom. 1:21-25). Hardening one’s heart brings punishment (Prov. 29:1), as is evident in Israel’s resistance at MERIBAH (Ps. 95:8). Refusal to listen, to obey, or to be thankful characterize the hardened heart, and Israel is portrayed as a prime example of this condition (2 Ki. 17:14; Neh. 9:16-17; Heb. 3:8).

The disciples’ hearts were said to be hardened or dull (Gk.pōroō G4800) when they failed to understand the miracle of the loaves (Mk. 6:52; 8:17). Gentile unbelievers are alienated from God because of their ignorance and hardness of heart (Eph. 4:18, noun pōrōsis G4801). With reference to Israel, PAUL states that while the elect obtained salvation, “the others were hardened” (Rom. 11:7; cf. v. 25; see ELECTION). Here the individuals themselves are described as being hardened, but elsewhere he says that “their minds were made dull” (2 Cor. 3:14).

H. M. WOLF

hare. A mammal of the genus Lepus (the most common in Palestine being L. syriacus), similar to the rabbit, but with longer ears and legs. The hare is mentioned in the Bible (Heb. ʾarnebet H817) only in two lists of unclean animals that chew the cud but do not have a split hoof (Lev. 11:6; Deut. 14:7; see UNCLEANNES). This context of the only two occurrences was once considered contradictory, but recent work confirms the apparently strange statement. Hares, like rabbits, are now known to practice “refection”: at certain times of the day, when the hare is resting, it passes droppings of different texture, which it at once eats. Thus the hare appears to be chewing without taking fresh greens into its mouth. On its first passage through the gut, indigestible vegetable matter is acted on by bacteria and can be better assimilated the second time through. Almost the same principle is involved as in chewing the cud. Hares, somewhat like the European hare or American jack rabbit (which is a true hare) but rather smaller, are found in many parts of Palestine. (See FFB, 39-40.)

G. S. CANSDALE

Harel hair’uhl. See ARIEL.

harem. This English term (from Arabic ḥarim, “forbidden”) denotes the building assigned to the wives and concubines of one man; the word often refers to the women themselves. Modern versions use it as the rendering of the Hebrew phrase, bēt-hannāšîm, “house of the women” (Esth. 2:3, 9, 11, 13-14; the NIV uses it also in vv. 8 and 15, where the Heb. simply has hannēšîm, “the women”). In addition, it is possible that the expression šiddâ wēēššiddôt, which occurs only in Eccl. 2:8 and which perhaps means literally, “a mistress and mistresses,” refers to a harem (so NIV; see discussion in HALOT, 1:354).

Hareph hair'if (חָרֵף H3073, possibly “sharp, shrewd,” others “scorn[ful]” or “harvest-time, autumn” [i.e., mature]; cf. HARIPH and HARUPHITE). Son of HUR, descendant of CALEB, and “father” (i.e., founder or ruler) of BETH GADER; listed in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:51).

Hareshah. See TEL HARSHA.

Hareth hair'eth. KJV form of HERETH.

Harhaiah hahr-hay'yuh (חַרְחִיָּה H3015 [some edd., חַרְחִיָּה], derivation unknown). Father of Uzziel; the latter was one of the goldsmiths who helped to repair the walls of Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 3:8). Some scholars emend the text to read “Uzziel, a son [i.e., member] of the guild [ḥeber] of the goldsmiths.”

Harhas hahr'has (חַרְחָס H3030, derivation unknown). Father of Tikvah and grandfather of Shallum; the latter was “keeper of the wardrobe” and the husband of HULDAH the prophetess (2 Ki. 22:14). The name is given as HASRAH (and father of Tokhath) in the parallel passage (2 Chr. 34:22).

Har-heres. See HERES #1.

Harhur hahr'huhr (חַרְחֻר H3028, possibly “raven” or “[born during mother's] fever”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53; this name is missing in the parallel list, 1 Esd. 5:31 [perhaps replaced by ASUR]).

Harim hair'im (חָרִים H3053, “consecrated” [see DEVOTED]). (1) The leader of a priestly family whom DAVID appointed by lot as the head of the third division for duties in the sanctuary (1 Chr. 24:8). He is possibly the same priest listed as the ancestor of a family of 1,017 people that returned from the Babylonian captivity with ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2:39; Neh. 7:42; cf. 1 Esd. 5:25 [KJV, “Carme”; NRSV, “Charme”]), some of whom had married foreign wives and agreed to divorce them (Ezra 10:21). Perhaps this is the same priestly family (or a member of it also named Harim) that joined in sealing the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:5). However, many scholars link this passage with what may be a different priestly family whose leader was Adna (Neh. 12:15; the name REHUM in v. 3 may be a variant of Harim).

(2) Ancestor of a family of 320 people that returned from the Babylonian captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:32; Neh. 7:35). Because this list includes many geographic names, Harim here may refer to a town. Some members of this family had married foreign wives and agreed to divorce them (Ezra 10:31; called “Annan” [KJV, “Annas”] in 1 Esd. 9:32). The same family (or a member of it also named Harim) joined in sealing the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:27). Malkijah, a descendant of this family (or the son of the individual Harim) helped repair a section of the wall of JERUSALEM as well as the Tower of the OVENS (Neh. 3:11).

It should be noted that many scholars identify four or more different individuals (or families) by the name of Harim (cf. ABD, 3:60).

Hariph hair'if (חָרִיף H3040, “sharp, brisk” or “[born at] harvest-time”; cf. HAREPH, HARUPHITE).

Ancestor of a family of 112 members that returned from exile with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 7:24; called “Jorah” in Ezra 2:18 and “Arsiphurith” in 1 Esd. 5:16). The same family (or a member of it also named Hariph) joined in sealing the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:19).

harlot. See PROSTITUTION.

Har-magedon hahr’muh-ged’uhn. See ARMAGEDDON.

Harmon hahr’muhn (הרמון H2236, meaning unknown). A city or region to which the powerful and unjust women of SAMARIA were to be exiled (Amos 4:3; KJV, “the palace”). No place with this name is known, and the text is widely thought to be corrupt (Gk. variants include “the mountain Remman [Rimmon],” “mount Hermon,” and even “Armenia” [so Symmachus; cf. Targum and Peshitta]). Many emendations have been proposed (cf. NIV mg., “O mountain of oppression”), but none has been generally accepted.

harmony of the Gospels. An edition of the GOSPELS that seeks to show the agreement or coherence among them. Gospel harmonies may take two forms: (1) works that interweave material from all four Gospels into one chronological narrative, and (2) arrangements (“synopses”) of the Gospels, especially the synoptics, in parallel columns according to some chronological scheme. The earliest harmony was Tatian’s DIATESSARON, produced c. A.D. 170. Another early effort was that of an Alexandrian named Ammonius (3rd cent.), whose work is known only from citations in EUSEBIUS. The Gospels were sometimes commented on in harmonistic fashion, for example, by AUGUSTINE in his De consensu evangelistarum libri quattuor (c. A.D. 400).

Many new harmonies began to appear in the 16th cent. (e.g., by the German theologian A. Osiander in 1537), but the first modern work of this type, which did not necessarily assume agreement among the Gospels, was J. J. Griesbach’s Synopsis evangeliorum (1776). During the 19th cent., similar synopses were edited by various prominent scholars, such as G. M. de Wette (1818), J. H. Friedlieb (1847), and C. von Tischendorf (1851). A. Huck’s Synopse der drei ersten Evangelien, which first appeared in 1892 (thoroughly revised by H. Greeven, Synopsis of the First Three Gospels: With the Addition of the Johannine Parallels, 13th ed. [1981]) became the most widely used in modern times until the publication of Synopsis quattuor evangeliorum by K. Aland (15 ed., 2005), which includes material from the apocryphal and patristic literature.

The bulkier two-volume work by R. W. Funk, New Gospel Parallels (1985), presents sequentially each Gospel in its entirety, along with its parallels. Also distinctive in their approach are the following: R. J. Swanson, The Horizontal Line Synopsis of the Gospels (1975); J. B. Orchard, A Synopsis of the Four Gospels in Greek, Arranged according to the Two-Gospel Hypothesis (1983); and M.-É. Boismard and A. Lamouille, Synopsis graeca quattuor evangeliorum (1986; cf. the review by J. S. Kloppenborg in CBQ 50 [1988]: 707-9).

W. WHITE, JR.

Harnepher hahr’nuh-fuhr (חַרְנֶפֶר H3062, “Horus [an Egyptian deity] is good”). Son (or descendant) of Zophah, included in the genealogy of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:36). The name Harnepher, however, may be a clan designation or even a place name (some have speculated that it was derived from an Egyptian outpost in Palestine). It has been suggested that the genealogy was composed on the basis of taxation lists and that the names represent geographical areas inhabited by Asherite clans.

harness. This English term, as noun or verb, is used a few times in Bible translations to render several Hebrew words, such as <sup>l</sup>āsār H673, “tie up” (Jer. 46:4; used of hitching up chariots, 1 Ki. 18:44, and yoking cows, 1 Sam. 6:7). The KJV also uses this English word in its older sense of “armor” (1 Ki. 22:34; 2 Chr. 18:33).

Harod hair’uhd (חֶרֶד H3008, “trembling”; gentilic חֶרְדִּי H3012, “Harodite”). (1) A spring at which The Harod Spring at the base of Mount Gilboa.

GIDEON encamped with his men while preparing for battle with the Midianites (Jdg. 7:1). Some have speculated that SAUL encamped at this spring (1 Sam. 29:1, “the spring in Jezreel”) before his fatal battle with the PHILISTINES (cf. 31:1). Harod is generally identified with (Ein Jalud, 9 mi. WNW of BETH SHAN.

(2) The epithet Harodite is applied to two of DAVID’S mighty warriors, Shammah and Elikā (2 Sam. 23:25; cf. 1 Chr. 11:27, “Shammoth the Harorite”). Some associate this name with #1 above, but many scholars believe it refers to an unrelated town also named Harod, possibly to be identified with modern Khirbet el-Ḥaredhan, c. 5 mi. SE of JERUSALEM.

Haroeḥ huh-roh’uh (חֶרְאֵה H2218, “the seer”). Son (or descendant) of SHOBAL, included in the genealogy of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:52); probably the same as REAIAH (1 Chr. 4:2).

Harorite hay’roh-rit (חֶרְוִי H2229). Epithet applied to Shammoth, one of DAVID’S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:27); probably the same as SHAMMAH the Harodite. See HAROD.

Harosheth Haggoyim huh-roh’shith-huh-goi’im (חֶרֶשֶׁת הַגּוֹיִם H3099, “woodland [or plantations] of the nations”). A Canaanite town and the home of SISERA, from which he led his forces against DEBORAH and BARAK (Jdg. 4:13), and to which his army fled after his defeat (v. 16). Some have identified it with Muḥrashti (a town in the Plain of SHARON mentioned in the TELL EL-AMARNA letters), others with modern Khirbet el-Ḥarithiyeh (c. 14 mi. SSE of Acco) or such nearby sites as Tell (Amr and Tell el-Ḥarbaj. Still others think Harosheth Haggoyim was not a town at all but, as its name suggests, a general woodland region in GALILEE of the Gentiles (see Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 221) or a district in JEZREEL inhabited by foreigners (see SacBr, 150-51).

harp. See MUSIC, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS IV.D.

harpoon. This English term is used to render Hebrew śukkâ H8496, which occurs only once (Job 41:7; KJV, “barbed irons”) parallel to “fishing spears”; both weapons are said to be futile in the battle with LEVIATHAN.

Harran. See HARAN.

harrow. This English term, as a noun (referring to a heavy farm implement with sharp teeth or disks), is used by the KJV to render Hebrew ḥārîṣ H3044 (“hoe, pick”), which occurs twice (2 Sam. 12:31; 1 Chr. 20:3). The verb harrow (“to break up and level the soil with a harrow”) occurs as the rendering of śādād H8440 (piel stem), a term of uncertain meaning, but clearly referring to some process of treating the soil (Job 39:10 KJV and NRSV [NIV, “till”]; Isa. 28:24 NRSV and NIV [KJV, “break the clods”]; Hos. 10:11 NRSV [KJV, “break his clods”; NIV, “break up the ground”). The passage in Isaiah mentions “opening” the ground before harrowing and then leveling the face of it (Isa. 28:24-25). Perhaps the Hebrew term refers to pulling branches behind the PLOW to cover the seed uniformly. Some suggest that it meant cross plowing or the making of furrows. No tool resembling a harrow is known from Egypt or ancient Palestine.

Harsha hahr’shuh (חַרְשַׁת הַגִּזְיִם H3095, possibly “deaf” or “mute”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54; apparently called “Charea” in the parallel list, 1 Esd. 5:32).

Harsha, Tel. See TEL HARSHA.

hart. This English word is now a semitechnical term for the male of some DEER, usually the red deer, especially after the fifth year (the female, usually from the third year, is known as HIND). The KJV uses “hart” consistently as the rendering of Hebrew ʾayyāl H385 (Deut. 12:15 et al.), but modern versions prefer “deer.”

G. S. CANSDALE

Harum hair’uhm (חַרֻּמָּה H2227). Father of Aharhel and a descendant of JUDAH through ASHHUR (1 Chr. 4:8; cf. v. 5).

Harumaph huh-roo’maf (חַרְיֻמָּה H3018, “split nose” [cf. Lev. 21:18 and see FLAT NOSE]). Father of Jedaiah; the latter helped in repairing the walls of JERUSALEM in the time of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:10).

Haruphite huh-roo’fit (חַרְיֻפִּי H3020; cf. HAREPH, HARIPH). Epithet applied to Shephatiah, one of the warriors from BENJAMIN who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:5; Ketib, “Hariphite”). It is not clear whether the term indicates geographic origin or connection to a clan.

Haruz hair'uhz (חֲרֹזַיִם H3027, possibly “gold” or “diligent”). Father of MESHULLEMETH, who was the mother of AMON, king of Judah (2 Ki. 21:19). The name may be either Phoenician or Arabic (see J. A. Montgomery, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Kings, ICC [1951], 522).

harvest. The ingathering of crops was a vital part of Palestine’s agrarian culture. BARLEY harvest began in mid-April along the JORDAN and about a month later in the high areas. The SICKLE was the major instrument used. During harvest time, the Jordan overflowed its banks (Josh. 3:15). Two weeks later, the WHEAT harvest began, lasting about seven weeks (Ruth 2:23). Summer fruits, such as FIGS and grapes (see VINE), were harvested in August and September. From September through the middle of November, OLIVES were gathered by beating the trees with sticks (Deut. 24:20). The drying of FLAX stalks took place in March and April (Josh. 2:6). The Gezer CALENDAR of the 10th cent. B.C. supplies valuable information concerning the dating of various harvests (see AGRICULTURE V).

The Mosaic law gave clear instructions requiring reapers to leave crops in areas of the field so that the poor and sojourners might follow them (Lev. 19:9; Ruth 2:15-16). Harvest time was characterized by intense heat, when a mist-cloud brought welcome relief (Prov. 25:13; Isa. 18:4). The joy in harvest was a highlight of the year (Isa. 9:3).

Several moral teachings are related to sowing and reaping. The law of reaping what one sows, whether righteousness (Hos. 10:12) or wickedness (Prov. 22:8), is given repeatedly; Gal. 6:7 echoes this law. Harvest is a picture of the blessing upon the returning captivity of Judah (Hos. 6:11). More frequently, the wielding of the sickle in harvest portrays the judgment upon the nations of the world

Palestinian villagers harvest wheat in the Jezreel Valley (photo taken in 1905).

(Joel 3:13). The NT repeats this image of judgment as an angel is told, “Take your sickle and reap, because the time to reap has come, for the harvest of the earth is ripe” (Rev. 14:15).

Jesus compares the harvest to the KINGDOM OF GOD, which grows by stages (Mk. 4:29). The separation of the weeds and wheat will occur at the “harvest” of the kingdom (Matt. 13:30). Christ used the harvest to represent a world of souls that is ready to be reached with the gospel. The fields are ready to be harvested, “but the workers are few” (Matt. 9:37). (See G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology [1962], 183-87.)

Hasadiah has’uh-di’uh (חַסְדִּיָּה H2878, “Yahweh is faithful”). (1) Son of ZERUBBABEL and descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:20), possibly born in Palestine (see HASHUBAH).

(2) Son of Hilkiah and ancestor of BARUCH (Bar. 1:1; KJV, “Asdias”).

Hasenuah. KJV form of HASSENUAH.

Hashabiah hash’uh-bi’uh (חֲשַׁבְיָה H3116, “Yahweh has taken account”; cf. also HASHABNAH and HASHABNEIAH). (1) Son of Amaziah, descendant of MERARI, and ancestor of ETHAN, who was a Levite musician in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 6:45).

(2) Son of JEDUTHUN, father of Azrikam, ancestor of Shemaiah, and a Levite musician (1 Chr. 9:14; 25:3, 19; Neh. 11:15). This Hashabiah was the head of the twelfth company of temple musicians appointed by lot under David.

(3) A ruler from HEBRON in the time of David who, along with his relatives, was “responsible in Israel west of the Jordan for all the work of the LORD and for the king’s service” (1 Chr. 26:30).

(4) Son of Kemuel and an officer over the tribe of LEVI under King David (1 Chr. 27:17).

(5) A leader of the Levites in the reign of JOSIAH who gave liberally toward the sacrifices (2 Chr. 35:9; 1 Esd. 1:9 [KJV, “Assabias”]).

(6) A prominent Levite who returned from the EXILE with EZRA; he is usually associated with SHEREBIAH (Ezra 8:19; Neh. 12:24; 1 Esd. 8:48 [KJV, “Asebia”]). He was also one of the priests entrusted with the temple treasures that were brought to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:24; 1 Esd. 8:54 [KJV, “Assanias”]). Moreover, this Hashabiah may have been the same one who as “ruler of half the district of Keilah” helped to repair the wall (Neh. 3:17) and who affixed his seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (10:11).

(7) One of the descendants of PAROSH who agreed to divorce their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25 NRSV, following the LXX [MT, “Malkijah”]; cf. 1 Esd. 9:26, “Asibias”). See MALKIJAH ##4-6.

(8) Son of Mattaniah, descendant of ASAPH, and grandfather of UZZI; the latter was chief officer of the Levites (Neh. 11:22).

(9) Head of the priestly house of HILKIAH in the time of JOIAKIM the high priest (Neh. 12:21).

Hashabnah huh-shab’nuh (חֲשַׁבְנָה H3118, possibly short form of HASHABNEIAH, “Yahweh has taken account of me”; cf. also HASHABIAH). One of the leaders of the Israelites who sealed the covenant under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:25).

Hashabneiah hash’uhb-nee’yah (חֲשַׁבְנִיָּה H3119, “Yahweh has taken account of me”; cf. HASHABIAH and HASHABNAH). KJV Hashabniah. (1) Father of Hattush; the latter helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem in the time of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:10).

(2) One of the Levites who offered prayer in the ceremonies that preceded the sealing of the covenant (Neh. 9:5). Some scholars identify him with HASHABIAH #6.

S. BARABAS

Hashabniah hash'uhb-ni'uh. KJV form of HASHABNEIAH.

Hashbaddanah hash-bad'uh-nuh (חֲשַׁבְדָּנָה H3111, derivation uncertain). KJV Hashbadana. One of the prominent men who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4; called “Nabariah” [KJV, “Nabarias”] in the parallel, 1 Esd. 9:44).

Hashem hay'shim (הָשֵׁם H2244). A GIZONITE whose sons are included among DAVID'S mighty men (1 Chr. 11:34; the expression bēenê hāēm could be read as “the sons of the name,” with the possible meaning, “famous men”). Many scholars, however, emend the text by omitting “the sons of” (the previous name ends with the consonants bny, cf. also LXX and NRSV) and changing “Hashem” to “Jashen” (cf. 2 Sam. 23:32).

Hashmonah hash-moh'nuh (חֲשַׁמּוֹנָה H3135, derivation uncertain). A place at which the Israelites stopped during their wilderness journey (Num. 33:29-30). It was evidently located between Mithcah and Moseroth, but the site is unknown.

Hashub. KJV alternate form of HASSHUB.

Hashubah huh-shoo'buh (חֲשֻׁבָּה H3112, possibly “considered [by Yahweh]” or “[highly] esteemed”; cf. HASHABIAH). Son of ZERUBBABEL and descendant of DAVID through SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:20). Some scholars suggest that the word is not a name and emend the text to “after his return” (ahārê šûubô), indicating that the subsequent names refer to Zerubbabel's sons born in Palestine.

Hashum hay'shuhm (חָשֻׁם H3130, “broad nose”). (1) Son of DAN (Gen. 46:23 NRSV, following LXX; MT, HUSHIM; see also SHUHAM).

(2) Ancestor of a family of 223 (or 328) members who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:19; Neh. 7:22). Some members of this family had married foreign wives and agreed to divorce them (Ezra 10:33; 1 Esd. 9:33 [KJV, “Asom”]).

(3) One of the prominent men who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4; called “Lothasubus” in the parallel, 1 Esd. 9:44). He may be the same Hashum who affixed his seal to the covenant (Neh. 10:18).

Hashupha. KJV alternate form of HASUPHA.

Hasideans, Hasidim has'uh-dee'uhns, has'uhdim (Ἀσιδαῖοι or Ἀσιδαῖοι, from חֲסִידִים [pl. of חֲסִיד H2883], “faithful ones, devout ones”). KJV Assideans. The term Hasideans—which occurs only three times, all of them in 1-2 MACCABEES—refers to a group of very devout, orthodox Jews in the 2nd cent. B.C. who took part with the Maccabeans in the revolt against ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes. When MATTATHIAS and his followers decided to fight the Seleucid ruler, “there united with them a company of Hasideans, mighty warriors of Israel, all who offered themselves willingly for the law” (1 Macc. 2:42; cf. also 7:13). They must have existed as a party before the days of the Maccabees, but nothing is said of their origin. They undoubtedly shared the beliefs and practice of other pious Jews of the time (cf. 1 Macc. 1:63; 2:34; 2 Macc. 6:18-20; Jdt. 12:2; Jos. Ant. 14.4.3).

After the death of Antiochus, “all the lawless and the ungodly of Israel...led by Alcimus, who wanted to be high priest” (1 Macc. 7:5), complained to the new king, DEMETRIUS, that Judas MACCABEE and his brothers had brought ruin on the land. Demetrius made ALCIMUS high priest and sent him with BACCHIDES to take vengeance, but the “Hasideans were first among the Israelites to seek peace” (7:13). Although Alcimus promised not to harm them, “he seized sixty of them and killed them in one day, in accordance with the word that was written, ‘The flesh of your faithful ones [Gk. hosios G4008, “pure, holy,” a word that commonly renders Heb. ḥādsid] and their blood they poured out all around Jerusalem, and there was no one to bury them’” (7:16-17, quoting Ps. 79:2-3). Elsewhere we read that, at a later time, the former high priest Alcimus reported to Demetrius: “Those of the Jews who are called Hasideans, whose leader is Judas Maccabeus, are keeping up war and stirring up sedition, and will not let the kingdom attain tranquility” (2 Macc. 14:6; quotations from NRSV).

After the revolt, the Maccabean leaders (who belonged to the priestly line but were not descendants of ZADOK) laid claim to the high priesthood, and most scholars believe that the Hasidim broke with them over this issue (see HASMONEANS). It is also widely thought that the later PHARISEES and possibly the ESSENES (whose name is perhaps derived from ḥāsid) developed out of two branches of the Hasidim. (Various views are represented by the following: HJP, rev. ed. [1973-87], 1:145, 157; 2:400-401; P. Davies in JJS 28 [1977]: 127-40; R. T. Beckwith in RevQ 11, no. 41 [Oct. 1982]: 3-46; J. Kampen, The Hasideans and the Origin of Pharisaism: A Study in 1 and 2 Maccabees [1988].)

The modern Hasidim (Chasidim) constitute a Jewish sect founded by Baal Shem Tov (1698-1760) in eastern Europe. He was famed as a miracle worker and healer, and was a pious character and mystic. His teaching developed in opposition to the unbending rationalism of the TALMUD and was characterized by a joyous worship of God, religious frenzy, emotional exaltation in prayer, and communion with God through ecstasy. Learning, he taught, is not necessary to gain favor with God, for God hears the joyous prayers of the unschooled just as much as those of the learned.

The leaders of the modern Hasidim are called Zaddikim (Tzadikim). They were thought to have achieved so holy a state that they could serve as mediators between God and the common people. Their doctrines spread with great rapidity among the poor and uneducated masses, and aroused a great deal of opposition among the Talmudists, who in 1781 pronounced it a heresy. Eventually the Hasidim separated from the rest of Judaism as a distinct sect. During the first half of the 19th cent., Hasidism won over nearly half of all the Jews of the world, but with the rise of the Enlightenment in Europe its power waned. It continued, however, as a living force in eastern Europe until the Second World War. In attenuated form it still continues in Palestine, America, and other lands to which it was transplanted. In modern times it was popularized by Martin Buber. (See G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism [1941], chs. 3 and 9; M. L. Diamond, Martin Buber—Jewish Existentialist [1960], 110-37; J. R. Mintz, Hasidic People: A Place in the New World [1992]; T. Rabinovicz, ed., The Encyclopedia of Hasidism [1996].)

I. The Jewish war of independence. In the early days of the Maccabean Revolt, the Syrians (Seleucids) underestimated the strength of the Maccabees. With major problems in the eastern part of their empire, the Syrians were content to send minor generals and small detachments to deal with the rebellious Jews. The revolt, however, had wide popular support, with the result that Judas MACCABEE and his brothers posed a serious challenge to Syrian rule. One after another of the Syrian armies sent against the Jews suffered defeat. Judas killed the general APOLLONIUS, and another, named SERON, was routed at BETH HORON.

ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes, the Seleucid emperor, realized that he had a full-scale revolt in Judea—but his attention was diverted by another rebellion among the PARTHIANS, successors to the old Persian empire. Antiochus personally moved eastward to Parthia, leaving his general LYSIAS to handle the rebellious Jews. Lysias gathered an army of Syrians, Hellenistically minded Jews (see HELLENISM), and volunteers from neighboring countries to defeat the Jewish rebels. Nicanor, Gorgias, and Ptolemy, subordinates of Lysias, were in charge of the engagement. Judas, however, by a surprise night attack, annihilated the Syrian army and seized enormous stores of booty. This victory, at the town of EMMAUS (166-165 B.C.), opened the road to JERUSALEM for Judas and his followers.

As Judas and his army moved toward Jerusalem, MENELAUS, the high priest who had collaborated with Antiochus, fled. Judas and his followers, subsequently known as the Maccabees, entered Jerusalem and took everything except the fort known as the ACRA. They entered the temple and removed the signs of paganism that had been installed there. The altar dedicated to Jupiter (ZEUS) was destroyed, and a new altar was erected to the God of Israel. The statue of Zeus was ground to dust. Beginning with the twenty-fifth of Kislev (December), they celebrated an eight-day Feast of DEDICATION, known also as Hanukkah and as the Feast of Lights.

For about a year and a half, Judas was master of Judea. The Syrians were awaiting an opportunity to strike back, however, and Judea's neighbors proved sympathetic to the Hellenists. The Syrian general, Lysias, marched against Judea and defeated a Maccabean army at Beth Zechariah near Jerusalem. Lysias then besieged Jerusalem, hoping to starve the Maccabees into submission. During the siege, however, Lysias learned that ANTIOCH OF SYRIA, capital of the empire, was being threatened by a rival, Philip. Anxious to head N, Lysias made an offer of peace to the Jews.

In the name of Syria, Lysias offered to refrain from interference in the internal affairs of Judea. Laws against the observance of Judaism would be repealed. Menelaus would be removed from office, and the high priesthood granted to a milder Hellenist named Eliakim, or ALCIMUS. Lysias promised that Judas and his followers would not be punished. The walls of Jerusalem would be razed, however.

A provisional government in Jerusalem considered the peace terms. This council included Maccabean army officials, respected scribes and elders from the party of the Hasidim (see HASIDEANS), and orthodox Jews who had supported Judas. The promise of religious freedom satisfied a majority of the council. Judas, however, was convinced that the promise was meaningless apart from full political liberty. The appeal of peace won the day, however, and Judas was outvoted. Alcimus was installed as priest. Menelaus was executed. Judas and a few of his followers left the city.

The fears of Judas proved correct, however. Alcimus had a number of the Hasidim, the orthodox party, seized and executed. Many loyal Jews turned to Judas again, and the war was renewed. Difficulties were greater than before, however. Alcimus appealed to Syria for aid, and a sizable army was sent. The hellenizing Jews adopted a more moderate attitude and won over large segments of the followers of Judas. Left with an ill-equipped army of 800 men, Judas bravely met a large Syrian army under NICANOR. Nicanor's Day became the holiday commemorating Judas's victory on that occasion. In 161 B.C., Judas fell in battle with another Syrian general, BACCHIDES. With the death of Judas, the first phase of the Maccabean struggle ended.

Several hundred soldiers loyal to the principles of Judas fled across the Jordan River. From the standpoint of Syria, they were a band of outlaws, but to many Jews—even those who had made their peace with Alcimus—they were the true patriots. Judas's brother Jonathan became the new leader, and young Jews were constantly being attracted to their ranks.

Syria was able to gain important military victories, and the Jews were on the defensive in the years following Judas's death. In 160 B.C., however, Alcimus died, an event regarded by many as God's judgment on him for his wickedness. From 160 to 153 the Maccabees slowly regained power. Jonathan's victory came as a result of diplomacy rather than war. A pretender, Alexander Balas, claimed the Syrian throne of Demetrius II (153-152), and both claimants sought Jewish support. Demetrius freed hostages held in Syria. Both Demetrius and Balas recognized Jonathan as the leader best able to rally the Jews. The Hellenistic Jews were bypassed, and in the year 153 Balas appointed Jonathan high priest. Jonathan had no interest in either the pretender or Demetrius, but he was astute enough to play a delaying action, which ultimately proved successful. He supported Balas and made treaties with Sparta and Rome. Rome had designs on the eastern Mediterranean, and therefore had a vested interest in weakening the Seleucid empire. In 150, Demetrius was killed, and Alexander Balas emerged as king. Jonathan continued as high priest and was further designated as governor of Judea and a member of the Syrian nobility. Jonathan's brother Simon was named governor of the Philistine territory along the Mediterranean coast. The Roman senate, with an eye to the future, declared itself the friend of Judea, but no efforts were made to implement the declaration.

Jonathan's foreign policy promoted the internal prosperity of Judea. The coastal cities, ruled by Simon, were practically annexed. Trypho, a former general under Alexander Balas, set out to destroy Jonathan and force Judea back into the Syrian orbit. He was able to take Jonathan by trickery, after which Jonathan was murdered. Simon succeeded him as leader of the Maccabean forces. See SIMON MACCABEE.

Simon was advanced in years when he became ruling high priest. Syria was rent into factions, one acknowledging Demetrius II as king, the other recognizing the legitimacy of Antiochus VI, a boy under the guardianship of the ambitious TRYPHO. Trypho ultimately murdered Antiochus and took the throne for himself, reigning as the first Syrian king who did not trace his dynasty to SELEUCUS, Alexander's general who had founded the dynasty. Simon ignored Trypho, recognizing Demetrius as rightful king of Syria.

Demetrius, in return for Jewish recognition, granted the Jews full immunity from taxation. This was interpreted as an acknowledgment of independence, and it occasioned great joy among the Jews. Simon was able to starve out the Syrian garrison at the citadel in Jerusalem known as the Acra. He also occupied the cities of Joppa, Beth Zur, and Gaza. Coins were issued bearing the words, "Holy Jerusalem," "Shekel of Israel," and the year numbers, 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

During the period of peace that marked the priesthood of Simon, the question of the legitimacy of the Maccabean priesthood was settled. The party of the Hasidim (the pious) had recognized the rights of the family of ONIAS, the priest first deposed by Antiochus Epiphanes, as legitimate heirs to the Aaronic priesthood. The family of Onias had gone to Egypt during the Maccabean conflict, a fact that was interpreted as a renouncing of claims to the priesthood. In recognition of Simon's wise rule, a convocation of leaders in Israel named him "leader and high priest for ever, until a trustworthy prophet" should arise (1 Macc. 14:25-49). The priesthood would henceforth be hereditary in the family of Simon. Simon was the last of the sons of Mattathias. The dynasty that he founded is known as the Hasmonean dynasty, named for an ancestor of the Maccabees named Asamonaïos (Jos. Ant. 12.6.1 §265; many scholars believe this term is derived from the place name HESHMON). Under Simon, a brother of Judas and the last of the sons of Mattathias, the concept of a hereditary ruling priesthood in the Hasmonean family was established and legitimized.

II. The Hasmonean dynasty

A. *John Hyrcanus. In 135 B.C., Simon and two of his sons, Mattathias and Judas, were murdered by an ambitious son-in-law. A third son, John Hyrcanus, managed to escape and succeed Simon as hereditary head of the Jewish state. The older generation that had fought and died for religious liberty was dying out. A new generation, proud of past victories and anticipating greater successes, was in control.

Although Syria under Antiochus VII was powerful enough to have conquered Jerusalem, she offered conditional recognition to Hyrcanus. The Roman senate may have helped write the terms of recognition. Hyrcanus was to consider himself subject to Syria and to help in Syrian military campaigns when requested. He was to forfeit the coastal cities that had been annexed under Jonathan and Simon, except for JOPPA, which would serve as the port city of the Jews. The Syrians, for their part, pledged to leave Judea. As a result, the hellenizing party disappeared from the Jewish political scene.

In 128 B.C., Antiochus was killed during a Parthian campaign. From this time on Judea enjoyed de facto independence. John Hyrcanus began a policy of territorial expansion, including the reconquest of the coastal cities ceded to Syria during the early years of his reign: Hyrcanus turned southward and conquered the province known as IDUMEA. The ancient Edomites (see EDOM) had been pushed out of their territory S and E of the Dead Sea by the NABATEAN Arabs, with the result that they moved into southern Palestine, including the area S of Hebron. This is the area that came to be known as Idumea, and it was forcibly annexed to the Jewish state by John Hyrcanus.

The coastal cities linked the commercial highway through Palestine. From earliest times merchants and warriors passed N from Egypt along the coastal road leading to Syria and Mesopotamia (see VIA MARIS). Without control of commercial routes, Hyrcanus could not hope to build a major state. As soon as Syrian internal affairs made interference from the N unlikely, Hyrcanus took the coastal cities as a guarantee of the future of his state's freedom of movement.

Another ancient trade route passed S of Judea, through Idumea, to Egypt. As Hyrcanus captured this territory, he compelled the Idumeans to accept Judaism and become circumcised. This action met opposition from many of the pious Jews of his own generation and has been condemned in succeeding ages. Ironically, the grandson of Mattathias forced religious conformity on a people conquered by Jewish arms (and a later Idumean “Jew,” HEROD, would oppress Judea again). Some men of wealth and the aristocracy favored Hyrcanus for making possible new commercial opportunities and for annexing larger territories to be governed. Moreover, some extreme nationalists supported Hyrcanus in the interests of enhanced national glory. The mass of the population, however, did not profit from territorial expansion. They were alarmed at the growing secularism of the age. The priesthood had little semblance of a sacred office. There were practical considerations, too. Wars cost lives as well as money.

The conquest of SAMARIA by John Hyrcanus ended the Samaritan challenge to the Jewish state. Samaritans had been enemies of the Jews since the return from Babylonian exile. They had built their temple on Mount GERIZIM, their sacred mountain. Samaria fell after a siege of one year, after which the city was razed. Old animosities continued, but the Hasmonean state proved itself militarily capable of dealing with the Samaritans.

During the reign of John Hyrcanus, political parties realigned. The old party of the Hasidim, “the pious,” became the party of the PHARISEES, “the separatists”—a probable reference to separation from uncleanness and defilement. It may be that the ESSENES date from the same period. Essenes were highly regarded by ancient writers such as JOSEPHUS, PHILO JUDAEUS, and PLINY the Elder. They were industrious, peace-loving, and pious. They ultimately separated themselves geographically from their countrymen, forming communal settlements such as that at QUMRAN where they attempted to cultivate their inner lives and live in total conformity to God’s law (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). Both Pharisees and Essenes continued the traditions of the Hasidim.

The old party of the Hellenists disappeared, to be replaced by the SADDUCEES, ostensibly the descendants of the priest ZADOK. As the sect developed, however, it became the party of the Jerusalem aristocracy and of the temple priesthood. John Hyrcanus began as a Pharisee, but during his reign he broke relations with the heirs of the Hasidim and espoused the cause of the Sadducees, who had a more secular and pro-Hellenistic philosophy.

The reign of John Hyrcanus was a turning point in the history of the Jews. The unity of the Hasmonean state was guaranteed. The borders of the state had been extended on every side. Although breaking with his orthodox past, Hyrcanus's life did not offend the most meticulous adherent of the law. His children, however, grew up in a palace and numbered themselves among the aristocrats. Their training was more in Greek than in Hebrew thought, and they had little sympathy for the older piety.

B. Aristobulus. The death of John Hyrcanus (104 B.C.) precipitated a dynastic struggle among his five children. His eldest son, who preferred his Greek name ARISTOBULUS to his Hebrew name Judah, emerged as victor. He cast his mother and three of his brothers into prison, where two of his brothers are thought to have starved to death, along with his mother. Another brother, Antigonos, was murdered in the palace.

Aristobulus continued the policy of territorial expansion begun by Hyrcanus. In his short reign of one year he pushed N, conquered and Judaized GALILEE, and annexed area near the Lebanon mountains. Not content with the title of high priest, Aristobulus took to himself that of king. The Hasmoneans used that title until POMPEY took Judea and made it part of the Roman empire. Aristobulus was called the phil-Hellene—the lover of Greece and things Greek. Whereas it is true that the records are prejudiced in favor of the Pharisees and against Aristobulus, it is still difficult to find anything of a positive nature in his record. Drink, disease, and the haunting fear of rebellion brought death, ending his one-year reign.

C. Alexander Jannaeus. After the death of Aristobulus, his widow, Salome ALEXANDRA, released his younger brother, Alexander, from prison, married him, and raised him to the throne.

Any who hoped for a change in policy with the accession of Jannaeus were bitterly disappointed. Alexander Jannaeus had to defend Judea against Egypt, but in the aftermath he was able to extend his territory to the Egyptian frontier and into the TRANSJORDAN area. The size of the state he ruled compared to that of the days of DAVID and SOLOMON. It incorporated the whole of Palestine with adjacent areas from the Egyptian border to Lake Huleh. PEREA in Transjordan was included, as were the Philistine cities except ASHKELON. The Hasmoneans aspired to become a maritime power. Ships are depicted on coins of the period, and they are sculptured on the family tomb near Modein.

Territories incorporated into the Hasmonean kingdom were quickly Judaized. Edomites came to exercise an important place in Jewish life. Although the orthodox of Judea considered “Galilee of the Gentiles” less than wholly trustworthy, this important region became thoroughly Jewish in its life and piety. Only Samaria resisted assimilation successfully. Individual cities such as Apollonia and Scythopolis, with only a small Jewish element in their population, likewise retained their non-Jewish character.

The rift between the Pharisees and the Hasmonean leaders, first noted during the reign of John Hyrcanus, reached its climax during the reign of Jannaeus, who used foreign mercenaries to keep the Pharisees in subjection. Open rebellion broke out at a memorable Feast of Tabernacles. Jannaeus, while officiating in the temple as priest-king, showed his contempt for the Pharisees by pouring out a libation at his own feet, instead of on the altar as prescribed in the Pharisaic ritual. Enraged, the people in the temple pelted Jannaeus with the citrons that they were carrying in honor of the feast. Jannaeus called upon his soldiers to restore order, and in the process 6,000 people were killed (Jos. Ant. 13.13.5).

The result was six years of civil war. The Pharisees invited Demetrius III, the king of Syria, to aid them. In this turn of events, the spiritual descendants of the Hasidim asked the descendants of Antiochus Epiphanes to aid them against the descendants of the Maccabees. The Syrians came and, aided by the Pharisees, forced Jannaeus into hiding in the Judean hills. The Pharisees did some serious thinking, however. Fearing that the Syrians would claim Judea as the fruit of victory, and hoping that Alexander Jannaeus and his sympathizers had learned their lesson, 6,000 Pharisees deserted the Syrian army and went over to Jannaeus. With this realignment of forces, Demetrius withdrew his Syrian armies, and Alexander Jannaeus emerged as victor.

Jannaeus did not learn from his near-defeat, however. He instituted a hunt for the leaders of the rebellion and made a horrible example of those he caught. He celebrated his victory with a banquet to which the leaders of the Sadducees were invited. Josephus wrote that 800 Pharisees were crucified in the presence of the celebrating guests. While one must allow for exaggeration, Alexander Jannaeus must be considered a tyrant of the worst kind. Some feel that he was the “Wicked Priest” who, according to the DSS, persecuted the “Teacher of Righteousness.” The bloody deeds of Jannaeus made compromise between Pharisees and Sadducees impossible.

One of the pious leaders of the Pharisees during the days of Alexander Jannaeus was Simon ben Shetach, the brother of his wife Alexandra. Tradition suggests that Jannaeus repented on his deathbed, instructing his wife to get rid of the Sadducean advisers and reign with the aid of the Pharisees.

D. Alexandra. Salome ALEXANDRA had been successively the widow of Aristobulus and of Alexander Jannaeus. She was nearly seventy years of age when she began to reign in her own right, and she reigned alone for seven more years. Being a woman, Salome could not officiate as high priest. She appointed her elder son, Hyrcanus II, as high priest, and assigned the military command to his brother Aristobulus II. Simon ben Shetach, Alexandra’s brother, was an important spiritual force from the party of the Pharisees.

The influence of the Pharisees in the area of education was a positive one. The SANHEDRIN, the Jewish Council of State, decreed that every young man should be educated. This education was primarily in the TORAH—the biblical law. A comprehensive system of elementary education was developed so that the larger villages, towns, and cities of Judea could produce a literate, informed people.

The reign of Alexandra was peaceful in comparison with its predecessors. Aristobulus led an expedition against DAMASCUS that proved futile, while a threatened invasion from Armenia was averted by diplomacy and bribes. Internal wounds were not healed, however. The Pharisees were happy in their recent recognition, but the Sadducees were resentful of the fact that they had lost power. To make matters worse, the Pharisees used their power to seek revenge for the massacre of their leaders by Alexander Jannaeus. Sadducean blood was spilt, and the makings of another civil war were developing. The Sadducees found in Aristobulus II, the younger son of Jannaeus and Alexandra, the man they would support as Alexandra’s successor. He was a soldier and thus appealed to those who dreamed of imperial expansion and power. Hyrcanus II, the older brother and rightful heir, was congenial to the Pharisees. With the death of Alexandra, the partisans of the two sons faced a showdown.

E. Hyrcanus II. At the death of Salome Alexandra, her older son Hyrcanus, already serving as high priest, succeeded to the throne, unmindful of the challenge he was soon to face. Aristobulus promptly rallied the Sadducees, gained a victory near Jericho, and marched his army to Jerusalem. Hyrcanus and the Pharisees had neither enthusiasm for war nor military ability. Declaring that he never really desired the throne, Hyrcanus surrendered all his honors to Aristobulus.

F. Aristobulus II. By right of conquest and backed by the Sadducees, Aristobulus took the throne from his brother. Hyrcanus and Aristobulus vowed eternal friendship. The eldest son of Aristobulus, Alexander, married Hyrcanus's only daughter, Alexandra.

Peace between the brothers was short-lived. Hyrcanus found it advisable (or necessary) to flee to ARETAS, king of the NABATEAN Arabs. Antipater, an Idumean by birth, saw in Hyrcanus's position an opportunity to gain political power in Judea. Hyrcanus was persuaded that he had been defrauded of his rights to the throne by his younger brother. According to Antipater's plan, the Nabateans would come to Jerusalem, drive out the usurper, and restore Hyrcanus to his rightful position. Hyrcanus agreed to the plan, and the Nabateans marched against Jerusalem. Aristobulus, caught by surprise, shut himself up in Jerusalem, and both sides prepared for a long siege.

III. The intervention of the Romans. The battles between Aristobulus II and Hyrcanus II provided ROME with the opportunity to intervene. In 63 B.C., POMPEY took Palestine. Rome probably would not have invaded Palestine if a dependable ruler had been there. As it was, Rome had a ready-made excuse to intervene in Palestinian affairs. Although the heirs of the Hasmoneans continued to serve under the Romans for a few decades, Pompey's invasion brought the Hasmonean Dynasty to a close.

C. F. PFEIFFER

Hasrah haz'ruh (חֲסֵרָה H2897, derivation uncertain). (1) Father of Tokhath and grandfather of SHALLUM; the latter was "keeper of the wardrobe" and the husband of HULDAH the prophetess (2 Chr. 34:22). The name is given as HARHAS (and father of Tikvah) in the parallel passage (2 Ki. 22:14).

(2) Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned with ZERUBBABEL from the EXILE (1 Esd. 5:31; LXX Asara, KJV "Azara"; not included in the parallel lists in Ezra and Nehemiah). Some identify him with #1 above.

Hassenaah has'uh-nay'uh (הַסְנְאָה H2189, possibly from שָׂנֵא H8533, "to hate"). The father (or ancestor) of a family that rebuilt the FISH GATE (Neh. 3:3). Many believe, however, that Hassenaah should be understood as the definite article plus SENAAH (Ezra 2:35; Neh. 7:38), which may well be a place name. If so, "the sons of Hassenaah" means perhaps "the people from the [region of] Senaah." See also HASSENUAH.

Hassenuah has'uh-noo'uh (הַסְנִיָּה H2190, possibly from שָׂנֵא H8533, "to hate"). KJV Hasenuah. Father of Hodaviah and ancestor of Sallu, from the tribe of BENJAMIN; Sallu is mentioned as one of the first to resettle in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:7). In a parallel list of postexilic Benjamites, Hassenuah is mentioned as father (or ancestor) of a certain Judah who was in charge of the Second District of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:9; KJV, “Senuah”). The name is possibly a variant form of HASSENAAH and SENAAB.

Hasshub hash’uhb (חֲשִׁיב H3121, “considerate” or “[highly] regarded” or “one to whom has been reckoned”). KJV also Hashub (in Nehemiah). (1) Son (meaning prob. a descendant) of PAHATH-MOAB; along with Malkijah son of Harim, he helped repair a section of the wall of JERUSALEM as well as the Tower of the OVENS (Neh. 3:11). He is probably the same Hasshub mentioned along with a certain Benjamin as having made repairs in front of their house (v. 23).

(2) One of the Israelite leaders who sealed the covenant in the time of EZRA (Neh. 10:23).

(3) Father of Shemaiah; the latter was a leader of the MERARI clan among the Levites and is mentioned as having settled in Jerusalem after the return from the captivity (1 Chr. 9:14; Neh. 11:15).

Hassophereth ha-sof’uh-rith (חֲסֹפְרֶת H2191 [Ezra 2:55], “the [office of] scribe” or “the guild of scribes”; also סֹפְרֶת H6072 [Neh. 7:57]). Ancestor of a family of SOLOMON’S SERVANTS who returned after the EXILE (“Hassophereth” in Ezra 2:55; “Sophereth” in Neh. 7:57 [KJV has “Sophereth” in both passages]; “Assaphioth” in 1 Esd. 5:33 [KJV, “Azaphion”]). Because the name is feminine in form, some have thought that the reference is to a matriarchal clan descended from a female scribe (cf. ABD, 6:159, s.v. “Sophereth”; however, cf. the form qōhelet H7738, Eccl. 1:1).

Hasupha huh-soo’fuh (חֲשׁוּפָא H3102, possibly “stripped” or “prematurely born”). KJV Hashupha (in Nehemiah). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46; 1 Esd. 5:29 [KJV, “Asipha”]).

hat. This English term is used by the KJV and other versions to render Aramaic karbēlā H10368, which occurs only once (Dan. 3:21; NIV, “turbans”); it is listed among other articles of clothing worn by the three Hebrews in the fiery furnace. It probably means “helmet, cap” (cf. Akk. karballatu, “pointed caps”), although some prefer “mantle” (cf. the cognate Heb. verb kirbēl H4124, “to clothe, wrap,” in 1 Chr. 15:27).

H. M. WOLF

Hatach hay’tak. KJV form of HATHACH.

hatchets. Possible rendering of Hebrew kelappôt H3965, with reference to an implement, perhaps a type of crowbar, used by the enemy in smashing the engraved wood of the temple (Ps. 74:6; NRSV renders “hammers,” but uses “hatchets” [NIV, “axes”] for the accompanying term, kaššîl H4172).

hate, hatred. An intense aversion or active hostility that is expressed in settled opposition to a person or thing. In ordinary OT usage, the Hebrew verb śānē’ H8533 expresses the hatred that people have for their fellow human beings—a response that usually comes from anger, fear, or a sense of injury, as when ESAU is said to have hated JACOB (Gen. 27:41; NIV, “held a grudge against”). In the NT, something of the same emphasis can be seen in the prophetic statement that Christ's disciples will be hated by men (Jn. 15:18-25; Gk. miseō G3631). The apostle PAUL condemned hatred, listing it as one of the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:20). Also, the OT includes a clear prohibition of hatred between kindred (Lev. 19:17).

There is a special and sometimes problematic usage in the OT, where God is said to love Jacob but to hate Esau (Mal. 1:2-3), to hate evildoers (Ps. 5:5), and to hate that which was evil (Prov. 6:16). The emotional connotation should be subtracted from such passages; God must not be understood to act on the human plane of anger and hostility. It must likewise be recognized that the Hebrew thought-form makes no sharp distinction between the individual and his deeds. A person in Hebrew thought is the sum total of the actions of his life, so that to say God hated a man is not to say that God was maliciously disposed toward a particular personality, but to note divine opposition to evil that was registered in that life. In connection with Esau, "hate" has a very colorless sense, being almost equivalent to the acknowledgement of a divine selectivity: Jacob he chose and Esau he rejected. God also was said to hate idolatry and false worship (Deut. 12:31; 16:22; Jer. 44:4) and even Israel's worship when it was external only (Isa. 1:14; Amos 5:21; Mal. 2:13-16).

Some OT passages intertwine God's hatred with the hatred of humans. God's enemies were the enemies of his people, and the enemies of God's people likewise became the objects of a divine hatred (Num. 10:35; Deut. 7:15; 33:11). The book of Psalms especially joined the hatred of God and his people for their mutual enemies (Pss. 68:1-2; 139:19-22).

Jesus modified the teaching of the Jews by insisting that although they had heard it said they were to love their neighbors but hate their enemies, they should rather love their enemies and do good to those who hated them (Matt. 5:43; Lk. 6:27). Jesus' words of admonition to his disciples seem strange in light of his teaching of love for enemies when he also said, "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, his wife and children, his brothers and sisters—yes, even his own life—he cannot be my disciple" (Lk. 14:26). The key to understanding these words is found in a knowledge of Semitic thought-forms. The Semitic mind thought by the contrast of extremes, such as light and darkness, truth and falsehood, love and hate. The disciples were thus instructed not that they should have anger, or hostility, toward those nearest and dearest to them, but rather that even those nearest and dearest to them must be given second place to their loyalty and affection for Jesus. Nothing must be allowed to interfere with the disciples' commitment to the cause of Christ, especially not their own selfish desires or ambitions.

The antithesis of love to hatred is especially emphasized in the Gospel of John, which expresses a sharp Semitic juxtaposition in the imagery of light and darkness. "Everyone who does evil hates the light, and will not come into the light for fear that his deeds will be exposed" (Jn. 3:20). In the same context, it is the love of God in Jesus Christ that has become operative in the world to destroy the hatred of the light; and even though the disciples are hated by the world, they are to reveal to it the love of Christ that is stronger than hate (17:14, 20-26). See LOVE.

Hathach hay'thak (חַתָּךְ H2251, possibly Persian, "good one" or "courtier"). KJV Hatach; TNIV Hathack. A EUNUCH under King XERXES assigned to attend Queen ESTHER (Esth. 4:5-6, 9-10). He served as a messenger between Esther and MORDECAI after HAMAN plotted to kill the Jews.

Hathak hay'thak. TNIV form of HATHAK.

Hathath hay'thath (חַתַּת H3171, “dread” or “weakling”). Son of OTHNIEL and grandson of Kenaz (CALEB’S younger brother), included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:13).

Hatipha huh-t’fuh (חַטִּיפָא H2640, “captured”). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56; 1 Esd. 5:32 [KJV, “Atipha”]).

Hatita huh-ti’tuh (חַטִּיטָא H2638, meaning uncertain). Ancestor of a family of gatekeepers who returned with ZERUBBABEL from the captivity (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45; 1 Esd. 5:28 [KJV, “Teta”]).

hatred. See HATE, HATRED.

Hatsi-hammenuchoth (חַצִּי הַמְּנַחֹת). KJV marginal reading for a Hebrew phrase that probably means “half of the Menuhoth” (1 Chr. 2:52 NRSV; KJV text, “half of the Manahethites” [similarly NIV]).

Hattaavah. See KIBROTH HATTA AVAH.

Hatti. See HITTITE.

Hatticon, Hattikon. See HAZER HATTICON.

Hattil hat’uhl (חַטִּיל H2639, possibly “talkative”). Ancestor of a family of SOLOMON’S SERVANTS who returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59; called “Agia” [KJV, “Hagia”] in 1 Esd. 5:34 ).

Hattush hat’uhsh (חַטּוּשׁ H2637, meaning unknown). (1) Son of Shemaiah and descendant of DAVID through ZERUBBABEL and SHECANIAH; he is apparently the same Hattush mentioned among the family heads who returned from the captivity (1 Chr. 3:22; Ezra 8:2; 1 Esd. 8:29 [KJV, “Lettus”]). Some scholars emend the text of Ezra to agree with the parallel in 1 Esdras (“Hattush the son of Shecaniah”), and on that basis delete from 1 Chronicles the phrase ûbēnê šēma yâ (“and the sons of Shemaiah,” which may have arisen through dittography). If so, Hattush was the brother, not the son, of Shemaiah.

(2) Son of Hashabneiah; he was one of the Isra elites who helped repair the wall of JERUSALEM under NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:10).

(3) A priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:4); he is probably the same man listed among those who returned with Zerubbabel and JESHUA (12:2).

Hauran haw’ruhn (חֹרַן H2588, derivation uncertain). A district SE of Mount HERMON, E of the JORDAN and the Sea of Galilee, N of the YARMUK River, and W of Jebel Druze. The area, which partially corresponds with biblical BASHAN, is about 50 mi. square and some 2,000 ft. above sea level. It was called Auranitis in the Greco-Roman period. The many extinct volcanoes on the E and W sides of the plateau give evidence of extensive volcanic activity in prehistoric times. The fertility of the rich lava soil has made it a great grain-growing area, providing wheat for DAMASCUS and PALESTINE. The district abounds in ruined cities dating back to the early Christian centuries, and everywhere there may be seen abandoned houses built entirely of black basalt. Hauran is almost treeless.

The name appears only in the book of EZEKIEL, where it is mentioned as the ideal border of Canaan on the E (Ezek. 47:16, 18). The name occurs also in Egyptian texts of the 19th dynasty and in ancient inscriptions of Assyria, but not much is known about the history of Hauran beyond the 1st cent. B.C. The tribe of MANASSEH settled both N and S of the Yarmuk, but in later times there were comparatively few Israelites in the land. Although SOLOMON taxed the region, it was seldom mastered by Israelite rulers. Alexander Jannaeus (see HASMONEANS II.C) gained control of the W part, but the NABATEANS repeatedly brought it under their sway. HEROD the Great included the whole of the land in his kingdom; and when he died his son Philip ruled it as a separate tetrarchy (Lk. 3:1), although it was not really Jewish. After Philip's death, CALIGULA bestowed it upon Herod Agrippa I, who ruled it until his death in A.D. 44, after which for nine years it was administered by the Romans. CLAUDIUS then gave it to Herod Agrippa II, and after his death in A.D. 106 TRAJAN added it to the Roman province of SYRIA. Under the Romans, Christianity made rapid progress in the area, but in 632 the Muslim hordes from Arabia swept through the land and utterly destroyed the church. (See G. A. Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, 25th ed. [1931], ch. 30.)

Haustafel. See HOUSEHOLD CODE.

haven. see FAIR HAVENS.

Havilah hav'uh-luh (חַוִּילָה H2564, "sandy"). (1) Son of CUSH and grandson of HAM (Gen. 10:7; 1 Chr. 1:9). His name is probably related to the geographical area discussed in #3 below.

(2) Son of JOKTAN, grandson of EBER, and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:29; 1 Chr. 1:23). His name is probably related to the geographical area discussed in #3 below.

(3) A land described as being bounded by one of the four rivers of the Garden of Eden, the PISHON, and as being rich in gold, resin, and onyx (Gen. 2:11-12; see EDEN, GARDEN OF). The region, or a different place bearing the same name, is mentioned with SHUR (prob. in N SINAI) as one of the limits of the territory of the Amalekites (25:18; see AMALEK); and SAUL is said to have defeated the Amalekites in this area (1 Sam. 15:7, though it is widely thought that Havilah here is a textual corruption). The location of Havilah is disputed, and various proposals have been made. Many scholars connect the name with Arabic Haulan, which refers both to an area in SW ARABIA (Yemen) and to an ancient tribal federation that still lives there. Some have even suggested that the individuals mentioned in #1 and #2 above represent two branches of this Arabian tribe. Others prefer to locate Havilah in W or NW Arabia. C. Westermann (Genesis, 3 vols. [1984-86], 313, 527) points out that in Gen. 2:11 the reference may be to the whole Arabian peninsula and that, if the name derives from ḥōl/H2567, “sand,” it might have been used in any number of places. (See further ABD, 3:81-82.)

S. BARABAS

Havvoth Jair hav’oth-jay’uhr (חֹתַיִר, H2596, “villages of Jair”). KJV Havoth-jair (Num. 32:41; Jdg. 10:4), Bashan-havoth-jair (Deut. 3:14); “towns of Jair” (1 Chr. 2:23). A settlement of sixty (Josh. 13:30) villages E of the JORDAN on the border of GILEAD and BASHAN. They were taken by JAIR, the son of Segub, and named after himself (Num. 32:41; 1 Chr. 2:22), and were part of the inheritance allotted by MOSES to the half-tribe of MANASSEH. At one time they belonged to the kingdom of OG, king of Bashan (Josh. 13:29-30). Jair was able to conquer “the whole region of Argob as far as the border of the Geshurites and the Maacathites” (Deut. 3:14).

These settlements are named as part of the commissariat district of BEN GEBER, SOLOMON’S purveyor in RAMOTH GILEAD, but it is not clear whether “the district of Argob in Bashan and its sixty large walled cities with bronze gate bars” (1 Ki. 4:13) refers to “the settlements of Jair” or are in addition to it. Similarly, the precise meaning of 1 Chr. 2:22-23 is uncertain: “Segub was the father of Jair, who controlled twenty-three towns in Gilead. (But Geshur and Aram captured Havvoth Jair, as well as Kenath with its surrounding settlements—sixty towns.)” It is possible that the sixty towns attributed to Jair in Josh. 13:30 include the towns originally associated with Nobah, who is said to have “captured Kenath and its surrounding settlements” (Num. 32:42). KD (Pentateuch, 3:305) speculate that “Nobah was a subordinate branch of the family of Jair, and the towns conquered by him were under the supremacy of Jair.”

According to Jdg. 10:3-4, moreover, Havvoth Jair was the name of a group of thirty villages in Gilead ruled by the thirty sons of Jair of Gilead, one of the judges of Israel. If this passage refers to the same settlements discussed above, it may be that Jair of Gilead inherited (or otherwise took over) the sixty towns previously under Jair son of Segub and that thirty of them were controlled by his sons. But other explanations are possible. Some scholars believe that the texts reflect different and conflicting etiologies. It is also worthy of note that the term ḥawwōt (possibly “tent-villages”) occurs only in the combination ḥawwōt yāīr (except for the associated use in Num. 32:41a), though the significance of this detail is uncertain. (See further Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 209; ABD, 3:82-83.)

hawk. To the ordinary person, a hawk is any small day-bird of prey (see BIRDS OF PREY). The falconer gives the name to any species he uses, while to the naturalist it means those with short rounded wings, like the sparrow hawk (Old World) and the Cooper’s hawk (North America). In the Bible the term is used to render Hebrew nēs H5891, which occurs in two lists of unclean foods (Lev. 11:16; Deut. 14:15) and in a poetic passage, “Does the hawk take flight by your wisdom / and spread his wings toward the south?” (Job 39:26; the autumn migration movement is suggested, but this applies equally to many species). G. R. Driver (in HDB rev., 367) notes that this bird is placed in between some of the owls and takes it as a general name for small birds of prey, such as kestrel and sparrow hawk. According to HALOT (2:714), the Hebrew term refers to the Falco peregrinus; see FALCON. (The NRSV uses “hawk” also to render qā’at H7684 in Isa. 34:11, but this word probably refers to the desert owl; cf. Lev. 11:18 et al. See further FFB, 40-41; ABD, 6:45-46.)

hay. Grass (or other plants) cut and dried to be used as fodder. The term is used in the NIV to render the common Hebrew and Greek words for “grass” in two appropriate contexts (ḥāaṣîr H2945, Prov. 27:25 [cf. also Isa. 15:6 KJV]; chortos G5965, 1 Cor. 3:12).

Hazael hay’zay-uhl (חֲזַאֵל H2599 [also חֲזַאֵל], “God has seen”). One of the most powerful of the kings of ARAM (Syria), ruling from c. 843 to c. 796 B.C. He reigned contemporaneously with Jehoram (the last few years), Jehu, and Jehoahaz, kings of Israel, and with Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Joash, kings of Judah. He is first mentioned in 1 Ki. 19:15-17, where ELIJAH at Mount Horeb was told by God that he would anoint Hazael king over Aram. At this time he was a high officer in the court of BEN-HADAD II, king of Aram. On a subsequent occasion, his sick sovereign sent him to inquire of the prophet ELISHA, who was then in DAMASCUS, whether or not he would recover from his illness. To this question Elisha replied that the illness of his master was not fatal, but that he would nevertheless die; and he added that Hazael himself was to become king of Aram and would be the perpetrator of monstrous cruelties against the children of Israel. The day after Hazael reported to the king the results of his interview with Elisha, he killed him by smothering him with a wet cloth, and Hazael became king in his stead (2 Ki. 8:7-15).

Soon after, Hazael fought against the combined forces of JEHOAM and AHASIAH at RAMOTH GILEAD (8:28, 29; 9:14, 15). He frequently defeated JEHU in battle, devastating all his country E of the Jordan from the ARNON River in the S to BASHAN in the N (10:32-33). During the reign of JEHOAHAS, Jehu’s successor, he repeatedly encroached upon the territory of Israel, which was kept from complete destruction only by God’s mercy (13:3, 22-23). Hazael also moved into SW Palestine, taking GATH; he compelled the king of Judah to pay a heavy bribe for sparing JERUSALEM (12:17-18; 2 Chr. 24:23-24). It was not until the death of Hazael that Israel was able successfully to check the aggression of Aram under Ben-hadad III, the son of Hazael (2 Ki. 13:24-25).

CUNEIFORM inscriptions show that Hazael (Assyr. Ḫaza’-ila) played a large role in some of the campaigns of SHALMANESER III. In the Black Obelisk from CALAH, Shalmaneser records that in 842 B.C. he joined battle with Hazael. He claims that the Aramean king was defeated, losing 6,000 warriors, 1, 121 chariots, and 470 horsemen, together with his stores, and that although Shalmaneser did not capture Damascus, he overran the Hauran and all the territory back to the Mediterranean Sea. Among his tributary kings he mentions the name of Jehu son of Omri. In another inscription Shalmaneser refers to Hazael as the “son of a nobody,” and mentions that Hazael had “seized the throne” and rebelled against him. (See ANET, 280.)

Among the spoils taken from Damascus by Assyria, and found by archaeologists at Arslan Tash (Hadathah), were an ivory inlay from the side of a bed, with the words engraved on it, “Bar Ama to our Lord Hazael in the year...,” and another ivory tablet, possibly a part of the same bed, showing in relief a god or king in Phoenician-Aramean style, which some scholars believe is actually a portrait of Hazael himself. (Cf. E. Puech in RB 88 [1981]: 544-62. See further E. Kraeling, Aram and Israel [1918], 79-83; M. F. Unger, Israel and the Aramaeans of Damascus [1957], 75-82, 160-63; I. M. In this basalt stela of the 9th cent. B.C., known as the Tel Dan Inscription (or House of David Inscription), Hazael king of Aram boasts of having killed both a northern Israelite king and a ruler of the Davidic dynasty.

Hazaiah huh-zay'yuh (חֲזַיָּהּ H2610, “Yahweh has seen”). Son of Adaiah, descendant of JUDAH through Shelah, and ancestor of Maaseiah; the latter was a provincial leader who settled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:5).

Hazar Addar hay'zahr-ad'uhr (חֲצֵר אֲדָר H2960, “settlement of Addar”). Also Hazar-addar. A site marking the S border of CANAAN (Num. 34:4). It was apparently between KADESH BARNEA and AZMON, but the precise location is unknown. The most common identification is modern (Ain Qedeis (c. 51 mi. SW of BEERSHEBA). The parallel passage (Josh. 15:3) is thought by some to break up the name Hazar Addar into two, HEZRON and ADDAR; others believe that Addar and Hazar Addar are identical and to be distinguished from Hezron. (See Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 70-72.)

Hazar Enan hay'zahr-ee'nuhn (חֲצֵר עֵינָן H2966, “settlement of Enan” [in Ezekiel, חֲצֵר עֵינָן]). Also Hazar-enan and Hazar-enon. A site marking the ideal NE boundary of Israel (Num. 34:9-10), apparently between DAMASCUS and HAMATH (Ezek. 47:17 [cf. also v. 18 RSV by emendation]; 48:1; and see HAZER HATTICON). Some scholars in the past identified it with the modern Hadr at the foot of Mount HERMON, not far from DAN (PLACE) and more than 30 mi. SW of Damascus, but now it is generally believed to be the same as Qaryatein, a full 70 mi. NE of Damascus. If the latter is correct, the envisioned territory of Israel would be almost twice as large as it was during most of its history.

Hazar Gaddah hay'zahr-gad'uh (חֲצֵר גָּדָה H2961, “settlement of Gad”). Also Hazar-gaddah. A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:27). It is mentioned between Moladah and Heshmon, but its precise location is unknown.

Hazar-hatticon hay'zahr-hat'uh-kon. KJV form of HAZER HATTICON.

Hazarmaveth hay'zuhr-may'vith (חֶזְרַמַּוֶּתַּת H2975, "village of Maveth [death]"). Son of JOKTAN, grandson of EBER, and descendant of SHEM (Gen. 10:26; 1 Chr. 1:20). His name appears to be preserved in Arabic Ḥadramaut, applied to a S Arabian tribe and to a fruitful valley running parallel to the Arabian sea coast for about 200 mi. See SABTA. In the days of its greatest glory (5th cent. B.C. and 1st and 2nd cent. A.D.) it was the home of a great civilization, with its capital at Shabwa. (See R. A. B. Hamilton, "Six Weeks in Shabwa," Geographical Journal 108 [1942]: 107-23; G. C. Thompson, The Tombs and Moon Temple of Hureidha [1944]; W. L. Brown and A. F. L. Hazar Shual hay'zuhr-shoo'uhl (חֶזְרַ שְׁעָלַי H2967, "fox habitat"). Also Hazar-shual. A village in the NEGEV, lying within the tribal territory of JUDAH, but assigned to SIMEON (Josh. 15:28; 19:3; 1 Chr. 4:28). It was resettled by the Israelites after the EXILE (Neh. 11:27). It is always mentioned in close relationship with BEERSHEBA, but its precise location is unknown.

Hazar Susah, Hazar Susim hay'zuhr-soo'suh, hay'zuhr-soo'sim (חֶזְרַ סוּסָה H2963 [alternate pl. form, חֶזְרַ סוּסִים H2964], "mare farm, horse enclosure"). Also Hazar-susah, Hazar-susim. A city in the SW part of the tribal territory of JUDAH, but assigned to SIMEON (Josh. 19:5; called "Hazar Susim" in 1 Chr. 4:31). Some scholars believe that the town was originally called SANSANNAH (listed in the parallel passage, Josh. 15:31), and that it was renamed because SOLOMON may have kept there the horses he brought from Egypt and sold to the Hittites and Syrians (1 Ki. 4:26; 9:19; 10:29). If this identification is incorrect, the location of Hazar Susah remains unknown, although some have suggested modern Sbalat Abu Susein, a short distance E of the Wadi Far'ah.

Hazar Susim. See HAZAR SUSAH.

Hazazon Tamar haz'uh-zon-tay'muhr (חֶזְזוֹן תְּמָר H2954, "gravel terrain of Tamar [date-palm]"). KJV Hazezon-tamar; TNI V Hazezon Tamar. After K EDORLAOMER and his allies defeated the HORITES in SEIR, "they turned back and went to En Mishpat (that is, Kadesh), and they conquered the whole territory of the Amalekites, as well as the Amorites who were living in Hazazon Tamar" (Gen. 14:7). This description, along with the subsequent narrative, suggests that Hazazon Tamar was located S or SW of the DEAD SEA, and some scholars identify it with Tamar (1 Ki. 9:18; Ezek. 47:18-19; 48:28), which is generally thought to be modern 'Ain Ḥuṣb, c. 23 mi. SSW of the S tip of the Dead Sea. See discussion under TAMAR (PLACE). Elsewhere, however, Hazazon Tamar is identified with EN GEDI (2 Chr. 20:2), which lies on the W shore of the Dead Sea, midpoint between the N and S tips. It seems unlikely, but not impossible, that Kedorlaomer fought the Amorites in En Gedi. Perhaps the name Hazazon Tamar was applied to more than one site distinguished by palm groves.

hazel. See ALMOND (Gen. 30:37 KJV).

Hazelelponi. KJV form of HAZZELELPONI.

Hazer Hatticon hay'zahr-hat'uh-kon (חֲתִיכֹן הָצֵר H2962, “settlement of Hatticon” or “middle court”). Also Hazer-hatticon; TNIV Hazer Hattikon. A place said to be on the border of HAURAN and named among the boundaries of ideal Israel (Ezek. 47:16). It is generally thought to be a scribal error or a variant name for HAZAR ENAN.

Hazerim huh-zih'r'im. The KJV transliteration of Hebrew ḥāsērîm, plural form of the common noun baser H2958, “village” (Deut. 2:23).

Hazeroth huh-zih'r'oth (חֲצֵרוֹת H2972, “settlements”). A camping station of the Israelites during their wilderness wanderings (Num. 11:35; 12:16; 33:17-18; Deut. 1:1). It was here that AARON and MIRIAM quarreled with MOSES regarding his marriage to a CUSHITE WOMAN and his claim that God spoke only through him (Num. 12:1-15). Hazeroth is generally identified with 'Ain Khadra (Ḥudrat), some 30 mi. NE of Jebel Musa (see SINAI), on the way to AQABAH.

S. BARABAS

Hazon Tamar haz'uh-zon-tay'muhr. TNIV form of HAZAZON TAMAR.

Haziel hay'zee-uhl (חֲזִיֵּאל H2609, possibly “God has seen” or “vision of God”). Son of SHIMEI and a Levite descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 23:9). The text is problematic and emended by some scholars.

Hazo hay'zoh (חֲזוֹ H2605, derivation uncertain). Son of NAHOR by his wife MILCAH; nephew of ABRAHAM (Gen. 22:22). The passage as a whole seems to indicate the origins of a dozen Aramean tribes (see ARAM), and the name Hazo is usually associated with Assyrian Ḥazu (mentioned in an inscription of ESARHADDON), referring to a mountainous region in N ARABIA.

Hazor hay'zor (חֲצֹר H2937, “enclosure”). (1) One of the southernmost towns within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:23). It was situated in the NEGEV, near the country of EDOM (V. 21), but its precise location is unknown. See also HAZOR HADATTAH.

(2) An alternate name for KERIOTH HEZRON, also included in the list of the southernmost towns of Judah (Josh. 15:25).

(3) A town within the tribal territory of BENJAMIN listed among the places settled by those who returned from the EXILE (Neh. 11:33). Its location is uncertain, though some have identified it with Khirbet Hazzur (some 3 mi. NW of JERUSALEM).

(4) An otherwise unknown group of desert settlements against which JEREMIAH prophesied (Jer. 49:28-33). The oracle speaks of “the kingdoms of Hazor” and associates them with KEDAR (a N Arabian tribe). Hazor is described as “a nation at ease...that has neither gates nor bars” and whose “people live alone.” NEBUCHADNEZZAR king of Babylon would attack them, plundering their camels and large herds. Hazor would thus “become a haunt of jackals, a desolate place forever.” Although some have thought Hazor was an Arab settlement in S Palestine, most scholars believe that the name referred to associated villages inhabited by semi-nomadic peoples in W or NW ARABIA (and Kedar may have been one of the kingdoms in the league).

(5) A city in N Palestine in the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 11:1, 10-13, et al.). It was located c. 5 mi. SW of Lake Huleh and 10 mi. N of the Sea of Galilee. In 1928 it was identified as Tell el-Qedah by John Garstang, after he had made several trial digs. However, systematic excavation was not carried out until 1955 by Yigael Yadin (IEJ 6 [1956]: 120-25; 7 [1957]: 118-23; 8 [1958]: of ancient Israel. (View to the E.) 1-14; 9 [1959]: 74-88; 19 [1969]: 1-19; see also his synthesis in NEAEHL, 2:594-606 [includes supplement by A. Ben-Tor]). The site consists of the tell proper, measuring about 25 acres, and a “camp area” (as Garstang called it), which was actually the lower city; the latter covers about 180 acres N of the tell (it is 1,000 meters in length by 700 in width). The main “tell” was founded in the 3rd millennium, and the lower city was probably added during the HYKSOS period early in the 2nd millennium. The lower city was protected along the W wall by an earthen rampart and a deep moat. The N and E were protected by a deep glacis.

Hazor was the largest city ever built in Palestine during the biblical period, accommodating up to 40,000 inhabitants. Though the city dates back to the 3rd millennium (2700-2500 B.C.), its most flourishing era was during the 2nd millennium. It was the military and political hub of Palestine during this period, which probably explains the statement that “Hazor had been the head of all these kingdoms” (Josh. 11:10). A. Malamat (in JBL 79 [1960]: 12-19) argues its importance as “the western outpost of the fertile crescent” from its mention in the MARI archives. Its strategic importance was due to its location. The VIA MARIS, which runs along the S coast of Palestine, branches at MEGIDDO. One branch continues along the northern coastline to ACCO and TYRE; the second one turns inland to Hazor and then northward to ABEL BETH MAACAH, IJON, and the Lebanese BEQA<sup>6</sup>. At Hazor there was a junction between this N-S road and one which crossed the JORDAN River just below Lake Huleh and went to DAMASCUS. BEN-HADAD I (c. 885 B.C.) and TIGLATH-PILESER III (733 B.C.) both invaded Palestine through this N-S route (1 Ki. 15:20 and 2 Ki. 15:29).

The downfall of the Canaanite Hazor is dated in the 13th cent. B.C., corroborating the account in Josh. 11:1—11 (although some attribute the destruction of the city to the SEA PEOPLES). JABIN, king of Hazor, formed a coalition with the kings of MADON, SHIMRON, ACSHAPH, the kings of the northern hill country and in the ARABAH S of KINNERETH and in the lowlands, to stop the advance of the Israelites. The coalition was defeated at the Waters of MEROM, and Joshua took Hazor and burned it. After its destruction, the lower city was never rebuilt, and the Israelite attempts to resettle the city during the 12th and 11th centuries were very poor and limited only to some parts of the tell. Excavations of the lower city have turned up a Canaanite temple and a small shrine. The Bible mentions a second battle between the Israelites and a Jabin of Hazor (a dynastic name?). DEBORAH and BARAK led the troops of Israel against SISERA, the captain of Jabin’s army, who had 900 chariots of iron. Because of divine aid, Israel defeated the Canaanites and was relieved of the oppression under which they had suffered for twenty years (Jdg. 4-5).

The city was rebuilt in the 10th cent. by SOLOMON (c. 950 B.C.) as a fortress, evidently to protect the N entrance to Palestine. According to 1 Ki. 9:15, he utilized forced labor to build Hazor, Megiddo, and GEZER as well as other projects. The great gate found at Hazor has proven to be very similar to those at Megiddo and Gezer, suggesting even the possibility of the same architect. The city was again destroyed by fire, probably by BEN-HADAD I, c. 885 (cf. 1 Ki. 15:20). Over the next two centuries, it was rebuilt and destroyed five different times. The last city of any significance is thought to have been demolished in the campaign of TIGLATH-PILESER III in 732 (2 Ki. 15:29). In the ash layer of this level a fragment of a wine jar was found bearing the name of PEKAH. There are evidences of further resettlements during the Assyrian, Persian, and Hellenistic periods, but the citadels were quite small.

Hazor Hadattah hay'zor-huh-dat'uh (חֲצוֹר הַדַּטָּחָה H2939, "New Hazor [enclosure]"). Also Hazorhaddattah. One of the southernmost towns within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:25; KJV reads two names, "Hazor, Haddattah"). Several towns in the NEGEV bore the name HAZOR, but their precise locations are unknown. The second component of the name Hazor Hadattah is the Aramaic word for "new" (cf. Heb. HADASHAH), which seems unusual. Some have speculated that the town was settled by residents of Hazor in NAPHTALI who had closer contact with Aramaic-speaking populations.

Hazzelelponi haz'uh-l-el-poh'ni (חֲזֵלֵלְפוֹנִי H2209, perhaps "shade my face"). KJV Hazelelponi. Daughter of ETAM, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3). The name is highly unusual, however, and various emendations have been proposed. For example, some have thought that the names of two different daughters have been merged. Others suggest that the name was simply Hazlel (hasēlel, "give shade") and that the second part of the word, pônî, is a scribal dittography (the first word in the next verse is the name pěnûēl, Pěnû'ēl; see G. N. Knoppers, I Chronicles 1-9, AB 12 [2005], 338).

Hazzobebah haz'oh-bee'buh (חֲצוֹבֵבָה H2206, meaning uncertain). Son of Koz, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:8). The first syllable of the name appears to be the Hebrew definite article, and thus the NRSV and other versions render, "Zobebah." It may be the name of a clan.

he hay (ה, meaning uncertain). The fifth letter in the Hebrew ALPHABET (ה), with a numerical value of five. Its sound corresponds to that of English h (but it is usually silent at the end of a word, where it serves to represent vowel sounds).

head. Both the brain case and the face are included in the head, considered to be the seat of life or the SOUL, although the Jews regarded the HEART as the seat of the intellect, and often used "head" (Heb. rō'sh H8031) to stand for the whole person (Acts 18:6, Gk. kephalē G3051). The word applies to animals, such as the bull's head of the burnt offering (Lev. 1:4), and to inanimate objects in phrases like, "Lift up your heads, O you gates" (Ps. 24:7), the four heads of rivers (Gen. 2:10), and the headstone (Zech. 4:7, a concept also applied to Christ, Matt. 21:42; see CORNERSTONE). Heads of animals decorated the tops of furniture in eastern homes. Early Christians preserved the head of a saint or martyr as an object of adoration which could exert miraculous power (J. A. MacCulloch in ERE, 6:536). The mark of the beast was put upon the FOREHEAD (Rev. 14:9).

Injury to the head was a chief form of defeating an enemy (Ps. 68:21). Decapitation, a custom likewise practiced in ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, added insult to injury (1 Sam. 17:51). On the other hand, anointing the head was a symbol of joy and prosperity (Ps. 23:5; Heb. 1:9), and dedication to priestly service (Exod. 29:7).

Leaders are heads: "the elders and prominent men are the head, / the prophets who teach lies are the tail” (Isa. 9:15). Christ is the HEAD OF THE CHURCH, his BODY, and of all CREATION (Eph. 1:22), every human being (1 Cor. 11:3), and of all rule and authority (Col. 2:10). The husband is the head of the woman. Because of the Greek custom of veiling of women, as opposed to the Jewish practice, PAUL urged the Corinthian women to be obedient to the local standards of decency and order, and to cover the head in worship. Men, however, pray with uncovered heads. See COVERING OF THE HEAD.

Blessing comes upon the head (Gen. 49:26), therefore the hands were laid upon it (48:17) and sins were transferred from the person to the beast by this gesture (Exod. 29:15). To “heap coals of fire on the head” meant returning good for evil (Matt. 5:44; Rom. 12:20). The Israelite swore by his head (Matt. 5:36). Covering or dusting the head or laying the hand on it signified sadness, grief, or shame (2 Sam. 13:19). To wag the head expressed derision (Mk. 15:29) and to bow down the head displayed sadness, humility, and mourning (Isa. 58:5). “Yet will I not lift up my head” is equivalent to lack of self-assertion (Job 10:15 KJV). Life gave one a hoary head along with honor and wisdom (Prov. 16:31).

R. L. MIXTER

headband. This English term is used variously by Bible versions to render several Hebrew terms, such as šābîs H8667 (which occurs only in Isa. 3:18) and migbā’â H4457 (which occurs only with reference to the headgear of priests; so NIV in Exod. 28:40 et al., where NRSV has “sashes”). See also HEADDRESS.

head covering. See COVERING FOR THE HEAD.

headdress. The ancients wore many forms of headdress. The Hebrews originally wore no covering for the head, except for special occasions, as a leather helmet in battle. Egyptian monuments show Syrian men wearing a fillet of rope or cord. Another type of headdress protected the head, neck, and shoulders from the sun, like the modern kaffiyeh. Assyrian sculptures show men with a TURBAN, a long cloth wound around the head (cf. Isa. 3:23 NRSV; Zech 3:5; note also the royal “diadem” in Isa. 62:3). The “hats” worn by DANIEL’S friends (Dan. 3:21 KJV) were probably one kind of the conical Babylonian headdress. ANTIOCHUS Epiphanes compelled young Jewish nobles to wear a low, broad-brimmed hat associated with the Greek god HERMES (2 Macc. 4:12). Among the many types of head covering worn by men in NT times was a scarf wound around the head and hanging down over the neck. Women sometimes wore a turban. Syrian women sometimes wore a headband on the hair. Syrian sculptures show women wearing a shawl covering the whole body from the head to the ankles. The OT mentions both mantles and veils, but it is impossible to distinguish between them.

S. BARABAS

head of the church. This phrase occurs only in Eph. 5:23 (Gk. kephalē tēs ekklēsias), but similar expressions occur elsewhere (Eph. 1:22; 1 Cor. 11:3; and esp. Col. 1:18, hē kephalē tou sōmatos tēs ekklēsias, “the head of the body, the church”; see BODY OF CHRIST and CHURCH). These phrases in each case are mentioned incidentally to some other argument, such as the proper place of women in the congregation and the home, and as a phrase in a doxological context. The reference is to the lordship of Christ as the risen exalted head of the congregation of God, a figure derived from the OT (Pss. 2:7-8; 72:7, 8; Dan. 7:13, 14; et al.), and reinforced by several events in the gospel narratives (Matt. 17:1-9; Jn. 1:32-34; cf. Mk. 9:2-9; Lk. 9:28-36). The phrase appears to have been a common one in the ancient church and it is used by the Greek and Latin church fathers. In the medieval era, after the declaration of the bulla Unam Sanctum (A.D. 1302), such passages were assumed to increase papal power, a thesis rejected by the reformers.

W. WHITE, JR.

healing, gifts of. This expression (Gk. charismata iamatōn) appears three times, all of them in 1 Cor. 12 (vv. 9, 28, 30). The theme of the chapter is the unity in which the “one and the same Spirit” (v. 11) distributes and administers the varieties of gifts within the one BODY OF CHRIST at CORINTH. The application is that believers, as members of the BODY OF CHRIST, have need of one another that all may benefit in the performance of particular ministries (12:4-7); therefore, they ought not to be divided by schism of any kind.

Certain gifts, such as apostleship, prophecy, and teaching (1 Cor. 12:28; cf. Rom. 12:6-8), have modi operandi and fulfill the normal needs of the CHURCH; others have special and exceptional functions. While they could be associated with certain members in the congregation (1 Cor. 12:30), these particular individuals are not set forth as appointed with gifts so as to become official or regular workers of miracles or healers. While PETER and PAUL (as well as PHILIP in SAMARIA) had an extensive healing ministry as recorded in the book of Acts, they were not identified as divine healers, nor is there any such designation elsewhere in Scripture. Gifts of healing were spontaneous within the assembly, and their exercise implied the rendering of service among believers. The plural “gifts of healing” suggests varieties of the sicknesses healed and the different manners in which the healings took place.

Further light is cast upon the function of these gifts in Jas. 5:13-16, where procedure is given for the corporate local church regarding those who particularly desire bodily healing. The sick (v. 14, literally, “without strength,” and thus perhaps prostrate) patient is to call for the elders of the church who are to ANOINT him with OIL in the name of the Lord and pray over him. See ELDER (NT). Biblical anointing is symbolic of the HOLY SPIRIT who administers the manifestation of gifts (1 Cor. 12:8-11). Kings, high priests, and prophets were anointed with oil, which sanctified them to a special work for God. The tabernacle, the altar, the vessels, and Aaron were anointed so that they might be sanctified or consecrated (Lev. 8:10-12).

There is no suggestion in James of medicinal use of the oil, since this might have been administered by anyone beside the elders. The use of oil symbolized sanctified commitment of the sick body to the operation of the Holy Spirit’s ministry, which quickens the mortal bodies of believers that they may be enabled and led to fulfill the ministry he has purposed for them as fellow heirs with Christ (Rom. 8:11-17). The promise in Jas. 5 is that the anointing of oil “and the prayer offered in faith will make the sick person well; the Lord will raise him up” (v. 15). Furthermore, believers are to confess their faults to one another and pray for one another that they may be healed, since “the prayer of a righteous man is powerful and effective” (v. 16).

Thus it appears that the suggested procedure as related to the sick who are to call for the elders of the church is not the only circumstantial manner by which God heals. God also heals as believers pray for one another; but it is the elders and not so-called “divine healers” that are to be sought when believers who are sick in body are hindered from gathering with the assembly. The prayer of faith is required; and the gift is in no way separated from the Giver, the blessing from the Blessor, or a human healer from the divine One. Sin is the greatest hindrance to the prayer of faith, whether it be in the patient or in those who pray in fellowship for him (Jas. 5:15-16). Sin is not necessarily the reason God does not heal or give the prayer of faith, since the Holy Spirit apportions his gifts to each believer individually as he wills (1 Cor. 12:11).

Closely associated with “gifts of healing” is the “working of miracles” (1 Cor. 12:10, 28-29). In the book of Acts, MIRACLES were associated with bodily healing and the casting out of evil spirits (8:6-7; 19:11-12). These were described as “great signs and miracles” (8:13) and “extraordinary miracles” (19:11). The distinction drawn in 1 Cor. 12 may carry this connotation and imply that “gifts of healing” were relatively common in the church and were practiced according to Jas. 5:13-16 in distinction from “working of miracles.” The prescription given in James suggests “gifts of healing” rather than “working of miracles” as the result of the prayer of faith.

John Calvin comments: “As the gift of healing as yet continued, he (James) directs the sick to have recourse to that remedy. It is, indeed, certain that they were not all healed; but the Lord granted this favor as often and as far as he knew it would be expedient; nor is it probable that the oil was indiscriminately applied, but only when there was some hope of restoration. For, together with the power there was given also discretion to the ministers, lest they should by abuse profane the symbol. The design of James was no other than to commend the grace of God which the faithful might then enjoy, lest the benefit of it should be lost through contempt or neglect.” He adds, “For this purpose he ordered the presbyters to be sent for, but the use of the anointing must have been confined to the power of the Holy Spirit” (Commentaries on the Catholic Epistles [1948], 335).

Today there is a new interest and a rethinking of the entire field of Christian healing. There is no reason to believe that gifts of healing have passed from the ministry of the church. Although from the early church to modern times records of divine healing can be found, the missing ingredient is the full ministry of the church in the exercise of charismatic gifts with the proper balance and relationship of the gifts as set forth by Paul in 1 Cor. 12. (Cf. H. J. Blair, “Spiritual Healing: An Enquiry,” EvQ 30 [1958]: 147-51; J. G. S. S. Thomson, “Spiritual Gifts,” in BDT, 497-500.) See also SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

healing and health. In the Scriptures healing is the restoration to a state of health by physical means or by miracle; the methods are not necessarily mutually exclusive.

1. Healing by physical means
2. Healing by miracle

I. Healing by physical means. Healing by means of medicines and surgical appliances is supported by Scripture. Local applications of ointments and bandaging of wounds were certainly standard treatment in OT times (Isa. 1:6). Moreover, the use of a plaster made of a cake of figs to be laid upon HEZEKIAH’S boil was recognized as appropriate treatment and was advocated by God’s prophet (38:21). The broken arm of PHARAOH, king of Egypt, was said by the prophet to require a bandage to bind it (Ezek. 30:21). Doubtless this bandage included the application of splints, for Egyptian mummies have been found, according to A. R. Short (The Bible and Modern Medicine [1953], 12), with broken bones treated by splints made of the bark of trees fixed with bandages.

Reference is furthermore made to the healing BALM of Gilead (Jer. 8:22; 46:11; 51:8). Short

(The Bible and Modern Medicine, 72) believes that this may have been of the nature of FRANKINCENSE or some similar aromatic juice from a shrub, containing benzoin, which finds medicinal use today with its pleasant odor and definite antiseptic properties. There are those who interpret Jas. 5:14 concerning the anointing with OIL as not merely referring to a religious rite, but as an injunction to accompany the prayer of faith with the application of whatever oil or balm seemed to be required in the particular instance of illness. Such applications were extensively used in Bible times, and may be regarded as similar to the present-day use of applications of oil of wintergreen to joints for rheumatic symptoms or of salve to wounds. See ANOINT.

Other than these few instances, the Bible gives little or no information regarding healing with medicines. This is no wonder, for the introduction of the great array of medicines, such as penicillin, sulfonamides, tetracyclines, insulin, and chloroquine, which are so effective today in healing and prolonging life, have all come on the scene in the past several decades.

II. Healing by miracle. Miraculous healing with or without associated use of physical means is frequently referred to in the Bible. It was performed, not as broadcast philanthropy, as Short points out, but as a SIGN. He declares that the purpose of the MIRACLES was to show that God was at work in a new way, using and accrediting his representatives so that their message might be believed. Short brushes aside the natural assumption that the ailment involved was functional or hysterical in most cases. Whereas it is true that hysteria may imitate a great variety of truly organic diseases, "We may rest assured that the man with the withered hand, the woman with the issue of blood, the woman with the bowed back presumably due to bony fusion of the vertebrae, either tuberculous or osteoarthritic; the blind people, and the lepers, cannot reasonably be written down as functional...Cases of paralysis are occasionally functional, and there is a one-in-a-million chance that the patient who was brought by his four friends may have been an example, but it is begging the question to regard him as a case of hysterical paralysis just because he got well."

It is interesting to note that Christ in two cases (Mk. 8:23; Jn. 9:6) used saliva to anoint the patient's eyes for healing, for it parallels the fact that the Egyptians believed saliva to be a valuable remedy for blindness, and PLINY the Elder and TACITUS both voiced similar beliefs. Short conjectures that Jesus used saliva partly to strengthen their faith, and partly to teach that divine healing may go hand in hand with the use of recognized medical remedies.

III. Health in pagan nations surrounding the Israelites. The view that history books give of conquering and defeated armies is often a distorted one. Back of these conquests was often a health situation that determined the outcome of wars.

A. Superstitions regarding the cause of illness. The nations round about Israel were deeply steeped in idolatry, and they frequently blamed their diseases on evil spirits, which must be driven out by incantations or magical formulas (see DEMON; EXORCISM). Without knowledge of the one true God, such vagaries of reasoning were doubtless inevitable. Epidemics wrought havoc among these peoples, often causing them to flee their lands to get away from supposed evil spirits to which they attributed disease.

B. Fantastic ingredients of pagan medicines. The Egyptian Papyri, discovered in Thebes about 1862, furnish medical prescriptions issued in Egypt about 1552 B.C. Sometimes these prescriptions were used to repair the supposed damage caused by an evil spirit, the medicine being given after the evil spirit was exorcised. These prescriptions are, in the light of our day, a compilation of fantastic and worthless nostrums. Listed among them, as quoted by S. I. McMillen (None of These Diseases [1963], 11), are “lizards’ blood, swine’s teeth, putrid meat, stinking fat, moisture from pigs’ ears, milk, goose grease, asses’ hoofs, animal fats from various sources, excreta from animals including human beings, donkeys, antelopes, dogs, cats, and even flies.” He further notes that to embedded splinters, worms’ blood and asses’ dung were applied, which doubtless resulted in a heavy toll of death from lockjaw since dung is loaded with tetanus spores. Indeed, one cannot help but wonder how these nations survived to the extent they did under such unsanitary conditions, lacking enlightened medical care. (In other respects, however, medicine in Egypt was relatively advanced; see K. R. Weeks in CANE, 3:1787-98.)

IV. Health among the Israelites. In striking contrast, the Israelites enjoyed comparatively good health. They had been given God’s promises that, hearkening to his commandments, none of the diseases that afflicted the Egyptians would come upon them (Exod. 15:26).

A. Significance of the laws of the Pentateuch for Israel’s health. In light of the fact that MOSES was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts 7:22), it is amazing that none of the fanciful nostrums of the day appear in the PENTATEUCH. McMillen (None of These Diseases, 11-24) concludes that there is but one answer to this puzzle: that the medical instructions of the Pentateuch were actually given to MOSES by God, as he says they were. McMillen’s work (a revised edition of which by D. E. Stern appeared in 2000) has been challenged by various writers. Nevertheless, it is remarkable that what Moses recorded has stood the test of time. Indeed, the mechanism by which the Jewish race has been preserved throughout the centuries is doubtless found in the sanitary measures observed by the Jews in Europe during the frightful scourges that visited Israel’s neighbors in ancient and medieval times. This survival took place despite the crowded ghettos of large towns, which were full of tuberculosis. Short (The Bible and Modern Medicine, 38) remarks that without doubt this survival is an attestation of divine providence, whereas from a secular point of view it was rendered possible by the healthy habits of living based upon the medical instructions of the Pentateuch.

1. Sanitary disposal of excrement. Noteworthy is the instruction given in Deut. 23:12-13 (Berkeley’s version), “You shall set off a place outside the camp and, when you go out to use it, you must carry a spade among your gear and dig a hole, have easement, and turn to cover the excrement.”

Whereas this is in a sense a primitive measure, it is an effective one that indicates advanced ideas of sanitation. It contrasts with the dumping of excrement in unpaved city streets in Europe, even up to the close of the 18th cent.

2. Washing and the use of running water. The emphasis on washing of the body and the clothes in WATER after contact with disease is worthy of comment. It is significant, too, that in some instances running water was specified (Lev. 14:50), which certainly had its advantages, not only in convenience but also in actual sanitation, since it eliminates the reuse of contaminated water. The introduction of modern plumbing has demonstrated this time and again. Concern for the purity of water supplies is notable in the OT. For example, the elders at JERICHO doubtless rightly attributed the town's epidemic to contaminated water, and so ELISHA was asked to purify it (2 Ki. 2:19-22). The discoveries of modern sanitary science as to typhoid fever, cholera, and schistosomiasis being carried by contaminated water accent the importance of these attitudes. Short refers to the Jews as a washing people and points out that PAUL knew where he was most likely to find a Jewish meeting place in PHILIPPI, because it naturally would be along the river bank where the water was.

3. Isolation and quarantine. Isolation and quarantine were imposed upon the Israelites in the Mosaic law. It is a natural corollary to the commandment to love one's neighbor as oneself. It is noteworthy that, as Short points out, the Jews escaped lightly in Italy in the 14th cent. when others died in epidemics of plague. It was rightly concluded that this might be due to their laws of uncleanness after touching dead bodies. On this basis the Jewish code was made compulsory on the whole community, and a period of forty days' quarantine (an English term derived from quaranta, Italian for "forty") was imposed with salutary results (Lev. 12:1-4). Today, with modern laboratory technology, it is possible to differentiate diseases more accurately and hence determine more specifically the needed period and strictness of isolation for the various diseases. For the day in which the regulations of the Pentateuch were promulgated, the blanket rules for preventing the spread of diseases served well.

4. Dietary regulations. The food laws of the Pentateuch are remarkable in the light of modern science. The restrictions regarding meats are based on two simple tests, namely, the animals suitable for human consumption must both part the hoof and chew the cud. This means that the pig and the rabbit are categorized as being unsuitable for eating. Modern parasitology has demonstrated that these animals are especially liable to infections with parasites and are safe only if well-cooked. The pig in particular is an unclean feeder, and often harbors two kinds of parasites, namely, trichina and the pork tapeworm, which are frequent causes of disease in man. These diseases still occur in the United States, although the introduction of federal meat inspection and compulsory boiling of garbage have greatly helped to reduce their incidence. In the absence of such adjuncts and good culinary apparatus, including readily available fuel for cooking (which certainly was not the case in ancient Israel), the complete avoidance of the use of these animals for food was indeed beneficial in preventing the spread of disease.

5. Dealing with bodily discharges. The method in the Pentateuch of dealing with infectious discharges has long aroused the admiration of experts in sanitation. Although not all bodily discharges are infectious, many are dangerous. To determine which of them carry diseases requires bacteriological tests that were obviously not available in Moses' day. The disposal of discharges, therefore, was based on the assumption that all were infectious in the absence of a ready means to distinguish the infectious from the noninfectious discharges. With this in view, the discharges were dealt with in a most scientific manner. It is almost surprising to find sputum mentioned as a possible vehicle of infection (Lev. 15:8), for the realization that sputum is a vehicle for the transmission of tuberculosis is usually dated to the discovery of the tubercle bacillus by Koch in modern times.

6. Cleansing after touching the dead. The regulations of the Pentateuch regarding touching dead bodies in connection with their burial specified a period of UNCLEANNESS of seven days' duration. During this time, the person involved must be isolated from others and had to perform certain acts that included bathing his body and washing his clothes. On completion of these acts and at the expiration of the time period, the unclean person was considered cleansed so that he could return to community life (Num. 19:11-22). Such precautions ought to have been considered essential for dealing with a body that had died of smallpox, plague, or other contagious diseases so rampant in those days. Modern health provisions including isolation regulations have so reduced the incidence of these diseases in America that the average individual is unaware of the real risk of these diseases spreading. Actually, they are still a menace in some parts of the world, and it is only by constant vigilance and strict enforcement of health regulations that they are kept from spreading to the United States in today's swift air travel. Application of the same regulations in death from all causes was warranted in Moses' day, since at that time methods of distinguishing between contagious diseases and other causes of death were not established on a scientific basis.

7. Sexual morality. The strict laws of the Pentateuch concerning sexual morality should not be glossed over in these days when there is so much loose talking and thinking regarding promiscuous sexual relations. These laws, and in particular the seventh commandment, if strictly observed, would put an end to the spread of venereal diseases. Sexual immorality by adults, who may be unknowingly infected with venereal disease, is no more hygienic, or permissible on a common-sense basis, than it is for a tuberculosis patient to spit his germs in public places. Not only does sexual promiscuity have dire psychological consequences, but the resulting high incidence of venereal disease is a steep price to pay. The complete cure of syphilis and gonorrhea, even with the newest and best of antibiotics, is rarely if ever absolutely sure. Often the initial symptoms respond promptly to treatment, convincing individuals that they are cured, whereas the disease may readily crop up twenty years or so later in a rapidly fatal heart condition or a severe mental disturbance, such as the general paresis of the insane caused by advanced syphilis of the brain. God knew what he was commanding when he gave the seventh commandment, and this law has not been abrogated. (See SEX.)

8. Circumcision and its timing. Some modern medical data seem to suggest that, where male CIRCUMCISION is practiced, the incidence of cancer of the male procreative organ is greatly reduced. Interestingly enough, the incidence of cancer of the female genitals, particularly of the cervix uteri (the mouth of the womb), is likewise said to be reduced where the male partner has been circumcised (see New England Journal of Medicine 346 no. 15 [2002]: 1105-12). Some argue that, without the foreskin, carcinogenic smegma can no longer be harbored in this location for local irritation in the male or for transmission to a female sex partner. In the light of this, circumcision of males may be regarded not only as a religious rite but also as a hygienic measure. (It should be noted, however, that in 1999 the American Academy of Pediatrics concluded that although circumcision has "some potential medical benefits," there is not sufficient data to support recommending routine newborn circumcision. According to the American Cancer Society, the evidence that circumcision reduces the risk of penile cancer is ambiguous.)

McMillen also points out that the specification in the Pentateuch of the eighth day after birth constitutes the optimum time for circumcision. After cutting off the foreskin, stanching of bleeding requires two elements to be present: (1) One of these is vitamin K, which is not formed in normal amounts in the baby's intestine until the fifth to seventh day of life. Then by the eighth day adequate amounts of vitamin K are absorbed into the blood to enhance clotting. (2) The other essential element is prothrombin. Careful investigations of the available prothrombin are charted by McMillen and show that on the third day of a baby's life the available prothrombin is only 30 percent, whereas on the eighth day it is 110 percent, after which it levels off to 100 percent. In other words, there is more prothrombin available for clotting the blood on the eighth day of life than at any other time in the whole life of the individual.

B. Significance of the laws of the Pentateuch to public health today. Modern sanitary measures have been arrived at occasionally as the outcome of research and discovery, sometimes through trial and error; but frequently these measures have been developed by reverting to the sanitary precepts of the Pentateuch, even in the absence of clear rationale for doing so. McMillen, quoting Rosen, points out that following the major plagues of the Dark Ages, including leprosy and the Black Death, which left the physicians of the day completely perplexed, order came out of chaos only when the church took over and used as its guiding principle the concept of contagion embodied in the OT. Thus, by combating leprosy, the first great feat in methodical eradication of disease was accomplished. More recently, the writer, when in China as a medical missionary, observed at first hand the decimating effects of contagious diseases such as diphtheria and scarlet fever in the absence of quarantine as it wiped out the early-school-age child population of whole villages. Amazingly, the nationals in the primitive part of the country viewed our notions of quarantine as a kind of imported Western superstition. Eventually the government public health services, organized on modern epidemic prevention principles, took over with salutary results. (Cf. P. E. Adolph, Surgery Speaks to China [1945], 92.)

Modern surgical procedures are largely made possible through the simple measure of washing the hands, introduced in 1847 by Semmelweis under such great protest and ridicule that it was many years before it was universally adopted. Yet the oft-repeated, almost monotonous, admonition to wash one's body with water and change the clothes as instructed in Leviticus furnishes the key to the whole matter. Before surgeons adopted these principles, the mortality following major surgical operations was exceedingly high. McMillen further points out that the New York State Department of Health became so alarmed over the spread of infections from a carrier who failed to wash his hands carefully that in 1960 the department issued a book on techniques for washing the hands, which approximates the scriptural method given in Num. 19. (For bibliography see DISEASE; MEDICINE.)

health. See HEALING AND HEALTH.

heap of Stones. The act of raising a heap of stones could be a symbol and reminder of a shameful act. After ACHAN and his family were stoned and burned, a pile of stones was heaped over their slain bodies (Josh. 7:26). After JOSHUA hanged the king of AI, he raised a heap of stones over his body (8:29). A similar heap of stones was raised over the body of ABSALOM, who was killed by JOAB and his men after he had tried to seize the throne from his father DAVID (2 Sam. 18:17). A heap of stones could also symbolize a COVENANT made between two persons, as in the case of JACOB and LABAN at MIZPAH; Laban said to Jacob that the heap was a witness that neither of them would pass over it to harm the other (Gen. 31:46-52; see GALEED). Finally, piles of stones could indicate God's judgment upon a sinful city or family (Job 15:28; Isa. 37:26; Jer. 9:11; Hos. 12:11).

Heaps of stones are still used to mark Palestinian agricultural boundaries.

heart. Aside from literal references to the physical organ, the term heart in the Bible (Heb. lēb H4213 and lēbāb H4222; Gk. kardia G2840) usually refers to the “inner person,” or the seat of mental functions (where one remembers, thinks), or the seat and center of all physical and spiritual life—the SOUL or MIND as the fountain of thoughts, passions, desires, affections, appetites, purposes, endeavors. See ATTITUDE. The Hebrew terms occur almost 800 times in the OT; the Greek term occurs almost 150 times in the NT. (See NIDOTTE, 2:749-54; NIDNTT, 2:180-84.)

I. Psychological definition. Heart denotes the essence of personality, the seat and center of all life. The psychological term of nearest equivalency to this old English word is ego, which represents the “I, self, person.” It is that term which is formalized, as a logical necessity, to denote that “center” to which all of a person's psychological activities and characteristics refer. As such, the “heart” is probably unknowable, but the word is a natural, created, figurative expressive concept. The term was born of logical need for categorical expression, communicative clarity, and practical utility. The “human heart” represents, then, that innermost center which is of ultimate importance; that which is basic, central, substantive, and of profound essence.

II. Consistency and variety of usage. There is a consistency of treatment with all biblical uses of heart. The term invariably refers to that which is central. Even when the word is used as a figure of speech, expressive of things and situations apart from mankind, it denotes central location, center, or being in the midst: “Your borders are in the heart of the seas” (Ezek. 27:4 NRSV; cf. also Ps. 46:2; Matt. 12:40). The word is employed to express certain important dimensions of human beings and God's concern and dealings with them. It is used, then, to denote:

A. The “inner self” (1 Pet. 3:4; lit., “the hidden man of the heart”), that central essence of a human being with which God is primarily concerned. It is that portion or essence of men and women which God the Lord looks on, searches, and tries (1 Sam. 16:7; Prov. 10:8; Jer. 11:20; 17:10; 20:12). It is the center and source of belief and faith (Lk. 24:25; Rom. 10:10).

B. That central agency and facility within a person whereby he imagines, intends, purposes, thinks, and understands (Ezek. 13:2).

- (1) Behaviors, expressions, and words have their origins there (Matt. 12:34-35; 15:18-19).
- (2) Beliefs and faith center there (Lk. 24:25; Rom. 10:10).
- (3) Considerations, concerns are associated (Jer. 12:11).
- (4) Imaginations originate (Prov. 6:18).
- (5) Inclinations are formed (Eccl. 10:2).
- (6) Intents are present there (Heb. 4:12).
- (7) It is very profound, deep (Ps. 64:6).
- (8) Numerous devices are known to it (Prov. 19:21).
- (9) Ponderings are made (Lk. 2:19).
- (10) Purposes are formed (Prov. 20:5; Acts 11:23).
- (11) Reflections are cogitated (1 Cor. 2:9; Rev. 18:7).
- (12) Understandings (1 Ki. 3:9; Job 38:36).
- (13) Will is exercised (Eph. 6:6).

C. Particular qualities of a person's character. As such, one may be seen to be or possess a "heart" that is:

- (1) Double (1 Chr. 12:33).
- (2) Honest and good (Lk. 8:15).
- (3) Large (1 Ki. 4:29).
- (4) Perfect or mature (1 Ki. 8:61; 11:4; 2 Chr. 16:9; 25:2; Ps. 101:2).
- (5) Pure (Ps. 24:4; Prov. 22:11; Matt. 5:8; 1 Tim. 1:5; 2 Tim. 2:22; 1 Pet. 2:22).
- (6) Single (2 Chr. 30:12; Jer. 32:39; Acts 2:46; 4:32; Col. 3:22).
- (7) True (Heb. 10:22).
- (8) Understanding (Job 38:36).
- (9) Wise (Job 9:4).

D. That which is descriptive of a person's attitude as depicted in his actions (behavior):

- (1) Despiteful, despising (Ezek. 25:15; 2 Sam. 6:16).
- (2) Dull (Acts 28:27).
- (3) False (Hos. 10:2).
- (4) Gross (Ps. 119:70).
- (5) Hard (Mk. 3:5; 16:14; Rom. 2:5).
- (6) Haughty (Prov. 18:12).
- (7) Impenitent (Rom. 2:5).
- (8) Meek and lowly (Jesus, as self-described, Matt. 11:29-30).
- (9) Searching (Jdg. 5:15, 16).
- (10) Stony (Ezek. 11:19; 36:26).
- (11) Subtle (Prov. 7:10).
- (12) Taken away (Hos. 4:11).
- (13) Whorish (Ezek. 6:9).
- (14) Willing (Exod. 35:5).
- (15) Wise (Prov. 10:8; 11:29; there are nearly fifty occurrences of the word in Proverbs).

E. That center, essence, and inner substance of a person that needs to be reconciled to God, redeemed; being righted with God, it may be reconciled to others. As such, the heart is described as being:

- (1) Deceitful and desperately wicked (Prov. 12:20; Isa. 44:20; Jer. 17:9).
- (2) Froward and proud (Ps. 101:4-5).
- (3) In need of a new creation and cleansing by God (Ps. 51:10).
- (4) In need of being renewed so as to know the Lord (Jer. 24:7).
- (5) Set to do evil (Eccl. 8:11; 9:3).
- (6) Stony, needing removal, and a new heart given in its stead (Ezek. 11:19; 18:31; 36:26).
- (7) Stubborn and rebellious (Jer. 5:23).
- (8) Turned by the Lord to others, otherwise to be smitten with a curse (Mal. 4:6).
- (9) Wicked (Ps. 58:2).

F. The core and seat of emotions; the center of emotional reaction, feeling, and sensitivity. As such, the heart may experience or know what it is to be:

- (1) Astonished (Deut. 28:28).

- (2) Bitter (Ezek. 27:31).
- (3) Broken (Pss. 34:18; 69:20; 147:3; Isa. 61:1).
- (4) Discouraged (Num. 32:7-9).
- (5) Failing (1 Sam. 17:32).
- (6) Fainting (Gen. 45:26).
- (7) Fearful (Isa. 21:4; 35:4).
- (8) Glad (Deut. 28:47; Ps. 104:15; Prov. 24:17; 27:11).
- (9) Grieved (1 Sam. 25:31; Ps. 73:21).
- (10) Heavy (Prov. 12:25; 25:20; 31:6; Matt. 26:37).
- (11) Joyful (Job 29:13; Eccl. 2:10).
- (12) Merry (1 Sam. 25:36; 1 Ki. 21:7; Esth. 1:10; Prov. 15:13, 15; 17:22).
- (13) Smitten (1 Sam. 24:5; Ps. 102:4).
- (14) Trembling (Deut. 28:65).

hearth. In biblical times the hearth was a depression in the floor of a HOUSE or TENT—in the center or in a corner—and in this area FOOD was cooked, or BREAD was baked in the ashes or on hot stones. There was no chimney; smoke escaped through a door or a window. Where obtainable, wood was used as a fuel, but withered vegetation (Matt. 6:30) and dried cow and camel dung were also used (Ezek. 4:15). In the better class of houses, in the cold season, rooms were warmed by means of a brazier or firepot (Jer. 36:22-23; Zech. 12:6). The term “altar hearth” was applied to the top of the ALTAR of burnt offering (various Heb. terms are used in Lev. 6:9; Isa. 29:2; 30:14; Ezek. 43:15-16).

heat and cold. These words appear in the same context twice (Gen. 8:22; 31:40). A striking feature of the climate of PALESTINE is the differences in temperature within so small a country. The land can experience almost tropical heat and bitter cold, although the cold lasts only a short time. These variations are due mainly to the nearness of plains and mountains, desert and sea, and the JORDAN valley. The differences increase as one moves eastward from the Mediterranean Sea, which keeps the temperature of the maritime plain much more constant than is found in the interior of the country.

Summers in Palestine are very hot, the intense heat leading to sunstroke, and the glare of the sun to eye trouble. A possible illustration may be the small boy who cried to his father, “My head! My head!” and died on his mother’s lap (2 Ki. 4:19-20). SNOW seldom falls in Palestine except sometimes in the winter months, and when it does it quickly melts. But because the cold lasts so short a time, homes are not protected against it, causing real discomfort. To keep warm, people huddled about a charcoal brazier, as Peter did in the court of the high priest (Jn. 18:18).

heath. A low-growing shrub with evergreen leaves (also known as heather). The term is used by the KJV twice to render Hebrew arār H6899 (Jer. 17:6; 48:6; NIV, “bush” [in the latter passage the text can be understood differently]). Since the true heath does not grow in Palestine, the Hebrew word probably refers to the JUNIPER (Juniperus phoenicia), a small tree with very small scale-like leaves and round cones; it grows on the W side of the mountains of EDOM. (Cf. FFB, 131-32.) See also FLORA (under Leguminosae and Pinaceae).

heathen. See GENTILE; NATIONS.

heaven. The biblical doctrine of heaven has never received, from a theological standpoint, the consideration that has been given to the doctrine of HELL and eternal punishment (see PUNISHMENT, ETERNAL). W. T. Shedd, for example, assigned two pages in his 3-volume Dogmatic Theology (1888-94) to heaven and eighty-seven pages to eternal punishment. Richard Niebuhr, in his quite exhaustive work, The Nature and Destiny of Man: A Christian Reinterpretation (1941-43), gives no consideration to the matter of heaven except for a regrettable statement, “It is unwise for Christians to claim any knowledge of either the furniture of heaven or the temperature of hell” (2:294). John Baillie asks the question, “How many preachers during these last twenty-five years have dwelt on the joys of the heavenly rest with anything like the old ardent love and impatient longing, or have spoken of the world that now is as a place of sojourn and pilgrimage” (And the Life Everlasting [1934], 15).

Furthermore, as has been pointed out: “The rapid changes in Western civilization have subjectivized and secularized heaven. In the nineteenth century, the concept grew increasingly vague, with wide scope in meaning. Eschatology which gathered up the ‘apparatus of celestial being’ gave much assurance and comfort, but lacked reality. The twentieth century has been ever more devastating to the idea of heaven. The word ‘heaven’ has been appropriated for many purposes, and used in connection with dreams, loves, lyrics, and fiction, until now it has been deprived of meaning for much of society” (R. E. Knudsen, Theology in the New Testament [1964], 408).

Of the hundreds of occurrences of the word heaven in the English Bible, practically all render just two terms: Hebrew šāmayim H9028 (which has a dual form) and Greek ouranos G4041 (see NIDOTTE, 4:160-66; NIDNTT, 2:188-96). These terms, which can also be translated “sky” (cf. also Heb. šahaq H8836, “cloud,” in Ps. 89:6 et al.), refer to that which is above earth and above human beings. Except when used figuratively, heaven designates one of three realms—the atmospheric space immediately above us, the stellar heavens that must ultimately embrace the universe, and heaven as the abode of God. In Catholic and medieval theology, these three realms are referred to as coelum aqueum, coelum sidereum, coelum empyreum. Interestingly enough, these are the three basic meanings of the word ouranos in Greek classical literature.

I. The atmospheric heavens. This realm includes the space that immediately surrounds the earth, the air that we breathe (in modern scientific terms, the troposphere, which does not extend more than 20 mi. above the earth; beyond it is the stratosphere). The most frequently occurring atmospheric phenomenon in the Scripture is, of course, RAIN, and also, on rare occasions, SNOW. One of the most relevant and wonderful passages embracing these matters is Isa. 55:9-11: “As the rain and the snow / come down from heaven, / and do not return to it / without watering the earth / and making it bud and flourish, / so that it yields seed for the sower and bread for the eater, / so is my word that goes out from my mouth: / It will not return to me empty, / but will accomplish what I desire / and achieve the purpose for which I sent it.”

FROST also is said to be sent from heaven, and DEW as well (Job 38:29; Deut. 33:13). Probably the statement regarding Yahweh casting down “great stones from heaven” at the battle of GIBEON refers to huge hailstones (Josh. 10:11 KJV; see HAIL). Frequently, the Bible mentions THUNDER from heaven (1 Sam. 2:10 et al.). Often, CLOUDS are identified with these atmospheric heavens: “he covers the heavens with clouds, / prepares rain for the earth, / makes grass grow on the hills” (Ps. 147:8 NRSV). Clouds often have an eschatological importance, especially in relation to the SECOND COMING of Christ.

The Bible sometimes speaks of “the four winds of heaven” (Zech. 2:6; 6:5). Probably the statement that bread came down “from heaven” (Exod. 16:4; Ps. 78:24; see MANNA) refers to the atmospheric heavens, though it also may include the idea of bread as a gift from God. Birds of heaven, such as eagles and others, are announced in the initial account of creation (Gen. 1:26, 30; Prov. 23:5). Generally, these atmospheric phenomena point to favors bestowed upon the human race, but sometimes they embrace destructive forces, as fire and brimstone sent down upon SODOM and GOMORRAH (Gen. 19:24).

The word heaven as used in the Bible can refer to the atmosphere where the birds fly, or to outer space where the stars are found, or to God's abode.

II. The celestial heavens. The term heaven, in both the OT and NT, often refers to the vast space above, in which are included the sun, moon, the planets, and the stars. At the beginning of the creation account is the phrase, “lights in the firmament of the heavens” (Gen. 1:14 KJV [NIV, “lights in the expanse of the sky”]; cf. 15:5; Deut. 4:19 and see FIRMAMENT). Repeatedly one reads, as the writer to the Hebrews states, “The heavens are the work of your hands” (e.g., Heb. 1:10; Ps. 33:6). Among the planets, Venus and Saturn are possibly referred to (Isa. 14:12; Amos 5:26); and among the so-called fixed stars, several constellations are named in the book of Job, as the Pleiades and Orion (Job 9:9; 38:31; cf. Amos 5:8). See ASTRONOMY. The Hebrew people were forbidden to worship these stellar bodies (Exod. 20:4; cf. the offering of sacrifices to the QUEEN OF HEAVEN, Jer. 44:17-25) and to indulge in astrological speculations (Isa. 47:13). In such phrases as “under the whole heaven” (Dan. 7:27), the reference is to the totality of mankind.

III. Heaven as the abode of God. Although the Scriptures teach that “the heavens, even the highest heaven, cannot contain” God (1 Ki. 8:27), and that God is everywhere present in the universe, they nevertheless clearly affirm that heaven is in a particular way the habitation of God. “For this is what the high and lofty One says—/ he who lives forever, whose name is holy: / ‘I live in a high and holy place, / but also with him who is contrite and lowly in spirit, / to revive the spirit of the lowly / and to revive the heart of the contrite’” (Isa. 57:15; cf. 63:15).

The psalmist often used the title “Most High,” especially when he wished to give thanks to God for deliverance or when appealing to him for deliverance from trouble (Pss. 7:17; 18:13; 57:2). Frequently in passages that relate to Israel and the nations round about occurs the title “The LORD, the God of heaven” (2 Chr. 36:23; Neh. 1:4, 5; Dan. 2:37, 44). GABRIEL, in the ANNUNCIATION to Mary, referred to Christ as “the Son of the Most High” (Lk. 1:32), and Jesus spoke of his disciples as “sons of the Most High” (6:35).

Various words in the OT and NT allude to heaven by referring to God’s habitation. The basic word is TABERNACLE, referring both to the tent erected by Moses and the building that the Lord set up, not man (Heb. 8:2; 9:11). The idea of God’s dwelling in a TEMPLE on earth is parallel with his dwelling in heaven (1 Ki. 8:12-13). The word SANCTUARY is used in reference to God’s dwelling in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:8), but also in relation to the holy place of heaven (Heb. 8:2; 9:8, 12); a similar use is found with the word DWELLING (Exod. 15:13; Ps. 33:14; cf. Isa. 63:15; Lk. 16:9).

The word that appears with greatest frequency in reference to heaven, both pointing to earthly structures and the heaven of God’s abode, is the word house, first introduced in Gen. 28:17. This use of the term occurs some fifteen times; note especially Solomon’s dedicatory prayer (and its context), where we read the great statement, “But will God really dwell on earth? The heavens, even the highest heaven, cannot contain you. How much less this temple I have built!” (1 Ki. 8:27). The same concept may be found in the Lord’s famous promise regarding the many “rooms” in his Father’s house (Jn. 14:2; but cf. the same Gk. word for “room,” monā G3665, in its only other occurrence, v. 23). Another term used in reference to heaven (as well as to structures on earth) is temple, found even in reference to the first tabernacle (1 Sam. 1:9; 3:3). A good illustration is DAVID’S statement, “In my distress I called to the LORD; / I called out to my God. / From his temple he heard my voice; / my cry came to his ears” (2 Sam. 22:7; cf. Isa. 6:1). The word sanctuary sometimes refers to the holiest part of the tabernacle or temple, but also to God’s heavenly abode (Ps. 102:19; cf. Heb. 8:2; Rev. 3:12; et al.).”

Often heaven is called the THRONE of God, both in the OT and NT (Isa. 61:1; Jer. 14:21; Matt. 5:34; and in the Apocalypse). The term GLORY often is used in reference both to the earthly tabernacle or temple and to the heavenly abode of God (Acts 7:55; 1 Tim. 3:16); the HOPE of heaven can be referred to as “the hope of glory” (Col. 1:27). Heaven can even occur as a synonym for God, as in the phrase “looking up to heaven” (Matt. 14:19; cf. Lk. 9:16). When the prodigal son said, “I have sinned against heaven,” he meant that he had sinned against God (Lk. 15:18; see also Matt. 23:22; Rom. 10; et al.).

IV. The relationship of Christ to heaven. The Lord Jesus in the NT is said to have dwelt eternally in the heavens, as he himself declares in the high priestly prayer (Jn. 17:5). Compare especially John’s statement that before his advent he was “in the bosom of the Father” (1:18 KJV), concerning which B. F. Westcott says that here is “the combination (as it were) of rest and motion, of a continuous relation, with the realisation of it” (The Gospel according to St. John [1880], 15). Repeatedly, the advent of Christ is expressed as Christ’s coming down from heaven, which he himself affirmed even at the beginning of his ministry (3:13). Six times in his great discourse on the Bread of Life, the Lord referred to himself as “the bread that came down from heaven” (6:33-51). Three times in the Gospels, utterances from heaven confirmed the claims of Christ: the first at the time of his BAPTISM (Matt. 3:16-17); then in the great experience of the TRANSFIGURATION (17:5; cf. 2 Pet. 1:18); and finally at the end of his ministry (Jn. 12:28; only in the fourth gospel).

The subject of heaven is inextricably identified with the ASCENSION of Jesus Christ. The APOSTLES’ CREED summarizes the NT teaching in the clause, “he ascended into heaven.” This was stated by the Lord himself (Jn. 20:17) and by Luke in his account (Lk. 24:51; Acts 1:9). The event is confirmed in references in the letters of PAUL (Eph. 4:10; 1 Tim. 3:16; 1 Pet. 3:22). To ascend into heaven was to ascend to God. As K. Schilder puts it (Heaven, What Is It? [1950], 56): “The ascension of Christ is of special meaning in the history of heaven. It reveals anew that the history of heaven is closely bound up with that of the earth. The diastase [separation] and the conjunction are clearly revealed. For Christ withdrew from the dwelling place of his people. The Greek puts it thus: he made diastase between himself and them [diestā ap' autōn, Lk. 24:51]. But there is conjunction also; Christ carried his physical body to heaven, a pledge of the coming union between heaven and earth. And he sent his Spirit as a counter pledge—the Spirit who utters that longing of men with unutterable groaning, crying out, ‘How long, O Lord?’ And heaven, too, awaits that consummation; the Son intercedes for the church, straining toward that end, that great moment of time. And the blessed cry out also, ‘How long, how long, O Lord?’ How long before we shall reach that ‘moment of time when earth and heaven shall be drawn together, as they ought to be’?”

Jesus on his throne in heaven. Painting in the Russian Orthodox Church of the Ascension, Mount of Olives, Jerusalem.

V. The present inhabitants of heaven. From ages long before the CREATION, heaven was the home of the angels. See ANGEL. Large groups of these are referred to as hosts: “Praise him, all his angels, / praise him, all his heavenly hosts!” (Ps. 148:2; cf. 103:21). The expression “the holy ones” can refer to angelic beings (Job 5:1; 15:15; Zech. 14:5). Karl Barth goes so far as to say, “A dogmatics which tried to escape the task of Angelology would be guilty of an indolent omission which might well jeopardize the whole church” (Church Dogmatics [1964-82], 3/3:374).

The CHERUBIM are first mentioned immediately after the FALL of the first parents. Having driven ADAM and EVE out of the Garden of Eden, God “placed on the east side of the Garden of Eden cherubim and a flaming sword flashing back and forth to guard the way to the tree of life” (Gen. 3:24; see EDEN, GARDEN OF). Apart from symbolic references, they appear especially prominent in Ezek. 10, where they are apparently to be identified with the living creatures of the first chapter. It is impossible here to interpret all the complicated details given concerning these creatures in EZEKIEL. Moorehead’s comment on these supernatural beings is a model of conciseness when he says that they are “hieroglyphs of God’s attributes, of the eternal forces and infinite powers of the throne of God... The execution of his will is through the power and forces which he himself has created, angels, natural law, human beings and the animal creation.”

VI. The possibility of heavenly life now. At the beginning of the Lord's ministry, in the great prayer he taught his disciples, a life ruled by heaven is certainly implied: "your will be done on earth as it is in heaven" (Matt. 6:10). True servants of the Lord cannot do anything else but obey his will, as Paul himself enjoined his readers not to be men pleasers, but "slaves of Christ, doing the will of God from your heart" (Eph. 6:6). A prayer such as this, taught by the Lord Jesus, certainly must be one that can be fulfilled.

Paul in his letter to the PHILIPPIANS has one of the fullest statements regarding the present relationship to heaven to be found anywhere in the Scriptures. He connects the heavenly influence upon present life with the great truth that some day in heaven believers will be clothed in a body conformable to the glorious body of the Lord Jesus: "But our citizenship is in heaven. And we eagerly await a Savior from there, the Lord Jesus Christ, who, by the power that enables him to bring everything under his control, will transform our lowly bodies so that they will be like his glorious body" (Phil. 3:20-21). The Greek word translated CITIZENSHIP is politeuma G4487, which meant first of all a commonwealth or a state, and then it came to mean a colony of foreigners who, in the environment of their present residence outside of their native country, were living according to the laws of the country of which they were citizens, not according to the laws of the country in which they were living.

Heaven as the sphere of spiritual life is mentioned in COLOSSIANS. If believers have been raised together with Christ they are to "set [their] hearts on things above, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God" (Col. 3:1). In EPHESIANS, Paul declares that God has "blessed us in the heavenly realms with every spiritual blessing in Christ" (Eph. 1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12). The word here translated "heavenly realms" is the plural of epouranios G2230 (see HEAVENLY), and this particular notion of "in heavenly places" is found exclusively in this one epistle (the word is used elsewhere in reference to God [Matt. 18:35], Christ [1 Cor. 15:48-49; 2 Tim. 4:18; Heb. 11:16; 12:22], celestial bodies [1 Cor. 15:40], and heavenly things [Heb. 9:23]). Westcott's interpretation of this phrase deserves study: "...the supramundane, supra-sensual eternal order, or as we should say generally, 'the spiritual world' which is perceived by thought and not by sight. This is not distant or future but present, the scene even now of the Christian's struggle where his life is already centered and his strength is assured to him and his triumph is already realized" (St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians [1906], 7). The hope that sustains us is laid up for us in heaven (Col. 1:5). Believers "share in the heavenly calling" (Heb. 3:1), that is, they "have tasted the heavenly gift" (6:4).

VII. The rule of heaven in the Apocalypse. Except for references to the kingdom of heaven, so frequently found in the Gospel of Matthew, the word heaven more frequently appears in the book of Revelation than in any other successive twenty-two chapters in the Word of God—fifty-two times, to be exact. Actually, the tremendous events prophetically set forth in the Apocalypse are, as in no other book in the Bible, under the rule of heaven. The phrase "the God of heaven" occurs once (Rev. 11:13). The phenomenon most mentioned in Revelation in reference to heaven is God's "throne," which is referred to thirty-six times, from the opening paragraph of the first chapter to the initial statement of the last chapter, a concept that goes back as far as the Psalter (see Ps. 45:6 quoted in Heb. 1:8). The One seated upon the throne whom John beheld when he was taken into heaven is certainly God the Father. At the same time, John beheld a group of creatures surrounding the throne identified as twenty-four elders, each sitting upon separate thrones, of whom R. Govett (pseudonym Mattheetes) says: "They are councillors of the throne; conversant with the purposes of the king and able to impart intelligence to John, as the servant of God" (The Apocalypse [1861], 2:21). The second group, consisting of four living creatures, “full of eyes before and behind,” are probably the same as the cherubim of the OT (Ezek. 1:5-10). In addition, of course, there were multitudes of angels and (only in Rev. 14:2) “harpists playing their harps.”

In Rev. 11:19 is mentioned “God’s temple in heaven,” where John saw the ARK OF THE COVENANT. Henry Alford (The Greek Testament, 4 vols. [1871-74], 4:666-67) comments: “The ark of the Covenant is seen, the symbol of God’s faithfulness in bestowing grace on His people and in inflicting vengeance on His people’s enemies. This is evidently a solemn and befitting inauguration of God’s final judgments, as it is a conclusion of the series pointed out by the trumpets, which have been inflicted in answer to the prayers of His saints. It is from this temple that the judgments proceed forth (cf. ch. xiv. 15, 17, xv. 5 ff., xvi. 17); from His inmost and holiest place that those acts of vengeance are wrought which the great multitude in heaven recognize as faithful and true, ch. xix. 2. The symbolism of this verse, the opening for the first time of the heavenly temple, also indicates of what nature the succeeding visions are to be: that they will relate to God’s covenant people and His dealings with them.”

The angels announce the various judgments of God (Rev. 8:1—9:1; 16:1-17). It is an angel to whom was given the key to the pit of the abyss (9:1). There are also the angels who had MICHAEL as their leader in the great war in heaven (12:7-9). Angels sent from heaven are especially active in the judgments upon BABYLON (17:1; 18:1, 4, 20). The twelfth song in the book is sung by a great multitude at the time of the marriage of the Lamb (19:6-8). After John saw heaven open at the beginning of the series of judgments (4:1), he heard “the voice of many angels, numbering thousands upon thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand” (5:11). In the final events that usher in ETERNITY, the dragon is bound and cast into the abyss by an angel coming down from heaven (10:1).

The Bible begins with God, the Creator of heaven and earth. The NT begins with One coming down from heaven to establish the kingdom of heaven and to fulfill the promise of life in heaven forever with him. Appropriately, the last book of the NT, in depicting the final and universal rebellions against Christ—participated in by men, by Satan, by Satan’s angels, and by the antichrist—shows heaven and its supernatural citizens as possessing a foreknowledge of all that is to happen on earth, and supernatural power to determine the time and limitations of these outbursts, to announce and execute the judgment of God, and to participate in the final disposition of every power arraigned against God. Here is fulfilled in final and irrevocable reality the oft-heard pronouncement that all power and authority has been given to Christ. He and he alone is able to subdue all things unto himself and to bring those whom he has redeemed into their eternal habitation, which is the habitation of God. See KINGDOM OF GOD.

Heaven, Queen of. See QUEEN OF HEAVEN.

heavenly. That which relates to HEAVEN. The relevant Greek adjectives (ouranios G4039, epouranion G2230) are used with reference to spiritual truths and to the divine and eternal realm. The meaning is best understood in context.

Jesus contrasted “the earthly things” (ta epigeia), concerning the rebirth of men on earth, with “the heavenly things” (ta epourania), concerning the revelation of his divine person from heaven (Jn. 3:12); the idea is somewhat abstract but not divorced from the idea of heaven as a locality. In the book of HEBREWS, the TABERNACLE is characterized as a copy and shadow of the “heavenly” sanctuary (Heb. 8:5): it contains “heavenly things,” which are purified by the high priestly offering of Christ (9:23). “Heavenly” here should be associated directly with “heaven itself” and “the presence of God” (9:24).

PAUL used the phrase in three distinguishable senses. (a) The sphere of thought is futurist eschatology in 1 Cor. 15 where the glorious nature of the RESURRECTION bodies of believers is seen in analogy to the heavenly bodies of the stars (vv. 40, 48); as Christians have an earthly body, they shall have a “heavenly” or glorified body (v. 49; cf. v. 22; 2 Cor. 3:18). (b) In Ephesians the context is that of “realized” eschatology: by virtue of a present or “realized” UNION WITH CHRIST, the believer is the recipient of spiritual blessings “in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 1:3, 20). Believers are raised with Christ and made to sit “with him in the heavenly realms” (2:6); and thus united to Christ, they participate in the conquest against the principalities and powers, “the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms” (6:12; 3:10). (c) Finally, the simple idea of locale is present in Paul’s reference to heaven (Phil. 2:10) and Christ’s heavenly kingdom (2 Tim. 4:18). (See TDNT, 5:358-42; A.T. Lincoln, Paradise Now and Not Yet: Studies in the Role of the Heavenly Dimension in Paul’s Thought with Special Reference to his Eschatology [1981].)

J. C. DEYOUNG

heavens, new. The expression “new heaven(s) and a new earth” is a technical term in the eschatological language of the Bible to define and describe the final, perfected state of the created universe. See ESCHATOLOGY. The conception of a re-created universe has its origin in the biblical account of CREATION: “In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth” (Gen. 1:1). Here the phrase “the heavens and the earth” is meant to embrace the whole of the created universe (cf. Jn. 1:2-3; see also COSMOGONY; WORLD). The creation of the universe may be defined further as a creation out of nothing (ex nihilo), and as accomplished by divine commandment. “Heavens” in the primitive worldview was meant to describe all that is above the earth—the sky with its heavenly bodies—and therefore should be distinguished from HEAVEN as the dwelling place of God that is outside the realm of the created universe. The promise of a re-creation of the heavens and the earth arises not out of some inherent lack or evil in the material universe, but because of man's sin and God's subsequent curse: "Cursed is the ground because of you" (Gen. 3:17).

The idea of a renewed or re-created universe is present in substance in many passages: Isa. 51:16; Matt. 19:28; 24:29-31, 35; Mk. 13:24-27, 31; Rom. 8:19-23; 2 Cor. 5:17; Heb. 12:26-28. Specific mention of "new heaven(s) and a new earth" is found in Isa. 65:17; 66:22; 2 Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1. These passages suggest the following points of interest:

God is the source of this new universe. "Behold, I will create new heavens and a new earth" (Isa. 65:17; cf. 66:22). The hope for a renewed human life and society is rooted in a new world that will be purified in a radical way by God.

God will bring the new universe into existence in the end of history. It will be the product of a purely eschatological activity and will be directly related to degeneracy in human ethical and religious life (Mk. 13:24-27; cf. Rom. 8:19-23; 2 Pet. 3:3-13) as well as accomplishment of the evangelistic task of the church (Matt. 24:14). It will be the result of catastrophic events in the created universe that are designed not to annihilate but to cleanse and purify (Mk. 13:24-27 and parallels; 2 Pet. 3:3-13). It will be brought about by a radical renovation but not by a new creation ex nihilo. Thus, Jesus spoke of the method to be used as "renewal" (palingenesia G4098, Matt. 19:28; KJV, "regeneration"). Likewise PETER speaks of "the restitution [apokatastasis G640] of all things" (Acts 3:21 KJV; NRSV, "universal restoration"), which will be in a way similar to the cleansing of the world with the flood—the world will be purged by fire (2 Pet. 3:6-7; this continuity between the present and future universe stands in contrast to the rabbinic teaching that the new heavens and new earth were created at the end of the original creation week).

The divine revelation concerning the new heavens and new earth is closely related to the theme of the NEW JERUSALEM (Rev. 21:2—22:5), which contains the motif of a new Garden of Eden (22:2). (See K. Schilder, Heaven, What Is It? [1950], 69—71, 113—18; U. Simon, Heaven in the Christian Tradition [1958], 46-51, 221-27; J. C. DeYoung, Jerusalem in the New Testament [1960], 152ff.)

heave offering. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS IV.C.

Heber hee'buhr (חֶבֶר H2491, "associate, companion"; gentilic חִבְרִי H2499, "Heberite"). (1) Son of Beriah, grandson of ASHER, and eponymous ancestor of the Heberite clan (Gen. 46:17; Num. 26:45; 1 Chr. 7:31-32).

(2) A KENITE who separated himself for a time from the main body of Kenites and settled near KEDESH, W of the Sea of Galilee (Jdg. 4:11). Heber's clan established friendly associations with JABIN king of HAZOR, who was an enemy of Israel. The king's commander, SISERA, having been defeated by BARAK, fled for refuge to Heber's settlement. Sisera went into the tent of JAEL, Heber's wife (4:17). Jael, however, betraying the alliance between Jabin and her husband, took this opportunity to kill Sisera (4:18-22; 5:24-27).

(3) Son of MERED (by the latter's Judahite wife), "father" (i.e., "ruler/founder") of Soco, and descendant of JUDAH, although his precise genealogical connection is unclear (1 Chr. 4:18).

(4) Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:17).

(5) KJV alternate form of EBER (1 Chr. 5:13; 8:22; Lk. 3:35).

S. BARABAS

Hebrew language. A NW Semitic language spoken by the HEBREW PEOPLE. With the exception of Dan. 2-6 and portions of Ezra 4-7 (which were written in ARAMAIC), the OT was composed in Hebrew, and has been preserved in Masoretic MSS, equipped with vowel-points and accents, which date from the 8th or 9th cent. A.D. See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (OT). Earlier MSS of the Hebrew Bible without such vowel signs have been discovered among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. As for extrabiblical Hebrew, very few texts composed during the biblical period are extant, but significant documents are found among the DSS, and extensive Hebrew (esp. rabbinic) literature survives dating from about A.D. 200. The correct interpretation of the OT depends on an adequate mastery of Hebrew lexicography, grammar, syntax, and style.

I. The position of Hebrew in the Semitic language group. The Semitic family of languages has traditionally been divided into E Semitic (Akkadian with its subdialects of Babylonian and Assyrian; possibly also Eblaite), S Semitic (comprising Arabic, S Arabian, and Ethiopic), and NW Semitic (comprising Canaanite and Aramaic). More recently, linguists have argued that Arabic (or N Arabian) is more closely related to the NW Semitic languages than to S Semitic, and have proposed a basic distinction between E and W Semitic, with the latter further subdivided into S Semitic (comprising S Arabian and Ethiopic) and Central Semitic (comprising N Arabian and NW Semitic). See LANGUAGES OF THE ANE II.

In either case, Hebrew clearly belongs within the Canaanite branch of NW Semitic. Canaanite also includes Moabite, which differs from Hebrew only in a few minor details, and Phoenician. The language spoken in MOAB is preserved almost exclusively in an inscription of King MESHA (see MOABITE STONE). The language of PHOENICIA was spoken in the great coastal cities of TYRE, SIDON, Berytus, Tripolis, and Byblos (see GEBAL), and in all of the colonies settled by Phoenician emigrants in Cyprus, Sardinia, Sicily, and N Africa (in which latter area regional peculiarities developed resulting in Punic). It was apparently the Phoenician alphabet that was adopted by all the Canaanite-speaking peoples, including Hebrews and Moabites, and also by the Arameans as well, no later than the the 11th cent. B.C. By this period several Semitic consonants had merged in Canaanite (e.g., ḏ with z; ḥ with ḫ; t with š). Phoenician also developed characteristics that set it apart from Hebrew, such as the causative stem yiphil (Heb. hiphil).

Canaanite moreover would have included the languages spoken in AMMON and EDOM (both extant in a few small texts) and possibly also AMORITE (which has been preserved largely in the form of personal names). The language attested in the so-called Sinaitic inscriptions (written in a type of alphabetic script resembling hieroglyphics, and found not only in the turquoise mines of Serabit el-Khadim in the Sinai peninsula but also in Palestine) may represent a type of S Canaanite, but the interpretation of these texts is debated (cf. W. F. Albright, The Proto-Sinaitic Inscriptions and Their Decipherment [1966]). See ALPHABET; WRITING.

Also controversial is the placement of Ugaritic, the language spoken in Ras Shamra (ancient UGARIT). Written in a thirty-character CUNEIFORM alphabet, Ugaritic preserved most of the original Semitic phonemes that were assimilated to other phonemes in Hebrew and Phoenician. Some scholars regard it as an early form of Canaanite, but others believe it represents a distinct branch within NW Semitic. (See further Z. S. Harris, The Development of the Canaanite Dialects [1939]; S. Moscati et al., An Introduction to the Comparative Grammar of the Semitic Languages [1964]; W. R. Garr, Dialect Geography of Syria-Palestine, 1000-586 B.C.E. [1985]; J. Huehnergard in CANE, 4:2117-34.)

The lexical relationship of Hebrew to other Semitic languages deserves special attention. It is only to be expected that the other Canaanite dialects are of great importance in illuminating the grammatical and lexical usages of biblical Hebrew, although unfortunately the amount of literature in these languages is regrettably meager, with the exception of Ugaritic. The decipherment and analysis of Ugaritic, totally unknown to modern scholarship until 1929, has proven to be of major importance in establishing that certain words and phrases, suspected by many OT critics of being textual errors in the Hebrew Scriptures, were in fact current back in the Mosaic period. New meanings for rare biblical words have been made available by the use of cognates in Ugaritic literature, and many obscurities thereby have been alleviated or cleared up altogether.

Another important source of information concerning the meaning of obscure biblical terms is the considerable literature preserved in Aramaic. To be sure, there is a rather limited amount of this from the OT period, largely consisting of funerary inscriptions, biographical epitaphs, governmental decrees, and a few epistles. Most of the Aramaic from intertestamental and NT times consists of the writings of Jews who were rooted in the OT tradition. The GENESIS APOCRYPHON, discovered in Qumran Cave 1, was written in the 1st cent. B.C. or earlier (in a form of Aram. separated by centuries of development from the Aram. of Daniel and Ezra); the Targum of Onkelos on the Pentateuch can be dated no earlier than A.D. 200, and the Targum of Jonathan on the Prophets somewhat later than that (see TARGUM). The Aramaic of the MIDRASH and TALMUD is later still. The Syriac Peshitta (written in an eastern dialect of Aram., and in a different form of alphabet from the "Square Hebrew" of biblical and post-biblical Aram.) can hardly be older than the late 2nd cent. A.D.

Outside the NW Semitic group, important sources of lexical data come from Akkadian (Assyro-Babylonian) literature, all of which dates back to OT times or even earlier, and some of which deals with matters discussed in the Hebrew Scriptures. Beginning with the Old Akkadian inscriptions of Sargon of Agade (c. 2200 B.C.), the first dynasty of Babylon with its Code of HAMMURABI (c. 1700), the MARI tablets from the same period, the Nuzi tablets from 1500, the Old Assyrian letters and commercial documents from the Assyrian merchant colony in Cappadocia, the royal inscriptions, official annals, and business documents from the Assyrian Empire period (850-612 B.C.), and the Neo-Babylonian inscriptions and annals from the 6th cent.—all of these furnish a large body of linguistic data from which to receive help in solving lexical problems.

As far as S Semitic is concerned, there is a modest number of dedicatory, boundary-marker, and funerary inscriptions in the various dialects (SABEAN, MINEAN, Qatabanian, Hadramautian) of Old S Arabian. Northern Arabian material prior to Muhammad consists largely of short graffiti (Thamudic, Lihyanic, Safahitic) dating from the 1st cent. B.C. to the 4th cent. A.D. Beginning with the Koran and the early Islamic period, a tremendous wealth of vocabulary has been preserved in a Semitic dialect so conservative in character as to retain, with relatively little change, the phonology and morphology of Primitive Semitic. Literary Arabic is of major value in supplying the most likely vowel patterns for the vowelless scripts of Ugaritic, Phoenician, Old Aramaic, and even of the earliest (Mosaic) form of biblical Hebrew, which may still have retained short vowel endings on its nouns and verbs during the 2nd millennium B.C. Otherwise, one has to rely on the transcriptions of Canaanite names contained in Middle Kingdom and New Kingdom Egyptian inscriptions, and about thirty-six different Canaanite words (the so-called “Canaanite glosses”) inserted into the Akkadian texts of the TELL EL-AMARNA Letters (c. 1420-1370 B.C.) in cuneiform syllabic spelling, clearly demonstrating that the short-vowel endings were still in use back in that period.

The chief extrabiblical Hebrew documents from the OT period include the following: (1) A schoolboy’s exercise on a clay tablet listing the agricultural significance of the successive months of the year; dated at about 925 B.C. and discovered at GEZER, it is known as the Gezer Calendar (see AGRICULTURE V). (2) The Siloam Inscription dating from about 705 B.C. in the reign of HEZEKIAH, and describing the completion of the tunnel cut through from the pool of SILOAM to a reservoir inside the city wall of Jerusalem. (3) The Samaritan OSTRACA dating from the reign of JEROBOAM II (c. 770 B.C.) and consisting of receipts for taxes paid to the royal treasury in the form of wine or oil. (4) The LACHISH letters dating from about 587 B.C., discovered at Tell ed-Duweir, and consisting largely of communications from the commander of a Jewish outpost to his superior officer in the city headquarters. Apart from these are a few fragmentary lists of names, one discovered at ARAD, and another found in the QUMRAN area, dating back to a preexilic army outpost maintained for a time in this region. These documents have served to confirm the authenticity of the OT books as written in the period to which they purport to belong (thus, the Lachish letters are strongly reminiscent of Jeremiah); but more important still, they indicate the way Hebrew was spelled in the older period, and thus give a clue as to possible ways in which copyists’ errors may have arisen in the course of the transmission of the OT text.

II. Phonology. The Hebrew alphabet consists of twenty-two letters, all of which are consonants. These letters represent almost all the consonantal sounds found in English plus a number of sounds foreign to Western languages, such as the pharyngeal fricatives het (ח) and ayin (ע), and the so-called “emphatic” consonants ḥet (ח), ṣade (צ), and qoph (ק). The precise pronunciation of these and other sounds in biblical times is debated. Hebrew had three sibilants: in addition to šin (ש, pronounced like Eng. sh), some kind of distinction existed between samek (ס = Eng. s) and śin (שׁ, perhaps an intermediate position between š and ś). It seems clear that in the northern kingdom of the ten tribes the distinction was lost quite early; in Judah it faded away by the 6th cent., and (esp. under Aram. influence), samekh began to be substituted for sin in the spelling of words. It also should be observed that sometime after 500 B.C. the occlusives or stops b, g, d, k, p, and t (known as the begadkephat consonants) became spirantized after vowel sounds, that is, the flow of air was not fully obstructed (cf. Spanish dedo, “finger”: the first d is pronounced as in English, but the second, which immediately follows a vowel, approximates the sound of th in those).

As for the Hebrew vocalic system, it is often described as consisting of ten vowels (a, e, i, o, u, each of them pronounced short or long) and two diphthongs (ai and «a). This description appears to be inaccurate, however. The vowel markings used by the Tiberian Masoretes seem to indicate a sevenfold distinction in quality or timbre: a (pataḥ), i (ḥireq), u (qibbuṣ), open e (ṣegol), close e (ṣere), open o (qames), and close o (holem). In this system, vowel length had no phonemic significance, although there is little doubt that, for example, the ḥolem and the qameṣ usually represent an original long ō and short o respectively, and that such length distinctions were linguistically significant in the biblical period. (See further P. Joüon and T. Muraoka, A Grammar of Biblical Hebrew, 2 vols. [1991], 1:34-46.) Note: in the discussion that follows, for the sake of simplicity, certain vowel distinctions are not represented in the transliteration if they do not affect the point being made.

III. Nouns. In the earliest period the Hebrew nouns, as in other Semitic languages, no doubt possessed short vowel endings: the nominative case ended in -u, the genitive in -i, and the accusative in -a (the feminine noun generally ended in -atu, -ati, -ata). The masculine plural was -īma for all three cases; the feminine plural was -ātu or -āti. There was also a dual number, especially for parts of the body existing in pairs (e.g., eyes, ears, wings, feet); the masculine dual ending was -ayim, and the feminine -ātayim. Already in the Mosaic period, however, the feminine long ā had rounded to long ō (the “Canaanite shift”); hence -ōtu in the plural and -ōtayim in the dual.

In the course of time the short vowel endings were dropped altogether, except that in some cases the accusative masculine -a was retained as a long ā in order to express motion toward a place (so called “he-directive,” since this was spelled with a final silent consonant he), or in rare cases, a simple location (e.g., mizbehāh, “on the altar”). Unlike feminine nouns ending in accented -āh, the accent always fell on the penult in the case of a he-directive. The genitive had to be expressed by word position after the case endings were lost; that is, the possessor always followed right after the thing possessed. For example, “the word of the king” (originally dabar hammalki, from dabaru “word,” and malku “king”) was expressed dēbar hammelek (the notation ě denotes the shewa sound or “half vowel”). Note that the definite article, “the,” was expressed by ha- and the doubling of the first letter of the noun itself. The first member of this pair was put into what is called the “construct” state. Partly because constructs lost their short vowel endings much earlier than did the absolutes, and partly because the construct bore no principal accent (which always fell on the second noun), the constructs often differed slightly from their normal or “absolute” form. This was especially true of feminine nouns. For example, the word for “queen” was originally malkatu, and this became malkāh in the OT period; but in the case of the construct the -t was retained, thus “the queen of Israel” was malkat yiśra'el.

In the case of the masculine plural, the ending -ey (-ê) was used for the construct; thus, from susim, “horses,” we get susey hammelek, “the horses of the king.” Apart from these special cases, the construct relationship was shown merely by the immediate juxtaposition of two nouns. One other important development ensued upon the loss of case endings, and that was the use of ’et as an indicator of the direct object, especially if the noun object was definite (i.e., preceded by the definite article, ha). This was virtually obligatory in prose (although is rarely used in poetry). Thus, “The king killed the horse” would be: qaṭal hammelek ’et-hassus.

As for adjectives, they were treated exactly like nouns, and originally had the same case endings. If they were attributive, they had to follow their noun rather than precede it, and they had to have the definite article if their noun did. Thus, “a good horse” was sus ṭob but “the good horse” was hassus haṭṭob. On the other hand, if the adjective was predicate, it normally preceded the noun and was never definite: “The horse (is) good” would be ṭob hassus. Interestingly enough, Hebrew was the first of the Canaanite dialects to develop the definite article, probably because the definite article was used widely in colloquial Egyptian during the 18th dynasty before the Israelites migrated from Egypt to Palestine.

IV. Verbs. Unlike many Western languages such as English, the Semitic tongues appear to be less interested in time values than in aspectual distinctions. That is to say, verbal forms do not primarily indicate when an action took place (past, present, future) but rather the way the action is perceived or presented by the speaker (as a complete whole or as an incomplete process). In general, the Hebrew “perfect” or perfective tense (a suffix conjugation) viewed the action as complete, while the “imperfect” or nonperfective tense (a prefix conjugation) presented it as incomplete (which sometimes reflected repetitive or continual action).

As a practical matter, however, the perfect tense in narrative usually referred to past time, and the imperfect tense usually referred to present or future time. Thus, for purposes of convenience one may render the form katab (perf 3rd sing. masc.) as “he wrote”; and its corresponding imperfect, yiktob, as “he will write” or “he writes.” Such renderings always need to be verified from the context: the surrounding setting of the imperfect verb may show that it referred to action in progress in past time; correspondingly, the perfect tense was used sometimes to express the immediate past, where in English we would employ the present tense. The frequent formula, “Thus says the LORD” renders koh ’amar Yahweh; the verb ’amar is in the perfect because the action is viewed as a complete whole (perhaps suggesting that the prophet knows what Yahweh has said only because he has already told him). The perfect is also used occasionally to express a future action that has been foretold by the Lord as part of his divine plan—and is therefore as certain of accomplishment as if it had already taken place. In each case the context will indicate quite clearly what the temporal locus is for each verb.

Basically the same antinomy between complete and incomplete action carries over into the “consecutive” (or “conversive”) tenses. Unlike other Semitic languages, Hebrew developed a specialized use of the conjunction “and.” When the simple particle wə- preceded the imperfect, there was no change in its tense value; but if it was strengthened to wa-with the doubling of the first consonant of the verb form, then it had the effect of converting an imperfect into a perfect in its function. Thus, yiktob meant “he will write,” but wayyiktob meant “and he wrote.” This usage seems to have originated from an old preterite tense that had genuine time value (cf. Akk. iprus, “he judged”). It never had the short vowel ending of the genuine imperfect; the original conversive was yaktub, and the original imperfect was yaktubu. Since both forms became yiktob in the 1st millennium, the only factor showing past time was the connective particle wa-.

Related to this preterite conversive form is the use of the Arabic jussive after the negative lam. The jussive also lacked a short vowel ending; thus, Arabic lam yaktub meant, “he did not write.” Then, by a principle of polarity (i.e., if a waw can change an impf. into a pf., then a waw should change a pf. into an impf.) the perfect conversive (or “consecutive”) arose as a secondary development. Thus, katab means “he wrote,” but wēkatab means “and he will write” (or even, “that he might write”). At least 90 percent of the perfects preceded by waw in biblical Hebrew are converted; the remaining 5 or 10 percent can be shown from the context to be unconverted. (The interpretation of the verbal conjugations is debated, however. For a full discussion, see B. K. Waltke and M. O’Connor, An Introduction to Biblical Hebrew Syntax [1990], chs. 29-33.)

In addition to its indicative uses, the imperfect can function as a subjunctive or a jussive. After a waw (or an explicit purpose particle), the imperfect is used to express the subjunctive idea: “in order that he may write.” There was also a jussive form that looked just like the indicative imperfect in the strong verb (except for the hiphil stem, where impf. yaktib, “he will cause to write,” contrasts with the jussive yakteb, “let him cause to write”). But since this jussive, like the imperfect conversive, went back to an original form that lacked short-vowel endings (yaktub, as contrasted with the impf. yaktubu), distinctive jussive forms were maintained in certain types of “weak” verbs. Thus, from the verb qum (“arise”) we have imperfect yaqum (“he will arise”), but jussive yaqom (“let him arise”).

The imperative of the verb consisted of the imperfect form without the prefix. Thus, tiktob meant “you will write” (impf.), but kētoḅ meant “write!” (imperative). There were two types of infinitive: (a) The infinitive construct (kētoḅ, resembling the imperative), which could serve as a complement to a main verb, was often preceded by a preposition like lē- (“to”); it could also take suffix pronouns as its subjects or objects. (b) The infinitive absolute (katob), which could have no preposition before it or suffix pronoun after it, served to emphasize or extend the action of the main verb it accompanied, or else could take the place of the main verb altogether (in cases where the action was being emphasized, rather than the agent of the action).

Having discussed the function of the various tenses of the verb, we now come to an analysis of the structure of the perfect and imperfect. Semitic verbs were constructed on a skeleton consisting usually of three consonants, and indicating tense or stem by doubling one of the consonants or by the vowel pattern used with them. Given the pattern, one is able to identify the tense and stem of almost any verb. (In the examples that follow, ā=qameṣ, ē=ṣere, ō=ḥolem). The pattern CāCaC (where C represents any radical consonant) always means the perfect active masculine 3rd person singular of that verb (thus, kātab, “he wrote”; qātal, “he killed”; šāmar, “he guarded”). The pattern yīCCōC always means the imperfect 3rd masculine singular active (thus, yiktōḅ, “he will write”; yīqtōl, “he will kill”; yīāmōr, “he will guard”). The perfect tense was inflected by the addition of suffixes (thus kātabti, “I wrote,” kātabtā, “you [masc] wrote,” kātabt, “you [fem.] wrote,” etc.).

The imperfect tense was inflected by both prefixes and suffixes (also referred to as preformatives and sufformatives). For example, the masculine 3rd singular was indicated by yī- (yiktōḅ, “he will write”), the masculine 3rd plural by the same prefix plus suffix -u (yiktē, “they will write”), the 1st singular by the prefix ʾe- (ʾektōḅ, “I will write”), and so on. If the root of the verb begins with a guttural (ʾayin, hē, het, or even ʾaleph), the vowel of the preformative preserves the original short a (e.g., yaʾāmōd, “he will stand,” instead of yīʾmōd). So-called hollow verbs (which appear to be missing a middle consonant), such as qum, “arise,” also preserve this a, but modified because the prefix syllable ends in a vowel (thus, yāqum, “he will arise”).

The examples given above use verbs in their basic stem, called qal (“light”). In common with the other Semitic languages, however, Hebrew verbs possessed derived stems that modified the root idea in various ways. (1) The niphal was a conjugation or stem that put the root into a reflexive or passive meaning (the stem names are derived from the classical model verb, pāal, “to make”). (2) The piel involved the doubling of the middle consonant, and it either intensified the action (thus, “sibber, “shatter,” from šādbar, “break”), or else it rendered the action transitive or causative. From qā’daš “be holy,” the piel qiddēš meant “sanctify.” Some verbs, such as dibber, “speak,” nearly always occur in the piel. (3) The passive of piel was pual; thus, šubbar meant “he was shattered,” and quddaš meant “he was sanctified.” (4) The reflexive of piel was hitpael; thus, hitqaddēš meant “he sanctified himself.” (5) The stem hiphil was primarily causative; thus, hiktib, “he caused to write.” Some hiphils, however, were characteristic, that is, they showed some noun in action. Thus, from the noun ōzen, “ear,” comes the hiphil heēzin (note how hi- modifies to he- before a guttural), meaning “to use the ear,” that is, “listen.” (6) The passive form of hiphil was hophal; for example, hoktab meant “he was caused to write.” Each verb might theoretically appear in seven stems (including the qal), but in actuality few verbs do; some of them occur in only one or two of these conjugations.

Some verbs are referred to as “weak” if any of their root consonants were subject to modification or even disappearance under certain conditions; this often resulted in alteration of the accompanying vowels. Thus, we have already seen that an initial guttural in the root would prevent the attenuation of an original short a to short i (thus, yaāmōd instead of yimōd) and would compel an original i to become e (thus, yehēzaq instead of yihzaq). Similar changes were occasioned by a guttural in whichever position it was present in the root, whether first radical, second, or third. Then again, if the first radical was a nun (נ=n), this became assimilated to the middle radical whenever no vowel sound separated them; thus, yippōl resulted from nāpal (“he fell”; the unassimilated form would have been yinpōl). If the middle radical was waw or yod, the result was a “hollow” verb like qum (“arise”) or bin (“understand”). If it was the third radical that was waw or yod, this led to alterations such as bānāh (“he built”) from original banaya, oryibneh (“he will build”) from original yibnayu. Or again, if the third radical was the same as the second, the two would combine to form a doubled consonant whenever there was no vowel sound in between. Thus from sābab (“surround”) is derived yāsōbbu (or else, by a transfer of the doubling to the first radical, yissēbu), “they will surround.”

It should be added that all seven stems possessed participles; thus, from qādaš (“be holy”) the qal participle would be qōdēš, the niphal niqdāš, the piel mēqaddēš, and so on. These participles could serve as simple adjectives (thus, hassōpēr hakkōtēb would be “the writing scribe”), or as relative clauses (the previous example could also be translated, “the scribe who was writing”), or as agential nouns like kōhēn, “priest” (from the root khn, which in the piel means “perform the duties of priest”), or as the predicate of a clause after a noun or pronoun subject. This last construction, known as a present periphrastic, was used to convey either continuous, durative action (e.g. hassōpēr kōtēb, “the scribe is writing”) or else imminent action (e.g., Yahweh nōtēn lākem could mean, “Yahweh is about to give to you”).

V. Pronouns. Hebrew makes use of both independent pronouns (e.g., āni or anōki, “I,” attah, “you [masc. sg.],” etc.) and pronominal suffixes. The latter can be attached to nouns (e.g., susi, “my horse,” suso, “his horse,” etc.) and to verbs (qēṭaltiḥu, “I killed him,” qetaluha, “they killed her”). When attached to nouns, the construct form is used; thus a feminine noun like malkah (“queen”) shows an -at ending before the possessive pronoun is added (“your [masc. sg.] queen” is malkatēka). Hebrew has the demonstrative pronoun “this” (masc. sing. zeh), but “that” is expressed with the independent third person pronouns preceded by the article (“that king” is hammelek hahu<sup>1</sup>, lit. “the king the he”). The relative pronoun is <sup>1</sup>āšer (more rarely še-, esp. in poetry), although often the relative clause was expressed by a participle with the definite article (thus, <sup>1</sup>šlohim habbore<sup>1</sup> ’et-ha’ares means “God who created the earth”).

VI. Word order. The normal word order of Hebrew prose was: (1) verb, (2) pronoun object or indirect object, (3) noun subject, (4) noun object. For example, “The king gave me the book” would be, natan li hammelek<sup>1</sup> ’et-hasseper. Any deviation from this order indicated some special emphasis. Thus, li natan hammelek<sup>1</sup> ’et-hasseper could be rendered, “It was to me that the king gave the book.” Correspondingly, ’et-hasseper natan li hammelek would suggest, “It was the book the king gave me.” In poetry the same general word order prevailed, but emphasis often influenced deviations from the verb-subject-object pattern. Introductory temporal or causal phrases would of course precede the verb; likewise such conjunctions as ki (“when, because, if”), ’im (“if”), or the relative pronoun, etc. Special emphasis also was achieved by the use of the independent pronoun with an inflected verb. Thus <sup>1</sup>’attah katabta would indicate, “It was you who wrote”; <sup>1</sup>’āni<sup>1</sup> ’ādabber means, “I myself will speak.”

VII. Loanwords. As the Israelites came into contact with foreign cultures, they naturally tended to absorb terms from other languages, especially nouns referring to manufactured products, or technical expressions relating to weights and measures, governmental administration, or the like. There was a certain carry-over of Mesopotamian words from the time of ABRAHAM, who was an immigrant from Ur and Haran, and it is possible that the Hebrew names of the months, many of which resemble the Akkadian, were imported into the language from the beginning. Likewise terms like hekal, “temple” (Akk. ēkallu, which was borrowed from Sumer. ē-gal, “great house”), kētonet, “linen garment, tunic” (Akk. kitintu), and others. There also were early borrowings from Aramaic in patriarchal times, as might be expected from Abraham’s sojourn in Haran, and the marriage of ISAAC and JACOB to Aramaic-speaking wives. Note that, according to Gen. 31:47, what Jacob called in Canaanite GALEED (“witness head”) his father-in-law Laban called in Aramaic JEGAR SAHADUTHA (same meaning).

The most noteworthy assortment of loanwords comes from Egyptian during the Pentateuchal period (as was only to be expected from the Israelites’ 430-year sojourn in GOSHEN). These include terms for weights and measures like zeret, “span” (Egyp. drt, “hand”) and <sup>1</sup>’epah, “ephah” (Egyp. <sup>1</sup>’pt), as well as other common words, such as qemah, “flour” (Egyp. kmhw, a type of bread) and yē’or, “river” (esp. the Nile, from Egyp, <sup>1</sup>(t)rw). During the Solomonic period, while trade relations were being carried on with India, a few words of probable Sanskrit origin were adopted (e.g., <sup>1</sup>appiryon, “palanquin, sedan-chair,” from Skt. paryanka, Cant. 3:9). Later on, in the 8th cent. and under the influence of Assyria, an infusion of Akkadian terms began, such as peḥah, “governor” (Isa. 36:9). During the Captivity it was only to be expected that many new terms would be adopted from Babylonian, like <sup>1</sup>’iggeret, “epistle” (Akk. egirtu), and middah, “tribute” (Akk. mandattu). Since Aramaic displaced Hebrew as the household speech of the Jews during the captivity, one is not surprised to see a word like ṭalal, “cover over” (instead of the regular šillel), as well as many others. After the Persian conquest of Babylon, numerous new words were added to the vocabulary of Hebrew, such as dat, “law” (Pers. data) and ‘appeden, “palace” (Pers. ’apadāna).

VIII. Style. From the foregoing description of the morphology of biblical Hebrew, it will be apparent that it lacked precision in tenses such as characterize Greek, Latin, and the Indo-European languages generally. It possessed remarkable power as a medium of emotional expression and prophetic eloquence. Because of its ability to compress so much thought-content into few syllables, it possessed a dynamic, penetrative force capable of stirring the hearer to the depths of his being. It may have lacked the ability of Greek to express fine shades of meaning, and many of its key terms may be difficult to define exactly, but it possessed a remarkable ability to soar to sublimer heights in its beautiful parallelistic poetry or exalted prophetic passages than other languages could hope to attain. In sound it was unusually sonorous, more so than the other Semitic languages, because of the frequency of pretonic long syllables (a feature peculiar to Hebrew).

No translation into another tongue can do justice to the emotional intensity and rugged beauty of its verse (perhaps German comes the closest to this ideal), or duplicate its shifting moods of exaltation and pathos. Its theological vocabulary requires careful study in depth, if the overtones, undertones, and connotations are to be grasped, for these are beyond the power of even the most skillful translation to convey with any real adequacy. Truly this was a linguistic medium ideally adapted for the proclamation of God’s message, so as to reach the intellect, the emotions, and the will.

Hebrew of the Hebrews. A phrase used by PAUL to describe himself (Gk. Hebraios ex Hebraiōn, Phil. 3:5). In this passage, the apostle was defending his integrity and recounting his pedigree for the benefit of his readers. In effect he was stating that he was of pure Hebrew stock and had retained the language and traditions of his ancestors, unlike some Jews who had become hellenized. The phrase involves the use of the Hebrew superlative, with a noun in special relationship to another noun (cf. “the song of songs,” i.e., the most excellent song).

Hebrew people. Members of the nation of ISRAEL (see also JEW). The term (ibrî H6303 has traditionally been derived from EBER (ēber H6299), the grandson of SHEM and ancestor of ABRAHAM (Gen. 10:24; 11:16). Others have derived the term directly from the verb (ābar H6296, “to pass, cross over, go beyond”; thus a Hebrew would be “one from the other side,” that is, beyond the JORDAN (cf. Josh. 1:2 et al.) or beyond the EUPHRATES (note that the LXX renders Gen. 14:13 with Abram tō peratē, “Abram who crossed over,” i.e., the migrant or wanderer).

Since the discovery of the TELL EL AMARNA tablets, an effort was made to identify the nationality of the HABIRU mentioned in these documents. Some have argued that this term is not the name of a people but an appellativum descriptive of a juridic-social position. The contexts suggest that the term refers to mercenaries. On the basis of various biblical texts (e.g., such as Exod. 21:2-6; 1 Sam. 14:21; Jer. 34:8-11, 14), G. von Rad surmises that Habiru originally described the legal position of servitude, or slavery, as opposed to hopšî, the free person. Gradually, first by outsiders and then by Israelites, the word was used as a gentilicium.

It is difficult to decide which opinion is right, but there is much to be said for the view that regards hāibrîm as a topographical description: “those from across the Jordan.” The memory of Israel’s origin lingered long in Jewish tradition: “My father was a wandering Aramean” (Deut. 26:5). The land was God’s gift to his people. The Psalms repeatedly refer to the miracle of the conquest. The Israelites knew themselves as Hebrews early in their history and were known as such (cf. 1 Sam. 4:6; cf. Jon. 1:9). In the NT, there is complete identification between Israelite and Hebrew (2 Cor. 11:22). The name stands as a constant reminder of the pilgrimage across the desert to the Promised Land. If this is the right interpretation, Israel’s history is a paradigm of humanity at large. (See G. Dalman, Jesus-Jeshua [1929], 7ff.; P. K. Hitti, History of Syria [1951], 160-61; A. H. Hebrew poetry. That the Semites in general were people of some musical ability, and that the Hebrews in particular fostered the cultural pursuits of music and poetry, will be apparent when it is realized that one-third of the Hebrew Bible was actually composed in poetic form. The wealth of poetic material that existed in the ANE has been illustrated by archaeological discoveries, some of which, such as the Ras Shamra texts (see UGARIT), have a direct bearing on the poetical material of the OT. Whereas the more obvious members of this corpus are Psalms, Proverbs, and the Song of Solomon, it also includes Lamentations, Obadiah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah, all of which were cast in poetic form apart from their superscriptions or titles. In addition, about one-half of Jeremiah is poetic in form, and there are also substantial segments of poetry in Job, Isaiah, Hosea, Joel, and Amos. Of all the OT writings, only Leviticus, Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Haggai, and Malachi do not seem to contain lines of poetry. The three divisions of the Hebrew CANON contain poetry in progressively increasing amounts.

I. Early studies in Hebrew poetry. Of those books that comprised the Writings or HAGIOGRAPHIA (the third division of the Heb. canon), the books of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job were regarded by the Jews as being specifically poetical in nature, and were described by a mnemonic title, “The Book of Truth” (the consonants of the Heb. word for “truth,” ’emet H622, correspond to the initial letters of the names of those books). Christian scholars also recognized readily the poetic cast of these three compositions, but apart from such notable instances of Hebrew poetry as the Song of Moses and the Israelites (Exod. 15:1-18), the Song of Moses to Israel (Deut. 32:1-43), and the Song of Deborah and Barak (Jdg. 5:2-31), they tended to assume that the bulk of the OT narratives were uniformly written in prose.

This attitude was understandable enough in light of the fundamental differences that exist between what people in the ANE understood as poetry and what is generally implied in the Western world by that term. Occidental poetry has been influenced to a large extent by the structural forms of the classical Greek and Latin writings, where the units of speech were structured in terms of carefully accentuated lines in which rhyme was often involved. By contrast, the poetry of the ANE, and particularly that of the Hebrews, was formulated along different lines in which rhyme as such was unknown, and the structural units consisted of ideas or concepts that were set out according to a balanced arrangement of component clauses. However, the format of the Hebrew itself seldom gave any indication of a poetic structure, although some MSS of the MT arrange the text of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job in terms of poetic units. Documents discovered at Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) have indicated that certain of the Psalms and the Song of Moses were copied in something approaching a stichometric format, but this seems to have been the exception rather than the rule in scribal practice.

Of course, from the fact that the books of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job possessed a more intricate system of punctuation in the Masoretic tradition, it is possible to argue for the existence of some awareness of poetic form among the Hebrew scribes. Nevertheless it is still true that poetic sections in the Torah and the Prophets were apparently not recognized as such by the Masoretes; or if they were, they were ignored. Equally unfortunate is the fact that, despite the wealth of classical Greek and Latin tradition in this regard, those who translated the Hebrew into the Greek and Old Latin versions were seemingly unaware of the possibility that the material with which they were working might have been cast in poetic form, an attitude that was also reflected in the Aramaic and Syriac versions of the OT books.

English translations also followed this general tradition, and even the American Standard Version of 1881 printed only the poetic books in a recognizable stichometric form. The Revised Standard Version of 1952 was the first English translation to cast all the poetic passages in the OT in a correspondingly distinctive form, which had the result of showing students of the English Bible precisely how much poetry there is in the OT Scriptures. Probably the earliest attempts to distinguish between poetry and prose structures were found in JOSEPHUS, who related that MOSES had composed a song in hexameter verse in Exod. 15, and in the same meter in Deut. 32 (Jos. Ant. 2.16.4; 4.8.44). Of DAVID he wrote that he composed songs and hymns to God in various meters, “some he made in trimeters and others in pentameters” (7.12.3). PHILO JUDAEUS agreed with this general opinion, and held that Moses had learned the “lore of meter, rhythm, and harmony” from the Egyptians (Vita Mosis 1.5). The recognition of poetry in portions of the OT other than the Hagiographa was a distinct advance, but unfortunately it was spoiled by the application of classical analogies to poetic forms that were actually different from those of the Aegean writers. EUSEBIUS, JEROME, and ORIGEN were influenced by the remarks of Josephus, though Origen is supposed to have distinguished between Greek and Hebrew methods of writing pentameter and hexameter poetry.

Some medieval commentators such as Ibn Ezra and Kimchi were aware that the thoughts were frequently reproduced in parallel form in Hebrew poetry, but in general the phenomenon was either ignored or misinterpreted by Jewish and Christian exegetes. Attempts made to study Hebrew poetry dealt with the syllabic forms in terms of Greek and Latin structures, an approach that was repudiated as late as 1753 by Bishop Lowth in his Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews. In this work, he stressed the existence of parallelism, holding that Hebrew poetry consisted of measured lines and that the verses contained two or more elements in parallel form. Lowth distinguished between various kinds of parallelism with considerable success, and his recognition of the presence of poetry throughout the Hebrew Bible laid the foundation for subsequent studies.

His successors in the field began to apply the metric principles of different varieties of Semitic poetry to Hebrew verse, but this approach involved syllabics rather than stresses. Some investigators made the accent the basis for determining the nature of poetic sections, and although this gained the approval of English-speaking scholars, it was marred in Europe by an indulgence in textual emendation. The arrangement of Hebrew poetry in terms of strophes was pointed out by F. B. Köster, who attempted to establish the existence of several different types. Although C. A. Briggs collated the findings in relation to the studies in parallelism that had emerged from studies subsequent to those of Lowth, the next real advance came with the work of G. B. Gray (The Forms of Hebrew Poetry [1915]), who resolved all poetic parallelisms into complete and incomplete forms, the latter being amenable to certain variations.

II. Parallelism. The fact that this phenomenon is so fundamentally a part of Hebrew poetic forms will be sufficient to show the importance that the Semites attached to the balance of thought as distinct from mechanical concepts of meter based on sound or phonic rhythm. Whereas Hebrew poetry may, and frequently does, contain a variety of rhetorical devices that aid in the promulgation of the particular aspect of thought, these elements must now be regarded as being consistently subordinated in the minds of the writers to the expression of the thought-forms in terms of literary parallelism. This balancing of thought against thought, and word against word, was adopted from the literary culture of the ANE, but was developed by the Hebrews with great skill to the point where it surpassed similar attempts in the literature of pagan nations.

As Bishop Lowth recognized, the essential formal characteristic of Hebrew poetry is what he described as the parallelismus membrorum, or the counterbalancing in a verse of components of thought that manifested an internal relationship to one another. Lowth distinguished between three kinds of parallelism as follows: (1) Synonymous, in which the second part of a poetic verse recapitulated the thought of the first part (Isa. 1:3). (2) Antithetic, where the two principal parts of a verse exhibited the idea of contrast (e.g., Prov. 1:29); sometimes the same concept would be expressed first in a positive form and then in a negative form (Ps. 90:6). (3) Synthetic, in which the sense was developed in a continuous manner to reach its logical conclusion (Ps. 1:1–2).

Later scholars came to realize that the last of these categories was hardly parallelism in the strictest sense. They also employed the term stichos (Gk. stichos, “row” or “line”) to describe individual lines of poetry. Two or three of these lines normally comprise the complete parallel form, which is marked, of course, by a proper degree of grammatical and syntactical unity. If a line is known as a stichos or stich, the half-line could be designated as a hemistich, although the latter term is occasionally used of the complete line also. The larger unit of two or three lines is described as a distich or a tristich respectively if whole lines are involved, or as a stich when the half-line components are regarded as hemistichs. Sometimes the two (or three) components of a Hebrew phrase are known as bicola (or tricola), but the term colon can be confused all too readily with the English punctuation mark of that name. The normal Hebrew poem thus consists of a series of terms that are grouped in pairs and are marked off from preceding and subsequent terms by means of major pauses, or caesuras. The general arrangement can be illustrated from Ps. 23:4–5 (KJV):

Thy rod and thy staff, / they comfort me.//
Thou preparest a table before me;/
in the presence of my enemies;// Thou anointest my head with oil,/
my cup overflows.//

In the above quotation, the caesura is represented by a double diagonal line, whereas the single diagonal signifies a minor pause within the pairs, represented in the citation by an antecedent comma. Quite frequently, the verse form of the English versions follows that of the MT, but this is by no means uniform.

In the light of the foregoing observations, it is possible to illustrate the various kinds of parallelism as suggested by Lowth and others. The first variety, synonymous parallelism, reproduces the same thought in successive stichoi, and is the least complex form of parallelism in Hebrew poetry. In Ps. 83:14, the first portion of the verse speaks of a fire burning the forest, a theme that is repeated quite simply in the second part in the figure of a flame setting the mountains on fire. One expression thus merely reinforces the thought of the other by the process of repetition in almost identical words and without the addition of any supplementary material. Recognition of this structural form occasionally clarifies obscure passages that could easily be misinterpreted, as with the familiar parallelism of Zech. 9:9:

Rejoice greatly, O Daughter of Zion!
Shout, Daughter of Jerusalem!
See, your king comes to you;
righteous and having salvation,
gentle and riding on a donkey, on a colt, the foal of a donkey.

According to some, Matthew assumed that two animals were involved, the donkey and her foal (Matt. 21:5), whereas the other three evangelists rightly discerned the synonymous parallelism involved in the citation, and consequently mentioned just one animal (however, see D. A. Carson in EBC, 8:438). Although in many synonymous parallelisms each term in the first stichos is matched by a corresponding term in the second, there are numerous instances where the parallels are not strictly complete, due to variations of vocabulary or rhetorical style. Moreover, it needs to be pointed out that typically the second member of the parallelism does not merely repeat the idea of the first but adds to it in some way (cf. T. Longman III in FCI, 171–72).

The second kind of parallelism described by Lowth as antithetic involves the two (or three) portions or members of the verse in some form of contrast. Quite often this is of a rather radical nature, as in Ps. 1:6: “For the LORD watches over the way of the righteous, / But the way of the wicked will perish.” The WISDOM literature is particularly rich in such contrasts, since it frequently offered individuals a choice of two quite different courses of action: “Hatred stirs up dissension, / but love covers all wrongs” (Prov. 10:12). As with synonymous parallelism, the antithetic form can be complete or incomplete, and in addition it can express the same concept in alternate positive and negative forms.

The third variety identified by Lowth, namely synthetic parallelism, is marked by balanced stichoi in which the thought of the first is developed by the second. Although this is not actually true parallelism, the two stichoi are in fact balanced off and marked by breaks in the continuity of the thought with preceding and subsequent material. Thus the quotation from Ps. 2:3 (NRSV), “Let us burst their bonds asunder, / and cast their cords from us,” exhibits a complementary balance of thought that is distinctively different from the remainder of the psalm. Even though there may not be a demonstrable parallelism of thought between the stichoi, the balance of form is seen in the pattern of recurrent major and minor stops in the poetry, and this factor has led certain scholars to describe this kind of parallelism as formal or numerical. Following the time of Lowth, further studies in Hebrew poetry described three subsidiary types of parallelism. They cannot be regarded as fundamental patterns, and seem to consist largely of variations or combinations of the three basic forms of parallelism discussed above.

Emblematic parallelism describes a situation where one stichos employed a literal or factual statement whereas the other stichos suggested a simile or a metaphor: “As the deer pants for streams of water, / so my soul pants for you, O God” (Ps. 42:1).

Climactic, or stairlike, parallelism is marked by the repetition and development of a concept in successive stichoi, perhaps involving three or more such members. It combines the principles of synonymous and synthetic parallelism to give the impression of extending the thought by recapitulation, where each stichos begins at the same place, but extends somewhat beyond its immediate precursor. An excellent example of this particular poetic pattern is Ps. 29:1–2: “Ascribe to the LORD, O mighty ones, / ascribe to the LORD glory and strength. / Ascribe to the LORD the glory due his name; / worship the LORD in the splendor of his holiness.”

The final subsidiary form, known as introverted or chiastic parallelism, involves four stichoi arranged in such a manner that the first corresponds to the fourth and the second to the third in an a:b::b:a pattern. Cf. Ps. 30:8–10:

- (a) To you, O LORD, I called; to the LORD I cried for mercy:
- (b) What gain is there in my destruction,
in my going down into the pit?
- (b) Will the dust praise you?
Will it proclaim your faithfulness?
- (a) Hear, O LORD, and be merciful to me;
O LORD, be my help.

The researches of Gray resulted in the description of two broad classes of parallelism, the first of which was complete, in which every word in one stichos was balanced by an appropriate word in the other stichos, as in Isa. 1:3, where two synonymous parallelisms actually combine to form a total antithetic parallelism:

The ox knows his master, the donkey his owner's manger,
but Israel does not know,
my people do not understand,

The other type of parallelism was described as incomplete, a designation that itself covered two subsidiary forms. One of these exhibited a pattern in which a part of the second stichos was parallel to the first: “But I will sing of your strength, / in the morning I will sing of your love” (Ps. 59:16). The other variety comprised a form in which a term was inserted in the second stichos that had no strict counterpart in the first stichos (Ps. 75:6):

No one from the east or the west or from the desert can exalt a man.
But it is God who judges:
He brings one down, he exalts another.

Hebrew poetry frequently supplemented the parallelism between stichoi by means of a corresponding parallelism between distichs, resulting in what is sometimes described by scholars as external parallelism. An external synonymous parallel structure is found in Isa. 1:10:

Hear the word of the LORD,
you rulers of Sodom;
listen to the law of our God,
you people of Gomorrah!

An even more sophisticated parallelism results from an external inversion (Isa. 6:10) with reference to certain bodily organs, italicized in the following passage so that the literary pattern can be recognized with ease:

Make the heart of this people calloused;
make their ears dull and close their eyes.
Otherwise they might see with their eyes, hear with their ears, understand with their hearts, and turn and be healed.

It will be apparent from the foregoing that, in the hands of a competent poet, the possibilities of variation in Hebrew parallelism are virtually limitless. The concept of balance inherent in the relationship of the stichoi imposed a necessary degree of control over the composer and prevented diffuseness of style or thought while allowing sufficient freedom for an aesthetically gratifying arrangement of the constituent members. The particular degree of sophistication that marked the literary form of the finished product would naturally vary with the skill of the individual composer, but even the least proficient of these invariably produced a poem that by its elasticity and fluency outclassed the stereotyped repetitions so typical of ANE poetry in general.

III. Meter. Having emphasized the fundamental importance of parallelism in Hebrew poetry, some attention can now be given to the possibility of metrical division. Since there is no tradition of meter in the poetic compositions of the Hebrews, any conclusions that are arrived at will necessarily be by analogy from other Semitic poetry as well as by inference from the kind of balance that the stichoi themselves exhibit. A great deal of caution needs to be exercised in this matter, however, since a mechanical regularity of syllabic or accentual structure does not seem to have been a part of Hebrew poetry at any time. A warning must also be given about the use of analogy in relationship to alien poetic meters, particularly those of the classical composers, since the fundamental principle at issue in Hebrew poetry is the balance of thought. In this connection, it might be observed that although Josephus applied the concepts of classical European poetry to the writings of an ANE people, he did so to demonstrate to his Gentile readers the fact that Hebrew poetry did conform to specific structural patterns.

Having said this, it should also be remarked that the analogy between classical hexameters, pentameters, and the rhythms of the Hebrew poems should not be pressed too closely. From the evidence afforded by ANE poetic compositions generally, it is apparent that there was a freedom and a fluidity about what is described in Western thought as meter. However, it may well be that at least some of the Psalms were written with something approaching meter in mind, since certain of them were apparently meant to be sung at some stage in their history, no doubt to the accompaniment of musical instruments. Again, it maybe that the dominant concern of the composer was for the beat or rhythm of the psalm rather than for the sort of metrical regularity characteristic of Greek and Latin poems. Certainly, in a heavily accented language such as Hebrew, the concept of stress was of great significance.

In 1866, J. Ley suggested that the character of a specific verse could be determined only by reference to the number of accented or stressed syllables that the verse contained. An accentual pattern could be formulated on the assumption that each major word of a stichos or distich should be assigned a numerical unit consisting of one stress. Ley observed that many of the verses of Hebrew poems consist of a three-stress stichos that was separated from a parallel two-stress stichos by means of a pause or caesura. He assigned the numerical value of 3:2 to this rhythmic pattern, and regarded it as an elegiac pentameter. Because this form occurred predominantly in Lamentations, it was given the name of qinah or “dirge meter” by K. Budde (Heb. qînâ H7806, “lament, dirge”). In one sense this designation was rather unfortunate, since subsequent studies showed that, whereas the qinah stresses were associated with emotional outpouring, that emotion was by no means always one of grief, as shown by its occurrence in some compositions where the theme was one of praise and gladness (Ps. 65). Concerning the unequal stresses, the 3:2 pattern is by far the most widespread in the OT. It is varied by means of 2:2 stresses, and there seem to be occasions when a 2:3 pattern is evident also.

It would appear proper to point out at this juncture that a certain degree of subjectivity attaches to the matter of assigning stresses to particular words in Hebrew poetry, and this in itself should induce caution in the application of this particular approach. Part of the problem arises from the fact that the accentual system that was devised by the Masoretes assigned one stress to each word, no matter what its length, apart from words joined together by means of the Hebrew hyphen (maqquph), in which event only the last syllable of the combination was accented. However, it is not known for certain whether or not each word in Hebrew poetry actually received one stress. It may well have been that under some circumstances, two or perhaps three separate short words were treated as though they only merited one stress. Furthermore, whereas older scholars generally denied the possibility of a lengthy word receiving more than one stress, it still has to be proven that this was the invariable practice of the Hebrew poets.

Since there appears to have been an unregulated number of unstressed syllables that were permitted to occur between two stressed syllables, it seems evident that the ancient Hebrews were governed by principles that allowed them much flexibility in the matter of rhythm. The studies that led to the recognition of stress patterns in Hebrew poetry were based on the theory that it was permissible to allow one stress, or ictus, to each of the major words in a stichos, distich, or tristich. It seems legitimate to establish this procedure as a general principle on the analogy of other ANE compositions, particularly when the laments of the Hebrews are compared with the penitential psalms of the Babylonians, or when Hebrew poetry is compared with its Ugaritic counterparts. Once again, however, these compositions give evidence of the fluid nature of anything approaching a metrical scheme. The poetry of ancient Babylonia was characterized by a 2:2 stress pattern, although some lines contain an extra ictus to make a 3:2 or 2:3 form. Other lines seem to have the kind of stress pattern that can best be scanned as 2:2:2, or occasionally as 2:2:3. On the basis of the normal stresses in ancient Babylonian poetry, the comparative simplicity of form exhibited in Hebrew speech would suggest that the primary type of poetic line was of a 2:2 order. Although it is true that this stress arrangement is commonly found in Hebrew poems, a 3:2 form occurs even more frequently.

By far the most widely used stress scheme in OT poetry, however, is the 3:3 pattern, which is found in the poetic portions of Job, Proverbs, in the bulk of the Psalms, and in a great many prophetic oracles. It needs to be observed that however much one particular stress pattern may have been favored by an author, it was never used to the exclusion of others. The poetic literature from Ras Shamra, written in a dialect closely related to biblical Hebrew, frequently employed a 3:3 pattern as a rhythmic basis, but at the same time incorporated a great many variations. These compositions, which came from the Amarna Age and thus anteceded the bulk of Hebrew poetry, exhibit a degree of constructional freedom that should warn against expecting to find a recognizable degree of metrical regularity in Hebrew poetry. They positively preclude the emendation of the Hebrew text to make it conform to some particular metrical scheme, a practice that was popular among German scholars of an earlier generation.

In light of the available evidence, it seems clear that Hebrew poetry never possessed a mechanical regularity of a syllabic or accentual nature, and that if one is to speak of meter at all, the concept should be entertained only in terms of the rhythmical counterpart of the thought-parallelisms. There is no intrinsic evidence in the OT for meter in Hebrew poetry, a fact that was ultimately conceded by the eminent German Hebraist Bernhard Duhm. Instead of employing a term such as meter, it is probably better to think of rhythmical balance based on elements of thought rather than upon strict syllabic quantities. Obviously, this approach involves considerably more subtlety than the mechanical patterns of Greek and Latin poetry, since in Hebrew poetic compositions, regularity of stress is of less significance than the regularity of balanced concepts of thought.

The situation can be summarized by presenting the three basic forms of Hebrew poetry as follows: (1) Qinah, the so-called “dirge-meter”—3:2 or sometimes 2:3, varied by the inclusion of 2:2 stresses. (2) Hexameter—3:3 or 2:2:2. (3) Heptameter—4:3 or 2:2:3. The use of the words hexameter and heptameter in this connection is related primarily to the sum of the stresses, and should not be interpreted in terms of Greek or Latin poetic usage.

IV. Strophe. During the last century and a half, much scholarly discussion has centered upon the question of whether it was possible to group the lines of Hebrew poetry to form stanzas or strophes. The researches of Köster in 1837 built on the foundation established by Lowth and laid great emphasis upon the strophic arrangement of Hebrew poetry. Successive scholars of the critical school held to the theory that the Psalms in particular had been arranged according to a fairly consistent strophic pattern. In those instances where this did not appear particularly evident in the Psalter, it was maintained that the original pattern had been partially obscured as the result of later liturgical glosses, and therefore needed textual emendation to make the basic form evident.

Subsequent studies took a different course by showing that the grouping of distichs and tristichs into larger poetic units cannot be demonstrated conclusively in the poetry of the OT. That such an arrangement was possible, however, is clear from the presence of acrostic poems, the most obvious of which is Ps. 119. In this arrangement, which is clearly rather contrived at best, the first word of the initial stanza commenced with the first consonant of the Hebrew alphabet, the first word of the second strophe with the second letter, and so on. Precisely where the idea of the acrostic arrangement originated is uncertain, but it had the undoubted value of imposing a degree of control over the vocabulary and the length of the composition, even though the final form was structurally rather artificial in nature. Psalm 119 consists of eight-distich stanzas or strophes, whereas chs. 1, 2, and 4 of Lamentations, which is also written in acrostic form, are composed of two-distich strophes (ch. 3 varies the pattern some by being made up of three-distich strophes). In Lam. 2, the alphabetic order is not followed scrupulously, since the letter pe comes before ayin instead of after it in the usual alphabetical manner. Interestingly enough, although ch. 5 contains twenty-two verses, one for each consonant of the Hebrew alphabet, there are no indications of an acrostic arrangement. Whatever the reasons for the use of an acrostic in the above compositions, it still remains true that the strophic pattern was never allowed to interfere with the sequence of the thought, a matter that was always of paramount importance. Under these circumstances it would appear that the stanza was never basic to the structure of Hebrew poetry in the sense in which it is for most modern poetical compositions.

Perhaps some sort of strophic arrangement may be indicated by the presence of a refrain, or chorus, that appears at a specific point in a psalm. Thus Ps. 46:7 and 11 have the following refrain: "The LORD Almighty is with us, / the God of Jacob is our refuge." A rather more sophisticated example of this literary device can be seen in Ps. 107, where the repeated refrain consists of two parts as follows: (a) "Then they cried to the LORD in their trouble, / and he delivered them from their distress"; (b) "Let them give thanks to the LORD for his unfailing love / and his wonderful deeds for men" (e.g., vv. 6, 8). Between these two portions of the refrain were inserted descriptions of deliverance from various perils by divine power, but the theme was handled in such a way that the poem contained strophes of quite unequal length. A more balanced arrangement was contained in Pss. 42–43, which seems to have formed a single poem and in which the refrain appears on three occasions (42:5, 11; 43:5):

Why are you downcast, O my soul?,
Why so disturbed within me?
Put your hope in God,
for I will yet praise him,
my Savior and my God.

As well as being indicated by the presence of a recurring refrain, the end of a stanza or strophe may possibly be marked by the inclusion of the enigmatic expression selâ H6138. The word itself comes from a Hebrew root meaning "to cast up, raise, build a road," and occurs seventy-one times in thirty-nine Psalms as well as in Hab. 3:3, 9, 13. In normal circumstances, selah stands outside the balanced arrangement of the thought-form, which is indicated in most English versions either by the word being enclosed in brackets or written in italics. However, some scholars have raised doubts that the term can be considered as a valid indication of strophic arrangement, if only because the meaning of the word is still uncertain. Since it occurs in association with what have been supposed to be musical titles in some of the Psalms, some commentators think that it was a direction to the singers of the particular psalm, calling for a crescendo of voices at that particular juncture.

It may be that the translators of the SEPTUAGINT had some sort of liturgical usage in mind when they rendered the term by Greek diapsalma, “interlude,” since an accompaniment of musical (stringed) instruments was evidently involved. Thus the Hebrew term could either indicate the “lifting up” of voices in music or in the recitation of the psalm, or the cessation of the voices and the crescendo of musical instruments. Of these two alternatives the latter seems more acceptable, for selah occurred generally at the end of some phase of thought in the poetry, where in recitation the voice would normally pause in any event.

It has also been suggested that selah directed the conductor of the temple musicians and singers to interrupt the flow of the chanting by means of a clash of cymbals or tambourines. Thus the presence of selah with higgaion (Ps. 9:16, from hāgā H2047, “to moan, mutter”) would seem to point to the thought of the psalm terminating in a soft whispering of stringed instruments followed at the direction of the conductor by a clash of cymbals to mark the end of the recitation.

Despite the foregoing suggestions, however, there must still remain considerable doubt whether the word selah was ever related to strophic arrangement in Hebrew poetry. The very fact that the term is distributed in the Psalter and Habakkuk would indicate that it can hardly be regarded as a genuine device for strophic division in more than a very few cases. If this term is not to be regarded as an indication of strophic arrangement, however, the only other hint of such a structure apart from the presence of a refrain or an acrostic form is found in the symmetrical ordering of the thought itself.

This feature may be illustrated by reference to Isaiah’s Song of the Vineyard (Isa. 5:1–8), which can be divided quite naturally into four subsections consisting of two verses each, as follows: vv. 1–2, the care of the vineyard; vv. 3–4, a call for judgment between the owner and his vineyard; vv. 5–6, the destruction of the vineyard heralded; vv. 7–8, the application in parabolic form to Israel. Each subsection consists of four distichs except for the third one, which is irregular and has one tristich added to the four distichs. Although the thought of the poem can be divided in this way, there is some doubt whether a short composition of this kind would ever have been broken down into such small components, particularly since the thought-pattern of the first six verses is given unity of form and meaning by the concluding two verses. This would suggest that the composition should be considered as an integrated structure with the major pause, normally indicated by the end of a stanza, marking the completion of the poem as a unit.

By way of concluding the discussion of the possibility of strophic formulation in Hebrew poetry, mention ought to be made of a technical device to which scholars have given the name of anacrusis. This normally consists of a single word, such as an interrogative particle or an exclamation, that stands outside the stress-pattern of the verse in which it occurs. For example, the interrogative “why” can sometimes be removed from the text without prejudice to the rhythm of the verse, which in fact conforms to the 3:3 pattern so commonly found in Hebrew poetry (Jer. 12:1). The exclamation “how” (Lam. 1:1) can be isolated from the remainder of the verse without disrupting the stresses, which fall into the 3:2; 2:2; 2:2 pattern. The presence of such words tends to affect the whole of the passage that follows them, and not infrequently the poetic material in these sections is of a particularly expressive nature.

An earlier generation of scholars was accustomed to resort to textual emendation as a commonplace procedure to restore what was thought to have been the original strophic arrangement of certain Hebrew poems in the belief that the structure had been disrupted and obscured by such things as marginal glosses, lacunae, or displacements of the text. Such reconstructions were sometimes made on the basis of readings reflected by the LXX, but there were many other instances where they were indulged in simply as the result of subjective speculation. Since the discovery of the Ras Shamra tablets, it has now become clear that only the most cautious of textual emendations can be countenanced, since the composers of Ugaritic poetry enjoyed a liberty of literary form and a freedom from mechanical meter that positively precludes the kind of rigid patternism foisted upon the Hebrew text by some 19th-cent. scholars.

V. Ugarit and Hebrew poetry. New light has been shed since 1928 on the nature of OT poetry as the result of archaeological discoveries at Ras Shamra (UGARIT). At this site, some literary texts originating in the early 14th cent. B.C., which were written in a previously unknown language and inscribed in an unfamiliar CUNEIFORM script, were deciphered and found to have been composed in a NW Semitic dialect closely related to biblical Hebrew (see HEBREW LANGUAGE). The tablets included both prose and poetic material, the latter being of great importance for the textual study of the Psalms. Among other things, the Ugaritic poetic compositions exhibited parallelism, as can be seen from the following example: “Lo, your enemies, O Baal, / Lo, your enemies you will smite. / Lo, you will vanquish your foes.”

These sentiments are remarkably similar to the thought of Ps. 92:9, and serve to illustrate the close degree of affinity that can often be seen when Ugaritic and Hebrew poetic compositions are compared. There seems to have been a common fund of linguistic expressions and literary idioms from which the two peoples drew. Thus BAAL was described as the “rider of the clouds” (cf. Pss. 68:4; 104:3) who was enthroned in the heavens (cf. Pss. 2:4; 103:19) and hurled down lightnings and thunderbolts (cf. Pss. 18:13; 77:18; 144:6). Canaanite poetry, as observed above, was based on a 3:3 stress pattern, but admitted of a great many variations. There is nothing that would indicate metrical exactitude in Ugaritic poetry, and in view of this it would hardly seem likely that the Hebrews placed any significant emphasis upon meter as such.

The Ugaritic material, however, has done an enormous amount of good in clarifying supposed textual anomalies in books such as the Hebrew Psalter. Alleged corruptions that were frequently emended by earlier scholars have now been seen to constitute genuine Canaanite grammatical and literary forms whose particular significance had been forgotten with the disappearance of Ugaritic culture. This realization has consequently prompted a much more cautious approach to the textual study of the Psalter.

VI. Varieties of Hebrew poetry. It is very difficult to maintain a formal distinction between the religious and the secular in the poetic compositions of Israel, since each tended to interpenetrate the other. The Hebrews employed their songs as expressions of or accompaniments to social activity in a manner by no means unfamiliar to other societies in a different age. One such poetic fragment is the so-called Song of the Well (Num. 21:17–18): “Spring up, O well! Sing about it, / about the well that the princes dug, / that the nobles of the people sank—/ the nobles with scepters and staffs.”

This utterance celebrated the way in which the well near a site called BEER was opened under the direction of the leaders of Israel. The use of the imperative form at the beginning of the poem would seem to express the concerns of those involved in digging the well that an abundant supply of water should reward their efforts. No doubt the same sentiments continued to be expressed by those who used the water of that same well in subsequent times. On such a basis there can be no thought of magic or incantation rituals associated with the task of excavation, as some have imagined.

The same would hold true for other daily activities where indulgence in song helped to make the time pass more quickly and lighten the burdens of work. Such choruses or songs (Jdg. 9:27; Isa. 16:10) were used where the harvesting of grapes was undertaken (Jer. 25:30; 48:33), and where shouts of joy accompanied the trampling of grapes in the winepresses. Quite probably, the rhythmic stresses of the songs employed on such occasions matched the pace of the work being undertaken. However, because of the scanty evidence for “work songs” as such, it is far from easy to identify them as a genuine literary category.

Some poetic fragments appear to have come from taunt or mocking songs that were credited to the activities of the “ballad singers.” One particular poem (Num. 21:27–30) heaped scorn on the Moabites and taunted them in connection with the destruction of their principal cities. A fragmentary quotation from the “song of the harlot” (Isa. 23:16) was applied prophetically to the city of Tyre: “Take a harp, / walk through the city, / O prostitute forgotten; / play the harp well, / sing many a song, / so that you will be remembered.” It should be noted that the “song” was not so much an actual poem recited to musical accompaniment by harlots, as in later Rome, but rather a derisive ditty mocking the efforts of an aged prostitute to attract the attention of potential clients.

There are references to drinking songs (Amos 6:4–6; Isa. 5:11–13) where the prophets were perhaps thinking of the musical entertainments that formed part of contemporary banquets. It may be that the citation, “‘Let us eat and drink,’ you say, / ‘for tomorrow we die!’” (Isa. 22:13), expressed the general tenor of the lyrics sung on such occasions. A more optimistic form of the song declares (56:12), “‘Come,’ each one cries, ‘let me get wine! / Let us drink our fill of beer! / And tomorrow will be like today, / or even far better.’” Aside from these two possible instances, however, no other portions of actual drinking songs have been preserved in the OT.

If it is legitimate to regard the lyrics of SONG OF SOLOMON as a collection of Israelite love poetry, then this genre would constitute yet another attest-able class of Hebrew verse. From the account of the wedding of SAMSON (Jdg. 14:10–18), it would appear that such festivities were animated affairs at that time, during which singing and dancing were very much in evidence. The poems contained in Canticles include some that described the physical beauties of the betrothed male and female, and it may be that these were recited or chanted during the wedding festivities somewhat in the manner of the more modern Arabic wasfs. Perhaps the author refers to the spectacular wedding procession of King SOLOMON, though other sections of the book need only be regarded as celebrating the depth and beauty of true human love in the absence of a specific wedding situation (Cant. 3:6–11). If it is granted, as suggested by some scholars, that Canticles as a whole has only a rather coincidental connection with marriage celebrations, it is difficult to isolate any other wedding poetry as such from the OT narratives.

Laments were a familiar part of Israelite funerary customs, the MOURNING songs being sung either by the relatives and others connected with the dead person (2 Sam. 1:17; 3:33) or by professional male and female mourners (Jer. 9:16; cf. Amos 5:16–17). The sarcophagus of Ahiiram from Byblos (GEBAL), dated about 1200 B.C., showed realistic pictures of professional female mourners stripped to the waist, wailing, beating their breasts, and tearing their hair. The most expressive funerary dirge was that composed by DAVID to commemorate the death of SAUL and JONATHAN (2 Sam. 1:19–27). It formed part of the Book of JASHAR (v. 18), which was apparently a national epic set down in written form during the early monarchy. The lament was used as a training poem on the orders of David whenever the Judeans were being instructed in the arts of bowmanship.

This situation was by no means unusual in the Mycenaean Heroic Age (15th to 10th centuries B.C.), in which music, poetry, and dancing had a regular place in all programs of military training.

The dirge lamented the slaying of the “glory” of Israel, lauded the virtues of the deceased, and exhorted the nation to mourn the dead heroes. The exquisite beauty and delicacy of the lament is eloquent testimony to the artistic levels that Hebrew

Illustration of mourners gathered at the tomb of Lazarus. Professional mourners often gave voice to the family's grief using funeral dirges.

poetry had attained in the days of David, and its independence of form furnishes additional assurance of authorship by the “sweet singer of Israel.”

The concept of the funeral dirge was used with great effect by the preexilic prophets to convey the seriousness of the national situation to an indifferent and unheeding Israel. Perhaps the most notable literary accomplishment along these general lines is to be found in Lam. 1–2 and 4, where this style was used in allegorical fashion of Jerusalem. Chapter 5 is a psalm of lamentation for the whole nation, whereas ch. 3 contains mixed elements of lamentation.

Not unnaturally, a great deal of the ancient lyric poetry found in the OT had to do with wars and victory in battle. One form of commemoration of the mighty act of divine salvation at the time of the exodus was the Song of MIRIAM (Exod. 15:20–21), which was chanted to the accompaniment of tambourines and dancers: “Sing to the LORD, / for he is highly exalted. / The horse and its rider / he has hurled into the sea.” In so far as this theme was echoed by the people, it comprised the genuine response in thanksgiving of those who had participated in a miracle and had witnessed the destruction of their enemies. A genuine psalm of victory is seen in the Song of DEBORAH (Jdg. 5:2–31), which constitutes the poetic parallel of the prose version of victory contained in the preceding chapter. Whereas it is a psalm of thanksgiving for victory, it also contains such diverse elements as confession, praise, taunting, curses, and thanksgiving.

What has been described by some scholars as the Song of the Ark (Num. 10:35–36) appears to have consisted of two shouts or rallying cries with which the ARK OF THE COVENANT was greeted by MOSES on its departure and return from battle: “Rise up, O LORD! / May your enemies be scattered; / may your foes flee before you,” and “Return, O LORD, / to the countless thousands of Israel.” These pronouncements were doubtless intended to strengthen the morale of the Israelite warriors and the nation as a whole by assuring them that the power of God was accompanying them and acting through them to secure victory over their enemies. When military success had been achieved, it was the common practice for the victors to boast of their valor, as in the ancient fragment known as the Song of Lamech (Gen. 4:23–24): “Adah and Zillah, listen to me; / wives of Lamech, hear my words. / I have killed a man for wounding me, / a young man for injuring me. / If Cain is avenged seven times, / then Lamech seventy-seven times.”

The social conditions portrayed in this fragment are long antecedent to the Mosaic age, since they reflect the personal vendettas of the nomad to whom the humanitarian prescriptions of the Mosaic law were entirely unknown. In the Heroic Age the victor in battle was frequently greeted on his return with songs and dances, as were JEPHTHAH (Jdg. 11:34) and DAVID (1 Sam. 18:6–7). In the case of the latter the narrative has preserved the chorus of the victory chant, “Saul has slain his thousands, / and David his tens of thousands”—a tribute that did not exactly strike an endearing chord in the mind of King SAUL.

Forming a poetic category of their own are the benedictions pronounced by the patriarchs, and their counterpart in the “last words of David” (2 Sam. 23:1–7). As is now well known from archaeological discoveries at MARI and NUZI, a benediction of this kind constituted in effect a last will and testament whose stipulations and dispositions were binding upon all those concerned. Prominent in the patriarchal benedictions was a prophetic element that was frequently coupled with a penetrating character analysis of the recipients of blessing to indicate to them what prosperity or adversity they could expect in the coming days. By contrast, the “last words of David” comprise nothing more than a short personal testimony to the power of God in his life and the essential transience of those who are motivated by lesser forces.

Into yet another category came the utterances of BALAAM, the talented Mesopotamian seer whom BALAK of MOAB had hired to curse his enemies, the Israelites. Magical texts recovered from Mari and elsewhere indicate that Balaam came within the professional classification of a master-diviner, and as such could command a high fee for his services. His pronouncements fell into a regular poetic form, one of which (Num. 24:3–9) was described by the prophetic term “oracle.” Because of the character of his encounter with God, the utterances of Balaam were in the nature of benedictions, and as such have a great deal in common with the patriarchal blessings.

Whereas the psalter may properly be regarded as an anthology of Hebrew poetry, there are other lesser collections of lyrics in the OT. Lamentations and Canticles comprise complete books of poems of specific kinds, but there are still smaller poetic collections that are important, having been associated with particular historic occasions. One of these anthologies has survived in fragmentary form in early OT literature under the designation of “the Book of the Wars of the LORD” (Num. 21:14–15). The surviving portion comprises a geographical note that may have referred to battles in Transjordan: “Waheb in Suphah and the ravines, / the Arnon and the slopes of the ravines / that lead to the site of Ar / and lie along the border of Moab.” This fragment gives no firm indication concerning the nature or content of the book, but from the title it may be assumed that it dealt in poetic form with the battles of the early conquest period before the main invasion of Canaan. See WARS OF THE LORD, BOOK OF THE.

The Book of Jashar, mentioned above, may have been a later counterpart of the Book of the Wars of the Lord, since it included the training poem for bowmanship originally composed by David as a lament for the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. 1:18–27). However, it is unwise to speculate about the relative dates of the two anthologies, since neither collection of poems is now extant. The Book of Jashar also included the celebrated charge of JOSHUA to the sun and moon: “‘O sun, stand still over Gibeon, / O moon, over the Valley of Aijalon.’ / So the sun stood still, / and the moon stopped, / till the nation avenged itself on its enemies” (Josh. 10:12–13).

No doubt there were a number of collections of poetic material of various kinds that have not survived the centuries. A record of one such collection was preserved by the Chronicler (2 Chr. 35:25), who spoke of an anthology of laments that was supposed to have contained the dirge composed by the prophet JEREMIAH at the time when King JOSIAH died. This collection has also vanished without trace. Scholars have pointed out that in general the poetry of the OT emerges either from continuous communal functions or from situations in which the material was formulated for some special historical purpose. To the former group belong most of the Psalms, particularly where the individual composition was of a devotional nature and had no particular historical associations. The latter category can be illustrated by reference to Lamentations, written as a tragic commemoration of the destruction of the theocracy.

Some of the different kinds of secular Hebrew poetry have already been discussed, including harvest songs, taunts, funeral laments, victory odes, and love lyrics. The more specifically sacred poetry, which was generally restricted to use in divine WORSHIP, fell into certain readily recognizable classes. These include prayers, songs of praise, special petitions for deliverance from sickness or enemies or both, confessions of faith in God as a contrast to the prevailing trends of polytheism, confessions of sin, imprecatory psalms that called down divine punishment on the heathen, intercession for the nation and its rulers, instructional or homiletical psalms, meditations, and psalms in praise of the Torah.

One of the more problematic classes of Hebrew poetry, known as the royal psalms, raises the question of the function of the king in relationship to the particular composition. Some scholars have gone so far as to suppose that certain of the royal psalms were used in connection with the coronation (cf. Pss. 2; 110), the marriage of the king (cf. Ps. 45), preparation for battle (cf. Ps. 20), and the victory celebrations that followed the successful conclusion of a military campaign (cf. Ps. 21). Other scholars have denied that there was ever anything approaching the modern concept of an elaborate religious ceremony at which the ruler was formally crowned, and still others have questioned whether the psalms in which God is mentioned as king should be included in the royal psalms at all.

Certain interpreters have gone to great lengths to adduce from certain of the royal psalms some evidence that would support the theory that there was an annual New Year festival in preexilic Israelite times at which God was greeted as the king who renewed his dominion by re-creating the world and life. In particular, S. Mowinckel (Psal-menstudien, 4 vols. [1921–24]) took the phrase “the LORD reigns,” occurring in certain of the so-called “enthronement psalms” (Pss. 93:1; 97:1; 99:1; cf. 47:8; 96:10), and interpreted it to mean, “the LORD has become king” (Heb. yhwh mālak). For him this constituted a triumphal shout that marked the climax of an enthronement festival liturgy proclaiming the Lordship of the God of Israel for another civil year. There is no evidence, however, that such a festival ever existed at any time in Israelite life; and, in addition, the rendering “the Lord has become king” is an unnatural translation of the Hebrew, the force of which is simply “the Lord is king” or “the Lord rules.” Still other interpreters of the concept of sacral kingship have maintained that the ceremonial acknowledgment of divine rule arose through metaphorical usage during the postexilic period, when kingship had been replaced by the developed theocracy. Although this may possibly have been a secondary usage of some of the royal psalms, it can hardly have been the primary one, since this particular category of poetry appears to have been preexilic in origin and to have represented the king as an individual functioning in a distinctive capacity.

VII. Figures of rhetoric. Part of the subtlety and attraction of Hebrew poetry consists in the way ordinary words are treated to heighten their general effect. To this end, several technical literary devices were employed by the ancient poets, one of the most obvious being paronomasia, or play on words. This is the basis of the pun, long favored among peoples in the Middle E as a refined form of HUMOR, but in the hands of such writers as the prophets the form took on a moral or an eschatological connotation. We read in Isa. 5:7 that the justice (mišpāṭ H5477) for which the Lord looked had been replaced by bloodshed (mišpāḥ H5384), and righteousness (šēdāqā H7407) by a cry (šē'āqā H7591). The basket of summer fruit (qayiš H7811) that Amos saw in a vision reminded him that the end (qēš H7891) of the nation was at hand (Amos 8:2). Clearly this is a very powerful rhetorical device for proclaiming fundamental theological issues in memorable terms.

Another effective marshaling of words is seen in the use of alliteration, which groups related sounds occurring at the beginning of words or phrases. The exhortation to pray for the peace of Jerusalem (Ps. 122:6) is given emphasis by the consonance of syllables in the Hebrew, šā'ālû šēlôm yē'rûšāla'im yišlāyû. A related rhetorical form favored by the prophets was that of assonance, which placed emphasis upon the correspondence of sound in the accented vowels, particularly where pronominal and verbal suffixes were involved. Thus in Isa. 53:4–7, the permanently long vowel û occurs no fewer than fifteen times, strengthening by its very sound the general impression of grief and woe contained in the verses. Hebrew writers generally made use of another device, known as onomatopoeia, in which the sense of a word was suggested by its sound. The gutturals and labials (42:14) convey the sense of a woman groaning and catching her breath during the pangs of childbirth. These literary and rhetorical techniques went far toward replacing rhyme, which does not occur in Hebrew poetry except where the same pronominal or verbal suffix is repeated at the end of two consecutive lines. This phenomenon is rare, and in each instance it must be considered strictly accidental in nature.

VIII. Poetry in the prophets. Prophetic poetry had its roots in the specific historical situations to which the divine message was addressed, and seldom comprised a formulation of devotional poetry for its own sake. The third chapter of Habakkuk may, however, furnish an exception to this general rule. In the matter of form and technique there is no difference between prophetic and other poetry in the OT writings. What made the poetry of the prophets distinctive was the occasion to which it was directed. Thus, the taunt song was given particular force by Isaiah when directed against Babylon (Isa. 47:1–15) or against Assyria (Ashur, Isa. 37:21).

A clever parody of the funeral lament was made by Jeremiah in his dirge on the people of Judah (Jer. 9:17–22). The poem described the situation immediately preceding the downfall of the nation, and it followed the tidings of doom by describing the travails of death. Instead of contemplating a glorious future, the women would have to teach their daughters how to become professional mourners. Death was personified in the dirge as an impartial “Harvester” who gathers in small and great alike. A much shorter dirge (Amos 5:2) dealt in a similar vein with the “virgin Israel,” who was hurled to the ground by death. There are other examples of prophetic laments (Ezek. 19:1–14; 26:17–18; Nah. 3:18–19). Certain prophetic utterances, including denunciations of foreign nations, were described by the Hebrew term maššā' H5363, “oracle,” but apart from this they had no distinctive features of form or rhythm. The prophetic writers found that they could express their message adequately by employing the traditional poetic structure as well as the normal prose forms, and it is clear that their genius as spiritual leaders in Israel arose from the content rather than the form of their poetic utterances.

Observed in retrospect, the fact that their predictions of doom were fulfilled with such finality gives added stature to the majestic poetic utterances that were declaimed so vigorously by these ancient servants of God. By contrast, the gentle, optimistic visions that saw blessing in the future for a penitent and obedient Israel carry more than a hint of sadness in their lyricism in the light of the fate which ultimately befell the Jews.

Hebrews, Epistle to the. The longest of the non-Pauline letters in the NT. Traditionally it follows the thirteen letters attributed to PAUL; in the great uncials it comes between Paul's nine letters to churches and his four to individuals; in P<sup>46</sup> (c. A.D. 200, the oldest extant MS of the corpus Pauli-num), it comes second among the letters addressed to churches, next after Romans. (This was its original position in the Syrian textual tradition; in the Coptic Sahidic version it follows 2 Corinthians; in the archetype of CODEX VATICANUS it followed Galatians.)

I. Authorship. In spite of traditional ascriptions and brilliant guesses, the authorship of Hebrews is unknown. At ALEXANDRIA it was ascribed to Paul from the second half of the 2nd cent. onward, although difficulties in this ascription were acknowledged by CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and ORIGEN: "God knows the truth of the matter," said the latter (Euseb. Hist. 6.25.14). TERTULLIAN (De pudicitia 20) ascribed it to BARNABAS. Luther's ascription to APOLLOS has commended itself to many; A. von Harnack's ascription to PRISCILLA seems to be ruled out by the masculine participle in Heb. 11:32. The author was a second-generation Christian, master of a fine literary style, quite unlike Paul's; like Apollos, he may have had an Alexandrian Jewish background and he certainly had "a thorough knowledge of the Scriptures" (Acts 18:24), which he knew in the SEPTUAGINT version and interpreted according to a creative exegetical principle.

II. Destination. The document does not name those for whom it is intended any more than the man who composed it. The title "To (the) Hebrews" goes back to the last quarter of the 2nd cent. A.D., but it cannot be determined if it corresponds to the original truth of the matter or, if so, what "Hebrews" precisely means. From internal evidence it may be inferred that the recipients were Hellenistic Jews who had embraced the gospel. Gentile believers who were disposed to backslide would not be greatly moved by an argument that began, "If perfection could have been attained through the Levitical priesthood..." (Heb. 7:11); their reaction would have been "Well, we never imagined it was!" The insistence on the obsolete character of the old covenant (8:13) and encouragement to the readers to go forth to Christ “outside the camp” (13:13) would have more point if their background was Jewish, as would also the author’s confidence that they would accept the authority of the OT (Gentiles who were inclined to give up the Christian faith would give up the OT with it). Where they lived cannot be conclusively decided. Jerusalem, Caesarea, Antioch, Alexandria, the Lycus valley, Ephesus, Corinth have all been suggested; but perhaps they may best be regarded as members of a house-church in Rome, the city in which knowledge of the epistle is first attested (in Clement of Rome, c. A.D. 96).

III. Occasion, purpose, and date. The people to whom the letter was sent were in danger of losing their initial enthusiasm. When first they became Christians, their exhilaration was such that they rejoiced amid persecution, endured plunder and outrage without complaint, and were unstinting in their service of fellow believers, especially those who were imprisoned. With the passing of the years their earlier zest waned. The PAROUSIA, which they had ardently expected, seemed as distant as ever; the Jewish establishment and the fellowship of the SYNAGOGUE, which they had given up for Christianity, continued to flourish and to offer the protection of a religion whose practice was licensed by the Roman state. Their original impetus slackened off; they were tempted to look backward instead of forward. Hence the urgency with which the author exhorts them, using a variety of metaphors, not to drift downstream but to row hard against the current, not to flag in the race but to persevere in faith. It may well be, as William Manson has argued, that he wanted to see them play their part in the advance of the Christian world-mission with other fellow believers instead of remaining in a backwater (The Epistle to the Hebrews: An Historical and Theological Reconsideration [1951], 44). To do this they must be prepared to burn their boats and sever their links with the old order. To ignore the forward call would be worse than negligence; it would be outright apostasy, turning away “from the living God” (Heb. 3:12). Against this he warns them solemnly, while at the same time he expresses his confidence that they will show themselves worthy of their first love and press on in patience and faith.

As for the date of the letter, a terminus ad quem is provided by the references to it in Clement of Rome (thus not later than c. A.D. 96). A terminus a quo is indicated in that author and readers alike received the gospel from those who had heard the Lord (Heb. 2:1–4). No completely definitive answer can be given to the question whether the letter was written before or after the destruction of the Jerusalem temple in A.D. 70. The sacrificial ritual is referred to in the present tense, and the “old covenant” under which that ritual was instituted is said to be “ready to vanish away” (8:13 RSV), but it is arguable that this is a “literary present” since the description of the ritual is based not on current practice but on the Pentateuchal prescriptions. Nevertheless, if, by the time of writing, the temple had been destroyed and the sacrifices brought to an end, this would have added such weight to the author’s argument that some allusion to it, however veiled, could hardly have been avoided. Thus a date before A.D. 70 is more probable, though not certain.

If the people addressed were Roman Christians, a date not later than A.D. 64 is indicated by Heb. 12:4, “In your struggle against sin, you have not yet resisted to the point of shedding your blood.” This could not have been written after the Neronian persecution. (The persecution of Heb. 10:32–34, which did not involve martyrdom, may have been connected with the expulsion of Jews from Rome in A.D. 49, mentioned in Acts 18:2.) Another chronological pointer may be the “forty years” quoted from Ps. 95:10 in Heb. 3:9, 17. The current belief in a forty-year probation at the end time to match that at the beginning of Israel’s history is attested, for example, in the QUMRAN texts (DEAD SEA SCROLLS); and if a period of forty years from the death of Christ was nearing its end when the author was writing, there would be the greater relevance in his quotation of the psalm.

IV. Outline. The letter is described by the writer as a “word of exhortation” (Heb. 13:22), an expression used elsewhere of a synagogue sermon (Acts 13:15). It is, indeed, a carefully constructed homily, delivered by force of circumstances in writing instead of orally.

1. The finality of the gospel (Heb. 1:1—2:18)
  1. God's completed revelation in the Son (1:1—4)
  2. Christ superior to angels (1:5—14)
  3. First admonition: gospel and law (2:1—4)
  4. Humiliation and glory of the Son of man (2:5—9)
  5. The Son of man the Savior and High Priest of his people (2:10—18)
2. The true home of the people of God (3:1—4:13)
  1. Jesus superior to Moses (3:1—6)
  2. Second admonition: the rejection of Jesus more serious than the rejection of Moses (3:7—19)
  3. The true rest of God may be forfeited (4:1—10)
  4. Exhortation to attain God's rest (4:11—13)
3. The high priesthood of Christ (4:14—6:20)
  1. Christ's high priesthood an encouragement to his people (4:14—16)
  2. Qualifications for high priesthood (5:1—4)
  3. Christ's qualifications for high priesthood (5:5—10)
  4. Third admonition: spiritual immaturity (5:11—14)
  5. No second beginning possible (6:1—8)

  1. Ethical injunctions (13:1–6)
  2. Examples to follow (13:7–8)
  3. The true Christian sacrifices (13:9–16)
  4. Submission to leaders (13:17)
  5. Request for prayer (13:18–19)
  6. Prayer and doxology (13:20–21)
8. Postscript (13:22–25)
  1. Personal notes (13:22–23)
  2. Final greetings and benediction (13:24–25)

V. Relation to the apostolic preaching. Because Hebrews represents a distinct school of thought within the NT, it is the more interesting to compare the GOSPEL message that is presupposed as common ground between author and readers with the message presented in other NT documents, and to discover that in basic essentials it is the same gospel.

The new age has been inaugurated; the OT prophecies have been fulfilled. “Jesus the Son of God” (Heb. 4:14) “has appeared once for all at the consummation of the ages” (9:26 ASV mg.). In his eternal being he is identified with wisdom, God’s agent in the creation of the world (1:1–3; cf. Jn. 1:1–3; Col. 1:15–17; Rev. 3:14); his human descent from DAVID is implied in what is stated to be a matter of common knowledge, that he belonged to the tribe of JUDAH (Heb. 7:14). The material circumstances of his death are known (13:12); he endured it “to do away with sin” (9:26; cf. Rom. 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:3). His resurrection is assumed rather than affirmed (cf. Heb. 13:20); it is part of the general movement of his exaltation to the right hand of God, where he intercedes for his people (cf. Rom. 8:34; Phil. 2:9–11). His parousia, which is confidently expected (Heb. 10:37), will consummate his people’s salvation (9:28). Meanwhile, they have received the Holy Spirit, whose presence with them is attested by his gifts “distributed according to his will” (2:4; cf. 1 Cor. 12:4–11; Gal. 3:2–5).

It has often been said that in Hebrews the older ESCHATOLOGY of the two ages has been combined (if not overlaid) with the Platonic scheme of the two worlds—the upper world of eternal reality and the lower world characterized by material and temporary copies of that reality. Something of this sort is indeed recognizable in Heb. 8–9, where the true abode of God is contrasted with the earthly sanctuary with its priesthood and ritual. Even for this, the author finds his text in the OT (Exod. 25:40, quoted in Heb. 8:5). He certainly shows himself familiar with the Platonic scheme, probably as mediated through PHILO JUDAEUS, but his principal category of thought in this respect is the Hebraic scheme of the two ages, modified (as by the other NT writers) in the light of the coming of Christ and God’s definitive word spoken in him “in these last days” (Heb. 1:2; cf. 1 Cor. 10:11; 1 Pet. 1:20). (See C. K. Barrett, “The Eschatology of the Epistle to the Hebrews,” in The Background of the New Testament and Its Eschatology, ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube [1956], 363–93.)

VI. Argument. On this basis the writer establishes the finality of the gospel as God’s perfect revelation. The gospel is contrasted in this regard with everything that preceded it, especially with the Levitical ritual. By emphasizing the completeness of the work of Christ and the perfection of his person, he presents the gospel as the one way that secures unimpeded access to God.

Christ, he shows, is superior to all the servants and spokesmen of God that went before him, whether human beings like Moses (Heb. 3:3) or angelic intermediaries like those through whom the law was communicated (1:4; 2:2). Christ is the SON OF GOD, his agent in creating and maintaining the universe (1:1–3), yet the One who, as SON OF MAN, submitted to humiliation and death (2:5–18). Now he is exalted above the heavens, enthroned at God’s right hand as his people’s representative (1:3; 4:14). This ministry is presented in terms of high priesthood, Hebrews being the only NT document that explicitly uses this language in reference to Jesus. His high priesthood is expounded partly on the basis of Ps. 110:4 (where the Davidic Messiah is acclaimed by God as “a priest forever, in the order of Melchizedek”), partly on the historical facts about Jesus. Whereas the oracle of Ps. 110:1, frequently quoted or echoed in Hebrews, is one of the commonest TESTIMONIA in the NT, the use of 110:4 is peculiar to this epistle. The MESSIAH who is acclaimed as king in 110:1 (“Sit at my right hand”), says the author, is acclaimed as priest in 110:4 (Heb. 5:6). The reference to the priestly order of MELCHIZEDEK is explained (Heb. 7) with the help of the narrative about that priest (Gen. 14:18–20), significance being found not only in what is said of him there but also in what is not said of him. This scriptural argument for Messiah’s high-priestly office is reinforced by Jesus’ personal qualifications to discharge that office: not only was he “holy, blameless, pure” in character (Heb. 7:26) but, having been tempted in every respect as his people are, he can sympathize with them and supply the help they need in the hour of trial (4:15–16; 5:7–10).

Jesus’ intercessory ministry finds mention in the Gospels (e.g., Lk. 12:8; 22:32; Jn. 17) and Epistles (Rom. 8:34; 1 Jn. 2:1–2), but it is elaborated in a distinctive manner in Hebrews. Various arguments are adduced to show that his priesthood is not only superior to that of AARON but also belongs to a totally different order. It belongs to the new covenant foretold in Jer. 31:31–34, a covenant marked by better promises and a better hope than the old covenant of Sinai under which the Aaronic priests ministered (Heb. 7:11–19; 8:6–13). See COVENANT (OT); COVENANT, THE NEW. It is associated with a better sacrifice than any that went before (9:23) and is discharged in a better sanctuary than any of this creation (9:11). Priesthood and sacrifice are inseparable. The priests of AARON’s line repeatedly offered up animal sacrifices (7:27), notably the annual sin offering on the Day of Atonement (9:7), but these could not meet the real need of men and women (10:4). Such sacrifices could not cleanse the conscience from the defilement of SIN, which is the great barrier to fellowship with God (9:9). Christ’s high-priestly ministry, however, is exercised on the basis of a real, voluntary, and effective sacrifice—“the sacrifice of himself” (9:26)—which, unlike all other sacrifices, cleanses the human conscience so that we can henceforth “serve the living God” (9:14). See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

The writer finds this perfect sacrifice predicted in Ps. 40:6–8, where a speaker, dismissing all animal sacrifice as unacceptable, dedicates his life to God for the obedient accomplishment of his will (Heb. 10:5–7). The words of the psalm are understood as the words of Christ when he comes into the world. In the “body...prepared” for him (Ps. 40:6, according to LXX) he fulfilled the will of God, in life and death alike. By this sacrifice of perfect obedience to God’s will his people are once for all sanctified and given the right of access to God (Heb. 10:10, 22); by it, moreover, the new covenant is established in which God implants his law in their hearts and remembers their sins no more (10:15–18). These arguments, based on the interpretation of Scripture, were corroborated by the practical experience of a generation of believers who, since the passion and triumph of Christ, had proved in their lives the efficacy of his sacrifice and intercession. Such a sacrifice (unlike the Levitical order) required no repetition; for those who repudiated this sacrifice no further sin-offering could be available; hence the solemn warning not to spurn the Son of God and profane his covenant-blood (10:26–31).

What the readers needed in their present situation was to cultivate patient endurance and hold fast their confession to the end. They should not be discouraged by hope deferred; the coming One would come (Heb. 10:36–39). The example of faith shown by men and women who lived and died in the hope of the promise which was fulfilled in Christ, although they themselves did not witness that fulfillment, should help them (11:1–40); still more should the example of Christ’s endurance nerve them to press on in the path of obedience to God and not give up the struggle (12:1–17). The familiar and congenial environment of their earlier days was vanishing, never to return; as heirs of the one unshakable kingdom they should sever the bonds that tied them to their past and go forth to Christ, embracing the stigma attached to his name, following him on the way of faith to “the city that is to come” (12:28—13:14).

VII. Canonicity and authority. Hebrews may be said to have received canonical recognition first of all when a 2nd-cent. editor (prob. in Alexandria) incorporated it into the corpus Paulinum. Certainly from the time of Pantaenus (c. A.D. 180) its canonicity was unanimously acknowledged by Alexandria; whatever ORIGEN's doubts on its authorship might be, he had none on its canonical quality. See CANON (NT). The example of Alexandria was followed by the eastern churches generally. EUSEBIUS of Caesarea included Hebrews (reckoned by him as a Pauline letter) among the books whose canonicity was "obvious and plain," although he did not overlook the fact that "some have set it aside on the ground that it was rejected by the Roman church as non-Pauline" (Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 3.3.5). EPHRAEM SYRUS (c. A.D. 350) and the other Syriac-speaking fathers accepted it without question as canonical (and as Pauline); unlike some of the CATHOLIC EPISTLES, it was included in the Peshitta (early 5th cent.) from the beginning.

In the W the situation was quite different. Although the epistle was known at Rome before the end of the 1st cent., it was not regarded as canonical there until the 4th cent., presumably because it was known not to be the work of an apostle. At last the Roman church, with no great enthusiasm, decided not to remain out of step with the eastern churches in this regard, being moved particularly by the persuasiveness of Athanasius, who spent his second exile (A.D. 340–346) in Rome. Even IRENAEUS of Lyons (c. A.D. 180), despite his belonging to proconsular Asia, had reservations about Hebrews; he may have given it a deuterocanonical status comparable to that of Wisdom (Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 5.26).

The difficulty felt by the Roman church was largely due to the tradition that linked canonical authority with apostolic authorship. Jerome and AUGUSTINE were content to accept Hebrews as a Pauline letter on this ground rather than from considerations of literary criticism. It was included in the canon promulgated by the Synods of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397) in this form: "Of Paul the apostle, thirteen epistles; of the same to the Hebrews, one."

When the question was reopened by the Reformers, the canonicity and apostolic authorship of Hebrews were clearly distinguished. Luther rejected its Pauline authorship and seemed to relegate it to a lower position because it contained, as he thought, some "wood, hay and stubble." Calvin equally denied its Pauline authorship but affirmed: "I class it without hesitation among the apostolic writings"—"apostolic" in doctrine and authority, not in authorship. Of its inherent worth he said: "There is no book of Holy Scripture which speaks so clearly of the priesthood of Christ, which so highly exalts the virtue and dignity of that only true sacrifice which he offered by his death, which so abundantly deals with the use of ceremonies as well as their abrogation, and, in a word, so fully explains that Christ is the end of the law. Let us therefore not allow the church of God or ourselves to be deprived of so great a benefit, but firmly defend the possession of it" (Commentary on Hebrews, trans. W. B. Johnston [1963], introduction).

It is all to the good that canonicity and authorship should be thus distinguished by the recognition of the right of an anonymous work to a place within the NT because of its essential quality. The abiding authority of the epistle can be found in its insistence on the inwardness of true religion and its relegation of externalities to a place of relative unimportance. (Even sacraments may have been included by the author among such externalities; it is not without significance that the one statement about Melchizedek in Gen. 14:18–20 to which no reference is made in Heb. 7:1–10 is his bringing forth bread and wine.) The purification that matters in the sight of God is the purification of the conscience from sin, not the removal of ritual pollution; the one sacrifice that avails in the sight of God to effect this purification is the sacrifice of an unreservedly willing and dedicated life, like that of the Isaianic Servant who spontaneously and deliberately offered himself “to take away the sins of many people” (Heb. 9:28).

No material shrine is necessary for the worship of God; the house of God, where his presence is manifested and the high-priestly ministry of the exalted Christ is discharged, is higher than the heavens in a spiritual, not in a spatial, sense, for it is identified with the fellowship of his people, if they hold fast their confidence and glorying of their hope (Heb. 3:6). No geographical city or country claims their allegiance because of some special sanctity; the once holy city was no longer such because Jesus, expelled beyond its precincts, “suffered outside the city gate” (13:12). The people of Christ must follow him as a pilgrim community, never halting in his service short of the rest that remains for them in “the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God” (4:9; 11:10). In a changing world, where the old landmarks disappear and old standards are no longer recognized, the only constant point of reference is the unchanging, onward-moving Christ, “the same yesterday and today and forever” (13:8); the path of wisdom is to face the unknown with him. Our author anticipates Herbert Butterfield in finding here “a principle which both gives us a firm Rock and leaves us the maximum elasticity for our minds; the principle: Hold to Christ, and for the rest be totally uncommitted” (Christianity and History [1950], 146).

Hebrews, Gospel of the. A Gospel according to the Hebrews is mentioned by CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, who quotes from it a saying also found, with some variation, in the OXYRHYNCHUS SAYINGS OF JESUS (POxy 654) and in the Coptic Gospel of Thomas (logion 2; see THOMAS, GOSPEL OF). This material has led to the claim that the Gospel of the Hebrews was the source of the other two, but the evidence is too meager to permit far-reaching conclusions. Only fragments are extant, and it is not certain that all the fragments quoted under this or similar titles belong to the same work. The document was known also to ORIGEN, who quotes from it a statement of Jesus that his mother, the Holy Spirit, took him by one of his hairs and carried him off to Mount TABOR (a variation of the temptation story, although Tabor was traditionally the mountain of the transfiguration). Thereafter patristic testimony is highly confused.

EUSEBIUS mentions a Gospel of the Hebrews in which Jewish converts take special delight; he links with it a story adduced by PAPIAS, which may be the pericope adulterae (Jn. 7:53—8:11), and says that the book was used by Hegesippus, who also quoted some things “from the Syriac” and “from the Hebrew language” (see Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 3.25.5; 3.39.17; 4.22.8). Some EBIONITES used only the Gospel of the Hebrews, esteeming the others as of little value (ibid., 3.27.4; according to IRENAEUS, the Ebionites used only Matthew). Eusebius also mentions a Hebrew Gospel of Matthew, said to have been taken by BARTHOLOMEW to India (Eccl. Hist. 5.10.3). In his Theophania, Eusebius quotes a gospel current among the Jews in Hebrew, but gives no name. He may thus have known two documents: a Greek Gospel according to the Hebrews known to Clement and Origen, and before them to Papias and Hegesippus, and an Aramaic gospel known also to Hegesippus (cf. P. Vielhauer and G. Strecker in NTAp, 1:138).

According to EPIPHANIUS (Pan. 29.9.4), the Nazoreans had the Gospel of Matthew complete in Hebrew, but evidently he had not himself seen the book. Like Irenaeus, he says that the Ebionites used only the Gospel of Matthew, but he adds that they called it the Gospel of the Hebrews (Pan. 30.3.7). The documents are not identical: while for Epiphanius the Gospel of the Nazoreans was Matthew complete in Hebrew, that of the Ebionites was merely a “so-called Matthew,” a falsified abridgment (NTAp, 1:141). Epiphanius is the first to identify the Nazorean Gospel of the Hebrews with the Hebrew “original” of Matthew, and it looks as if he has combined the statements of Irenaeus and Eusebius concerning the Ebionites. The documents appear, however, to be distinct: the Nazorean gospel he knows only by repute, the Ebionite he quotes (but for this he is the sole authority). Suspicion is cast upon his testimony by the fact that elsewhere he says that Tatian’s DIATESSARON “is also called the Gospel according to the Hebrews” (Pan. 46.1).

Confusion is increased by JEROME, who uses various formulae to introduce his quotations: Gospel according to the Hebrews (seven times), Gospel of the Hebrews (twice), the Hebrew Gospel (thrice), the Hebrew Gospel according to Matthew (twice). He speaks of its use by the NAZARENES (the various forms of this name constitute another problem) or by the Nazarenes and Ebionites, and claims to have translated it from Hebrew into Greek and Latin. One of his quotations, however, is the statement cited above from Origen, who gives no hint that it was not already before him in Greek. After a detailed chronological review, Vielhauer concludes that the measure of confidence to be placed in Jerome’s statements is very small (NTAp, 1:146). Jerome had only one gospel in mind, which he called the Gospel according to the Hebrews and identified (wrongly) with the Aramaic Gospel of the Nazarenes. His claims to have obtained the latter from the Nazoreans and to have translated it into Greek are open to serious question.

The problems are, therefore, (a) to determine how many documents are involved, and (b) to allocate the surviving fragments among them. Vielhauer argues cogently for three: a Greek Gospel of the Hebrews known already to Clement and Origen, a Greek Gospel of the Ebionites known only from Epiphanius (who also supplies the only extant fragments), and an Aramaic Gospel of the Nazarenes, attested by Hegesippus and Eusebius, Epiphanius, and Jerome. On the other hand, his allocation of the fragments may at some points be open to question. For example, M. R. James (The Apocryphal New Testament [1924], 1–8) distinguishes two documents, the Gospel of the Hebrews and that of the Ebionites, and assigns to the former the fragments allocated by Vielhauer to the Gospel of the Nazarenes; but he isolates as from a different document a Coptic fragment assigned by Vielhauer to the Gospel of the Hebrews (it has a partial parallel in Epistula Apostolorum 14, and hence, while unorthodox, is not necessarily completely heretical).

Two other fragments frequently quoted in modern literature as from the Gospel of the Hebrews are both assigned by Vielhauer to the Gospel of the Nazarenes: the note that the man with the withered hand (Matt. 12:9–13) was a mason, and Jerome's comment that it was not the veil of the temple that was rent (27:51), but the lintel that collapsed. Both, however, are introduced in terms similar to those used for fragments assigned to the Gospel of the Hebrews.

In the circumstances it is difficult to be certain of the character, form, and compass of these documents, and precarious in the extreme to build hypotheses upon the little that is known. All three seem to stand in some relation to Matthew, but the extent of modification or abridgement is not clear. The Gospel of the Hebrews is, however, commonly mentioned by the church fathers with a certain respect, and hence was not obtrusively heretical. It was probably the gospel of Jewish Christians in Egypt, distinguished by its title from the Gospel of the Egyptians (which may have been more Gnostic); but to go much further is to enter the realm of speculation. (See further NTAp, 1, ch. 4; ABD, 3:105–6.)

Hebron (person) hee'bruhn (חֶבְרֹן H2497, “associate, companion”; gentilic חֶבְרֹנִי H2498, “Hebronite”). (1) Son of KOHATH, grandson of LEVI, and uncle of MOSES (Exod. 6:18; Num. 3:19, 27; 1 Chr. 6:2, 18; 15:9; 23:12, 19; 24:23); eponymous ancestor of the Hebronite Levitical clan, which played an important role during the time of DAVID (Num. 3:27; 26:58; 1 Chr. 26:23, 30–31).

(2) Son of MARESHAH and great-grandson of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:42–43). The Hebrew text is difficult and variously emended. According to the SEPTUAGINT, Mareshah (not Mesha) was the firstborn of Caleb, in which case Hebron would be Caleb's grandson; according to other reconstructions, Hebron is removed from Caleb by several generations. It has also been suggested that v. 42 should be translated, “Mesha his firstborn, who was the founder of [the city] Ziph, and his son Mareshah, who was the founder of [the city] Hebron”; but this interpretation is inconsistent with v. 43, which says that Hebron had four sons. Nevertheless, there may be a connection between Hebron son of Mareshah and HEBRON (PLACE).

Hebron (place) hee'bruhn (חברון H2496, "association"). A city about 20 mi. SSW of JERUSALEM at more than 3,000 ft. above sea level, situated between two ridges and occupying the valley between, lying somewhat WNW by ESE (today it is also known as El-Khalil). The main residential part of the city lies on the slopes of the ridges to the E and N with movement to the SW ridge and up the NE slope of Jebel er-Rumeideh, site of the ancient tell of Hebron. The present city extends N from the W end of the valley on both sides of a wide street forming the present road to Jerusalem. The city valley itself is the lower end of the Wadi Tuffa<sup>1</sup> (Valley of the Apples). A large number of springs and wells dot the landscape, making it certain of occupation. Two large pools with cut-stone walls are located within the city area. Apple, plum, fig, pomegranate, apricot, and nut trees are found in profusion; grapes, melons, and several vegetables are also abundant from the rich soil of valley and terrace. The principal landmark in the present city is the Ḥaram el-Khalil, the area sacred to the Arabs, covering the ancient cave of MACHPELAH, and Deir el-Arba<sup>2</sup> in, the traditional burying place of RUTH and JESSE.

Hebron is mentioned frequently in the OT, and several times its earlier name of KIRIATH ARBA is given (Gen. 23:2 et al.). It "had been built seven years before Zoan in Egypt" (Num. 13:22), or c.

Hebron.

1728 B.C., which is the HYKSOS period. However, excavations performed in 1964–66 show that the tell on Jebel er-Rumeideh was occupied as early as c. 3300 B.C. and has enjoyed fairly continuous habitation down to the present time (P. Hammond, American Expedition to Hebron: Preliminary Report [1966], 1), which makes it appear that the building spoken of was a rebuilding, probably under the Hyksos, since a Middle Bronze II wall some 30 ft. wide has been uncovered at the SE corner of what was an ancient tell, now obscured by grape and olive yard terraces but with masonry outcroppings visible here and there.

Hebron is the later name for the general area (Gen. 23:19) in the days of MOSES, and included MAMRE, the latter traditionally located less than 2 mi. N of Hebron to the E of the Jerusalem road (the site of a temple built by Constantine to the memory of Abraham's sojourn there). Some (G. F. Moore,

A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Judges, ICC [1910], 23; F. Hommel, The Ancient Hebrew Tradition [1897], 232–234) deemed the older name Kiriath Arba to mean tetrapolis (fourfold city) on the grounds that the name is an anomalous Hebrew form, indicative of being a loanword, therefore not a personal name; the similarity to ARBA, the father of ANAK (cf. Josh. 14:15), is a coincidence and here a play on the word. What the four cities were which made up the “association” is not known except for Mamre.

The archaeology of Hebron may be summarized as follows. Evidence of Chalcolithic occupation from as early as c. 3000 B.C. was exposed at the SE angle of what should prove to be the Middle Bronze wall. Not far away under a new house to the S was found evidence of Early Bronze I habitation, but outside the Middle Bronze II wall. The latter was discovered to be c. 30 ft. broad, with a large portion of its southern face exposed to display the usual cyclopean unworked stones. The wall continued at least 330 ft. westward. Some 197 ft. northward of the Middle Bronze II wall, Iron I occupation was unearthed in a significant house of the monarchy period (11th–10th centuries). Some data may point to the invasions of SENNACHERIB and the destruction of the land by NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

The next certain occupation was that of the Hellenistic period, most striking in the large pottery works, with at least two kilns at the westward end below and outside of the Middle Bronze II wall, and on the N side of the tell as well. In this area, a remarkable settling and water storage system from the Byzantine era was unearthed hardly a foot below terrace level. However, the largest amount of evidence for Byzantine occupation was unearthed below Arab remains at the eastern end of er-Rumeideh some 400 ft. E of the tell. An extensive Byzantine burial ground was uncovered with typical artifacts. A later Muslim palatial house covered part of this area, and below its courtyard were found evidences of Roman occupation. All phases of Islamic occupation down to the present era were brought to light.

Abram (ABRAHAM) moved to Hebron after LOT left him (Gen. 13:18), when Mamre was known as part of Hebron, the latter being the biblical author’s identification of the place by the later name.

Abram built the first altar there to Yahweh. Mamre was named at this time after Mamre the AMORITE (Gen. 14:13) in league with Abram. In Abraham's ninety-ninth year, Yahweh appeared to him with the two angels "near the great trees in Mamre" (18:1). Two ancient trees in the vicinity of Hebron have been called "the oaks of Mamre," traditionally associated with Abraham: one near the traditional site of Mamre, and another on the western edge of the Wadi Tuffa<sup>6</sup> in the grounds of the Russian Orthodox Church. At Mamre, Abraham pled with Yahweh to spare SODOM (18:23), marking him as "the friend [Arab. el-Khalil] of God" (cf. Isa. 41:8; Jas. 2:23).

It was in Hebron that SARAH died (Gen. 23:2), and Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah (23:17), which was opposite Mamre, from EPHRON the HITTITE. By this time the Hittite enclaves had replaced the Amorites (cf. chs. 13–14). There was buried Sarah, and later ISAAC, REBEKAH, LEAH, and JACOB (49:31; 50:13). In the days of the exodus, spies were sent into the land and from the brook ESHCOL in Hebron took back the wondrous grapes on a staff (Num. 13:22–24). For his valor and constancy (cf. Josh. 14:9), CALEB was given the area of Hebron (14:13), but the town became one of the CITIES OF REFUGE. When SAMSON tore loose the doors of the city gate of GAZA, he carried them to Hebron (Jdg. 16:3).

DAVID settled in Hebron after the death of SAUL (2 Sam. 2:1) and from there ruled over Judah for seven and a half years before being anointed king over all Israel (5:4–5). After this, he moved to Jerusalem. However, it was from Hebron that ABSALOM launched his revolt (15:7–12), perhaps considering he would have stronger support there for his rebellion. In his own days, REHOBOAM fortified Hebron, possibly in the prospect of attack from Egypt by SHISHAK.

The next references to Hebron are from the period of the Maccabees. Judas MACCABEE defeated the Edomites who had invaded the NEGEV from EDOM and established themselves as far N as Hebron. Later, HEROD erected the enclosure (Haram) about the ancient burial place of Abraham; the "Herodian" masonry is clearly distinguishable from later work. Pilasters adorn the walls, a distinct peculiarity, and the Muslim work begins above them. Islam has made the Haram a sacred site because Muhammad is said to have passed through it on his night journey to heaven. It came into Muslim control after the Arab conquests.

In the 19th cent., Guy le Strange summarized some of the reports of ten previous visitors to Hebron, one of whom, in A.D. 1172, declared he had seen the bodies of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. In 1168, Hebron was made the seat of a bishopric but reverted to Arab rule in 1187 in Saladin's conquests. It was reported by Ibn Battuta that Joseph's body was moved there by 1395. Cenotaphs within the Haram are reputedly over the resting places of the bodies. History and tradition thus combine in designating this as the cave of Machpelah where Abraham and others were buried.

hedge. This noun is used by the NIV twice, in both cases with reference to thorn shrubs (Heb. měšûkkâ H5372, Isa. 5:5; měšûkâ H5004, Mic. 7:4). Verbal expressions are used figuratively to refer to God's protecting care (Job 1:10) or his constraint (3:23). The KJV uses the noun also to render Hebrew gādēr H1555, "stone wall" (Ps. 80:12 et al.) and Greek phragmos G5850 with reference to a FENCE, enclosure, or partitioning WALL (Matt. 21:33; Mk. 12:1; Lk. 14:23 [NIV, “lanes”]; Eph. 2:14).

hedgehog. An insectivorous mammal covered with dense spines. The term is used by the NRSV twice to render Hebrew qippōd H7887 (Isa. 14:23; 34:11 [RSV, “porcupine”]; the NIV takes this term as a reference to the OWL). The hedgehog should be distinguished from the porcupine, which is the largest rodent in Palestine and may weigh over forty pounds. The powerful sharp spines, up to fifteen inches long, are modified hairs. Porcupines live in all countries where they can find rocky shelter, eating mostly roots and other vegetable matter but also some bones, and even animal remains. In most parts of their range they are considered good eating. Hedgehogs are much smaller, up to about ten inches, and they are covered above with short spines; in color they are sandy to brown. They eat a wide range of insects, as well as baby rodents, birds’ eggs, small reptiles, etc., mostly at night. When alarmed they roll into a defensive ball, spines pointing outward. Three species live in Palestine, two being desert forms. (See FFB, 66.)

G. S. CANSDALE

heel. The Hebrew word (āqēb H6811 is twice used in a literal sense of ESAU’s heel, which JACOB grasped while still in the womb of REBEKAH (Gen. 25:26; Hos. 12:3). Elsewhere, the term heelis use in a figurative sense. In the protevangelium (Gen. 3:15), God said that the seed of the woman would bruise the serpent’s head, but the serpent would bruise his heel—clearly a reference to the conflict between Satan and the Son of God and the utter defeat Christ would administer to the foe responsible for his crucifixion at Calvary. The dying patriarch Jacob, when blessing his children, spoke of DAN’s enemies as a rider whose horse’s heel is bitten by a serpent (Dan) so that the frightened animal rears and throws his rider (Gen. 49:17). Similarly, he spoke of GAD as someone who would attack raiders “at their heels” (v. 19). JOB’s friend BILDAD the Shuhite insinuated that Job was like the wicked who bring about their own destruction: “A trap seizes him by the heel” and he is caught (Job 18:9). The psalmist laments that the bosom friend whom he trusted and who dined at his table lifted his heel against him, that is, spurned him with brutal violence or perhaps kicked him when he was down (Ps. 41:9). Jesus referred to this statement at the Last Passover and applied it to himself; the bosom friend who ate with him and then betrayed him was Judas (Jn. 13:18, Gk. pterna G4761).

S. BARABAS

Hegai heg’i (𐤁𐤒𐤀 H2043 and 𐤁𐤒𐤀 H2051, derivation uncertain). EUNUCH of King XERXES in charge of the HAREM; he was entrusted the women from whom the king intended to choose a queen to replace VASHTI (Esth. 2:3 [KJV, “Hege”], 8, 15). ESTHER quickly won Hegai’s favor, and he provided her with special treatment (v. 9). Another part of the harem was the responsibility of SHAASGAZ (v. 14).

Hege hee’gee. KJV alternate form of HEGAI.

Hegemonides hej’uh-moh’nuh-deez (Ἡγεμονίδης). A Syrian officer appointed by the boy-king ANTIOCHUS V Eupator over the district from Ptolemais to Gerar at the time when the king was forced to return to ANTIOCH OF SYRIA to deal with a revolt by Philip in 162 B.C. (2 Macc. 13:24). The KJV takes the name as an adjective (“made him principal governor”), but contemporary inscriptions confirm the existence of a military commander named Hegemonides son of Zephorus.

Heglam heg'luhm (הגלם, from גלה HI655, hiphil “to take into exile”). Son of EHUD and father of Uzza and Ahihud (1 Chr. 8:7 NRSV). The passage is difficult, however, and it is possible that a person named Heglam did not exist. The Hebrew words wəgērā' hū' heglām (NRSV, “and Gera, that is, Heglam”) can be rendered “and Gera, who deported them” (so NIV; cf. KJV).

heifer. See CATTLE.

heifer, red. This term (Heb. pārâ' ādummâ) refers to a red-brown, unblemished, and unworked cow that was sacrificed and burned (Num. 19:1–8); its ashes were then kept “for use in the water of cleansing; it is for purification from sin” (v. 9). The cleansing in view had to do with corpse contamination (vv. 11–22). This ritual included several unusual features, such as the requirement that the slaughtering take place outside the camp (instead of on the ALTAR), and some scholars have argued that it should not be regarded as a SACRIFICE in the strict sense. Various interpretations, some allegorical, have been proposed regarding the details of this offering (see J. Milgrom in VT 31 [1981]: 62–72; R. B. Allen in EBC, 2:858–60). See also CLEAN; PURIFICATION; PURITY; UNCLEANNES; WATER OF CLEANSING.

heir. A person who inherits the property of another, usually upon the latter’s death. The OT includes two legislative texts pertaining to INHERITANCE (Num. 27:1–11; Deut. 21:15–17). The disposition of property by a last will and TESTAMENT is never mentioned in the OT. Before the head of a house died he gave verbal instructions about the distribution of his property, but in doing so he had to conform to the laws and customs of the time.

The FIRSTBORN son succeeded to the headship of the FAMILY and received an inheritance that was double that of each of the other brothers (Deut. 21:17). He could, however, lose this BIRTHRIGHT by surrendering it to a brother (cf. ESAU, Gen. 25:29–34) or for a serious offense (REUBEN, 35:22). The law protected him against favoritism on the part of his father (Deut. 21:15–17). There are, however, a number of cases in the OT where a younger son displaced an elder son, but these were exceptions to the ordinary law.

In the early history of Israel, the sons of concubines did not share the inheritance unless the father adopted them and made them equal in rank with the sons of his freeborn wives. SARAH objected to ISHMAEL’s sharing the inheritance with her son ISAAC (Gen. 21:10). In later times this practice was not so strictly followed. Daughters did not inherit property unless there were no male heirs. If a man died without sons, the order of succession was as follows: daughter, brother(s), paternal uncle(s), nearest male relative (Num. 27:1–11).

The widow had no right to the inheritance because the property could pass outside the family. A childless widow either remained a member of her husband's family by the LEVIRATE LAW of marriage or returned to her father (Gen. 38:11; Lev. 22:13). Undoubtedly she could keep what she had contributed to the marriage and the gifts she had received from her husband. If she had grown-up children, they provided for her.

A daughter who inherited had to marry within the tribe of her father to keep the inheritance within the tribe (Num. 36:6–9). If she married outside the tribe, her inheritance was forfeited and went to the person next in succession. On occasion, however, this law seems to have been set aside (1 Chr. 2:34–36). (See further E. Neufeld, Ancient Hebrew Marriage Laws [1944]; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions [1961], 53–55.)

In the NT the Greek word klēronomos G3101 is typically used in a special theological sense of the recipients of God's promises and of those who wait for what is promised. PAUL, especially, brings out that the heirs of the promises of salvation made to the seed of ABRAHAM, which are to be fulfilled in the messianic age, are not physical descendants of Abraham who keep the law but his spiritual descendants—those who have faith like him (Rom. 4:14; Gal. 3:29; Eph. 3:6). (See TDNT, 3:767–85.) S. BARABAS

Helah hee'luh (חֶלֶה H2690, “necklace”). One of the two wives of ASHHUR (apparently founder of the town of TEKOA), who is included in the genealogy of JUDAH; she had four children (1 Chr. 4:5, 7).

Helam hee'luhm (חֶלֶם H2663, meaning unknown). A town in TRANSJORDAN to which the Arameans under HADADEZER retreated after JOAB initially routed them; there they were subsequently defeated by DAVID (2 Sam. 10:16–17). This town is not mentioned elsewhere in the Hebrew OT, though the SEPTUAGINT apparently refers to it in Ezek. 47:16 (Ēliam) as being N of DAMASCUS toward HAMATH. Most scholars consider such a location too far N, and some identify Helam with Alema (1 Macc. 5:26; cf. hl'm in the Egyptian EXECRATION TEXTS, c. 1850 B.C.), which is modern Alma in HAURAN, c. 50 mi. S of Damascus and c. 35 mi. E of the Sea of Galilee.

J. B. SCOTT

Helbah hel'buh (חֶלְבָּה H2695, possibly “forest” or “fruitful”). A town in the tribal territory of ASHER from which Israel could not expel the Canaanites (Jdg. 1:31). Similarity in the consonants and location leads many scholars to identify Helbah with AHLAB (1:31) and MAHALAB (Josh. 19:29) at Khirbet el-Maḥalib, 4 mi. NE of TYRE on the coast (but see Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 222).

Helbon hel'bon (חֶלְבֹן H2696, possibly “forest” or “fruitful”). A city or region mentioned by EZEKIEL in his lamentation over TYRE (Ezek. 27:18; cf. also the Genesis Apocryphon [1Q20] XXII, 10, which identifies HOBAB as Helbon). From Helbon wine was imported to Tyre by traders of DAMASCUS. It is probably to be identified with the Valley of Hal-bun, some 12 mi. N of Damascus. The area has been famous from ancient times for its fine wines, preferred even by kings (Strabo, Geogr. 15.3.22 [735]).

J. B. SCOTT

Helchiah, Helchias hel-ki'uh, hel-ki'uhs. KJV alternate Apoc. forms of HILKIAH (1Esd. 8:1; 2 Esd. 1:1).

Heldai hel'di (חֶלְדַּי H2702, possibly “mole”). (1) A descendant of OTHNIEL from the town of NETOPHAH who served as captain of the temple guard for the twelfth monthly course (1 Chr. 27:15). He is probably the same as HELED.

(2) One of a group of Jewish exiles who brought gold and silver from BABYLON to help those who had returned under ZERUBBABEL; from these gifts a crown was to be made for Joshua (JESHUA) the high priest (Zech. 6:10; in v. 14 the MT has ḥēlem [KJV, “Helem”], apparently a scribal error or an alternate name for Heldai).

Heleb hee'lib. See HELED.

Helech hee'lik (חֶלֶךְ H2662). TNIV Helek. A city or region that, along with ARVAD (a Phoenician island town), supplied sailors and soldiers for TYRE (Ezek. 27:11). Although several identifications have been suggested, perhaps the least objectionable proposal is to equate Helech with Assyrian Hilakku, that is, CILICIA, in SE ASIA MINOR (the Cilicians were noted for their warlike character and would fit as mercenaries of Tyre). The SEPTUAGINT (hēdynamis sou) and the KJV (“thine army”) interpret the Hebrew word not as a name but as the common noun ḥayil H2657 with suffix (2nd person fem. sing.). This view is preferred by some scholars.

Heled hee'lid (חֶלֶד H2699, possibly “mold”; in 2 Sam. 23:29, most Heb. MSS have חֶלֶב, possibly “fruitful”). Son of Baanah from the town of NETOPHAH; he is included in the list of DAVID's mighty men (2 Sam. 23:29 [KJV, NRSV, “Heleb”]; 1 Chr. 11:30).

Helek hee'lik (חֶלֶק H2751, “portion, lot,” possibly short form of חֶלְקֵי יְהוָה H2760, “Yahweh is my portion” [see HILKIAH]; gentilic חֶלְקִי H2757, “Hele-kite”). (1) Son of GILEAD and great-grandson of MANASSEH; eponymous ancestor of the Helekite clan (Num. 26:30). Elsewhere, however, “the sons of Helek” (Josh. 17:2, lit. trans.) are listed with other Manassite clans as receiving an inheritance W of the Jordan, in distinction from the Gileadites, who were granted territory in TRANSJORDAN.

(2) TNIV form of HELECH.

Helem hee'lim (חֶלֶם H2152, meaning uncertain). (1) Son of Heber and great-grandson of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:35; some edd. of RSV have the misprint “Heler”); many scholars emend the text to HOTHAM (on the basis of v. 32).

(2) A variant form of HELDAI (Zech. 6:14 KJV and other versions, following the MT).

Heleph hee'lif (חֶלֶף H2738, possibly “replacement [place]” or “marsh grass [settlement]”). The (western) starting point of the southern boundary of the tribe of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:33). The precise location of Heleph is uncertain, but many scholars identify it with Khirbet Irbadeh, about 3 mi. NE of Mount TABOR.

Heler. See HELEM #1.

Helez hee'liz (חֶלֶז H2742, possibly “[God/Yah-weh] has rescued”). (1) One of DAVID's mighty men, identified as “the Paltite” (2 Sam. 23:26), meaning probably a native of BETH PELET or perhaps a descendant of PELET the Calebite; in the parallel list he is called “the Pelonite” (1 Chr. 11:27), a term of unknown derivation and maybe a scribal misspelling. He is probably the same as “Helez the Pelonite, an Ephraimite,” commander of the seventh division (1 Chr. 27:10).

(2) Son of Azariah, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:39).

Heli hee’li (Ἠλὶ G2459 [some editions Ἠλί or Ἠλεῖ], from Heb. הֵלִי H6603, possibly “lofty” or “[God/Yahweh] is high”). (1) Son of MATTHAT and father of JOSEPH according to Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:23). Because the parallel passage lists Matthan son of Eleazar as the father of Joseph (Matt. 1:15), some regard Heli as his grandfather, perhaps corresponding to Eleazar. Others argue that Luke gives Mary’s genealogy, in which case Heli is really her father, not Joseph’s.

(2) KJV Apoc. form of ELI (2 Esd. 1:2).

Helias hee’lee-uhs. KJV Apoc. form of ELIJAH (2 Esd. 7:39; NRSV v. 109).

Heliodorus hee’lee-uh-dor’uhs (Ἡλιόδωρος, “gift of Helios [the sun god]”). The chief minister of King SELEUCUS IV Philopator (187–175 B.C.). He tried unsuccessfully to plunder the treasury of the temple in Jerusalem (2 Macc. 3:7–40; 4:1; 5:18). A Jew named Simon had a disagreement with the high priest ONIAS and, because he could not have his way, decided in revenge to tell Apol-lonius, the governor of Phoenicia and Coelesyria, that there were vast treasures in the temple in Jerusalem that could easily come into the possession of Seleucus, who was then in control of Palestine. When Apollonius reported to the king what Simon had told him, the king immediately sent Heliodorus, his chief minister, to take possession of the money.

When Heliodorus arrived, the Jews told him that the money belonged mostly to widows and orphans, who had deposited it there for safekeeping, and that it would be sacrilegious to take it. When Heliodorus entered the treasury with a bodyguard, he saw a great apparition, a rider on a magnificently caparisoned horse, and two young men, strong and splendidly dressed. The horse struck Heliodorus with its hoofs, and the young men scourged him mercilessly. His men carried him out on a stretcher sorely wounded and pled with Onias to spare his life. The high priest prayed for him, and Heliodorus recovered. After offering a sacrifice and making grateful vows to God, he returned to Syria. (The same story is told in 4 Macc. 4, but with the important difference that Seleucus sends Apollonius rather than Heliodorus to plunder the temple.)

Although he was reared with Seleucus when they were boys, in 175 B.C. Heliodorus murdered the king and attempted to seize the throne, but he was driven out by Eumenes of Pergamus and his brother Attalus. Then ANTIOCHUS IV (Epiphanes), the brother of Seleucus, ascended the throne (Appian, Syrian Wars 233). It was this Antiochus whose attempt to hellenize the Jews led to the Maccabean war, which ended with deliverance from Syrian control. See MACCABEE.

S. BARABAS

Helipolis hee’lee-op’uh-lis (from ἥλιος G2463, “sun,” and πόλις G4484, “city”). This name occurs in the NIV as the rendering of Hebrew לְאֵוֶן H225, corresponding to Egyptian Iwnw (Ezek. 30:17; KJV, A VEN; NRSV, ON); in the NRSV it is used to render בֵּית־שֶׁמֶשׁ, “house of the sun” (Jer. 43:13; KJV, “Beth-shemesh”; NIV, “the temple of the sun”). In both instances, the SEPTUAGINT has ἡλιου πόλις, “city of the sun,” but probably to be understood as a proper name. See SUN, CITY OF THE.

Heliopolis was an ancient city in EGYPT, sacred to the sun-god RE and located in Tell el-Hisn, near el-Matarieh, about 10 mi. out of Cairo to the NNE. It first attained prominence in the Old Kingdom (Pyramid Age) of Egyptian history, when the pharaohs used a solar symbol for their tombs and adopted the title “Son of Re.” The kings of the fifth dynasty may have come from Heliopolis as a subordinate branch of the fourth dynasty. However, the major influence of Heliopolis in Egypt was less on the political than on the religious plane. The theological system and cultic usages there elaborated profoundly influenced the religion of Egypt in general. Identified with the local creator-god Atum, Re was at the head of a “family” of nine gods (Ennead) among whom the Heliopolitan theologians skillfully included the funerary god OSIRIS, chief rival of Re in the late Old Kingdom. The main temple in Heliopolis accordingly was that of Re, or Rē-Atum, the site being marked by the remains of a great enclosure and by the sole remaining obelisk of Sesostris I (c. 1900 B.C.).

Sesostris rebuilt the great temple of Re (Berlin Leather Roll; see A. de Buck in Studia Aegyptiaca 1 [1938]: 48–57); this was doubtless the structure at which Joseph’s father-in-law POTIPHERAH (POTIPHAR) subsequently served as “priest of On” (high priest in Heliopolis?), an affiliation reflected by his name, which means “gift of Re” (Gen. 41:45, 50; 46:20). The greatest pharaohs of the New Kingdom (c. 1550–1070 B.C.) adorned the temples of Heliopolis. The works of THUTMOSE III included two well-known obelisks, now in New York and London (“Cleopatra’s Needle”). Under RAMSES III, Heliopolis came second only to THEBES in its wealth of royal endowments (Papyrus Harris I). Among other edifices, obelisks were also erected by Amenhotep II, Seti I (now in Rome), and Ramses IV; these were slender, pyramidically topped shafts sacred to the sun-god.

As late as HERODOTUS, Heliopolis remained important, but thereafter sank into decline. Prior to his time three OT passages of the 8th–7th centuries B.C. appear to refer to Heliopolis. The City of Destruction in Isa. 19:18 is possibly a Hebrew pun for City of the Sun, that is, Heliopolis (see DESTRUCTION, CITY OF). Ezekiel’s judgment on Egypt (Ezek. 30:17) included Aven (ʾāwen H225, “wickedness”), perhaps also a pun (for ʾōn H228, “On” or Heliopolis); its association there with Bubastis (Pi BESETH) and MEMPHIS (KJV, Noph) would agree well with this identification. Similarly, Jeremiah threatened that NEBUCHADNEZZAR of Babylon would ravage Egypt’s temples with fire, and “break the obelisks of Heliopolis” (Jer. 43:13 NRSV).

Helkai hel’ki (חלקי H2758, short form of חלקיה H2760, “Yahweh is my portion” [see HILKIAH]). The head of a priestly house who returned from exile with ZERUBBABEL (Neh. 12:15).

Helkath hel’kath (חלקת H2762, “smooth place” or “plot of ground”). A town that served to mark the boundary of the tribal territory of ASHER (Josh. 19:25). It was one of four cities from this tribe that were assigned to the Levite family descended from GERSHON (21:31; called HUKOK in the parallel passage, 1 Chr. 6:75, probably a scribal mistake). It is first mentioned in the list of towns conquered by THUTMOSE III (c. 15th cent. B.C.). Its precise location is uncertain, but two possible identifications are Khirbet el-Harbaj, c. 12 mi. S of Acco, and Tell el-Qassis, some 5 mi. farther S and closer to the exit of the valley of ESDRAELON. (See further ABD, 3:125–26.)

Helkath Hazzurim hel'kath-haz'yoo-rim (הַצִּדִּים הַלְקָתִים H2763, perhaps “field of rocks [or flint knives],” but meaning debated). Also Helkath-hazzurim. A place near the pool of GIBEON where twelve men under JOAB fought to the death with an equal number from ABNER's forces (2 Sam. 2:16); the precise location is unknown. It is difficult to see why the area would have been called “field of rocks” as a result of this confrontation, and various changes to the text have been proposed (see ABD, 3:126–27).

Helkias hel-ki'uhs. KJV Apoc. form of HILKIAH (1 Esd. 1:8).

hell. This English word (from a Germanic root meaning “concealed place” or “underworld”) is used by the KJV in the OT to render Hebrew šə'ôl H8619 (Deut. 32:22 et al.; see SHEOL); in the NT it renders Greek hadēs G87 (Matt. 11:23 et al.; see HADES) and geenna G1147 (5:2 et al.; see GEHENNA). The NIV and other modern versions use it almost exclusively as a translation of geenna, which refers to the Valley of HINNOM (Wadi er-Rababi, just SW of JERUSALEM), the location of the notorious sacrificial offering by fire of children to the god MOLECH (2 Chr. 28:3; 33:6; cf. 2 Ki. 23:10; Jer. 7:32; 19:6). The apocalyptic book of 1 Enoch states that there would be an abyss filled with fire S of Jerusalem into which ungodly Israelites would be thrown. Later the idea was extended so that this place was conceived to be the scene of fiery punishment for all of the ungodly. Still later, when the place of punishment was conceived of as under the earth, the idea of fiery torment was maintained. (The English term occurs also as part of a phrase used to render tartaroō G5434, “to send to hell,” 2 Pet. 2:4. In Gk. mythology, Tartarus was the name of a deep abyss below Hades where the Titans were imprisoned, but in time the term became roughly equivalent to Hades.)

I. Intertestamental views. The teaching that there is a place where the ungodly are punished forever is scarcely mentioned in the OT. In the intertestamental period, however, this idea became prominent, although its acceptance by the rabbis was far from unanimous. According to the Apocryphal book of 2 Esdras (also known as 4 Ezra; see ESDRAS, SECOND), Ezra asks if the lost soul will be tortured immediately at death or not until the renewal of the creation, to which God answers: “as the spirit leaves the body...if it is one of those who have shown scorn and have not kept the way of the Most High...such spirit shall...wander about in torment, ever grieving and sad...they will consider the torment laid up for themselves in the last days” (2E sd. 7:7–84).

The pseudepigraphical book of 1 Enoch gives detailed descriptions of Gehenna as a place of punishment. The PHARISEES accepted this view: according to JOSEPHUS (War 2.8.14), they believed that “the souls of bad men are subject to eternal punishment.” Elsewhere he describes the position of the Pharisees by saying that the wicked “are to be detained in an everlasting prison.” In the time just prior to the NT period, the rabbinical school of Shammai divided all men into three groups: the righteous, the wicked who are “immediately written and sealed to Gehenna,” and a third group of people who “go down to Gehinnom and moan and come up again.” The school of HILLEL thought that the ungodly were punished in Gehenna for a year and then annihilated, although certain especially wicked men “go down to Gehinnom and are punished there to ages of ages.”

II. Teachings of Jesus. It should be noted that in the NT, geenna is used only in the synoptics (except for an occurrence in Jas. 3:6), and only by JESUS CHRIST. In other words, the knowledge of hell comes almost exclusively from the teachings of Christ, who spoke emphatically on the subject on a number of occasions.

(1) Jesus states that “anyone who says, ‘You fool!’ will be in danger of the fire of hell” (Matt. 5:22). In the context Jesus is saying that whereas the OT simply condemned murder, he has a higher demand, and the result is that expressions of anger toward one’s brother can lead to the most severe punishment.

(2) According to Jesus, the punishment of hell is so severe that it would be better for a person to lose an eye or a hand rather than that these members of the body should be instruments of sins that would lead to hell. Twice he speaks about the whole body being thrown into hell (Matt. 5:29–30).

(3) Without using the word Gehenna itself, Jesus is obviously speaking of the punishment of hell when he says that the tree that does not bear good fruit will be cut down and “thrown into the fire” (Matt. 7:19).

Some ancients believed that this cave at Caesarea Philippi (modern Pnias) was an entrance into the Underworld.

(4) Part of the punishment pronounced upon the ungodly is that they will be cast out from the presence of Christ (Matt. 7:23). It is noteworthy that all of the above references come from the SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

(5) The ultimate punishment resulting from apostasy will include being consigned “outside, into the darkness, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Matt. 8:12).

(6) Jesus states that God has the power to “destroy both soul and body in hell” (Matt. 10:28).

(7) In the parable of the tares, as well as in the parable of the nets, Jesus says that at the end of the age, sinners will be cast “into the fiery furnace, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Matt. 13:42, 50).

(8) The ultimate punishment inflicted upon sinners is described by Jesus as being much worse than death itself, for it would be better to be drowned than to be punished for causing a child to be led astray (Matt. 18:6). Jesus then adds that it would be better to lose a limb that was the source of sinful behavior than to “be thrown into eternal fire” or “the fire of hell” (vv. 8–9). The parallel speaks of going “into hell, where fire never goes out” (Mk. 9:43), and hell is further described as the place “where their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched” (9:48, citing Isa. 66:24).

(9) In the parable of the wedding feast, the punishment is again described as that of being “outside, into the darkness, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Matt. 22:13).

(10) Jesus condemns the Pharisees for making their converts “twice as much a child of hell as you are” (Matt. 23:15). A little later he warns that they will not be able to “escape being condemned to hell” (v. 33).

(11) In the parable of the talents, Jesus again alludes to outer darkness and to the weeping and gnashing of teeth (Matt. 25:30), while in the parable of the sheep and the goats, Jesus says to those whom he condemns, “Depart from me, you who are cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (25:41). Later in the same parable, Jesus describes their fate as “eternal punishment” (v. 46).

In several passages, Jesus implies that there will be degrees of punishment in hell. He speaks of hypocrites as those who will “receive the greater condemnation” (Mk. 12:40 NRSV); some “will be beaten with many blows,” whereas others who have a lesser knowledge of the master’s will, “with few blows” (Lk. 12:47–48). The certain conclusion from all of these passages is that Jesus taught the doctrine of hell clearly and emphatically. All but those who interpret Scripture with extreme literalism agree that this is figurative language used to describe hell, but the figures stand for the most terrible reality.

III. Writings of the apostles. As already noted, the word hell (Gehenna) occurs only once outside the synoptics (Jas. 3:6), but the idea of severe punishment in the world to come is taught in several passages. For example:

(1) PAUL speaks of the impending judgment of God, which will result in eternal life for those who do good, but “wrath and anger” for those who do wickedness. For the evildoer, “there will be trouble and distress” (Rom. 2:7–9).

(2) A person’s appearance before the JUDGMENT SEAT of Christ will result in receiving “good or evil” depending on the actions during this life (2 Cor. 5:10). Paul sees the danger of this terrible fate as an impelling force in his ministry (v. 11).

(3) At the return of Christ, those dwelling in complacency will experience sudden destruction, “and they will not escape” (1 Thess. 5:3).

(4) At the SECOND COMING, Jesus will be “revealed from heaven in blazing fire with his powerful angels. He will punish those who do not know God and do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus. They will be punished with everlasting destruction and shut out from the presence of the Lord and from the majesty of his power” (2 Thess. 1:7–9).

(5) The author of Hebrews speaks of “eternal judgment” as a fundamental of the faith (Heb. 6:2), and of the threat of punishment as “a fearful expectation of judgment and of raging fire that will consume the enemies of God” (10:27). He refers to it as “much worse punishment” (v. 29 NRSV) than the death that was administered to those who broke the law of Moses.

(6) JAMES speaks of the tongue as “set on fire by hell” (Jas. 3:6).

(7) In his second epistle, Peter writes about the angels who sinned and says that God “sent them to hell [Tartarus],” a place described as “gloomy dungeons” (2 Pet. 2:4). Later in the passage, God is described as knowing how “to hold the unrighteous for the day of judgment, while continuing their punishment” (v. 9). The ungodly are like brute beasts that will be “caught and destroyed” (v. 12). “Blackest darkness is reserved for them” (v. 17).

(8) In a similar passage in Jude, it is revealed that the fallen angels have been kept by God “in darkness, bound with everlasting chains for judgment on the great Day” (Jude 6). The inhabitants of SODOM and GOMORRAH “serve as an example of those who suffer the punishment of eternal fire” (v. 7).

(9) In the book of Revelation, an angel says of those who worship the beast that “the smoke of their torment rises forever and ever” (Rev. 14:11). The place of the wicked “will be in the fiery lake of burning sulfur. This is the second death” (21:8).

These scriptural references demonstrate that the apostles followed Christ in teaching that life issues in two possible destinies, eternal blessedness or the torment of hell. The NT writers are very reserved in their descriptions of hell, especially in comparison to the contemporary extrabiblical literature, but they are clear in teaching a judgment issuing in eternal punishment. (See PUNISHMENT, ETERNAL for a discussion of the claims that the Bible teaches annihilation or universalism.)

IV. The early church. In the period immediately after NT days, the doctrine of hell was clearly taught. Many of the martyrs of that period, considering hell to be the fate of those who denied the faith, were given courage to face martyrdom by the conviction that this was the easier of the two alternatives.

In the 2nd cent., the church fathers give evidence in their writings of their convictions on the subject. For example, IGNATIUS (died A.D. 110) says, “one so defiled will go into unquenchable fire” (Eph. 16.2). The Epistle of Barnabas (c. 130) mentions “the way of eternal death with punishment” (20.1). The Shepherd of Hermas (c. 140) states, “those who fell into the fire and were burned are those who have departed for ever from the living God” (Vis. 3.7.2).

JUSTIN MARTYR (c. 110–165) states, “we are fully convinced that each will suffer punishment by eternal fire, according to the demerit of his actions” (I Apol. 17.4). IRENAEUS (c. 135–200) uses the term “eternal fire” repeatedly. TERTULLIAN (c. 160–220) mentions “the greatness of the punishment which continueth, not for a long time, but forever.” He is the first of the church fathers who expresses joy at the spectacle of the lost in hell, an attitude not found in the Bible, but one that became common in the Middle Ages. The early Christian theologians gave unanimous testimony in favor of the belief in hell. It was not until ORIGEN (c. 185–254), who held a number of other unbiblical views as well, that a major church teacher denied this doctrine.

In conclusion, the doctrine of hell is a thoroughly biblical doctrine. Therefore it is not surprising that in the history of theology a denial of this doctrine has often accompanied weak views of biblical inspiration. The reaction against this doctrine has, however, been partly the fault of some of its adherents who have proclaimed it in crudely literalistic terms. Thoroughgoing conservatives such as Calvin, Hodge, Strong, and Schilder have recognized the symbolic nature of the biblical terms “worm,” “fire,” etc. Another cause of reaction against the doctrine has been the exultant glee or other unloving attitudes held by some who have proclaimed it, but this is not a part of the biblical doctrine.

The Bible does not give the physical location of hell or anything about its furnishings, but it assures readers that those whose sins are not atoned for by Jesus Christ will receive perfect justice from God, that they will receive exactly what they deserve for all eternity, which will be a most miserable fate. This ought to be one of the impelling motives making evangelism the urgent business of all Christians.

Hellenism (from “Ἑλλην G1818, “Greek”). The civilization and culture of ancient GREECE; especially, the dissemination and adoption of Greek thought, customs, and life style. It often implies the fusion of Greek and non-Greek culture. (Among classical scholars, the term Hellenistic is primarily a chronological designation, covering the period from Alexander to the beginnings of the Roman empire. In biblical scholarship, the term has a broader connotation and is roughly equivalent to Greco-Roman.)

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, who was taught by Aristotle, devoted his life to conquering the world for the spread of Greek culture. He was convinced of the superiority of the Greek way of life and carried with him on his campaigns copies of Homer’s Iliad and Odyssey. In the summer of 334 B.C. he entered ASIA MINOR, and by the autumn of 333 he was already entering SYRIA and had conquered the whole of Syria and PALESTINE, and then EGYPT by the winter of 332/331. In 331 the Persian empire was in his hands. He died in 323, and the empire came into the hands of his generals. His eleven years of conquest changed the course of history, introducing a new lifestyle that affected every nation conquered, even the Jewish nation. Alexander and his successors broke down the old national, political, cultural, and religious establishment and introduced Greek culture by establishing new colonies and cities, by rapidly spreading the Koine (see GREEK LANGUAGE), and by the intermarriages of the Greeks with the Asiatics.

According to JOSEPHUS, Alexander’s relationship to the Jews both in Palestine (Ant. 11.8.5 §§329–39) and in ALEXANDRIA (War 2.18.7 §§487–88; Apion 2.4 §35) was friendly. After Alexander’s death and until 198 B.C., the Jews were under the Ptolemaic influence (see PTOLEMY). During this time they were treated with consideration, particularly in Alexandria where the Ptolemies, trying to compete with ATHENS, encouraged scholars and writers from every nation to help them achieve their goal. The Ptolemies set up the largest library in the world, founded learned societies, and established schools to teach the Greek culture and language. It was this influence that led the Alexandrian Centaur wrestling with Lapith. Hellenistic culture focused on form, pleasure, and entertainment.

Jews in the 3rd cent. to translate the Bible into Greek (see SEPTUAGINT).

The Ptolemaic influence over Palestine ended in 198 B.C. with their defeat by the SELEUCID empire under ANTIOCHUS the Great. The Seleucids gained control of the selection of the high priesthood, which allowed some Hellenistic influence to penetrate. However, with the Seleucids trying to force their way of life, the Jews finally resisted this influence which finally led to the Maccabean War beginning in 168 (see MACCABEE). But only three decades later John Hyrcanus (see HAS-MONEAN II.A) made a pact with the Seleucids, and from then on one can see some influence of Hellenism in Palestine right down to the time of the Roman occupation in 63 B.C. This influence continued with the Roman and Herodian rulers. The entrenchment of Hellenism can more readily be seen among the Alexandrian Jews, especially among some of their philosophers such as PHILO JUDAEUS, who adopted the allegorical interpretation that led to the sacrificing of the truth in the OT on the altar of pagan philosophy.

Hellenistic influence is apparent early in the church's history (in Gk. literature, the term Hellēnistēs Gl821 occurs for the first time in Acts 6:1; 9:29; 11:20; in the last passage, some early witnesses have Hellēnas, i.e., Greeks or Gentiles). According to Acts 6:1, there was a dispute in the Christian community at JERUSALEM between the Hebrews and the Hellenists (KJV, "Grecians"; NIV, "Grecian Jews") because the widows of the Hellenistic group were being neglected in the daily allocation from the common pool of property. Some have thought that these Hellenists were non-Jews, but (1) the context of Acts 1–5 is the spread of the church among Jews in JUDEA; (2) the admission of Gentiles into the church marked a new phase that begins later (chs. 10–11); (3) the subsequent conflict of the church regarding the admission of the Gentiles without CIRCUMCISION (ch. 15) would have been pointless if the Gentiles were admitted in the church at its inception; and (4) the reference to Hellenists in 9:29 makes no sense if it means "Greeks," for Paul was not disputing with Gentiles in Jerusalem. Most scholars, therefore, believe that the passage refers to Jews who spoke Greek (in contrast to the "Hebrews," who spoke Hebrew or, more likely, Aramaic; for the various views, see H. J. Cadbury in BC 1/5 [1933], 59–74; C. F. D. Moule in ExpTim 70 [1958–59]: 100–102; I. H. Marshall in NTS 19 [1972–73]: 271–87; C. K. Barrett, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, ICC, 2 vols. [1991–96], 1:301–9).

These "Hellenists" were probably Jews from the DIASPORA who had returned to Palestine. (See PAUL; STEPHEN.) In the past, some scholars argued that such individuals had a liberal attitude to the adoption of Greco-Roman ways and that they would often have been in conflict with the stricter Jews native to Judea. Diaspora Jews, no doubt, were sometimes viewed with suspicion, but it is widely agreed now that the evidence does not support a sharp dichotomy between Hellenistic and "Hebraic" Jews with regard to their approach to the Mosaic law.

helmet. The head-protecting part of the soldier's ARMOR. The walls of Karnak in Egypt show HITTITES wearing helmets in the form of a skullcap. In the early history of Israel, probably only kings and prominent persons wore helmets. King SAUL's armor included a helmet of bronze (Heb. qôba' H7746, 1 Sam. 17:38), as did also that of GOLIATH (kôba' H3916, 17:5). The helmet was part of the equipment of foreign troops (Jer. 46:4; Ezek. 23:24; 27:10; 38:5). King UZZIAH provided his soldiers with helmets Assyrian helmet made of iron with bronze inlay around the rim. From a palace in Nimrud (8th cent. B.C.).

(2 Chr. 26:14). The helmet worn by Assyrian and Babylonian soldiers was pointed, in contrast to the Syrian-Hittite helmet. Roman soldiers wore helmets with a crest. Helmets were usually made of leather; only in the SELEUCID period was the ordinary soldier supplied with brass helmets (1 Macc. 6:35). In the OT, the Lord is represented as wearing a helmet of salvation (Isa. 59:17); and PAUL in the NT says that the armor of the Christian too includes the helmet that symbolizes the hope of salvation (Gk. perikeph-alaia G4330, Eph. 6:17; 1 Thess. 5:8).

S. BARABAS

Helon hee'lon (הֶלֶן H2735, "strong"). Father of ELIAB; the latter was a leader of the tribe of ZEBULUN at the time of MOSES (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24, 29; 10:16).

helpmeet. This English term, meaning "helpmate," does not occur in the Bible, but apparently arose from a misunderstanding of the words, "I will make him an help meet [i.e., a helper suitable] for him"

(Gen. 2:18, 20 KJV). See ADAM; EVE.

helps. Aside from its occurrence in Acts 27:17 (Gk. boētheia G1069, “help, support”), the English plural helps is used by the KJV to render the plural of Greek antilēmpsis G516, which is found only in 1 Cor. 12:28, listed among the SPIRITUAL GIFTS God gives to the church. The RSV translates the word as “helpers,” but it is questionable whether this rendering, which understands the word as a personal noun, can be justified (“helper” would be rather the translation of antilēptōr, LXX antilēptōr). The word is really an abstract noun, has reference to that which the helper does, and hence should be translated “helpful deeds,” “acts of aid,” or “succor” (cf. NRSV, “forms of assistance”).

Similarly, the other four items mentioned in the second part of this list refer to gifts and not to separate offices. Only the first three in this list of eight items are clearly officers: apostles, prophets, and teachers. The rest of the list refers to charismatic gifts that may be possessed by various officers. A Christian may hold one office and have many special gifts that he exercises in the one office. (Both the RSV and the NIV render all eight terms in personal fashion, apparently assuming that the gifts should be taken, by metonymy, as references to those who possess the gifts.) Although “helps” does not refer to a separate office, it is commonly believed that it does refer to gifts expressed more particularly in the work of deacons, while “administrations” (kybernēseis) refers to the gifts of elders in their ruling functions. See DEACON; ELDER (NT). However, Paul admonished the Ephesian elders to “help [antilambanō G514] the weak” (Acts 20:35), and he directed a similar exhortation to Christians in general (1 Thess. 5:14). (See J. Bannerman, The Church of Christ [1869], 2:229–30; TDNT, 1:375–76.)

hem (of a garment). The part of the outer garment that would hang down loosely. It could be on the outer upper garment or on the lower one. The Hebrews were instructed to wear tassels on the four corners of the outer garment as a constant reminder of the commandments (Num. 15:38–39; Deut. 22:12; see FRINGE). AARON’S robe was to have golden bells and pomegranates on its hem (Heb. šûl H8767, Exod. 28:33–34; 39:24–26). Jesus criticized the PHARISEES for their false display of piety by lengthening the TASSELS (Gk. kraspedon G3192, “edge, border, hem”) on their garments (Matt. 23:5). However, the hem or fringe of Jesus’ garment plays an important role with the hemorrhaging woman who believed that she would be healed if she could but touch the hem of his cloak; Jesus responded to her faith and granted her request (Lk. 8:43–48).

Hemam hee’muhn (הִמָּם H2123). Son of the clan chief Lotan and grandson of SEIR the Horite (Gen. 36:22 KJV). The NIV reads HOMAM on the basis of the parallel passage (1 Chr. 1:39), whereas the NRSV renders it HEMAN.

Heman hee’muhn (הִמָּן H2124). (1) Son of the clan chief LOTAN and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:22 NRSV, following the LXX reading, Aiman). The KJV follows the MT, HEMAM, whereas the NIV has HOMAM (1 Chr. 1:39).

(2) Son (or descendant) of ZERAH and grandson (or more distant descendant) of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:6). He is also listed as one of “the sons of Mahol” (meaning perhaps “members of the musical guild”) who were regarded as wise men (1 Ki. 4:31). See DARDA; ETHAN; MAHOL.

(3) Son of Joel and grandson of SAMUEL; a Kohathite prophet-musician (see KOHATH) whom DAVID appointed to lead in the musical services (1 Chr. 6:33; 2 Chr. 5:12). He is usually mentioned along with ASAPH and ETHAN (JEDUTHUN): they were responsible for sounding the trumpets, the bronze cymbals, and other instruments (1 Chr. 15:17, 19; 16:41–42); and some of their sons were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals” (25:1). Heman, also called “the king’s seer,” had fourteen sons and three daughters, divinely given to him “through the promises of God to exalt him” (25:4–6). The names of several of his sons are unexampled elsewhere, and some scholars have attempted to interpret the last nine as a liturgical prayer (see J. M. Myers, 1 Chronicles, AB 12 [1965], 172–73); it may be that the names were derived from the openings (or other significant phrases) in individual psalms. Heman’s descendants served during the reign of HEZEKIAH and JOSIAH (2 Chr. 29:14; 35:15).

Hemath hee’math. KJV alternate form of HAMATH (1 Chr. 13:5; Amos 6:14) and HAMMATH (1 Chr. 2:55).

Hemdan hem’dan (חַמְדָּן H2777, possibly “desirable”). Son of the clan chief DISHON and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:26; also 1 Chr. 1:41 NIV [following a significant number of Heb. and Gk. MSS], where KJV has “Amram” and NRSV “Hamran” [MT, ḥamrān]).

hemlock. This English term can refer to any of various coniferous evergreens as well as to certain poisonous plants (genera Conium and Cicuta). It is used by the KJV in two figurative passages to render Hebrew rōš H8032 (Hos. 10:4; NIV and NRSV, “poisonous weeds”) and la’ānā H4360 (Amos 6:12; NIV, “bitterness”; NRSV, “wormwood”). According to some scholars, the first term does refer to the poison hemlock (Conium maculatum), which grows throughout Palestine (see FFB, 167–68). See also GALL; POISON; WORMWOOD.

hemorrhage. Bleeding or the flow of blood from a break in continuity of a blood vessel whether from injury or frailty of the blood vessel walls. The woman having an issue of blood twelve years (Lk. 8:43–44) probably had recurrent severe hemorrhage in connection with her menstrual flow because of a fibroid tumor in the womb, a condition readily treated today by surgery (cf. A. R. Short, The Bible and Modern Medicine [1953], 30–31). For further discussion, see DISEASE.

P. E. ADOLPH

hen. The female of the domestic fowl (Matt. 23:27; Lk. 13:34; see CHICKEN; ROOSTER) or of various other birds. The NRSV uses WATER HEN as the rendering of tinšemet H9492 (Lev. 11:18; Deut. 14:16 [NIV, “white owl”]; see OWL).

Hen (person) hen (חֵן H2835, “gracious”). Son of a certain Zephaniah; he was one of several men to whom was given the crown that was made for joshua (JESHUA) the high priest (Zech. 6:14; NRSV, “Josiah”). Hen was apparently another name, or perhaps a descriptive title (cf. NIV mg.) for Josiah son of Zephaniah; if so, it was in his house that the crown was made (v. 10).

Hena hen'uh (הנע H2184, meaning uncertain). One of several Syrian city-states vanquished by SENNACHERIB (2 Ki. 18:34; 19:13; Isa. 37:13). The commander of the Assyrian forces, seeking to shake HEZEKIAH's confidence in the Lord, claimed that the gods and kings of those cities were powerless before Sennacherib. Because Hena is listed along with HAMATH and ARPAD (also SEPHARVAIM and IVVAH), it is thought to have been located in N SYRIA; one possible identification is modern <sup>1</sup>Anah (Anat) on the EUPHRATES in Iraq, but that location may be too far E (41.5° E longitude). Some scholars, noticing that Hena and Ivvah are not mentioned in similar lists (2 Ki. 17:24; Isa. 36:19), and suspecting that they are not true geographical names, have suggested that they are pagan deities, or that the text is corrupt, or that the words should be rendered, "he has taken away and overthrown" (see ABD, 3:137–38).

Henadad hen'uh-dad (חנדר H2836, "favor of [the god] HADAD"). Father or ancestor of a family of priests who helped rebuild the temple under ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 3:9), assisted in repairing the wall of JERUSALEM in the time of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:18, 24), and signed the covenant (10:9).

henna. A small tree (Lawsonia inermis, called the Egyptian privet in some quarters), common in Palestine, having privet-like leaves and masses of white or pink scented flowers that grow in clusters. The term is used twice figuratively in SONG OF SOLOMON to describe the bride (Heb. kōper H4110, Cant. 1:14; 4:13 [KJV, "camphire"]; cf. also 7:12 NIV mg.). The leaves of the henna, when dried and powdered, can be made into a paste that was used in the E for dyeing the toenails, fingernails, and even the soles of the feet and palms of the hands. Men colored their beards with henna and used it also to groom their horses' tails. It was a cosmetic dye much used in EGYPT at the time of MOSES. (Cf. FFB, 127–28.) See FLORA (under Lithraceae).

W. E. SHEWELL-COOPER

Henoch hee'nuhk. KJV alternate form of ENOCH (1 Chr. 1:3) and HANOCH (1:33).

Hepher (person) hee'fuhr (חפר H2918, possibly "protector"; gentilic חפר' H2920, "Hepherite"). (1) Son of GILEAD, descendant of MANASSEH, father of ZELOPHEHAD, and ancestor of the Hepherite clan (Num. 26:32; 27:1; Josh. 17:2–3). His clan may be associated with HEPHER (PLACE).

(2) Son of ASHHUR (apparently founder of the town of TEKOA) by his wife Naarah; included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:6).

(3) A MEKERATHITE, included among DAVID's mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:36; his name is missing in the parallel list in 2 Sam. 23).

Hepher (place) hee'fuhr (חפר H2919, possibly "protector" or "[water] hole"). A Canaanite royal city whose king was defeated by JOSHUA (Josh. 12:17). Presumably, it was part of the "land of Hepher," which became the third administrative district under BEN-HESED in the time of SOLOMON (1 Ki. 4:10). Possible identifications are el-Ifshar (c. 25 mi. NNE of JOPPA and only 3 mi. from the coast) and Tell el-Muhaffar in the hill country of MANASSEH (c. 2 mi. NW of DOTHAN and 11 mi. SSE of MEGIDDO). The latter view has been proposed by A. Zertal (see ABD, 3:138–39), who suggests that "the land of Hepher" was approximately defined by the territory belonging to the daughters of ZELOPHEHAD (Num. 27:1–11).

Hephzibah hef'zi-buh (חֶפְצִיבָּה H2915, “my delight is in her”). (1) Wife of King HEZEKIAH and mother of King MANASSEH (2 Ki. 21:1).

(2) Symbolic name of ZION (Isa. 62:4; the NRSV translates the name, “My Delight Is in Her”). See BEULAH for a brief discussion of the passage.

Heptapegon (Ἑπταπηγών, “Seven Fountains”). This name, first attested in the Middle Ages, is applied to an area with several springs about 2 mi. SW of CAPERNAUM. Known today as (Ain eṭ-Ṭabgha (in Heb., (En Sheba<sup>(1)</sup>), the place was apparently referred to as Capernaum in the time of JOSEPHUS (War 3.10.8), no doubt because of its close connection with the town. (See ABD, 3:139–41; NEAEHL, 2:614–16.)

Herakles her'uh-kleez. Greek name of HERCULES.

herald. A MESSENGER who proclaims important news. The term is used occasionally in Bible versions to render such words as Aramaic kārôz H10370 (Dan. 3:4) and Greek kēryx G3061 (1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11; this term is often translated “preacher” in 2 Pet. 2:5). In two passages (Isa. 40:9; 41:27), the NRSV uses “herald of good tidings” to render the piel participle of Hebrew bāšar H1413 (see GOSPEL). A herald was usually a representative of a royal or government official having as his specific responsibility the bearing of a message. The message and whom he represented was his primary concern, and he was to remain secondary. See also PREACHING.

herb. This term in English refers to plants that have fragile stems (and thus usually die at the end of the growing season) or to aromatic plants used for seasoning and medicinal purposes. The word occurs frequently in the KJV with reference to vegetation generally (e.g., to render Heb. ēšeb H6912, Gen. 1:11–12 et al.), but modern versions use it sparingly, for example, with reference to the light plants gathered by a member of the company of the prophets to add flavor to the stew (Heb. ôrâ H246, 2 Ki. 4:39), and to the garden plants that the PHARISEES tithed (lachanon G3303, Lk. 11:42; this Gk. term occurs also in Matt. 13:32; Mk. 4:32; Rom. 14:2). See FLORA.

Hercules huhr'kyuh-leez'. Roman name for Her-akles (Hēraklēs), son of ZEUS by a mortal woman and the most popular of mythological Greek heroes. The name occurs in one passage in the APOCRYPHA (2 Macc. 4:18–20) in connection with the attempts of ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes (176–164 B.C.) to impose Hellenistic culture in Judea. See MACCABEE. JASON, who had changed his Hebrew name Joshua to this Greek form, was able to seize the high priesthood in JERUSALEM from his brother ONIAS III in 175 by allying himself to Antiochus. To further the hellenization of the city, Jason obtained the authority to form a Greek city-state within Jerusalem; here he also established a GYMNASIUM, which led to the weakening of Jewish life. See HELLENISM.

Once every four years games were held in TYRE in honor of Hercules, who was linked with the Phoenician god Melqart (Gk. pentaetērikos in this passage literally means “quinquennial, every five years,” which reflects an inclusive method of reckoning time). Jason sent “envoys, chosen as being Antiochian citizens from Jerusalem,” to represent the city and to bear silver for the sacrifice of Hercules. However, those who were bearing the tribute felt that this was an evil use of the money, so they spent it instead on shipbuilding. The story highlights Jewish resistant to Jason’s Hellenistic reforms.

Some scholars, pointing out similarities between the legends regarding Herakles/Hercules and events in the life of Jesus, have argued that the Gospels may have derived from a document influenced by a Hellenistic life of the Greek hero. Others have suggested a less direct influence of “Herakles imagery” on the NT, especially the letter to the Hebrews (see D. E. Aune in Greeks, Romans, and Christians: Essays in Honor of Abraham J. Malherbe, ed. D. L. Balch et al. [1990], 3–19; note also his article in DDD, 765–71).

herd. See CATTLE; SHEEP.

herdsman. KJV, “herdman.” This English term is used a few times in Bible versions as the rendering of Hebrew rōʿeh (ptc. of rāʿ; â H8286, Gen. 26:20 et al.), a term usually translated “shepherd” (the KJV uses “herdman” also to render other Heb. terms in Amos 1:1; 7:14). The frequent biblical references to keepers of livestock emphasize the important agricultural basis of the Palestinian economy. The herdsman’s responsibility in tending his flocks was (1) to guide them to fertile areas, (2) to make sure the flocks could get to water, and (3) to protect them from wild beasts and robbers. See SHEPHERD.

G. GIACUMAKIS, JR.

Heres hihr’iz (הֶרֶס H3065, possibly “sunny”). (1) “Mount Heres” (NRSV, “Har-heres”) is mentioned, along with AIJALON and SHAALBIM, as one of the places from which the tribe of DAN could not drive out the AMORITES (Jdg. 1:34–35). It is usually identified with the town of IR SHEMESH (“city of the sun,” Josh. 19:41; cf. Shaalabbin and Aijalon in v. 42), which in turn is probably the same as BETH SHEMESH (“house of the sun,” Josh. 15:10 et al.), on the boundary between Judah and Dan. However, it would be unusual to call a village a har H2215 (“mountain”), and some scholars prefer to identify it with a mountain range on the eastern side of the valley of Aijalon, 2 or 3 mi. SE of modern Yalo (see ABD, s.v. Har-heres, 3:56–57).

(2) The “Pass [or Ascent] of Heres” was apparently a place E of the Jordan from which GIDEON returned after defeating two kings of MIDIAN (Jdg. 8:13). The text can be interpreted differently, however (KJV translates, “before the sun was up”). If it is indeed a geographical reference, the site is unknown.

See also DESTRUCTION, CITY OF; SUN, CITY OF THE; TIMNATH HERES.

Heresh hihr’ish (חֶרֶשׁ H3090, “silent, mute”). A Levite, listed among those who returned from the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:15; his name is omitted in the parallel, Neh. 11:15).

heresy. This English term is derived (through French and Latin) from Greek hairesis G146, which meant “a taking” or “choice,” hence “opinion, way of thinking.” In the Hellenistic period it came to mean “[political] preference,” then “system, sect, faction.” Not till the 2nd cent. A.D. did the word come to mean specifically a position or doctrine at variance with established, orthodox church doctrine (though this was a natural development from negative uses in the NT).

In the book of Acts, the word is applied to the religious “parties” of the SADDUCEES and PHARISEES (Acts 5:17; 15:5). PAUL was accused of being “a ringleader of the Nazarene sect” (Acts 24:5; cf. 24:14; 28:22). A negative element is more apparent when the apostle speaks about the “factions” present in the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 11:19 NRSV; NIV, “differences”), for in the same context he uses the stronger term schisma G5388, “division, split” (vv. 10, 18). Elsewhere he includes the word hairesis in his list of the works of the flesh (Gal. 5:20, mentioned between “dissensions” and “envy”). The NT use closest to the later technical, theological meaning is found in 2 Pet. 2:1, which states that false teachers “will secretly introduce destructive heresies, even denying the sovereign Lord who bought them—bringing swift destruction on themselves.” This language implies willful departure from accepted teaching.

Even in this last reference, the negative element is borne primarily by the adjective “destructive” as well as the broader context, so the noun could be rendered simply “opinions” (so NRSV). Nevertheless, such a use leads to a semantic change whereby the term by itself indicates “wrong opinion, false teaching,” as in the letters of IGNATIUS (e.g., “you all live according to truth, and no heresy dwells in you,” Eph. 6.2; cf. Thral. 6.1). The term is used with this technical sense by other 2nd-cent. writers (Herm. Sim. 9.22.4; Justin, 1 Apol. 26.8 et al.). Indeed, “within Christianity hairesis always denotes hostile societies” (TDNT, 1:183). (Cf. M. Simon, “From Greek Hairesis to Christian Heresy,” in Early Christian Literature and the Classical Greek Intellectual Tradition: In Honorem Robert M. Grant, ed. W. R. Schoedel and R. L. Wilken [1979], 101–16; on the relationship between Judaism and early Christianity regarding the notion of heresy, see D. Boyarin, Border Lines: The Partition of Judaeo-Christianity Divinations: Rereading Late Antique Religion [2004].)

The church had to deal with heresy from the earliest times. Error crept into the church as it grew and larger numbers of believers attempted to understand and express their faith. Error which developed into a conscious resolute position necessitated that the church address it. Heresy thus contributed to the formation of orthodox doctrine as the defenders of the faith denounced the error and attempted to define TRUTH, or at least the limits of doctrinal truth if not the precise meaning of the truth. As the church addressed heresies like GNOSTICISM, Montanism, Monarchianism, Arianism, and others, it was forced to define the doctrine of the TRINITY. Thus doctrinal formulation came as a corrective to error.

According to some scholars, it is misleading to speak of “orthodoxy” and “heresy” in the early stages of Christianity. In an influential work published first in 1934, Walter Bauer argued that the church was at that time characterized by great diversity and that there was no unified and established norm that could help define particular movements as heretical (the 2nd ed. of his work was translated as Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, ed. R. A. Kraft and G. Krodel [1971]). It is certainly true that we should not transfer back to the 1st and 2nd centuries the notion of an explicitly institutionalized church with well-defined theological norms; any assessment of Christianity during that period must take fully into account its variegated character and fuzzy boundaries. It would be an even greater mistake, however, to infer that the Christian communities were unconcerned about the distinction between truth and error or that no central theological commitments united the church against unacceptable teachings.

Hereth hihr’ith (חרת H3101). KJV Hareth. The name of a forest in the tribal territory of JUDAH where DAVID hid after he left his parents in MOAB for their safety (1 Sam. 22:5). Its location is unknown, though some scholars have suggested the site of Kharas because it is near KEILAH (some 18 mi. SW of Jerusalem), which was the scene of a confrontation between David and the PHILISTINES a short time later (23:1–5).

heritage. See INHERITANCE.

Hermas huhr’muhs (Ἑρμᾶς G2254). One of several Christians in Rome that PAUL greets by name in his letter to the church there (Rom. 16:14b; note that the KJV, following the TR, reverses the names “Hermas” and “Hermes”). It was thought by some in the ancient church that he was the author of Shepherd of Hermas; this work, however, was probably composed over a period of time in the 2nd cent. (see next entry). The name is possibly a short form of Hermodōros (cf. BDF §125.1), but see also HERMES (PERSON).

Hermas, Shepherd of huhr’muhs (Ἑρμᾶς G2254). A noncanonical APOCALYPTIC writing of the early church; it is the longest of all the books included among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS, and considerably longer than any book of the NT. It was apparently considered an inspired book by many early Christians, including IRENAEUS, ORIGEN, and also TERTULLIAN in his earlier years.

I. Author. The author called himself Hermas. His style indicates either Jewish origin or acquaintance with Jewish literature. He was, or had been, a slave, and was not brought up by his parents. He was married. A revelation indicated that his wife was too careless in her speech (Vis. 2.2.3). His children were apparently, at best, undisciplined. He had a country farm that he worked, but he was obviously not a man of great ability or talent.

II. Date and place of origin. Hermas placed at least part of his life at Rome, and some of his early visions occurred on the road to Cumae, an ancient Greek town about 12 mi. NW of Naples. The work has, then, a central Italian background.

Hermas was instructed to write some of the words revealed to him in two little books and to give one to Clement and one to Grapte (Vis. 2.4.3). Clement was to send his book to the foreign cities, since that was his function. Presumably the reference is to the author of the first epistle of Clement, an officer of the church at Rome, considered by later writers from Irenaeus on to have been in the succession of Roman bishops, though not in a modern sense of the term. See CLEMENTS, EPISTLES OF. Since Clement lived in Rome c. 88–97, it is probable that the early part of the Shepherd was written at some time during that period. On the other hand, the MURA-TORIAN CANON (c. A.D. 200) reads: “very recently, in our own times, in the city of Rome, Hermas wrote the Shepherd, when his brother Pius, the bishop, sat upon the chair of the city of Rome.” This gives an impression of being trustworthy. Pius was a bishop in the decade beginning with the year 140. These indications are not necessarily contradictory. The Shepherd may well have been written in parts over a considerable period of time, which seems more likely because of its content, style, and organization.

III. Content. The Shepherd is almost exclusively concerned with Christian living. Its purpose was to set forth in detail the Christian virtues, that is, to indicate how the Christian should live and what he should avoid. A particular issue, referred to more than once, is the problem of sins committed after baptism. Can they be forgiven? The generally held view of sin in the 2nd cent. was so far removed from that presented in Scripture that it was commonly believed that Christians did not, ideally, sin at all after baptism. However, it was obvious that some did. Could they be granted forgiveness if they repented? Hermas reverted to this theme again and again. In general, his answer was that God was graciously granting an opportunity for repentance and forgiveness at the time at which Hermas was writing. But there would be no such opportunities in the future. This would be the last occasion that the grace of God might be expected in such an instance.

The book is divided into three sections: five Visions, twelve Mandates (commands), and ten Similitudes (parables). The first two are approximately of equal length, the third is much longer.

The Visions concerned the church. The basic form in which the church appeared is that of a tower in process of construction. Explanations were given by an old lady who also personified the church. The first woman to appear in the visions was Rhoda, who was Hermas’s owner when he was a slave. Then came the old woman who personified the church. The tower, which is the church, was being built of stones, representing people. The officers—apostles, bishops, deacons, teachers—fitted easily. So did martyrs and the upright. Unbelievers and apostates were the stones that were cast away. There were seven women around the tower. They were daughters who represented the virtues of faith, continence, simplicity, knowledge, innocence, reverence, and love. The old woman, the church, appeared first as old, then as middle aged, and finally, as young and beautiful as the faith of Hermas became stronger. The fourth vision is devoted to the great beast of persecution. The world was to be destroyed by blood and fire. The fifth, which is called a revelation rather than a vision in the oldest MS, introduced the shepherd who was to give Hermas the commandments and parables. At the end of the vision he was called the angel of repentance.

The Mandates were not organized according to any discernible plan or developing sequence. The unity of God was stressed in the first, the seventh exhorted concerning the fear of God, and warnings against grieving the Holy Spirit were mentioned in the tenth. The ethical principles of simplicity, reverence, and innocence were commended in the second, patience in the fifth, joy in the tenth. Christian conduct was discussed by the command in the third mandate to tell the truth; in the fourth, to reject adultery and fornication; and in the eighth, to be temperate in all living. Faith, an undivided heart, and the rejection of evil desire were commended in the sixth, ninth, and twelfth commandments. The section came toward its close with the warning that if the commandments were not kept, salvation would be lost. On the other hand, resolution will make it easy to keep them.

The Similitudes are not a brilliant collection. They consist of exhortations containing similes and metaphors and an occasional full-story parable. The city in heaven and the city on earth were compared. The rich man is like a prolific vine that needs the support of the poor man, the elm tree, to be most useful. Budding trees are the righteous, dry trees the wicked. There is an elaborate parable of the willow tree as the law of God, with the distribution of branches from it to Christians and their varied development. There is a shepherd of luxury, clothed in yellow, and a shepherd of punishment, clothed in a white goatskin. The most extensive parable is the ninth, concerning the twelve mountains in Arcadia. They differed in color, formation, and vegetation, and represented different types of persons from good bishops and hospitable men on the one hand to apostates and blasphemers on the other. The figure of the tower, as the church, appeared again, being constructed in stages.

IV. Theology. Hermas was not a theologian. His theological statements are confused. In the parable of the field, the master, the son, and the servant (Sim. 5), the field is the world and the servant is said to be the Son of God (5.5.2), leaving the Son unexplained. The Holy Spirit is said to dwell in flesh and the flesh is made the Spirit's companion (5.6.6). Later, we are told that the Holy Spirit is the Son of God (9.1.1). Baptism is presented as necessary for salvation; the apostles baptized those who had died before them that they might be saved (9.16.5).

V. Ethics. The tone of the Shepherd is that of ASCETICISM in general, though not to the strictest degree. The twelve maidens in Arcadia were faith, temperance, power, longsuffering, simplicity, guilelessness, holiness, joy, truth, understanding, concord, and love (Sim. 9.15.2). A second marriage after the death of a partner was permissible but is not as virtuous as remaining unmarried (Mand. 4.4). Works beyond the commandments of God were possible and made one "more honorable with God" than one was "destined to be" (Sim. 5.3.3).

VI. Text. The Shepherd was written in Greek, but there is no complete Greek text available. CODEX SINAITICUS contains the text as far as Mand. 4.3.6. A 15th-cent. MS from Mount Athos contains most of the rest, and other incomplete texts on papyrus or parchment exist. There are two Latin and one Ethiopic versions, as well as fragments in Coptic and Persian.

hermeneutics. See INTERPRETATION.

Hermes (deity) huhr'meez (Ἑρμῆς G2258). In Greek mythology, the son of ZEUS and Maia (a Titan nymph), known among the Romans as Mercury. He was thought of as the spirit of the herma (“support, cairn, stone heap”), set up as a guidepost or boundary, though it is now questioned whether the connection between the god and the cairn was original. The herm (or herma) developed into a four-cornered pillar, with a bust of the god on top and a phallus on the front. Diverse ideas were associated with him: he was ingenious, having invented the lyre the day he was born; he guided souls from earth to HADES; he became the patron of merchants, travelers, and even robbers; he was the giver of good luck, fertility, and cunning.

Hermes was best known, however, as the messenger of the gods; he was often represented with traveler's cap, winged sandals, and herald's staff. Preferring persuasion to violence, he could be viewed as the god of oratory (the term hermeneutics is derived from his name; see INTERPRETATION). It is this role that prompted the people of LYSTRA to identify

This marble statue of Hermes, the protector of travelers, was used as a sacred mile stone on the roads. Roman copy of a work by the famous Greek sculptor Alkamenes (5th cent. B.C.).

PAUL, being “the chief speaker,” with Hermes (Acts 14:12; KJV, “Mercurius”), while BARNABAS was identified with Zeus. Such a response may have as its background the story of an aged couple who lived in that general region and who entertained Jupiter and Mercury without realizing who they were (Ovid, Metamorphoses 8.620–724; cf. further F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles: The Greek Text with Introduction and Commentary, 3rd ed. [1990], 321–22; for a broader discussion, see DDD, 771–83). See also GREEK RELIGION; on Hermes Trismegistus, see HERMETIC WRITINGS.

Hermes (person) huhr'meez (Ἑρμῆς G2258). One of several Christians in Rome that PAUL greets by name in his letter to the church there (Rom. 16:14a; note that the KJV, following the TR, reverses the names “Hermas” and “Hermes”). This was a common name, especially among slaves, probably because Hermes was the god of good fortune (but see BDF §125.1). It has been suggested that possibly all five men mentioned in this verse were, or had been, slaves. One of them was named HERMAS, which may be a variant of Hermes (see C. K. Barrett, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, ICC, 2 vols. [1975–79], 2:795).

Hermetic writings. A collection of religious and philosophical tractates, the main body of which is known as the Corpus Hermeticum (or simply Her-metica), probably dating around the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. The title of the literature is derived from the name Hermes Trismegistus (Gk. trismegistos, “thrice greatest”). See HERMES (DEITY). The Greek messenger of the gods had much earlier been identified with the Egyptian god Thoth, whom the Egyptians sometimes referred to as “very great-great” (see W. Scott, Hermetica: The Ancient Greek and Latin Writings which Contain Religious or Philosophic Teachings Ascribed to Hermes Trismegistos, 4 vols. [1924–1936], 1:4–5). The literature, which probably originated in Egypt though written in Greek, was a typical product of Hellenistic syncretism. “Hermes” thus became a suitable appellation for the figure who revealed the secrets pertaining to man’s divine origin and salvation. Affinities are evident with Platonic thought, the STOICS, PHILO JUDAEUS, GNOSTICISM, the Gospel of John (with notable contrasts; see JOHN, GOSPEL OF IV.C) and the OT, on which it is, in part, dependent.

The extant material is in various forms, ranging from the discourses and dialogues of the main corpus of eighteen works to a number of fragments, some of which are in the Gnostic library of Chenoboskion (the so-called NAG HAMMADI texts; see ASCLEPIUS #2). The best-known treatise is the Poimandres, the first in the corpus; another significant text is entitled Peripalingenesias (“Concerning Regeneration”).

The meaning of the name Poimandres may be “Shepherd of Man” (cf. H. Jonas, The Gnostic Religion, 2nd ed. [1963], 147–73) or “the knowledge of the Sun-God” (cf. Scott, Hermetica, 2:15–16). The latter suits the dominant theme, held in common with Gnosticism, of religion as true KNOWLEDGE. Poimandres is the spirit being who provides the information, recorded in the first tractate, on the origin of the world, the fall of man, and his restoration through knowledge. The SEPTUAGINT of Genesis is reproduced in several details, but in a totally different COSMOGONY. This cosmogony involves the successive generation of intermediary beings, which include Light (identified with Nous/ Mind), the Word or Son of God, and the Demiurge, who created the world. Through desire, man, the child of God, became mortal, but through gnosis (knowledge) his soul may pass through the spheres to the godhead. This restoration is described in Peri palingenesias as a rebirth, during which the soul is cleansed from the things, characteristic of life in the material world, which were punishing him: lust, ignorance, wrath, etc. Each of these is countered by an appropriate “power” from God, who is Light and Life.

Following the conclusions of C. H. Dodd (The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel [1955], 10–55 et passim) and others, it may be affirmed that the affinities with Christian thought forms, particularly those of John, need not imply dependence in either direction. The basic data of the Christian gospel concerning the atoning work of Christ are conspicuously lacking.

Hermogenes huhr-moj'uh-nee-z (Ἑρμογένης G2259, “born of HERMES”). Named with Phygelus as among the disciples in proconsular ASIA who abandoned PAUL when he rightly expected their support (2 Tim. 1:15). Some view it as a doctrinal defection; others as a refusal to testify in Paul’s behalf during the second imprisonment at Rome for fear of sharing Paul’s fate. The language used (“deserted me”) suggests that “the defection was from Paul personally, not necessarily from the faith...but in the light of the preceding verses it may well have included a rejection of Paul’s version of Christian teaching” (I. H. Marshall and P. H. Towner, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles, ICC [1999], 717; see also W. Hendriksen, New Testament Commentary: The Pastoral Epistles [1957], 238–40). Hermogenes and the others stand in sharp contrast to ONESIPHORUS (v. 16). In the Acts of Paul and Thecla, DEMAS and Hermogenes are named as Paul’s companions, “full of hypocrisy,” when he fled to Iconium (see NTAp, 2:239).

Hermon huhr'muhn (הרמון H3056, possibly “place of consecration [or of the BAN]”). The S spur of the ANTILEBANON chain of mountains, which runs parallel to the Lebanon range and is separated from it by the valley of BEQA<sup>1</sup>. It is c. 9,200 ft. above sea level, the highest mountain in Syria. It can be seen from many places in PALESTINE, even from as far away as the DEAD SEA. Because snow covers it for much of the year, the Arabs call it the “gray-haired mountain” or the “mountain of the snow.” The water from its melting snows flow into the rivers of N HAURAN and provide the principal source for the JORDAN River. Below the snow, the sides are covered with trees (pine, oak, and poplar) and with vineyards. Its forests contain wolves and leopards, and sometimes Syrian bears. It is not a high summit with a distinctly marked base, but a whole cluster of mountains. Its three summits are nearly equal in height and are the same distance from each other. It extends 16–20 mi. from N to S.

According to Deut. 3:9, the people of SIDON referred to Hermon as SIRION (a name that occurs elsewhere only in Ps. 29:6, but see Deut. 4:48 NRSV), whereas the AMORITES called it SENIR (1 Chr. 5:23 [which perhaps differentiates Senir, Hermon, and BAAL HERMON as three distinct peaks]; Cant. 4:8 [differentiating Senir and Hermon]; Ezek. 27:5 [the builders of TYRE made use of the pine trees from Senir]). In a textually uncertain passage, Hermon is called Mount SIYON (Deut. 4:48; KJV, “Sion”; NRSV [following the Syriac version], “Sirion”).

Mount Hermon was the N boundary of the Amorite kingdom (Deut. 3:8; 4:48), and thus is said to lie in the territory of OG (Josh. 12:5; 13:11). It was the N limit of the conquests of JOSHUA (Josh. 11:17; 12:1; 13:5), and the N limit of the half-tribe of MANASSEH. The HITTITES dwelt at the foot of Hermon in the land of MIZPEH (Josh. 11:3). It is mentioned in the Bible as the N boundary of the Promised Land (Deut. 3:8). In ancient times it was regarded as a sacred mountain, as its Hebrew name suggests; the alternate (or at least associated) name Baal Hermon (Jdg. 3:3) suggests that BAAL was worshiped there. Remains of shrines are found on the highest summit. It is thought by some scholars that the TRANSFIGURATION took place on Hermon. Its modern name is Jebel esh-Sheikh, “the moun tain of the chief,” or Jebel eth-Thalj, “mount of snow.” (See further ABD, 3:158–60; NEAEHL, 2:616–18.)

7. Agrippa I (A.D. 37 –44)
8. Agrippa II (A.D. 50 –100)

I. Background (67–47 B.C.). The dynasty of the Herods became prominent during the confusion resulting from the decline of the HASMONEAN dynasty, the transference of SYRIA and PALESTINE to the rule of the Romans, and the civil wars that marked the decay of the nation. The first of the Herodian dynasty was Herod the Great's grandfather, Antipater (or Antipas), who had been appointed governor of IDUMEA by Alexander Jan-naeus (Jos. Ant. 14.1.3 §10). His son, also named Antipater, was considered by JOSEPHUS an Idumean by race and a man of great wealth (War 1.6.2 §123; cf. also Ant. 14.1.3 §9; Justin Martyr, Dialogue with Trypho 52.3; Euseb. Hist. 1.6.2; 1.7.11; b. Baba Bathra 3b–4a; Kiddushin 70b). The latter came into prominence after the death of ALEXANDRA, the Maccabean queen.

Alexandra's eldest son, Hyrcanus II, assumed the royal power in 67 B.C. Being a quiet and peaceful man, he was set aside by his younger brother Aristobulus after only three months' reign (Jos. Ant. 14.1.2 §4–7; 14.6.4 §180; War 1. 5.4 §§117–19). Hyrcanus, declaring that he never really had desired the throne, surrendered all his honors to Aristobulus, who became king and high priest. Although Hyrcanus and Aristobulus publicly made peace with each other, it was short lived. Antipater saw in the position of Hyrcanus an opportunity to fulfill his own dream of being a political power in Judea. It was not difficult for Antipater to persuade Hyrcanus that he had been unjustly deprived of his hereditary rights by his younger brother, and suggested he should flee to ARETAS, king of ARABIA, with a view to recovering his rightful kingdom. Thus he fled to PETRA (JOS. Ant. 14.1.3–4 §§ 8–18).

It was at this point that Rome intervened. POMPEY, the general who had been so successful in bringing the Roman power to the E, determined to act. Scaurus, one of his subordinates, felt that Pompey should support Aristobulus, who would probably be better able to pay the bribe offered by each contestant. Pompey, however, decided to side with Hyrcanus because there was evidence that Aristobulus might revolt against Rome (Jos. Ant. 14.3.3 §§46–47). Pompey made war against Aristobulus, besieging the Jerusalem temple for three months. When Pompey won the war, he went into the holy of holies but did not plunder it of its valuables (Jos. Ant. 14.4.4 §§69–72; War 1.6.5–1.7.6 §§133–53; Tac. Hist. 5.9; Livy, Epit. 102; Appian, Mithridatic Wars 106, 114; Florus, Epit. 1.40.30; Plutarch, Pompey 39; cf. Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 37.15–17). Because of Hyrcanus's loyalty, Pompey reinstated him as high priest (Jos. Ant. 14.4.4 §73; War 1.7.6 §153). Jerusalem was made a tributary of Rome and placed under Scaurus, whom Pompey made legate of the province of Syria.

Antipater proved himself useful to the Romans both in government and in their operations against the Hasmoneans. He married a woman named Cypros, daughter of an illustrious Arabian, by whom he had four sons: Phasael, Herod, Joseph, Pheroras, and a daughter, Salome (Jos. Ant. 14.7.3 §121; War 1.8.9 §181).

After Pompey was defeated by Julius CAESAR in 48 B.C. in Egypt (at Pharsalus), Hyrcanus and Antipater attached themselves to Caesar's party. Antipater had risked his life for Caesar in the fighting in Egypt the previous year. Because of this Caesar made Antipater a Roman citizen with exemption of taxes and appointed him procurator of JUDEA. Also he confirmed the appointment of Hyrcanus to the office of high priest and gave him the title of ETHNARCH of the Jews (Jos. Ant. 14.8.1–5 §§127–55; 14.10.2 §191; War 1.9.3–1.10.4 §§187–203). Immediately after, Antipater went about the country to suppress the disorders and appealed to the restless Judean population to be loyal to Hyrcanus. Although appealing to the people in this fashion, he felt that Hyrcanus was an unsuitable leader of Judea, so he took the country in his own hands and appointed his son Phasael as governor of Jerusalem and his second son Herod as governor of GALILEE (Jos. Ant. 14.9.1–2 §§156–58; War 1.10.4 §§201–3). Antipater continued his loyalty to Hyrcanus, yet it can be seen that Antipater was the power behind the throne.

II. Herod the Great (47–4 B.C.)

A. As governor of Galilee (47–37 B.C.)

1. His rule. Herod became governor of Galilee at the young age of twenty-five years. Immediately he was admired by the Galilean Jews and Roman officials in Syria because of his promptness in capturing and executing the bandit leader Ezekias and many of his followers. Some in Hyrcanus's court persuaded him that Herod was getting too powerful and that he had violated the Jewish law in the execution of Ezekias and his followers and thus should be tried before the SANHEDRIN. SO Hyrcanus ordered a trial. Herod appeared not as an accused person but as a king in purple and attended by a bodyguard. Sextus Caesar, governor of Syria, ordered Hyrcanus to acquit Herod or there would be consequences following. Herod was released and fled to join Sextus Caesar at DAMASCUS. Appointed by the latter governor of COELESYRIA because of his popularity, Herod became involved with the affairs of Rome in Syria. He then began to march against Jerusalem in order to avenge himself for the insult Hyrcanus had given him but was persuaded by his father and brother to refrain from violence (Jos. Ant. 14.9.2–5 §§158–84; War 1.10.5–9 §§204–15; cf. b. Kiddushin 43a). All this occurred in 47 or the beginning of 46 B.C.

Caecilius Bassus, a partisan of Pompey who was Julius Caesar's foe, murdered Sextus Caesar and became the leader of Syria (Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 47.26.7—47.27.2; Livy, Epit. 114; Jos. Ant. 14.11.1 §268; War 1.10.10 §216). Antipater, a friend of Julius Caesar, sent troops under his two sons against Bassus. This minor war dragged on indecisively for about three years. After Cassius, Brutus, and their followers murdered Caesar on March 15 of the year 44 B.C., Cassius defeated Bassus and became leader of Syria. In the need of raising certain required taxes exacted by Cassius, Antipater selected Herod, Phasael, and Malichus for the job.

Because of Herod's success in collecting taxes, Cassius not only appointed him as governor of Coelesyria (as he had been under Sextus) but also promised to make him king of Judea after the war that Cassius and Brutus were fighting against Caesar and Antony. The Herodians were definitely growing in power under the Romans, and because of this Malichus, whose life Antipater had previously saved, bribed a butler to poison Antipater (43 B.C.). Finally, in revenge Herod killed Malichus by stabbing him (Jos. Ant. 14.11.3–6 §§277–93; War 1.11.2–8 §§220–35).

When Cassius had moved out of Syria to join Brutus for the campaign against Octavius and Antony, troubles caused by Hyrcanus broke out again in Judea. With some difficulty Herod quieted the revolt (43 B.C.). Hardly was this revolt crushed when another broke out. Ptolemy, the prince of the Itureans, had taken Mattathias Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, under his protection and saw a chance to use him. Herod defeated them (42 B.C.) and was received with acclamations by the people and warm congratulations by Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. 14.12.1 §§297–99; War 1.12.2–3 §§238–40).

By this time Herod had a wife, Doris, and by her a son, Antipater. Although she is described as a native of Jerusalem, she most likely was an Idumean. But also during this time Herod became betrothed to Mariamne (MARIAMME), granddaughter of Hyrcanus II and daughter of Aristobulus's son, Alexander, and thus a niece to Antigonus, the rival of Herod (Jos. Ant. 14.12.1 §300; War 1.12.3 §241). This strengthened Herod's position immensely, for he would marry into the royal house of the Hasmoneans and would become the natural regent when Hyrcanus, who was growing old, should eventually pass away. Herod's betrothal to Mariamne won him, being by birth an Idumean, an acceptance in the Judean circles.

The legacy of Herod the Great.

In 42 B.C. Antony defeated Cassius at PHILIPPI and then proceeded to BITHYNIA of ASIA MINOR and was met by Jewish leaders there who brought accusations against Herod and Phasael (governor of Jerusalem) to the effect that they had usurped the power of the government while leaving Hyrcanus with titular honors. Herod defended himself against the accusers with the result that the charges were neutralized (Jos. Ant. 14.12.2–6 §§301–23; War 1.12.4–6 §§242–45; Plutarch, Antony 24; Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 48.24; Appian, Civil Wars 5.4). Soon after, in the autumn of 41, when Antony had gone to Antioch, the Jewish leaders again made accusations against Herod and Phasael. Since Hyrcanus was there, Antony asked him who would be the best qualified ruler and Hyrcanus pronounced in favor of Herod and Phasael. Antony thus appointed them as TETRARCHS of Judea (Jos. War 1.12.5 §243–44; Ant. 14.13.1 §§324–26).

2. His struggle against the Parthians. The new tetrarchs of Judea enjoyed their office for only a brief period. The next year (40 B.C.) the PARTHIANS appeared in Syria. Pacorus, a Parthian prince, joined with Antigonus in the effort to place the latter on the throne held by Hyrcanus. This move began a complicated series of incidents, and Jerusalem was eventually besieged by the invaders (Jos. War 1.13.2 §§250–52; cf. also 1.12.3 §240; Ant. 14.13.3 §335). A civil war was inevitable. There were daily skirmishes between the two forces.

As the feast of PENTECOST drew near, thousands of Jews came to Jerusalem. At this moment, a Parthian cup-bearer also named Pacorus appeared with an army and claimed to come to settle the dispute in the name of Barzaphranes, the Parthian king. Though Herod was suspicious of the proposal, Phasael and Hyrcanus decided to meet the Parthian king in Galilee. Phasael and Hyrcanus were treacherously put in chains, and simultaneously a Parthian detachment left behind in Jerusalem tried to convince Herod to accompany them outside the Jerusalem walls. Having heard of the mistreatment given to Phasaël and Hyrcanus, Herod with his troops, close relatives, and Mariamne made their escape and took refuge in MASADA and then finally moved to PETRA, the capital of the NABATEAN kingdom (Jos. Ant. 14.13.7–9 §§352–64; War 1.13.6–7 §§261–64).

Meanwhile in Jerusalem the Parthians began a pillage that they extended into the other parts of Judea. Antigonus was made king (Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 48.41 [note also 48.26]; cf. Jos. Ant. 14.13.10 §§368–69; War 1.13.9 §§268–70). In order to prevent the possibility of Hyrcanus's restoration to the high priesthood, Antigonus mutilated him. Phasaël died either by suicide or poisoning, or in battle (Jos. Ant. 14.13.10 §§365–69; War 1.13.10–11 §§271–73). Hyrcanus was taken to Parthia (Jos. Ant. 15.12.1 §12).

Malchus, the Arabian king from whom Herod had expected help, asked Herod to leave. He thus departed to Egypt and then to Rome, where he was welcomed by Antony and Octavius Caesar. After hearing Herod's story, they with the senate's confirmation designated him as king of Judea (Jos. Ant. 14.14.6 §§381–85; War 1.14.4 §§282–85; cf. also Strabo, Geogr. 16.2.46; Appian, Civil Wars 5.75; Tac. Hist. 5.9). This occurred in late 40 B.C. From Italy he sailed back to Ptolemais in late 40 or early 39, marched through Galilee, and then captured Joppa and finally moved to Masada where his relatives were under attack (Jos. Ant. 14.5.1 §§394–98; War 1.15.3–4 §§290–94). With the help of the Roman armies, Herod then proceeded to encamp on the W side of Jerusalem. He proclaimed that he was the lawful king and promised to forget all the past offenses against himself. Antigonus made counterproclamations, stating that Herod was a commoner and an Idumean, that is, a half-Jew, and thus not a legitimate heir to the throne.

In 38 B.C. Herod put down the guerrilla bands in Galilee. Being discontent with the slow progress, he went to Antony to get effective aid from the Romans. Thus he divided his forces and left part of them with his brother Joseph under the orders not to fight until he received reinforcements, and with the rest he went to Samosata where Antony was besieging Antiochus, king of Commagene, who had sided with the Parthians. Herod hoped by giving timely assistance to Antony, who had not been very successful with the siege, that Antony might help him in return. Antony was pleased with Herod's unsolicited demonstration of loyalty, and after the defeat of Samosata, he ordered one of his legates, Sossius, to use the Roman army to support Herod.

On returning to Antioch with Sossius and two legions, Herod received the bad news that his brother Joseph had been killed at Jericho, which was a result of disobedience to Herod. Finally Herod defeated the opposition in Galilee (Jos. Ant. 14.15.8–13 §§439–64; War 1.16.7–1.17.7 §§320–41). Next spring (37 B.C.), the third year since he had been proclaimed king when at Rome, Herod moved his troops to Jerusalem and prepared for the siege. Having assigned his army to several tasks, he appointed his most efficient lieutenants to supervise the work while he left for Samaria to marry Mariamne, with whom he had been betrothed for about five years. This was certainly a contemptuous move against Antigonus, the uncle of Mariamne, for marrying a Hasmonean strengthened Herod's claim to the throne.

After the wedding he returned to Jerusalem. Following a long and bitter siege, Jerusalem fell and Antigonus was captured by Sossius in the summer of 37 B.C. (Jos. Ant. 14.16.2 §§470–80; War 1.18.2 §§349–52; Tac. Hist. 5.9; Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 19.22). One of the great problems that faced Herod was to stop the Roman allies from profaning and plundering the temple and the city of their great wealth. Herod did not want to be a king of a wilderness, and he knew that if the temple were desecrated by the Romans it would never be forgiven him by the Jews. He appealed to Sossius to prevent this pillage of the temple and city by promising a reward for each soldier as well as a sizable gift for Sossius out of his own purse. The troops were called in, the promised donation was paid, and Sossius marched away taking Antigonus to Antony in chains. According to Josephus (Ant. 14.16.4 §§489–90), Herod gave a large bribe to persuade the Romans to put Antigonus out of the way. It is recorded that Antigonus fell beneath the ax (Jos. War 1.18.3 §357; Plutarch, Antony 36; cf. also Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 19.22). This, of course, ends the Hasmonean rule of 129 years. Herod, therefore, ceased to be the nominee for king and became king de facto.

B. As king (37–4 B.C.). The reign of Herod is divided by most scholars into three periods: first, consolidation from 37 to 25; second, prosperity from 25 to 14; and finally, the period of domestic troubles from 14 to 4.

1. Consolidation (37–25 B.C.). This period extends from his accession as king to the death of the sons of Babas (with Costobarus, the second husband of Salome, Herod's sister), when the last male representative of the Hasmonean family was removed from his pathway. During this time of rule he had to contend with many powerful adversaries: the people and the Pharisees, the ruling class, the Hasmonean family, and Cleopatra.

The first adversaries were the people, who were under the persuasion of the PHARISEES. The Pharisees did not like Herod as their king because of his being an Idumean, a half-Jew, and a friend of the Romans. Therefore, he had to secure the obedience of the population. Those of Judea's population who opposed him were punished, while those whom he won to his side he rewarded with favors and honors (Jos. Ant. 15.1.1 §2–3; War 1.18.4 §358).

The second of the adversaries were the aristocracy, who sided with Antigonus. Herod executed forty-five of the most wealthy and the most prominent of this class. He confiscated their properties and replenished his coffers, which had been depleted due to the payment of Sossius and his soldiers and the payment of money to Antony in order to gain a firmer hold upon him (Jos. Ant. 15.1.2 § §5–6; War 1.18.4 §359).

The third of the adversaries were the Hasmonean family. It was Alexandra, Herod's mother-in-law, who caused the most trouble. Herod needed a high priest to replace Hyrcanus. Although Hyrcanus had come back from his Parthian exile, Antigonus had mutilated him, which disqualified him to be the high priest. It is assumed, then, that Herod did not choose himself as high priest, as did Antigonus, because he was an Idumean (though he liked to be considered as of a priestly family). He wanted a high priest of insignificance and yet belonging to the Zadokite family (see ZADOK), which held the office before the Hasmoneans. This would seem to be a legitimate change. Herod found his man in Ananel (Hananeel), a priest of the Babylonian DIASPORA (Jos. Ant. 15.1.1 –4 §§11–22).

This decision was taken as an insult by Herod's mother-in-law Alexandra, who thought it was an infringement on the Hasmonean line and felt that the position should be given to the only rightful heir, her sixteen-year-old son Aristobulus, the brother of Mariamne. She, therefore, used every conceivable means in order to secure her wishes. Particularly she wrote to CLEOPATRA urging her to exert her influence on Antony, who in turn would force Herod to appoint Aristobulus as high priest (Jos. Ant. 15.2.5 §§23–24). Mariamne also pled with Herod to have her brother as high priest. Thus Herod finally gave way to the petitions and set aside Ananel (which was unlawful because the high priest was to hold the office for life) and made Aristobulus high priest. He was only in his seventeenth year (c. late 36 or early 35 B.C.).

This brought peace between Herod and Alexandra but it was short lived. Herod mistrusted Alexandra and so he kept a watchful eye on her. Alexandra grew tired of this situation, and Cleopatra told her to escape with her son and come to Egypt. Two coffins were prepared for the flight from the city to the sea coast, but the scheme was betrayed. Herod allowed the scheme to be carried on and caught them in the act. Even though he overlooked the offense, he became all the more suspicious of her (Jos. Ant. 15.3.2 §§42–49).

When the next feast of Tabernacles was celebrated, there arose among the people a great affection for Aristobulus, who officiated. Because of Aristobulus's growth in popularity, Herod determined to get rid of this dangerous rival and enemy. After the festivities, Herod was invited by Alexandra to a feast at Jericho. Herod acted with friendliness toward Aristobulus and suggested they go swimming since the day was very hot. While swimming in a pool Aristobulus was pushed under the water, as if in sport, by some of those with him who had been bribed by Herod. He was kept down so long that he was drowned. Herod displayed the most profound grief and gave him a most magnificent funeral. No one publicly questioned the official version of the death, but Alexandra was not deceived and resolved to devote her life to revenge (Jos. Ant. 15.3.3–4 §§50–61; War 1.22.2 §437).

Since Alexandra believed Aristobulus's death to be murder, she sent a report to Cleopatra, who persuaded Antony to summon Herod for an account of such actions. Herod was under obligation to go, and, realizing that Antony could and might sentence him to death, he put Mariamne under the surveillance of his uncle Joseph, who was married to Herod's sister (Salome), instructing him in strict secrecy that he should execute Mariamne if Herod were killed, so that she would not become someone else's lover.

By eloquence and bribery Herod persuaded Antony to free him of any charges. When Herod returned, Salome charged her husband Joseph of having unlawful intercourse with Mariamne. Herod questioned Mariamne but was satisfied with her denial. But when he learned that Mariamne knew about the secret command he had given to Joseph (who thought it was evidence of Herod's love to her), Herod believed this was a confirmation of Salome's charge and had Joseph executed without giving him an opportunity to be heard (34 B.C.). He also put Alexandra in chains and under guard, for he blamed her in part for all these troubles (Jos. Ant. 15.3.5–9 §§62–87; War 1.22.4–5 §§441–44).

The fourth of the adversaries of Herod was Cleopatra. In connection with Alexandra she made trouble for Herod. By her influence over Antony she obtained an increase of territory. Although at first he would not yield to her, finally during his expedition against Armenia (c. 34 B.C.) he was induced to give her the whole of Phoenicia, the coast of Philistia south of Eleutherus River (with the exception of the free cities of Tyre and Sidon), a portion of Arabia, and the district of Jericho with its palm trees and balsams, which was the most fertile area of Herod's kingdom (Jos. Ant. 15.4.1–2 §§88–96; War 1.18.4–5 §§360–63). Cleopatra visited the territories, and Herod, though reluctantly, received her with great honor and splendor. But when she tried to entrap Herod by her devices, he would not give in (Jos. Ant. 15.4.2 § §97–103).

Civil war broke out between Antony and Octavius. Herod wished to help Antony, but at the instigation of Cleopatra he was instead ordered by Antony to fight against Malchus, the Arabian king. Malchus failed to pay his tribute, and she wanted him to be punished. Actually she hoped that when the two kingdoms weakened each other, she could absorb both (Jos. Ant. 15.5.1 §§108–10). Initially Herod was victorious over the Arabs, but Cleopatra helped them, resulting in Herod's eventual defeat. In the spring of 31 a destructive earthquake occurred in Herod's domain costing the lives of 30,000, and when Herod sent envoys to Arabia for the purpose of making peace, the Arabians slew them. After encouraging his troops, who were despondent because of these circumstances, he attacked and defeated the Arabs and then returned home (Jos. Ant. 15.5.2–5 §§121–60; War 1.19.3–6 §§369–85).

Soon after, on 2 September 31 B.C., Antony was defeated by Octavius (later AUGUSTUS) in the Battle of Actium. This turn of events was a blow to Herod. With political skill Herod had to convince Octavius that he should be regarded as the only legitimate ruler of Judea. Since Hyrcanus II was his only possible rival, he charged Hyrcanus of plotting with the king of the Nabateans and subsequently killed him (Jos. Ant. 15.6.1–4 §§161–82; War 1.20.1 §386).

On setting out to see Octavius in Rhodes (spring, 30 B.C.), Herod thought it wise to prevent Alexandra from stirring up any revolts. He placed her and Mariamne in Alexandreion (3 mi. SW of the confluence of the Jabbok and Jordan Rivers) under the custody of his steward Joseph (not Herod's brother-in-law) and Soemus, the Iturean who was a trusted friend of Herod. He instructed them to execute the two women if Herod were to be killed and to preserve the kingdom for his sons and his brother Pheroras (Jos. Ant. 15.6.5 §§183–86).

At Rhodes Herod played his part skillfully. He admitted his loyalty to Antony, although actually he did not fight against Octavius because of his war against the Arabs. He showed that his loyalty would benefit Octavius, and the latter confirmed Herod in his royal rank. Herod, then, returned to his own home. In that same summer Octavius left Asia Minor and landed on the Phoenician coast on his way to Egypt. Herod met him with great pomp at Ptolemais and gave him 800 talents and provided supplies for Octavius’s soldiers during that hot season. This was appreciated by Octavius (Jos. Ant. 15.6.6–7 §§189–201; War 1. 20.1–3 §§387–95).

Octavius gained control of Egypt when he defeated Antony. Antony and Cleopatra committed suicide in August of 30 B.C. Having heard this, Herod went to Egypt to congratulate Octavius and to secure a great reward for himself. Octavius gave him the title of king (Strabo Geogr. 16.2.46). In addition, Octavius now gave back to him not only Jericho, but also Gadara, Hippos, Samaria, Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and Strato’s Tower (later CAESAREA; Jos. Ant. 15.7.3 §§215–17; War 1.20.3 §§396–97). Thus Herod secured much for himself.

While Herod seemed to enjoy the outward success of having his kingdom conferred to him by Octavius and of having gained control of new areas, his domestic affairs were far from peaceful. While he was at Rhodes, Mariamne found out from Soemus that Herod had ordered him and Joseph to kill her if he were killed. When Herod returned she was very unfriendly to him. Since Herod was caught between loving and hating her, his sister Salome and their mother Cypros saw their opportunity to satisfy their hatred toward Mariamne and spread slanderous stories about her which would fill Herod with hatred and jealousy at the same time. Herod would not listen to them.

Later when he returned from Egypt, after congratulating Octavius and receiving the new territories, Mariamne’s attitude toward him was more irritating. Salome seized upon this opportunity by bribing Herod’s butler to say that Mariamne prepared a love-potion for the king. Herod inquired with regards to the love-potion but the butler did not know. Being in an ugly mood, Herod had Mariamne’s eunuch examined by torture regarding this love-potion. He also knew nothing of it but did confess of Mariamne’s hatred of him because of the command he had given Soemus. Because Soemus, as well as Joseph, had betrayed his secret, Herod felt this was proof of unlawful intercourse and had Soemus immediately executed. Mariamne, after a judicial investigation, was condemned and then finally executed at the end of 29 B.C. (Jos. Ant. 15.7.1–5 §§202–36). Herod never sanely accepted Mariamne’s death. He fell ill, and because his recovery was doubtful, Alexandra began to scheme so that if he died she would secure the throne. She tried to win over those in command of the two fortified palaces in Jerusalem. When this was reported to Herod, Alexandra was executed in the year 28 (Jos. Ant. 15.7.6–8 §§237–52).

After Herod recovered from his depression over Mariamne, he found occasion for further bloodshed in this period. Soon after his accession as king, he had appointed a distinguished Idumean, Costobarus, as governor of Idumea and given him his sister Salome, after putting to death her former husband Joseph (in 34 B.C.). Even during this first period Costobarus secretly conspired with Cleopatra against Herod, but Herod granted him pardon at the entreaty of Salome. However, now Salome was getting tired of her husband and so she wanted to get rid of him. She had learned that he, along with Antipater, Lysimachus, and Dositheus, was planning to revolt. As a proof of her charges she revealed that her husband had preserved the influential sons of Babas, who remained loyal to Antigonos and always spoke ill of Herod. When Herod heard this, Costobarus and his followers, whose place of concealment was betrayed by Salome, were seized and executed in 25 B.C. Herod now could console himself that all the male relatives of Hyrcanus (who could dispute the occupancy of the throne) were no longer living (Jos. Ant. 15.7.9–10 §§23–66). This ends the first period of Herod's reign.

2. Prosperity (25–14 B.C.). This period is marked with splendor and enjoyment, although there were moments of disturbance. The first event mentioned by Josephus regarding this period is Herod's violation of the Jewish law by his introduction of the quinquennial games in honor of Caesar and by the building of theaters, amphitheaters, and race courses for both men and horses (Jos. Ant. 15.8.1 §§267–76). Some time later (c. 24), Herod built for himself a royal palace and also built or rebuilt a good many fortresses and Gentile temples, including the rebuilding of Strato's Tower, which was renamed CAESAREA (Jos. Ant. 15.8.5—15.9.6 §§292–341).

The Hyrcania fortress, built by Herod the Great some 10 mi. SE of Jerusalem, was used to detain his political prisoners.

Herod's greatest building, of course, was the TEMPLE in JERUSALEM, work on which began c. 20 B.C. Josephus considers it the most noble of all his achievements (Jos. Ant. 15.11.1 §380). Rabbinic literature states: "he who has not seen the Temple of Herod has never seen a beautiful building" (b. Baba Bathra 4a). Also, it is suggested that it was his "atonement for having slain so many sages of Israel" (Midr. Num. 14:8; for a discussion of Herod's building projects, see E. Netzer in ABD, 3:169–72; D. W. Roller, The Building Program of Herod the Great [1998]). Also during this period, he took great interest in culture and surrounded himself with a circle of men accomplished in Greek literature and art. The highest offices of state were entrusted to Greek rhetoricians, one of whom, Nicolas of Damascus, was Herod's instructor in philosophy, rhetoric, and history. He was the king's adviser and figured much in Herod's dealings.

Regarding domestic affairs, late in the year 24 he married Mariamne (who will be designated as Mariamne II), daughter of Simon, a well-known priest in Jerusalem. Herod sent his two sons by Mariamne I, Alexander and Aristobulus, to Rome for their education. Augustus (Octavius's title since 27 B.C.) himself received the sons and they stayed at the house of Asinius Pollio, who professed to be one of Herod's most devoted friends. At this time Augustus gave him the territories of TRACONITIS, BATANEA, and Auranitis (HAURAN) which had been occupied by nomad robber tribes with whom the neighboring tetrarch Zenodorus had made common cause (Jos. Ant. 15.10.1–2 §§342–49; War 1.20.4 §§398–99). It is apparent that there was a friendly relationship between Caesar and Herod. Herod, undoubtedly, was considered an important king to Rome, for he kept that section of the Roman empire well in control.

Augustus came to Syria in 20 B.C. and bestowed upon Herod the territory of Zenodorus, or that which laid between Tracoonitis and Galilee (containing Ulatha and Paneas), and made it so the procurators of Syria had to get Herod's consent for all their actions (Jos. Ant. 15.10.3 §§354–60; War 1.20.4; cf. Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 64.7.4–6; 64.9.3). He also asked Augustus for a territory for his brother Pheroras, who was given PEREA (JOS. Ant. 15.10.3 §362; cf. War 1.24.5 §483). Because of these gracious bestowments, Herod erected a beautiful temple for Augustus in the territory of Zenodorus, near the place called Paneion (Jos. Ant. 15.10.3 §363; War 1.21.3 §§404–6).

Also at this same time Herod remitted a third of the taxes under the pretext of crop failure but actually it was to bring goodwill among those who were displeased with his emphasis on Greco-Roman culture and religion. The remittance of taxes was effective for the most part. There seemingly was a great dissatisfaction because Herod would not allow the people to congregate for fear of a revolt. He demanded a loyalty oath by the people, but excluded Pollio the Pharisee and his disciple Samaia, as well as most of their disciples. The ESSENES did not have to submit to this oath because, according to Josephus (Ant. 15.10.4 §§365–72), Herod had a high regard for them. In 17 or 16 B.C., Herod made a trip to Rome to meet Augustus and fetch his two sons, who had completed their education. Upon their return to Judea, Aristobulus was married to Salome's daughter Berenice, while Alexander married Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of CAPPADOCIA (JOS. Ant. 16.1.2 § §6–11; War 1.23.1 §§445–46).

One can conclude that the period from 25 to 14 B.C. was the most brilliant in Herod's entire reign. His building program was of great splendor and his domestic affairs were reasonably stable (until near the end of this period). Although he had some trouble within his political sphere, he had good control of his people and twice he favored them by lowering taxes (in the year 14 he reduced taxes by one-fourth, Jos. Ant. 16.2.5 § §64–65).

3. Domestic troubles (14–4 B.C.). Herod married a total of ten wives (Jos. Ant. 17.1.3 §§19–22; War 1.28.4 §§562–63). Herod repudiated his first wife Doris and their son Antipater when he married Mariamne I in 37 B.C., but they were allowed to visit Jerusalem during the festivals (Jos. War 1.22.1 §433). This Mariamne, the granddaughter of Hyrcanus, bore him five children. The two daughters were Salampsio and Cypros (Jos. Ant. 18.5.4 §§130–32). The youngest son died during the course of his education in Rome (Jos. War 1.22.2 §435). The older sons were Alexander and Aristobulus, who played an important part during this period of Herod's life. Herod married his third wife Mariamne II in late 24 B.C., and by her he had Herod (Philip). His fourth wife was a Samaritan, Malthace, by whom he had Archelaus and Antipas. His fifth wife, Cleopatra of Jerusalem, was the mother of Philip. Of the other five wives, only Pallas, Phaedra, and Elpsis are known by name, and none of these played a significant role (Jos. Ant. 17.1.3 §§19–22; War 1.28.4 §§562–63).

Herod's favorite sons were Alexander and Aristobulus, the two he had by Mariamne I. After they had returned from Rome and had married Glaphyra and Berenice respectively, troubles domestically began to come to the forefront. Salome, Herod's sister and mother of Berenice, hated these two sons and tried desperately to establish her own son. It may well be that to a certain degree the haughtiness by the two sons of Mariamne I was due to their being a part of the Hasmonean dynasty. Salome aggravated them by speaking ill of their mother, whom Herod had killed, which caused them to defend her. Salome and Pheroras (brother of Herod and Salome) reported to Herod that his life was in danger because the two sons were not going to leave the murder of their mother unavenged and that Archelaus, king of Cappadocia (father of Glaphyra), would help them reach the emperor and bring charges against their father (Jos. Ant. 16.3.1–2 §§66–77).

In order to provide a counterbalance to their aspirations and to show them that there might be another who could be heir to the throne, Herod recalled his exiled son Antipater. In the spring of 13 B.C., Herod sent him to Rome in the company of Agrippa (friend of Augustus), who left the E to go to Rome, so that he might present Antipater to the emperor. Instead of being a counterbalance, Antipater used every conceivable means to acquire the throne. He used slander against his two half brothers. The rift between Herod and Mariamne I's two sons became so great that Herod decided to accuse his two sons before the emperor. In 12 B.C. the two sons went with Herod and they were tried before Augustus in Aquileia. After the case was heard, Augustus was able to reconcile Herod and his sons, and having restored domestic peace, the father, the two sons, and Antipater returned home. When they arrived home, Herod named Antipater as his first successor and next after him were to be Alexander and Aristobulus (Jos. Ant. 16.3.3–4. 6 §§86–135; War 1.23.2–5 §§451–66).

Scarcely had they arrived home when Antipater, being helped by Herod's sister Salome and Herod's brother Pheroras, began to slander the two sons of Mariamne I. Alexander and Aristobulus became more decidedly hostile in their attitude. Herod became suspicious and increasingly morbid about the situation. Antipater played on Herod's fears. He even caused the friends of Alexander to be tortured so that they might confess any attempt to take Herod's life, and one friend made the admission that Alexander, with the help of Aristobulus, had planned to kill him and then flee to Rome to lay claim on his kingdom. For this Alexander was committed to prison. When the Cappadocian king Archelaus, Alexander's father-in-law, heard of this state of affairs, he began to fear for his daughter and son-in-law and thus made a journey to Jerusalem to see if there could be reconciliation. He appeared before Herod very angry over his good-for-nothing son-in-law and threatened to take his daughter back with him. Because of this Herod defended his son against Archelaus. By this sly maneuver on the part of Archelaus, he accomplished the reconciliation he desired and then returned to his home (Jos. Ant. 16.7.2–16.8.6 §§188–270; War 1.24.1—1.25.6 §§467–512). These events probably occurred in 10 B.C. Thus there was peace once again in Herod's household.

In this same period Herod had troubles with some foreign enemies and with the emperor. Sylaeus, who ruled in the place of the Arabian king Obodas and who was determinedly hostile to Herod, gave shelter to forty rebels of Traconitis and tried to relieve his country from paying a debt contracted with Herod. The latter demanded the handing over of the rebels and the payment of the debt. With the consent of the governor of Syria, Saturninus, Herod invaded Arabia and enforced his rights (c. 9 B.C.). This attack was only to be a punitive measure with no intentions of territorial gain, but Syllaeus had meanwhile gone to Rome and distorted the picture, with the result that Augustus became suspicious and intimated to Herod that their close relationship was at an end and that he would henceforth treat him no longer as a friend but as a subject. In order to justify himself, Herod sent an embassy to Rome and, when this failed, he sent a second under the leadership of Nicolas of Damascus (Jos. Ant. 16.9.1 – 4 §§271 – 99).

About this time, the domestic discord again came to the forefront. A certain Eurycles from Lacedemon, a man of bad character, inflamed the father against the sons and the sons against the father (Jos. Ant. 16.10.1 §§300–310; War 1.26.1–4 §§513–33; cf. also Pausanias, Description of Greece 2.3.5; Strabo, Geogr. 8.5.1; Plutarch, Antony 67). As other mischief-makers became involved, Herod's patience was exhausted: he put Alexander and Aristobulus into prison and complained to the emperor that they were involved in treasonable plots. Meanwhile Nicolas of Damascus had accomplished his mission and had again won over the emperor to Herod. When the messengers who were bringing the accusations of Herod reached Rome, they found Augustus in a favorable mood. The emperor gave Herod absolute power to proceed in the matter of his sons as he wished, but advised him that the trial should take place outside of Herod's territory at Berytus (Beirut), before a court of which Roman officials would form part, and to have the charges against his sons investigated by it (Jos. Ant. 16.10.5—16.11.1 §§320–60; War 1.27.1 §§534–37).

Herod accepted the advice of the emperor. Although the governor of Syria, Saturninus, and his three sons thought that Herod's sons, though guilty, should not be put to death, the court almost unanimously pronounced the death sentence. Tiro, an old soldier, publicly proclaimed that the trial had been unjust and the truth suppressed. But he and 300 others were denounced as friends of Alexander and Aristobulus and thus were put to death. Therefore, at Sebaste (Samaria), where Herod had married Mariamne thirty years before, her two sons were executed by strangling, probably in 7 B.C. (Jos. Ant. 16.11.2–8 §§361–404; War 1.27.2–6 §§538–51).

Antipater, now remaining as the sole heir and enjoying the full confidence of his father, was still not satisfied, for he wished to have the government wholly in his own hands. He held secret conferences with Herod's brother Pheroras, tetrarch of Perea, which Salome reported to her brother Herod, stating that they were contriving to kill him. Thus the relationship of Antipater and his father became strained. Antipater thus wrote his friends in Rome to ask if Augustus would instruct Herod to send Antipater to Rome. Herod sent him to Rome and designated in his will that Antipater was his successor to the throne; in the event that Antipater's death might occur before his own, Herod (Philip), son of Mariamne II, the high priest's daughter, was named as his successor.

While Antipater was in Rome, Pheroras died, and this event proved to be the seal of Antipater's fate. Freedmen of Pheroras went to Herod to relate to him that Pheroras had been poisoned and that Herod should investigate the matter more closely. It was found out that the poison was sent by Antipater with the intention not to kill Pheroras but rather that Pheroras might give it to Herod. Herod also learned from the female slaves of Pheroras's household of the complaints that Antipater had made at those secret meetings regarding the king's long life and about the uncertainties of his prospects. Consequently Herod recalled Antipater under false pretenses, and Antipater returned with no suspicion. When he arrived he was committed to prison in the king's palace and was tried the next day before Varus, the governor of Syria. In light of the many proofs against him, he could make no defense. Herod put him in chains and made a report of the matter to the emperor. This occurred c. 5 B.C.

Another plot of Antipater was unveiled and Herod desired to kill him. Herod then became very ill with a disease from which he would not recover. Therefore, he drew up a new will in which he by-passed his eldest sons, Archelaus and Philip, because Antipater had poisoned his mind against them. Instead he chose the youngest son, Anti-pas, as his sole successor (Jos. Ant. 17.2.4—17.6.1 §§32–146; War 1.29.1—1.32.7 §§567–646).

According to Matthew, shortly before Herod's death the MAGI came to Judea to worship the newborn king of the Jews. Herod summoned the wise men, asking them to report to him the location of the Christ child when they found him in BETHLEHEM. Being warned in a dream, the Magi did not return to Herod but departed to the E by another route. The Lord appeared to Joseph in a dream and told him to flee to Egypt because of Herod's intention to kill Jesus. They fled to Egypt and Herod killed all the male children of Bethlehem who were two years and under (Matt. 2:1–18).

Herod was now nearly seventy years old and his sickness grew worse. As news spread that he had an incurable disease, two rabbis, Judas son of Sep-phoraeus and Matthias son of Margalus, stirred up the people to tear down the offensive eagle from the temple gate. Judas and Matthias argued that such an action would be pleasing to God. Herod, having heard this, seized the offenders and passed sentences of death upon them and had the principal leaders burned alive.

As Herod's disease grew worse, the baths at Cal-lirrhoe (see ZERETH SHAHAR) no longer benefited him. When he returned to Jericho, he commanded all notable Jews from all parts of the nation to come to him, and when they arrived he shut them up in the hippodrome, summoned his sister Salome and her husband Alexas, and ordered that all these leaders should be cut down at the moment he died so that there would be a national mourning rather than a festival. At the time he was giving these instructions, he received a letter from Rome in which the emperor gave him permission to execute his son Antipater, which he did immediately. Herod again altered his will by nominating Archelaus, the older son of Malthace, as king, Antipas as tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, and Philip as tetrarch of Gaul-anitis, Traconitis, Batanea, and Paneas.

Finally, on the fifth day after the execution of Antipater, Herod died at Jericho in the spring of 4 B.C. Salome and Alexas dismissed those who were summoned to the hippodrome. Then Ptolemy, who had been entrusted with the king's seal, read Herod's last will in public, and the crowd acclaimed Archelaus as their king. A pompous funeral procession accompanied the body from Jericho to the HERODIUM, where it was finally laid (Jos. Ant. 17.6.1—17.8.3 §§147–99; War 1.33.1–9 §§647–73; cf. R. K. Fenn, The Death of Herod: An Essay in the Sociology of Religion [1992]).

Herod's reign, if one reckons from 37 B.C., lasted thirty-three to thirty-four years. Much of his rule was characterized by violence, though in this respect other rulers were not very different from him. As a whole, he was disliked by the Jews because of his infidelity to or his unconcern for their law. Although he was the king of the Jews, many of his subjects would not characterize him as truly a Jewish king. (See further J. S. Minkin, Herod, King of the Jews [1936]; S. Perowne, The Life and Times of Herod the Great [1956]; S. Sandmel, Herod: Profile of a Tyrant [1967]; A. Schalit, König Herodes: Der Mann und sein Werk [1969]; M. III. Herod's will disputed. During his life Herod had written six wills (actually, the sixth will was a set of codicils to the fifth). As mentioned above, the sixth will was made only five days before his death. Hence it needed the ratification of the emperor. So as soon as Herod died Archelaus took over the leadership, but he did not accept the title of king nor allow himself to be crowned (Jos. Ant.

17.8.4. §§202–3; War 2.1.1 §§2–3). Immediately after the Passover, Archelaus and Antipas left for Rome to dispute the wills of Herod while Philip took care of the home front. Archelaus claimed that Augustus should ratify the sixth will because it expressed Herod's desire just before he died. On the other hand, Antipas claimed that the fifth will, which already had been ratified, had greater validity, because when Herod designated Antipas as king, he was in good physical and mental health, whereas when he named Archelaus as king in the codicils, he was stricken both in mind and body and was incapable of good reasoning. To complicate the situation further, there was a revolt in Palestine while the two brothers were in Rome disputing the will. The result of this revolt was that a Jewish delegation was sent to the emperor pleading for the autonomy of the nation and for its union with the province of Syria. By now Philip had also gone to Rome.

After considerable debate and delay, Augustus decided on a compromise solution: (a) Archelaus was designated ETHNARCH, with the promise to be made king if he proved capable of that position, and was to rule over Idumea, Judea, and Samaria; (b) Antipas was made TETRARCH over Galilee and Perea; (c) and Philip was made tetrarch over Gaulanitis, Traconitis, Batanea, and Paneas (Jos. Ant. 17.11.4 §§317–20; War 2.6.3 §§93–100). Therefore, although Antipas lost claim to kingship, he prevented Archelaus from being king over the whole realm.

IV. Archelaus (4 B.C. to A.D. 6). Archelaus was born c. 22 B.C. to Herod the Great and Malthace (a Samaritan). As soon as Herod died, Ptolemy, to whom the king had entrusted his signet-ring, read the codicils that designated Archelaus as king and Philip and Antipas as tetrarchs. Although the codicils were not ratified, Archelaus assumed the leadership. The people began making demands with which Archelaus complied in order to ingratiate himself with them. There were, however, revolutionaries among the crowd who were out to revenge the blood of those whom Herod killed for cutting down the eagle from the temple gate. Archelaus, wanting to prevent an uprising of the mob at Passover, sent out an army and killed 3,000 people (Jos. Ant. 18.8.4—19.9.3 §§200–218; War 2.1.1–3 §§1–13). Consequently his rule got off to a bad start.

While on his way to Rome, another revolt broke out at Pentecost lasting about two months: the temple porticoes were burned and its treasury pillaged by the Romans. This revolt spread to the countryside of Judea as well as to Galilee and Perea (Jos. Ant. 17.10.2–5 §§254–72; War 2.3.1—2.4.1 §§40–56). Thus when Herod's sons returned to Palestine (prob. in the spring of 3 B.C.) after the trial, the situation was all but ideal for them to begin their rule.

Archelaus proceeded to treat both Jews and Samaritans with great brutality (Jos. War 2.7.3 §111). This unfortunate state of affairs is reflected in the NT, which relates that Joseph, after returning from the flight to Egypt, heard that Archelaus was the ruler of Judea, and being afraid to go back there, withdrew to Galilee (Matt. 2:22). Furthermore, Archelaus removed the high priest Joazar, the son of Boethus, on the pretext that he sided with the insurgents; he appointed in his stead Joazar's brother Eleazar, who in turn was later replaced by Jesus son of See (Jos. Ant. 17.13.1 §§339–41). Archelaus divorced his wife Mariamne to marry Glaphyra, who was the daughter of King Archelaus of Cappadocia and had formerly been married to Archelaus's half-brother, Alexander, thus transgressing the ancestral law (Jos. Ant. 17.13.1, 4–5 §§341, 350–53; War 2.7.4 §§114–16). Either or both of these last mentioned events may have caused unrest in the country, and Archelaus's methods of suppression of unrest were oppressive.

Finally in A.D. 6 Archelaus was deposed. Although there are divergencies in the accounts, it can be reasonably reconstructed. It was triggered by a formal complaint to Augustus by a delegation of Jews and Samaritans concerning Archelaus's cruelty and tyranny. The cooperation of these two communities, normally bitter enemies, indicates the seriousness of the grievances. Furthermore, Archelaus's brothers, Antipas and Philip, went to Rome to bring charges against him, presumably regarding his oversight of them, since as ethnarch he was the Roman representative for Palestine. The outcome was that Archelaus was banished to Vienna in Gaul (modern Vienne on the Rhône, S of Lyons), while Antipas and Philip retained their rule. Archelaus's domains were reduced to a province under the rule of PREFECTS Or PROCURATORS (Jos. Ant. 17.13.1–5 §§342–55; War 2.7.3–2.8.1 §§111–18; Strabo, Geogr. 16.2.46; Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 55.27.6; see further HJP, rev.ed. [1973–1987], 1:353–57).

V. Antipas (4 B.C. to A.D. 39). Antipas was born c. 20 B.C. to Herod and Malthace (a Samaritan), hence was the younger full brother of Archelaus.

A. His realm. Of all the Herodians, he figures most prominently in the NT, for he was the tetrarch over Galilee and Perea, the two areas in which John the Baptist and Christ had most of their ministry. When Antipas returned from Rome to begin his rule in the domains allotted to him, he found them ravaged by the rebellion at the feast of Pentecost in 4 B.C. He had to restore order and rebuild what had been destroyed. Following in the footsteps of ALEXANDER THE GREAT and his father Herod the Great, he founded cities. He began by rebuilding SEPPHO-RIS, which was the largest city in Galilee as well as the capital for his domains until he built TIBERIAS. Sepphoris was probably completed c. A.D. 8–10, and it is very possible that Joseph, Mary's husband, plied his trade as a carpenter (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3) during its rebuilding, since NAZARETH was only 4 mi. SSW of Sepphoris. Probably the second city to be rebuilt was Livias (or Julias) of Perea in honor of Livia, the wife of Augustus. This city was most likely completed in A.D. 13.

Tiberias should be considered one of the most important of all twelve cities built by the Herodian family, for it was the first city in Jewish history to be founded within the municipal framework of a Greek polis. It was built in honor of the reigning emperor, TIBERIUS. While building it, they struck upon a cemetery, which was destroyed. Antipas thus had difficulty in getting devout Jews to settle there, for they considered the city unclean. He offered free houses and lands and exemption from taxes for the first few years if anyone moved into the new city. It was completed c. A.D. 23 and became his capital.

B. His rule

1. Antipas and Archelaus. The only significant event that occurred early in Antipas's career was in A.D. 6, when he and Philip, as well as a delegation of Jews and Samaritans, went to Rome with the intention of bringing about the downfall of his brother Archelaus. In the end, Antipas remained a tetrarch but gained the dynastic title Herod (cf. Jos. Ant. 18.2.1 §26; War 2.9.1 §167), which was of great significance both to his subjects and to the political and social circles of the Roman world. This title given by the emperor may have been a concession in lieu of his being made king.

2. Antipas and John the Baptist. The episode for which Antipas is best remembered is his involvement in the imprisonment and death of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Matt. 14:3–12; Mk. 6:17–29; Lk. 3:19–20; Jos. Ant. 18.5.2 §§116–19). Antipas had married the daughter of ARETAS IV (her name is not known), a NABATEAN king, before A.D. 14. This relationship probably was instigated by Augustus, who was known to favor intermarriages among the various rulers for the sake of peace in the Roman empire. This particular alliance would have made for peace between the Jews and the Arabs; in addition, Aretas's territory served as a buffer between Rome and Parthia.

Around A.D. 29 Antipas made a journey to Rome. On his way he paid a visit to his half-brother Herod (prob. Herod Philip; see below), who apparently lived in one of the coastal cities of Palestine. Antipas fell in love with his host's wife HERODIAS, who was also his own niece. She was ambitious, and this was her opportunity to become the wife of a tetrarch. Herodias agreed to marry Antipas on his return from Rome, with the stipulation that Aretas's daughter must be ousted (Jos. Ant. 18.5.1 §§109–10). The latter got wind of the arrangement and consequently fled to her father. This divorce was not only a personal insult to Aretas but also a breach of a political alliance; it later led to a retaliation by Aretas.

Soon after the departure of Aretas's daughter, Antipas and Herodias were married. John the Baptist spoke boldly against this union, and consequently Antipas incarcerated him. John's denouncement was that Antipas had married his brother Philip's wife. The Mosaic law forbade the marriage of a brother's wife (Lev. 18:16; 20:21) with the exception of raising children to a deceased childless brother by LEVIRATE marriage (Deut. 25:5; Mk. 12:19). However, in Antipas's case his brother had offspring, namely, Salome; more seriously, Antipas's brother was still alive.

A problem arises over the identification of Herodias's first husband, for the Gospels state that he was Philip (Matt. 14:3; Mk. 6:17), whereas Jose-phus (Ant. 18.5.1 §109) identifies him as Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne II. Many scholars think that the gospel accounts are incorrect. Since the Herodian genealogy is very complicated, they propose that Matthew and Mark confused this Herod with Philip the tetrarch, who later married Herodias's daughter Salome. However, as easy as this solution may be at first sight, it is untenable for several reasons.

(1) The Gospels would be guilty of three historical errors: (a) confusing this Herod with his half-brother Philip, (b) making Philip the tetrarch husband of Herodias instead of the husband of her daughter, and (c) identifying Salome as the daughter of Philip the tetrarch, who according to Jose-phus had no children. It is quite improbable that the evangelists would have committed three blunders in matters of well-known history with which they otherwise show familiarity. Such major lapses seem especially incredible when one considers that the Christian community had in its midst such individuals as JOANNA, wife of Chuza (who was Antipas's financial minister, Lk. 8:3), and MANAEN (an intimate friend of Antipas, Acts 13:1). (2) The Gospels speak of a daughter of Herodias before she was married to Antipas (Matt. 14:6, 8–11; Mk. 6:22, 24–26, 28) which harmonizes exactly with Josephus's comment that Herodias and Herod (son of Mariamne II) had a daughter named Salome (Jos. Ant. 18.5.4 §136). (3) The objection that Herod the Great would not have had two sons with the name Philip is untenable, for although they had the same father, they had different mothers; also, Herod the Great had two sons named Anti-pas/Antipater and two sons named Herod. (4) It is not unreasonable for Herodias's first husband to have a double name, namely, Herod Philip; no one disputes that the Herod of Acts 12 is the Agrippa of Josephus or suggests that Luke confused him with Herod, king of Chalcis (similarly, Archelaus is the same as Herod Archelaus). (5) If the evangelists meant that Herodias's former husband was Philip the tetrarch, why did they not call him by that title as they had called Antipas right within that same pericope (Matt. 14:1; Mk. 6:14, 26)? Therefore, it is most reasonable to consider that the Philip in the Gospels and the Herod in Josephus to be one and the same person. In fact, to do otherwise would seem to create inextricable confusion.

Herodias was not satisfied to leave John in prison and so at a suitable time she arranged for a banquet, probably for Antipas's birthday, at MACHAERUS in Perea in order to get rid of John. Her daughter SALOME danced before the dignitaries, and Antipas promised her with an oath that he would give her anything up to half of his kingdom. Being advised by her mother, she requested John the Baptist's head on a platter. Antipas was sorry he had made the promise under oath, but due to the presence of his underlords he had to follow through with the request. Consequently John the Baptist's ministry came to an end c. A.D. 31 or 32 (according to a different chronology, in the year 27). See CHRONOLOGY (NT) II.

3. Antipas and Jesus. Antipas's relationship to Jesus is seen in three episodes. (1) Antipas heard of Jesus' ministry and concluded, possibly with a note of irony, that Jesus was John the Baptist resurrected (Matt. 14:1–2; Mk. 6:14–16; Lk. 9:7–9). He had put to end one dangerous movement headed by John the Baptist, but now there appeared a still more remarkable and successful people's preacher. Hence, it was John the Baptist all over again. Antipas wanted to see Jesus but was not able to do so because he withdrew from his territories; in addition, he did not want to use force because he might rouse his people again as he had in connection with John.

(2) The second episode to be noted is when Jesus was on his final journey to Jerusalem. Some of the Pharisees came to Jesus and stated that he had better remove himself from Antipas's territories because he wanted to kill Jesus (Lk. 13:31–33). Jesus replied by saying, "Go tell that fox, 'I will drive out demons and heal people today and tomorrow, and on the third day I will reach my goal.'" In other words, Jesus would continue his ministry for a short time at least, but only after he had finished would he go to Jerusalem to perish. Antipas saw the potential danger of Christ's popular movement and wanted him to leave his domains by threatening to kill him. Antipas did not dare to use force because there was no evidence that Jesus was causing potential trouble, and the people had not forgiven Antipas for his treatment of John the Baptist whom they considered a prophet. But Jesus saw through Antipas's scheme and called him a "fox" (a weak animal that uses cunning deceit to achieve its aims), hence a crafty coward. The lion of Judah was not going to be ordered by the fox (the fox and lion often were contrasted in ancient literature). Jesus was to finish his ministry there for a short time, and though Antipas had killed John the Baptist in his territory, he did not control the fate of Jesus.

(3) The final encounter was when Jesus was tried by Antipas in the year 33 (alternately, 30). The incident is recorded in Lk. 23:6–12, and many scholars consider this pericope as legendary since it is not in the other Gospels. However, it is difficult to see any apologetic purpose for its inclusion; it was probably included because of Luke's particular interest in the Herodian house (specifically, LUKE and his addressee THEOPHILUS, who may have been a Roman officer, would have been interested in the reconciliation between Antipas and PILATE, 23:12). Since the other Gospels did not have a particular interest in the Herods, one can see the reason for the omission of this event, which adds nothing to the progression of the trial of Christ. There are some scholars who think that the source of the pericope is Acts 4:25–26 (which quotes Ps. 2:1–2), but upon close examination the opposite is true. Other scholars say that the pericope's origin is in the Gospel of Peter, but the parallel is not strong (in fact, the Gospel of Peter holds Antipas responsible for Jesus' death where there is nothing of this in Luke).

Regarding the contents of the pericope itself, Pilate sent Jesus to Antipas, who was in Jerusalem for the Passover. Pilate did not make this move out of kindness but to free himself from an awkward case: the Jews insisted on Jesus' execution but Pilate found no guilt in him. Another reason for handing Jesus over to Antipas was for diplomatic courtesy in order to improve his relationship with Antipas, which had been strained by the Galilean massacre (Lk. 13:1) and by the incident over the votive shields being brought into Jerusalem by Pilate (Philo, Legatio ad Gaium 299–304). The last incident was reported by Antipas (and other Herods) to Tiberius, who ordered Pilate to remove the shields immediately. Pilate had overstepped himself and was anxious to appease. Antipas did not presume on Pilate's gesture; after mocking Jesus, he sent Jesus back. The one thing that was accomplished in this trial was the reconciliation of Antipas and Pilate.

4. Antipas and Rome. In A.D. 36 Aretas made an attack on Antipas and defeated his army. The Jews saw this defeat as a divine retribution upon Antipas for his execution of John the Baptist (Jos. Ant. 5.1.2 §§116–19). Tiberius ordered Vitellius, governor of Syria, to help Antipas. Before attacking Aretas, however, Vitellius and Antipas went up to Jerusalem to celebrate a feast (prob. Pentecost of 37), and while there received the news of Tiberius's death (16 March 37). Consequently, Vitellius called off his expedition against Aretas until he received commands from the new emperor, CALIGULA.

Caligula upon his accession gave his friend Agrippa I, brother of Herodias, the land of Philip as well as the tetrarchy of Lysanias with the title of king (Jos. Ant. 18.6.10 §§225–39). Later Agrippa went to Palestine (c. Aug. of 38). Due to Agrippa's acquisition of the title of king, Herodias prodded Antipas to go to Rome to seek the same title. Finally in 39 Antipas with Herodias went to Rome, but meanwhile Agrippa dispatched one of his freedmen to Rome to bring accusations against Antipas. As a result, Antipas was banished to exile at Lugdunum Convenarum (now Saint-Bertrand de Comminges of France). Although Herodias did not have to go into exile, she chose to follow her husband. Antipas's territories were given to Agrippa (Jos. Ant. 18.7.1–2 §§240–55; War 2.9.6 §§181–83).

VI. Philip the tetrarch (4 B.C. to A.D. 34). Philip was born c 22/21 B.C. to Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. As a result of the debate over Herod's will, Augustus made Philip the tetrarch over the northern part of Herod the Great's domain, which included GAULANITIS, Auranitis (HAURAN), Batanea (BASHAN), TRACO-NITIS, Paneas, and ITUREA (Jos. Ant. 17.8.1 §189; 17.9.4 §319; 18.4.6 §106; 18.5.4 §136; War 1.33.8 §668; 2.6.3 §95; Lk. 3:1). The make-up of his subjects was primarily non-Jewish; the Syrian and Greek element was predominant, and he was the first and only Herodian to have the images of the emperor on his coins.

Philip built two cities (Jos. Ant. 18.2.1 §28; War 2.9.1 §168). He rebuilt and enlarged Paneas/Banias, the city near the source of the Jordan. He renamed it CAESAREA PHILIPPI in honor of the Roman emperor (the addition of Philippi to the name served to distinguish it from the coastal Caesarea). It is here that Jesus received PETER's confession of faith and gave the revelation of the formation of the church (Matt. 16:13–20; Mk. 8:27–30). The second city Philip rebuilt was the fishing village of BETHSAIDA (where the Jordan flows into the Sea of Galilee), which he raised to the status of a Greek polis. He renamed the city Julias in honor of Augustus's daughter Julia. It is here that Jesus healed the blind man (Mk. 8:22–26); and it was a desert place near Bethsaida where the feeding of the 5,000 occurred (Lk. 9:10). It may very well be that the feeding of the 4,000 also occurred in the southern portion of Philip's territory.

Philip, not being so ambitious and scheming as his brothers, ruled his domain with moderation and tranquillity. He was well liked by his subjects (Jos. Ant. 18.4.6 §§106–8). He married Herodias's daughter Salome, whose dances had earlier led to the execution of John the Baptist. They had no children (Jos. Ant. 18.5.4 §137). After Philip died in A.D. 34, Tiberius annexed his tetrarchy to Syria. When Caligula became emperor in 37, he gave Philip's territory to Agrippa I, brother of Herodias. (See further HJP, rev. ed. [1973–1987], 1:336–40.)

VII. Agrippa I (A.D. 37–44). Agrippa was born in 10 B.C. to Aristobulus (son of Herod the Great and Mariamne) and Berenice (daughter of Herod's sister Salome and Costobarus, Jos. War 1.28.1 §552; Ant. 19.8.2 §350). He was the brother of Herodias. Agrippa went to school in Rome and lived a careless and extravagant life, especially after his mother's death. He soon ran out of money and accumulated debts. When Tiberius's son Drusus was poisoned by Sejanus in A.D. 23, Agrippa lost the support and favor of the court and had to retire quietly to Maltha, a fortress in Idumea, leaving many angry creditors behind him in Rome (Jos. Ant. 18.6.1–2 §§143–47; 18.6.4 §165). Being utterly depressed over his humiliation, he contemplated suicide, but his wife Cypros pleaded with his sister Herodias for help. Antipas gave him a home, a guaranteed income, and a small civil service position as inspector of markets in Antipas's new capital Tiberias. But the new position in life did not last long. Matters came to a head one evening at Tyre during a feast when Antipas reproached Agrippa for his poverty and debts. Agrippa left and went to L. Pomponius Flaccus, legate of Syria (c. A.D. 32/33), whom he had known intimately at Rome, but soon left for Rome after they had quarreled (c. 36). He repaid old debts by incurring new ones (Jos. Ant. 18.6.2 – 3§ §148–60).

In Rome, Agrippa made friends with Gaius Caligula but was imprisoned by Tiberius because of his unwise remark (overheard by a servant) that he wished Tiberius would relinquish his throne to Gaius, who was much more capable of ruling. He remained in prison until Tiberius's death six months later (Jos. Ant. 18.6.4–10 §§161–236; War 2.9.5 §§178–80; Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 59.8.2). When Caligula became emperor, he released Agrippa and gave him a chain of gold equal in weight to the chain he had worn in prison. He also conferred upon him the region of Philip the tetrarch and the more northerly tetrarchy of Lysanias and gave him the title of king (Jos. Ant. 18.6.10 §237; War 2.9.6 §181). The Senate also conferred upon him the honorary rank of praetor (Philo, In Flaccum 40) and subsequently gave him consular rank (Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 60.8.2).

In late summer of 38, Agrippa went to Palestine to see his land. As noted above, his political rise led to the downfall of Antipas. Agrippa's sister Herodias prodded her husband Antipas to ask for the title of king. Because of her insistence, Antipas finally in 39 went to Rome to ask for the new title. Upon hearing this, however, Agrippa dispatched one of his freedmen, Fortunatus, to Rome to bring charges against Antipas. Agrippa's move was successful and led to Antipas's banishment; subsequently Agrippa was given the tetrarchy and property of Antipas (Jos. Ant. 18.7.1–2 §§240–56; War 2.9.6 §§181–83). In the year 41 Agrippa happened to be in Rome when Caligula was murdered, and he was helpful in the accession of CLAUDIUS, a childhood friend, to the throne (Jos. Ant. 19.4.1–6 §§236–73; War 2.11.1–4 §§204–13; Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 65.8.2). Claudius confirmed Agrippa in his rule and added Judea and Samaria to his domains, which meant that he ruled over all the territory of his grandfather Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. 19.5.1 §§274–75; War 2.11.5 §§214–15).

Agrippa I is known in the NT for his persecution of the early church in order to curry favor of the Jews (Acts 12:1–19). He killed JAMES, the son of Zebedee, and imprisoned PETER; the latter, however, was released by an angel, and Agrippa had the sentries put to death. Agrippa died in 44 in Caesarea. According to Josephus, on the second day of a festival he appeared in the theater with a robe made wholly of silver. When the robe sparkled in the sun, the people cried out flatteries, declaring him to be a god and entreating him to have mercy upon them. While the king allowed himself to be carried away with the flatteries, he noticed an owl on a rope, which was an omen that he would die very soon. Immediately he had severe stomach pains and was carried to his house and died five days later (Jos. Ant. 19.8.2 §343–52).

Luke states that Agrippa was in Caesarea sitting on the judgment seat, dressed in royal robes and addressing ambassadors from Tyre and Sidon with whom he was displeased. While speaking, the people called out stating that it was the voice of a god and not man. Immediately an angel of the Lord smote him because he did not give God the glory; and he was eaten of worms, and died (Acts 12:20–23). It may well be that Agrippa went to the festival as mentioned by Josephus and that on the second day (12:21 says on an appointed day), dressed in royal apparel, he made the oration to the ambassadors of Tyre and Sidon. Also, it could be a period of five days from the time he was smitten by an angel of the Lord until he died. Hence the two narratives can be harmonized.

His survivors were three daughters, Berenice (see BERNICE), Mariamne, and Drusilla, and a son also named Agrippa who was seventeen years of age (Jos. Ant. 19.9.1 §§354–55; War 2.11.6 §§218–20). Because Agrippa II was a minor, Agrippa I's territories were reduced temporarily to a province. (See further HJP, rev. ed. [1973 –1987], 1:442 – 54; O. W. Allen, Jr., The Death of Herod: The Narrative and Theological Function of Retribution in Luke-Acts [1997].)

VIII. Agrippa II (A.D. 50–100). Agrippa II was the son of Agrippa I and Cypros, daughter of Phasael (Herod the Great's nephew) and Salamp-sio (Herod the Great's daughter; Jos. Ant. 18.5.4 §§130–32). Upon the death of Agrippa I, Claudius wanted to make him king over his father's territories but was persuaded by two freedmen that a youth would not be able to hold sway over a large and much-harassed kingdom. Consequently Cuspius Fadus was appointed procurator of Palestine.

In A.D. 50, two years after the death of Agrippa II's uncle and brother-in-law Herod, king of Chalcis, Claudius made Agrippa II king of Chalcis (Jos. Ant. 20.5.2 §104; War 2.12.1 §223). In 53 Claudius granted Agrippa II the tetrarchy of Philip, ABILENE (or Abila), Traconitis, and Arca (the tetrarchy of Varus) in exchange for the territory of Chalcis (Jos. Ant. 20.7.1 §138; War 2.12.8 §247). NERO became emperor in 54 and shortly after his accession he gave Agrippa the Galilean cities of Tiberias and Tarichea with their surrounding land, as well as the Perean cities of Julias (or Betharamphtha) and Abila with their surrounding land (Jos. Ant. 20.8.4 §159; War 2.13.2 §252). In appreciation for the imperial favor, Agrippa enlarged his capital city Caesarea Philippi and renamed it Neronius (Jos. Ant. 20.9.4 §211). So Agrippa now ruled Philip's tetrarchy with the added toparchies of Galilee and the three detached territories of Abilene, Arca, and the two middle toparchies of Perea.

Agrippa II's private life was not exemplary. His sister Bernice had become a widow after her second husband (and uncle) Herod, king of Chalcis, died in A.D. 48. From that date she lived in her brother's house. In an attempt to quiet the rumors of incest she resolved to marry Polemo of Cilicia. But she did not continue long with him and returned to Agrippa. The apparently inappropriate relationship became the common talk of Rome (Jos. Ant. 20.7.3 §§145–47; Juvenal, Satires 6.156–60).

Like his uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, Agrippa II was in control of the temple treasury and the vestments of the high priest and consequently could appoint high priests (Jos. Ant. 20.5.2 §103; 20.9.4 §213; 20.9.7 §222). The Romans would consult him on religious matters, and this is probably why FESTUS asked him to hear PAUL at Caesarea (A.D. 59). Agrippa was accompanied by his sister Bernice (Acts 25–26).

In May of 66, the revolution in Palestine broke out (Jos. War 2.14.4 §284). Agrippa attempted to stop the revolt but was unable to do so, and all through the war of 66–70 he was unhesitatingly on the side of the Romans (see WARS, JEWISH). After Nero's suicide on 9 June 68, VESPASIAN sent his son TITUS, who was accompanied by Agrippa, to pay respects to the new Emperor Galba. On the way to Rome they received the news of Galba's murder (15 January 69) and Titus returned to Palestine while Agrippa continued to Rome. After Vespasian had been elected emperor (1 July 69) by the Egyptian and Syrian legions, Agrippa returned to Palestine to take the oath of allegiance to the new emperor (Tac. Hist. 2.81). Agrippa continued to be with Titus, who was in charge of the war (Tac. Hist. 5.1) and after the conquest of Jerusalem (5 Aug 70), Agrippa was probably present at the victory celebrations over the destruction of his people (Jos. War 2.1.2—2.3.1 §§5–40).

Vespasian confirmed Agrippa in the possession of the kingdom he had previously governed and added new territories. In the year 75 he and his sister Bernice went to Rome where she resumed being Titus's mistress (as she had been in Palestine), which became a public scandal (Tac. Hist. 2.2). Titus was forced to send her away; when he became emperor (Vespasian died on 23 June 79), she returned once more to Rome, but Titus left her unnoticed (Dio Cassius, Rom. Hist. 56.18) and so she went back to Palestine.

Nothing further is known of Agrippa or Bernice except that he corresponded with Josephus about the Jewish War, praising its accuracy, and subsequently purchased a copy (Jos. Life 65 §§361–67; Apion 1.9 §§47–52). Although some hold that Agrippa II's death was c. A.D. 93 (cf. HJP, rev. ed. [1973–1987], 1:481), it is more probable that it was c. 100. The TALMUD (b. Sukkah 27a) implies that Agrippa had two wives, but Josephus gives no indication of his being married or having any children. His death marked the end of the Herodian dynasty.

Herodians hi-roh'dee-uhnz (Ἡρώδαιοι G2477). A party, mentioned in the Gospels, who cooperated with the PHARISEES on two different occasions in opposition to Jesus (Mk. 3:6; 12:13 [= Matt. 22:16]). Composed of the name HEROD and a common suffix, the term designates partisans of Herod the Great or his dynasty. The Herodians are named only in Matthew and Mark. JOSEPHUS uses the term Hērōdeiōn (War 1.16.6) and elsewhere speaks of tous ta Hērōdou phronountas, (lit., “those who mind the things of Herod”), referring to those who were favorable to Herod the Great before he became master of the whole country (Ant. 15.15.6), but it is doubtful that the party alluded to by Josephus should be identified with the group mentioned in the NT.

Although the NT designation evidently refers to adherents of a Herod or of the Herodian dynasty, a more specific identification is a matter of conjecture, and varied suggestions concerning them have been made: soldiers of Herod; courtiers of Herod; Jews belonging to the northern tetrarchies ruled by sons of Herod; supporters of Jewish aspirations for a national kingdom who favored Herodian rule versus direct Roman rule; political supporters of Antipas. Of these, the last is most probable and receives wide support. F. C. Grant (in IB, 7:683) suggests that they were “members of the Herodian party, satellites of the tetrarch Antipas, royalists who hoped for a restoration of the Herodian monarchy.” Unlike the Pharisees, they were not a religious party but rather a political group concerned with the interests of the Herodian dynasty. Theologically, their membership doubtless cut across recognized party lines. They may have had Sadducean proclivities, but the Gospels never suggest that the Herodians are to be equated with the SADDUCEES. That Matt. 16:6 substitutes “Saducees” for “Herod” in Mk. 8:15 (a few MSS read “Herodians”) does not establish the identity; Matthew simply omits the reference to Herod or the Herodians and names another group.

The Herodians in the gospel accounts first appear in Galilee, where they joined with the Pharisees against Jesus to attempt to destroy him (Mk. 3:6; cf. Matt. 12:14, which omits them). The politically minded Herodians would be interested with the ecclesiastical Pharisees in preserving the status quo. During PASSION week they joined with the Pharisees in seeking to trap Jesus on the question of paying tribute (Mk. 12:13; cf. Matt. 22:17). F. V. Filson (A Commentary on the Gospel according to St. Matthew [1960], 234) suggests that the Herodians as supporters of Antipas were “in Jerusalem to forestall the supposed revolutionary tendencies of Jesus”; however, they would naturally have been in Jerusalem for the Passover. Herodias hi-roh'dee-uhs (Ἡρώδης G2478). The wife of Herod Antipas who contrived the death of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Matt. 14:3–12; Mk. 6:17–29; Lk. 3:19–20). Herodias was the daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great; her brothers were Herod Agrippa I and Herod king of Chalcis. (See HEROD, esp. sections V and VII.)

Herodias's first husband was her uncle, called Philip (Matt. 14:3; Mk. 6:17), to be distinguished from the tetrarch Philip (Lk. 3:1). JOSEPHUS (Ant. 18.5.1) calls her first husband “Herod,” Luke gives no name, and a few ancient witnesses (D and Lat. versions in Matt. 14:3) lack the name Philip; some scholars therefore hold this name is an error, a probable confusion with that of the tetrarch. But the name Philip is clearly original in Mark and most probably also in Matthew. The argument that two sons of Herod would not both be called Philip is weakened by the fact that two of his sons were called Herod (Jos. Ant. 18.1.3; 18.5.4). Herodias's husband was apparently named Herod Philip, just as Antipas could also be referred to as Herod Antipas.

Herodias and her husband, by whom she had a daughter named SALOME, lived in Rome; while a guest in their home, Antipas persuaded Herodias to marry him. Antipas divorced his first wife, a NABATEAN princess, to marry Herodias. Because John the Baptist publicly denounced Antipas for marrying his brother's wife, he was imprisoned at MACHAERUS. John's bold rebuke aroused the bitter hatred of the unscrupulous Herodias. She finally managed to secure John's death by instructing her daughter, the dancing girl, to demand of Antipas the head of John on a platter. The ambitious Herodias proved the downfall of her second husband. When her brother Agrippa I was given the tetrarchy of Philip with the title of “king,” Herodias persuaded the tetrarch to solicit the title for himself. The emperor instead banished Antipas to Gaul. The proud Herodias followed her husband into exile. (See further F. M. Gillman, Herodias: At Home in That Fox's Den [2003].)

D. E. HIEBERT

Herodion hi-roh'dee-uhn (Ἡρώδιον G2479). A Christian at Rome to whom PAUL sent greetings (Rom. 16:11). The apostle refers to him as his syngenēs G5150, meaning that he was either Paul's blood-relative or, more likely, a fellow Jew. The name suggests that he may have been a freedman of the HEROD family and perhaps a member of the household of ARISTOBULUS (v. 10). See also HERODIUM.

Herodium hi-roh'dee-uhm (Ἡρώδειον). Also Herodion. One of two fortress palaces built by HEROD the Great as memorials to himself. One was on the Idumean frontier, the exact site of which is not known. The other one has been identified as modern Jebel el Fureidis, c. 8 mi. S of JERUSALEM and less than 4 mi. SE of BETHLEHEM. It was built on a mountain that was artificially heightened and had a conical shape. It was one of a chain of palace-fortresses Herod erected to protect his kingdom—some others being Alexandrium, Hyrcania, MASADA, MACHAERUS, CAESAREA, JERICHO. In the year 40 B.C., Herod had defeated at this spot PARTHIANS and Jews, and he built the citadel in memory of the great victory he achieved there (Jos. War 1.13.8). It was begun about 24 B.C. and completed by 15 B.C.

According to JOSEPHUS, it was encompassed with circular towers, and 200 polished marble steps led to the summit, where rich royal apartments provided both for security and beauty. At the foot of the mountain were other palaces, buildings, pools, and terraces. An aqueduct brought an abundance of water, at a vast expense, from a great way off (Jos. Ant. 15.9.4; War 1.21.10). During the Roman period it was the chief town of a toparchy (War 3.3.5). The fortress played a role at the time of the war in A.D. 66–70 and was one of the last refuges for the rebels (War 4.9.5, 9). See WARS, JEWISH.

In 1962 excavations at Herodium were begun by the Italian archaeologist Vergilio Corbo. These revealed that the site was inhabited again in the 5th cent. by some Christians. They also showed the damage that was done by the Roman siege machines. Objects found were some Greek and Hebrew OSTRACA, arrow heads, plaster wall decorations, and a Roman bath system. DEAD SEA SCROLL materials reveal that BAR KOKHBA used Herodium's installations for collecting grain for his forces. Herod's tomb has as yet not been discovered at Herodium. (See C. F. Pfeiffer: The Biblical World [1966], 287–89; E. Netzer, Greater Hero-dium [1981], and his summary in ABD, 3:176–80; NEAEHL, 2:618–26.)

Herodotus hi-rah'du-tuhs (Ἡρόδοτος). Born early in the 5th cent. B.C. at HALICARNASSUS (on the W coast of ASIA MINOR), Herodotus lived to see the Persians take over Ionian Greece, was expelled from his home for political reasons, wandered through much of the ancient world, and finally settled as a colonist in Thurii in Italy where he died. He is commonly referred to as the “Father of History” and is best remembered for his Histories: nine books dealing with the provincial history of the Persian empire, the immediate causes of the Persian-Greek war, and the actual war itself. The underlying philosophy of his work is that pride draws down the wrath of the gods, which accounts for the fact that the Persians lost the war to the numerically inferior Greeks. Although his trustworthiness has at times been disputed, Herodotus is an indispensable source of information for the ANE at the end of the OT period. (See J. L. Myres, Herodotus: Father of History [1953]; J. Gould, Herodotus [1989]; J. A. S. Evans, Herodotus: Explorer of the Past [1991]; OCD, 696–98.)

heron. A wading bird of the family Ardea; it has a long neck and long legs as well as a pointed bill. The English word occurs in two lists of unclean birds (Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18) as a rendering of Hebrew <sup>אֲנָפָא</sup> ʾānāpā H649, a term that has always been in dispute (philologists can only suggest that the root may describe a bird with a beak shaped like a nose, whereas Targum Pseudo-Jonathan treats it as a hawk). Some scholars believe it refers to the plover or to the cormorant, but it would not be surprising if herons were listed in these passages. A dozen species live in or pass through Palestine, some of them conspicuous and in numbers; several of them are palatable when young, but their habits might class them as unclean. The most common are the gray, purple, and night herons, and the little and cattle egrets. These may all be seen at close quarters in spring in the bird sanctuaries on the Israeli coast and in the upper Jordan valley. (See FFB, 41.) Some have thought that Hebrew <sup>חַסִּידָא</sup> ḥāsîdâ H2884 (Lev. 11:19 et al.) means “heron,” but this term probably refers to the STORK.

Heshbon hesh’bon (<sup>חֶשְׁבֹן</sup> H3114, perhaps “reckoning, account”). A city in TRANSJORDAN, c. 15 mi. ENE of the N tip of the DEAD SEA and less than 4 mi. NE of Mount NEBO. Originally part of MOAB, it was captured by the AMORITE king SIHON, who made it his capital. Heshbon was then taken from Sihon by the Israelites under MOSES on their way to Canaan (Num. 21:25–30; Deut. 1:4; 2:24–30; et al.; see Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 200–209). It was located within the tribal territory of REUBEN on its border with GAD, and the Reubenites rebuilt it after the conquest of Canaan (Num. 32:3, 37). Apparently absorbed by the Gadites, Heshbon was then assigned to the Levites descended from MER-ARI (Josh. 21:39; 1 Chr. 6:81). The town subsequently must have fallen again into the hands of the Moabites, for the prophets repeatedly mention it in their denunciations of Moab (Isa. 15:4; 16:8–9; Jer. 48:2, 34, 45; 49:3; cf. also the references to nearby MEDEBA in the MOABITE STONE, ANET, 320–21). In later days the HASMONEANS and HEROD the Great controlled it (Jos. Ant. 13.15.4; 15.8.5).

The name Heshbon is apparently preserved in the modern city of Ḥesban in Jordan, some 12 mi. SW of Amman. Ruins of the city, which come chiefly from the Roman period, lie on the summit of a hill and are about a mile in circuit. Nearby there is a large ruined reservoir, which may be the “pools of Heshbon” mentioned in the Song of Solomon (Cant. 7:4). Archaeological evidence, however, has led some scholars to believe that the OT site itself may be in nearby Jalul. (See R. D. Ibach, Jr., Archaeological Survey of the Hesban Region [1987]; A. J. Ferch et al., Historical Foundations: Studies of Literary References to Hesban and Vicinity [1989]; L. T. Geraty in ABD, 3:181–84; NEAEHL, 2:626–30.)

S. BARABAS

Heshmon hesh’mōn (<sup>חֶשְׁמוֹן</sup> H3132, possibly “smooth field”). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:27). It was apparently near BETH PELET, but its precise location is unknown. Heshmon may have been the original home of the HASMONEANS (JOS. Ant. 12.6.1).

heth hayth (<sup>הֵת</sup>). Also het and cheth. The eighth letter of the Hebrew ALPHABET (<sup>ח</sup>), with a numerical value of eight. Although in modern Hebrew it is pronounced as a velar fricative (ħ, consisting of a vibration of the uvula), in biblical times it was probably a pharyngeal sound (ħ, a constriction of the throat muscles). These two sounds were distinct phonemes in proto-Semitic (and are preserved as such in Arabic), but they merged in Hebrew and other Semitic languages.

F. W. BUSH

Heth heth (חֶתְ H3147). Son of CANAAN, grandson of HAM, and eponymous ancestor of the HITTITES. The Hebrew form is rendered “Heth” by the KJV in all its occurrences (Gen. 10:15; 23:3–20; 25:10; 27:46; 49:32; 1 Chr. 1:13). The NRSV has the name “Heth” only in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:15; 1 Chr. 1:13); elsewhere it renders the name as “Hittite(s).” The NIV uses “Hittite(s)” throughout. See NATIONS II.A.

Hethlon heth’lon (חֶתְלוֹן H3158, derivation uncertain). In EZEKIEL’s vision, Hethlon is one of the places marking the ideal N boundary of Israel; a road passing by it leads from the Mediterranean to LEBO HAMATH (Ezek. 47:15; 48:1). The site is unknown, though some places on the Lebanese coast have been proposed, including modern Heitela, NE of Tripoli.

hewer. This English term is used by the KJV and other translations to render the participle of Hebrew ḥāṭab H2634, “to cut or gather [wood]” (cf. also ḥāṣēb H2933 and derivatives). The expression “hewers of wood” (NIV, “woodcutters”) was apparently a special social classification; it was imposed on the Gibeonites, residents of four towns in the area of Jerusalem because they had tricked JOSHUA into a treaty (Josh. 9:21, 23, 27; see GIBEON). This status, which is better defined as forced labor, was not quite as degrading as slavery, but still very low on the social ladder. The Hebrews despised forced labor, as is later evidenced during the reign of SOLOMON. JOSHUA also delegated the Gibeonites to be “drawers of water” (Josh. 9:27 [NIV, “water carriers”]; cf. Deut. 29:11), which would fit with their low class status. Some of them became the later temple slaves. Not all woodcutters or woodsmen are included in this social status, for social levels change frequently in a society. Those referred to in 2 Chr. 2:10 and Jer. 46:22 are important segments of the society. With the increased construction during the united monarchy, a carpenter or craftsman would be in great demand.

G. GIACUMAKIS, JR.

Hexapla hek’suh-pluh. The name (from Gk. hex G1971, “six”) given to a six-column work produced by ORIGEN. For most of the OT, it included the Hebrew text (both in Hebrew characters and in Greek transliteration), followed by four Greek translations (Aquila, Symmachus, the LXX, and Theodotion). See SEPTUAGINT V.A.

Hexateuch hek’suh-tyook. This term (from Gk. hex, “six,” and teuchos, “book”) is used by some scholars as a designation for the first six books of the Bible (cf. PENTATEUCH, “five books”; TETRA-TEUCH, “four books”). It derives from the theory that the original compilation of books pertaining to the early background and establishment of the commonwealth of Israel included the book of Joshua, rather than Deuteronomy, as its last component, a view apparently first set forth by Alexander Geddes in 1792 (cf. E. J. Young, Introduction to the Old testament [1958], 133). He felt convinced that Joshua was compiled by the same author as the preceding five books, and that it constituted “a necessary appendix to the history contained in the former books.” See DEUTERONOMY; JOSHUA, BOOK

OF.

This position was more fully elaborated by Friedrich Bleek in his De libri Geneseos origine (1836), in which he argued that after the first redaction of the “Mosaic” books in the 10th cent. B.C., a second redaction was carried through by the compiler of Deuteronomy in the late 7th cent., and this included Joshua as well. Heinrich Ewald (in his History of the People of Israel [1840–1845]) regarded the Hexateuch as the product of five redactions or stages of crystallization, the final stage being about 600 B.C. (he later brought the final compilation of Deuteronomy down to 500).

After enjoying great favor for a century or more, the concept of a Hexateuch began to fall out of vogue in critical scholarship. D. N. Freedman (IDB, 2:597) remarks: “In recent scholarship the Hexateuchal reconstruction has come under suspicion, and the Hexateuch itself has disintegrated. It is by no means certain that the sources in Joshua are the same as those in the Pentateuch. Prominent scholars have argued that J and E are not to be found in Joshua, but end substantially in the book of Numbers; that the lists in Joshua may be P-type material, but not necessarily P; and finally that Joshua in its present form is part of the great Deuteronomistic history extending from Deuteronomy through 2 Kings, and does not therefore belong to a Penta-teuchal complex.” Thus the position of Ivan Engnell (Old Testament Introduction [1945]) has come to the forefront, and the present trend is to understand Genesis through Numbers as a P (priestly) complex, and Deuteronomy through 2 Kings as a D (Deuteronomistic) complex. See DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY.

It was only natural for adherents of the Documentary Hypothesis, who dated the earliest portions of the Pentateuch (Document J) in the 9th cent., to feel that the successful climax of the Hebrew migration from Egypt to Canaan must have been included in the Israelite tradition by that time. Yet there are absolutely compelling considerations that render the Hexateuch theory logically untenable. Foremost is the undeniable fact that the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, which regarded the Pentateuch as canonical, did not include Joshua with it. This is all the more significant because the SAMARITANS above all others had every reason to exalt Joshua to canonical status. It is apparent from the propagandistic insertions into the Samaritan text of the Torah that they were most concerned to prove that Mount GERIZIM, rather than Mount ZION, was the holy mountain of the Lord, and that leadership of Israel belonged to the tribe of EPHRAIM rather than to JUDAH.

Unquestionably there is much in Joshua to commend itself to Samaritan nationalism, for Joshua himself was an Ephraimite hero, and he summoned the twelve tribes to meet with him in SHECHEM, under the brow of Mount Gerizim. Furthermore, in this book is recorded the setting up of inscribed stelae containing the law of Moses in conformity to Joshua’s command (Josh. 8:32), after which the solemn reading of the Torah with all its blessings and curses took place in the presence of the twelve tribes upon the slopes of Gerizim and EBAL. Despite all of these incentives to include Joshua with the Pentateuch as authoritative and canonical, the Samaritans never did so. There can be only one reason for this: at the time of the Samaritan schism it was so widely and universally known that the Pentateuch constituted a unity by itself that it was impossible to add Joshua to it, however advantageous it would have been for them to do so.

A second difficulty for the Hexateuchal theory is found in the consideration that Joshua does not purport to have been composed or compiled by Moses himself; hence it could not have been regarded as part of his legacy to the nation. Therefore, no matter how profoundly influenced in viewpoint, ideals, and language the book of Joshua may have been by the Pentateuch, this must be understood as a natural consequence ensuing from Joshua’s status as the successor and spiritual heir of Moses. Joshua is not at all presented as a God-inspired legislator; he is only an executive who carries out in action the principles of the law. The book of Joshua, therefore, is not to be regarded as an integral

Hezeki hez'uh-ki. KJV form of HIZKI.

Hezekiah hez'uh-ki'uh (חִזְקִיָּהוּ H2625, חִזְקִיָּה H2624 [mainly 2 Ki. 18], חִזְקִיָּהוּ H3491 [mainly 2 Chr. 28–33], חִזְקִיָּה H3490 [only Ezra 2:16; Hos. 1:1; Mic. 1:1], “Yahweh has strengthened me” or “Yahweh is my strength” [see HIZKI and HIZKIAH, cf. EZEKIEL, JEHEZKEL, JEHEZKIAH] ; Ἐζεκιῶς G1614). Several men in the Bible are known by this name. (1) An ancestor of the prophet ZEPHANIAH (Zeph. 1:1 [KJV, “Hizkiah”]); possibly the same as #5, below. (2) The head of a family that returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21; 10:17 [KJV, “Hizkijah”]; 1 Esd. 5:15; see A TER). (3) One of the men who stood beside EZRA when he read the law to the people (1 Esd. 9:43, called HILKIAH in Neh. 8:4). (4) Son of Neariah and postexilic descendant of DAVID (1 Chr. 3:23 KJV; see HIZKIAH). (5) Son of AHAZ, descendant of David, and king of Judah; three accounts are given of his reign (2 Ki. 18:1—20:21; 2 Chr. 29:1—32:33; Isa. 36:1—39:8). The rest of this article deals only with King Hezekiah.

1. Chronology
2. Historical background
3. Hezekiah's policies
4. The Assyrian threat

I. Chronology. The twenty-nine-year reign of Hezekiah is best dated in the three decades 716/15 to 687/86 B.C. The extensive research on the chronology of this period by E. R. Thiele (The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], ch. 9) reflects some difficulties in interpreting the dating systems during OT times and awaits further analysis. By adopting the above dates for Hezekiah, the interpretation of the biblical data and its synchronization with the chronologies of Syria, Assyria, Babylon, and Egypt seem to offer the best solution to the difficulties in the light of present knowledge. Based on this chronology, some of the important events during the lifetime of Hezekiah can be dated as follows:

- 740—Birth of Hezekiah
- 736—Ahaz begins coregency with Jotham
- 732—Damascus capitulates to Assyria
  - Jotham dies
  - Hoshea replaces Pekah in Samaria
- 727—Shalmaneser V becomes king of Assyria
- 723—Samaria conquers Assyria
- 722—Sargon becomes king of Assyria
- 716/15—Ahaz dies, Hezekiah becomes king
- 711—Ashdod conquered by Sargon II
- 705—Sennacherib becomes king of Assyria
- 701—Hezekiah's sickness, fifteen-year extension

—Deliverance from Assyrian pressure

—Merodach-Baladan congratulates Hezekiah

697—Manasseh made coregent with Hezekiah

689—Babylon destroyed by Sennacherib

688—Sennacherib fails in his second threat to conquer Jerusalem

II. Historical background. The reign of Hezekiah can be understood better in the light of the international pressure that the Assyrian kings brought to bear upon the nation of Judah during his life (see ASSYRIA). Judah emerged as the strongest power in the heart of Palestine under UZZIAH (Azariah) during the decade from 750 to 740 B.C. Israel had enjoyed its greatest peak of economic and political prosperity under JEROBOAM II, who died in 753.

During the following three decades, revolutions and dynastic changes occurred repeatedly until SAMARIA capitulated to the Assyrians in 723 B.C. The aggressive westward move of TIGLATH-PILESER, who ruled Assyria from 745 to 727, was temporarily halted (c. 743) by a coalition in northern Syria in which Uzziah, king of Judah, participated in a battle at ARPAD. Since MENAHEM, the king of Israel, paid tribute to Tiglath-Pileser, the Assyrians did not advance southward so that Uzziah was able to maintain an anti-Assyrian policy. JOTHAM continued this policy but likely was replaced by AHAZ because the latter adopted a pro-Assyrian policy in 736/35. At the same time, PEKAH in Samaria and REZIN in Damascus formed an alliance to resist Assyrian aggression. Ahaz triumphed in his Assyrian alliance even when the two kings of the N temporarily invaded Judah. The political involvement of Ahaz, who met the Assyrian king in Damascus when Rezin and Pekah were both dethroned, brought idolatry and paganism into the temple where God alone was to be worshiped.

By 723 B.C. SHALMANESER V had invaded Israel and conquered Samaria. SARGON II (722–705) advanced southward along the Mediterranean coast conquering ASHDOD in 711. When SENNACHERIB came to the Assyrian throne in 705, he began the conquest of numerous cities on the coastal plain, boasting that he subjected forty-six walled cities. Although he threatened Hezekiah repeatedly, he never succeeded in conquering Jerusalem. In 701, Sennacherib's plans were abruptly terminated when he had to return to suppress a Babylonian rebellion. After destroying Babylon in 689, he may have made another attempt to suppress Hezekiah. Sennacherib never claims in his records to have conquered Jerusalem. In 681, Sennacherib was killed by two of his sons and succeeded by another son named ESARHADDON.

III. Hezekiah's policies. Religiously and politically, Hezekiah faced a kingdom in need of extensive reforms. Under Ahaz, who had defied the warnings and advice by ISAIAH, idolatry had been promoted to an unprecedented degree through his alliance with Assyria. Hezekiah was not interested in currying the favor of the Assyrian kings either politically or religiously.

The Siloam Inscription, discovered in the tunnel built during the reign of Hezekiah. It describes the completion of the project, when the hewers could hear the workers on the other side.

Hezekiah reacted drastically to the idolatrous conditions that prevailed in Judah and Jerusalem. Being keenly aware that the Israelites were God's covenant people, he provided leadership as king in initiating a reform program to honor God in accordance with the Mosaic revelation. The temple in Jerusalem was reopened. The Levites were given the responsibility for repairing and renovating it so that God could again be properly worshiped. All the things associated with idolatry were removed to the brook KIDRON, whereas the vessels that had been desecrated were sanctified for the temple to be used by the priests and Levites in their ministries. The initiation of sacrifices was accompanied by musical groups employing harps, cymbals, and lyres as had been the custom in the time of DAVID. Burnt offerings were accompanied by liturgical singing in which psalms of David and ASAPH were used by the participants.

With Israel having been reduced to the status of an Assyrian province, Hezekiah took advantage of the opportunity to invite the Israelites from the northern tribes to join in the celebration of the PASSOVER in Jerusalem. Many responded to Hezekiah's invitation. Except for observing the Passover a month late to allow adequate time for preparation, the religious leaders under Hezekiah carefully followed the Mosaic instructions. The joyfulness of the celebration of this Passover had been previously exceeded only at the time when the temple had been dedicated under SOLOMON.

Throughout Judah, Benjamin, Ephraim, and Manasseh there were signs of religious reformation in the destruction of idols. PILLARS, Asherim (see ASHERAH), HIGH PLACES, and altars were demolished throughout the land. Hezekiah himself exemplified his concern by destroying the bronze serpent MOSES had erected in the wilderness (Num. 21:4–9), so that the people could no longer use it as an object of worship (see NEHUSHTAN). Like David, Hezekiah provided leadership in organizing the priests and Levites for the regular religious services. The TITHE was reinstituted and allotted to the religious leaders who devoted themselves to the service of God in accordance with the law. So generous were the contributions that all the priests and Levites had sufficient support to engage in their religious responsibilities. Plans were made to observe the feasts and seasons regularly according to the order prescribed in the law of Moses. As a whole, the religious reformation under Hezekiah was a decided success.

From the political and military perspective, Hezekiah provided equally strong leadership to Judah. When Sargon II advanced into the PHILISTINE area and captured Ashdod, international tension developed. ISAIAH dramatically warned Hezekiah and his people not to interfere with the Ashdod siege lest Jerusalem become directly involved and attacked by the Assyrians (Isa. 20:1–6). During this time, Hezekiah made extensive preparation in anticipation of Assyrian aggression. As part of his defense program he built fortifications around Jerusalem, stimulated craftsmen in the production of shields and weapons, and organized his fighting forces under combat commanders.

Realizing the importance of an adequate water supply, Hezekiah constructed a tunnel extending 1,777 ft. through solid rock from the GIHON SPRING to the SILOAM pool. The city wall was extended to enclose this vital source of water. In the area surrounding Jerusalem other sources of water were cut off as far as possible, so that the invading Assyrians would not be able to utilize them to their own advantage.

Having led his people in extensive religious and military reforms to prepare them for the impending threat of the Assyrians, Hezekiah exemplified before the nation an attitude of confidence in God. Boldly he assured them that God would sustain them to withstand the enemy who was dependent on “the arm of flesh” (2 Chr. 32:1–8).

IV. The Assyrian threat. The scriptural accounts of the relationships between Judah and Assyria during the Hezekiah-Sennacherib era, the extension of Hezekiah’s life, and Judah’s contacts with Babylon are quite extensive and detailed, but they are not necessarily in chronological order. Exact time sequence is often omitted. Although a number of problems await solution, it seems probable that the biblical and secular accounts can be reasonably integrated by allowing for the sequence of developments in the following order.

In 705 B.C., Sennacherib faced numerous rebellions when he succeeded Sargon as king of Assyria. Babylon rebelled under MERODACH-BALADAN, who by 702 abandoned his throne to Belibni. Nationalism surged in Egypt under Shabako, an Ethiopian king who founded the 25th dynasty (c. 710). Having forced Merodach-Baladan into exile, Sennacherib turned westward to subdue PHOENICIA and other coastal resistance centers, advancing to the maritime plain W of Jerusalem. By 701, he boasted about conquering forty-six walled cities and taking 200,000 captives.

From Hezekiah he exacted a heavy tribute in silver and gold and then sent representatives to Jerusalem to intimidate the king and his people (2 Ki. 18:13—19:8; Isa. 36:1—37:8). Speaking in the Hebrew language, the Assyrians warned the people that their God would not give them any more aid than the heathen gods had aided other cities in their futile resistance against Assyrian might. Hezekiah reacted in great distress, went to the temple dressed in sackcloth, and sent word to Isaiah. The latter predicted that Sennacherib would hear a rumor and suddenly return to his own land where he would die by the sword (2 Ki. 19:7). Shortly after this, Sennacherib received word that Babylon was in rebellion. Immediately he abandoned his siege of LACHISH and departed without conquering Jerusalem. In his records he merely boasts about shutting up Hezekiah like a bird in a cage.

With the Assyrian exit from Palestine, the surrounding cities and nations expressed their congratulations to Hezekiah with abundant gifts (2 Chr. 32:23). These gifts, plus the resumption of trade, ushered in a period of economic prosperity such as Judah had not enjoyed for some time.

Very likely it was in 701 B.C. that Hezekiah was seriously ill. Although warned by Isaiah to prepare for death, Hezekiah’s prayer was answered in the extension of his life for a fifteen-year period as well as the promise of deliverance from the Assyrians (Isa. 38:4–6; 2 Ki. 20:1–11). The congratulations of Merodach-Baladan may have been a recognition of Hezekiah’s physical recovery as well as his successful resistance to the king of Assyria. The triumph of Hezekiah’s personal and national recovery was only tempered by Isaiah’s prediction that subsequent to his reign Judah would be subjected to Babylonian captivity.

After a decade or more of repeated rebellions, Sennacherib destroyed Babylon in 689 B.C. Hearing of the advance of TIRHAKAH, king of ETHIOPIA, Sennacherib may have attempted to march across the Arabian desert toward Egypt the following year. This time he sent a letter to Hezekiah (2 Ki. 19:9–34; Isa. 37:9–36). To this threat Hezekiah responded very calmly, spreading this letter out before the Lord in the temple and praying in confidence that God would deliver. From Isaiah came the message that the king of Assyria would return the way he came. Subsequently the army of Sennacherib was decimated in a miraculous manner by 185,000 men (2 Ki. 19:35–37). Probably Sennacherib returned across the desert, abandoning his hopes to conquer Hezekiah and Tirhakah. In 681, he was killed by two of his sons as had been predicted by Isaiah twenty years earlier.

Hezekiah died in 686 B.C., having enjoyed the fifteen-year extension of his life in peace and prosperity. He was succeeded by MANASSEH his son, who probably had become coregent in 696. Hezion hee'zee-uhn (חִיזִין H2611, possibly “vision” or “lop-eared”). Father of Tabrimmon and grandfather of the Aramean king, BEN-HA-DAD (1 Ki. 15:18). He may be the same as REZON (1 Ki. 11:23).

Hezir hee'zühr (חִצִּיר H2615, “boar”). (1) A descendant of AARON whose family in the time of DAVID made up the eighteenth division of priests (1 Chr. 24:15).

(2) A leader of the people who signed the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:20).

Hezrai hez'ri. KJV form of HEZRO (2 Sam. 23:35).

Hezro hez'roh (חִצְרוֹ H2968, derivation uncertain). A Carmelite included in the list of DAVID's mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:35 [KJV, “Hezrai,” following many Heb. MSS]; 1 Chr. 11:37). On the tenuous grounds that Hezron was from the city of CARMEL, some have speculated that he may have been a servant of NABAL who fled from his master to join David.

Hezron (person) hez'ruhn (חִצְרוֹן H2969, derivation uncertain; gentilic חִצְרוֹנִי H2971, “Hezronite”; Ἑζρών G2272). (1) Son of REUBEN, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Hezronite clan within the tribe of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14; Num. 26:6; 1 Chr. 5:3). Some scholars argue that the Reubenites were assimilated into the tribe of Judah and that these Hezronites became a Judahite clan; see #2 below.

(2) Son of PEREZ and grandson of JUDAH; father of JERAHMEEL, RAM, CALEB (Kelubai), and SEGUB (the latter by the daughter of MAKIR, a Manassite, whom Hezron married at sixty); eponymous ancestor of the Hezronite clan within the tribe of Judah; and ancestor of DAVID (Gen. 46:12; Num. 26:21; Ruth 4:18–19; 1 Chr. 2:5, 9, 18, 21, 24–25; 4:1). Hezron is included in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:3; Lk. 3:33). A few textual problems in 1 Chr. 2 make it difficult to reconstruct certain details regarding Hezron's family; for example, see ABIJAH #3.

Hezron (place) hez'ruhn (חִצְרוֹן H2970, possibly “enclosure, settlement”). A town on the S border of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:3). Hezron was apparently somewhere between KADESH BARNEA and ADDAR, but the precise location is unknown. Regarding the parallel passage (Num. 34:4), see the discussion under HAZAR ADDAR. The town of Hezron is to be distinguished from KERIOTH HEZRON (Josh. 15:25), which was also in the S of Judah.

Hiddai hid'i (חִידַי H2068, possibly “splendor [of God]”). An Ephraimite from the ravines of GAASH, included in the list of DAVID’s mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:30; called “Hurai” in the parallel, 1 Chr. 11:32, probably a scribal error).

Hiddekel hid'uh-kel (חִדְקֶל H2538, from sumer. Idigna; cf. Akk. Idiqlat and Old Pers. Tigrā). The KJV rendering of the Hebrew name for the river TIGRIS (Gen. 2:14; Dan. 10:4).

Hiel hi'uhl (חִיֵּל H2647, possibly “brother of God” or “God lives [here]”). A man of BETHEL who in the days of King AHAB rebuilt the city of JERICO, and the loss of whose sons, ABIRAM and SEGUB, was interpreted as the fulfillment of a curse pronounced by JOSHUA upon anyone who might rebuild the city (1 Ki. 16:34; cf. Josh. 6:26). It is uncertain whether Hiel sacrificed his sons or whether they died a natural death.

Hierapolis hi'uh-rap'uh-lis (Ἱεράπολις G2631, “sacred city”). A city in the Lycus Valley, part of the region of PHRYGIA in W ASIA MINOR (its only NT mention is Col. 4:13). A good contour map of Asia Minor will reveal the importance of the Lycus Valley in the communications system of the peninsula. The chief trade route from the AEGEAN to the EUPHRATES and SYRIA ran due E from EPHESUS, SMYRNA, and MILETUS, up the valley of the Mae-ander. The central plateau of Asia Minor had to be surmounted, and the best approach to the high country, which topped 8,500 ft., was manifestly by the gentler gradients of the river valleys. The highway ran due E until it reached the so-called Gates of Phrygia. Beyond this point, where Phrygia and CARIA met, the Maeander Valley became difficult to negotiate and the road followed the Lycus Valley, which continued its easterly direction for some distance before bending in a more northerly direction and ascending the western slopes of the plateau. It was obvious that a highway so important would attract commerce and the population that commerce and trade foster.

The three cities of the Lycus Valley are mentioned in the NT: the rich and self-conscious LAODICEA; COLOSSE, to whose church Paul wrote an important letter; and Hierapolis. The city of Hierapolis lay across the river from Laodicea, distant 6–7 mi., a subsidiary town of the great markets and banking center, a spa of importance, and perhaps a residential area. It occupied a conspicuous position on an elevated ledge of the hills with gleaming white cliffs below. The surviving ruins demonstrate what an unusual building site Hierapolis was.

The name of the city undoubtedly derived from the hot springs located there, a phenomenon always associated with the presence of a deity. Those familiar with any area of thermal activity—e.g., the Yosemite district, or preeminently the Roto-rua district in New Zealand—will be familiar with the features that marked the topography of Hierapolis: the glazed terraces, the whitened banks covered with the chemical deposits of the heavily laden waters, even the Plutonium, as the vent of mephitic gas was called (the Karapiti Blowhole at Wairakei in New Zealand is just such a volcanic phenomenon). The people of Laodicea were no doubt very familiar with the features of thermal activity in nearby Hierapolis. Two matters in the imagery of the apocalyptic letter to that church (Rev. 3:14–20) are based upon it. Highly emulsified and chemically charged mud is a mark of hot springs and probably formed a constituent of the salve for which the valley was known, and which provides the writer with an ironic point (see EYE-SALVE). Water “neither hot nor cold” and emetic in its quality must also have been a feature of the place (New Zealand has a similar nauseating warm soda spring near Lake Rotorua).

The church of Hierapolis was probably founded during PAUL’s Ephesian ministry by that process of diffusion down the main roads that was a principle of his strategy. EPAPHRAS (Col. 4:12–13) may have been active there. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus at the end of the 2nd cent., quotes a tradition that PHILIP ministered in this church. Also, JOHN THE APOSTLE probably served there.

In secular history, Hierapolis was the birthplace of EPICTETUS the STOIC. There was, according to inscriptions, a Jewish community. The Jews of Hierapolis appear to have been organized in trade guilds, of which those of the purple dyers and carpet makers are known. The city recognized these organizations, and also the “congregation of the Jews,” which had its public headquarters and the power to prosecute for religious offenses—privileges that dated from a royal foundation by a Hellenistic king (if the word katoikia G3000, used in this connection, has its common significance of “colony”). The feasts of Unleavened Bread and Pentecost are mentioned in inscriptions. The information is of interest because the close neighborhood of Laodicea makes it likely that the position of Jews in Hierapolis indicates what their standing was in the larger center. Hiereel hi-ih-r’ee-uhl. KJV Apoc. form of JEHIEL (1 Esd. 9:21).

Hieremoth hi-ihr'uh-moth. KJV Apoc. form of JEREMOTH (1 Esd. 9:27, 30).

Hierielus hi-ihr'i-ee'luhs. KJV Apoc. form of JEHIEL (1 Esd. 9:27).

Hiermas hi-uhr'muhs. KJV Apoc. form of RAMIAH (1 Esd. 9:25).

hieroglyphics. See WRITING.

Hieronimus hi'uh-ron'uh-muhs (ἱερώνυμος, “of hallowed name”). A district governor in Palestine under ANTIOCHUS V who, with his fellow governors, harassed the Jews (2 Macc. 12:2).

Higgaion hi-gay'yon (הִגָּיוֹן H2053). A musical term of uncertain meaning, used in conjunction with Selah (Ps. 9:16). The Hebrew word is used three other times, once with the meaning “melody, sounding, playing” (Ps. 92:3; elsewhere “meditation, planning,” Ps. 19:14, and “murmur, talk,” Lam. 3:62). See MUSIC VI.D.

high (higher) gate. See UPPER GATE.

high place. The usual English rendering of Hebrew bāmâ H1195 (Lev. 26:30 and frequently in cultic contexts), a term that otherwise means “back” (like Ugar. bmt [C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Manual [1955], §19.332]; cf. Deut. 33:29 NRSV) or “ridge, height” (like Akk. bāmtu; cf. Num. 21:28 et al.). A high place, as the term indicates, was usually an elevated geographic site (one “goes up” or “comes down” from it, 1 Sam. 9:13, 25). In the OT, the term takes on the specialized meaning of a place of WORSHIP ordinarily situated on a hill or mountain and commonly associated with false religions. Such sanctuaries could however be found at city gates (cf. 2 Ki. 23:8), which have no apparent connection with an elevated area; and some “high places” were located even in valleys (Jer. 7:31; 19:5–6; 32:35). Other Hebrew terms of comparable meaning can also be used in a cultic sense (e.g., gab H1461, “mound,” and rāmâ H8229, “height,” in Ezek. 16:24–25, 31, 39; note also šēpî H9155, “barren height,” Num. 23:3–4; Jer. 3:21–23; 7:29).

The selection of an elevated spot seems psychological, for this location put the worshiper above his immediate environment with its mundane associations and placed him nearer the skies, where the ultimate object of worship was believed to reside. In the plains of ancient MESOPOTAMIA, the feeling for a height for religious observances led to the construction of the staged or terraced temple tower, or ZIGGURAT. A requirement for the high place was an ALTAR, often simply made of unhewn stones, on which animal sacrifices could be slain and then offered by fire. Related to the high place was a tree or pole of wood that served as an idol or as an adjunct to worship (cf. ASHERAH). In Muslim areas, a weli (shrine) of a departed sheikh typically has nearby a tree to which the faithful may attach items that will bring the needs of the worshiper to the attention of the spiritual benefactor.

Frequently the high place had a stone symbol, a kind of obelisk or pillar (Heb. maššēbâ H5167, Exod. 23:24 et al.) that also was an object of veneration or a commemorative monument. The high place could also contain images of heathen gods placed in a shrine (cf. 2 Ki. 17:29). Sometimes the high place had a basin or tank where water could be kept for ablutions or libations. In addition to violating the greatest commandment, the IDOLATRY of the high place involved the breaking of other divine laws, for the worship of certain deities demanded human sacrifice (usually of infants or children) and the celebration of rites of a sexual nature, whether religious PROSTITUTION or homosexual acts.

Several examples of these high places are known from archaeological evidence. A large oval platform measuring 8 x 10 yards and standing 6 yards high has been found at MEGIDDO. A flight of steps led up to the platform and sacrifices were obviously offered upon this shrine, which was built in the middle of the 3rd millennium B.C. Similar examples are known from Hazar (13th cent. B.C.), Nahariyah near Haifa (18th or 17th cent. B.C.), and at Malhah, SE of Jerusalem (7th–6th cent. B.C.). Among the best known examples of actual high places visible today are those of GEZER and PETRA (see R. A. S. Macalister, The Excavation of Gezer [1912], 2:281–411).

The Canaanites used the high places long before the Israelite conquest of the land, but the first mention of such a shrine in the Bible appears in connection with that event. The children of Israel were commanded to demolish the high places of the Canaanites, along with the idols of those people (Num. 33:52). At the same time the Lord warned the Israelites that if they disobeyed his laws he would punish them and destroy their high places and false worship (Lev. 26:30; cf. Ps. 78:58). After the destruction of SHILOH and before the building of the TEMPLE at Jerusalem, the high place was used as a site of true worship. SAMUEL blessed the offering which the people made at the high place (1 Sam. 9:12–14). When SAUL consulted Samuel, Samuel invited him to take part in the feast at the high place. On his way home, Saul was met by a band of prophets coming down from the high place of GIBEAH (10:5, 10); Saul prophesied with them and also went to the high place (v. 13).

The chronicler remarked that the tabernacle of the Lord was situated at the high place of GIBEON during the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 16:39; 21:29; 2 Chr. 1:3–4). In the time of SOLOMON, mention is made of sacrificing at the high places, because a temple had not yet been built (1 Ki. 3:2–3). At the great high place of Gibeon, Solomon offered a thousand burnt offerings (v. 4; cf. 2 Chr. 1:3–6, 13). In his later years Solomon fell into apostasy and built high places for the Moabite CHEMOSH and the Ammonite MOLECH on the mountain E of Jerusalem (1 Ki. 11:7–8; cf. 2 Ki. 23:13). At the division of the kingdom, JEROBOAM tried to prevent the Israelites from going to Jerusalem for the religious festivals: he set up calves of gold at BETHEL and DAN (PLACE), built houses on high places, and appointed non-Levitical priests to serve at the high places (1 Ki. 12:26–32; cf. 13:33; 2 Chr. 11:15). A prophet of God predicted that the priests of the high place of Bethel would be sacrificed upon that altar and that the altar would be torn down (1 Ki. 13:2–3).

Meanwhile, in the southern kingdom there was also apostasy; during the reign of REHOBOAM,

“They also set up for themselves high places, sacred stones and Asherah poles on every high hill and under every spreading tree. There were even male shrine prostitutes in the land” (1 Ki. 14:23–24). When ASA became king of Judah, he initiated many religious reforms, but “he did not remove the high places” (15:12–14). The Chronicler provides more details: “He removed the foreign altars and the high places, smashed the sacred stones and cut down the Asherah poles” (2 Chr. 14:3) and also “removed the high places and incense altars in every town in Judah” (v. 5), but “he did not remove the high places from Israel” (15:17).

In similar fashion, JEHOSEPHAT “did what was right in the eyes of the LORD. The high places, however, were not removed, and the people continued to offer sacrifices and burn incense there” (1 Ki. 22:43). Some reforms of Jehoshaphat are indicated: “he removed the high places and the Asherah poles out of Judah” (2 Chr. 17:6; cf. 20:33). His son, the murderous JEHORAM, did what was evil and “built high places on the hills of Judah” (21:11). JOASH again did what was right, but the high places remained and the people continued to use them (2 Ki. 12:3). His son AMAZIAH followed his father’s policy, with the same results (14:3–4), as did his son UZZIAH (Azariah, 15:3–4), and Uzziah’s son JOTHAM (15:34–35). AHAZ, the son of Jotham, departed from his father’s ways and followed the kings of Israel; he even burned his son as an offering, and sacrificed and burned incense on the high places he made in every city in Judah (16:3–4).

The fall of SAMARIA was the result of sin and was related to the worship conducted at the high places (2 Ki. 17:7–18). The Israelites built high places in all of their towns, “from watchtower to fortified city” (v. 9). “They set up sacred stones and Asherah poles on every high hill and under every spreading tree. At every high place they burned incense” and “worshiped idols” (vv. 10–12). This apostasy involved the making of an Asherah, the worship of the host of heaven, the service of BAAL, the offering of sons and daughters, and the use of divination and sorcery (vv. 16–17). The people who replaced the deported Israelites made their own gods and “set them up in the shrines the people of Samaria had made at the high places” (17:29), but they also feared the Lord and appointed priests to sacrifice for them in the shrines of the high places (v. 32).

In Judah, HEZEKIAH introduced some far-sweeping reforms; he removed the high places, breaking the pillars, cutting down the Asherah poles, and even smashing the NEHUSHTAN, the bronze serpent of the wilderness wanderings (2 Ki. 18:3–4; 2 Chr. 31:1; Isa. 36:7). MANASSEH, the son of Hezekiah, went contrary to his father’s example; he rebuilt the high places his father had torn down and brought many elements of heathen religion into Judah and Jerusalem (2 Ki. 21:2–9, esp. v. 3; 2 Chr. 33:3–9, 17, 19). In the revival during the reign of JOSIAH, extensive reforms were again carried out (2 Ki. 23:4–25; 2 Chr. 34:3–7); Josiah deposed the idolatrous priests who served at the high places (2 Ki. 23:5); he defiled the high places, from GEBA to BEERSHEBA, and broke down the high places of the gates (v. 8). He defiled the high places E of Jerusalem, which Solomon had built for Ash-toreth, Chemosh, and Milcom (v. 13; cf. 1 Ki. 11:7). He utterly destroyed the high place at Bethel and burned human bones upon it (2 Ki. 23:15–16; cf. 1 Ki. 13:2).

The prophets spoke boldly against the high places, whether of Israel or the surrounding nations. Isaiah and Jeremiah mention the high places of MOAB (Isa. 15:2; 16:12; Jer. 48:35). Jeremiah refers to the high place of TOPHETH, which was built in the HINNOM Valley (Jer. 7:31), where people burned their children as offerings to Baal (19:5). Ezekiel and others also prophesied that the high places of Israel would be destroyed (Ezek. 6:3; Hos. 10:8; Amos 7:9). The prophet described the worship of the high places and made a word play on the name BAMAH (Ezek. 20:27–31). The Babylonian captivity served as a severe lesson to Israel concerning idolatry, and after that event no more is said in the Bible concerning high places.

high priest. See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

Hilen hi’luhn (חִילָן H2664). A Levitical town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH, assigned to the descendants of KOHATH (1 Chr. 6:58 [MT, v. 43], according to many Heb. MSS; the MT reads ḥîlēz). The parallel passage has HOLON (Josh. 21:15).

Hilkiah hil-ki’uh (חִלְקִיָּה H2759, חִלְקִיָּה H2760, “Yahweh is my portion”). (1) Son of Amzi, descendant of MERARI, and ancestor of the Levite musician ETHAN (1 Chr. 6:45).

(2) Son of HOSAH and descendant of Merari; he was a Levite gatekeeper during the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:11).

(3) Father of ELIAKIM, who was palace administrator under King HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 18:18, 26, 37; Isa. 22:20; 36:3).

(4) Father of JEREMIAH the prophet and a priest in ANATHOTH (Jer. 1:1). It is often suggested that he descended from ABIATHAR, David’s high priest, whom SOLOMON exiled to Anathoth for supporting ADONIJAH (1 Ki.2:26–27).

(5) Father of GEMARIAH, who carried a message from Jeremiah to the captive Jews (Jer. 29:3).

(6) Son of Shallum (Meshullam), high priest in the time of King JOSIAH, and ancestor of EZRA; this is the Hilkiah who helped Josiah in his religious reforms and who found the Book of the Law in the temple (2 Ki. 22:4–14; 23:4; 1 Chr. 6:13; 9:11; 2 Chr. 34:9–22; 35:8; Ezra 7:1; Neh. 11:11; 1 Esd. 1:8 [KJV, “Helkias”]; 8:1 [KJV, “Helchiah”]; 2 Esd. 1:1 [KJV, “Helchiah”]; Bar. 1:7 [KJV, “Chelcias”]).

(7) One of the leaders of the priests who returned from EXILE with ZERUBBABEL and JESHUA (Neh. 12:7); his son or descendant Hashabiah later became leader of his priestly family (v. 21).

(8) One of the prominent men who stood near EZRA when the law was read at the great assembly (Neh. 8:4; called “Hezekiah” in 1 Esd. 9:43). He may be the same as #7 above.

(9) An ancestor of BARUCH, the servant of Jeremiah (Bar. 1:1; KJV, “Chelcias”).

(10) The father of SUSANNA (SUS. 2, 29, 63; KJV, “Chelcias”).

(11) Son of Eliab and ancestor of JUDITH (Jdt. 8:1; omitted in KJV).

hill. Natural land elevations in PALESTINE are seldom more than 3,000 ft. high, and therefore what English Bibles call “mountains” may in some other parts of the world be regarded as nothing more than high hills. Only familiarity with the geography of the land will enable the reader to know what sort of elevation is meant. Moving eastward from the Mediterranean, Palestine is divided into four main geographical divisions: the maritime plain along the coast; the SHEPHELAH or “hill country”; the JORDAN valley; and the TRANSJORDAN plateau. Most of the country is hilly and mountainous.

The most common Hebrew term for “hill,” “hill country,” “mountain,” or “mountain range” is har H2215, which occurs almost 500 times. It is often applied to ZION (PSS. 2:6; 48:2, 11). A hilly area often is identified with the designation “the hill country of” (e.g., of Judah and Israel, Josh.

11:21; of Ephraim, 17:15; of Naphtali, 20:7). Another term, gib'â H1496, which occurs more than 60 times, refers to elevated terrain in general, although never to a range of mountains (Exod. 17:9 et al.); it can also be used as a proper name (GIBEAH of Saul, 1 Sam. 11:4; 15:34; of Benjamin, 13:16). See also OPHEL.

The general Greek word for “hill” is bounos G1090 (only Lk. 3:5; 23:30). More frequent is oros G4001, which can also be rendered “hill” (e.g., Matt. 5:14), but more typically “mountain” (4:8 et al.). (See NIDOTTE, 1:805, 1051–54; NIDNTT, 3:1009–13.)

Hillel hil'uhl, hi-lel' (הלל H2148, prob. “he has praised”). (1) Father of ABDON; the latter led Israel for eight years during the time of the judges (Jdg. 12:13, 15). See JUDGES, PERIOD OF IV.

(2) A Jewish scholar (c. 60 B.C. to A.D. 20), reputed to have played a foundational role in the development of the oral law. He and his contemporary Shammai mark the beginning of the Tan-naitic period in rabbinic history (see MISHNAH), although it is difficult to determine the historical value of statements attributed to them (for a skeptical approach, cf. J. Neusner, From Politics to Piety: The Emergence of Pharisaic Judaism [1973], ch. 2, which popularizes parts of his earlier work, The Rabbinic Traditions about the Pharisees before 70, 3 vols. [1971]).

According to tradition, Hillel was head of the SANHEDRIN during part of the reign of King HEROD. A native of BABYLON, he desired earnestly to study Torah in Jerusalem under the famed teachers there. He went to Jerusalem, but because of his extreme poverty, he was not able to pay for such study. It is said that he sat upon the window to hear the words of the learned teachers, Shema'iah and Abtalion. One Sabbath eve as he sat on the window, the snow fell, covering him three cubits deep. In the morning Shema'iah asked Abtalion why the house was so dark. They then spied Hillel in the window and brought him in. Any man thinking himself too poor to study Torah was often referred to Hillel's example: “Were you poorer than Hillel?”

The legends that are told of Hillel magnify his kindness and gentleness and contrast him with his colleague, Shammai, a native Judean, who was said to be of a harsher disposition, impatient, and irascible. The personalities of Hillel and Shammai are also reflected in their interpretation of the law, Hillel being more humanitarian and liberal, Shammai more stringent and conservative. These tendencies were later reflected in the two schools associated with their names, although in many specific cases the “House of Hillel” ruled with greater stringency than that of Shammai. Especially after A.D. 70, the generally progressive school of Hillel became preeminent, thus giving direction to the course of classical Judaism.

Perhaps the best-known anecdote concerning these two rabbis concerns a heathen who went to see Shammai and stated that he would embrace Judaism provided it could be explained to him while he stood on one foot. In response, Shammai chased him out with a measuring stick, but when the man spoke to Hillel, the latter answered: “Do not do to your neighbors what is hateful to you. This is the whole law; the rest is commentary” (b Šabb 31a). Such moral and ethical aphorisms characterize Hillel's contribution to Pharisaic and Talmudic Judaism. To many, Hillel was a second E ZRA from Babylonia, one who came to establish the law and its interpretation among the people.

Hillel is credited for having developed seven rules of biblical INTERPRETATION; these made it possible to draw from the written law logically valid principles that could be applied juridically. The most famous enactment ascribed to him was the Prosbul, which concerned the cancellation of debts in the sabbatical year (Deut. 15:2). Fearing the loss of their money, wealthy individuals were unwilling to lend to the poor as the sabbatical year approached. Hillel's interpretation, however, made it possible for a creditor to make the court his agent; because the debt, through this fiction, was no longer of a private nature, it could be collected even after the sabbatical year. Although such a ruling was motivated by humanitarian reasons, it allowed people to feel justified when they refused to cancel the debts owed to them.

hin. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES III.A.

hind. This English term (the female of HART) is used by the KJV to render Hebrew ʾayyālā H387 (Gen. 49:21 et al.); modern versions usually translate “doe.” See DEER.

hind of the morning. The RSV rendering of ʾayyelet haššaḥar (Ps. 22 title; NIV, “Doe of the Morning”; NRSV, “Deer of the Dawn”). This is either the name of a particular melody that was popular in the day of the psalmist and was the cue to the way the psalm should be sung, or it is some type of technical musical term. Since this is the only place the phrase occurs, it may be best to leave it untranslated (cf. KJV and NASB). See MUSIC VI.B.

G. GIACUMAKIS, JR.

hinge. This English term, referring to a device that allows a DOOR or lid to turn, is used rarely in Bible versions (e.g., to render the unique Hebrew word šîr H7494, Prov. 26:14). Most of the ancient hinges were of a pivot type that would fit into a socket (cf. 1 Ki. 7:50 KJV).

Hinnom, Valley of (Ben) hin'uhm (הִנּוֹם H2183). A valley that ran W and S of JERUSALEM, along the boundary of the tribes of JUDAH and BENJAMIN (Josh. 15:8; 18:16); the POTSHERD GATE led to it (Jer. 19:2). The valley had an evil reputation in later OT times because it was the site of TOPHETH, where parents made their children pass through the fire to BAAL and MOLECH. Kings AHAZ and MANASSEH were guilty of this horrible abomination (2 Chr. 28:3; 33:6). Isaiah refers to it, although not by name, as a place where the dead bodies of the unbelieving shall lie, and where their worm shall not die and the fire is not quenched (Isa. 66:24).

Aerial view of Jerusalem (looking NE). The Hinnom Valley lies to the W and S of the Old City.

Jeremiah predicted that God would visit the place with such awful destruction because of its wickedness that it would become known as the “Valley of Slaughter” (Jer. 7:31–34). King JOSIAH defiled this place so as to make it unfit for its idolatrous rites (2 Ki. 23:10). It became a type of sin, punishment, and misery because the bodies of dead animals and criminals were burned at its ever-burning fires. The Hebrew name gê-hinnōm is the origin of the term GEHENNA, which in the NT is used to designate the place of eternal punishment.

The location of the valley has been much disputed. All three of the valleys around Jerusalem have been identified with it—the KIDRON to the E, the Tyropoeon in the center, and the Wadi er-Rababi on the W. Early Jewish, Christian, and Muslim writers identified it with Kidron, but scarcely anyone does so today. Since the Tyropoeon Valley was incorporated within the city walls before the time of Manasseh, it is extremely unlikely that it could have been the place of the sacrifice of children, which must have been done outside the walls (2 Ki. 21:10–15). The Wadi er-Rababi location has the most support. It begins W of the Jaffa gate, turns S about a third of a mile, and gradually curves E to join the Kidron Valley. If Bir Ayyub is the biblical E N ROGEL (Josh. 15:7; 18:16), as seems probable, then the Wadi er-Rababi locates the Valley of Hinnom.

hip. This English term is used a few times in Bible versions to render Hebrew yārēk H3751, which properly refers to the upper THIGH. JACOB was struck on the socket of his hip (Gen. 32:25; KJV, “the hollow of his thigh”) to reduce his feeling of self-sufficiency and to make him lean upon God. This Hebrew term is used alongside another word meaning “thigh” or “leg” (šôq H8797) when the biblical writer says that SAMSON struck the PHILISTINES šôq (al-yārāk (Jdg. 15:8), an unusual expression that the KJV and NRSV render somewhat literally, “hip and thigh,” while the NIV interprets it to mean “viciously.” The NRSV also uses “hips” once to translate motnayim H5516 (Exod. 28:42; NIV, “waist”; see LOINS) and twice to translate the plural of šēt H9268 (2 Sam. 10:4; 1 Chr. 19:4; NIV, “buttocks”).

hippopotamus. See BEHEMOTH.

Hirah hi'ruh (חִירָה H2669, derivation uncertain). A Canaanite man from the town of ADULLAM with whom JUDAH stayed after leaving his brothers (Gen. 38:1 NIV; according to the NRSV, Judah “settled near” Hirah). Subsequently Hirah is described as a friend of Judah (vv. 12, 20; the LXX and the Vulg., vocalizing the Heb. differently, have “shepherd” instead of “friend”); he was sent to get back the pledge that Judah had given to a woman he thought was a prostitute (in reality, TAMAR; see vv.13–26).

Hiram, Hiram hi'ruhm, hyoor'uhm (חִירָם H2671, חִירֹם H2670 [1 Ki. 5:10, 18; 7:40], חִירָם H2586 [only in Chronicles]; from Phoen. אַחְרָם, “my brother is lifted up”). To avoid confusion, the NIV uses “Hiram” for #1 below and “Hiram” for #2; in the Hebrew text, however, both forms are used for both individuals.

(1) The king of TYRE in the reigns of DAVID and SOLOMON, with whom he had peaceful and friendly relations. After David captured Jerusalem and made it his capital, Hiram sent him wood, carpenters, and stonemasons to build his palace (2 Sam. 5:11). When Solomon ascended the throne, Hiram wrote to the new king expressing the hope that the long-existing friendship he had enjoyed with David would continue with Solomon. Thus Solomon asked for help in building a temple and a new palace, projects that took him twenty years to complete. Hiram sent him wood—cedar, pine, and algum—from the forests of LEBANON and all the gold he needed (1 Ki. 5:1–9; 2 Chr. 2:3–10), together with all the skilled workmen necessary for erecting and furnishing them. In return, Solomon sent him every year “twenty thousand cors of wheat as food for his household, in addition to twenty thousand baths of pressed olive oil” (1 Ki. 5:11). He also gave Hiram twenty cities in GALILEE, but when Hiram inspected them, he told Solomon he was not well pleased with them (9:10–14). When Solomon built a fleet of ships at EZION GEBER in EDOM, on the shore of the RED SEA, Hiram sent him experienced seamen to work with Solomon’s men on the ships. Once every three years they brought to Solomon gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks (1 Ki. 10:22; 2 Chr. 9:21).

According to JOSEPHUS (Apion 1.17–18), the father of Hiram was Abibalus, who had been king of Tyre before him. He also comments that Hiram and Solomon wrote many letters to each other, consulting one another on problems they had—for which Solomon had the better solutions. Josephus reports that Hiram died at the age of fifty-three, after a prosperous reign of thirty-four years. The reliability of these and other details is questioned by some scholars. (See H. J. Katzenstein, The History of Tyre: From the Beginning of the Second Millennium B. C.E. until the Fall of the Neo-Babylonian Empire in 538 B. C.E. [1973]; H. Donner in Studies in the Period of David and Solomon and Other Essays, ed. T. Ishida [1982], 205–14.)

(2) A skilled craftsman sent by King Hiram to Solomon to help him build his palace and the temple. He is also called Hiram-Abi (חִירָם אֲבִי H2587, 2 Chr. 2:13 [KJV, “Hiram my father”; cf. LXX]; חִירָם אֲבִי, 4:16 [KJV, “Hiram his father”]; the second element may be a title). His father was a native of Tyre of a family of craftsmen, but his mother was of the tribe of NAPHTALI (1 Ki. 14:2); according to the Chronicler, however, she was of the daughters of DAN (2 Chr. 2:13; see the discussion in R. B. Dillard, 2 Chronicles, WBC 15 [1987], 4–5, 20–21). He was skilled in working with all sorts of materials—gold and silver, copper and iron, wood, and cloth—and was a fine engraver. Among the important metal parts of the temple and its furnishings that he made were the two bronze pillars, called Jakin and Boaz, the elaborate capitals on the pillars, the molten sea and the twelve oxen on which it rested, ten bases of bronze, ten basins of bronze, and the pots, shovels, and tossing-bowls used in the temple.

hire. See WAGES.

hireling. This English term, which today has a negative connotation (someone who does menial or even offensive work for pay), is used several times in the KJV to render Hebrew śākîr H8502 (Job 7:1 et al.) and Greek misthōtos G3638 (only Jn. 10:12–13). Modern versions prefer such renderings as “laborer” and “hired hand.” See LABOR; WAGES.

hiss. To make a sharp sibilant sound (like a prolonged s or sh), an act of special meaning in many Near Eastern cultures. The English term is used by the KJV and other versions mainly to render the Hebrew verb šāraq H9239, “to whistle,” which occurs a dozen times in the OT (Job 27:23 et al.). Because hissing is used to express derision, the NIV often renders it with “scoff” (e.g., 1 Ki. 9:8). The related noun is šērēqâ H9240, “whistling, hissing” (2 Chr. 29:8 et al.; NIV, “scorn”).

history. A narrative of events or the study of the past. God often has been isolated from history or too closely linked with it. Karl Marx refused even to consider divine activity in history because history is the outcome of matter in motion. Many of the theological existentialists so link God with what they call holy history that he is uninterested in the historical events resulting from human action. Others invert biblical ideas. PROVIDENCE is replaced by progress, ETERNITY by time, and a MILLENNIUM by an earthly Utopia brought about by human activity in a secular setting. The Bible, however, links the events of SALVATION with empirically verifiable history except for CREATION (Heb. 11:3) and the final consummation of history (2 Pet. 3; see ESCHATOLOGY).

I. The Bible and the definition of history. History may be defined as events in time and space that have social significance. The Bible indicates that the coming of Christ to earth in the home of Joseph is to be linked with history (Gal. 4:4; Jn. 1:14, 18). History in this sense is absolute, occurring only once in time and space, and cannot be directly studied by the historian as the scientist can study his data.

If we follow Thucydides’ use of the Greek word historia (from which our word history is ultimately derived), and consider it as the documents, remains, or relics of historical action or as research upon those events through these remains, then biblical writers think of history in this sense too. LUKE in the prologue to his gospel makes the claim that he used both secondary narratives and firsthand accounts by eyewitnesses of the life of Christ (Lk. 1:1–4). He describes how he did research upon the data to write his gospel in a manner similar to that of the modern historian. If history is defined as literary reconstruction of the past to record the events by the study of documents, Luke suggests that this is his objective. The Bible seems to emphasize history as events relating the acts of God to the acts of human beings, but history as document, research, or reconstruction is also given consideration.

II. The Bible and the writing of history. Luke and other biblical writers give attention to the method of the historian. Luke’s prologue is a summary of much of what one finds concerning historical methodology in the best modern manuals on that subject. As already noted, he points out in his prologue that he used several secondary narratives of the life of Christ. His use of the word “us” (Lk. 1:1–2) and “also” (v. 3) suggests that he thought these were valid documents. Like modern historians, he emphasized his use of firsthand information of eyewitnesses. Mary’s story of the birth of Christ in chs. 1–2 must have been one of these eyewitness sources. He would agree also with other biblical writers that one should have two independent witnesses to an event to confirm truth (Deut. 19:15; Jn. 8:17; 2 Cor. 13:1). His material was therefore empirical as well as revelational. Luke’s use of the word parakolouthēō G4158, “to follow closely” (Lk. 1:3) suggests the idea of careful personal investigation of documents and eyewitnesses to reconstruct the events. The word akribōs G209, “exactly, accurately,” also suggests his care in the testing and use of material.

The biblical writers recognized that, while God claims that some TRUTH is his alone, other truth concerning historical events has been given to us (Deut. 29:29; Amos 3:7). Luke believed that facts drawn from records of the events should be related in an orderly synthesis which would yield meaning, certainty, or truth concerning the matter under investigation (Lk. 1:4). PAUL (1 Cor. 10:6, 11) and PETER (2 Pet. 2:16) believed that a good historical reconstruction of past events should have moral value in helping one to avoid the mistakes and sins of the past. Paul also asserts that written history will have a positive function (Rom. 15:4). History in their opinion has a didactic, moral, or intellectual function in life that makes us better and wiser.

III. The Bible and the meaning of history. The historian may be scientific in his method of gathering and evaluating documentary evidence concerning past events, but engages in what is philosophic work when he asks what meanings his carefully gleaned facts have. If, as it may be defined, philosophy is an attempt to find a unifying principle by which events can be integrated and related to ultimate meaning, then the Bible is also philosophic and has an underlying philosophy of history that all the writers hold in common. Both the secular and the divine history are related to the historical process.

Some writers, such as Oswald Spengler, think of history as cyclical, deterministic, and lacking any progress. Others in the liberal tradition of the Renaissance and Enlightenment are so sure man can make progress in history by his own efforts that they replace the treadmill or cycle of history with an escalator or spiral or upward-moving graph to picture their belief in progress by the efforts of perfectible human beings. Theological existentialists, who accept the universality of sin, are not so optimistic, but do have confidence that God will bring an end to history outside history. Evangelicals prefer to take their stand with the biblical writers, who were “pessimistic optimists” in their interpretation of history.

A. The source Of history. Biblical writers assert that God is the source of history because he initiates it through his sovereign creative will and acts within it. Events such as the birth and resurrection of Christ are as historically verifiable as those initiated by human beings (with the exception of the creation and the consummation of history, which come to us by revelation). History is neither an evolving process in which God is imprisoned, nor the result of chance. Instead it is an act of the sovereign self-sufficient God (Gen. 1:1; Rom. 11:36). Isaiah pictures God as the Creator of heaven and earth (Isa. 40:26, 28; 42:5; 45:12). Jeremiah (Jer. 27:5) and the psalmist (Pss. 8:3, 6; 19:1; 24:1–2), as well as John (Rev. 4:11) and Paul (Acts 17:25; Rom. 1:19–21), agree with Isaiah.

Man as the chief actor on the earthly stage of history is also pictured by the biblical writers as the result of divine creativity. They did not think of him as the result of a natural process (Gen. 1:26–28; 2:7; Job 33:4; Pss. 8:5–6; 24:1; 139:14–16; Isa. 42:5; 43:7; 45:12; Jer. 27:5; Acts 17:24–26; Heb. 11:3). Man's task was to master nature for his good and the glory of God (Gen. 1:28; Ps. 8:6–8).

When speaking of CREATION, the biblical writers reveal their belief that the preexistent Christ was the divine agent of God the Father (Jn. 1:4; Col. 1:16; Heb. 1:2–3). Christ is neither an indifferent transcendent Creator nor enmeshed in pantheistic fashion in his creation. History is a linear process moving to a meaningful end under the divine guidance rather than a meaningless series of cycles or an evolutionary escalator to progress. God and Christ are also considered to be the source of moral values to enlighten conscience after the FALL (Jn. 8:9; Rom. 2:15).

This is not to say that the biblical writers ignore the role in history of secondary horizontal factors, such as geography, economics, or great individuals. They recognize the role of the economic factor in history as a secondary or contingent, but never as a final cause (Deut. 8:3; Matt. 4:4; 1 Thess. 4:11–12). These factors all have their proper subordinate role.

B. The scope Of history. The biblical writers—unlike G. W. F. Hegel, who limited the divine in history to his ideal monarchical Protestant Prussian state, or K. Marx, who looked to the chosen proletariat to achieve a workers' Utopia—look upon history as a universal and unitary process that involved the human race rather than any chosen segment of it. All are linked with ADAM as the head of the race (Acts 17:26; Rom. 5:12–19).

There is, however, a clear concept of temporal dualism within history because of the entry of sin into the race by the failure of Adam and Eve in the garden. This event affected everyone, leaving human beings corrupt and sinful (Gen. 3; Ps. 51:5; Jer. 13:23; 17:9; Rom. 5:12–19; 1 Cor. 15:22). Even nature is pictured in the Bible as affected by the human failure to obey God (Gen. 3:17; Rom. 8:22–23). This sin becomes self-assertion contrary to God's will. This dualism is developed in time as some become the willing subjects of God's kingdom through faith in the incarnate Christ, whose cross offers an opportunity for grace and the destruction of the work of Satan (Jn. 1:14; 1 Jn. 3:5, 8). Others reject this proffered grace to form the earthly city. This dualism in time is temporary and is to be resolved at the end of time and history by the coming of Christ.

Human beings are not only finite (Ps. 115:16) as creatures, but also fallen and fallible. They are subjected to the pressures of Satan, the world around them, and the tendency of their fleshly nature to evil (Eph. 2:2–3; 1 Jn. 2:15–16). This tragic flaw makes human progress impossible except in limited areas of technical and scientific progress. Biblical realism is thus opposed to the optimistic monism of the Renaissance and the Enlightenment and modern liberalism. Modern history with its Stalins and Hitlers demonstrates that man can be demonic and defiant.

C. The scheme of history. (1) Paul considers the scheme, or course, or pattern of history to be controlled by the divine sovereignty (Rom. 11:36; Eph. 4:6). God is transcendent to nature but manifests his power in it as providence. His creatures profit by the uniformity of nature. Whether nature is good or bad, it is sustained in its course by divine power (Job 12:10; Col. 1:17; Heb. 1:3). Natural calamities may come, but to biblical writers they are the result of interim judgment of God in history to bring sinners to repentance (Joel 1:4; 2:23–26). Others may come because human sin violates the divine order in nature by ravishing the soil or denuding the hills of their forest cover. It is this uniformity of nature under divine providence that provides a basis for science.

(2) The Bible traces human institutions to the act of God. The FAMILY (Gen. 1:28; 2:20; Deut. 4:7–10; Matt. 19:4–6; Eph. 6:4) and human GOVERNMENT (Gen. 9:5–6; Rom. 13:1–7; 1 Pet. 2:14–17) are depicted in Scripture as gifts of God to promote orderly SOCIETY. Without them society would become hopelessly anarchic and chaotic. God also is pictured as the sovereign controller of the events of history and particularly the affairs of the three most significant groups in Scripture, the Gentile nations, the Jews, and the church (1 Cor. 10:32). DANIEL links spiritual beings with historical events in the history of nations (Dan. 10:13, 21; 12:1).

(3) Several writers express the general principle that nations operate under the sovereignty of God even though they may ignore him in their domestic and diplomatic policies (Deut. 32:8; Isa. 40:15, 28; Jer. 46:28; Dan. 2:21, 37; 4:17, 32–35; 5:21; Acts 17:26; Rom. 9:17, 22–23). Special nations are said to be under divine governance. Syria and Philistia as well as Israel have been brought to their place of habitation by the act of God (Amos 9:7). Edom is punished for her treachery toward those that were tied to her by blood (Obadiah). Ezekiel sees Egypt suffering judgment under the hand of God (Ezek. 26:10; 29:6, 13, 19; 30:4, 10, 19, 26).

Isaiah believes that God had a hand in the history of empires, such as Assyria (Isa. 10:5; 30:31; 37:36; 38:6), to effect his will. Jonah is forced to recognize the mercy of God to a repentant Nineveh, a great city of Assyria. Babylonian kings had to learn that God ruled over their nation and put them in office (Dan. 2:21, 37; 4:18, 32–35; 5:12). They were used to punish the sinful Jewish nation and to wean her finally from the worship of idols (Jer. 24:5; 25:9–12; 27:5–11; 46:13; 50:11; Dan. 9:1; Hab. 1:1–11). Babylon also was reminded that God would finally punish her for her sins after she had served his purpose (Jer. 25; 27; Hab. 2). Persia with her more tolerant policy is linked by the biblical writers with the deliverance of the Jews from the Babylonian Captivity (Ezra 1:1–3; Isa. 5:11; 13:7; 44:28; 45:1). Although human leaders have freedom to act and are responsible for their actions in history, the writers of the Bible believe that God uses nations to effect his will and judges them in history. Battles such as those at Marathon and the naval defeat of the Spanish Armada, as well as the rise of the Frankish nation in western Europe and the Byzantine Empire in eastern Europe to protect the western and eastern flanks of Europe in a period of weakness, may also be illustrations of the same principles.

(4) God's control of events is especially linked with the history of the Jews, who are looked upon by the writers of the OT as God's chosen people who are to reveal his will to the nations. Their continuity and persistence as a nation makes them a problem for the modern scientific historian. The nation emerged in an interlude between about 1200 and 800 B.C. when the Egyptian and Hittite empires had fallen and the Assyrian and Babylonian empires had not yet risen. Thus Jews were not hindered in their growth to an empire under Solomon. They were said to be chosen by God (Gen. 15:13–16; Deut. 2:25; 4:34; 6:12; 7:6; 11:12; 15:6; 20:17–18; Ezek. 23:9), rescued from Egypt and brought to their land by him (Amos 9:7). God was said to be present in their dispersal and captivity in Babylon (cf. Jer. 24:5; 25:9–12; Dan. 1:2). In the light of several passages (Isa. 11:11; 27:11; Jer. 31:33, 35–37; Ezek. 37), one can well presume that these prophets would have rejoiced in the modern emergence of Israel as a nation in 1948. Perhaps the Jews' long period of being set aside as a nation in the present era (Lk. 21:24; Acts 15:14; Rom. 11:25–26) is nearing the end when God will more particularly deal with them again.

(5) NT writers affirm that God in the period of Jewish national eclipse is using the CHURCH. Peter sees the church as chosen of God and redeemed by Christ's sacrifice (1 Pet. 1:18–21). It was to proclaim Christ's grace to all (Matt. 28:18–20; Lk. 24:45–48; Acts 1:8; 2 Cor. 5), to have an impact on the culture of their day (Eph. 2:10; Tit. 3:8), to display his wisdom to the universe (Eph. 3:10), and to glorify God (Eph. 3:20) until the time of Christ's second advent.

(6) Above all, the Bible writers look upon Christ, largely ignored by classical Roman writers, as the source of all knowledge and wisdom (Col. 2:2–3). He becomes the center of linear history as well as the key to its fulfillment and consummation. Unlike the Greeks, whose leaders became gods, John and others see Christ as the God who became man in the fullness of time (Jn. 1:14; Acts 2:23; 4:28; Gal. 4:4; 1 Pet. 1:20) in order to minister to and redeem sinners by his death on the cross (Mk. 10:45). His resurrection was looked upon as a historic event that confirmed his divine origin and work (Acts 17:2, 3; Rom. 1:4; 4:25; 1 Cor. 15:3–4). God then gave to him all authority in time (Matt. 11:27–28; 28:18; Jn. 3:35; 13:3). Christ will consummate history as its Judge and the Initiator of divine rule on earth subsequent to his return to earth.

D. The solution of history. God is also linked in the Scriptures with the solution of history at its end as well as with the course of events in time. God challenges pagan gods, according to Isaiah, because they cannot foresee the end of history (Isa. 41:22; 42:9; 46:10; 48:3; cf. 2 Pet. 1:19–21). History is not deterministic cyclic recurrence lacking linear progress or a goal, nor human evolutionary progress to a human Utopia. Instead the Bible pictures history moving to linear consummation by Christ as it earlier moved toward Christ in linear centered time.

Both the OT and NT writers find the solution to the story of the Gentile nations, the Jews, and the church in the SECOND COMING of Christ to judge all three groups and to set up his kingdom prior to the eternal state. This coming is the hope of the church (Jn. 14:1–3; 1 Thess. 4:13–18; 1 Pet. 1:16, 19–21), which is also to be judged for reward for the work it has done for Christ (Rom. 14:10; 1 Cor. 3:11–15; 2 Cor. 5:10). The Jewish and the Gentile nations also are depicted by the writers of the Bible as undergoing judgment at the hands of Christ, to whom God has given the power to judge (Jn. 5:28–29; Acts 24:15). The proof of that power is the RESURRECTION (Acts 17:31). The principle of judgment after resurrection is set forth in Gen. 18:25; Heb. 9:27–28; 12:23. Judgment upon nations is specially mentioned by Matthew (Matt. 25:31–46).

The prophets then picture a righteous rule of Christ in history upon earth with the Jewish nation playing an important part in this period (Isa. 11; 65:17; 66:12; Dan. 2:44; Acts 15:13–17; Phil. 2:8–11). Even the Son will, when sin and death are conquered, return his rule to the Father, who will rule over all in the eternal kingdom of God (Rom. 11:36; 1 Cor. 15:24–28; Rev. 11:15; 21:14; 22:3).

This biblical conception of history does not exclude the secondary horizontal factors of history, such as geography and economics, but relates them as the ultimate cause in a vertical orientation to God. It speaks also to the problem of recurrence in history raised by the Greeks and by Spengler and to the problems of continuity and progress that seem to be the dream of modern man. Change and continuity are reconciled in the divine plan for history that is concerned both with secular and religious events without creating a dualism. Both the writers of the OT and NT emphasize eschatological linear direction in history rather than cyclical motion or an indefinite spiral of progress through human activity. God is for them the Creator, Controller, and Consummator of history. See ACTS, BOOK OF; DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY; GOSPELS; ISRAEL, HISTORY OF.

Hittite hit'tit  H3153, cf. also , “the sons of HETH” [Gen. 23:3 et al.]; represented in cuneiform as ḫatti). The Hittites were an ancient Indo-European people who lived in ANATOLIA and N SYRIA. The term, however, is used in the OT to designate several peoples of differing ethnic origins.

  2. Hittite influences on the literature and culture of Israel

I. Use of the term Hittite. In scholarly usage, the term Hittite bears at least three meanings. It can denote: (1) the aboriginal inhabitants of the central plateau of ASIA MINOR, more accurately designated as Hattians; (2) that branch of Indo-European immigrants that settled in central Anatolia c. 2000 B.C. and wrote in a language that they called “Nesite” (nesumnili); and (3) the people who lived in several large city-states of N Syria during the 1st millennium B.C., which had been vassal states of the Anatolian Hittites during the period c. 1400–1200. Some scholars designate this third group by the term neo-Hittites. To the Assyrians and Hebrews of the 1st millennium B.C., the term Hittites covered all the inhabitants of the earlier Hittite empire and its Syrian dependencies, irrespective of their linguistic or ethnic affiliation.

II. The Indo-European Hittites of Asia Minor

A. History. During the 3rd millennium B.C., central Anatolia (Asia Minor) was occupied by several small kingdoms of non-Semitic and non-Indo-European peoples. One of these, the Hattians, bequeathed their name to the large mass of Indo-European immigrants who entered Asia Minor c. 2300–2000 and soon became the dominant political power. The centers of Indo-European power during the earliest period were the cities of Nesa and Kussar, but with the eclipse of the small Hattian kingdoms c. 1750, the seat of Hittite power soon shifted (c. 1650) to the city of Hattusas. Already in the reign of Hattusilis I (c. 1650–1620), Hittite armies made forays into N Syria, where important cities such as ALALAKH, ALEPPO, and Hashshum endured their onslaught. Hittite activities in Syria and Mesopotamia at this early period were limited to raids without any attempt at consolidation of conquests or the appointment of governors or vassals. Though the Hittite raids were ephemeral, they were none the less impressive. About 1600, the successor of Hattusilis I, Mursilis I (c. 1620–1590), raided and sacked the mighty city of BABYLON. The rest of the period called the “Old Kingdom” (c. 1600–1400) was marred by internal dissension and weakness in the homeland, which made any appreciable Hittite influence abroad impossible.

The revival of Hittite fortunes can be traced to the reign of an energetic monarch with the throne-name Suppiluliuma (Shuppiluliumas) I, c. 1380–1340 B.C. His reign initiated the “empire period,” which lasted until the fall of Hattusas c. 1190. Suppiluliuma I began the practice of seeking to control the important, but small, city-states of N Syria by a combination of military force and astute diplomacy. He created a vast network of vassal states bound to the Hittite suzerain by treaties (see TREATY). The system was a kind of benevolent feudalism. Each vassal king was given a free hand in matters of internal rule and the guaranteed protection of his dynasty against usurpers. In turn he forswore the right to an independent foreign policy and pledged an annual delivery of tribute to the Hittite capital.

The archrivals of the Hittites in Syria were the Egyptians, who controlled most of S Syria. A military showdown was reached in 1300 B.C., when RAMSES II of Egypt and his allies joined battle with Muwatallis (c. 1315–1290) and the Hittite allies in the vicinity of KADESH ON THE ORONTES. In traditional style, both sides vociferously claimed the victory. It appears, however, as though no appreciable amount of territory changed hands. After 1300, both powers seemed to realize increasingly their need for each other’s support. In 1284, Hattusilis III of Hatti and Ramses II of Egypt concluded a treaty of mutual recognition and assistance. The new enemy of both powers was the Assyrian kingdom of Tukulti-Ninurta I.

By c. 1265, when Tudhalia (Tudhaliyas) IV began his reign, political and military pressure on Hatti came from another direction. Freebooters called the Ahhiyawa, who may have been an early wave of SEA PEOPLES from the Greek mainland, began harassing the western coast of Asia Minor and prompted Tudhalia to lead an army to the W c. 1230 to protect Hittite interests. Some scholars connect this pressure from the Ahhiyawa with the traditional invasion of the western coast of Asia Minor by the Achaeans at the time of the Trojan War (c. 1230–1210?). When the end finally came for the Hittite empire c. 1190 during the reign of Suppiluliuma II, the conquering hordes included another wave of Sea Peoples who likewise brought to an end the influential city-state of UGARIT.

B. Languages and scripts. The official archives of the Hittite capital city, Hattusas, contained clay tablets on which were inscribed in CUNEIFORM script documents composed in at least five distinct languages: (1) Hattic, the language of the aboriginal inhabitants; (2) Nesite, the language of the Indo-Europeans who initiated the Hittite kingdom at Hattusas; (3–4) Luwian and Palaic, Indo-European dialects closely related to Nesite; and (5) Hurrian. In addition, the most common cuneiform languages, (6) Sumerian and (7) Akkadian, were represented (see LANGUAGES OF THE ANE). Since the vast majority of texts were written in Nesite, this language was dubbed “Hittite” and was assumed to have been the official language of the empire.

The Hittites.

Hittite pictographs. From Carchemish, 8th cent. B.C.

The Indo-European character of Nesite and its sister dialects is apparent not only from its vocabulary (containing words like mekki- “much,” pada- “foot,” watar “water,” eshar “blood,” kard- “heart,” genu- “knee,” and pahhur “fire”), but also from its grammatical inflection of nouns and verbs, and its pronominal forms (kuis “who,” etc.). It is at present the oldest known written Indo-European language and has in consequence enormous value for the reconstruction of the early history and development of that language family. It appears that the Hittites and their neighbors also recorded their language in a hieroglyphic script on tablets of wood, which have not been preserved because of the perishable medium. Examples of this hieroglyphic script have been found inscribed in stone or lead from sites in Anatolia, Syria, and northern Mesopotamia. The language of these texts, though popularly referred to as “hieroglyphic Hittite,” is actually closer to Luwian than to Nesite.

C. Religion and pantheon. The Hittites referred to their pantheon as “the thousand gods” and with good reason. Although the present listing of divine names falls short of 1,000, it does represent a wide diversity of linguistic and ethnic origins. Deities were venerated whose names and origins were Hattic, Luwian, Palaic, Hurrian, Nesite, Sumerian, Akkadian, and Canaanite. At present there is no evidence that any Egyptian deities were venerated on Hittite soil. Many of these deities are known only as names in a list of treaty guardians, whereas others are described in myths, rituals, and festival texts. Most of these deities are depicted in the long relief carved into the rock at the sanctuary of Yazilikaya near modern Boğgazköy. Gods were worshiped in their own language by singers called “the Hurrian singer,” “the Hattic singer,” “the Nesite singer,” etc. The male head of the pantheon was a storm deity; the female head, a solar deity. During the empire period, the HURRIAN elements in the pantheon gained the ascendancy. Each king had his own patron deity.

III. The Neo-Hittites of N Syria. The term “neo-Hittites” implies nothing with regard to continuity of language or ethnos with the Hittites of Anatolia during the 2nd millennium B.C. When the Hittite capital was destroyed by the Sea Peoples c. 1190, the only centers that remained to continue the culture of the Hittites were the important cities of Syria that had once been under their sway. It is not clear just to what extent the culture of the Hittite empire truly survived in these Syrian centers. This much is clear: (1) The old Hattic throne names borne by the Hittite emperors (Sup-piluliuma, Labarnas, Muwatallis, Hattusilis) continued to be used by the kings of N Syria during the 1st millennium, for they appear in the Assyrian annals (as Sapalulme, Lubarna, Mutallu, Katuzili). (2) Many of these kings erected stone monuments bearing inscriptions in “hieroglyphic Hittite.” (3) The Assyrians and Hebrews of the 1st millennium B.C. continued to refer to N Syria as Hatti and its inhabitants as “Hittites.”

Among the petty kingdoms that scholars call “neo-Hittite” were: Tuwana (classical Tyana), Tunna (Tynna), Hupisna (Kybistra), Shinukhtu, and Ish-tunda, all in the Taurus Mountains or on the S edge of the central plateau; Tabala (biblical TUBAL) to the NE of these, somewhere along the upper reaches of the EUPHRATES River; Milid (modern Malatya), capital of Kammanu; Marqasi (modern Marash), capital of Gurgum (both of the latter were along the upper Euphrates); to the S was the kingdom of Kummukhi (classical COMMAGENE); and still farther S the city-state of CARCHEMISH. NW of Carchemish was the kingdom of ARPAD, to the W of which, and reaching to the gulf of Alexandretta, was the state of Yaudiya (also known as Sam'al). Occupying the Amuq plain was the kingdom of Basalt stela of the Hittite goddess Kubaba holding a mirror and standing beneath a winged sun-disk (9th cent. B.C., from Birecik, N of Carchemish).

Hattina with its capital at Kinaluwa (biblical CAL-NEH). In the vicinity of ALEPPO was located the kingdom of Lukhut with its capital first at Aleppo itself and later at Hatarikka (biblical HADRACH).

In the extreme S was the kingdom of HAMATH, and E of the Euphrates was a kingdom centered in Til-Barsip (modern Tell Ahmar). These kingdoms were by no means all continuations of Hittite vassal kingdoms during the 2nd millennium. To the contrary, with the exception of Carchemish and Aleppo, almost all of them were newly founded during the centuries that immediately succeeded the fall of Hattusas (c. 1190 B.C.). It cannot be denied, however, that they were culturally the heirs of much that is properly associated with the 2nd-millennium Hittites. In time, as the powerful neo-Assyrian armies pushed westward to the Mediterranean coast and into Asia Minor itself, these small kingdoms were—one by one—incorporated into the Assyrian empire. Culture is not subject to force of arms, and the distinctive neo-Hittite culture of these areas continued with only slight diminution down into the Hellenistic age, where traces of it appear at sites such as Nemrud Dag.

IV. Hittites in the OT

A. Terminology

1. In the patriarchal age. The OT employs the expressions “sons of Heth” and “Hittites” synonymously. The former expression, which has reference to HETH (Gen. 10:15; 1 Chr. 1:13), the eponymous ancestor of the “Hittites,” occurs only in Genesis (Gen. 10:15; 23:3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 20; 25:10; 27:46 [“daughters of Heth”]; 49:32). It is used to designate the “Hittites” only of the patriarchal age and no others. The term ḥittî, on the other hand, has a much broader reference and is found not only in Genesis (15:20; 23:10; et al.), but also throughout the historical and prophetic literature of the OT. With reference to the many meanings that the term Hittite bears in scholarly literature, it may be noted that in the OT it denotes only two groups. There is no reference in the OT under this term to the Indo-European Hittites of Asia Minor. Nor is there any allusion to the Hattians. In the OT, the term Hittites refers either to an ethnic group in Palestine during the patriarchal age, the period of the exodus, and the period of the conquest, or to the “neo-Hittite” peoples and kingdoms of Syria during the 1st millennium B.C.

E. Forrer (in PEQ no vol. [1936]: 190–209) proposed, on the basis of a cuneiform Hittite text written in the reign of Mursilis II (c. 1330 B.C.), that a group of Hittite people from the city of Kurustamma migrated into Egyptian territory (i.e., anywhere S of Kadesh on the Orontes, but prob. Palestine). There they formed an enclave and survived into biblical times. The above-mentioned text, though written c. 1330, refers to an incident that might have taken place centuries before. But the migration described would hardly have taken place as early as c. 1700 (i.e., during the patriarchal age). And even this ingenious proposal does not fully satisfy the biblical data. O. R. Gurney (The Hittites, 2nd ed. [1990]) presents an alternative view: that the Hattians were originally much more widespread geographically than just in central Asia Minor, and that an enclave of Hattians had lived in Palestine since prepatriarchal times. Neither of these two views can, of course, be conclusively proved.

Some scholars have seen in the account of ABRAHAM’S purchase of the cave in MACHPELAH (Gen. 23) from EPHRON the Hittite a reflection of subtle distinctions of Hittite law relating to transfer of certain feudal obligations by sale of property (M. R. Lehmann in BASOR 129 [Feb. 1953]: 15–18; Hittite laws ##46–47 in ANET, 191). If this interpretation is correct, the passage would offer support to Forrer’s theory (but cf. H. Hoffner in TynBul 20 [1969]: 27–55). Whatever the geographic origin of the “Hittites” of Palestine in the patriarchal age, it is clear that they have been thoroughly semitized, for none of their personal names can be satisfactorily interpreted as Indo-European or HURRIAN.

2. In the monarchy. During the age of the Hebrew monarchy, other “Hittites” appear in the narratives, but these are foreigners rather than aboriginal inhabitants of Palestine. They are, in fact, the “neo-Hittites” of Syria. Solomon’s Hittite wives, unlike Esau’s, were foreigners he married for political reasons, along with women from Egypt, Moab, Ammon, Edom, and Sidon (1 Ki. 11). The “kings of the Hittites” mentioned elsewhere (2 Ki. 7:6–7; 2 Chr. 1:17) were powerful monarchs from Syria. In this category one would wish to place URIAH the Hittite, the faithful soldier in DAVID’S army. The hard core of David’s army consisted of foreign mercenary troops, who were undeterred by petty local allegiances from following him without question (2 Sam. 15). Since David’s northern border reached all the way to the Euphrates (8:3), it is surely likely that among his mercenaries would be a sizable number of Syrian “Hittites.” And since the new bureaucracy of David’s state required the service of experienced civil servants from Egypt and elsewhere (2 Sam. 8; 1 Chr. 18 [note the Egyptian name Shavsha in v. 16]), the political affairs in the new capital, Jerusalem, may also have received the council of trained bureaucrats from Syria, that is, “Hittites.”

B. Hittite influences on the literature and culture Of Israel. In 1954, G. Mendenhall proposed that the structure of the biblical COVENANT at Sinai be understood as preserving a very ancient TREATY form best known from, but not originating in, the Hittite suzerainty treaties with Syrian vassal states during the 2nd millennium B.C. (see BA 17 [1954]: 26–46, 49–76). This “form” contained the following elements: (1) a preamble; (2) a historical prologue, detailing the previous relations between the twoparties to the treaty; (3) a section of stipulations, which included (a) prohibition of foreign alliances outside the Hittite orbit, (b) prohibition of hostility against another vassal of Hatti, (c) obligation to answer any call to arms issued by Hittite suzerain, (d) obligation to suppress any vicious rumors about the Hittite crown or secret plots to rebel, (e) prohibition against granting asylum to refugees from Hatti, and obligation to extradite all such fugitives to Hatti, (f) obligation to appear personally at least once a year at Hittite court with tribute; (4) a provision for depositing a copy of the treaty in the sanctuary and bringing it forth for periodic public reading; (5) lists of the gods of both the Hittite empire and the vassal state as legal witnesses and enforcers of the treaty; and (6) formulae of curses and blessings.

Each of these elements finds a striking counterpart in the OT passages relating to the Sinai covenant. Some years later, M. G. Kline (Treaty of the Great King [1963]) extended this comparison to the problem of the formal unity of the book of DEUTERONOMY. These theories do not presuppose a direct influence of the Anatolian Hittites on the biblical Hebrews. Rather they employ evidence from the Hittite texts to elucidate the form in which a given segment of biblical narrative might have been cast. (Kline's theory has apologetic ramifications, since, if one can demonstrate very early prototypes contemporaneous with Moses for the literary form of Deuteronomy, then there is less plausibility for certain critical views regarding the source analysis of the book and its supposed compilation as late as the reign of Josiah.)

Another portion of the biblical text where the literary form of the narrative might possibly hark back to a prototype dating from the 2nd millennium, and most familiar from Hittite texts, is the section from 1 Sam. 15 to 2 Sam. 8, which many OT source critics are accustomed to designate as the court history of David and to regard as one of the oldest portions of the OT in its present written form. This pericope, dealing as it does with the transfer of rule from SAUL, the unfit incumbent, to David as chosen of God, may well be a very early piece of dynastic justification. Political apologies that seriously attempt to justify an extraordinary transfer of power on a firm moral and theological basis are far from common in the ANE. There are, however, concrete examples of such to be found. One with many striking similarities to the court history of David is the Hittite text that E. H. Sturtevant aptly entitles "The Apology of Hattusilis" (Hittite Chrestomathy [1935], 43; this is a much more appropriate label than "The Autobiography of Hattusilis" used by many other Hittitologists). The text in question is certainly no autobiography, for it omits too much that is pertinent to such a literary genre and includes much that is unnecessary, placing a conspicuous emphasis at every turn on the "propagandistic" elements. The entire thrust of the document is to demonstrate that the paranoiac Urhi-Teshub (Mursilis II) was not only unable to function as a worthy ruler, but in a jealous rage actively pursued plots to murder Hattusilis III, when he suspected that the goddess ISHTAR had designated the latter to succeed him to the throne.

The similarities extend beyond mere coincidental incidents in the lives of the persons involved and point to a possible formal similarity attributable to the function of the respective documents. It is by no means suggested that the constituent episodes in the two documents were fabricated for propaganda purposes. On the contrary, such documents would depend upon the reliability of the information for their effectiveness. Nor does this theory imply that David's motives were questionable in having such a document drawn up. When David came to power, matters were unstable for many years. It was advantageous for him to have drawn up a record of the events leading up to his accession, making clear to all that he had no hand in killing Saul, that he at all times refrained from taking the initiative to drive his predecessor from the throne, and that Yahweh had been working behind the scenes from the start to place upon the throne of Israel his chosen one. If within his cabinet, or bureaucracy, there were Syrians who knew of an appropriate form in which to express this information, David would certainly have felt inclined to employ it.

A final area of possible Hittite influence on the literature and culture of Israel is the science of historiography. From the earliest periods of Sumerian and Egyptian history, documentary records were kept of important events. The lists of such events can in a very loose sense be termed HISTORY. Historical writing in the sense in which we encounter it, as in the writings of HERODOTUS (“the father of history-writing”) is found in only two areas of the ANE. Only in Hatti and ancient Israel is there evidence of historical writing that probes for causes, and which seeks to express a kind of moral philosophy of history. (Cf. A. Malamat, “Doctrines of Causality in Hittite and Biblical Historiography,” VT 5 [1955]: 1–12; A. Kammenhuber, “Die hethitische Geschichtsschreibung,” Saeculum 9 [1958]: 136–55.) Without desiring to instigate a pan-Hittite movement in the study of ANE civilizations, some scholars have suggested an indirect influence here by the 2nd millennium culture of the Hittites upon the late 2nd millennium and early 1st millennium culture of the Hebrews.

Hivite hiv’it (𐤁𐤓𐤕 H2563, derivation uncertain). One of the names appearing in the lists of peoples dispossessed by the Israelites (Exod. 3:8, 17; 13:5; 23:23, 28; 33:2; 34:11; Deut. 7:1; 20:17; Josh. 3:10; 9:1; 11:3; 12:8; 24:11; Jdg. 3:5; 1 Ki. 9:20, cf. 2 Chr. 8:7). In the Table of NATIONS, the Hivites are included as descendants of CANAAN (Gen. 10:17). They were located in the LEBANON hills (Jdg. 3:3) and in the HERMON range (Josh. 11:3). In the reign of DAVID they are listed after SIDON and TYRE (2 Sam. 24:7), implying their location near these cities. HAMOR, the father of SHECHEM, is called a Hivite (Gen. 34:2). The inhabitants of GIBEON to the N of JERUSALEM are also identified as Hivites (Josh. 9:7; 11:19).

Many equate Hivite with HORITE, assuming an early textual corruption of the Hebrew letter resh (𐤃) to waw (𐤅). A certain ZIBEON is apparently identified both as a Hivite and as a Horite (Gen. 36:2, 20), and the SEPTUAGINT twice reads Horite where MT has Hivite (Josh. 9:7; Gen. 34:2; note also that some MSS of the LXX read Hittite for MT’s Hivite in Josh. 11:3; Jdg. 3:3). Clearly these strange ethnic designations confused the scribes. It has been maintained that, since no name that closely resembles Hivite has yet been found in extrabiblical sources, the biblical name should be viewed as a corruption of Horite, and that both Hivites and Horites should be seen as groups related culturally and linguistically to the HURRIANS. (See Die Israeliten und deren Nachbarstämme [1906], 328–45; E. A. Speiser in AASOR 13 [1933]: 26–31; H. A. Hoffner, Jr., in TynBul 20 [1969], 27–37.)

H. A. HOFFNER, JR.

Hizki hiz’ki (𐤁𐤕𐤕𐤕 H2623, “[Yahweh] has strengthened me” or “[Yahweh] is my strength”; see HEZEKIAH). KJV Hezeki. Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:17).

Hizkiah hiz-ki'uh (חִזְקִיָּה H2624, “Yahweh has strengthened me” or “Yahweh is my strength”; see HEZEKIAH). (1) KJV alternate form of HEZEKIAH (Zeph. 1:1; see also Heb. text of 2 Ki. 18:1, 10, 13–16; Neh. 7:21; 10:17; Prov. 25:1).

(2) Son of Neariah and a postexilic descendant of DAVID (1 Chr. 3:23; KJV, “Hezekiah”).

Hizkijah hiz-ki'juh. KJV alternate form of HEZEKIAH (Neh. 10:17).

hoarfrost. See FROST.

Hobab hoh'bab (חֻבַּב H2463, possibly “beloved” or “crafty”). Son of REUEL the Midianite (Num. 10:29). Reuel was another name for JETHRO, father-in-law of MOSES; Hobab was therefore the sister of ZIPPORAH and Moses' brother-in-law. Because Hobab, as a native of MIDIAN, would have been very familiar with the desert regions in the SINAI peninsula, Moses invited him to guide the Israelites in their travels. Hobab declined, for he wanted to return to his (heathen) land and family, but Moses insisted, promising to share God's blessings with him (vv. 29–32). Although Hobab's final response is not recorded, the text seems to imply that he consented; moreover, his descendants are later associated with the Israelites (Jdg. 1:16; 4:11). The latter passage raises a difficulty by referring to the KENITES as “descendants of Hobab the father-in-law of Moses” (NRSV). According to some scholars, Hobab was another name for Jethro/ Reuel, but in this verse it may be better to revocal-ize the Hebrew ḥōtēn H3162 (“father-in-law”) to ḥātān H3163, a broader term that can be rendered “brother-in-law” (cf. NIV). The precise relationship between the Kenites and the Midianites is unclear; it may be that Jethro's family was a Kenite tribe that had migrated to Midian.

Hobah hoh'buh (חֻבָּה H2551, possibly from Egyp. Abum, “land of reeds”). A city or region N (lit., “left”) of DAMASCUS to which ABRAHAM pursued the defeated armies of KEDORLAOMER and his allies (Gen. 14:15; called HELBON in Genesis Apocryphon [1Q20] XXII, 10). The location is unknown, though some have identified it with modern Hoba (c. 55 mi. NNW of Damascus, on the road to Palmyra/ TADMOR), and others with ancient Ube/Upi, a territory of which Damascus was part (ANET, 329 n. 8, 477; EA, 53.27–63). See also CHOBA.

Hobaiah hoh-bay'yuh (חֲבִיָּה H2469, “Yahweh has hidden [or protected]”). Ancestor of a postexilic family that was unable to prove its priestly descent (Ezra 2:61 [KJV, NRSV, “Habaiah”]; Neh. 7:63 [KJV, “Habaiah”]; 1 Esd. 5:38 [KJV, “Obdia”; NRSV, “Habaiah”]).

S. BARABAS

Hod hod (הוֹד H2087, “majesty, vigor”). Son of Zophah and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:37).

Hodaiah hoh-day'yuh. KJV alternate form of HODAVIAH (1 Chr. 3:24).

Hodaviah hod-uh-vi'uh (הוֹדָוִיָּה H2088 [Neh. 7:43], הוֹדְוִיָּה H2089 [1 Chr. 5:24; 9:7; Ezra 2:40], הוֹדְוִיָּה H2090 [1 Chr. 3:24, Qere], “praise Yahweh”; cf. J ODA and JUDAH). (1) A clan chief of the half-tribe of MANASSEH; he and others are described as “brave warriors, famous men, and heads of their families” (1 Chr. 5:24). Because of their unfaithfulness, however, they and their families were taken captive by the Assyrians (vv. 25–26).

(2) Son of Hassenuah and descendant of BENJAMIN; his grandson Sallu was among those who resettled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:7; cf. vv. 1–3; apparently called “Joed” in Neh. 11:7).

(3) Ancestor of a family of Levites who returned from the exile (Ezra 2:40; 3:9 [KJV, “Judah,” following MT]; Neh. 7:43 [KJV, NRSV, “Hodevah”]; apparently called “Sudias” in 1 Esd. 5:26 and “Joda” in 1 Esd. 5:58).

(4) Son of Elioenai and postexilic descendant of SOLOMON (1 Chr. 3:24 [KJV, “Hodaiah”]).

Hodesh hoh’desh (חֹדֶשׁ H2545, “new [moon]”). One of the wives of SHAHARAIM, a Benjamite; she bore him seven children (1 Chr. 8:9–10). Instead of “his wife Hodesh,” some render “his new wife”; apparently he married her after divorcing Hushim and Baara (v. 8).

Hodevah hoh-dee’vuh. KJV, NRSV alternate form of HODAVIAH (Neh. 7:43).

Hodiah hoh-di’uh (חֹדִיָּהּ H2091, “majesty of Yahweh”). KJV Hodijah (except 1 Chr. 4:19). (1) Father or ancestor of KEILAH the Garmite and ESHTEMOA the Maacathite; he is included in the genealogy of JUDAH and also identified as having married the sister of a certain Naham. Hodiah’s place in the genealogy is unclear (see the textual discussion of vv. 18–19 in G. N. Knoppers, I Chronicles 1–9, AB 12 [2005], 341–42). To avoid this difficulty, the KJV interprets the verse to refer back to Mered, adds a pronoun, and renders, “the sons of his wife Hodiah.” Others, also referring to Mered, emend “and the sons of the wife of Hodiah” (ûbēnê’ āšet hōodiyyâ) to “the sons of his Judean wife” (ûbēnê’îštô hayēhudīyyâ, as in v. 18).

(2) A Levite who helped EZRA instruct the people in the law (Neh. 8:7; 1 Esd. 9:48 [KJV, “Auteas”]). He is probably the same person mentioned among those who led the people in confession and worship (Neh. 9:5) and among the Levites who signed the covenant with NEHEMIAH (10:10).

(3) Another Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:13). Some scholars emend the text to read HODAVIAH.

(4) One of the layleaders of the people who signed the covenant (Neh. 10:18).

Hoglah hog’luh (חִגְלָה H2519, “partridge”). The third of the five daughters of ZELOPHEHAD of the tribe of MANASSEH (Num. 26:33). Since Zelophehad had no sons, Hoglah and her sisters requested ELEAZAR the priest that they be allowed to inherit their father’s property, and the request was granted (27:1–11; 36:11; Josh. 17:3–4). Some see a connection between her and the town of BETH HOGLAH.

Hoham hoh’ham (חֹהָם H2097, meaning unknown). King of HEBRON during the time of JOSHUA (Josh. 10:3). Hoham formed a league with four other AMORITE kings to make war on GIBEON because its inhabitants had signed a treaty of peace with Joshua. The five kings were decisively defeated in a battle at BETH HORON, and after being shut up in a cave at MAKKEDAH in which they had taken refuge, they were put to death (vv. 4–26).

1. In the OT

A. Vocabulary. According to some scholars, holiness is the most typical concept in the OT faith. It is revealed chiefly in the Hebrew verb qādaš H7727 and its cognates (ḥíram H3049 and its cognates will not be considered since the underlying connotation of the BAN is largely negative; see also ACCURSED). The verb is used primarily in the piel form (qiddaš), which means “to pronounce, make, or treat as holy; to sanctify, consecrate.” The related adjective, qādōš H7705, is usually translated “holy” or “sacred.” Several nouns are built on the same root: qōdeš H7731 (“holy thing, holiness, sacredness”), miqdāš H5219 (“holy place, sanctuary, shrine”), qādēš H7728 (“consecrated person”=“cult prostitute”). Forms of the root appear some 830 times in the OT, about 350 of them being in the PENTATEUCH; the cognate Aramaic qaddīā H10620 (“holy”) occurs thirteen times in Daniel. Aside from qādēš, which is used in connection with heathen cults, words derived from the root qdš invariably are related to God as himself holy, or to people, times, places, and objects made holy because of their association with him. “No thing or person is holy in itself, but becomes holy as it is placed in relation to God” (H. Ringgren, The Prophetical Conception of Holiness [1948], 9).

With respect to meaning, qōdeš is clearly the opposite of ḥōl H2687, “common, profane” (1 Sam. 21:5; Ezek. 22:26; et al.). The etymology, however, is disputed. An earlier theory, ventilated by G. F. Oehler and others, assumed an affinity between the root qdš and ḥādaš H2542 (piel, “to renew”), but this connection is rejected by O. Procksch (TDNT, 1:89) as contrary to the Semitic laws of sound, although E. Jacob (Theology of the Old Testament [1958], 86) recognizes this interpretation as a possibility.

W. W. Graf von Baudissin (Studien zur semi-tischen Religionsgeschichte, 2 vols. [1876–78]) followed H. L. Fleischer in pointing to a more basic root qd, “to divide,” and concluded that the essence of qdš is separation from the secular. The root would then signify “to cut off, withdraw, set apart.” The nuances of “to deprive” and “to elevate” also have been attached. Although this interpretation has been adopted by many (e.g., R. Asting, J. Skinner, A. B. Davidson, W. R. Smith, O. C. Whitehouse, J. Muilenberg), others consider it unlikely (cf. HALOT, 3:1072). N. H. Snaith accepts Baudissin's main argument while challenging the view that the term was altogether devoid of moral content (The Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament [1944], 21–50). It has been claimed that whenever this root appears in the OT, the meaning of separation is permissible, and in many cases demanded. Ringgren, on the other hand, believes that “the idea of withdrawal, or separation, is not always very prominent” (Prophetical Conception, 6).

To meet those who have objected that such a derivation provides an unduly negative presentation of holiness, proponents of this theory emphasize the dual nature of separation, as implying not only being cut off from the secular, but positively devoted to and destined for the service of God. W. Eichrodt considers that this latter reference is primary. O. R. Jones concludes that holiness involves separation, but rarely is to be understood as equivalent to it. Things are separate because they are holy, not holy because they are separate. Only in virtue of its relationship to God did anything become holy and thus be regarded as separate.

Another school of etymological research attempts to trace the Hebrew root to the Akkadian qadāšu, “clear, bright, brilliant.” Supporters of this view have included W. Gesenius, A. Dillmann, T. K. Cheyne, K. Kohler, and H. Zimmern. More recently T. C. Vriezen has gone on record as conceding that this is the most plausible meaning. The idea is linked with that of fear. Some point out that the root has the double significance of shining and terrible. This notion, of course, is implied in those passages in the OT which speak of God as revealed by fire (e.g., Exod. 3:2–5; Lev. 9:24; Deut. 4:22–24; Josh. 24:19–20; Ps. 18:8–11; Isa. 4:4–5; 6:1–5; 10:17; Ezek. 1:4). F. Delitzsch took the root as indicating freedom from defect. U. Bunzel carried this approach further by stressing the element of purity involved in brightness. Procksch considers that ṭāhōr H3196 (“pure”) is most closely related materially to qōdeš (the latter being the basic cultic term, while the former is ritual). Yet, he adds, “there is always an energy in the holy which is lacking in the pure or clean” (TDNT, 1:89).

It was no doubt with these apparently divergent theories in mind that J. Pedersen decided that “a consideration of this root...affords no insight into the nature of holiness, since nothing is known about it except the very fact that it is used about what we call holiness” (Israel: Its Life and Culture, 2 vols. [1926–40], 2:264). Etymological considerations sometimes shed light on a rarely used term, but they never determine the actual meaning of a word as used by the speaker. Since the qdš word group is widely attested in the OT, and since its etymology remains obscure, its actual employment in the Bible itself determines its significance. A look at its occurrences in context suggests that the factor of separateness is present, but not to the exclusion of other elements, such as radiance and purity.

B. Holiness Of God. The adjective qādōš is a distinctly religious term, and is used exclusively in relation to God. It refers either to God himself, or to what has been sanctified by him. Primarily, however, it is God who is holy (Exod. 15:11; Isa. 6:3). There is no holiness unassociated with him. Holiness is not a human quality, nor is it an impersonal concept. Its divine provenance is everywhere insisted on in the OT.

T. C. Vriezen sees holiness as “the central idea of the Old Testament faith in God” (An Outline of Old Testament Theology, 2nd ed. [1970], 300). Some scholars treat the entire doctrine of God in the OT under this head (e.g., J. Hänel, Die Religion der Heiligkeit [1931]). Perhaps Hos. 11:9 supplies the most succinct declaration of God’s holiness found in the OT: “For I am God and not man—the Holy One among you.” This pregnant statement lays stress (a) on the “otherness” of God, his majesty and incomparability with any created being; and (b) on his nearness and involvement in the affairs of his people, his persistent love and graciousness (cf. HDB rev., 387). To equate God’s holiness with his transcendence and to dissociate it from his immanence is to fall short of the OT revelation. Ringgren, who interprets qōdeš in terms of “the wholly other,” nevertheless recognizes that it includes the divine beneficence. The Holy One is also the kindly God who has chosen Israel and has mercy on his people.

The holiness of God, however, was proclaimed long before the period of the prophets. It is implicit from the earliest times. “The concept of God’s sanctity is proper to Mosaic religion from its very inception as well as to pre-Mosaic religion. The prophets only stressed this truth to a greater extent in their denunciation of a cult that was wholly external” (P. Heinisch, Theology of the Old Testament [1955], 69).

God is described as “the Holy One of Israel.” The title recurs twenty-four times in Isaiah (cf. also 2 Ki. 19:22; Job 6:10; Pss. 71:22; 78:41; 89:18; Prov. 9:10; 30:3; Jer. 50:29; 51:5; Ezek. 39:7; Hab. 1:12; 3:3). The appellation does not mean that the Holy One belongs to Israel, although strict grammar might allow such a rendering, as E. Jacob notes. He is so not because he is consecrated to Israel, but because he has consecrated Israel to himself; and Israel itself is holy only because of what God has done.

Holiness is not merely one of God’s attributes. It represents his essential nature. Holiness is his selfhood. When he swears by his holiness, he swears by himself (Amos 4:2; 6:8; cf. Gen. 22:16; Pss. 89:35; 108:7). As a predicate of God, holy comes to mean divine, and can be employed as an adjective for God (Isa. 5:16; 6:3; Hos. 11:9; Hab. 3:3). The niphal form strongly indicates this (Ezek. 20:41; 28:22, 25; 36:23; 38:16; 39:27; cf. Num. 20:13). God’s holiness is simply his self-assertion (Vriezen). It is his active self-differentiation (Brunner). As such it expresses his whole divine personality. “The ‘god-ness’ of God is highlighted by the word ‘holy’ when it is used in connection with him” (O.J. Baab, The Theology of the Old Testament [1949], 34). Holiness is what makes God who he is.

As holy he is thus unique and incomparable (1 Sam. 2:2; 6:20; Job 25:5; Isa. 40:18–20, 25–26; Hab. 3:3). God’s holiness marks him off from angels (Job 4:17–18; 15:14–15; Sir. 42:17), from heathen gods (Exod. 15:11; Ps. 77:13), and from men (Job 4:17; 15:14; Eccl. 5:2). Hence unapproachability is an element that, according to J. Skinner, “is never absent from the notion” of holiness (HDB, 2:397). Holiness is an aspect of God’s sovereignty. He is set apart from and above all other beings for the sake of manifesting himself as he is and fulfilling his magisterial purposes. “God is free of all considerations and conditions, absolutely free master of his own will, of his feelings, even of his wrath; mighty, not having any responsibility or requiring any justification, exalted over all, Lord absolutely of his resolutions and decisions and therefore to be feared absolutely. Holy is at once exalted, supreme, and fearful” (L. Koehler, Old Testament Theology [1957], 53).

Holiness entails power. As the Holy One, God controls all the forces of the universe. This he does, not in order to reserve tyrannical overlordship for himself, but to convey life and blessing to mankind through his chosen people Israel (Gen. 12:1–3). This integration of the divine holiness with the righteous purpose of God is a distinctive feature of the OT revelation (Exod. 3:7; Isa. 5:16). It is thus that qōdeš acquires an intensified moral orientation, as it is taken up into the personal being of God (TDNT, 1:91). God’s holiness is expressed in his justice (Lev. 10:3; Num. 20:12–13; Ps. 99:3–5; Isa. 5:16; Ezek. 28:22; 38:23).

It also manifests itself in his attitude to SIN. God’s holiness denotes not merely his separation from sin in the perfection of his own being, but also his abhorrence of it and hostility to it. As a “faithful God who does no wrong” (Deut. 32:4), his “eyes are too pure to look on evil” and he “cannot tolerate wrong” (Hab. 1:13). He is concerned for his holy NAME, which he cannot allow to be profaned (Ezek. 36:20–22). He vindicates his own holiness by showing his hatred of sin and cleansing his people from it (Ezek. 36:23–25). It is in the presence of God’s holiness that we become aware of our sin (Isa. 6:3–8).

Hence, there is a strong connection between divine holiness and divine JUDGMENT. A holy God who abhors sin can do no other than punish it. He is “not a God who takes pleasure in evil”; with him “the wicked cannot dwell” (Ps. 5:4). Those who desecrate God’s holiness must expect his displeasure (Ps. 11:5). Indeed, the holy God proves himself to be holy as he executes his judgments

(Isa. 5:16). It is by his holiness that he swears that the worldly women who oppress the poor will not escape retribution (Amos 4:1–2). JOSHUA warned the people that because God was a holy God he would not forgive their transgressions while they forsook him and served idols (Josh. 24:19–20). When fire came out from the presence of the Lord to devour NADAB and ABIHU in their impiety, MOSES pointed out to AARON that the Lord had said, “Among those who approach me / I will show myself holy; / in the sight of all the people / I will be honored” (Lev. 10:3). Similarly, KORAH and his band of Levites perished because they had despised the Lord by violating his holiness (Num. 16:30).

Such judgment will be visited on nations as well as on individuals, and for the same reason. This takes place both during the course of history and at the end of history. The Holy One of Israel is like a flame that burns and devours the thorns and briars of ASSYRIA in one day (Isa. 10:17). As he summons every kind of terror to destroy the forces of GOG in the final age, he will thereby demonstrate his greatness and holiness (Ezek. 38:23).

The supreme manifestation of God’s holiness, however, is in his LOVE. In this the OT prepares the way for the fuller disclosure of the divine nature in the NT. It is in the prophecy of HOSEA that “the concept of holiness takes up into itself as the fulness of deity the thought of love” (TDNT, 1:93). The prophet’s own domestic tragedy becomes a parable of God’s predicament in the face of human waywardness and sin. Hosea’s readiness to love his wanton wife and restore her to himself mirrors the immeasurably more comprehensive LOVE of God for his lost children. As Procksch brings out, the opposition between the holiness of God and all that is human still remains, but is absorbed into the deeper opposition of holy love to unholy nature. What God in virtue of his holiness may do to love unholy nature, no human being may do, and therefore the antithesis between God and us consists in the very love which overcomes it (TDNT, 1:93). See also GOD, BIBLICAL DOCTRINE OF.

C. Holiness of God’s people. The holiness of God is expressed not only in his own mighty acts both of judgment and of mercy, but is also reflected in the holiness of his people. This is what Brunner calls his transitive holiness. Israel is “holy to the Lord” (Deut. 7:6; 14:2, 21; 26:19; 28:9; Jer. 2:3), “a holy nation” (Exod. 19:6), “a holy people” (Isa. 62:12; 63:18; Dan. 12:7), “a holy seed” or “race” (Ezra 9:2; Isa. 6:13), a community of “saints” or “holy ones” (Pss. 16:3; 34:9; 89:5; Dan. 7:21, 27), “a kingdom of priests” (Exod. 19:6), “a holy congregation” (Num. 16:3).

Moses was commanded to announce to the assembled people of Israel: “Be holy because I, the LORD your God, am holy” (Lev. 19:2). As M. Noth (Leviticus: A Commentary, rev. ed. [1977], 139) points out, the expression leaves it undecided whether this is a statement (lit., “You shall be holy”) or a demand. Perhaps it might be concluded that with reference to Israel’s position it is a statement, but with reference to Israel’s character it is a demand. This dual aspect has an important bearing on the developed revelation of holiness in the NT as it applies to God’s people. Israel’s holiness in the first place lies in the fact that she has been set apart by God and for God, in order that she might become the instrument of his purpose in the world. She is position-ally holy since she belongs to God and has been called out from among the nations to be a chosen people for his glory (Exod. 19:4; Ezek. 37:27; Hos. 2:23). In virtue of this relationship, ratified in the COVENANT, Israel is to exhibit an actual holiness in forsaking sin and following the commandments of the law. To this end the whole body of ceremonial, legal, and moral requirements was designed.

These requirements are summarized in the Holiness Code of Lev. 17–26, in which the cultic and moral elements are intermingled. The repeated theme of Lev. 19:2 serves as a text for the whole (cf. 20:7–8, 26; 21:6, 8, 15, 23). “The remarkable distinction of this collection,” explains J. L. Mays, “is the passionate urgency with which it holds holiness before Israel as the essential mark of existence as the people of the Lord” (Leviticus, Numbers [1964], 55). The moral code includes such practical matters as honesty (19:11, 36), truthfulness (19:11), respect for parents (19:3; 20:9), respect for elders (19:32), fair treatment of servants (19:13), love for neighbors (19:13, 16–18), kindness to strangers (19:33–34), generosity to the poor (19:10, 15), help to the handicapped (19:14, 32), sexual purity (18:1–30; 20:1–21), and the avoidance of superstition (19:26, 31; 20:6, 27).

The remainder of the Holiness Code has to do with cultic regulations. These, however, must not be dismissed as of minimal importance. The ceremonial sanctity of God’s people was an expression of devotion to him. When linked, as in Leviticus, with the call to personal righteousness, it had its place in the development of the religious ideal. What the prophets later repudiated was a ceremonial cult divorced from justice. The holiness of God’s people was derived from their relationship to him and was originally both cultic and ethical. The two elements are often scarcely distinguishable (cf. 2 Ki. 4:9). The first requires the second. Cultic sanctity is imperfect without ethical sanctity. Cultic purity itself demands personal purity (TDNT, 1:92). As over against Mowinckel, who denies that the word “holy” has any predominant ethical reference in the OT, a growing consensus of scholarly opinion is inclined to reemphasize this element, while at the same time recognizing the spiritual value of the cultic.

D. Holiness of times, places, and things. These are regarded as holy because of their association with God. They possess no inherent sacredness. They are consecrated through contact with him.

Times set apart for worship are said to be holy. Most prominent is the SABBATH or holy day (e.g., Gen. 2:3; Exod. 16:23; 20:8; Lev. 23:3, 8; Neh. 8:9–11; 9:14; 10:31; Isa. 58:13, 14). The gathering itself is described as a holy assembly (Exod. 12:1–6; Lev. 23:3–4, 7–8, 21, 24, 35; Num. 28:18, 25–26; 29:7, 12).

Places designated as holy are those where God has revealed himself or is worshiped. HEAVEN itself as the abode of God is described as holy (Deut. 26:15; 2 Chr. 30:27; Ps. 11:4; Isa. 63:15; Jer. 25:30; Jon. 2:4, 7; Mic. 1:2; Hab. 2:20; Zech. 2:13). The same adjective is applied to such earthly locations as the BURNING BUSH (Exod. 3:5), SINAI (19:11), GILGAL (Josh. 5:13–15), and the resting place of the ARK OF THE COVENANT in Jerusalem (2 Chr. 8:11). Similarly both BETHEL and Horeb (SINAI) were regarded as sacred (Gen. 28:17; 1 Ki. 19:8). The land of promise is holy (Exod. 15:13; Ezek. 4:12–13; Hos. 9:3, 4; Amos 7:17; Zech. 2:12). The camp of the Israelites is holy (Lev. 10:4, 5; 13:6; 16:20–22; Deut. 23:14). The city of JERUSALEM is holy (Neh. 11:1, 18; Ps. 46:2, 4; Isa. 48:2; 52:1–2); ZION is holy (Isa. 11:9; 27:13; 56:7).

Both the TABERNACLE and later the TEMPLE, with all their appurtenances, are called holy. The tabernacle itself is called a sanctuary (Exod. 38:24; Lev. 10:4). The court of the tabernacle also is called a sanctuary (Lev. 10:17–18). The tabernacle and its courts together with their contents are holy (Exod. 40:9). The first section, the outer room, is known as “the holy place” (26:33; 28:29). The second section, the inner room, is known as “the most holy” or “holy of holies” (26:33–34). The entrance to the tabernacle is holy (29:31). The temple is a holy house (1 Chr. 29:3; Pss. 5:7; 79:1; 138:2; Isa. 64:11). Its precincts share this sacredness (1 Chr. 24:5; 2 Chr. 29:7). The holy place (Ezek. 41:21, 23; 42:14; 44:27) and the most holy place (1 Ki. 6:16; 7:50; 8:6; 2 Chr. 3:8, 10; 4:22; 5:7; Ezek. 41:4) retain their distinctions.

Every item connected with the tabernacle and the temple is represented as holy: the altars of incense and burnt offering (Exod. 29:37; 30:27; 40:10), the flesh of the sacrifices (Num. 18:17; 2 Chr. 29:33; Ezek. 36:38; Hag. 2:12), the food of the sacrifices (Lev. 21:22; Num. 5:9; 18:9), the vessels for drink offerings (1 Ki. 8:4), the ark of God (Exod. 30:26; 2 Chr. 35:3), the anointing oil (Exod. 30:25; Ps. 89:20), the incense (Exod. 30:35, 37), the table (30:27), the showbread (Lev. 24:5–9; 1 Sam. 21:4), the candlestick (Exod. 30:2), the laver (30:28), the clothing of the priests (28:2; 29:29; 31:10; Ezek. 42:14), the shekel of the sanctuary (Exod. 30:13), the valuables deposited in the treasury (Josh. 6:19; 1 Ki. 7:51). In keeping with the holiness associated with the tabernacle and the temple, the priests ministering there also are regarded as sacred and for this reason were consecrated to their office (Exod. 29:1; Lev. 21:6, 23; 22:9).

No doubt this repeated emphasis in the OT on the holiness of times, places, and things belongs to the realm of the cultic rather than the moral. It is never altogether easy to disentangle these elements. While such a materialization of the holy might lend itself to abuse—such times, places, and things could be considered to possess some sanctity in themselves apart from the presence of the living God—this danger seems largely to have been avoided when his people remained faithful to him. The spreading contagion of uncleanness is not paralleled by any such uncontrolled dissemination of holiness (cf. Lev. 6:27; 22:1–9; Num. 19:11–13). When Haggai asked the priests of the return: “If a person carries consecrated meat in the fold of his garment, and that fold touches some bread or stew, some wine, oil or other food, does it become consecrated?” they were able to answer quite correctly, “No” (Hag. 2:12).

While the ethical content in the OT conception of holiness must not be underrated any more than the cultic, it is to be remembered that the overriding and determinative factor is that holiness comes from the Lord. “The uniqueness of the OT definition of holiness,” declares W. Eichrodt, “lies not in its elevated moral standard, but in the personal quality of the God to which it refers” (Theology of the Old testament, 2 vols. [1961], 1:276).

II. In the NT

A. Vocabulary. The concept of holiness is expressed in the NT through various terms, such as the adjectives hosios G4008 (e.g., of God himself, Rev. 15:4) and hieros G2641 (of Scripture, 2 Tim. 3:15), and the noun hosiōtēs G4009 (Lk. 1:75; Eph. 4:24). Of greater significance, however, is the frequent adjective hagios G41, which recurs some 230 times, as well as several of its cognates. This adjective can be used as a substantive (e.g., of sacrificial meat, Matt. 7:6; of the sanctuary, esp. in the plural, Heb. 8:2 et al.). The expression ho hagios, “the Holy One,” is used of God the Father in the Greek OT, but only of Christ the Son in the NT (Mk. 1:24 et al.; cf. ton hosion sou, Acts 2:27), unless 1 Jn. 2:20 is an exception. The plural hoi hagioi, “the holy ones,” is used of angels (1 Thess. 3:13; 2 Thess. 1:10) and of saints, that is, Christians consecrated to God (Acts 9:13, 32; Rom. 1:7; et al.). In the SEPTUAGINT, hagios is consistently utilized to render the Hebrew adjective qēdōš, and the fact that this Greek term was appropriated wholly in the interests of the OT view of holiness is determinative for NT usage.

Out of four or five Greek terms that could be rendered “holy,” hagios is the least frequent in classical literature. The concept of holiness had to be filled with fresh content; hence, as H. Cremer saw, this Greek adjective “is one of the words wherein the radical influence, the transforming and newly fashioning power of revealed religion is most clearly shown” (Biblico-Theological Lexicon of New Testament Greek, 3rd ed. [1883], 35). It has a history similar to the corresponding Hebrew term. Originally it was a cultic concept, indicating that which is consecrated or devoted to or qualified to approach a deity (BDAG, 9). Its earliest established attestation is in HERODOTUS (Hist. 5.119), where it is used in close association with the sanctuary. It is also applied to the gods. But hagios does not appear to have been related to man in connection with the cultus, hagnos G54 being preferred for this usage (TDNT, 1:89).

There are indeed some few instances in the NT where the cultic sense persists. This is particularly the case in OT quotations and allusions to the former dispensation. Jerusalem is described as the holy city as in the OT (Matt. 4:5; 27:53; Rev. 11:2). The same expression is applied to the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. 21:2, 10; 22:19). The temple is spoken of as the holy place (Matt. 24:15; Acts 6:13; 21:28). The mount of transfiguration is holy (2 Pet. 1:18). It is noticeable that all these instances are related to places rather than persons. Even in this connection, the adjective soon shades over into the fuller meaning of holy, that is, pure, perfect, worthy of God. The term is employed in this sense with reference to the law of God (Rom. 7:12), the temple of the body (1 Cor. 3:17), the temple of the church (Eph. 2:21), and the spiritual sacrifice of the Christian (Rom. 12:1).

In the great preponderance of occurrences, hagios is used of persons and signifies a relationship to God, who is himself holy (Jn. 17:11; 1 Pet. 1:15; Rev. 4:8). The prophets of the OT are described as holy (Lk. 1:70; Acts 3:21; 2 Pet. 3:2). John the Baptizer is “a righteous and holy man” (Mk. 6:20). The apostles are holy (Eph. 3:5). The most common reference of all is to Christians who, because of their position before God in Christ and the sanctifying work of the indwelling Spirit, are properly designated holy. This is connected closely with their calling and election (Col. 3:12; 2 Tim. 1:9). The commandment they have received, to which obedience must be given, is holy (2 Pet. 2:21). This association between calling, commandment, and holiness is crystallized in 1 Pet. 1:15–16: “But just as he who called you is holy, so be holy in all you do; for it is written, ‘Be holy, because I am holy.’”

The fact that hagios is the NT equivalent of qāḏōš suggests that the idea of separation and purity is carried over into a new context. It is given a reinforced ethical and spiritual cast. As applied to Christians, the term means set apart for God, reserved for his praise and service. Believers have been made holy by the saving work of Christ on the cross, which has separated them from this present evil world and transferred them into the kingdom of God’s dear Son (Col. 1:13). They are continually being made holy by the work of the HOLY SPIRIT within, who enables them to respond to the NT summons to live in righteousness and purity. According to G. B. Stevens, hagios is “above all things a qualitative and ethical term” (HDB, 2:399). This is indicated by the adjectives with which it is paired: dikaios G1465, “righteous” (Mk. 6:20; Acts 3:14), and amōmos G320, “blameless” (Eph.

1:4; 5:27; Col. 1:22).

The cognate verb hagiazō, “to make holy,” “consecrate,” “sanctify,” appears twenty-seven times in Marble pig (Greek, 350–300 B.C.). The holiness of the Israelites was reflected in their diet; certain foods, such as pork, were considered “unclean.”

the NT, though it is rare in extrabiblical usage. In the LXX it is the usual rendering of the root qđš in its verbal forms. The NT uses the verb in the sense of setting aside or rendering things suitable for ritual purposes (cf. Matt. 23:19, the altar makes the gift sacred; 1 Tim. 4:5, what is received with thanksgiving is consecrated by the Word of God and prayer). It is used also of profane things made holy by contact with the sacred (cf. Matt. 23:17, the temple makes the gold sacred). With reference to persons, the verb may signify “consecrate, dedicate, make holy,” that is, “include...in the inner circle of what is holy, in both cultic and moral associations of the word” (BDAG, 10). It is so used of the CHURCH, which Christ sanctified and cleansed “by the washing with water through the word” (Eph. 5:26), and of Christians consecrated by BAPTISM (1 Cor. 6:11).

The verb hagiazō also may mean “to sanctify” by the blood of sacrifice, that is, to atone for sins (Heb. 2:11; 9:13; 10:10, 14, 29; 13:12). Sometimes its significance is “to treat as holy, to reverence” (Matt. 6:9; Lk. 11:2; 1 Pet. 3:15). Its basic connotation is to consecrate or sanctify by contact with the One who alone is holy, God himself. So Christians are hēgiasmenoi, in a state of having been sanctified (Jn. 17:19; Acts 20:32; 26:18; Rom. 15:16; 1 Cor. 1:2). It is God who sanctifies (Jn. 17:17; 1 Thess. 5:23).

Cognate substantives are comparatively infrequent: hagiōsynē G43 seems to refer to holiness as a quality (Rom. 1:4; 2 Cor. 7:1; 1 Thess. 3:13); hagiasmos G40, holiness as a process or result, that is, “sanctification, consecration” (Rom. 6:19, 22; 1 Cor. 1:30; 1 Thess. 4:3–4, 7; 2 Thess. 2:13; 1 Tim. 2:15; Heb. 12:14; 1 Pet. 1:2); and hagiotēs G42, holiness as a condition or state (2 Cor. 1:12; Heb. 12:10).

The rare word hagiōsynē is constructed from the adjective hagios by extension as an abstract term of quality (cf. dikaiośynē, “righteousness,” from dikaioś, “righteous”). It is not found in prebiblical Greek. The three NT occurrences are all in the Pauline epistles. In Rom. 1:4, the phrase “according to [NIV, through] the Spirit of holiness” is contrasted with “according to the flesh” (v. 3; NIV, “as to his human nature”). Some take this to be an exact rendering of the Hebrew phrase for “Holy Spirit” (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10–11); others argue, on the basis of the antithesis with flesh, that the reference is to Christ’s own spirit (however, see T. R. Schreiner, Romans, BECNT [1998], 43). In 2 Cor. 7:1 Paul urges his converts to purify themselves “from everything that contaminates body and spirit, perfecting holiness out of reverence for God” (NEB, “complete our consecration”). The ethical character of hagiōsynē is obviously prominent here. This is equally the case in 1 Thess. 3:13, where Paul's prayer for his readers is that the Lord may strengthen their hearts so that at the PAROUSIA they may stand before God the Father "unblamable in holiness" (RSV).

The term hagiasmos is an active verbal noun derived from hagiazō; it thus implies the act of sanctifying rather than SANCTIFICATION either as a condition (hagiotēs) or as a quality (hagiōsynē). When used in a moral sense (as it is invariably), hagiasmos denotes a process or on occasion the result of a process. It is infrequent in the LXX and has no specific Hebrew equivalent (TDNT, 1:113). In the NT it is confined to the epistles and occurs mainly in the context of Gentile Christianity. The act or process of being sanctified is the will of God for Christians (1 Thess. 4:3). It is manifested in the sphere of sexual morality as the husband learns how to honor his body (or his wife; cf. NIV mg.). The opposite is "impurity" (4:7 NRSV; the term is also linked with modesty or propriety, 1 Tim. 2:15). The body, which was once employed in the service of impurity and lawlessness, now must be yielded to God in the service of righteousness, with hagiasmos ("a holy life," NEB) as the goal in view (Rom. 6:19). In this emancipation from sin in the service of God, the return (lit. "fruit") Christians get is holiness (Rom. 6:22). The source of such sanctification can only be the holy God: he sanctifies us in Christ, whom he has made to be our hagiasmos as well as our wisdom, righteousness, and redemption (1 Cor. 1:30). This work is said to be by or in the Spirit (2 Thess. 2:13; 1 Pet. 1:2). Without it no one will even see the Lord when he returns; hence, it is to be aimed at and striven for as the goal of the Christian life (Heb. 12:14).

The third noun, hagiotēs, is quite rare (cf. the references in BDAG, 11). As a condition or state, hagiotēs is an essential attribute of God which he shares in measure with his children, so that it can be said that they "share in his holiness" (Heb. 12:10; a notion virtually equivalent to "participate in the divine nature," 2 Pet. 1:4). Although this state is only consummated and perfected in glorification, the implication seems to be that already in this life believers partake of God's holiness. The other NT occurrence of the term (2 Cor. 1:12) is less certain, since most MSS have the word haplotēs G605 (KJV, "simplicity"; NRSV, "frankness"). This latter term is preferred by many scholars, partly because of the context (the word is paired with eilikrineia G1636, "sincerity"), partly because Paul does not elsewhere use hagiotēs. But the earliest witnesses have hagiotēs, which may be regarded as the more difficult reading and thus the more likely to be original (cf. NIV). The genitive "of God" is not necessarily possessive (as Procksch assumes, TDNT, 1:114); it may be one of origin, indicating that holiness and sincerity in the believer spring from the working of God's grace. In this case a qualitative element is also implied (cf. G. Abbott-Smith, A Manual Greek Lexicon of the New Testament, 3rd ed. [1937], 5).

B. Holiness Of God. In the OT the holiness of God is trebled in the praises of the seraphim: "Holy, holy, holy is the LORD Almighty" (Isa. 6:3). This trisagion is repeated in the NT as John in his vision is permitted to hear the living creatures that surround the heavenly throne singing in ceaseless antiphon: "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God Almighty" (Rev. 4:8). Such a threefold reiteration, however, is not merely impressive in its effect. It is related to the TRINITY of persons in the Godhead, and this factor, implicit in the OT, is made explicit in the NT. The Son addresses the Holy Father (Jn. 17:11); he is himself the Holy Servant or Child (Acts 4:30); and the third Person of the Godhead is the Holy Spirit (Jn. 14:26). Holiness is not reserved for one but belongs to each.

1. God the Father. The number of passages in the NT in which holiness is directly attributed to God the Father is not large. It is not to be supposed that the NT regards the holiness of God the Father as of less importance than the OT, or that there is any discrepancy between what is revealed in the OT and what is revealed in the NT. On the contrary, it is in the harmony of the Testaments that one sees the reason for the comparative paucity of references. The OT itself had sufficiently established the personality and holiness of the Father. It remained for the NT to focus on the Son and the Spirit. If, however, the holiness of God the Father is seldom stated in the NT, it is everywhere presumed (TDNT, 1:101). Mary in her MAGNIFICAT rejoices in God her Savior: “the Mighty One has done great things for me—holy is his name” (Lk. 1:49). Whenever the Father is named, his holiness is asserted.

The teaching of Jesus is definitive. The prominence given to the hallowing of the Father’s name in the initial clause of the prayer he taught his disciples is indicative of the place it held in his mind (Matt. 6:9; Lk. 11:2; see LORD’S PRAYER). In his own high priestly prayer, he addressed “the only true God” (Jn. 17:3) not simply as “Father” (vv. 1, 5, 21, 24) but as “Holy Father” (v. 11) as well as “righteous Father” (v. 25). The context in which this expression is used is most instructive. Jesus pleaded with his holy Father to keep his disciples who were to be left in the world. The basic element in God’s holiness is his separation from this present evil world. W. Temple remarks that in Jn. 17:15, “where the burden of prayer is deliverance from the evil power of the world...the thought of God as wholly separate from that evil is specially appropriate. The Father is asked to grant to the disciples His own immunity from evil” (Readings in St. John’s Gospel [1945], 318). In the conjunction of holiness and FATHERHOOD, the transcendence and immanence of God, already implied in the OT revelation of holiness, is further emphasized.

2. God the Son. In twelve NT passages, Christ is described as holy. In nine of them the adjective hagios is used (Mk. 1:24; Lk. 1:35; 4:34; Jn. 6:69; Acts 3:14; 4:27, 30; 1 Jn. 2:20; Rev. 3:7), and in three hosios (Acts 2:27; 13:5; Heb. 7:26). Before his birth, the Lord was marked out as holy. The angel announced to Mary: “The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. So the holy one to be born [of you] will be called the Son of God” (Lk. 1:35). The demon-possessed man in the CAPERNAUM synagogue cried out: “I know who you are—the Holy One of God” (Mk. 1:24; Lk. 4:24). There was a mortal confrontation between the Holy One and the evil one. In Jn. 6:69 there is recorded a confession of faith on the part of Simon Peter which is to be set beside that in the synoptics (cf. Mk. 8:29; Matt. 16:16). Its essence is belief, and indeed knowledge, that Jesus is the Holy One of God.

Three times in Acts—once in Peter’s speech in Solomon’s portico and twice in the prayer of the believers after Peter and John had been discharged by the Sanhedrin—Jesus is referred to as God’s (holy) servant (Acts 3:13–14; 4:26, 30). The word in Greek is pais G4090, which also can mean a child. It significantly identifies Jesus with the Suffering Servant of Isaiah, and at the same time asserts his divine Sonship: both as Servant and Son, he is holy. The two verses in Acts where Christ is described as “the Holy One” (ho hosios) are both quotations from Ps. 16:10 (Acts 2:27; 13:35), and F. F. Bruce takes the reference in Heb. 7:26 to reflect this same usage (The Epistle to the Hebrews, NICNT [1964], 156).

The Holy One in 1 Jn. 2:20, by whom believers are anointed, is clearly to be regarded as the Son. If this unction is not directly connected with the Holy Spirit, but with the Lord’s own messianic consecration at his baptism, now shared by all who belong to him, as C. H. Dodd believes, the identification is confirmed. The Lord of the churches is described as “holy and true” (Rev. 3:7), a title that reappears as appertaining to God the Father (6:10), and is thus a tacit acknowledgement of the Son’s divinity (see DEITY OF CHRIST). Jesus is he “whom the Father has sanctified and sent into the world” (Jn. 10:36 NRSV). The holiness of the Son as it is manifested to the world is derived from that of the Father.

The holiness of the Son is exhibited in his character. He loved righteousness and hated iniquity (Heb. 1:9). Both the positive and the negative factors are essential to holiness. He refrained from evil and pursued the good. He committed no sin of any kind (1 Pet. 2:22). Although he was tempted in every respect as all human beings are, yet he remained entirely without sin (Heb. 4:15). It was because of the holiness of his nature that he was thus enabled to triumph over the evil one. His testimony was that he always did what was acceptable to his Father (Jn. 8:29). It was only by virtue of his holiness that the Lord was equipped to make the one sufficient sacrifice on the cross which would save men from their sins. Because his abhorrence of sin was so acute, he willingly turned his back on heavenly glory in order to redeem lost humanity. Only the one who knew no sin could be made sin for us (2 Cor. 5:21). Only the perfectly righteous could suffer and die for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God (1 Pet. 3:18).

3. God the Spirit. The holiness of the Spirit is indicated by the frequent attachment of the predicate hagios to his name. It is not for nothing that the NT describes him predominantly as the HOLY SPIRIT. This title occurs only three times in the OT (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10–11), but is found no fewer than ninety-one times in the NT. In the OT he usually is designated as “the Spirit,” “the Spirit of the Lord,” or “the Spirit of God.” In the NT he appears simply as “the Spirit” forty-six times, as “the Spirit of God” eighteen times, and as “the Spirit of the Lord” four times. The title “Holy Spirit” is by far the most common.

It is used in the first instance to distinguish him from other spirits, especially those which are evil. “The adjective here is not merely qualitative: it is adversative” (J. J. von Allmen, Vocabulary of the Bible [1958], 172). The NT emphasis on the Spirit as holy marks him out as altogether unique and incomparable (Matt. 12:32; Rom. 15:16; 1 Cor. 6:19; Eph. 2:18; 2 Tim. 1:14). The qualitative aspect of the title cannot, however, be overlooked. It implies that the third Person of the Trinity shares the holiness of the godhead. The essential nature of deity belongs to the Spirit, as well as to the Father and the Son. In view of the fact that in the NT holiness is invariably personalized, the use of hagios in connection with the Spirit is further evidence that the Spirit is regarded as a Person rather than merely an influence.

His holiness is implicit in the fact that he is described as the Spirit of Christ (Rom. 8:9; Phil. 1:19; 1 Pet. 1:11; cf. Gal. 4:6). His work is to glorify the Son (Jn. 16:14; cf. 15:26). He fixes attention on the Savior. It is his function to cause the living Christ to dwell within the heart of the believer. As F. D. E. Schleiermacher recognized, the fruit of the Spirit is nothing less than the virtues of Christ. It is the Spirit who makes possible such conformity to the Master’s image: he can do so only by reason of his holiness. None but the Holy Spirit can be the Spirit of Christ. He is holy in himself and also makes believers holy by renewing them in the likeness of their Lord.

The teaching of Jesus concerning the Spirit sufficiently substantiates his holiness. There has been a tendency on the part of some more radical scholars to discount this evidence on critical grounds. As C. K. Barrett (The Gospel according to John, 2nd ed. [1978], 88) insists, however, the comparative sparseness of reference is to be accounted for in terms of Jn. 7:39—“Up to that time the Spirit had not been given, since Jesus had not yet been glorified.” Even as it stands, the Lord’s teaching about the Spirit clearly demonstrates his holiness. There could be no BLASPHEMY against any but a Holy Spirit (Mk. 3:28–30; cf. Matt. 12:31, 32; Lk. 12:10). None other than a Holy Spirit could eject demons, acting as “the finger of God” (Matt. 12:28; Lk. 11:20). Baptism into the name of the Holy Spirit, as well as of the Father and of the Son, implies that the Spirit’s name is holy (Matt. 28:19).

We have seen that in the OT the holiness of God is a synonym for his power. This is made markedly apparent in the NT with reference to the Holy Spirit. T. W. Manson (The Teaching of Jesus: Studies in Its Form and Content, 2nd ed. [1935], 266 n. 1) maintained that “power” in Mk. 14:62 simply means God (cf. NIV, “the Mighty One”). The close association of the Spirit with power would seem to suggest that in him this power is brought directly down to earth and made available for the purposes of godly living.

C. Holiness of the church. This theme is implicit throughout the NT, although the explicit phrase “holy church” does not occur. The personal factor remains uppermost, since in the NT the CHURCH is not regarded as an organization as much as a fellowship of those who are in Christ. There is “no holy ‘It,’ above all no holy collective, no holy institution” (E. Brunner, Dogmatics [1962], 3:125). Nevertheless, “the idea of holiness remains basically communal and ecclesiastical” (Allmen, Vocabulary, 168). The believer is born again into the family of God and only in that family will he grow in grace. O. Cullmann can go so far as to define holiness in these terms simply as “the fact of belonging to the saints” (Baptism in the New Testament [1950], 53).

The holiness of the church is the NT equivalent for the holiness of Israel as God’s people in the OT. The community of Christians constitutes the New Israel (Gal. 6:16; Eph. 2:12; Heb. 8:10). This is not merely a matter of continuity: indeed, if this were the sole consideration, it is doubtful whether the phrase New Israel should be used at all. But the determinative factor is that Christians are heirs of the new covenant in Christ Jesus, the true Messiah, in whose advent the kingdom had arrived (see COVENANT, THE NEW). Living in the last days under the rule of God and awaiting the return of Christ as judge, Christians were identified with the saints or holy ones of Dan. 7:18, 22 (and 1 En. 38.4-5) who lived in expectation of the end. It is in this sense that the church is regarded in the NT as the New Israel. As such it shares in the holiness of God’s people.

It is significant that Peter in his first letter takes the expression of Exod. 19:6—“a kingdom of priests and a holy nation”—and transfers it to the church, adding, as if to stress the point, “a chosen people” and “a people belonging to God” (1 Pet. 2:9). Holiness is a characteristic of the church as the continuing people of God. The covenantal basis of Israel’s holiness was strongly underlined in the OT (Exod. 19:5-6; Lev. 19:2; Deut. 7:6; 26:19; Ps. 89:5). In the NT the new covenant in Christ’s blood shed on the cross is the ground (Jn. 17:19; Rom. 15:16; 1 Cor. 1:2; 6:11; Eph. 5:26).

Holiness is much more than a secondary feature of the church. On the contrary, it defines its very essence. Its importance is reflected in the frequency of references in the NT. The holiness of the church is alluded to in fourteen NT writings, and in seven others parallel expressions occur. As being holy, the church is the creation and possession of God. Both its inception and its survival depend on his gracious activity. The community of Christians is “a people only because he dwells within them and moves among them” (P. S. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament [1961], 69).

The idea of separation, so prominent in the OT, is carried over into the NT doctrine of the church (2 Cor. 6:14). However, the positive aspect of being set aside for God to be utilized in his service prevails over any negative exclusivism. The OT conception of property as forming an extension of personality finds its loftiest expression in the relationship between God and his people. In the NT this is intensified in respect of the church and of the Christians who compose it. The church as the BODY OF CHRIST belongs to God and becomes the vehicle of his activity in the world (1 Cor. 12:27; Col. 1:18). Similarly, the church as a dwelling place of God in the Spirit exists solely to further the ends of redemption (Eph. 2:22; 3:5-6). In order to prove an effective instrument of the gospel, the church must be holy.

Not only does the NT doctrine of the church take over and fill out the OT concept of Israel as the holy people of God: it also reinterprets the temple cultus spiritually in terms of a new sanctuary, in which Christ is both priest and sacrifice. The priests of the former dispensation who offered gifts according to the law served “a copy and shadow of what is in heaven” (Heb. 8:5). Hence, hagios in the NT takes on a pneumatic sense (TDNT, 1:106). Christ as the Holy Servant of God becomes the center of a new WORSHIP in which he is supreme. As the great High Priest in glory, he has now sat down at God’s right hand, indicating that his sacrificial work is once for all complete (Heb. 7:27; 10:12). Henceforward the cultic holiness of the church is displayed in the offering of spiritual worship (Rom. 12:1) and spiritual sacrifices of praise, thanksgiving, and doing good (Heb. 13:15-16; 1 Pet. 2:5), since there is no longer any sacrifice for sin (Heb. 10:18, 26). The church reveals itself as holy by its emancipation from materialistic expressions of worship. It is significant that the temple itself is reinterpreted as the community of the Spirit (Eph. 2:19-22), and that when there is a localized reference, it is to the believer’s body in which the Spirit makes his home (1 Cor. 3:16-17).

The eschatological dimension of the church’s holiness must not be overlooked (see ESCHATOLOGY). As we have seen, in OT apocalyptic the holy are those who have been delivered from the domain of darkness and participate in the glory of the messianic age. According to the NT, Christians have even now entered into the FIRSTFRUITS of this blessing. They enjoy the seal of the Spirit, which is the guarantee of their INHERITANCE until they acquire full possession of it (Eph. 1:13-14). But the riches of Christ’s glorious patrimony still lie in the future (Eph. 1:18). Being holy, the church is continually waiting for and hastening toward the coming of God’s great day (2 Pet. 3:11-12). Its members are being built up by the word of God’s grace, which is able to give them “the inheritance among all those who are sanctified” (Acts 20:32).

The eschatological, however, is never divorced from the ethical. In view of what lies in store for the church at the end, the purpose of God is “to purify for himself a people that are his very own, eager to do what is good” (Tit. 2:14). It was for this that Christ “loved the church and gave himself up for her to make her holy...without stain or wrinkle or any other blemish, but holy and blameless” (Eph. 5:25-27). The church is betrothed to Christ, and at the parousia she is to be presented “as a pure bride to her one husband” (2 Cor. 11:2 RSV; cf. Rev. 19:7-8; 21:9).

D. Holiness of the Christian. This theme already has been dealt with in expounding the meaning of hagios and its cognates. We have also noted that in the NT, as in the OT, it is the intention of the holy God that his children should be holy as he is. It is the function of the Holy Spirit to effect this sanctification by conforming believers to the image of Christ. The personal manner in which the church is presented in the NT as the fellowship of Christians means that it is holy as its members are holy. We need do no more than summarize the evidence.

The most common name for Christians in the NT is saints. They share in the first resurrection, or new birth, and as such are regarded as holy (Rev. 20:6). They have been sanctified in Christ (Acts 20:32; 26:18; 1 Cor. 6:11; Heb. 10:10). They are holy brethren (1 Thess. 5:27), constituting a holy priesthood (1 Pet. 2:5). They have been separated from sin (1 Cor. 6:19; 2 Tim. 2:19; Tit. 2:12), and consecrated to a life of purity and godliness (Eph. 1:4; 5:27; Col. 1:22; 2 Pet. 3:11). Holiness is inseparably bound up with the Christian's calling and election (Col. 3:12; 2 Tim. 1:9; 1 Pet. 1:5). It is accomplished by the will of the Father (1 Thess. 4:3; 5:24; Heb. 10:10). Its center is Christ himself (1 Cor. 1:30) and its agent is the Holy Spirit (2 Thess. 2:13; 1 Pet. 1:2). It is connected with faith, which is at once its outcome and the ground on which it continues to operate (Acts 26:18; Eph. 1:1; Col. 1:2; 2 Thess. 1:11; Rev. 13:10). Its objective is the glory of God, both now and at the last (2 Thess. 1:10, 12).

Holiness is ultimately to be interpreted in terms of the complementary experiences of our being in Christ and Christ being in us. These two are inextricable. In the NT to be in Christ is at the same time to have Christ in us (Eph. 3:17). Any alleged UNION WITH CHRIST that fails to produce the image of Christ within is exposed as false (Rom. 8:9).

The supreme manifestation of holiness is in love. There is at once a eulogy of Christian love and a delineation of Christian holiness (1 Cor. 13). It is perfectly realized only in the man Christ Jesus. It remains nevertheless as the criterion by which the believer's growth in grace is to be assessed. The essence of the divine nature is holy love. It is in this above all that as he is so are we to be in the world (1 Jn. 4:17). See SANCTIFICATION.

Holiness Code. A common designation for the legal corpus found in Lev. 17-26, thought by many to have had an independent origin; often referred to simply as H. See PENTATEUCH.

holm tree. This term is used by some English versions (based on the Vulg. ilex) to render Hebrew tirzâ H9560, which occurs only once (Isa. 44:14 [NRSV, "He cuts down cedars or chooses a holm tree or an oak"]; cf. also KJV Sus. 58 for Gk. prinos). The holm oak, also known as the holly oak (Quercus ilex), is a beautiful Mediterranean evergreen that reaches a height of 40-50 ft. (see FFB, 128-29). The meaning of the Hebrew word is uncertain, however, and the NIV follows the KJV in interpreting it as a reference to the CYPRESS. See also FLORA (under Fagaceae).

Holofernes hol'uh-fuhr'neez (Ὠλοφέρνης or Ὀλοφέρνης; cf. Ὁροφέρνης [closer to the original Persian form] in Polybius, Hist. 3.5.2 et al.). According to the book of JUDITH, Holofernes was the chief general of the army of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, king of Assyria (!) and second only to the king in power (Jdt. 2:4 et al.). He was commissioned by the king with the task of subjugating “the whole of the west,” including Palestine. One after another, the nations fell before him; only Israel refused to yield. Holofernes besieged the Jewish town of BETHULIA, where the army of Israel was concentrated, and almost forced its capitulation, when a beautiful Jewish widow named Judith asked the Jewish leaders for permission to leave the town and see Holofernes. Permission was granted. When she appeared before the general, she told him that she had come because she knew that BETHULIA was doomed and she knew how the town could be captured easily. Holofernes fell completely under the spell of her charm and beauty and believed everything she told him. On the fourth night of her stay with him, he made a banquet to which she was invited. Holofernes got drunk, and after everyone else had left she took his sword and cut off his head, which she took in a bag to the leaders of Israel. When the Assyrians realized that their general was murdered, they were seized with panic and fled. Thus ended the Assyrian threat.

Holon hoh’lon (חולון H2708, possibly “sandy”). (1) A town in the hill country of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:51); it was later assigned to the Levites descended from KOHATH (21:15; called HILEN in the parallel passage, 1 Chr. 6:58). The site is unknown. Some scholars have identified it with Khirbet (Alin, c. 11 mi. NW of HEBRON, but a location S or SW of Hebron seems more likely (Holon is associated with such towns as ANIM, DEBIR, and ESHTEMOA).

(2) A city in the plain of MOAB against which JEREMIAH pronounced judgment (Jer. 48:21). It was probably located N of the ARNON River, but the site is unknown.

Holy Ghost. See HOLY SPIRIT.

Holy of Holies. See TABERNACLE.

Holy Place. See TABERNACLE.

Holy Sepulchre, Church of the. See GOLGOTHA.

Holy Spirit. In Christian theology, the third person of the TRINITY. The OT refers to the Spirit of God (Gen. 1:2 et al.) with the Hebrew term rûaḥ H8120, which often means “wind”—an invisible, irresistible power, sometimes benign and beneficial, sometimes raging and destructive (Gen. 8:1; Exod. 10:13, 19; 14:21; Num. 11:31; et al.). By analogy, the word was applied to the human breath, and since the breath is at once the evidence of animal vitality and the vehicle of thought and passion, the word means both the principle of animation and the distinctive spiritual principle in human beings (Gen. 6:17; Job 17:1; Ezek. 37:6; see SPIRIT). The OT writers also believed that man was made in the IMAGE OF GOD, that he had received his vital breath from God, and that at death, when he breathed his last, he gave his spirit back to God. Thus God is described as being or having a rûaḥ, thus as being essentially Spirit, the source of that breath of life by which all living creatures are animated, and the Giver of those unique qualities that make human beings like himself.

The name Holy Spirit occurs in the OT in only two passages (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10-11; lit., “Spirit of holiness”), but in the NT it is found over ninety times (the KJV renders “Holy Ghost” in almost all instances). The word for “spirit” in Greek is pneuma G4460 (from the verb pneō G4463, “to breathe, blow”; cf. Jn. 3:8), which can also mean “wind, breath.” The NT, moreover, includes many references to the Spirit “of God,” or “of the Lord,” or “of the Father,” or “of Jesus,” or “of the Christ” (for the last two, see Acts 16:7; Rom. 8:9; Phil. 1:19; 1 Pet. 1:11; cf. Gal. 4:6)—or simply “the Spirit.” Above all, it is significant that the Spirit now receives a personal name, in anticipation of his unique historical manifestation: he is the other Comforter or PARACLETE (Jn. 14:16-26).

I. The Spirit of God in the OT

A. His work in general. The Spirit of God, or the Spirit of the Lord, is repeatedly mentioned in all parts of the OT. These uses do not indicate clearly the Spirit is a person distinct from the Father and the Son. This Trinitarian meaning, which Christians commonly assume in using the term Spirit or Holy Spirit, presupposes and rests upon the events of the INCARNATION and the day of PENTECOST. In the OT, the Spirit is holy (cf. Ps. 51:11), not because he is “the Holy Spirit” in distinction to the Father and the Son, but because the Spirit pertains to God and comes from God who is holy. See HOLINESS. The Spirit of God is the divine nature viewed as vital energy. This vital energy that comes from God is related both to the world, which is his creation, and especially to humankind, the crown of creation.

As for the world of nature, in the beginning the Spirit of God brooded like a bird on the nest over the formless primeval chaos (Gen. 1:2). As a result, from chaos there emerged the cosmos. The Spirit, as the source of all energy and life, impregnated, as it were, the deep nothingness or formless void, and out of it came forth at the divine behest the vast realm of the created order. Once the CREATION has been achieved, the same Spirit conserves, renews, and withdraws life by a continuous process in the realm of nature (Job 33:4; Pss. 33:6; 104:30). Thus the OT justifies the epithet “the One who makes alive,” used to describe the Spirit in the Nicene Creed (see CREED III.B).

As for human beings, their very life depends on a special impartation of the “breath [here Heb. něšāamā H5972] of life” (Gen. 2:7), and the divine Spirit is behind all the unique powers that they possess in distinction to the animals. The Spirit, or Breath, of God is the source of human reason (Job 32:8); of endowments and gifts (Gen. 41:38; Exod. 28:3); of artistic skills, as in the case of BEZALEL (Exod. 36); of cunning in war, as exemplified in JOSHUA (Deut. 34:9); of heroism, as displayed in the judges (Jdg. 13:25); of wisdom, as celebrated in SOLOMON (1 Ki. 3:28); of religious and ethical insights, as seen in the inspiration of the poets and prophets (Num. 11:17, 25-26, 29; 2 Sam. 23:2; 1 Ki. 22:24; Ezek. 11:5; Dan. 4:8-9); and of purity, as seen in the strength and penitence of the righteous (Neh. 9:20; Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10; Ezek. 36:26; Zech. 12:10).

In view of these passages, it is hardly possible to suppose that the “evil spirit” (see DEMON) sent by the Lord as a judgment upon certain wicked men (Jdg. 9:23; 1 Sam. 16:14; 18:10) is the Holy Spirit performing a mission of penal judgment. More likely, the thought is that even an evil spirit, who inspires lying or jealousy, is under God’s control as his creature, and accomplishes his purposes. One is reminded of the saying of Luther, “The devil is God’s devil.”

B. His saving work. The strand of OT revelation that most directly anticipated the NT doctrine of the Holy Spirit tells of the Spirit’s saving work. As early as the era of the judges, it is clear that salvation was wrought in Israel by the Spirit of the Lord. See JUDGES, PERIOD OF. Without previous preparation or the possibility of resistance, unknown sons of peasants were stirred up and enabled to perform mighty acts of valor by the Spirit of God. Thus Israel was delivered from her enemies (Jdg. 3:10; 11:29; 14:6; 1 Sam. 11:6). Chosen for a more lasting function, kings were anointed (1 Sam. 16:13), a rite that signified the permanent endowment of the Spirit, investing them with a sacred character (26:11).

The salvation of Israel did not depend solely upon judges and kings empowered to deliver God’s people from their enemies. There were also seers and prophets, who by an equal charismatic endowment and sovereign constraint were lifted into communion with God and made interpreters of the divine will to the people. Primarily as a result of their teaching, Israel had a unique literature containing a message of judgment and salvation (2 Sam. 23:2; Ezek. 2:2; 3:12, 14; Mic. 3:8; note also the frequent use of the formula, “thus says the LORD,” in Isaiah and Jeremiah).

Ancient Babylonian basalt statue of a lion devouring a man. The Spirit of God protected his people from danger, such as Daniel in the lion’s den.

Earthly kings, though anointed of God, were not always faithful or able to establish peace and justice in Israel. The greatest of the prophets found the people stiffnecked and unwilling to hear (Jer. 17:19-23), and complained that none believed their message (Isa. 53:1). Therefore, to accomplish God's purpose of salvation, ultimately there must be one who would uniquely combine the roles of prophet, priest, and king, and who would be uniquely endowed with the Spirit of God, that is the MESSIAH, the Anointed One par excellence. This shoot out of JESSE'S stock, this branch out of his roots (Isa. 11:1), would receive the gifts of the Spirit in their fullness (11:2; 42:1; 61:1). Thus Jesus became the ideal Prophet and King, because he was anointed with the Spirit of God above measure; this is what makes him the Christ.

The OT anticipated that when the Messiah came, the Spirit would be poured out on all flesh like the rain that gives life to the earth (Isa. 32:15), as the breath of life animated dry bones (Ezek. 37). This effusion of the Spirit would transform the hearts of the people, making them receptive to the voice of God and spontaneously obedient to his word (Isa. 59:21; Ps. 143:11). This vision of the age of the Spirit remained principally a hope, not a reality, in the history of Israel. The people rebelled and grieved God's Holy Spirit so that he was turned into their enemy (Isa. 63:10). If this hope was to be realized, it was necessary that God should do the impossible—that he should come himself in person. “Oh, that you would rend the heavens and come down, / that the mountains would tremble before you!” (Isa. 64:1). (See further L. J. Wood, The Holy Spirit in the Old Testament [1976]; W. Hildebrandt, An Old Testament Theology of the Spirit of God [1995]; NIDOTTE, 3:1073-78.)

The APOCRYPHA and other Jewish literature between the Testaments add nothing significant. In works that have a Palestinian origin, references to the Spirit are uncommon (but see J. R. Levison, The Spirit in First Century Judaism [1997]). In the Jewish Alexandrian literature, the activity of the divine Spirit is underscored particularly by associating the Spirit with wisdom, an association that culminated in the writings of PHILO JUDAEUS. The Spirit promoted clearness of vision and a capacity for an intellectual knowledge of God.

II. The Spirit in the NT

A. Jesus and the Spirit. The gospel age opened with a special moving of the Spirit. JOHN THE BAPTIST, the forerunner of the Messiah, is described as one who was filled with the Holy Spirit from his mother's womb (Lk. 1:15, 80). By the inspiration of the Spirit, SIMEON divined the presence of the Messiah in the person of the infant Jesus (Lk. 2:25). As for the Messiah himself, his mother was informed by an angel that her son would be conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit (1:35; cf. Matt. 1:18, 20). The Spirit was active in the creation of a new humanity, free from the taint of human corruption. (That which was begotten of the virgin is “holy,” Lk. 1:35 NRSV.) The true immaculate conception is not that of the virgin, but of her Son. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

When Jesus was about thirty years of age, he was baptized. As he had been sanctified in his humanity at birth by the Spirit, so at his baptism he was consecrated to the office of Messiah by the same Spirit, who descended upon him in the form of a dove (Matt. 3:16; Lk. 3:22), an appropriate symbol for One who came as the “Prince of Peace.” PETER was probably referring to this event when, in his first sermon to the Gentiles, he spoke of Jesus as the One whom God had anointed with the Holy Spirit and with power (Acts 10:38). The Gospel of John emphasizes the plenitude of this endowment with the Spirit: “For the one whom God has sent speaks the words of God, for God gives the Spirit without limit” (Jn. 3:34).

From the time of his baptism, the life of Jesus was filled with manifestations of the Spirit's power. Immediately after coming up out of the waters of Jordan, Jesus was driven by the Spirit into the wilderness where he encountered the tempter (Mk. 1:12-13 and parallels). In his victory as the second ADAM, the true man, he overcame the power of the Evil One by the Spirit of God. The Lord later attributed his power of EXORCISM to the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:28). The same is true of his teaching; the Spirit had anointed him to preach good tidings to the poor and to proclaim release to the captives (Lk. 4:18).

Running through the gospel account of Jesus' public ministry are allusions to a strange power working within him. He was seized by such a sense of urgency that people thought he was beside himself (Mk. 3:21); they were impressed with the authority of his teachings (1:22); he was sometimes seemingly forgetful of bodily needs (Jn. 4:31); and some even supposed him to be demon-possessed (8:48). When the seventy returned from a successful evangelistic tour, Luke relates how Jesus rejoiced in the Holy Spirit (Lk. 10:21).

The question might well be asked, Why, if Jesus is himself God the Son, was the power of the Spirit so necessary to carry out his mission? A part of the answer must lie in the real humanity that Jesus assumed when he became incarnate (see INCARNATION). Jesus was no less a man because he was divine, as though he were divine omnipotence masquerading as human frailty. Since God had made man by his Spirit, and since man always lived in dependence upon God's Spirit, therefore Jesus, if he was one with mankind, must also have depended upon the indwelling Spirit of God. That is why, in the economy of salvation, he assumed the role of the Messiah, the One who was anointed by the Spirit of God. Yet he was also conscious of his own divine, absolute authority. Unlike the prophets in their dependence upon the Spirit, he did not say, "Thus says the LORD," but "truly, I say unto you." See DEITY OF CHRIST.

B. The coming of the Spirit upon the disciples. Jesus' reception of the Spirit is associated with his baptizing others with the same Spirit. John the Baptist said, "I would not have known him, except that the one who sent me to baptize with water told me, 'The man on whom you see the Spirit come down and remain is he who will baptize with the Holy Spirit'" (Jn. 1:33). Two events following the RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST mark this extension of the messianic unction to the whole body of the disciples. The first occurred shortly after the resurrection when Jesus breathed, saying, "Receive the Holy Spirit" (Jn. 20:22). The other is the well-known descent of the Spirit at PENTECOST (Acts 2). In an effort to harmonize these two, it has been suggested that the former event is symbolic of the latter (cf. esp. the full discussion by D. A. Carson, The Gospel according to John [1991], 649-55). It seems preferable, however, to suppose the real communication of the Spirit when Jesus breathed on his disciples (although the Gk. simply says "he breathed," without an object), which anticipated the larger effusion of the Spirit upon the whole body of believers gathered in the upper room with the apostles on the day of Pentecost. Perhaps Jesus' breathing looked back to the original divine inbreathing of the Creator (Gen. 2:7) and symbolized the infusion of a new principle of life by the risen Lord into the redeemed race, present in embryonic form in the little band of disciples.

Whatever our understanding of Jn. 20:22, Pentecost is an event that can hardly be overemphasized: it is of the same order of importance in redemptive history as the Incarnation. The symbolism of a rushing mighty wind is clear enough in the light of the basic meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words for Spirit—not to mention Jesus' word to NICODEMUS in Jn. 3:8, which likened the Spirit to the wind that blows where it will. At the same time, there appeared also tongues as of fire, resting upon the heads of all, possibly in fulfillment of the prediction of John the Baptist that Jesus should baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire (Matt. 3:11; according to some, the Baptist's prediction is a reference to judgment). The tongues as of fire were distributed to indicate that none should be without his portion in this new age of the Spirit, for the same Spirit gives gifts "to each one, just as he determines" (1 Cor. 12:11). The gift of the Spirit, then, is both collective and individual, for the whole body of the church and for each individual member.

Empowered by the Spirit, the apostles began to proclaim the mighty works of God. Devout Jews from all over the Roman empire were amazed to hear these men speaking the mighty works of God in their own languages (Acts 2:7-12). In response to Peter's Spirit-inspired sermon, many were baptized, confessing Christ; thus the Christian church was born. With this Pentecostal outpouring, what may be called the "dispensation of the Spirit" began. The promise of the prophet Joel that God would pour out his Spirit upon all flesh was fulfilled (Joel 2:28-29), as was also the saying of our Lord Jesus Christ that the Holy Spirit would come to teach the disciples how they ought to speak (Mk. 13:11; Lk. 12:12). The most elaborate account of the Lord's teaching regarding the coming of the Spirit is in Jn. 14-17, where it is made plain that the primary work of the Spirit was to illumine the minds of the disciples in their teaching in order that Christ may be glorified. This is exactly what happened at Pentecost and throughout the period recorded in the book of ACTS. By the preaching of the apostles through the power of the Spirit, men were everywhere convicted in respect of sin and of righteousness and of judgment (Jn. 16:8; Acts 2:37).

According to Acts, the entire historical movement, beginning at Pentecost and resulting in the founding of the church universal, took its rise from the BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT (Acts 1:5, 8) and was under his direction and control. The presence of the Spirit became the distinctive mark of the Christian society. The Spirit directed PHILIP to the ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH and later "took Philip away" (8:29, 39). At JOPPA, the Spirit spoke to PETER and led him to CORNELIUS in CAESAREA (10:19;

11:12). The Spirit enjoined the church at ANTIOCH OF SYRIA to set apart PAUL and BARNABAS for the missionary task (13:2) and guided the church in its deliberations over the most crucial question arising out of that mission (15:29). The Spirit would not allow PAUL to enter ASIA (16:6) and warned him especially through the prophecy of AGABUS about the evil intent of the Jews in Jerusalem (20:23; 21:11). Paul told the Ephesian elders that the Holy Spirit had made them bishops to feed the church (20:28), and presumably he would have said this of all churches. Therefore, the church age may be called the age of the Spirit, and the time that preceded it may be cited as a time when the Spirit had not yet been given (Jn. 7:39). The difference between the Spirit's manifestation before and after Pentecost was so great that it is here expressed in absolute terms, though such absolutes should not be pressed literally.

C. The Holy Spirit in the epistles of Paul. The epistles of Paul contain the fullest treatment of the doctrine of the Spirit in the NT. In harmony with the teaching of the book of Acts, which gives great prominence to the place of the Spirit, Paul associated the gift of the Spirit with spiritual power (1 Thess. 1:5), with inward joy (1:6), with moral purity (4:4-8), and with religious consecration (2 Thess. 2:13). As for the gift of prophecy, Christians were admonished neither to despise this gift, which would be to quench the Spirit (1 Thess. 5:19), nor to accept gullibly every teaching that purports to be inspired of the Spirit, when such was not the case (2 Thess. 2:1-2; see PROPHETS AND PROPHECY). Over and beyond these considerations, Paul wrote certain things about the Spirit that are not clearly expressed elsewhere and may be looked upon as new revelation. It is the Holy Spirit who bears witness to human spirits that they are God's children (Rom. 8:16), and enables them to call God their Father (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6; see FATHERHOOD OF GOD). He likewise assists them in PRAYER with sighs too deep for words (Rom. 8:26).

One of the more difficult aspects of Paul's teaching about the Spirit concerns his concept of the relation of the Spirit to Christ. As will be seen later, the universal teaching of the church has always been that the Spirit is a distinct person of the Godhead, as the third member of the Holy Metal relief depicting Paul in chains laying hands on those visiting him while imprisoned in Rome.

Trinity. However, upon examination of what Paul wrote about the Spirit, it is obvious that the "metaphysical" question of how God, Christ, and the Spirit are related is not a primary concern. In

Rom. 8:9-10 Paul uses the expressions “Spirit of God,” “Spirit of Christ,” and “Christ” as interchangeable. To “walk in the Spirit” is the same as “minding the things of the Spirit,” which is the same as “being in the Spirit.” All of these expressions are broadly synonymous with being “in Christ.” That is to say, the Spirit is the sphere in which the believer lives, a sphere of power and newness of life where “through Christ Jesus the law of the Spirit of life set me free from the law of sin and death” (8:2).

Is the Spirit then simply the power of the risen Lord as it is manifest in the life of the Christian and in the church? One recalls Paul’s words, “Now the Lord is the Spirit” (2 Cor. 3:17). Some have suggested that this sentence be reversed to read, “Now the Spirit is the Lord,” and see in it an affirmation of the sovereignty and divinity of the Holy Spirit. The context, however, shows plainly that the word LORD refers to Christ. He who is Lord is himself the Spirit (see the close of v. 18). Hence it would be difficult to establish any great difference in Paul’s thought between the formula “in Christ” and “in the Spirit.” The Spirit is the glorified Lord, the Christ, as he is present and active in his church. But if this is the case, why did Paul invoke upon his converts “the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit” (2 Cor. 13:14)? Using a Trinitarian benediction, he implied there is as much of a distinction between Christ and the Spirit as there is between Christ and God his Father.

The best resolution of this difficulty is to remember that in Paul’s writings the Spirit is also called the Spirit of God. “Don’t you know that you yourselves are God’s temple and that God’s Spirit lives in you?” (1 Cor. 3:16; cf. 6:19). Paul conceived of the Spirit as the essential being of God. Where the Spirit dwells and works, God is at work, for as the spirit of man knows the things of a man, so the Spirit of God knows the things of God (1 Cor. 2:11). This does not mean that there is no distinction in his mind between God, as he has revealed himself to be the Father, and God who, as the Spirit, enables believers to cry from the depth of their hearts, “Abba, Father.” No one need suppose that Paul so identified Christ and the Spirit as to make no distinction between the Lord and the One who enables believers to call Jesus Lord, that is, the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 12:3). It is because of the oneness of the work of Christ and the Spirit that his language reflects an identity between them. It is a dynamic identity; it is through his Spirit that the risen Lord dwells in his church and works in people’s lives. Christ may do everything that the Spirit does; and the formula “in the Spirit” can mean the same as “in Christ.”

The majority of references to the Spirit in Paul’s epistles are concerned with his work in the spirit of believers. When the Spirit “indwells” a Christian, there is manifest in his life the fruit of love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, and self-control (Gal. 5:22-23). With these virtues and graces, which adorn the Christian life and make a person the temple of the Spirit (1 Cor. 3:16), there is the firm hope of the resurrection: “And if the Spirit of him who raised Jesus from the dead is living in you, he who raised Christ from the dead will also give life to your mortal bodies through his Spirit, who lives in you” (Rom. 8:11).

Where Paul is concerned with the work of the Spirit in the human spirit, it is not easy to determine whether the word pneuma refers to the Holy Spirit or to the spirit of a person under the influence of the divine Spirit. This is especially true in passages contrasting the FLESH and the Spirit. The flesh lusts against the S(s)pirit and the S(s)pirit against the flesh (Gal. 5:17). Flesh may be understood as the weak and sinful aspect of human nature, whereas spirit may be interpreted as the human spirit, empowered by the divine Spirit in its struggle against the flesh. In other words, those whose spirit struggles against the flesh are those who live “in accordance with the [Holy] Spirit, [and] have their minds set on what the [Holy] Spirit desires” (Rom. 8:5).

A similar antithesis is found in 1 Cor. 3:1-2, where Paul distinguishes between “spiritual men” and “men of the flesh.” A man “of the flesh” is one who is dominated by his lower nature. The spiritual man, by contrast, is one who lives by the higher nature, the spirit, as guided and dominated by the Holy Spirit. The human spirit and the divine Spirit are one in their operation (not in their essence, for Paul is not a mystic). The “Spirit-filled” person is one in whom the Holy Spirit so assumes the ascendancy that at every point his or her life is guided and sustained by the Holy Spirit. Such a person is a citizen of that kingdom that is “righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit” (Rom. 14:17), someone who abounds in hope through the Holy Spirit (15:13).

The doctrine of Christian perfection, which is commonly regarded as the hallmark of the Wesleyan tradition, is so basic to the NT concept of the Christian life that it can be suppressed only by doing violence to the Christian message (see PERFECT). Those who feel an antipathy for all forms of “perfectionism” may indeed quote the verse, “For you died, and your life is now hidden with Christ in God” (Col. 3:3). Though the root of the tree be hid from view, the fruit is there for all to see. The same apostle admonished his readers, “Do not get drunk on wine, which leads to debauchery. Instead, be filled with the Spirit” (Eph. 5:18). If anyone is drunk, people will know it. Should they not also be able to see the difference that the Spirit makes in the life of one who is controlled, not by the destructive power of inebriation, but by the greater redemptive power of the Spirit? The note of caution that needs to be sounded is that there is no easy formula for achieving this perfection, as some who have talked about the “higher” or “victorious” Christian life have implied. Although the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has already made believers free from the law of sin and death (Rom. 8:2), there yet remains another law (7:21-22). Delivery from the strength of this subtle and sinister “law of sin” is not so instantaneous and dramatic as some teachers of perfection maintain. See SANCTIFICATION.

Another contrast beside that of “flesh” and “Spirit” is that which Paul drew between the Spirit and the letter (gramma G1207). Having died to the law (the written code), “we serve in the new way of the Spirit, and not in the old way of the written code” (Rom. 7:6). He styled himself a minister “of a new covenant—not of the letter but of the Spirit; for the letter kills, but the Spirit gives life” (2 Cor. 3:6). Not that the law is without spiritual worth (“the law is spiritual,” Rom. 7:14), but viewed as an external code of conduct by which a person can be justified before God, it can only minister death; for the sinner, the law can bring only the knowledge of SIN, never deliverance from sin (Rom. 3:20). Viewed as the JUDAIZERS understood it, the law is in opposition to the Spirit and the Spirit to the law. He who is renewed by the Spirit and so united to Christ by faith, has died to the law as a way of salvation. Paul reminded the Galatians: “But if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under law” (Gal. 5:18).

Before leaving the teaching of Paul on the Holy Spirit, a word must be said about the Spirit and the CHURCH. The Spirit is the bond of catholic unity, which has been regarded as one of the marks of the true church (Eph. 4:3). It is helpful to associate Paul’s thought here with his figure of the church as a body (1 Cor. 12:12-27; see BODY OF CHRIST). The Holy Spirit is the One who animates the body: “For we were all baptized by one Spirit into one body...and we were all given the one Spirit to drink” (12:13). The gifts of the Spirit are for the edification of the church (14:12; see below, III.C). Christians love one another in the Spirit (Col. 1:8); they have fellowship in the Spirit (Phil. 2:1); they worship God in the Spirit (Phil. 3:3); the church is comprised of Christians who are built up together as a habitation of God in the Spirit (Eph. 2:22); thus the church becomes an epistle of Christ, written not with ink, but by the Spirit of the living God (2 Cor. 3:3).

D. The doctrine of the Spirit in the non-Pauline documents of the NT. Although the other writings in the NT speak freely of the Spirit, they add little to Paul's teaching. The author of Hebrews stressed the role of the Spirit in the inspiration of Scripture. When he quoted Scripture, he often did so as though it were the direct Word of the Spirit. The Holy Spirit is the One who says what the Scripture says, and the Scripture says what the Holy Spirit says (Heb. 3:7; 9:8; 10:15). In this light one should understand the familiar verse where the "word of God" is described in personal categories, having the power to penetrate a person's inmost being and to discern the thoughts and intents of his heart (4:12). This power is not in the WORD as such, but only as it is the Word inspired by the Spirit, and the Spirit, who inspired it, uses it as a means to convict and convert those who hear. (Note Paul's reference to the word of God as the sword of the Spirit, Eph. 6:17.) Peter reflected the same view of the Spirit's relation to Scripture when he stated that the Spirit of Christ was in the OT prophets, bearing witness both to the sufferings and coming glories of the Christ (1 Pet. 1:11). Like the author of Hebrews, PETER gave the priority, not to the human author, but to the Holy Spirit in the writing of Scripture. No prophecy ever came by the will of man, but men spoke from God being moved by the Holy Spirit (2 Pet. 1:21).

In the epistle to the Hebrews it is said of the Lord's atoning death that "through the eternal Spirit" Christ "offered himself unblemished to God" (Heb. 9:14), a phrase difficult to interpret. It is probably best understood of his own Spirit as the eternal, preexistent Son of God. Unlike the animals of ritual sacrifices, he voluntarily offered up himself, thus acquiescing in the redemptive purpose of the Father (note Paul's reference to Christ as a "life-giving spirit," 1 Cor. 15:45).

The last book of the Bible, the Apocalypse, speaks of the Spirit from the perspective of his role in OT prophecy. The author, like the prophets of old, was "in the Spirit" on the Lord's Day (Rev. 1:10), and he wrote a message in which the Spirit spoke to the churches (2:7). "The testimony of Jesus," said the angel, "is the spirit of prophecy" (19:10); that is, it was the same Spirit who inspired the prophets that enabled the angel to show John these things, and who enabled John to receive and write them; hence, the angel was John's fellow servant. The Apocalypse refers repeatedly to the "seven spirits" of God (1:4; 3:1; 4:5; 5:6). The NUMBER seven is generally understood as a symbol of the perfection of the Spirit in the plenitude of his universal efficacy in the church. This interpretation is the basis of the well-known lines of the Latin hymn Veni, Creator Spiritus: "Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire, / And lighten with celestial fire. / Thou the anointing Spirit art, / Who doest thy seven-fold gifts impart." The Holy Spirit not only speaks to the church, but also joins his voice with the church in calling for Christ's return (Rev. 22:17).

E. Conclusion. Scripture reveals that the Holy Spirit is divine (not a created intelligence superior to the angels and inferior to the Son, as ARIUS maintained); in some sense one with the Father and the Son, in another differing from them. In his work, the Holy Spirit is intimately involved in the creation of all things, and sustaining all things, especially those creatures in which is found the breath of life. He is also intimately involved in the redemption of humanity, being not only the author of moral purity, but the Spirit who inspired the prophets to tell of the coming Savior. It is he who in due time anointed the Savior, resting all his fullness upon him. In the last days he extended his gifts to the whole world that he might raise up a new Israel, an elect nation, the church catholic, which he empowered to bear witness to Christ, and which he leads into all truth. This is accomplished by the renewal of the hearts of individual persons, whom he indwells, making them his temple, purifying them inwardly, and identifying with them in their struggle against the world, the flesh, and the devil, and in their aspiration for God. By his mighty power, with which he raised up Jesus from the dead, he will raise up the saints in the last day, a glorious company resting from their labors, whose works shall follow after them (Rev. 14:13).

III. The Holy Spirit in the theology and life of the church. Certain questions concerning the teaching of Scripture about the Holy Spirit have been omitted or only briefly touched upon in the above survey—matters for which more especial treatment has been reserved because of their importance or difficulty, or because they are matters on which the Christian church has been divided, or concerning which it has an uncommon interest.

A. *The Holy Spirit and the Trinity. In the OT, the Spirit of God is described as holy, but there is no doctrine of the Holy Spirit as the “third person of the Trinity.” This mode of expression, however, has had a large and varied history in Christian theology, and it is necessary to review briefly the meaning of the phrase and seek to outline the biblical basis for a Trinitarian understanding of God.

To say that the OT contains no doctrine of the Spirit as a distinct person does not imply that the Spirit in the OT is a vague, impersonal force. The Spirit is God’s Spirit, and because the God of Israel is a personal God, his Spirit is invested with personal qualities and involved in personal acts. As the living energy of a personal God, the Spirit is said to brood, rule, guide, quicken, and move. “Where can I go from your Spirit? / Where can I flee from your presence?” asked the psalmist (Ps. 139:7), implying that where God’s Spirit is, there he is personally present. The Holy Spirit of God was grieved by the rebellion of Israel (Isa. 63:10).

In view of this personalistic language, the promise of Jesus that when he departed from them (Jn. 16:7), the Father would send another Comforter (PARACLETE), even the Holy Spirit (14:16, 28), is a promise in keeping with the OT teaching concerning the Spirit. Furthermore, since he had fellowship with his disciples as a person, the implication is that the Spirit, who shall take his place, must also be a person like himself. Otherwise the promise of the Paraclete would offer little comfort to the disciples in the contemplation of their Master’s departure. Not that they would have had any clear understanding of these matters before Pentecost, but given that great revelational event, they were prepared by what they had learned from Jewish Scripture and the Lord himself, to regard the Spirit, not simply as God’s presence, much less as some vague influence, but as a personal manifestation of God.

Hence, Peter could accuse ANANIAS of lying to the Holy Spirit, who is God (Acts 5:3-4). This side of the incarnation and Pentecost, Peter could use the term Holy Spirit as distinct from both the risen Lord, who had been taken up from them into heaven (1:9), and the Father, to whose right hand Jesus had been exalted and from whom he had received the promise of the Spirit (2:33). This same hypostatic, or personal, distinction of the Spirit appears in Paul’s pronouncing of a threefold benediction upon the Corinthians: “The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all” (2 Cor. 13:14).

The clearest Trinitarian statement in the NT is the Lord’s commission to his disciples to baptize “in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 28:19). One passage concerning the Spirit that has figured largely in the debate of the church is Jn. 15:26: “When the Counselor comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth who goes out from the Father, he will testify about me.” As far as the doctrine of the Trinity is concerned, this passage has classically been appealed to as establishing the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit. As the Son is “begotten of” the Father, so the universal church confesses that the Spirit “proceeds from” the Father. (Under the influence of AUGUSTINE, the Western church, both Roman Catholic and Protestant, confesses that the Spirit proceeds from the Father “and the Son” [filioque], but this element is not expressly stated in Scripture.)

In interpreting this text, note should be taken of the two clauses. It was the Paraclete whom the Son would send, and it is the Spirit who proceeds from the Father. The former clause seems definitely to refer to the sending of the Spirit at Pentecost in his role, or office, as Sanctifier. Since this sending of the Spirit as the Paraclete was yet future at the time Jesus spoke, he used the future tense, referring to the Spirit as the One whom “I will send.” In technical theological language, this is an “economical” clause, that is, it describes the role of the Spirit in the “economy” (plan) of redemption. The latter clause, “who goes out from the Father,” describes, by contrast, the essential nature of the Spirit himself, that is, it is an “ontological” clause. The Holy Spirit is the One who eternally proceeds from the Father.

Not all scholars are agreed on this last point. Some would understand the proceeding from the Father and the future sending by the Son as both referring to the Spirit’s coming at Pentecost. In this case it may be maintained (from the plainly revealed fact that the Spirit was given by the Father and the Son to the church at Pentecost) that it is proper to describe his mysterious intertrinitarian relation to the Father and the Son in an analogical way. Hence, the church speaks of his “eternal procession” from the Father and the Son after the analogy of his proceeding into the world at Pentecost from the Father and the Son.

B. The sin against the Holy Spirit. Although the NT is full of the message of mercy, pardon, and reconciliation, which is the gospel, there are some sobering statements about a “sin unto death” (1 Jn. 5:16 KJV), about insulting “the Spirit of grace” in a way that invites the divine vengeance (Heb. 10:29), about blaspheming the Holy Spirit, a sin that shall never be forgiven, neither in this world nor in the one to come (Mk. 3:28-29, and parallels). The particular offense called blaspheming against the Spirit in the Gospels is attributing Jesus’ power of exorcism to BEELZEBUB, the prince of the demons, as though Jesus himself were possessed of an unclean spirit. There are many nuances of interpretation of this passage, but it surely seems that the unpardonable nature of the sin must be related to the hopeless warping and perversion of the moral nature, which would make one capable of such blindness to the truth as to attribute works of mercy having their origin in the power of God’s Spirit to a diabolic source, a malignity so deep-seated as to make one insusceptible of redeeming grace. It is not clear that the church has the insight infallibly to perceive such a sin, much less the power to invoke the anathema upon it; but the warning clearly implies that a person may be guilty of such a sin and that he will surely have to reckon with God. See UNPARDONABLE SIN.

This is essentially what the apostate does when having been one of those “who have shared in the Holy Spirit, who have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the coming age,” he falls away, becoming someone “who has trampled the Son of God under foot, who has treated as an unholy thing the blood of the covenant that sanctified him, and who has insulted the Spirit of grace” (Heb. 6:4-5; 10:29). The person who does this is one who says that the witness that the Spirit bears in his own soul is a lie, and he will not live by his original confession, and by his life declares that he does not believe what the Spirit says. Such a person cannot be renewed to repentance. On such a background one can appreciate a little more the seriousness of the sin of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5) and the swift judgment that befell them. As mentioned earlier, these statements contribute to the evidence that the Spirit is a person. One cannot sin against an influence; sin is meaningful only in the personal dimension, in the sphere of personal relationships. Since the sin against the Holy Spirit is the most aggravated form of sin, the conclusion is obvious that it is a sin against a most sacred, holy, and divine person.

C. The Holy Spirit and spiritual gifts. The word charisma G5922 is principally a Pauline term used technically for the gifts of the Spirit bestowed upon Christians for the edification of the church. None of the various lists in Paul's epistles is exhaustive, but by collating and combining the texts, it is possible to form an impressive list of SPIRITUAL GIFTS. Some of the gifts are connected with the proclamation of the Word and the preserving and inculcating of the truth (prophecy, Rom. 12:6; 1 Cor. 12:10; discerning of spirits, 1 Cor. 12:10; 1 Jn. 4:1; teaching, Rom. 12:7; 1 Cor. 12:28; tongues and their interpretation, 1 Cor. 12:10, 28, 30; miracles, 12:10, 28, 29; the word of wisdom and the word of knowledge, 12:8); others have to do with rendering service, some of it quite mundane in character, to the Christian brotherhood (healings, 12:9, 28, 30; governments, 12:28; helps, 12:28). The scope of these gifts illustrates that, according to the NT, the Spirit animates the whole church as a body, so that nothing is done except by his enabling power. Evidently the apostles exercised all these gifts, but Paul wrote to the Corinthians (12:4-5) as if, for the most part, gifts were distributed among the individual members of the church according to the Spirit's sovereign will (12:11), looking to the building up of the church. These gifts are to be received with thanksgiving and exercised with due consideration, but they are not abiding nor universal, as are faith, hope, and love (13:13). These normal fruits of the Spirit—"love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control"—make up the fullness of the Christian life (Gal. 5:22-23).

In keeping with the sovereignty of the Spirit, whom Jesus likened to the wind that "blows wherever it pleases" (Jn. 3:8), there seems to be no uniform modus operandi by which these gifts are given. In the initial outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, as the disciples were gathered in an attitude of expectation, suddenly the Spirit came with the sound as the rushing of a mighty wind and appeared in the form of tongues as of fire resting upon each one of them (Acts 2:1-4). At another time, while Peter was preaching the Word, the Spirit fell upon the house of Cornelius (10:44). At other times, the Spirit in his charismatic manifestations comes not by the hearing of the Word but by the laying on of hands. It is especially interesting to note that in Samaria, Philip was endowed with certain charismata as he preached—demons were exorcised, the sick were healed (8:7-8)—yet those who believed and were baptized did not have the Spirit fall upon them until Peter and John laid hands upon them (8:17). The Spirit was similarly mediated by Paul's laying hands on twelve disciples of John the Baptist in Ephesus (19:1-7).

The laying on of hands has become the received custom in the Christian church for symbolically conveying the Spirit in confirmation and ordination, and in those communions where charismatic endowment is sought and manifested, this receiving of the gifts of the Spirit is generally accompanied by the laying on of hands. The hands have always been expressively used by men and women, and their imposition has been from ancient times a means of conveying a blessing or benediction (Gen. 48:13-16; Mk. 10:16). It is appropriate then that receiving this supreme blessing of the Spirit's presence and power should be symbolized by such an outward act. See HANDS, LAYING ON OF.

As for the range of spiritual gifts, they extend all the way from the most striking displays of power to humble and menial matters. Acts 19:12 reports healings by a touch of handkerchiefs and aprons used by the apostle Paul. Paul listed "helpers" and "administrators" among those gifted by the Spirit (1 Cor. 12:28 RSV). It does not seem, however, that any overt, miraculous endowment is necessarily involved. Rather, those in the fellowship of believers who were endowed with wisdom in practical affairs and whose spiritual strength made them a worthy example to the weak, were regarded as having received such endowments from the Spirit as a gift, to be employed in the establishing of the church.

As time passed on, the inspirational aspect of the ministry began to recede in favor of the institutional in the form of the offices of presbyter (see ELDER (NT)) and DEACON, and many of the supernatural manifestations of the Spirit disappeared altogether. There can be no doubt that this trend impoverished the Christian communities, and the struggle to keep the church from becoming a merely institutional structure within human society, with the loss of that vital inspiration that only the Spirit can give, remained a constant factor throughout the centuries of Christian history. The rise and rapid growth of Pentecostalism in modern times is a striking testimony to the need of the institutional church for spiritual renewal. Without the presence and power of the Holy Spirit, the church is simply a sociological phenomenon.

D. The gift of tongues. In the discussions of the sovereignty of the Spirit in bestowing his gifts, of the renewal of the church, and of the wide range of the charismata, no subject will more quickly reveal a difference of opinion on all these questions than that of the gift of tongues. Because of the modern recrudescence of interest in this subject, a brief discussion is necessary from the point of view of the general treatment of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. Some dismiss this question on the score that Paul evidently found the gift an embarrassment, placing it last in a list where apostleship was first (1 Cor. 12:28), and exhorted his readers to covet the greater gifts (12:31), saying that he would rather speak five words in church with his understanding than a thousand in a strange tongue (14:19). On the other side, however, is the obvious fact that Paul, the chief of the apostles, recognized the gift as given by the Spirit (12:11), and thanked God that he spoke in tongues more than anyone else (14:18). The gift of tongues, furthermore, was central in the Pentecostal effusion of the Spirit and the founding of the Christian church.

Whether the initial gift of tongues at Pentecost was the same as that later manifested in CORINTH, however, is not altogether clear. The same word for “tongue” (glōssa G1185) is used in both instances, and the same inspiration of the Spirit is presupposed. Even the same reaction on the part of unbelievers is possible. Some mockingly accused the apostles of being inebriated (Acts 2:13), and Paul feared that unbelievers would consider the Christians as lunatics (1 Cor. 14:23). There is, however, the plain testimony in Acts that the Jews of the DIASPORA heard the apostles speaking in their native dialects (Acts 2:8). Whereas the sound was described as a “tongue” from the speaker’s standpoint, it was called a “language” from the hearer’s standpoint. Such, however, was not the case with the glossolalia of Corinth. There the phenomenon was described as an “unknown tongue” both from the speaker’s and the hearer’s point of view, for an interpreter was necessary for the edification of the hearers. That Paul spoke of the ecstatic experience of tongues as praying in the spirit while the mind was “unfruitful” (1 Cor. 14:14) has led many to feel that the Corinthian gift is not “language” at all, but gibberish, though this is perhaps to use a word that is too pejorative. (Some have argued that Paul refers to unknown tongues in the sense of very obscure languages, but linguistic analysis does not support this thesis. See further discussion under TONGUES, GIFT OF.)

Unbelief will, of course, dismiss all such manifestations as mere enthusiasm, there being no need to invoke the supernatural to explain them. It must indeed be granted that the emotions are radically involved in the use of tongues, just as the glands are radically involved in the exercise of love and anger. But even as the experience of love is more than glandular secretion (“a cold sweat in propinquity”), so speaking in tongues may be more than emotion. It may be emotion evoked by the presence and power of the Holy Spirit.

The popularity of the gift both in the ancient church and in certain circles today is understandable. As a person is drawn up into an ecstasy, he feels his spirit suffused with the divine Spirit, hence he is intensely aware of being in favor with God and in closest fellowship with him. Against such a spiritual experience there is surely no law, and it is a hollow prejudice that would deny the right of a Christian thus to “speak to himself and to God” (1 Cor. 14:28). Nonetheless, the gift is obviously a showy one in public and gratifying to anyone who craves personal prominence. In his classical evaluation of the gift (chs. 12-14) Paul recognized tongues as a divine gift (12:10), and expressed gratitude for this gift in his own personal experience (14:18). Yet it is a gift by no means indispensable, and the more excellent way is the way of LOVE (12:31). Speaking in tongues without love is like “a resounding gong or a clanging cymbal” (13:1). Therefore let him who speaks in a tongue renounce all self-glorification and seek the edification of the body (14:4).

When such rules are observed, there is no reason to demean the use of tongues. It is not the presence or absence of a particular gift as much as the lack of spiritual power in the lives of individuals and the church that is at issue. This is the summons which the Pentecostal movement addresses to the whole church: Do not quench the Spirit, but earnestly desire his gifts. Where has it ever been shown that 1 Cor. 12 and 14 are for the apostolic age alone? Only let those who claim to have discovered the neglected gifts of 1 Cor. 12 and 14 not neglect the love of 1 Cor. 13, which is the best and only commendation of the Spirit-filled life. (See J. L. Sherill, They Speak with Other Tongues [1964]; H. Thieliicke, Between Heaven and Earth [1965], ch. 5.)

E. Baptism and the Holy Spirit. One reason that the church in its more institutional form has shown little interest in the demonstrative evidence of the presence of the Spirit, is that the theology of the Spirit's role in the church and the Christian life has been intimately bound up with the theology of BAPTISM. It is taught that one receives the Spirit at the time of his or her baptism and needs, therefore, no other experience of the Spirit. On first consideration this might seem anomalous, since John the Baptist expressly contrasted his baptism in water with the baptism in the Holy Spirit and in fire that his successor (Christ) would perform (Matt. 3:11 and parallels). How then can these two baptisms, which are so sharply contrasted by the Baptist, be associated in the teaching of the church?

First, it must be recognized that the prophecy of baptism in the Spirit and in fire had its fulfillment at Pentecost, when the Spirit descended upon the disciples with the manifestation of tongues as of fire (Acts 1:5). There is no reason to associate this experience in any direct way with the baptism in water, which apparently took place during the earthly ministry of Christ (Jn. 4:1). Furthermore, the outpouring of the Spirit on the household of Cornelius, identified as the baptism of the Holy Spirit by Peter (Acts 11:16), was obviously independent of their baptism in water, which took place only subsequently.

Before the relationship of the Spirit to water baptism is considered, it is necessary to determine the meaning of the expression “baptism in the Holy Spirit.” Does the phrase describe a unique event at the founding of the church, or should Christians in all ages seek such an experience? In this writer's judgment, one should reserve the term “baptism in the Spirit” for the initial gift of the Spirit to the church. The phrase used both by John the Baptist (Mk. 1:8) and by the risen Lord (Acts 1:5) clearly refers to Pentecost, and Pentecost is obviously unique in redemptive history (a uniqueness that is commemorated in the Christian year in Whitsunday).

How, then, does one explain Acts 11:16, where Cornelius's house is said to have been “baptized with the Holy Spirit”? It should be noted that this incident was looked upon by Luke as unique. This is the first account of the preaching of the gospel to Gentiles, and when Peter rehearsed the affair before the Jerusalem elders, he stressed that the Holy Spirit had now fallen on the Gentiles as “on us at the beginning” (11:15). Thus Peter directly linked this outpouring of the Spirit to the first outpouring at Pentecost. His hearers recognized it as such: “So then, God has granted even the Gentiles repentance unto life” (11:18). Therefore the opening of the door of the gospel to the Gentiles was the completion of what happened at Pentecost, since it showed that not only Jews “from every nation under heaven,” but Gentiles as well, are to be embraced in the blessings and privileges of the new dispensation of the Spirit. The Scriptures refer to both these events as the “baptism in the Spirit,” reserving the term exclusively for these events.

The baptism in the Spirit simply describes that coming of the Spirit upon the church at the beginning in a new and permanent way, in contrast to the partial, transient, and limited manifestations of his power in the OT age. Because the Spirit has come in a final and full manifestation, he remains present in the church in all ages to bestow every spiritual gift and blessing necessary for the life and growth of the individual Christian and the ongoing of the mission of the church. Since the Spirit has thus come to abide with the church forever, Christians are bidden to “live [lit., walk] by the Spirit” (Gal. 5:16), and to be “filled with the Spirit” (Eph. 5:18). They are said to have the “anointing” of the Spirit (1 Jn. 2:20-27); the Spirit is called the “guarantee” of the Christian’s inheritance (Eph. 1:14). This last expression (Gk. arrabōn G775) refers to a “first installment” or “down payment” or “pledge,” which obligates the one making it to make further payments (see EARNEST). The apostle’s thought is that the Spirit is given as a first installment of the believer’s inheritance in Christ.

Although baptism in the Spirit is to be distinguished from water baptism, it by no means supersedes baptism with water (as the Quakers have taught). The work of the Holy Spirit is closely related in the NT to water baptism. To begin with, the Lord, when commissioning his disciples to baptize, told them it should be “in the name...of the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 28:19). Such a command would indicate at least this much, that the baptized Christian is placed in a relationship of dependence upon the Holy Spirit throughout the remainder of his life and consecrated to the service he inspires. Baptism itself does not effect this relationship, but there is no true baptism where this relationship between the Spirit and the one baptized is lacking.

The connection between baptism and the Spirit can be more closely defined by the account of Jesus’ conversation with NICODEMUS (Jn. 3). Jesus traced the spiritual life of the individual back to its origins in the new birth effected by the Spirit. At the same time, he connected this inner renewal effected by the Spirit with water: “no one can enter the kingdom of God unless he is born of water and the Spirit” (3:5). Whereas it would be anachronistic to say that Jesus referred expressly to Christian baptism, it would be even less plausible to suppose this Scripture has nothing to do with baptism (as is done when water is allegorized to mean the “word”). The use of water for the religious purpose of ablution and cleansing, with which Nicodemus was familiar as a Jew, was subsumed into the meaning of the Christian rite of initiation by baptism.

There can be little doubt that by the time the Gospel of John was written, the phrase “to be born of water” was understood of the outward sign of baptism, while “to be born of the Spirit” referred to the inward grace that is signified. It can hardly be overemphasized, however, in the light of the long history of sacramentalism, that this distinction between the outward sign and the inward grace must be carefully maintained. The symbolism and the inner reality move along parallel lines. Therefore baptism is the appropriate symbol of the inner renewal of the Spirit, but baptism itself does not effect this renewal. The new birth is the result of a supernatural work of the Spirit in the heart (cf. Jn. 6:63). That the work of the Spirit is associated with baptism, but not dependent upon it, is seen in the several events during the early years of the church: in Acts 8:17, the Spirit is said to have come in his charismatic gifts after baptism; in 9:17, before baptism; and in 19:5-6, immediately upon baptism.

This last instance is interesting, since Paul, when he perceived that the disciples in Ephesus did not have the Spirit, raised the question of their baptism, which he would not have done had there been no connection in his mind between the two. Having asked if they had received the Spirit, and they having professed utter ignorance of the matter, he then inquired: “Into what, then, were you baptized?” (Acts 19:3 NRSV). The naturalness with which Paul associated baptism and the receiving of the Spirit is also evident from 1 Cor. 12:13: “For we were all baptized by one Spirit into one body.” The Spirit is the element in which the baptism takes place, for it is he who animates the body, that is, the church, to which one is joined through baptism. Paul continued in the same verse to say, “we were all given the one Spirit to drink,” which may allude to the EUCHARIST, but that seems farfetched. It is likely that the whole verse refers to baptism. Literally, Paul wrote that all were “watered” or “saturated” with the one Spirit, by which all were baptized into one body. The figure is that of being immersed in the Spirit or drinking of the Spirit as the potion of new life, which is the experience of the baptized Christian.

Another passage that possibly indicates that Paul associated the reception of the Spirit and baptism is found in his second letter to Corinth. He wrote to the Corinthians: “Now he that establisheth us with you in Christ, and anointed us, is God; who also sealed [sphragizō G5381] us, and gave us the earnest...of the Spirit in our hearts” (2 Cor. 1:21-22 ASV). As early as the 2nd cent., baptism was called a “seal,” and it is quite possible that Paul was alluding to baptism in the figure of sealing, as that which marks, authenticates, and attests the believer’s union with Christ and the reception of his Spirit in his heart.

Perhaps the closest association in Paul’s epistles between the outward rite of baptism and the inward receiving of the Spirit is found in his brief letter to Titus, where the apostle says that God, because of his mercy, “saved us through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit, whom he poured out on us generously through Jesus Christ our Savior” (Tit. 3:5-6). The language of “washing” is plainly an allusion to baptism, and REGENERATION refers to the new birth, a fundamental inner change that issues in a (progressive) “renewal by the Holy Spirit.” If this were all that Paul ever wrote about baptism and the new birth, one might conclude that the former effects the latter. But in the larger context of his teaching on the efficacy of baptism, it is best to understand this passage in a manner that takes away neither from the meaning of the outward sign nor from the power of the Holy Spirit. Baptism is a washing of regeneration in the sense that it pertains to and sets forth, in a symbolic manner, the inward cleansing from the sin of the past, so that he who is baptized rises from the waters of baptism to a new life in Christ, here called the “renewal by the Holy Spirit.” See also BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

F. The Holy Spirit and confirmation. Confirmation is a rite closely related to baptism and is practiced in one form or another by many Christian churches. Because of the association between the reception of the Spirit and baptism, reflected in the Scriptures that have been discussed, in ancient times the church symbolized the receiving of the Spirit by a special rite immediately following baptism. The newly baptized confessor was “confirmed” by the laying on of hands, and his body was anointed with oil in the form of a cross on his forehead, that he might be endued with the Holy Spirit and consecrated to the spiritual priesthood of believers. This rite has been practiced down to the present time in the Eastern church. Since baptism is now commonly administered in infancy, the newborn child is anointed in token of his reception of the Spirit. In the Roman church, however, the rite of confirmation, which has attained separate status as a sacrament, is delayed until the age of puberty as “the sacrament through which the Holy Ghost comes to us in a special way to enable us to profess our faith as strong and perfect Christians and soldiers of Jesus Christ.”

The Reformers minced no words in depriving this rite of its sacramental status. Luther called it “foolery and lying prattle, devised to adorn the office of the bishop that they may have at least something to do in the church.” Yet, though divested of its sacramental status, some form of confirmation has been retained in those communions practicing infant baptism, as a sort of completion of that ordinance. When the question is asked what precisely the rite of confirmation signalizes, classically the answer has been given (esp. in Lutheran and Anglican circles), that it symbolizes the impartation of the Holy Spirit. This thought, included in the “Order of Confirmation” of the English Book of Common Prayer, has been adorned with poetic beauty in Keble’s Christian Year. Speaking of the child about to be confirmed, he sings: “Draw, Holy Ghost, thy seven-fold veil / Between us and the fires of youth; / Breathe, Holy Ghost, thy freshening gale, / Our fevered brow in age to soothe.”

Whereas it is true that in two instances in the book of Acts baptism is followed by the laying on of hands and the reception of the Spirit (Acts 8:17, the Samaritans, and 19:6, the Ephesian disciples of John), there are no other instances of this exact order of events. Furthermore, in both these instances, those who were baptized were adults confessing their faith, and the coming of the Spirit involved the use of charismatic gifts. (This is not expressly said of the Samaritans, but the response of SIMON MAGUS, as he observed the effect of the laying on of hands, implies as much.) By contrast, the present-day rite of confirmation is given to those who have been baptized as infants and it is not concerned with the exercise of the gifts of the Spirit. It is doubtful, therefore, if the view that one receives the Spirit at confirmation can be established from the NT. (See further G. W. H. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit: A Study in the Doctrine of Baptism and Confirmation in the New Testament and the Fathers, 2nd ed. [1967].)

G. The Holy Spirit and Scripture. Throughout the history of the church, the written Word of God and the Spirit of God have been closely associated. The authority of the Jewish Scriptures in the apostolic church is expressly grounded in the INSPIRATION of the Spirit. David wrote the Psalms through the Spirit (Matt. 22:43; Mk. 12:36; Acts 1:16); the same is true of the prophets (Acts 28:25; 1 Pet. 1:11; 2 Pet. 1:21). The author of Hebrews is especially clear that it was the Spirit of God who spoke in Scripture (Heb. 3:7; 9:8; 10:15). The most comprehensive statement is found in 2 Tim. 3:16, which reads that all Scripture is God-breathed (theopneustos G2535). Often it is said that “God speaks” or “the Lord speaks” in Scripture (Mk. 12:26; Matt. 1:22). That such language is interchangeable with “the Spirit speaks” is further evidence for the full deity of the third person of the Godhead.

When Christ came, the “Word made flesh” did nothing except by the Spirit. The words that he spoke were Spirit-filled and they are life. He, in turn, promised that when he left his disciples he would send another, who would bring to their remembrance what he had said and lead them into the truth (Jn. 14:26). The church has universally understood this promise to mean that the apostles were uniquely inspired by the Spirit as witnesses to Christ and as teachers of the church. The documents, therefore, that they and their associates wrote are of final authority for the church, along with the OT Scriptures.

The role of the Holy Spirit in REVELATION is summarized as follows: From the day of Pentecost onward, the Spirit assured the validity of the apostolic testimony to Jesus Christ (Acts 1:8; 2:1-2). Illumined by the Spirit, they discovered both the significance of Jesus’ existence and the final meaning of the OT Scriptures that bore witness to him. This truth was the object of their witness (Acts 2:22-41), a witness that has been preserved by the church in the NT Scriptures.

H. The inward testimony of the Spirit. When it comes to authority in matters of faith, Rome appeals to the magisterium, or teaching office, of the church; the sectarians appeal to the direct inspiration of the Spirit, which tends to merge with enlightened reason or conscience, or religious ecstasy. The Protestant church appeals to Scripture alone (sola Scriptura). The doctrine of the inward testimony of the Spirit teaches that the same Spirit who spoke the Scripture speaks in human hearts by and with the Scripture, to confirm and seal its truths to all who believe. This inward testimony adds nothing to the written revelation, for outside of Scripture there is no revelation. But it attests the Scripture to be God’s Word so that “our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth and divine authority of Scripture, is from the inward work of the Holy Spirit, bearing witness by and with the word in our hearts” (Westminster Confession of Faith 1.5).

In this regard, note should be taken of John’s reference to the unction from the Holy One that Christians have, which enables them to know all things—that is, all things necessary for their salvation (1 Jn. 2:20). It seems best to understand this “unction” or “anointing” to refer to the Holy Spirit whom believers have from Christ. This anointing, wrote John, “remains in you, and you do not need anyone to teach you. But as his anointing teaches you about all things and as that anointing is real, not counterfeit—just as it has taught you, remain in him” (1 Jn. 2:27). This is said in a larger context of admonition and warning against false teachers, whom John called ANTICHRISTS, teachers who deny the Christ. As an inspired apostle, he wrote to his converts urging them to abide in the truth that they had heard from the beginning (v. 24). Significantly, he did not rely solely upon his own authority as an apostle, important as it was that he should exercise this authority by writing a letter to them. For the authentication of the truth of his teaching over against the false teaching of those whom he opposed, he appealed to the anointing that his readers had received as Christians. It is natural to understand this anointing by the Holy One as the work of the Holy Spirit. This Spirit, given by Christ, confirmed and sealed to the hearts of the Christians to whom John wrote the truth of God's Word as the apostle had taught it to them, so that there was no danger that they would succumb to false teaching. They had the anointing that enabled them to discern all things.

The word witness is an apt and biblical term to describe this aspect of the Holy Spirit's work, for he is the preeminent witness. As Jesus bore witness to the Father, so the Spirit bears witness to Jesus throughout Scripture. This may be the meaning of the difficult verse in 1 Tim. 3:16, which says that Jesus was "vindicated by the Spirit." That is, Jesus, who was condemned by unbelieving men and crucified, is vindicated by the witness of the Spirit that he is the Christ, as the Scriptures testify. He seals to the hearts of believers what the Scriptures say about Jesus as the Christ.

However one may interpret 1 Tim. 3:16, the importance of the Spirit's witness in our hearts, as far as Scripture is concerned, is that thereby the Bible becomes the personal address of God to the individual. Otherwise it remains a mere human book, to be read as one of the Great Books of the world, a masterpiece of literature savored for its passages of great prose. When the Spirit speaks through Scripture, one discovers that the holy history, which unfolds from the first to the second Adam, engages him in his own destiny. He stands fallen in Adam and condemned; and, by the grace of God, he stands righteous in Christ. It is this inward testimony of the Spirit that transforms the formal authority of Scripture—which the Roman Catholic Church accepted as well as the Reformers—into a material authority, so that it becomes "alive and powerful" to transform lives.

John not only associated the Spirit with the proclamation of the apostles that Jesus is the Christ, as that Word is preserved in Scripture, but also with the sacraments: "This is the one who came by water and blood—Jesus Christ. He did not come by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the Spirit who testifies, because the Spirit is the truth. For there are three that testify: the Spirit, the water and the blood; and the three are in agreement" (1 Jn. 5:6-8). This passage is notably difficult, and the detailed interpretation offers several options. It is possible that the "water" and the "blood" are an allusion to the baptism and crucifixion of Jesus. If so, it is difficult to know why Jesus' baptism and death should be mentioned in this way, unless some reference to the baptism of the faithful and their eucharistic participation in Christ's death was made, to which is enjoined the inward witness of the Spirit. When the Spirit bears witness with a person's spirit that he is a child of God, and he has the faith to confess Jesus as Lord, then the outward, sacramental signs "agree" with the inner witness of the Spirit, and the three bear a common witness to the truth.

The perennial objection to the doctrine of the inward testimony of the Spirit is that it is mere subjectivism (this doctrine was called by D. F. Strauss the "Achilles' heel" of Protestant theology). The question is pressed, how can one verify an inward experience? How do we know that we have to do with the Spirit of God, and not mere psychology? After all, people can be inwardly certain and convinced about some very uncertain and unconvincing things. John offers this answer: the way to prove a spirit, whether it be of God—for there are many false prophets in the world—is to see if one is led to confess that Jesus Christ, who came in the flesh, is of God. "By this you know the Spirit of God" (1 Jn. 4:2). The movement of the argument, then, is from the inward conviction to the outward, external, historical event of the Incarnation.

This is, indeed, an adequate criterion only for those who stand within the circle of faith. Should one press for a "neutral" criterion by which to verify the presence of the Holy Spirit in the life of the individual Christian, or the church as a whole, there can be no other than that of love. Everyone, says the apostle, who is begotten of God, loves God, for God is love. And if a believer loves God, he will love his neighbor also, for how can he hate a brother whom he has seen, and love God whom he has not seen? If he loves God, God abides in him (1 Jn. 4:7-8). There can be no doubt that this abiding presence of God in the heart and life is the presence of the Holy Spirit, for “God has poured out his love into our hearts by the Holy Spirit, whom he has given us” (Rom. 5:5). Therefore, of all the fruits of the Spirit, love is the greatest, and it is the most excellent way (1 Cor. 13).

I. The Holy Spirit and the mission of the church. God entered history in Jesus Christ; he also continued to participate in history in and through the work of the Spirit. The Acts of the Apostles are the acts of the Holy Spirit in the world. As the writer of Hebrews quotes Scripture with the words, “the Holy Spirit says,” so what was accomplished in the mission of the apostolic church may be described as “that which the Holy Spirit does.” This mission of the church continues and will continue until the Lord shall have conquered the last enemy, death. As Jesus’ life, death, and resurrection are the content of the gospel, so it is the Holy Spirit who makes the gospel a transforming, redeeming reality in society. Were it not for the Holy Spirit, there would be no church in the world. It is the Spirit who speaks to the church (Rev. 2:7, 11, 17, 29), and it is he who thrusts the church into the world to proclaim the gospel (Acts 13:1-4), and empowers it under all circumstances faithfully to bear this witness (Heb. 2:3-4).

Homam hoh’mam (הוֹמָם H2102, derivation uncertain). Son of the clan chief LOTAN and grandson of SEIR the Horite (1 Chr. 1:39). The parallel passage reads HEMAM (Gen. 36:22 KJV; the NRSV has HEMAN, following LXX), though the NIV regards this form as an alternate of Homam and thus uses the latter in both passages.

homer. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES III B.

honey. The common Hebrew term dēbaš H1831 can refer both to the sweet fluid produced by bees from the nectar of flowers and to syrup made from fruit, such as dates and grapes (these were the only sweet food stuffs known in antiquity). The foraged honey is referred to as “from the rock” (Deut. 32:13; bees often built their combs in the crags) and “on the ground” (1 Sam. 14:25 et al.). Domestic honey from bee hives also is mentioned in the list of FIRSTFRUITS (2 Chr. 31:5). The significance of this food for the Israelites may be gauged from the characteristic description of PALESTINE as “a land flowing with milk and honey” (Exod. 3:8 and frequently). A less common term for domestic honey is nōpet H5885 (e.g., Ps. 19:10, which states that God’s ordinances are sweeter; cf. Ps. 119:103). The Greek term for “honey” is meli G3510 (Matt. 3:4; Mk. 1:6; Rev. 10:9-10). See also BEE; FOOD.

honor. This English term is used to render various words, especially Hebrew kābôd H3883 (frequently “glory”; cf. also the cognate verb kābēd H3877 in the piel form) and Greek timē G5507 (verb timaō G5506). In antiquity, the dual concepts of honor and SHAME played a very important role in the ordering of SOCIETY (cf. J. G. Péristiany, ed., Honour and Shame: The Values of Mediterranean Society [1966]), and recent scholarship has paid increasing attention to the significance of this cultural theme for biblical INTERPRETATION (e.g., J. H. Neyrey, Honor and Shame in the Gospel of Matthew [1998]; D. A. DeSilva, The Hope of Glory: Honor Discourse and New Testament Interpretation [1999]; J. H. Hellerman, Reconstructing Honor in Roman Philippi [2005]).

In a more general sense, honor is an enviable esteem, a valuable reward for excellence in station, character, or service. It is paid in thought, word, deed, or substance (cf. Isa. 29:13; Prov. 3:9). Primarily, God is to be honored, but all people are to “honor the Son just as they honor the Father” (Jn. 5:23; cf. Mk. 6:4). All that is sacred is to be honored, such as the SABBATH (Isa. 58:13-14) and MARRIAGE (Heb. 13:4, timios G5508). God declared to the Israelites that he would set them high above the nations “in praise, fame and honor” (Deut. 26:19). The Bible also mentions many individuals who were held in honor, including SAMUEL, DAVID, and JOB (1 Sam. 9:6; Ps. 4:2; Job 30:15 [Heb. nēdîbâ H5619, NIV, “dignity”]). SOLOMON and other kings were described as having riches and honor (2 Chr. 1:12; 17:5; 18:1; 32:33; cf. Ps. 45:9). Also, “The wise inherit honor” (Prov. 3:35). See GLORY.

PAUL told the Christians in Rome to pay “honor to whom honor is due” (Rom. 13:7 NRSV). The Bible is clear on who merits honor, including the list above. The fifth commandment is explicit: “Honor your father and your mother” (Exod. 20:12; Eph. 6:2-3). Jesus rebuked the PHARISEES and SCRIBES for not honoring their parents with material necessities (Matt. 15:4-6). Ancient laws pronounced the death penalty on those who dishonored parents in act or word (Exod. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9). PETER exhorted his readers to honor everyone, especially “the king” (i.e., the emperor, 1 Pet. 2:17), and Paul asked slaves to honor their masters (1 Tim. 6:1). (See NIDOTTE, 2:577-87; NIDNTT, 2:48-52; DNTB, 518-22.)

hook. This term occurs in English Bibles as the rendering of several words, including Hebrew wāw H2260 (used of the gold and silver connectors or pegs from which various hangings were suspended in the TABERNACLE, Exod. 26:32 et al.) and ḥāḥ H2626 (used, for example, of a ring put on the nose of a captive or an animal, 2 Ki. 19:28; Ezek. 19:4; et al.). In the NT, Greek ankistron G45 refers to a fishhook (Matt. 17:27).

hoopoe. One of the birds that the Israelites were not to eat (Heb. dûkîpat H1871, Lev. 11:19; Deut. 14:18; KJV, “lapwing”). There is general agreement that the species in question is the Upupa epops, a quite unmistakable bird, with long curved bill, fan-like crest (erected only when settled), and very conspicuous black-and-white wing pattern seen in flight. It hunts insects in all sorts of unsavory places, taking many dung beetles and other insects, and its nest gets into the most unsanitary condition because the excreta is left in and around it. Hoopoes visit Palestine to breed and have been well known there since early times. Several Arab legends link this bird with Solomon. (See FFB, 42.)

hope. The most common Hebrew noun for “hope” is tiqwâ H9536 (Ruth 1:12 et al.; note also the verbs qāwâ H7747 and yāhal H3498, “to wait, expect, hope,” Isa. 40:31; Job 6:11; et al.). In the NT this meaning is expressed with the Greek noun elpis G1828 (Acts 2:26 et al.) and its cognate verb elpizō G1827 (Matt. 12:21 et al.). Other Hebrew and Greek terms or expressions can signify attitudes that are related to hope.

6. Prominence of hope in the Bible.

I. Definition of hope. Hope has been defined as “desire accompanied by expectation.” Hope, however, is not always expectant. One may have hope with little or no expectation. He may recognize the possible, though not the certain or probable, fulfillment of something. On the other hand, a person may be so confident of something that he simply expects it to happen. A better definition of hope is “an interest or desire whose fulfillment is cherished.” Defining it thus, distinction can be made between strong and weak hope and between great and earnest hope. Strong hope has better grounds for believing an interest or desire will be fulfilled than a weak hope. It will be more confident and expectant. Great hope may refer to the intensity rather than to the confidence with which something is cherished, whereas earnest hope may designate the seriousness with which it is contemplated.

Hope is also to be distinguished from FAITH. They supplement each other, but are hardly identical. Hope is based on desire, facts, and rational considerations as well as, in its higher form, on faith. Faith is based not only on facts (Jer. 33:20, 25) and rational considerations (Gen. 1:1; Pss. 14:1; 19:1-4; 104; Isa. 40:12-26, 28; 41:17-20; 44:9-20; 45:2-8, 18-19; Acts 17:22-31; Rom. 1:18-23), but on a sense of God’s presence in one’s own life and in the life of a godly community (Isa. 12:2-6). It is also strengthened by one’s personal devotion and commitment to God. Like simple expectation, faith in its certainty or confidence is apt to go beyond hope (Heb. 11:1); yet in some respects a Christian’s hope is rooted in his faith and goes beyond it. It is in faith that Christ himself becomes one’s hope.

II. Human beings as hopeful. Because human beings are limited in their knowledge of the future and aware of alternative eventualities, they are hope-full, for they naturally seek fulfillment and meaning in life. The STOICS, who recommended apathy as the rational way of life, still hoped to attain happiness thereby. Nietzsche held that hope was the worst of evils, because it prolongs the torment of man; but his life was largely marked by hopeful efforts to interpret the world acceptably. Human beings are inherently hopeful.

III. Function of hope. Hope is not the only activating and guiding principle in human life; faith, thankfulness, intellectual curiosity, bodily desires and needs, moral ideals, social interests, and religious objectives and zeal also motivate us. Hope, however, is a major factor among them all and is intimately associated with the others. None of the other factors spur us to action without some measure of hope or certainty that our action will satisfy us in a given way. Dr. Karl Menninger (in Pastoral Psychology 11 [1960]: 11-24) speaks of the sustaining function of hope. Animals are known to revive quickly when given new hope but to die quickly when hopeless. Furthermore, evidence shows that helplessness and hopelessness can develop organic disease in human beings. Samuel Johnson was not far wrong when he observed that where there is no hope there can be no endeavor.

IV. Presence and nature of hope in the Bible. In view of its important function in human life, it is not surprising to find hope present in many biblical accounts long before it is mentioned by name. EVE saw that the forbidden tree was good for food and was to be desired to make her wise, and in the hope of satisfying her appetite and achieving wisdom she took of its fruit and ate (Gen. 3:6). JACOB had hope that by God granting his sons mercy Joseph might send back Simeon and Benjamin (43:14).

From these and other references it is evident that hope may lead to sin as well as to righteousness. It may err as well as guide correctly. What hope does depends on where a person seeks to find fulfillment and on what the hope is based. According to the Bible, no one should put his trust in riches (Job 31:24; Ps. 52:7; Lk. 12:13-21; 1 Tim. 6:17), or hope in men rather than God (Pss. 118:8-9; 146:3-4; Jer. 17:5-6). Reliance on idols is futile (Jer. 48:13; Hab. 2:18-19), and dependence on other nations is, to say the least, uncertain (Ps. 33:10; Isa. 19:3; 20:5-6; 31:1, 3; 37:6-7; Ezek. 29:13-16). Misplaced hope may prove false, and in some cases sinful. But it should be observed that even where an instance of hope is viewed as sinful, hope itself is nowhere in the Bible regarded as evil. Throughout the Bible, hope is considered a desirable attribute of human life. Even JOB in all his suffering does not curse hope as a cruel tantalizer, but laments the fact that his days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle and come to their end without hope (Job 7:6).

V. Objects of hope in the Bible

A. *Earthly blessings. Much of the hope in the Bible has to do with personal, temporal, and earthly concerns. There is the hope of bearing children (Ruth 1:12), of finding water (Job 6:15-20), of military victory (Ps. 33:18), of receiving repayment (Lk. 6:34), of seeing a miracle performed (23:8), of being saved in a storm (Acts 27:20), of sharing a crop (1 Cor. 9:10), and of visiting someone (Rom. 15:24; 1 Cor. 16:7; 1 Tim. 3:14; 2 Jn. 12; 3 Jn. 14). Much hope in the Bible also has to do with a better adjustment to life and the world individually and collectively (Jer. 29:11; 31:17; Zech. 9:12; Jn. 5:45). In both these cases, the people's further hope is often placed in God (Ezra 10:2-4; Pss. 33:18-19; 62:5-7; 71:5; 146:5-7; Jer. 14:8, 22; Lam. 3:21-24).

B. *God. Besides placing hope in God when seeking individual and collective blessings, the truly religious person also finds his highest longings and hopes directly fulfilled in God himself. Of the psalms perhaps none offer a better example than Pss. 42-43. "As the deer pants for streams of water, / so my soul pants for you, O God. / My soul thirsts for God, for the living God. / When can I go and meet with God?" (42:1-2). The writer's soul is cast down, but he enjoins it to hope in God because, he says, "I will yet praise him, my Savior and my God" (42:5). God is his "exceeding joy" (43:4 NRSV). A similar sentiment is expressed in Ps. 73, where the psalmist asks, "Whom have I in heaven but you?" and adds, "And earth has nothing I desire besides you" (73:25). Passages like these suggest a love of God with all one's heart, and with all one's soul, and with all one's might (Deut. 6:5).

This God-centered attitude of the OT persists in the NT. Jesus says, "Now this is eternal life: that they know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent" (Jn. 17:3). For Paul, to live is Christ, and to depart and be with him is far better than to remain in the flesh (Phil. 1:21, 23). The peace of God is what he cherishes (4:7). John anticipates being like Jesus and seeing him as he is (1 Jn. 3:2-3).

Geerhardus Vos, in an article on "The Eschatology of the Psalter," has very aptly expressed something of the fulfillment we can find in God: "The Psalmists sometimes succeed in transporting themselves into the midst of the joy and blessedness, wherewith Jehovah himself contemplates the consummate perfection of his work. This faculty for entering into the inner spirit of God's own share in the religious process represents the highest and finest in worship; it closes the ring of religion" (PTR 18 [1920]: 19). Fulfillment such as this makes clear why God, or Christ, himself is the highest object of hope.

C. *A new world. (1) Scriptural statements. Finding hope and fulfillment of life directly in God is something that occurs in the present life. In the Bible is also a vision of individual and community life that in important respects transcends our ordinary earthly existence. It is sometimes hard to distinguish between such a transcendent life and what simply is a better adjustment to life and the world. Yet it is there and repeatedly comes to clear expression. A day will come when “the Root of Jesse will stand as a banner for the peoples; the nations will rally to him, and his place of rest will be glorious” (Isa. 11:10; cf. 2:2-3). Not only shall the nations finally beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3), but even the animal kingdom will be peaceable (Isa. 11:6-9). God will create a new heaven and a new earth, and the former things shall not be remembered or come to mind (Isa. 65:17; 66:22). All flesh shall come to worship before him (66:23). See HEAVENS, NEW.

Jeremiah states that the days are coming when the Lord will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah, and they shall all know him from the least to the greatest (Jer. 31:31, 34). Significantly, at the Last Supper Jesus said, “This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many” (Mk. 14:24). Paul stated that “if any one is in Christ, he is a new creation” (2 Cor. 5:17). Christ rose from the dead, and because he lives his disciples will live also (Jn. 14:19). We who are in Christ are now “children of God, and what we will be has not yet been made known” (1 Jn. 3:2). “Now we know that if the earthly tent we live in is destroyed, we have a building from God, an eternal house in heaven, not built by human hands” (2 Cor. 5:1). John on Patmos “saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth had passed away” (Rev. 21:1). He also saw a throne and he who sat upon it said, “I am making everything new” (21:5). Many other passages are relevant. See ESCHATOLOGY.

(2) Its nature. According to the NT, OT visions and promises find a special fulfillment in Jesus Christ, but a further fulfillment of some of them (as well as of new promises) awaits the future. As Rudolph Bultmann sees it, in the OT the godly person was always directed to what God will do, so that his hope for the future consisted in a wholly general trust in God’s protection and help. The time of salvation, he says, was the time of confidence. The attitude of waiting and trusting hope became more and more an expression of knowledge concerning the provisional nature of everything earthly and present, and a hope in the eschatological future (Bible Key Words, ed. G. Kittel, 5/1 [1963]; cf. P. S. Minear in Scottish Journal of Theology 6 [1953]: 340).

Bultmann’s stress here on what God will do is doubtless justified; but his emphasis on the provisional character of our present, earthly situation in comparison with the eschatological future is open to question. One may grant that man by himself is ineffective and weak, that he is a sinner in need of God’s redeeming grace, and that his days are numbered: like a flower of the field he flourishes, for the wind passes over it and it is gone, and its place knows it no more (Ps. 103:15-16; cf. 62:9; 144:4). All this refers to the limitations of human power, commitment to wrong values, the brevity of the present life, and dependence on God. It does not refer to the intellectual, moral, and spiritual structure of our being, nor to the life that we live when God’s Spirit takes possession of us. As far as basic features go, the life hereafter that the Christian hopes for and his present earthly existence are of one piece. However much imagery and symbolism may be used elsewhere, Paul characterizes this life in sober, literal terms. He says, “And now these three remain: faith, hope and love” (1 Cor. 13:13). From this it appears that Paul conceived of “the perfect” that is coming as something living, dynamic, and growing, like the present existence, not as something static or consummated in every way; nor as something totally different from what is known already. Hope is one of the characteristics of human life today. With faith and love it will also be a characteristic of human life on a higher plane hereafter.

It is noteworthy that Bultmann interprets hope in the NT in a way similar to his interpretation of it in the OT. Taking hope in that sense, he holds that it will persist. In virtue of its idea of God, he says, Christian being, also in perfection, cannot be conceived apart from hope, that is, from a trust in God that looks away from itself and the world and patiently waits for God's gift; and when God has granted his gift, he will assuredly maintain what he has given (Bible Key Words, 37; see also TDNT, 2:530-33). Bultmann's contention that hope will persist is doubtless right; but he fails to recognize that since the love of which Paul speaks is a love of other human beings (1 Cor. 13:4-7) as well as of God, the hope springing from it can hardly be simply the kind of trust he says it is. It is rather a hope both in God and in the future as man envisions it on the basis of the knowledge, faith, and love that will be his.

VI. Prominence of hope in the Bible. The main reason hope is prominent in the Bible is its high concept of God and its strongly prevailing faith in him. Such a God and such strong faith in him cannot but instill great hope in us. But a further reason is the freedom the Bible assumes we have. God is ultimately in full control of things, but not in a fatalistic way. His control is one of intelligent and loving purpose, not a matter of blind, unintelligent determination. Furthermore, God leaves us as free agents. He does not force us in our deliberate choices or against our will, but rather indirectly and directly controls those personal factors that go to form our will freely. Along with this, the Bible also affirms that God has ordained great principles of life for us to rely on, to give meaning and stability to life in a world of vast possibilities. With such a view of God, man, and the world, there is ample room for hope on the part of the believer.

Hophni hof'ni (חֹפְנִי H2909, possibly from Egyp. ḥfn, "tadpole"). Son of ELI, who was the high priest at SHILOH (1 Sam. 1:3; 2:34; 4:4, 11, 17). Hophni and his brother PHINEHAS were greedy and rapacious when ministering as priests before the altar of Yahweh (2:12-17), and they acted immorally with the women who served at the entrance to the TABERNACLE (2:22). According to the law of MOSES, the worshiper at the altar was required to present to the priest the fat of the sacrificed animal along with the breast and shoulder (Lev. 7:29-34). The fat was to be burned on the altar as an offering to Yahweh (3:3-5); the breast and shoulder became the portion of the priest. Hophni and Phinehas, not content with the share assigned to them, sent a servant to interrupt the preparation of the sacrificial meal and to seize a further portion. They also insisted on getting their share of the offering before the parts dedicated to God were burned on the altar, and they demanded the best part of the animal raw, not boiled, before the offering had been made. All this, together with their immorality, brought great discredit to their father Eli. He remonstrated with them, but not severely enough. In consequence God's judgment was pronounced against him and his house first by an unknown prophet and later through SAMUEL (1 Sam. 2:27-36; 3:11-14). Hophni and Phinehas died in the battle against the PHILISTINES at APHEK; and Eli fell down and died when he heard of their death. This rejection of the house of Eli provides the setting for the emergence of a rightful priest, Samuel.

The plain N of Aphek where Hophni and Phinehas died in battle. (View to the N.)

Hophra hof'ruh (חֲפְרָא H2922, from Egyp. ḥa(a)ibre', meaning possibly "RE [the sun-god] is long-suffering [or of constant heart or happy-hearted]"). Fourth king of the 26th dynasty in EGYPT. Better known as Apries (through Gk. adaptation; his Egyp. birthname was Wahibrē), this PHARAOH reigned nineteen years, 589-570 B.C. When NEBUCHADNEZZAR II of Babylon besieged Jerusalem in 589, Hophra rashly marched against him at the appeal of ZEDEKIAH of Judah (sending a fleet to PHOENICIA; see Herodotus, Hist. 2.161). As soon as the Babylonians turned from Jerusalem to meet him, the pharaoh seems to have retreated homeward, thus affording the Hebrews no relief (Jer. 37; cf. Ezek. 17:15, 17). In his reign, and taken unwillingly to TAHAPANHES in the NILE delta, JEREMIAH prophesied that Nebuchadnezzar would in turn invade Egypt (Jer. 43:9-13; 46:13-26), while in far distant Babylon, EZEKIEL in the tenth to twelfth years of his captivity (c. 587-585) uttered further judgments on the pharaoh and his land (Ezek. 29:1-16; 30:20-26; 31-32), and again in his twenty-seventh year, c. 570 (29:17—30:19) on the very eve of Hophra's final fall. Hophra's end was prophesied by Jeremiah (Jer. 44:30, sole biblical reference to Hophra by name) and resulted from a military defeat in LIBYA and a consequent revolt against him in Egypt; Nebuchadnezzar duly attacked Egypt in 568/567 (ANET, 308; see further ABD, 3:286-87).

Hor hor (הֹר H2216, possibly equivalent to הָר H2215, "mountain"; the name always appears in the phrase הֹר הָהָר "Hor, the mountain"). (1) A mountain on the border of the land of EDOM at the foot of which the Israelites encamped on their journey from KADESH to the Promised Land (Num. 20:22-23). It was here that God told MOSES and AARON that, because of their sin at MERIBAH, Aaron would die on Mount Hor in the sight of the people of Israel. The two men ascended the mount with ELEAZAR, Aaron's son, and there Moses removed Aaron's high priestly garments and put them on Eleazar; then Aaron died, 123 years old. This was in the fortieth year after Israel had come out of Egypt (Num. 33:33-37; in Deut. 10:6 it is said that Aaron died at MOSERAH, possibly a neighboring area).

According to JOSEPHUS (Ant. 4.4.7), Mount Hor was one of the mountains surrounding PETRA, namely, Jebel Nebi Harun ("Mountain of the Prophet Aaron"), which rises 4,800 ft. and is approximately half-way between the S end of the DEAD SEA and the N end of the Gulf of AQABAH. It is the highest of the mountains in Edom. On the top is a tomb said to belong to Aaron, but the upper part at least is a Muslim tomb. Islamic tradition has it that this is the Mount Hor where Aaron is buried. This identification is doubtful, however. For one thing, Jebel Nebi Harun is in the middle of Edom and not on its border as was Mount Hor; since Edom denied the request of the Israelites to pass through its territory, and came out against Israel with a strong force of men, it is not likely that Israel would encamp at a mountain in the middle of Edom. It is also too far E of Kadesh. Moreover, the mountain is too high for the people to have witnessed from below what went on above, and too rugged for the three men to ascend it.

Jebel Madurah (Maḏrah), a mountain c. 15 mi. NE of Kadesh, on the NW border of Edom, is a more likely site. Its topography is such that Israel could observe the ceremony on the top. It is on the direct route from Kadesh to MOAB. Another possibility is Imaret el-Khureisheh, some 10 mi. NE of Kadesh (and 40 mi. SW of BEER SHEBA).

(2) Another mountain peak with the same name was to mark the N boundary of Israel's promised inheritance (Num. 34:7-8). Its exact location is unknown, but it was undoubtedly a prominent peak in the LEBANON range between the Mediterranean and LEBO HAMATH. Mount HERMON, Jebel Akkar (a NE spur of Lebanon), and Ras Shaqqa (on the coast, some 30 mi. NNE of Beirut) have been suggested.

Horam hor'am (חֹרָם H2235, meaning unknown). King of GEZER; when LACHISH was attacked by the Israelites, Horam came to its assistance, "but Joshua defeated him and his army—until no survivors were left" (Josh. 10:33; cf. 12:12).

Horeb hor'eb (חֹרֵב H2998, "dry, desolate"). See SINAI, MOUNT.

Horem hor'em (חֹרֵם H3054, possibly "consecrated" or "[small] rock crevice"). A fortified town in the hill country of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:38). It was probably in N GALILEE, but the precise site is unknown.

Horesh hor'esh (חֹרֶשׁ H3092, found only in its locative form, חֹרֶשָּׁה, and usually with the definite article, "the woodland"). A place in the Desert of ZIPH where DAVID took refuge from SAUL; there David and JONATHAN made a compact (1 Sam. 23:15-18). The "strongholds at Horesh" are further identified as being on the hill of HAKILAH and S of JESHIMON (v. 19). Though the precise location is uncertain, it is often identified with Khirbet Khoreisa, about 6 mi. S of HEBRON. A few scholars, however, have thought that the word should be understood as a common noun (thus "the thicket in the Desert of Ziph”) rather than as a place name.

Hor Haggidgad hor’huh-gid’gad (חִגְדָּגַד H2988, “cave of Gidgad”). KJV Hor-hagidgad. A station of the Israelites in the wilderness, located between BENE JAAKAN and JOTBATHAH (Num. 33:31-33); apparently the same as GUDGODAH (Deut. 10:7). The site is unknown, though one proposed identification is Wadi Ghadhaghedh.

Hori hor’i (חֹרִי H3036, derivation uncertain; see HORITE and HURRIAN). (1) Firstborn son of LOTAN and grandson of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:22; 1 Chr. 1:39). He was no doubt the ancestor of a tribal group in EDOM. The form of his name is the same as that of the gentilic “Horite,” but the connection between the personal and the ethnic name is unclear. Perhaps Hori was viewed as the Horite par excellence. It has also been suggested that his name reflects a tribal struggle for supremacy.

(2) Father of Shaphat, who was the leader from the tribe of SIMEON included among the twelve spies sent by MOSES to explore the land of Canaan (Num. 13:5).

Horite hor’it (חֹרִי H3037, perhaps “cave dweller” or “nobleman” or “son”). Phonetically, this name is the OT Hebrew equivalent of extrabiblical HURRIAN, but the OT references to “Horites” do not fit what we know about the Hurrians, a non-Semitic people. The personal names of the “Horites” in Gen. 36:20-30 are inconsistent with Hurrian patterns and seem rather to be Semitic. It is moreover claimed that no archaeological evidence exists for Hurrian settlements in EDOM or TRANSJORDAN in general, whereas the OT reports “Horites” living there (Gen. 14:6; Deut. 2:12, 22 [KJV, “Horim”]). These people, whom we may refer to as E Horites, and who were driven out and destroyed by the Edomites, were apparently not Hurrians.

On the other hand, it is thought by some that the name Horite originally stood in two places where the Hebrew text has HIVITE (see LXX Gen. 34:2 and Josh. 9:7; cf. also Isa. 17:9). If so, these passages would refer to a group that we may call W Horites, because they are said to reside in the region to the W of the Jordan. They are to be kept distinct from the E Horites, the predecessors of the Edomites. The W Horites, it is claimed by some, are non-Semites related to the peoples called Hurrians in extrabiblical texts of the 2nd millennium B.C. The etymology of the name of the E Horites may be the Semitic noun for “cave” (ḥōr H2986), identifying the pre-Edomites of SEIR as “cave dwellers,” whereas the etymology of the name of the W Horites is obscure, being involved with the uncertain origins and relationships of the poorly understood Hurrian language. Hormah hor’muh (חֹרְמָה H3055, possibly “consecration, destruction” or “rock crevice”). One of the southernmost cities of the tribe of JUDAH, located in the NEGEV, toward the boundary of EDOM (Josh. 15:30; cf. v. 21); it was subsequently allotted to the tribe of SIMEON (Josh. 19:4; 1 Chr. 4:30). According to some, it was officially a Simeonite town incorporated into Judah’s tribal territory (note that it was regarded as Judahite in the time of DAVID, 1 Sam. 30:30; cf. v. 26).

Hormah is first mentioned in Num. 14:45, which records that when the Israelites rashly invaded Canaan at KADESH against the will of God, the Amalekites and Canaanites defeated and pursued them as far as Hormah. Toward the end of the wilderness wanderings, the Canaanite king of ARAD fought against Israel and took some of them captives. The Israelites vowed to the Lord that if he would help them conquer the Canaanites, they would utterly destroy their cities (Num 21:1-2, using the verb ḥāram H3049, “to consecrate, devote [to destruction], place under the ban”; see BAN). God answered their prayer, they conquered the Canaanite towns, and “the place” (referring either to a cluster of cities or only to the specific spot of the defeat) was named Hormah (Num. 21:3).

Some scholars believe that the biblical text reflects conflicting traditions, for JOSHUA is later said to have conquered the king of Hormah (Josh. 12:14). Moreover, the book of Judges relates that many years later “the men of Judah went with the Simeonites their brothers and attacked the Canaanites living in Zephath, and they totally destroyed the city. Therefore it was called Hormah” (Jdg. 1:17). A possible explanation is that at the time of Moses the Israelites were satisfied with the defeat of the Canaanites of Arad and deferred “the complete execution of their vow until the time when they had gained a firm footing in Canaan” (KD, Pentateuch, 3:137). According to this view, Num. 21:3 does not refer specifically to ZEPHATH, a town within the country of the king of Arad that was renamed Hormah only later (Jdg. 1:17, though referred to by this name proleptically in the book of Joshua).

The location of Hormah/Zephath is uncertain. It is mentioned between Geder and Arad (Josh. 12:14), between Kesil and Ziklag (15:30), and between Bethul and Ziklag (19:4). Proposed sites include Tell el-Milh (c. 7 mi. NE of BEERSHEBA, but see ARAD and cf. Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 201), Tell esh-Shari<sup>ah</sup> (c. 12 mi. NW of Beersheba, but see ZIKLAG), Khirbet el-Meshash (= T. Masos, c. 8 mi. ESE of Beersheba; see esp. Y. Aharoni in BA 39 [1976]: 55-76, and cf. NEAEHL, 3:986-89), Khirbet Gharra (= T. <sup>ira</sup>, c. 2 mi. NE of el-Meshash), and Tell Khuweilifeh (= T. Ḥalif, c. 9.5 mi. NNE of Beersheba, but see RIMMON (PLACE) #1).

horn. This term, usually the rendering of Hebrew qeren H7967, can refer literally to the bony structure projecting from the head of rams and other animals (e.g., Gen. 22:13), but it is also used as a symbol of power, victory, and salvation (e.g., Ps. 18:2; cf. Gk. keras G3043, Lk. 1:69). Musical instruments were made from rams’ horns (see MUSIC, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS IV.C). See also HORNS OF THE ALTAR.

hornet. This English term is used by some Bible versions to render Hebrew šir’â H7667, a word that occurs three times, possibly referring to a stinging wasp (Vespa orientalis). God told the Israelites that he would send his terror ahead of them to throw the pagan nations into confusion. Then he added, “I will send the hornet ahead of you to drive the Hivites, Canaanites and Hittites out of your way” (Exod. 23:28; similarly Deut. 7:20; Josh. 24:12; in all three passages the NRSV renders “pestilence,” and others suggest it means “terror” or “discouragement”).

In modern Hebrew, the name is given to a number of large and conspicuously banded hymenopterous insects that live in colonies of varying sizes. The largest of all is more specifically known as hornet in English; it is over one and a half inches long and its sting can be both unpleasant and dangerous because of the large volume of venom that can be injected. The word wasp refers generally to a large assortment of smaller, but generally similar, insects. In contrast to the BEE, both hornets and wasps are basically carnivorous, and in Palestine hornets often prey on honeybees.

The true hornet is found in many parts of Palestine and in all types of country, including the desert around the DEAD SEA. Although wasps have a less painful sting, some common species live in large colonies, some of which make nests suspended from tree branches. Such a nest could easily be disturbed, with serious results, by soldiers and their mounts going through scrub and woodland. The widespread occurrence of these stinging insects, whose massive interference could have caused some panic and thus affected the outcome of a battle, makes it possible that the use in these three passages is purely literal. On the other hand, J. Garstang (The Foundations of Bible History: Joshua-Judges [1931], 112ff., 258ff.) identified the hornet with the sacred symbol of the pharaohs and saw the fulfillment of this promise in the Egyptian campaigns in Canaan prior to the exodus, but this view has not been generally accepted.

G. S. CANSDALE

horns of the altar. The four protrusions at the corners of a hewn stone ALTAR, a feature common to the ancient world (Exod. 27:2 et al.). It is clear that the horns of the altar conferred sanctuary to the accused (1 Ki. 1:50).

Horon. See BETH HORON.

Horonaim hor'uh-nay'im (חורנים H2589, prob. "twin caves"). (1) According to the SEPTUAGINT (CODEX VATICANUS), a place near BAAL HAZOR, mentioned in connection with the killing of AMNON by the men of ABSALOM (2 Sam. 13:34; Baal Hazor is mentioned in v. 23). The KJV, following the MT, reads: "But Absalom fled. And the young man that kept the watch lifted up his eyes, and looked, and, behold, there came much people by the way of the hill side behind him." The Greek versions, however, add a sentence that takes the following form in Codex Vaticanus: "The watchman went and told the king, 'I see men in the direction of Horonaim [ek tēs hodou tēs Ōrōnēn], on the side of the hill'" (NIV rendering; the NRSV accepts the reference to Horonaim, but reconstructs the text differently). The omission in the MT can reasonably be explained as a result of haplography (the scribe's eye skipping from mišad hāhār, "beside the hill," in the middle of the verse to its repetition at the end). If Horonaim is indeed original, the reference is probably to "the twin Horons," that is, Upper and Lower BETH HORON (c. 12 mi. SW of Baal Hazor). "The royal party must have fled Baal-hazor by way of Bethel and picked up the Horonaim road to Jerusalem near Gibeon" (P. K. McCarter, Jr., II Samuel, AB 9 [1984], 333).

(2) A city of MOAB, mentioned in two prophetic oracles (Isa. 15:5; Jer. 48:3, 5, 34). The name Horonaim (in the form ḥwrnn, Hauronen) also occurs in the MOABITE STONE, where King MESA states that he fought against it and presumably conquered it (cf. ANET, 322). During the OT period, it appears that Israel was never in possession of Horonaim, but subsequently, according to JOSEPHUS, Alexander Jannaeus (see HASMONEAN II.C) took it from the Arabs (Ant. 13.15.4 §398; Hyrcanus later restored it to Aretas, 14.1.4 §18). The city was apparently near LUHITH at the foot of a descent (Jer. 48:5), but its exact location is unknown. It probably lay on one of the roads leading from the Moabite plateau to the ARABAH. Various identifications have been proposed (cf. ABD, 3:289), among them el-Iraq, some 9 mi. E of the S tip of the Dead Sea and 6 mi. N of the ZERED river.

Horonite hor'uh-nit (חורני H3061). An epithet applied to SANBALLAT, who opposed NEHEMIAH in his attempt to restore Jerusalem (Neh. 2:10, 19; 13:28). The name may denote a citizen of HORONAIM in MOAB or, more probably, of BETH HORON.

horse. This term (Heb. sûs H6061, Gk. hippos G2691) is applied equally to a mounted horse or to a horse without rider. The male is called a stallion; the female, mare (Heb. sûsâ H6063, Cant. 1:9); the young (usually born singly), colt or foal.

I. Introduction. The horse was the latest and strongest transport animal to be developed; it spread rapidly, first over Eurasia and N Africa, later to the Americas and Australasia, escaping and becoming feral in suitable areas. Everywhere it has become the most important beast of burden and an intimate associate of man, next only to the dog. This factor may have helped to fix a prejudice against eating horsemeat in English-speaking lands. Horsemeat was forbidden to the Hebrews because, like its close relative the donkey (see ASS, DONKEY), the horse is single-hoofed and does not ruminate; there is no obvious hygienic basis for this ban.

II. Origin. F. E. Zeuner (A History of Domesticated Animals [1963]) sets out in detail the archaeological and zoological evidence of the horse's early history, and the following owes much to his research. The equines once formed four groups, fairly distinct geographically: (1) the zebras in E and S Africa, where sporadic attempts to use them had only temporary success; (2) the true asses of N and NE Africa, from which the donkey is derived; (3) the half-asses (see WILD ASS) from the dry belt running from Palestine eastward to the Gobi Desert; (4) the horses of the grassy lowlands of Eurasia N of the great mountain ranges. All four groups were divided into local species or races. Of the true horses, only Przewalski's, the E race, survives precariously in Mongolia and some zoo parks. It stands about forty inches at the shoulder and is reddish brown, the hair becoming longer and paler in winter; the mane is dark brown. Like all equines it runs in herds. The W race was the tarpan, of which the last known specimen died in 1851 in the Ukraine. It was a small gray-brown horse with upright mane and the chief ancestor of the many breeds of domestic horses today, with the Plains of Turkestan a likely center of domestication, though not the only one.

III. Domestication. Undoubtedly horses were domesticated later than the sheep, goat, ox, and ass, but nothing is known of its early pattern. Oxen had long been used for pulling wheeled carts, and with the fertile patches of plains country becoming exhausted and dried out (as happened after a few centuries of primitive agriculture), the need for faster draught animals might have prompted the farmers to catch and tame these wild horses. The actual means remains a mystery; modern humans have achieved nothing like it, other than the catching and training of a few zebras. Regarding its original domestication, this must have been during the 3rd millennium B.C., but evidence prior to 2000 B.C. is not reliable. The Sumerians mention the horse in proverbs from c. 2100 but apparently did not use it. The horse first found regular mention about 1800, though it was not yet important (the Code of HAMMURABI, c. 1750, does not list it). Within the next fifty years it spread rapidly to the SW, including Asia, Palestine, and Egypt, where it arrived in the HYKSOS era not many decades before JOSEPH came to power. This spread, which took it as far as Troy, resulted from its use in war chariots. Whatever its purpose when first brought into service, the horse added a new dimension to invading armies.

IV. The horse in biblical narrative. The first biblical mention is Gen. 47:17, which states that the Egyptians "brought their livestock to Joseph, and he gave them food in exchange for their horses, their sheep and goats, their cattle and donkeys." At this time, and for some centuries, the horse was used mainly for draught purposes, mostly drawing CHARIOTS, and the first clear evidence of one being ridden is a figurine of the 18th Egyptian dynasty (c. 1580 B.C.). An individual rider appears first in 1 Ki. 20:20 (“Ben-Hadad king of Aram escaped on horseback with some of his horsemen”), but Gen. 50:9 records that both horsemen and chariots accompanied the great cortege that took JACOB’S body for burial in Canaan, and the Egyptian armies used both chariots and cavalry to pursue the escaping Hebrews. It is unlikely that the Israelites had owned horses in GOSHEN or taken any with them to the desert.

Later, when SOLOMON had control of the two main routes parallel to the coast along which animals could be brought safely, Egypt became an important source of horses for Israel (1 Ki. 10:28-29). The amassing of horses had been specifically forbidden by God (Deut. 17:16), and the context of this ban is notable: it follows the statement that the Hebrews would one day demand a king. When the people made this request some two centuries later (1 Sam. 8:11), SAMUEL warned them that the ban would be ignored to their detriment; however, it may have been observed through the reigns of SAUL and DAVID, when the main reference is to horses in the enemy armies. It appears from 2 Sam. 8:4 that David kept some for his own use; he killed most, but left enough for a hundred chariots. This turned out to be a tragic mistake, for they were available for two of his sons to use. ABSALOM, plotting against him, “provided himself with a chariot and horses” (2 Sam. 15:1). Some twelve years later, when David was on his death bed, a younger son, ADONIJAH, in an effort to take over the kingdom, “got chariots and horses ready” (1 Ki. 1:5).

Solomon made no attempt to obey God on this point, and within a year or so of becoming king he had built stables for 4,000 horses (2 Chr. 9:25; the figure of 40,000 in the corresponding passage in the MT of 1 Ki. 4:26 [cf. KJV] must be a scribal error). He imported horses from Egypt, with which he had profitable connections through marrying the daughter of the pharaoh, paying 150 shekels of silver (60 ounces) per horse. Horses also formed part of the regular tribute paid him (1 Ki. 10:25). From then on both Judah and Israel regarded horses and chariots as essential for fighting the frequent wars with neighboring nations. Early in its history the horse sometimes had sacred connections. The only biblical instance is in 2 Ki. 23:11, where JOSIAH, in his sweeping reforms, removed horses that earlier kings had dedicated to the sun.

V. Biblical significance. There is nothing about the horse’s biology or habits in the many biblical contexts, in contrast to other major animals. The psalmist associates it with the mule as animals that “have no understanding but must be controlled by bit and bridle or they will not come to you” (Ps. 32:9). Many carvings illustrate the early use of the BIT AND BRIDLE. JOB’S description (Job 39:19-25) is of a war horse and speaks merely of its strength and fearlessness in battle. Horses are also mentioned in connection with the famine foretold by ELIJAH (1 Ki. 18:5). Donkeys were much more numerous, but could manage on poorer forage and were owned in ones and twos.

The horse’s place in the Scriptures contrasts markedly with that of the donkey. Of over 140 references to horses, only about 50 are truly literal; the rest, with all the 15 NT references (except horsemen, Acts 23:23, 32), are figurative or prophetic. In a small minority of cases a single horse is mentioned (notably 1 Ki. 10:29; Esth. 6:8-11; and nine quasiproverbial expressions in Job, Psalms, and Proverbs). There is no record of a horse being owned by the common people; throughout OT times the horse was a monopoly of kings and their nobles in both Palestine and nearby countries and thus, in effect, a symbol of human power. This confirms its metaphorical significance. Some of the prophetic passages of Zechariah and Revelation are highly symbolic and beyond the scope of comment here, but the tenor of all the many figurative passages may be summed up in two verses: Ps. 33:17, “A horse is a vain hope for deliverance”; and Hos. 1:7, “I will save them—not by bow, sword or battle, or by horse and horsemen.” (See further G. S. Cansdale, Animals and Man [1952]; FFB, 43-45; ABD, 6:1136-37.)

Horse Gate. A JERUSALEM gate on the E wall of the city (Jer. 31:40). Restored by NEHEMIAH (Neh. 3:28), it was apparently N of the WATER GATE and S of the EAST GATE (vv. 26, 29), therefore near the SE corner of the TEMPLE. Queen ATHALIAH was killed “at the entrance of the Horse Gate [mēbô’ ša’ar-hassûsîm] on the palace grounds” (2 Chr. 23:15; the parallel passage, 2 Ki. 11:16, has simply mēbô’ hassûsîm, lit., “the entrance of the horses”), and some argue that this was a different entrance, situated between the palace and the temple, and that it led to the stables in the Palace of the Forest of Lebanon (see M. Avi-Yonah in IEJ 4 [1954]: 240, 247; ABD, 3:290).

horseleach. See LEECH.

Hosah (person) hoh’suh (חֹסֵה H2880, possibly “refuge”). A Levite descended from MERARI whom DAVID made a gatekeeper of the tent housing the ARK OF THE COVENANT when it was brought into Jerusalem (1 Chr. 16:38). He and his family were later part of the organization of the gatekeepers (26:10-11) and were made responsible for providing guards for the SHALLEKETH Gate on the W (26:16).

Hosah (place) hoh’suh (חֹסֵה H2881, possibly “refuge”). A town on the N border of the tribal territory of ASHER, near TYRE on the Mediterranean coast (Josh. 19:29). Its precise location is uncertain, but many scholars identify it with ancient Usu (mentioned for example in Seti I’s lists) and modern Tell Rashidiyeh, a coastal town c. 3 mi. SSE of Tyre (cf. Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 178, 258). Others question the connection with Usu and identify Hosah with modern Khirbet el-Hos, just E of Tell Rashidiyeh (cf. the discussion in Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 218-20).

hosanna hoh-zan’uh (חֲסַנָּא G6057, a transliteration of Heb. [or possibly Aram.] חֲסַנָּא, “Save, please,” though this precise form is not attested). This term was originally a Hebrew invocation addressed to God (found only in Ps. 118:25 [KJV, “Save now”], which uses the more common long form of the imperative, hōšî’â nnā’). Later it apparently came to be used as a joyous acclamation, an ascription of praise to God (cf. R. H. Gundry, The Use of the Old Testament in St. Matthew’s Gospel: With Special Reference to the Messianic Hope [1967], 41-43). Already in Jeremiah’s time the verb could almost be used as a shout of welcome, for God instructs Israel to give praise by saying, hōša’ yhwh’et-(ammēka, “O LORD, save your people” (Jer. 31:7). In this sense it was used at the joyous Feast of Tabernacles, the seventh day of which came to be called the “Great Hosanna” or “Hosanna Day.” (For further data, and for arguments that the term is Aram. and reflects pre-Christian usage, see J. A. Fitzmyer in Tradition and Interpretation in the New Testament, ed. G. F. Hawthorne and O. Betz [1987], 110-18.)

The English transliteration hosanna appears in Bible versions only in connection with Jesus’ TRIUMPHAL ENTRY into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday. Three of the evangelists give accounts of this incident, containing both identical and supplementary phrases. Matthew records: “The crowds that went ahead of him and those that followed shouted, ‘Hosanna to the Son of David!’ ‘Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord!’ [= Ps. 118:26] ‘Hosanna in the highest!’” (Matt. 21:9; cf. also v. 15). Mark adds the statement, “Blessed is the kingdom of our father David that is coming!” (Mk. 11:9-10), whereas John gives a briefer report (Jn. 12:13). Luke, in keeping with his tendency not to include Hebrew or Aramaic terms and expressions, which would be obscure to his Gentile audience, omits the word hosanna in his account of the people’s acclamation (Lk. 19:37-38).

It may be noted that according to some scholars the use of the term as a shout of praise reflects an early Christian misunderstanding of the cries of the crowd, who really meant either “Please save the Son of David” (taking the underlying Semitic particle l- as a sign of the direct object) or “O Son of David, please save us!” (for the latter, cf. M. H. Pope in ABD, 3:290-91, who assumes that the crowds were using l- as a vocative, an obsolete function found in Ugaritic but not clearly attested in postbiblical Heb. or Aram.). This approach is problematic because it suggests that Matthew, who was either unaware of what the crowd meant or deliberately ignored it, mistranslated the statement with the Greek dative case (tō huiō David), and that Mark and John as well failed to represent the incident accurately.

Hosea, Book of hoh-zay’uh (הוֹשֵׁעַ H2107, “salvation,” or short form of הוֹשֵׁעִיד H2108, “Yahweh has saved” [see HOSHAIAH]; Ὡσηε G6060). First book of the Minor Prophets. The name in Hebrew is identical with that of HOSHEA, the last king of Israel (2 Ki. 17:1); it is also the original form of the name of JOSHUA (Num. 13:16; Deut. 32:44).

I. Historical background. The activity of the prophet Hosea took place in the 8th cent. B.C. (Hos. 1:1), at a time when Israel and, to a lesser extent, Judah were experiencing an upsurge of material prosperity reminiscent of the golden age of the early monarchy. The principal reasons for this economic resurgence were political in nature, and resulted from the decline of Syria (ARAM), under BEN-HADAD III (c. 796-770), as a serious military threat to the northern kingdom. According to the Zakir stela (see ANET, 655-56), Ben-Hadad, who had previously brought considerable pressure to bear upon JEHOASH of Israel (798-782/81), formed a military alliance to attack Zakir of HAMATH, a political opportunist from Lu<sup>ath</sup>, who had seized control of the entire kingdom of Hamath-Luath. The stela, which was found in 1907 in Afis, 25 mi. SW of ALEPPO, commemorated the way in which Zakir and his allies defeated the coalition led by Ben-hadad at Hatarikka (HADRAK, Zech. 9:1).

This victory marked the effective end of the dominance in Syria of the Aramean dynasty of DAMASCUS, and it was not long after this reverse that Damascus was itself placed under the control of JEROBOAM II (2 Ki. 14:28). The territory of the N kingdom was thus in effect extended to Hamath, whereas to the S and E the limits of Israel and Judah came close to those obtained in the days of DAVID and SOLOMON. During this period, Assyria was also showing signs of becoming a political threat to Syria and Palestine, although its military prowess under TIGLATH-PILESER III (745-727 B.C.) was still a rather remote prospect when Jeroboam II succeeded to sole rule in Israel.

Once the necessity for maintaining a standing army in Israel had been removed, the nation was able to devote itself to more peaceful pursuits. As a result, there occurred a remarkable revival in the areas of trade, commerce, culture, and economic life in Israel, a situation that brought about similar benefits for Judah also. The acquisition of Damascus meant that Israel was once again able to control the ancient caravan trading routes, and this stimulated the growth of a mercantile class that quickly became prosperous and shared with the nobility the wealth of the kingdom.

This situation caused a marked change in the character of the Israelites, for the newly won degree of prosperity was accompanied by a demand for those luxury items that previously were restricted to the ruling classes. Wealthy merchants began to build houses similar to those occupied by the nobility, and they imported various commodities from Egypt and the Orient to decorate them. The skills of Phoenician workmen were in great demand in this connection, particularly where work in ivory was being executed. Numerous ivory inlays, the earliest of which went back to the time of AHAB (874/3-853 B.C.), have been found during excavations at the hill of SAMARIA (modern Sebastiyeh), occurring mostly in the form of small panels in relief. The remains of a bed decorated with ivory inlays (cf. Amos 6:4) have also been recovered, with such items as ivory lions, palmettes, lilies, and winged human figures executed in the typical Phoenician style.

The rise of the wealthy mercantile class accentuated the widening social and economic gap between rich and poor in the northern kingdom. The peasant farmers and artisans fell increasingly under the avaricious designs of the wealthy, who began to use every possible means of depriving them of their land holdings, and in other areas made demands on their skills and productivity that were beyond their abilities. Stark testimony to the wanton and luxurious desires of the upper classes has been furnished by the famous Samaritan OSTRACA from the reign of Jeroboam II, discovered in 1910 just W of the site of the royal palace (cf. ANET, 321). When the fragments of these sixty-three potsherds were deciphered, they were found to have consisted originally of administrative documents relating to shipments of wine and oil to Samaria. The references in these sherds to “pure clarified wine” and “refined oil” suggest the demand for luxury items by the social elite of Samaria, and amply justified the prophetic rebukes concerning wanton living in Israel (Amos 3:15; 1 Ki. 22:39; et al.).

Perhaps the most insidious influence of the day came from pagan religious sources. Since the time of Joshua, the life of the Israelites had been tainted by the corruptions of Canaanite worship. Archaeological discoveries in N Syria at Ras Shamra (UGARIT) have supplied much information about the religion of the Canaanites, who had occupied Palestine from an early period (Gen. 12:6). This seductive cult, which was by far the most degenerate morally in the entire ANE, gained a foothold in Israelite religious life prior to the period of the judges, being incorporated by processes of religious syncretism into the Hebrew cultus, and by the time of Amos and Hosea it had become the worship of the masses.

The principal deities venerated by the Canaanites and Phoenicians were the fertility god BAAL (a term meaning “lord,” “master,” or “husband”), who was the mythical offspring of the supreme deity EL and his consort Asherat, and the goddess ANATH, sometimes known to the Israelites as ASHTORETH or ASHERAH. Baal and Anath functioned as fertility deities in the cult, which was notorious for its emphasis upon fecundity. Both deities were often worshiped under the form of bulls and cows, so that when Jeroboam I set up two golden calves, one at BETHEL and the other at DAN (PLACE) (1 Ki. 12:28), he was actually encouraging the people to indulge in the FERTILITY CULTS of Canaan (see CALF, GOLDEN). The cultic ceremonies were observed several times each year, marked by ritual PROSTITUTION, acts of violence, drunkenness, and indulgence in pagan forms of worship at the HIGH PLACES or shrines. The widespread prevalence of cultic prostitution is evident from the fact that in the time of JEREMIAH, a century after the mission of Hosea to Israel, prostitution flourished in the temple precincts of Jerusalem (2 Ki. 23:7).

II. Unity and problems of integrity. The unity of the prophecy is closely bound up with the nature of the sources dealing with the marriage of Hosea (see H. H. Rowley in BJRL 39 [1956]: 200-233). The first primary source (Hos. 1:1—11) contains a third-person account of the marriage of the prophet, whereas the second (3:1-5) comprises a short selection of material written in the first person along the same lines. The first source describes how Hosea was ordered to marry a harlot, GOMER, who later bore three children, whereas the second source narrates Hosea’s declaration that God had commanded him to love a woman cherished by her paramour, and described the way in which he purchased and disciplined this adulteress.

These two sources comprise a single unit of biographical and autobiographical material, linked by a sermon to Israel in the second chapter. This organic unity of narrative is characterized by the fact that the first three chapters use the figure of the MARRIAGE relationship to describe the bond between God and Israel, as well as the behavior of the latter within this situation in terms of the adultery of the wife. Some scholars have held that the account of the marriage in Hos. 3 is a parallel though variant description of the way in which Gomer came to be the wife of Hosea, and that historically it antecedes what was described in the first chapter. If this is so, it becomes hard to account for the absence of the mention of Gomer’s children, who played such a prominent part in the narrative. The period of isolation mentioned in 3:3, indicating that the prophet abstained from sexual relations with Gomer, would appear to contradict the facts of 1:3, which suggest that the first child was born within a year of the marriage. Consequently it seems more logical to integrate the contents of the third chapter with the events of the first two, the second of which could only have been written after the birth of the third child.

Some scholars have suggested that the third chapter refers to events that occurred before the marriage, whereas the first furnishes a record of the marriage and its outcome. Such a view endeavors to place Gomer in a better light by supposing that the infidelity from which Hosea ransomed his wife was not actually misbehavior toward the prophet himself. In the unlikely event that Hos. 3 actually preceded ch. 1, the fact is that Gomer was unfaithful after her marriage to Hosea (2:2), something also implied by an absence of direct claim by Hosea to paternity in connection with the second and third children.

Varying somewhat from the foregoing are the views of other scholars that Gomer had become a temple prostitute by the time that she was reclaimed (Hos. 3:2), or that a distinction ought to be made between Gomer and the harlot of ch. 3, the latter presumably being a cultic prostitute. Such theories fail to satisfy a straightforward reading of the text, which shows clearly that Gomer was a prostitute both before and after her marriage to Hosea. It is hardly possible to maintain that chs. 1 and 3 refer to two different women because of the difficulties surrounding the idea that, after Israel had rejected her espoused deity, he went in search of another bride. If the prophetic analogy regarding Israel is to be truly valid, the wife of one chapter must be identified with the wife of the other.

Some scholars have explained the infidelity of Gomer by supposing that she was a temple prostitute before her marriage. Despite numerous OT references to ritual prostitution, little is known about the women who functioned as hierodules in the Baal fertility cults. There is insufficient evidence for the view that they were ever respected as a class in Israel, or that Gomer had been some kind of sacred or devoted person at a local shrine. By contrast, certain writers have reconstructed events to the point where they could refute the assertion of the text that Gomer was a harlot, and others, following medieval Jewish tradition, held that her bad reputation was due to her being an inhabitant of debauched Israel. Another view thought of “harlot” in Hos. 1:2 as used proleptically, so that Gomer was actually pure, or thought to be so, when Hosea married her. Whether this is true or not, the term “wife of whoredoms” (KJV) implies unchaste behavior before or after marriage, and the description of her as an adulteress in ch. 3 cannot possibly be proleptic. For those who have balked at the idea of a moral deity commanding his servant to marry a harlot, it should be noted that it was equally reprehensible among the Semites for a man to take back an adulterous wife.

Some older scholars, such as P. Volz and K. Marti, denied to Hosea certain sections of the book containing promises of blessing and salvation (Hos. 11:8-11; 14:2-9). Other secondary interpolations that have been entertained include some of the passages mentioning the southern kingdom. Yet A. Bentzen and O. Eissfeldt have shown that in the undoubtedly genuine portions of the book (chs. 1-3) there is mention of salvation following punishment, thereby modifying the effect of the foregoing views. There seems no adequate reason for denying to Hosea any portion of the prophecy, and the mention of Judah seems quite logical since the prophet regarded the northern kingdom as a usurpation (8:4; cf. 3:5). No doubt this standpoint led him to date his utterances in terms of the southern regime. (See further A. D. Tushingham in JNES 12 [1953]: 150-59; L. Ruppert in BZ 26 [1982]: 208-23.)

III. Authorship. Little is known of Hosea himself. He was the only northern prophet whose writings have survived, but his actual birthplace in Israel remains unknown, as does his occupation in life. It has been suggested that he worked as a baker (Hos. 7:4-8) or a farmer. Certainly his grasp of history and religion and the elegance of his language virtually preclude a peasant origin. Some clue as to his birthplace has been sought in the description of Gomer as the daughter of DIBLAIM (1:3), taking the latter as a reference to a location in GILEAD. This, however, is doubtful for lack of evidence.

Estimates of the length of Hosea’s ministry vary. Since Hos. 1:4 was spoken before the fall of JEHU'S dynasty, Hosea must have been preaching prior to the death of Jeroboam II in 753 B.C. Thus his marriage and the birth of his first child evidently anteceded this event also. Hosea was an ardent patriot and a warm humanitarian, whose love for his people shone through each of his prophetic oracles. Unlike AMOS, he never once referred to foreign nations except in terms of their relationship to Israel.

IV. Date. The work of Hosea occurred in the last generation of the history of the northern kingdom. According to the superscription in Hos. 1:1, the chronology was related to both the northern and southern kingdoms, in the reigns of JEROBOAM II (c. 782-753 B.C.) and UZZIAH (767-740), JOTHAM (740-732), AHAZ (732-716), and HEZEKIAH (716-687). It has been suggested that the verse in question may, in part or whole, comprise a Judahite editorial revision, since the mention of kings of Judah took precedence over that of Jeroboam II. This need not necessarily be the case, however, for such an arrangement could well imply that Hosea regarded the Davidic line as alone legitimate. If so, the superscription probably originated with the prophet himself.

The reference in Hos. 1:4 indicates a date prior to the death of Jeroboam II for the start of the ministry, as noted above, and if the allusion to Assyria (8:9) is to the tribute paid to TIGLATH-PILESER III by MENAHEM about 739 B.C., this would indicate that the ministry of Hosea was well established by 743. Its continuation beyond the death of Jeroboam II in 753 is assured if the reference in 5:8—6:6 is to the Syro-Ephraimite conflict of 735-734. Furthermore, the mention of relations with Egypt (7:11; 9:6; 12:2) would point to the political activity of HOSHEA, the last king of Israel, who ruled for a decade prior to the fall of Samaria in 722. The ministry of Hosea could thus be placed between 753 and c. 723. Just what happened to Hosea after this time is unknown, but from the Judean content of the superscription it is reasonable to assume that the oracles of this prophet were known in the southern kingdom. Possibly Hosea spent his declining days in Judah, though there is no real evidence for this view.

The development of Hosea's prophetic ministry seems closely related to the process by which his work arrived at its extant form. Accordingly it should be noted that the symbolic names given to the three children of Gomer over a period of some six years parallel the same themes of inescapable doom (Hos. 2:2-13) and the oracles in chs. 4-13. Any estimate of the date and compilatory processes of the prophecy should consider the view that chs. 4-14 may have circulated separately from chs. 1-3 for some time, and also the theory that the message of hope for Israel seems inconsistent with the tenets of Hosea, belonging more properly to the exilic period. Although it is true that the contents of chs. 4-14 concerned the depravity of cultic Baalism and the moral and spiritual failures of Israel, it is hard to see how the basic message of Hosea, with its powerful marital allegory as a foundation, could have been proclaimed in the absence of chs. 1-3.

By the time the contents of Hos. 4-14 were in writing, the material in the first three chapters would form a necessary prerequisite to the prophecy as a whole. Although it is just possible that chs. 4-14 circulated independently for a period of time, that would have taken place only within the lifetime of Hosea himself, since Hebrew tradition does not know of the prophecy as anything other than a unity. With regard to Hosea's hopeful outlook for the nation, it should be noted that a distinct element of hope formed a consistent part of 8th-cent. prophetic teaching, and there is no evidence for any assertion that would deny such aspirations to Hosea. Indeed, it could well be argued that the prophet's own experience of divine mercy, in which love triumphed over judgment, suggested a similar prospect for the nation.

The question of alleged Judahite editorial activity also affects the matter of dating. Whereas it is possible to suppose that Judean scribes modified the text of the prophecy, which undoubtedly contains many corruptions, it is hard to see how this could have been done in the lifetime of Hosea himself, particularly since no “school” was associated with him (so far as is known), nor would it even have been thought necessary to make alterations after 722 B.C., since the apostasy of the northern kingdom (and by contrast the implied fidelity of Judah) was no longer a current issue. Furthermore, only about four references to Judah are at all commendatory, and the rest are critical of the southern kingdom, and thus could hardly have been the work of Judean scribes anxious to glorify their own people at the expense of Israel (cf. Hos. 6:11; 8:14; 12:2). There is nothing in the material relating to Judah that would necessitate an exilic date for the prophecy, much less a final recension of postexilic provenance. The present state of the evidence gives firm support to the traditional view that the prophecy was the work of one individual who ministered to the house of Israel (3:5) in the 8th cent., and in whose lifetime the book was compiled and edited.

V. Place of origin and destination. The oracles clearly originated in the northern kingdom against the background of material prosperity and social and spiritual corruption characteristic of the time of Jeroboam II. Although their primary destination was the territory of the northern tribes, the concern of the prophet was with the nation as a whole. In this respect, the inclusion of Judean kings in the superscription made the scope of the utterances clear. No doubt the written prophecy was well-known in Judah at the time when Hosea died, and may even have been used in subsequent days of political and religious turmoil.

VI. Occasion and purpose. The apostasy of Israel and her enslavement to pagan Canaanite traditions—in open neglect of the provisions of the Sinai covenant—evoked from Hosea a strong plea for repentance and spiritual renewal. The social corruption and moral decay of the northern tribes had made them ripe for destruction, and the purpose of the prophet was to reveal the love of God for the sinful and apostate nation. Taking the appropriate symbol, namely the marriage relationship, he sought to show Israel how she had become a faithless wife by the standards of the covenant, committing spiritual adultery and repudiating her association with her divine spouse. Such behavior, if unaltered by acts of repentance, contrition, and renewal, could only issue in a period of seclusion and punishment for the nation, after which divine mercy would again be manifested. Whereas Amos had denounced the social inequalities of his day and the exploitation of the lower classes, Hosea was primarily concerned with the political, religious, and moral evils of the nation. The political vacillation toward Assyria that took place under Menahem, and the interest in Egypt shown by Hoshea, were a source of complaint on the part of the prophet (Hos. 5:13; 7:11; 12:1), who rebuked Israel for turning everywhere for help except to God.

Hosea’s great affection for his people was an epitome of the divine love for Israel, and the marital experiences of the prophet furnished the immediate occasion for his fervent, challenging prophecies, which were given force and urgency by the use of symbolic names for Gomer’s children. The first of these, Jezreel (Hos. 1:4), implied that God would

These Assyrian iron swords (8th-7th cent. B.C.) are a reminder of Hosea's proclamation that God would judge the idolatry of the Israelites by bringing the Assyrian army against them.

Hosea prophesied that God would "break Israel's bow in the Valley of Jezreel" (Hos. 1:5). (View to ENE toward Mount Moreh.)

punish the dynasty of Jehu for the bloodshed of Jezreel (cf. 2 Ki. 10:12-28). The second, Lo-Ruhamah (Hos. 1:6), meant "unpitied," and signified a withholding of divine compassion from Israel, and the third, Lo-Ammi (1:9), meaning "no people of mine," brought the promise of divine rejection to an assured climax. For an ardent patriot such as Hosea, the situation demanded immediate action if the house of Israel was to be spared the horror of divine punishment by exile. (See H. G. May in JBL 55 [1936]: 285-91.)

VII. Canonicity. The book of Hosea stands first in the canonical list of the twelve Minor Prophets, an arrangement that had obtained as early as Ben-Sira (Sir. 49:10), if not earlier. Although a variant order of the first six books occurs in some SEPTUAGINT MSS, Hosea always claimed priority, perhaps because of its length. In Baba Bathra 14b, Rabbi Johanan was cited as placing Hosea chronologically before Amos, a position that most scholars would reject, although absolute certainty on the point is lacking. The book itself was named after its attributive author.

VIII. Textual considerations. The text of the prophecy presents the interpreter with great difficulties, since it is probably more corrupt than that of any other OT work. Why this should be the case is not clear, though it may possibly have arisen from the widespread usage of the prophecy in the southern kingdom during the late 8th and early 7th centuries B.C. Many textual problems, however, arise from such accidents of scribal activity as the transposition of consonants, the occasional confusion of similar consonants, and an incorrect division of the letters forming words. Others may have been occasioned by the peculiarities of N Israelite dialect as misunderstood and miscopied by Judean scribes. There are often marked variations in translation when scholars resort to textual emendation in an attempt to restore the Hebrew where the versions have proved inadequate for such purposes.

The SEPTUAGINT is often of great help in recovering the original, even though it was apparently made from a Hebrew text that had close ties with that preserved by the Masoretes; this was also true of the Syriac version. See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (OT). From the differences in the vocalizing of the Hebrew it seems clear that the MSS used by the Greek translators did not contain certain consonants in the MT used as vowel letters (matres lectionis), particularly waw and yod. There appear to be places where the LXX has preserved superior readings (Hos. 2:20; 5:15; 8:10; 10:10), as well as some additional phrases (2:4; 8:13; 13:13). Noteworthy difficulties in the MT are, among others: Hos. 4:18; 5:2; 7:16; 8:10; 9:13; 11:7; 12:9. The complexity of the textual problem in the prophecy may be one reason why scholars have differed so widely in their approach to passages such as ch. 11. In general, the style of the prophetic oracles of Hosea is brief and concise, and has marked emotional overtones evident in the sensitive, pleading quality of the utterances.

IX. Content. The prophecy may be summarized as follows:

- A. Using his marriage as an illustration, Hosea depicts the relations of Israel with her God (Hos. 1:1—3:5).
- B. Denunciation of Israelite pride, immorality, and idolatry (4:1—8:14).
- C. The certainty of doom for the northern kingdom (9:1—10:15).
- D. A parenthetical utterance relating to God's mercy and love (11:1—11).
- E. The rebellion and apostasy of Israel will issue in destruction (11:12—13:16).
- F. Future blessings will overtake a penitent nation (14:1-9).

X. Theology. There is little doubt that the Hebrew term ḥesed H2876 (Hos. 6:1 et al.) crystallizes the message of Hosea. This comprehensive word is difficult to render adequately by means of a single term, and renderings such as "zeal," "piety," "mercy," and "lovingkindness" hardly do justice to the meaning of the expression. It can be said to embody the idea of true love in the light of some specific relationship, and has special emotional and spiritual content. The distinctive contribution of Hosea to OT theology was his recognition that reciprocity on the part of Israel was an important feature of the relationship between God and his people. Whereas Amos had stressed that the sin of Israel lay in failure to meet God's demand for righteousness, Hosea proclaimed that the real iniquity of the nation commenced with the breaking of a COVENANT or agreement that by nature needed to be upheld by both parties involved.

For Hosea the essence of this covenant is ḥesed, which was characteristic of the relationship forged at SINAI between God and Israel. On that solemn occasion the nation had made a voluntary pact with God that involved her surrender, loyalty, and obedience to his will. The result was that Israel became God's son (Hos. 11:1; cf. Exod. 4:22) by adoption and divine grace. It was the primary duty of Hosea to recall the wayward and indifferent Israel to its obligations entered into at Sinai. Although the prophet was aware that divine love and grace had provided the initiative for the covenant, he also realized the importance of emphasizing the free cooperative acceptance of that spiritual relationship by the chosen people. For this reason he stressed that Israel was actually God's bride (Hos. 2:7, 16, 19) and used the marriage metaphor with telling effect to demonstrate the nature of the association between the bride and her divine Lover.

Hosea's own marital experience furnished dramatic illustration of the situation that had overtaken the nation of Israel. The prophet had been ordered by God to marry a harlot (who would later continue in her old ways), to have children by her, and to give them symbolic names typifying divine displeasure with Israel. After this woman had consorted with her paramours, he was told to ransom her and with patient love and tenderness to readmit her to his home, there to await in penitence and grief the time of restoration to full favor. For those who had eyes to see, this was a clear illustration of wanton, apostate Israel in its historic relationship with God, and showed the enduring fidelity of the Almighty.

Because of the way Israel had become tainted by the corruption of idolatry, immorality, and materialism, God was compelled to leave the nation to her own devices until she gave clear proof that she no longer coveted the old idolatrous ways of life. The discipline to be imposed as a means of producing REPENTANCE was actually an indication of divine love and concern, since it would help to awaken in the Israelites an awareness of true spiritual values. The stern, forbidding picture of retribution presented by Amos is absent from Hosea, being replaced by an image of God as a kindly, loving father who is concerned for the welfare of his family, or as a sympathetic farmer who attends continually to the welfare of his livestock (Hos. 11:3-4).

The expression of REPENTANCE (Hos. 6:1-4) has been treated by scholars either as a genuine emotional experience, reflecting the nation's desired forgiveness in the recognition that the people were sinful, or as a shallow declaration on the part of a people who felt that the covenant association automatically guaranteed them an assured future under divine protection without any particular reciprocity on their part. The prophet made it clear that true repentance was a hard-wrought experience involving the mind and will as well as the emotions (cf. 14:2). For him the chief difficulty encountered in the historic relationship between God and Israel was the fact that the nation had no real intellectual awareness of the moral and ethical qualities of its God, and the way in which the Sinai covenant made these binding on the chosen people.

To a large extent, the Israelites had been beguiled by the corrupt ethos of the Phoenician-Canaanite religious tradition, which by nature was entirely remote from the advanced ethical characteristics of the God of Sinai, and which saw no incongruity between religious observances and a morally corrupt way of life. Nonetheless, the fact that the spirituality of the Sinai agreement had been ignored for generations did not mean that it was no longer valid, and Hosea taught that the coming divine judgment upon sin would be the result of the disruption of the ancient covenant relationship, rather than constituting an arbitrary divine act. Out of this experience could still come hope for the nation, for divine grace would intervene to rescue Israel from bondage and open the way for a restoration of the covenant and an outpouring of blessing on the nation.

hosen. This archaic English word (meaning “long trousers”) is used by the KJV to render the noun paṭṭîš H10582 (Dan. 3:21). The meaning of this Aramaic term is uncertain; both the NIV and the NRSV render it “trousers,” but rabbinic traditions also suggest “turbans” and “coats.”

Hoshaiah hoh-shay'yuh (הֹשִׁיָּהוּ H2108, “Yahweh has saved [or helped]”; cf. HOSEA and JOSHUA). (1) A leader of Judah who took a prominent part in the ceremonial processions at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:32).

(2) Father of AZARIAH; the latter was one of the army officers opposed to JEREMIAH (Jer. 43:2 [LXX 50:2]). Elsewhere (42:1 [LXX 49:1]), the MT has “Jezaniah son of Hoshaiah” (see JAAZANIAH), but the LXX reads “Azariah son of Maaseiah,” and some scholars emend the MT to read “Azariah son of Hoshaiah” (cf. NRSV). If Jezaniah/Jaazaniah is the same person as Azariah, then his father Hoshaiah was a MAACATHITE (2 Ki. 25:23; Jer. 40:8).

Hoshama hosh'uh-muh (הֹשִׁמָּה H2106, prob. short form of the unattested name הֹשִׁמָּה, “Yahweh has heard”). Son of King Jeconiah (i.e., JEHOIACHIN), apparently born after the royal family was led away into exile in BABYLON (1 Chr. 3:18).

Hoshea hoh-shee'uh (הֹשִׁעַ H2107, “salvation,” or short form of הֹשִׁיָּהוּ H2108, “Yahweh has saved” [see HOSHAIAH]). The name in Hebrew is identical with that of HOSEA the prophet.

(1) Original name of JOSHUA son of Nun before MOSES changed it (Num. 13:8, 16); apparently he was known by both names for a time (Deut. 32:44 MT).

(2) Son of Azariah; he was an officer of DAVID set over the tribe of EPHRAIM (1 Chr. 27:20).

(3) One of the leaders of the people who set their seal to the covenant of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 10:23).

(4) Son of Elah and last king of Israel (2 Ki. 15:30; 17:1-6; 18:1, 9-10). Hoshea ruled for nine years (732-724 B.C.) during a time of social and moral upheaval when a total of six kings came to the throne of Israel in a period of only fourteen years (746-732). Hoshea became king by forming a conspiracy against and murdering his predecessor PEKAH son of Remaliah (2 Ki. 15:30), apparently due to the utter failure of Pekah's policy of resistance to ASSYRIA. This policy had ended in complete defeat.

When Hoshea came to the throne in 732, TIGLATH-PILESER had annexed virtually the whole kingdom of Israel to the Assyrian empire. In 733 he attacked the northern part of the Jordan Valley, making GILEAD and GALILEE into Assyrian provinces (2 Ki. 15:29; cf. Isa. 9:1). These actions meant the removal of all Israelite holdings in TRANSJORDAN and the extension of Assyrian power to S of MEGIDDO (administrative capital of GALILEE). In his own annals, Tiglath-Pileser records that he also added the coastal plain of SHARON as a third province with a capital at DOR, probably extending all the way to the PHILISTINE border near JOPPA (see Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 371-76, esp. map 31). This campaign left only the capital city of SAMARIA and the surrounding hill country of Ephraim as Israelite domain. It is likely that Samaria too would have been taken had not Hoshea murdered Pekah, apparently with Assyrian confirmation (at least Tiglath-Pileser could say in one of his annals that he "placed Hosea as king over them [i.e., the Israelites]"; see ANET, 284).

Over this truncated kingdom Hoshea reigned as the vassal king of Assyria, under heavy tribute (cf. 2 Ki. 17:3). Nothing is known of the details of his reign except the laconic evaluation of the editor of 2 Kings: "He did evil in the eyes of the LORD, but not like the kings of Israel who preceded him" (17:2). Tiglath-Pileser III died in 727 B.C. and SHALMANESER V succeeded him. This change probably led Hoshea, apparently seeking such an opportunity, to withhold tribute and so declare independence. At the same time he sought help from Egypt, sending messengers to So king of Egypt (17:4). The prophet HOSEA denounced the Israelites for their divided loyalty and machinations: "Ephraim is like a dove, / easily deceived and senseless—/ now calling to Egypt, / now turning to Assyria" (Hos. 7:11); "Ephraim feeds on the wind; / he pursues the east wind all day / and multiplies lies and violence. / He makes a treaty with Assyria / and sends olive oil to Egypt" (12:1). Shalmaneser marched against Israel in 724. Hoshea capitulated and paid tribute (2 Ki. 17:3), but he was too badly compromised to clear himself. Shalmaneser, doubting his loyalty, imprisoned him (2 Ki. 17:4).

Shalmaneser then surrounded Samaria, and after a siege of three years, the city fell. Whether it was captured before Shalmaneser died, or in the first few weeks of his successor, SARGON II, is still a matter of some doubt. Although the vast majority of scholars have accepted the latter view, some investigations have cast doubt on the credibility of the scribes of the Khorsabad inscriptions that mention Sargon's capture of Samaria (see E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], 163-68; H. Tadmor in Journal of Cuneiform Studies 12 [1958]: 33-39). This latter approach fits best with the natural understanding of 2 Ki. 17:6, where the "king of Assyria" is most simply taken as the "Shalmaneser" of v. 3 (so also 18:9-10). After Hoshea's imprisonment by Shalmaneser, nothing more is heard of him. It would appear that Samaria endured the three years of her siege without royal leadership.

hospitality. In the ANE, the generous treatment of guests played a distinctly important role in tribal and domestic life. Existence in the desert made hospitality a necessity, and among the nomads it became a highly esteemed virtue. By it the FOREIGNER or weary traveler found rest, food and shelter, and asylum. (Even today a nomad can remain under his host's roof for three days in safety and subsequently receive protection "until the salt he has eaten has left his stomach"; see R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel [1961], 10.) The custom was supported by the thought that the host himself might some day be a stranger, and by the possibility that the visitor was divinely sent.

Cella frieze depicting a Greek banquet scene, with participants sitting on cushions. Both in the OT and NT, hospitality was demonstrated by providing a meal for one's guests.

I. In OT Times. While no specific term meaning “hospitality” occurs in the Hebrew OT, many heartwarming stories reflect this practice. A definitive account of the custom is given in the story of ABRAHAM’S entertainment of three strangers who turned out to be angels (see ANGEL). He hastened from his tent door to welcome them, washed their feet, provided a sumptuous meal—of veal, milk, curds, and fresh baked bread—in the shade of a tree, and stood attentively by while they ate (Gen. 18:1-8). That night in the city of SODOM, LOT entertained two of the same angelic guests (19:1-11). Of similar interest is the idyllic story of the courtship of REBEKAH. When Abraham’s servant and attendants arrived at the home of BETHUEL in search of a wife for ISAAC, Rebekah and her brother LABAN cordially received them into their father’s house. There they were entertained lavishly while they, in turn, adorned Rebekah with costly jewelry and raiment (24:11-61).

Nomadic hospitality was preserved by the settled Israelites in Canaan. DAVID made SAUL’S grandson a permanent guest at his royal table (2 Sam. 9:7). Solomon’s daily dinners were astounding, not to mention his banquets for royal guests like the QUEEN OF SHEBA (1 Ki. 4:22-23; 10:4-5). NEHEMIAH, governor of Jerusalem, fed daily at his table 150 Jews plus numerous aliens (Neh. 5:17-18). Excesses in hospitable asylum are seen in the instances of Lot (Gen. 19:1-8) and of the old man at GIBEAH (Jdg. 19:16-24).

II. In NT Times. Even though the NT makes reference to the availability of inns, as at BETHLEHEM and JERICO (Lk. 2:7; 10:34), one looked to the private home for hospitality. Jesus practiced hospitality in feeding the multitudes (Mk. 6:30-44; 8:1-10) and his disciples (Lk. 22:7-13; Jn. 21:9-14). Similarly, he availed himself of hospitality from two prominent PHARISEES (Lk. 7:36-50; 14:1-14), the BETHANY family (Lk. 10:38-42; Matt. 26:6-13; cf. Mk. 14:3-9; Jn. 12:1-8), ZACCHAEUS (Lk. 19:5-10), and the EMMAUS hosts (Lk. 24:29-32).

The apostles availed themselves of Jewish and Gentile hospitality wherever they spread the gospel over the Roman empire. PETER was entertained by SIMON at JOPPA and by CORNELIUS at CAESAREA (Acts 9:43; 10:5, 23-48). PAUL and his companions received hospitality in numerous private homes. Among their hosts were LYDIA and the jailer at PHILIPPI (16:14-15, 25-34), AQUILA AND PRISCILLA as well as TITIUS JUSTUS at CORINTH (18:1-3, 7), PHILIP in Caesarea and MNASON at

Jerusalem (21:8, 16), and PUBLIUS on MALTA (28:7). Christians were to “practice hospitality” (philoxenia G5810, Rom. 12:13; cf. the cognate adjective in 1 Pet. 4:9). Bishops and widows were to be hospitable (1 Tim. 3:2; 5:10; Tit. 1:8). Finally, like Abraham and Lot, “Do not neglect to show hospitality to strangers, for by doing that some have entertained angels without knowing it” (Heb. 13:2 NRSV). (See E. W. K. Mould, Bible History [1966], 103-7, 170-73; J. Koenig, New Testament Hospitality: Partnership with Strangers as Promise and Mission [1985].)

hostage. This English term is used to render the Hebrew phrase, bēnê hattaʿārûbôt (lit., “sons of the pledges,” i.e., captives kept as surety against further political upheavals), which occurs only in the record of the victory of JEHOASH of Israel over AMAZIAH of Judah, when hostages were carried off to SAMARIA (2 Ki. 14:14=2 Chr. 25:24; the LXX mistranslates tous huious tōn symmixeōn, “the sons of intermixture”). Similar records from CUNEIFORM sources indicate that such hostages were treated as members of a special social class and often integrated into the conquering society. Although they were in jeopardy, they were not slaves or servants.

hostility. See ENEMY.

hostility, dividing wall of. See WALL OF PARTITION.

host of heaven. This phrase is used by the KJV and other versions as a literal rendering of Hebrew šēbā haššāamayim, which occurs eighteen times in the OT (Deut. 4:19 et al., in addition to five places where “their host” is used with probable reference to the heavens). The NIV uses a variety of translations, such as “heavenly array” (Deut. 4:19) and “starry hosts” (2 Ki. 17:16). In some instances (e.g., 1 Ki. 22:19), the SEPTUAGINT renders the phrase with hē stratia tou ouranou, and this language is reflected in the Lukan writings (Lk. 2:13; Acts 7:42).

I. Basic meaning. Although the most frequent meaning of šābā H7372 may have to do with warfare or an army, it does not seem that this sense is the most fundamental. At least some passages do not bear that meaning easily (Num. 4:3). It becomes a question then whether these passages should be explained as metaphorical extensions of the basic meaning “army” or taken as themselves illustrative of a broader basic meaning such as “group,” of which the examples meaning “army” are a specialization. In this light, is the host of heaven to be thought of as an army of heaven, or a group of beings inhabiting heaven? Contrary to some of the standard lexical tools (e.g., BDB, 838), it would appear that comparative Semitic data does not support the meaning “army” as the basic force of the word. The Chicago Assyrian Dictionary gives the meaning of šābu as “group of people, contingent of workers, troop of soldiers.”

II. Linguistic aspects of the phrase. In the phrase under consideration, the word for “host” is always used in the singular-collective form (contrast the pl. use in the common phrase yhwh šēbāôt, LORD OF HOSTS). It is generally in the form “all the host of heaven.” One must be careful to distinguish between “host of heaven,” “host[s] of Yahweh” (both sing. and pl.), and “Yahweh of hosts” (always pl.). There is no necessary connection between these phrases (for the last one, which is not the main concern of this article, see M. Tsevat in HUCA 36 [1965]: 49-58, who interprets it to mean “Yahweh [is] armies,” i.e., “God is protection”). In addition to using the term stratia, the SEPTUAGINT renders the word šābā in many ways, including kosmos, “world” (Deut. 4:19), dynamis, “power” (2 Ki. 17:16), and astron, “star” (Isa. 34:4).

III. The host of heaven as heavenly bodies. In most of the passages, the phrase probably has reference to heavenly bodies, either in general or in reference to stars in particular. These are mentioned in several different connections. For example, the host of heaven is not to receive worship (Deut. 4:19; 17:3). On the other hand, various passages show that Israel did worship the host of heaven. It is mentioned in the summary of the sins of the northern kingdom (2 Ki. 17:16). In the southern kingdom, MANASSEH advanced this practice, probably under the syncretism at the height of Assyrian power (2 Ki. 21:3, 5; 2 Chr. 33:3, 5). Jeremiah alludes to the practice (Jer. 8:2) and states that such worship was performed on the roof tops (19:13; cf. Zeph. 1:5), an incidental proof that the host of heaven was indeed thought of as heavenly bodies. JOSIAH attempted to stamp out the idolatrous worship of his day, among which was the burning of incense to all the host of heaven (2 Ki. 23:4-5).

Alongside these direct references stand passages that refer to the same activity, but where the phrase “host of heaven” is not used. Among Josiah’s reforms was the taking away from the temple the horses “dedicated to the sun” (2 Ki. 23:11). Men worshiping the SUN was an abomination to Eze-kiel (Ezek. 8:16). It is possible that the references to the QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Jer. 7:18; 44:17-19, 25) have in mind the worship of some heavenly body, perhaps the sun (cf. M. Dahood in Revista Biblica [1960]). An alternative would be to identify this deity with ISHTAR, who was called Queen of heaven in ASSYRIA and was identified with Venus. Another probable reference to Israelite worship of the host of heaven is found in Amos 5:26, where the words translated “tabernacle” and “Chiun” in KJV are probably names of the Assyrian astral deity SAKKUTH or KAIWAN (i.e., Saturn; the Masoretes evidently have changed the vowels of these objectionable names to sikkût and kiyyûn, after the pattern of the word šiqqûš H9199, “abomination”).

Very striking is the relationship expressed in the statement that the host of heaven was allotted (ḥālaq H2745) by God to all the peoples of the earth (Deut. 4:19) except Israel. That this must mean allotment not only for the regulation of time and life but also for worship is shown by Deut. 29:26, where Israel is accused of worshiping gods that were not “allotted” to them (see KD, Pentateuch, 3:312, and cf. Rom. 1:18-25).

Sometimes the host of heaven is seen as the object of God’s creative activity, rendering obedience to the divine will. It may be that the “host” of Gen. 2:1 (KJV) is a broader conception: the host of heaven and earth, including the whole of creation. The host of heaven was made by divine breath (Ps. 33:6), named and controlled by God (Isa. 40:26; 45:12). The faithful working of the heavenly bodies is probably what is meant by “the host of heaven worships you” (Neh. 9:6 NRSV; NIV, “the multitudes of heaven”), and their seemingly endless number is used as an illustration of the number of the descendants of David (Jer. 33:22). Probably Jdg. 5:20 is to be included here: “from the heavens the stars fought...against Sisera”—a figure for God using nature to defeat his enemies.

At least once the phrase is used in the context of receiving God’s judgment: “All the host of heaven shall rot away” (Isa. 34:4 NRSV) must be referring to heavenly bodies, since it is parallel to “the skies roll up like a scroll.” It is uncertain whether this is also the meaning in Isa. 24:21, inasmuch as there “host of heaven” is parallel to “kings of the earth,” although v. 23 mentions the involvement of the moon and sun.

IV. Worship of heavenly bodies in the ANE. (1) The sun. In ancient times SUN WORSHIP was widespread. In Egypt the sun was worshiped in its various aspects under different names, the chief of which were RE and Aton. In Assyro-Babylonia the sun appeared as a male deity called Shamash (Sumerian Utu). The same word used in UGARIT as Shepesh was thought of as female. In Canaan itself, old place names such as BETH SHEMESH (“house of the sun”) probably reveal the early practice of sun worship. At Ugarit this practice may have taken place on roof tops as is mentioned in the Bible. The fact that Shemesh was called a chariot-rider in Assyrian texts might explain the placement of horses and chariots at the entrance of the Jerusalem temple as idolatrous sun worship (2 Ki. 23:11).

(2) The moon. In UR and HARAN, both places of patriarchal contact, the MOON was worshiped under the name Sin as a male deity. Earlier Sumerian names were Nanna and Ningal. This last name appears in the Ugaritic story of the marriage between Yerah, the Ugaritic moon god, and Nikkal, here a female deity. The probable purpose of this story was the desire for fertility. Again in Canaan a place name, JERICHO (from yārēah H3734, “moon”), testifies to the early moon worship under a Canaanite name. Ornaments in the shape of the crescent moon have been found in Palestine.

(3) Venus. In Mesopotamia the goddess ISHTAR is connected with Venus, but it is thought that originally Ishtar was a male deity. This would explain why in the western lands (Ugarit) Venus was thought of as male. In this case, however, it is not one deity but two, one for the morning phase of Venus (SHAHAR, “Dawn”), the other for the evening phase (Shalem, “Dusk”). An important Ugaritic text (C. H. Gordon, Ugaritic Literature [1949], no. 52) describes the origin of these deities. In another text (no. 49) mention is made of Athtar, which is probably the same as Ishtar, only in Ugarit considered male. The fact that the feminine form ASHTORETH occurs frequently in Hebrew shows how much the Israelites must have been involved in worship of the host of heaven.

(4) Saturn. The names for Saturn have been given above in connection with Amos 5:26. (See further S. N. Kramer, ed., Mythologies of the Ancient World [1961].)

V. The host of heaven as angels. Although “host of heaven” most frequently means heavenly bodies, there are a few passages where it clearly means something else. According to 1 Ki. 22:19 (= 2 Chr. 18:18), the prophet MICAIAH saw the host of heaven standing beside God’s throne conversing with the Lord, and in v. 21 they are called spirits. This conception of the host of heaven as angelic beings is also seen in Lk. 2:13, where the phrase must refer to angels. A transitional passage between this meaning and that of heavenly bodies is Job 38:7, where “morning stars” is parallel to “sons of God” (NIV, “angels”). Note that the phrase “host[s] of Yahweh” sometimes is used of angels (Pss. 103:21; 148:2; once it is used of Israel, Exod. 7:4, while the being who appeared to JOSHUA could be commander of God’s heavenly host or of a human army, Josh. 5:14-15). The thought of angels as God’s host is also expressed by another Hebrew word, maḥāneh H4722, “[military] camp, army” (Gen. 32:2 [MT, v. 3]).

VI. Daniel. One specific passage, Dan. 8:10-13, must receive special consideration. Although vv. 12-13 are quite difficult, four explanations of the phrase “host of heaven” can be given for vv. 10-11. One takes the host of heaven as the stars and explains the little horn’s attack against the stars as figurative of his impiety (Isa. 14:13). A second understands the phrase as the deities represented by the heavenly bodies and revered by peoples of antiquity; these deities the horn attempted to desecrate, and it even carried the attempt to God himself (Dan. 8:11). A third interpretation views the host of heaven as the people of God who are opposed by the horn. Finally, the phrase may mean angelic beings. Perhaps it is unwise to make a judgment in such a potentially symbolic context, but the second alternative seems most plausible. (See further ABD, 3:301-4; NIDOTTE, 3:733-35.)

hosts. Lord of. See LORD OF HOSTS.

Hotham hoh'tuhm (חֹתָם H2598, “signet, seal”). (1) Son of Heber and great-grandson of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:32; apparently called HELEM in v. 35).

(2) A man from AROER who was the father of Shama and Jeiel, two of DAVID'S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:44; KJV, “Hothan,” following LXX).

F. W. BUSH

Hothan hoh'tuhn. See HOTHAM #2.

Hothir hoh'tuhr (חֹתִיר H2110, possibly “abundance” or “[God/Yahweh] has left over”). Son of HEMAN, the king's seer (1 Chr. 25:4). The fourteen sons of Heman, along with the sons of ASAPH and JEDUTHUN, were set apart “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals” (v. 1). The assignment of duty was done by lot, and the twenty-first lot fell to Hothir, his sons, and his relatives (25:28).

hough. An archaic English verb used by the KJV to render Hebrew āqar H6828, which in the piel form means “to cripple, hamstring” (Josh. 11:6 et al.).

hour. The OT does not use a specific Hebrew term for “hour” (in the sense of a unit of time marking intervals during the day), for apparently the Israelites had no system of equal hours for dividing the day. In the earlier periods of OT history, the only divisions of the natural day were morning, noonday, and evening (Gen. 1:5; 43:16). The night appears under the threefold division of first, middle, and morning watches (Exod. 14:24; Jdg. 7:19; Lam. 2:19). The Babylonians must have been among the first to adopt the division of twelve equal parts for the day, for HERODOTUS (Hist. 2.109) testifies that the Greeks derived this custom from them. The sundial of AHAZ (2 Ki. 20:11; Isa. 38:8) was undoubtedly introduced from Babylonia.

Although the Greek term pēchys G4388 (“forearm, cubit”) should perhaps be rendered “hour” in one saying of Jesus (Matt. 6:27 = Lk. 12:25), the standard term is hōra G6052, which the NT uses in different ways. (1) It may signify a brief period of time of no definite length (Matt. 26:40). (2) It is used in connection with the broad divisions of time, that is, third, sixth, and ninth hour (corresponding roughly to our 9 a.m., noon, and 3 p.m.); the third and the ninth were the regular times of worship in the temple (Acts 2:15; 3:1), the times for the morning and evening sacrifice. (3) The Greek term may also refer to a definite period of time, that is, one twelfth of the day: although only one NT passage expressly mentions the twelve hours of the day (Jn. 11:9), there are references to “two hours” (Acts 19:34), the “seventh hour” (Jn. 4:52), the “tenth hour” (Jn. 1:39). (4) An “hour” may be simply the point of time at which an event occurs (Matt. 8:13; 9:22 [NIV, “moment”]; 15:28). (5) The term is used of the appointed time of God's intervention in history (Matt. 24:36, 44, 50; 25:13; Mk. 13:32; Lk. 12:12, 39, 46; 22:53; Rev. 3:3, 10; 9:15; 14:7, 15; 18:10); see ESCHATOLOGY. (6) Another theological use is with reference to God's appointed time for specific events in the life of Christ. Jesus again and again made clear that the Father had a fixed time for every event in his life. This is evident especially in the Gospel of John (Jn. 2:4; 12:23, 27; 13:1; 17:1), but the other Gospels also make it clear (Matt. 26:45; Mk. 14:35; Lk. 22:53); and the disciples of Jesus were aware of it, at least in retrospect (Jn. 7:30; 8:20). There was nothing accidental in the life of Jesus; everything he did was done according to the will of his Father. (For a discussion of the various Gk. terms for time, see NIDNTT, 3:826-50.) See ETERNITY.

house. Words for “house” (mainly Heb. bayit H1074, Gk. oikia G3864 and oikos G3875) are very frequent throughout the Bible, denoting a dwelling place and including references to the rudest huts, the palace, and the temple of God. Earliest houses of the ANE found to date occur at Haçılar in Anatolia (ASIA MINOR) from the 7th millennium B.C. These already were rectangular in plan, indicating the early solution to roof framing, whereas in the area near the Persian Gulf and in Egypt, where reeds were plentiful, the natural shape was a round plan, having woven reed walls with the tops of tall reeds bent over dome-like to form the roof. A later variation was the row of center posts formed of bundled reeds with woven reed walls on either side, with the tops bent over to form the roof and fastened to a pole set atop the center posts (G. Contenau, Everyday Life in Babylon and Assyria [1954], 26). Only with the advent of the rectangular plan and the use of tree poles as roof beams could expansion of living space occur, for reeds grow only to limited height and have little inherent strength.

In EGYPT stone was plentiful, but the houses of the lower classes in all ages, after mud-brick was developed c. 3500 B.C., were always constructed of BRICK. In MESOPOTAMIA, the situation was reversed: there was no native stone and thus stone had to be imported, whereas mud was everywhere available and mud-brick was developed earlier here than in Egypt (cf. Gen. 11:3). In PALESTINE stone was available, but prior to the Greek period it was not used in constructing public buildings except by SOLOMON, OMRI, and AHAB. However, buildings were erected either of rubble stone set in mud (plastered or unplastered) or of mud-brick on stone base courses and plastered over with mud, and in some cases whitewashed (see ARCHITECTURE). In Mesopotamia, asphalt (see BITUMEN) was the mortar, whereas in Egypt it was fine CLAY, with the brick laid when three-quarters dry to form a tight bond between brick. JERICHO, however, provided the earliest usage of mud brick in the plano-convex shape; although these came later in Mesopotamia, it is not known whether Jericho builders influenced the Mesopotamians.

After the 4th millennium B.C., houses with rooms enclosing an inner court, frequently two stories high, were developed in Mesopotamia, providing for a self-contained unit to carry on family and craft occupations within the shelter of the home. A porter would have had charge of the gate from the street. Family quarters were on the second floor, and animals were housed on the first floor, where were also rooms for storage and the craft rooms. Second-floor rooms were served by a wood balcony with access gained by a wooden stair from the court. Two-story houses are found already in the 5th millennium B.C. at Haçılar, well before those of Ur III. Poorer houses usually consisted of one room, with people and animals sharing the space.

Roof structures were formed of tree poles or palm tree trunks, over which smaller branches, brush, reeds, or palm fronds were placed to form a base for a packed clay layer rolled into place with stone rollers, some of which have been found in house ruins. In some areas marly stone was pulverized and spread over the clay, and this method provided a much more impervious surface. The roof, accessible by outside stairs, became a favorite sitting area in the evening to enjoy cooling breezes (1 Sam. 9:25-26; 2 Sam. 11:2; Acts 10:9). Representations of awnings demonstrate attempts to protect the roof terrace during the heat of the day. It was also a place where flax was easily spread out to dry (Josh. 2:6), and probably other field products were stored there. In cases where roofs were occupied, a parapet (KJV, “battlement”) was to be supplied to prevent persons from falling off (Deut. 22:8). In Assyrian reliefs, some houses are pictured as having a cupola that served as a shelter (summer parlor, Jdg. 3:20). In NT times, roofs were gabled as well as flat; for the gabled type of the better houses, roof tiles formed the covering. In the case of the house where the paralytic was healed (Lk. 5:18-26), the type of roof, whether flat or pitched, is uncertain.

Floors for ground levels were of beaten clay and in some cases given a thin lime plaster coating. Second floors were framed and formed as for roofs with the addition in some cases of the lime plaster topping. Cooling effect was obtained in Mesopotamia by facing the houses toward the NE and providing for drafts of cooler air to work through the rooms. In Egypt, houses were oriented northward to cut off the southern heat. Frequently they had a device on the roof to deflect the breezes into the house.

DOORS were generally made of wood panels from imported WOOD in Egypt and Mesopotamia, and the FORESTS of Palestine adequately provided for local needs. In other cases, cloth or hide hangings were used. Enough houses have been excavated from the time of DAVID lacking sockets at sill and lintel to indicate that the need of doors was not pressing, and revealing general social and political safety. It would appear that David had organized the military forces to act as a police force (J. P. Free, Archaeology and Bible History [1950], 62).

WINDOWS in walls fronting inner courts were of larger size, while any occurring in street walls were most likely small, with a protective lattice to prevent ingress (2 Ki. 1:2). In the house of RAHAB, a window looked out over the city wall, a convenient place to observe an attacker as well as to escape, hence the query addressed to her about the spies (cf. Josh. 2:15). At DAMASCUS, the window was high enough above ground to dispense with the lattice, allowing PAUL to be lowered to the ground (2 Cor. 11:33).

Sanitary systems were built sporadically. In many cases in Egypt, these systems discharged into the sand outside the houses. In preplanned towns and fortresses in Nubia, drains ran down the streets and emptied outside the gates (A. Badawy, Architecture in Ancient Egypt and the Near East [1966]). A house in UGARIT of c. 1400 B.C. had cesspools (ibid., 156). In poorer quarters, the gutter in the street was more frequent than the cesspool. In Mesopotamia, in other cases, an aperture in the floor received wastes that were conducted off through clay pipes to cesspools (ibid., 160). WATER was transported to the houses, and evidence indicates that, at least for the better homes, storage jars set in courtyards provided immediate storage facility.

FURNITURE varied with the economic status of the householder. COOKING was done over an open hearth, the smoke finding the best way out. A stone mill of base and quern was a certain item in any kitchen to provide flour. Ovens occurred in outer courts, the poor using a community oven in a public court. In Egypt, the living room was furnished in some cases with a bench on one wall. Better class homes contained (in different periods) chairs, stools, tables, and beds. In poorer homes, mats on the floor served for sleeping. Chests of various sizes, some highly decorated, provided closed storage for some household items. Pottery of various shapes and sizes served as dishes. Metal bowls and basins have been recovered from the better houses. Babylonians had short-legged tray-like tables as well as the usual types. Houses of Haçilar from the 6th millennium B.C. had plastered wall cupboards, in addition to fire boxes, which were safer than the open hearths.

If storage room was provided in the house, large storage jars with lids were sunk in the floor for storing oil, grain, and wine. Other rooms stored rough goods, that is, field produce. Where occasion demanded, rooms provided for crafts (e.g., weaving), as shown in tomb models from Egypt.

Typical interior of a 1st-cent. Judean home.

Lighting for the house was a clay dish with a wick, set either in a pinched rim or in its own spout, the latter being the LAMP of Matt. 25:1. Fuel was olive OIL, but in Mesopotamia, frequently a crude oil provided better light. Sesame oil was sometimes used. Methods to shield or cover the candle were suggested (Matt. 5:15). Torches were secured by the use of pitch on a stick. Heating for houses varied according to the climate. Egypt required little, furnished by simple means. In Mesopotamia, braziers were used for both cooking and heating in winter. In Anatolia, palace remains indicate a few cases of movable hearths (Badawy, Architecture, 133). Where the kitchen hearth was used, it furnished heat for one-room houses. (See further A. Badawy, "Architectural Provision Against Heat in the Orient," JNES 17 [1958]: 123.)

Decoration varied from mere whitewashed walls to painted plaster in the better houses, often a painted wainscot, dark in color with a top stripe. Ceilings in some cases were finished with plaster or painted lath. In wealthy homes in Egypt, gold and electrum were used on a stucco base as a lining on low relief. In Mesopotamia, elaborately painted plaster was frequent. Door frames at times were painted red, and in other cases stone slabs as wainscots provided the only decorative elements.

household. See FAMILY.

household code. This term (also German Haustafel, “house table,” pl. Haustafeln) refers to a set of behavioral standards for members of an extended family. The term is applied to lists of various kinds found in Greco-Roman literature and to several NT passages, especially Eph. 5:21—6:9 and Col. 3:18—4:1. See ETHICS OF PAUL III.C.

householder. This English term (as well as “good-man of the house”) is used in the KJV to render Greek oikodespotēs G3867, “master [or owner] of the house.” The word, which appears only in the Synoptic Gospels, is applied to differentiate between employer and employee in Jesus’ parables (Matt. 13:27 et al.). It is used also to describe Christ himself in his overlordship of the KINGDOM OF GOD (Lk. 13:25). The rendering “householder” is used consistently by the RSV (in NRSV only at Matt. 13:27), but more recent translations prefer “master of the household,” “landowner,” etc.

household gods. See IDOLATRY; TERAPHIM.

House of the Forest of Lebanon. See FOREST.

Hozai hoh’zi (חֹזַי H2559 [not in NIV]). According to the MT (followed by NJPS), the apparent name of the author of a chronicle or history in which the prayer of MANASSEH, his sinfulness, and certain of his impious acts were recorded (2 Chr. 33:19 [KJV mg., “Hosai”]; cf. 32:32, which says that the events in the reign of Hezekiah were “written in the vision of the prophet Isaiah”). Most versions, however, follow the reading of one Hebrew MS, ḥôzîm (pl. of ḥôzeh H2602), and of the SEPTUAGINT (tōn horontōn), and translate “the seers.” Some scholars have suggested reading ḥôzāyw, “his [Manasseh’s] seers.”

Hubbah huh’buh (חֻבָּה H2465 [Ketib חֻבָּה; cf. BHS], derivation uncertain). Son of Shomer (KJV, “Shamer”; NRSV, “Shemer”) and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:34; KJV, “Jehubbah,” following the Ketib consonants but the Qere vocalization).

Hukkok huh’kok (חֻקֶּק [some edd., חֻקֶּק] H2982). A town on the W border of the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:34; NJPS, “Hukok”). It has often been identified with Yaquq, some 3 mi. NW of GENNESARET. Others, objecting that Yaquq is much too far to the E, propose Khirbet el-Jemei-jmeh, 15 mi. W of Gennesaret and 12 mi. ESE of Acco. See also HUKOK.

Hukok hyoo’kok (חֻקֶּק H2577). A town within the tribal territory of ASHER assigned to the Levites descended from GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:75 [Heb. 6:60]). Some think it may be the same as HUKKOK, but the parallel passage (Josh. 21:31) leads most scholars to identify it with HELKATH.

Hul huhl (חִיל H2566, meaning uncertain). Son of ARAM and grandson of SHEM, included in the Table of NATIONS (Gen. 10:23). In the parallel list (1 Chr. 1:17), the phrase “the sons of Aram” is missing from the MT, making it appear that GETHER was a son of Shem and thus a brother of Aram. It is possible that this passage intends to list the descendants of Shem without distinguishing generations (cf. NRSV), but many scholars believe that the phrase in question dropped out by scribal mistake at an early stage in the textual transmission of the book (cf. NIV).

Huldah huhl'duh (חֻלְדָּה H2701, “mole, weasel”). A prophetess who lived during the reign of King JOSIAH (2 Ki. 22:14-20; 2 Chr. 34:22-28). Identified as the wife of SHALLUM, who was the “keeper of the wardrobe,” Huldah lived in the mišneh H5467, that is, the SECOND DISTRICT, of JERUSALEM (cf. Zeph. 1:10 and esp. J. Simons, Jerusalem in the Old Testament [1952], 290-93). HILKIAH the priest, SHAPHAN the scribe, and some others, having been commanded by Josiah to seek an oracle from the Lord concerning the lawbook found in the TEMPLE, came to her to fulfill the request. She then prophesied judgment and disaster upon Jerusalem and its people, but not for Josiah, since his reading of the lawbook had led to repentance. For him she relayed God’s message, “I will gather you to your fathers, and you will be buried [lit., be gathered to your grave] in peace. Your eyes will not see all the disaster I am going to bring on this place” (1 Ki. 22:20). Since Josiah actually died in battle (23:29-30), the words “you will be buried in peace” may mean that he would be gathered to his rest before the catastrophe befell the city. It is interesting to note that she was consulted on the matter even though both JEREMIAH and ZEPHANIAH were prophesying at the time. In this regard she had a precursor in DEBORAH (Jdg. 4) and a worthy follower in the prophetess ANNA (Lk. 2:36).

human nature. The psalmist, in asking “what is man?” (Ps. 8:5), voiced a question as old as mankind. One facet of human uniqueness is man’s ability to transcend himself and to make himself his own object. The problem may be raised within many contexts, these being broadly divisible into two types, the theistic and the nontheistic.

Human nature is a complex phenomenon, so that definitions of it tend to lack comprehensiveness. While some appear more adequate than others, all tend to be partial. There is need for balance between discussion of the essential nature of human beings on the one hand, and their existential relationships on the other. Any discussion of human nature must take account of many thought-currents, including those flowing in the recent past. It is proposed here to approach the subject historically, beginning with views explicated in the OT and NT. Other views will be noted, particularly as they affect the course of the history of the doctrine since NT times. The interaction of biblical and classical views forms a proper part of this discussion and affords a basis for an assessment of more recent and contemporary modes of interpretation of the subject.

It is of the nature of Christian theology to articulate a credible view of human nature, which determines both a person’s general orientation and one’s total religious commitment. While anthropology does not ultimately condition theology, it is questionable whether any adequate view of redemption is possible until there has been made a reasoned and credible understanding of its subject, human beings.

I. In the OT. The Genesis account of CREATION presents human origination as involving two stages, apparently occurring in close sequence. A body was formed “from the dust of the ground,” and was then permeated with “breath of life,” so that the resultant man, ADAM, was “a living being” (Gen. 2:7). While the OT does not labor to articulate a detailed anthropology, it implies that the human BODY was tenanted by a vital principle that made it alive and responsive to the outside world. The first man was “diversified” by the creation of a female counterpart, EVE; and from this point the human being was bisexual, both with respect to personality and in the matter of reproduction.

With respect to physical heritage, the OT sees the human race as having sprung from a common origin and as being the progeny of a single primal pair. The origins of the diverse races are shrouded in mystery, while the proliferation of human languages is described in one brief account, the incident of the Tower of BABEL (Gen. 11:1—9). Language considerations are seen as accounting, in part at least, for geographical dispersal.

There is indication in Genesis that profound changes took place, at certain stages, in the human biological structure. It is suggested that at the FALL the human reproductive cycle was accelerated and, as well, that the process of childbirth became painful and even dangerous. It is also indicated that the human lifespan was markedly, and rather suddenly, shortened soon after the flood (see FLOOD, GENESIS). This abbreviation came, by one apparent transitional stage, from about 900 years, to nearly its present length. During the transitional stage, following the diversification of language, longevity shrank from about 500 years to 200 years, after which the normal age-span lowered to about a century, and then to the level of “threescore years and ten” (Ps. 90:10 KJV). The factors entering into this development are not given, but one is left with the impression that it resulted from direct providential action.

The account of human origins as given in the book of Genesis is serious, orderly, and straightforward in its appeal to human REASON. Like the rest of the created universe, human beings are shown to have originated in a free act of God’s will. Their appearance culminates an ascending series of divine acts; and in their creation, the originative activity of God came to rest. They are portrayed as being linked, in the physical side of their being, with organic nature, while at the same time transcending nature in their spiritual endowment. With respect to this latter quality, they are portrayed as being made in the IMAGE OF GOD. The imago dei will be described elsewhere in this work; for the present it must be said only that man’s organic frame received the “breath of life” and a “living being” (lit., “living soul”) upon which the print of likeness to God is stamped.

In man and woman, as originally formed, there existed a dignity, and as well a sovereignty over nature, that was analogous to God’s own dignity and sovereignty. Answerable to this dignity and sovereignty, God placed the first human pair over nature that they might discipline, order, and enjoy it. Implied in this action is their original sinlessness, their possession of a primeval righteousness, and a consequent unclouded relation to their Maker. Human beings are personal, self-conscious, rational, social, and above all, accountable in a moral sense to God.

Evil was no part of their original donation, but the book of Genesis indicates that a primal disobedience, seemingly occurring early in their career, introduced a new and damaging element into the human predicament, which affected both their existential being and their relation to their Maker. The details of the fall are few, but basic are the following: the first pair was placed under one clear and simple prohibition; they were subject to the solicitation of a tempter; they heeded the voice of the serpent; they disobeyed; and certain consequences followed.

The impact of the fall upon human nature is sketched in bold strokes: the first pair came to possess new awarenesses (e.g., of being unclad and thus exposed); their relation to their Creator was disturbed; and interpersonal relationships (i.e., between Adam and his wife) were corrupted. The resultant changes within human nature are rather illustrated than spelled out in the OT. Between the human pair, now fallen, and God there arose alienation and tension. Aware of their guilty behavior, they sought to conceal themselves from the divine presence. God, in accordance with his original word, sent the first pair forth from their original environment and into a hostile nature.

Within man there appeared almost immediately character disturbances. Adam reproached his wife, in an attempted transfer of responsibility. Within the first growing primary group (the family), the malignancy with which mankind was henceforth to be afflicted began to appear. Murder invaded the sanctuary of the first family, revealing the emerging irresponsibility of CAIN (Gen. 4:9) and his consequent and growing alienation from self and kindred.

Outward from this familial pattern of tragedy there radiated social and cultural disorientation: "The LORD saw how great man's wickedness on the earth had become, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time" (Gen. 6:5). Thus is portrayed the ruin of the divine image that was sustained by man. His moral resemblance to God became largely destroyed, his God-consciousness became clouded, and even his natural virtues became a mere shadow of those with which he was originally endowed.

There remained the human personality (albeit in maimed and distorted form), the self-consciousness, and some measure of capacity to respond to the claims of the moral and spiritual realm. His propensities toward society and toward societal living are shown to be capable of gross distortion, as are also his capabilities for the erection of culture. A false sense of autonomy, and a narrowly based pride of achievement, corroded and corrupted the human enterprise (Gen. 4:23-24).

Moral aberration, leading to spiritual and moral degradation, multiplied; sins of both flesh and spirit became the major expressions of fallen human nature. Parallel, however, was a line of spiritually receptive persons who gave attention to God's mandates and who preserved in obedience the element of faith, this latter often leading to the maintenance of family expiatory rites. The behavior of such seems to be related to the continuing striving of the Spirit of the Lord with men (Gen. 6:3).

The major bearers of early cultural history are shown by the OT to have been arrogant and systematically evil, until the Lord determined to preserve providentially the family of NOAH and make a new beginning with the race. The postdiluvian history reveals human nature as expressing itself continually in terms of intoxication, pride, and greed. The patriarchal period, the period of the captivity in Egypt, the epoch of the exodus and the settlement in Canaan, and the period of the judges, all reveal essentially the same pattern of human behavior. The OT dramatizes this feature in the historical book of Judges, in which it is said that selfish human wants and desires ruled society. Like a refrain, it is said, "the Israelites once again did evil in the sight of the LORD" (Jdg. 4:1; 6:1; 10:6; 13:1; et al.). This pattern issued from the fact that "everyone did as he saw fit" (17:6; 21:25). Writing centuries later, Jeremiah summed up the OT estimate of the natural man thus: "The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure. / Who can understand it?" (Jer. 17:9).

From the foregoing it is clear that the OT views human nature in terms of the following: (1) Man was created morally undefiled, a special creation at God's hand. (2) He was placed under a clearly understood order of probation, with a specific prohibition at its heart. (3) The initial disobedience brought swift consequences of a radically negative sort, both upon the first pair and upon their progeny. (4) The original "image of God" became disfigured and distorted, while at the same time God left mankind capable of some measure of response and of hope. (5) Evil became a constant and malignant element in the whole of human experience. (6) Evil centered in an imbalance in the relation between God and man, so that man asserted a false claim of autonomy, and chronically pitted himself against the deliverances of conscience, of seer and prophet, and of the entire pattern of divine revelation. (7) Evil brought social and interpersonal strife, disorganizing human relationships and corrupting all human institutions. (8) Overt evil-doing objectified a deep-seated disturbance within human beings, a disorientation that was hereditary in nature and malignant in its intricate pattern of manifestations.

It needs to be said, in summary, that the OT understanding of human nature finds a certain focal expression in the doctrine of the "evil impulse." This idea is rooted in the statements of Gen. 6:5 and 8:21 that the "inclination" (yēṣer H3671) of the human heart was found to be "only evil all the time" and "evil from childhood." Even at an early period in Israel's history, the teaching concerning the ingrained evil in human nature had taken root and was beginning to take shape.

This usage of the term yēṣer occurs elsewhere (Deut. 31:21; 1 Chr. 28:9; 29:18). The OT suggests with growing clarity that evil entrenches itself in the mind and that there is a resultant pervading sinfulness which is universal among mankind. Such an inclination to evil is inherent in human beings as a part of the nature they inherit (Ps. 51:5). This view was continued in the rabbinical literature, which draws a contrast between the yēṣer hārā' (the evil impulse) and yāṣer haṭṭōb (the good impulse).

II. In the NT. The estimate of human beings in the NT, and more especially in the teachings of our Lord, rests basically upon the Hebraic understanding of human nature and the OT interpretation of human racial history. The four Gospels do not undertake to articulate a "doctrine of man" as such; they do portray the activities of our Lord as he met men and women in concrete and often crucial situations; and out of these situations emerged rather definite teachings with respect to human nature.

People were regarded as sinners, and the lot of the human race was that which resulted from its sinfulness. Jesus addressed his disciples with the words, "If you then, though you are evil, know how to give good gifts..." (Lk. 11:13), thus suggesting man's universal involvement in the sinful predicament. He recognized that the defilement of SIN reached the springs of human action and operated outward from a hidden sanctuary (Matt. 15:11; Mk. 7:15). He further stated that "out of the heart come evil thoughts, murder, adultery, sexual immorality, theft, false testimony, slander. These are what make a man 'unclean'" (Matt. 15:19-20a; cf. Mk. 7:21-23).

These and similar passages indicate the emphasis of our Lord upon the solidarity of the human race in the predicament of sinfulness. While he made reference to what may be called the "sins of the flesh," his emphasis was more frequently upon the "sins of the spirit," such as covetousness, pride, and self-sufficiency. Such forms of evil were most frequently seen as barriers to entry into the kingdom, as witness for example the dealing with the rich ruler (Lk. 18:18-24). Underlying these analytical statements of Jesus is the statement by John to the effect that Jesus needed no one to instruct him concerning human nature, "for he knew what was in man" (Jn. 2:25). This suggests a realistic view of human sinfulness upon the part of our Lord.

Jesus saw all people as needing “healing” (i.e., salvation), and referred in irony to those who felt no such need. Even those who outwardly “appear to people as righteous” were held to be inwardly “full of hypocrisy and wickedness” (Matt. 23:28). Mankind was likewise indicted for “hardness of heart,” this being held to render necessary Yahweh’s earlier permissions of such evils as divorce—and even here the suggestion is that this was not part of man’s original order of conduct (i.e., before the fall) but the result of the sin-order (Matt. 19:8).

While our Lord gave full recognition to the evils and ills that are part of the experience of the race, he never regarded these as final, for he always viewed human beings from the standpoint of God’s redemptive power and will toward humanity. While he saw that recompense, in the form of suffering here and hereafter, came as a result of sin, he saw the sin-order as modified by the order of GRACE. With this in mind, he sought out sinners without minimizing the gravity of the evil that was part of fallen man’s endowment. He recognized that human beings, in the deepest layers of their being, harbored a pernicious mood of revolt against their Creator.

The four Gospels thus portray humanity—seen through the eyes of Jesus Christ—as having suffered an original catastrophe that cast its long and melancholy shadow across human experience and human history. The nature of man thus bore the disastrous effects of the fall; but as a foil to this, it was made clear that humanity possesses a residual capacity for sonship with God through grace.

Similar estimates are discoverable in the apostolic preaching, particularly as recorded in the book of Acts. PETER’S sermon on the day of PENTECOST makes incidental mention of the wickedness that led to the CRUCIFIXION (Acts 2:23), while the conclusion of that address shows the hearers as convinced of their sins and openly penitent (2:37-38). Human ignorance is seen as a cause of some human wrongdoing (3:17), an ignorance that is now no longer excusable (3:19; 17:30).

The book of Acts presents, in contrast to the usual declarations of man’s evil nature, the newness of life that believers come to enjoy. Thus “the multitude of them that believed” were no longer hostile to one another (Acts 4:32 KJV) but manifested a new spirit of amity and of generosity. Hypocrisy was shown to be both immediately uncovered and summarily punished in the early Christian community, particularly in the account of ANANIAS and SAPPHIRA (5:1-10).

Believers, now renewed in their inner natures, showed an uncommon boldness and a rare disregard for the opposition of the ungodly, extending to the most unusual capacity for the bearing of physical pain. The contrast between “man by nature” and “man by grace” recurs throughout the apostolic KERYGMA, both in the book of Acts and in the writings of PAUL, whose personal experience is adduced as a primary illustration (Acts 9:1-2, cf. 9:27-29; 22:3-6, 19-20; 26:9-11, cf. vv. 16-19).

The book of Acts reiterates the negative judgment pronounced upon the natural human heart for its covetousness (Acts 5:2-4), for its wrong-headed desire for power (8:18-23), for its narrow prejudice (10:10-16; cf. 10:34), its willingness to exploit others (16:16-20), its tenacious adherence to evil doing (24:25-27), and its obduracy against truth (28:25-27). Thus the early apostolic preaching took for granted the OT and rabbinical view of human nature as subject to the “evil inclination,” a negative propensity that is universal in its distribution within mankind.

The Pauline understanding of human nature finds its most systematic presentation in the epistle to the ROMANS, although it is by no means absent from his other writings. It needs to be said that his major concern was not with the Christian estimation of humanity as such, but with the message of Christian redemption which was designed to meet each person’s deepest needs. Salvation meant deliverance from the deep and entrenched forms of evil that oppress everyone.

Men and women are seen by nature to be “carnal, sold under sin” (Rom. 7:14), like slaves being bought by a cruel master and driven to a twisted course of action. This situation is declared to be universal (3:10-18), with every member of the race being involved in a situation in which the flesh was subject to sin. This does not mean that Paul subscribed to the Greco-Eastern view of the inherent evil of the human BODY, but that people are held to be under the sovereign sway of sin and death, with sin regarded as universal and death regarded as its inevitable penalty.

Paul's use of the term sarx G4922 is treated elsewhere (see FLESH), but it needs to be said here that Paul regards "flesh" as the weak and corrupted instrument of sin as a controlling principle. It is of great significance at this point to note that when Paul lists the "works of the flesh" (Gal. 5:19-21; NIV, "the acts of the sinful nature"), only five of the seventeen forms of evil are direct expression of the physical appetites. Sin is entrenched in the flesh, and from this as a base of operations, wages war against the higher impulses of human beings.

Parallel to the prevailing temper of the book of Acts, in which (as noted previously) there is a stress upon that which human beings may become by grace, Paul emphasizes that human nature can become the dwelling place of the HOLY SPIRIT of God (Rom. 8:11), whose role in human life is that of deliverer "from this body of death" (Rom. 7:24) and of imparter of the "fruit of the Spirit" (Gal. 5:22-23).

It needs to be noted that the NT, especially in the Epistles, recognizes not only that the human being is a composite creature (i.e., composed of body and soul and/or spirit), but also that the whole person is to be the subject of redemption. Paul makes it clear that in the RESURRECTION we will have a body that, while being the lineal descendant of and successor to our "natural" body, will nevertheless not consist of "flesh and blood" (1 Cor. 15:42-50).

The Johannine understanding of human nature does not differ markedly from that of the Pauline epistles. John proclaims the universal sinfulness of mankind (1 Jn. 1:8) and describes the natural man as being "in darkness" (2:9) and as being among "the children of the devil" (3:10). Reference is made to the primal murder (3:12) and the contrast between the works of the redeemed and the ways of the unregenerate. The Johannine picture of the generality of worldly people is not an optimistic one: "the whole world is under the control of the evil one" (5:19) and its citizens are subject to deception on a grand scale (2 Jn. 7).

The understanding of human nature in the Revelation of John follows the general lines laid down in the rest of the NT. The catalogues of the misdeeds of the unregenerate resemble those of the Gospels and the Pauline epistles, while the possibilities for the redemption of human nature in Christ form part of the NT's general message of hope for man in his fallen predicament.

The NT thus takes for granted, and builds upon, the major themes of Hebrew religion, and in the light of revealed redemption, brings the portrait of human nature to a new fullness. There is given a realistic view of the negative results of sin in human nature, by which the original "image of God" in the human creature is distorted and disfigured. At the same time, man bears the marks of a high ancestry. While evil has touched adversely every aspect and quality of his nature, there remain elements upon which the Spirit of grace may lay hold.

It follows that, though fallen, men and women are at the same time capable of bearing the restored image through grace. It is in redemption that their unfulfilled capacities begin to be realized, although they must live in relative incompleteness in this life. The NT suggests, further, that their spiritual part is imperishable and survives DEATH. While little is specifically stated concerning the INTERMEDIATE STATE, the NT makes clear that the disembodied existence is a temporary one, and that all await the resurrection of the body, some to everlasting righteousness, and others to final spiritual loss.

Seen within the context of grace, the NT view of man is neither fully pessimistic nor largely optimistic, but rather melioristic. Man is not what he may become; he is dependent and unfulfilled, and no genuine realization of his potentialities is possible apart from the restoration of his fractured relationship with his Creator through Jesus Christ. Human beings normally exist in society, in human community. Within this context, they are loved by an everlasting Heart that seeks to draw them into a higher community, through the transformation of their nature by the agency of the divine Spirit, for whose indwelling they have a basic capacity that survived the fall.

In the INCARNATION, the eternal LOGOS appeared in human form to show what redeemed man might become. In One who was “very God and very man,” human beings behold the Image to which they are to be conformed through being transformed by him who shared our common life in the days of his flesh. In him we can glimpse human nature as it ought to be, and as it will be when he brings many sons to glory.

III. The classical period. The views of human nature that prevailed in the Greco-Roman world impinged upon Christian thinking at several points: first, during the intertestamental period, as Jewish thinkers confronted HELLENISM, especially at ALEXANDRIA; second, during the early Christian centuries; and third, in the later medieval and early Renaissance eras. Christian thinkers have from the time of the apostles been under necessity of understanding the major elements of the classical anthropology, particularly as this was articulated by Plato, Aristotle, the Stoics, and the Epicureans.

The anthropology of the Greco-Roman world was itself complex, being composed of several strands and embodying conceptions that reached back to the times of Homer and Hesiod, for the thinkers of Greece’s Golden Age were indebted to those who preceded them. Classical thought in general regarded man as being distinguished from mere nature by his possession of a rational capacity. Even in Stoicism, in which the universe was invested with an immanent REASON, there was still the lingering contention that reason must somehow transcend the seemingly nonrational parts of nature. Thus when Aristotle defines man as “a rational animal,” he speaks for the classical tradition as a whole. This marked a radical departure from, for example, the Ionian physicists or the atomists. Thus, classical anthropology possessed a deeply-rooted DUALISM (i.e., of reason versus matter) which distinguished between “man as body” and “man as mind.”

Concerning moral endowment, the classical world had no doctrine of “original sin” as such; Plato suggested that human beings may possess a “fount of reason that is as yet uncurbed” (Laws 792e) but it is still assumed that they, as rational beings, would ultimately perceive and seek “the Good” in both individual and social behavior. This was, of course, a corollary of the dictum of Socrates to the effect that “Virtue is knowledge, and can be taught.”

The further implication of classical thought for the understanding of human nature is that the rational creature that man is—imperfect yet capable of knowing and achieving the Good—must rely upon his own endowment(s) for the solution of his problems. There was little or no place within this system for a belief in any concept of moral and spiritual assistance from any Power outside and above man, for his relation to the gods was primarily one of etiquette.

In classical thought, and more especially in Plato, the ultimate aim and directing impulse in human beings is the imitation of the ideal. This finds its best expression in the operation of the human essence, which is their reason, and which Plato thought to be divine and immortal. It seems that Socrates may have been the mentor of his more famous pupil at this point; both shared a profound belief that the person with the enlightened reason would in the final analysis pursue “the Good.” It was, of course, the more practical Aristotle who asked, at a point crucial to the discussion, “But what of the passions?”

It needs to be said that classical anthropology, from Socrates onward, recognized that the SOUL or spiritual part of human beings was subject to a multitude of inward strains, since there existed a multiplicity of factors within the soul. To bring these into harmonious pattern, it was regarded as essential that these factors be brought into an ordered hierarchy or household, with each element functioning in its proper place. Like the well-ordered state, in which there is a proper division of labor according to the several abilities of the citizens, the healthy soul is the one in which each capacity is directed toward its proper end, so that none works in interference with any other.

The chief competitors for moral supremacy, in this view, are reason and desire. The former speaks for the “good in man,” the latter contests “the Good” in the name of supposed lesser goods. Desire is clamorous, and it has faculties of memory by which former situations can be recalled and be made a competitor for higher goods.

With respect to human freedom, classical anthropology regarded it to inhere in man’s status as a rational being—a being who can act in accordance with “the Good” as it is freely apprehended. Human beings can thus be enslaved only by the irrational. The free person thus achieves freedom through the apprehension of the rational good.

Evil in people rests basically in ignorance, upon a lack of apprehension of the goals of their reason. This deficiency, in turn, is usually the product of the shortcomings of the social environment. Evil is not regarded in terms of the violation of any divinely constituted mandate, but of the irrational shortcomings or comings-short of the normally rational person. Concerning the ultimate origin of human evil, classical thought has no clearly articulated view. To Plato, it seems that the human “fall” consisted of a wrong choice upon the part of the soul in its antenatal state, by which it is incarcerated, through human generation, in a BODY, in which it, in turn, becomes involved in complications of the most grave sort. In the earthly career, each person is composite and becomes an arena for combat, the contestants being chiefly three: reason, the irrational elements of the being, and the goading drives of the body.

Bronze statue of a Hellenistic Greek thinker (c. 300 B.C.), positioned in the reflective posture of a philosopher. Aristotle taught that reason was the highest faculty of mortals.

Aristotle’s views had much in common with that of Socrates and Plato. He felt, with earlier classical thinkers, that reason was man’s highest faculty. He disagreed especially with Plato, who held the view that reason was diffused in the “lower” faculties. He protested also the rigid compartmentalization of human beings into soul-and-body, feeling that these two elements were more closely interrelated. Aristotle made more of the power of both will and passions, and thus differentiated the moral qualities. His view of freedom was more analytical than that of his predecessors in that he distinguished more sharply between voluntary and nonvoluntary acts, and in that he gave a diminished place to the reflective reason, in favor of a more organic view of human beings.

Concerning the final end of man, classical thought was ambiguous at the point of personal IMMORTALITY. Earlier thinkers, especially Socrates and Plato, had a relatively clear understanding at the point of the survival of the soul after the dissolution of the body, as expressed in Plato's Myth of Er in book 10 of the Republic. Aristotle was less clear in his beliefs at this point, while STOIC thought, understanding Reason as a spark of the all-pervading divine fire, held more or less clearly to the imperishability of human reason. Epicurus and his followers ignored or denied the doctrine of immortality, as a corollary of their materialism (see EPICUREAN). Nowhere in classical anthropology does one find the human body to be the subject of immortality, nor is there any clear teaching at the point of qualitative differences between the destination of the good and the evil persons respectively, save possibly as such differences inhered in notions inherited from the preclassical past.

The anthropology of the Greco-Roman period oscillated between acceptance of happiness as the highest goal for man on the one hand, and the concept of discipline on the other. This dialectic centered largely in the differences between the Epicureans and the Stoics. Epicurus himself believed that happiness or pleasure was the proper goal of human striving, but sought to distinguish between grades of pleasure, as producing varying degrees of happiness. His followers failed to perpetuate this discriminating attitude, and tended to move in the direction of straightforward hedonism in which sensory pleasure became the highest good.

Stoicism, on the other hand, pursued happiness in terms of discipline. The good life was the life lived in terms of reason; in consequence, the Stoics distrusted sensory pleasure as tending to obscure reason and thus to undercut the deeper forms of happiness, notably tranquillity of soul. The CYNICS adopted the coarser features of Stoicism, making ASCETICISM and nature-harshness the highest goal.

In summary, the classical anthropology contained variety at a number of points. Chief among these were the following: (1) the structure of man—whether dualistic as in the Platonic tradition, or monistic as in either the pantheistic-Stoic or the materialistic-Epicurean form; (2) the precise role of reason; (3) the nature of freedom; (4) and the role of immortality. It did, however, possess unifying elements, especially (1) a general regard for man as a creature of reason; (2) a belief in the general goodness of human life; (3) a belief in man's capabilities for "salvation"; (4) the conviction that there was something "divine" in man; and (5) the belief that man's well-being was somehow bound up with inner harmony. It was this latter holistic tendency, which related the classical ethic to the classical ideal of beauty, that pervaded the esthetics of the classical and Hellenistic periods.

IV. The patristic period. It has been noted that the Christian view of human nature as developed in the NT is basically a continuation of that found in the Hebrew religion. Modifications within it were of a secondary character, consisting largely of elaborations; but with the period of the church fathers, more influences from the classical and Hellenistic eras were felt within the Christian thought stream, and certain changes in the understanding of man, particularly of his psychology, began to be discernible.

The analytic trend of classical anthropology found expression within the systematic writings of IRENAEUS, TERTULLIAN, and especially ORIGEN. Irenaeus distinguished, for example, between the “higher” and “lower” elements in the soul, while Tertullian expressed belief in the essential corporeality of the soul. This latter feature, probably derived from Stoic dogma, found expression in the teaching of the Gregorys, while Origen propounded a view of the preexistence of the soul that has strong affinities with the view of Plato and was later condemned.

Origen expressed a negative value judgment upon the human body reflective of the Platonic dualism. His view of the “image of God” is fairly typical of the ante-Nicene period; it inhered in the endowment for the ultimate perfect realization of the “divine likeness” and thus has affinities with the Aristotelian ideal of man.

With respect to the imago dei, JUSTIN MARTYR makes it to inhere in good part in man’s rational endowment, while Tertullian sees it in terms of man’s imperishability, and the Alexandrian writers locate it in both reason and immortality. This represents an attempt to be analytic at the point of teachings that Hebrew thought tended to regard concretely and synthetically.

With respect to the doctrine of human sinfulness, patristic writers tended to polarize around two patterns: the eastern, which regarded Adam’s fall as the first in a long line of sinful acts, leading to human frailty and ultimate mortality; and the western, which regarded Adam’s fall as a corrupting influence that left man not only mortal, but also guilty and impotent with respect to good.

The post-Nicene fathers developed, in the main, the two branches of this dichotomy. Roughly representative of the former view is that of the British monk Pelagius, who held that man in his present state possesses the capability of going either toward righteousness or toward evil. God’s grace meant, in this view, little more than a kind of superadded assistance to human capability. AUGUSTINE, on the other hand, formulated the view that is generally associated with his name, in which human beings were regarded as being, since Adam, incapable of choosing righteousness, being rather wholly corrupt.

With respect to human freedom, Pelagius maintained man’s ability, in his present state, to elect either alternative in the conflict between good and evil. Augustine, on the other hand, held that man’s present freedom consisted only in the ability to express his corrupted nature. In the former view, one may either commit evil or abstain from it; in the latter, only commission is possible.

The church of the patristic period struggled with the radically dualistic modes of thought with which its environment confronted it, notably the systems of the Gnostics (see GNOSTICISM) and the MANICHEANS. The fathers resisted both of these, probably chiefly because of the fact that the pairs of opposites tended to be rooted in nature rather than spirit.

It may be said that in Augustine the anthropology of the Western church found a synthesis that was dominant for several centuries of Christian history. Augustine looked deeply into human nature, and gave a formula for the understanding of the ills he found there. He set safeguards around the will of man, particularly at the point of the indeterminism that had been overstressed by some of the fathers. He emphasized the universality of sin, the racial nature of corruption, and the profundity of human need for divine grace. He saw that no element of human nature escaped the negative effects of the fall, and thus made a permanent place in Christian anthropology for the need for inward grace.

V. Medieval and Renaissance periods. The church of the medieval period was, in a large measure, concerned with practical matters such as the evangelization of the Germanic peoples, the relating of herself to the secular power, and the fusion of Latin and Teutonic cultures under her banner. There were, however, creative thinkers in the area of anthropology, insofar as this was requisite to the larger academic task of bringing the whole of knowledge into a synthetic unity.

Augustine patterned much of early medieval thought; the writings of Gregory the Great indicate a heavy dependence upon the Bishop of Hippo, although with modifications. These were largely in the direction of the substitution of weakness for inability, and (in some measure) the substitution of outer for inner grace. More place began to be made for human cooperation with grace, this element being a derivative of the thought of Pelagius. Abelard, with his emphasis upon freedom and upon the distinction between motive and act, seemed to be likewise akin to Pelagius, while Anselm was, on the surface at least, nearer to Augustine. The latter diverged from Augustine's view chiefly in his insistence that original sin was negative and privative, rather than aggressive and positive.

Thomas Aquinas marked a milestone in the medieval understanding of human nature. With him, there came a larger ascription of freedom to human beings, possibly as a corollary to the doctrines of penitence and of merit. Thomas understood the "image of God" to inhere in man's natural inclination toward the good, and in the original gift of grace that began to be bestowed at creation. Such was the emphasis upon the quantity of ability native to fallen man that Aquinas's position is frequently regarded to be Pelagian. While the practical drift of Scholasticism was in the direction of the glorification of the ascetic life, there was less emphasis upon concupiscence as the major expression of original sin than seems to have been placed by Augustine in his system. When this element did express itself, it was regarded by Aquinas to be the consequence of the absence of original righteousness. Man appears in Thomism thus to be innately evil, but with a capacity for some initiative toward God and against sin. He is likewise capable of receiving the operation of grace; and it was but a short step from this to the assertion of the capacity of cooperation, a belief that was consonant with the medieval conception of merit.

The Pelagianizing tendencies, seen to have been present in Abelard, and to a lesser extent in Anselm and Bonaventura, expressed themselves more forcibly in John Duns Scotus. The latter, with his emphasis upon the will, regarded human nature as being sinful only insofar as the will allows people to overstep the bounds set by a harmonious constitution, and good insofar as the will works with the offered grace of God. The crucial issue seems to be whether grace is a gift of God or whether it is acquired by meritorious conduct. The Council of Trent failed to resolve the differences between the Thomistic view on the one hand, and the Nominalistic views of Abelard and Duns Scotus on the other. It was proclaimed at Trent that original sin is removable only by Christ's grace as applied by baptism, and that this removal is total. It goes without saying that this last requires a radical readjustment of the evaluation placed upon the so-called "sins of the flesh."

The Renaissance represented, in part at least, a return to the classics, first for their literary value, but shortly also for their contents. It is not surprising that Renaissance anthropology expressed many features which appeared in the Greco-Roman era. Science, which was one of the major outgrowths of the Renaissance, early came to stress the operation of unvarying law throughout the realm of nature. Its spirit was nominalistic, and its thinkers were more hospitable to nature-oriented views of man than to the views which found expression in Scholastic realism. Throughout the Renaissance, the thought of Aristotle inspired the intellectual life of many of the theological schools of Europe. Perhaps the best exponent of the Renaissance doctrine of man was Giacomo Zabarella (1532-1589), who held that the soul was a function of the body, and that reason was the principle of natural life in the body. While man was finite, yet he was immortal in the sense that intellect does not perish.

Giovanni Pico, count of Mirandola (1463-1494), stressed the dignity of human beings, asserting that their true distinctiveness lay not in their origin as God's creation, but in their ability to share in the properties of all other beings as a result of their capacity for freedom. Pietro Pomponazzi of Mantua (1462-1525) developed a doctrine of immortality that restated Aristotle's view of the soul's immateriality and its consequent immortality. It follows that the Renaissance viewed man in terms of classical antiquity, giving a restatement, in the light of the advance of knowledge of the time, of that which was thought in antiquity. The mood of the period was humanistic, stressing the dignity and the competence of human beings.

VI. The Reformation. The Reformation begun by Luther retained much of Catholicism's formulations, but with specific emphases upon aspects of earlier views. Less attention was given to man's origin than to his present salvation and future destiny. As a result of original sin, men and women were regarded to be under condemnation, being weak and unable to find their own way of deliverance from present guilt and future judgment. They were held to be profoundly and directly dependent upon God. Their future hope was by means of the act of faith, and they were regarded to be delivered thus from the uncertainties and weaknesses of human action.

John Calvin continued Luther's stress upon "the will bound" and upon the purely divine origin of redemption. The malignancy of sin in human life was taken for granted, so that the Augustinian emphasis upon absolute original sin and the unconditional natural corruption of human powers was retained, and in some cases accentuated. The immortality of the soul was accepted as a matter of course. In general, also, classical views were implicitly rejected, particularly insofar as they stressed natural human dignity and human adequacy in the face of the human predicament of evil.

The Reformation in German-speaking Switzerland under the guidance of Ulrich Zwingli followed in general Lutheran lines. Zwingli's classical orientation did lead him to express some views concerning human nature divergent from those of the great Saxon. Zwingli recognized the common human inheritance of a corrupted nature, regarding this as analogous to the state of slavery, into which one may be born without any personal culpability. He is one with Luther in rejecting the Pelagianizing tendencies of the medieval scholastics.

The emphasis upon human incompetence in the face of man's sinful predicament that began with Luther and was continued in Calvin, with some further refinements, provoked a reaction both within Protestantism and in the Roman Catholic tradition. Within the latter came the Jansenist response (in the direction of Augustinianism), while within Protestantism came the Remonstrance (in the direction of Pelagianism) to which is attached the name of Jacobus Arminius.

The Remonstrance brought to the fore the question of human competence, so that the first of its Five Articles asserts that the divine purpose is to save those who believe on Jesus Christ "with the help of" grace. This emphasis led to the reply formulated by the Synod of Dort (1619), which reemphasized the major positions of the Reformed tradition in its strict limitation of the contribution of sinners in their response to the call of grace. More specifically, Dort affirmed particular election, its unconditional quality, and the inalienability of Christ's grace, doctrines that also found expression in the Westminster Confession of Faith (1646).

It may be properly said that this stage marks the close of specific formulation of Reformation teaching concerning the nature of man. Significant also is the fact that this development occurred almost wholly within the specifically Reformation tradition, and largely severed from the influence of the Renaissance, which had pursued a course largely independent of the religious and spiritual revolution precipitated by Luther.

VII. The modern period. Modern science, which is one of the major aspects of the legacy of the Renaissance, brought massive forces to bear upon the more recent understanding of human nature. Parallel to theistic views of man's being, there developed nontheistic modes of understanding that had for a common denominator, as Reinhold Niebuhr observes, "primarily faith in man."

In the post-Reformation era, these newer views challenged earlier understandings of man, most or all of which, however, continued to command some adherence. Within the general orthodox tradition, certain modifications occurred, chiefly with respect to the dimensions of the retained image of God within a fallen race, and its corollary of the competence (or lack of it) on the part of sinners to respond to grace. Semi-Pelagian (or more properly, semi-Augustinian) positions developed with the repeated recurrences of mass evangelism, with its appeal to the element of human decision.

The "liberal" theologies that emerged in opposition to historic orthodoxy elaborated a wide range of anthropologies, most of which were deeply influenced by Kant's assertion of human autonomy, particularly in the ethical sphere. Historic understanding(s) of man were challenged as being pessimistic and as infringing upon human freedom. It came to be asserted that if human beings are to be "truly ethical," they must be autonomous in a sense incompatible with the teaching concerning original sin. The doctrines of the fall, of sin, of grace, and of salvation (applied) were held to be in need of reinterpretation in terms of a "new moral consciousness."

In some strands, for example, that of Friedrich Schleiermacher, sinfulness was seen in terms of finite defectiveness rather than as a distortion of the will inherited from our first parents. Ruled out are the motifs of man's solidarity in evil, the imputation of sin, and native inability. These denials rest upon a non-Christian metaphysic of evil, and ultimately upon a nonbiblical understanding of human origin.

The theological liberalism of the 19th and early 20th cent., with its refashioning of the Christian understanding of both sin and grace in relation to human nature was challenged by the Dialectical Theology, of which Karl Barth, H. Emil Brunner, and Reinhold Niebuhr were major exponents. These sought to establish, on grounds relatively independent of the Christian Scriptures, a form of "Christian realism" with respect to human nature. The Dialectical Theology tended to regard Adam as a nonhistorical paradigm of the fate of Everyman. Likewise it saw man's original endowment to consist in moral potentiality rather than in created righteousness.

Theological liberalism, confronted by the historical crises that have shown the earlier optimistic and idealistic faith in man to be untenable, has sought to recover some form of realism with respect to human nature, and in case of some of its exponents, has accepted the discipline imposed upon it by some forms of existentialist philosophy. Such motifs as alienation, despair, and meaninglessness have forced new explorations of the subject. The interpretations placed upon human nature by Schleiermacher, Ritschl, Harnack, and Troeltsch have come to be regarded as products of an age that has passed.

The resurgence of evangelicalism that paralleled in time the period of largest acceptance of the Dialectical Theology has brought a renewed concern for an articulation of a view of human nature that would at one and the same time be in harmony with the whole scriptural portrayal and, as well, come to grips with the challenges presented by newer researches. These have come, in particular, from naturalism and much of current psychological studies. It is in the light of the former of these, with its explanation of causality in terms of random selection during an almost infinite time scale, that evangelicals assert again the historic conviction that man is a special creation, composite in nature, and originally endowed with the qualities of pristine holiness, in which the imago dei centered and which was forfeited in a historical fall. With respect to contemporary psychologies, evangelicals have rejected, in the name of the Christian REVELATION, the extremes of determinism (which robs man of his essentially moral and accountable nature) and of voluntarism (which in some strands of Existentialism deprives man of any genuine “nature”).

Against these forms of thought, it is asserted that human nature cannot be understood apart from a fearless application of the teachings of the Christian Scriptures. Evangelicals maintain that it is only in this light that our nature can be assessed with accuracy, so that the two elements of our “dark side” and of our high destiny are kept in balance.

humiliation of Christ. See EXALTATION OF CHRIST.

humility. Distinctive of biblical faith, humility is a virtue to which many other religions accord no honor and even fail to recognize. Philosophers, except those positively influenced by the Judeo-Christian tradition, likewise ignore or belittle it. Thus Aristotle, in his masterful systemization of pre-Christian wisdom, Nichomachean Ethics, praises a high-minded self-sufficiency that is the obverse of tapeinophrosynē G5425 (“lowliness, humility”). Centuries later Friedrich Nietzsche castigates humility as part and parcel of a perverted morality, a Christian transvaluation of values in which inferior individuals like PAUL resentfully metamorphose their baseness and weakness, exalting servility to the apex of excellence. Humility, therefore, is attacked by Nietzsche as a denial of that genuine humanity which will be embodied in the anti-Christian, aristocratic Superman.

Within the framework of revelational theism, however, humility is indeed a virtue, the proper attitude of the human creature toward his divine Creator. It is the spontaneous recognition of the creature's absolute dependence on God, an ungrudging, unhypocritical acknowledgment of the gulf that separates Self-subsistent Being from utterly contingent being, Kierkegaard's "infinite qualitative difference between God and man." It is the bent-knee stance of awed and grateful awareness that existence is a gift of grace, that inscrutable mercy which, having called a person out of nonbeing, sustains him moment by moment from lapsing back into nothingness. Humility, then, is explicated in Abraham's confession that he is "nothing but dust and ashes" (Gen. 18:27). It is explicated again in Paul's sharp reminder to the inflated Corinthians that each person's position before God is necessarily that of a recipient, a beggar whose hands are empty until divine benevolence fills them (1 Cor. 4:6-7).

Within the theistic framework, furthermore, humility is the altogether right reaction of a guilty creature in the presence of his holy Creator. It is the sinner's admission that his irreducible insufficiency as a finite creature has nevertheless been immeasurably diminished by rebellion against his Creator. In the OT it is the cry of the young prophet as he sees the Lord: "Woe to me!...I am ruined! For I am a man of unclean lips" (Isa. 6:5). In the NT it is the apostle's honest self-deprecation as he reflects on his stubborn disobedience to the truth (1 Cor. 15:9; Eph. 3:8; 1 Tim. 1:15). Humility is the logical corollary of sin-consciousness. Despite his dignity, therefore, his inestimable worth as imago dei, man as a finite agent of rebellion is indeed "dust and ashes."

It follows, then, that humility is the essence of OT piety. A frequent theme in the book of Proverbs (Prov. 3:34; 11:2; 15:33; 16:19; 25:7), humility is exemplified by ABRAHAM (Gen. 32:10); preeminently MOSES ("a very humble man, more humble than anyone else on the face of the earth," Num. 12:3); SAUL at the outset of his career (1 Sam. 9:21); and SOLOMON, whose self-knowledge motivated a sincere self-abasement (1 Ki. 3:7). As a foundation of godliness, this virtue is classically expressed in Mic. 6:8, "And what does the LORD require of you? /To act justly and to love mercy/ and to walk humbly with your God." So Rabbi Joshua ben Levi was simply epitomizing the OT when, discussing the comparative merit of various blessings, he insisted: "Humility is the greatest of them all, for it is said, 'The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me, to bring good tidings to the humble' (Isa. 61:1). It is not said 'to the saints,' but 'to the humble,' whence you learn that humility is the greatest of them all" (quoted by M. S. Enslin, The Ethics of Paul [1930], 249).

Humility is likewise the essence of NT piety. How could it be otherwise in view of Christ's own example? As Paul brings out in the greatest of all KENOSIS passages, the Savior "humbled himself," voluntarily abandoning his divine status, surrendering his beatitude and dignity in order to live as a human being on the lowest level of poverty and obscurity, eventually sinking to the bottommost depths of ignominy and agony (Phil. 2:5-8). In self-giving agape is the antithesis and contradiction of all self-seeking eros. Moreover, the character of Jesus exhibited nothing of pride or arrogance. Though unflinchingly courageous and at times scathingly outspoken, he was "gentle and humble in heart" (Matt. 11:29). So his teaching on poverty of spirit had no hypocritical ring to it (Matt. 5:3). Rather than accepting praise, he bore witness to total dependence on his Father as the source of his own wisdom and power; rather than grasping for glory, he ascribed all GLORY to his Father (Jn. 5:19; 6:38; 7:16; 8:28, 50; 14:10, 24). When he stooped to wash the feet of his disciples, Jesus was not indulging in a piece of ostentatious theatrics; instead, he was symbolizing with perfect integrity the whole meaning and message of his ministry. In that act the ground-motif of his person and work broke through, that motif which reached its crescendo on the CROSS.

Consequently, since imitatio Christi is the NT imperative, the life of the faithful disciple must be a life of humility. Concerned to exalt the Savior as the Savior was concerned to exalt his Father, the disciple declares with the Savior's baptizer, "He must become greater; I must become less" (Jn. 3:30). The disciple turns his back on status, security, and success, asking only an opportunity to serve, however inconspicuously (Matt. 23:8, 10; Mk. 10:35-45). Glorifying in nothing but the cross (Gal. 6:14), he struggles to achieve a proper self-evaluation, neither unrealistically deflated or egotistically conceited (Rom. 12:3). He takes seriously the injunction to make the attitude of Jesus his all-controlling life principle whether in relationship to God or to his brother (Rom. 12:10; Jas. 4:10; 1 Pet. 5:5-6). In short, the faithful disciple fights a continual battle against that pride which is the root of sin, that egoism which breeds self-centeredness, self-exaltation, self-will, self-sufficiency, self-confidence, self-righteousness, self-glorying, and hence self-delusion with its ultimate fruit of self-frustration and self-despair (Rom. 10:2). As he keeps on winning the battle against pride and presumption, he matures in that HOLINESS which flourishes only in the soil of humility.

This virtue is susceptible of gross misunderstanding. Let it be said flatly, therefore, that biblical humility is not the inverted conceit which disguises itself as lowliness. It is that attitude which results from a fearlessly honest self-appraisal, a self-appraisal that neither minimizes one's achievements nor exaggerates one's failures. Humility is not the subtle masochism that enjoys its own debasement. It is not that cowardice which protects itself by a groveling Uriah Heep servility. It is not, moreover, a purely privatistic virtue. It is the child of that radical theocentricity which gratefully acknowledges God's sovereign bestowal of gifts and his sovereign enablement in service; thus it eliminates the arrogance that destroys community. Completely devoid of arrogance, humility nevertheless rejoices with Mary in saying, "the Mighty One has done great things for me—and holy is his name" (Lk. 1:49).

AUGUSTINE, therefore, was right. The secret of sanctity is, as he gave it triple emphasis, "Humility! Humility! Humility!" Or in the penetrating words of Kenneth Kirk: "Without humility there can be no service worth the name; patronizing service is self-destructive—it may be the greatest of all disservices. Hence to serve his fellows at all—to avoid doing them harm greater even than the good he proposed to confer on them—a man must find a place for worship in his life...If we would attempt to do good with any sure hope that it will prove good and not evil, we must act from the spirit of humility; worship alone can make us humble" (The Vision of God [1931], 449).

V. C. GROUNDS

humor. Humor may be defined as constituting a facetious turn of mind that issues in jocularity. It involves a perception of the incongruous or comic elements of life, and an ability not merely to appreciate them but to communicate them so that others may perceive the amusing factors also. It is generally less subtle than wit, which is marked by the full expression of the intellect in terms of some minor issue to produce a result that can be incisive, caustic, or merely amusing. Humor is normally more genial, sympathetic, and pleasant than wit, for since the latter is primarily an intellectual exercise, it is frequently of a keen, cold, analytical character, and lacks the saving grace of being able to laugh at itself. See LAUGHTER. Humor and wit are alike, however, in being frequently associated with such moral values as truth and virtue. Humor is one of the principal antidotes to personal pride.

I. The English term. The origin of the word is in the Latin umor (also humor), which in a general sense meant "moisture" or "vapor." In medieval physiology, the word was used of the four cardinal fluids (blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile), whose relative proportions in the body were thought to determine the physical and mental qualities, as well as the disposition, of the individual concerned. Black bile (black choler) produced melancholy, whereas yellow bile resulted in a brighter disposition. In the sense of caprice or whim, the term humor was commonly found in 16th-cent. writings, though from the next century the meaning was broadened to include both the quality of action, speech, or writing that excited amusement and the faculty of perceiving and conveying what was ludicrous or comical. In its most developed form, the word was applied to the jocular treatment of a topic, whether in oral or written form.

II. Eastern humor. As in so many other areas of life, the Eastern attitude toward a matter such as humor is quite different from that of Western countries. Judging from the literature, life in the ANE seems to have been a depressingly insecure affair, and if ever circumstances produced anything parallel to the modern occidental situation-comedy, it was not given prominence in written records. Yet such things are bound to have happened periodically, and to have produced a purely comic, if perhaps rather unintentional result. One of the oldest jokes known to man is thought to have originated in MESOPOTAMIA before the prosperous third dynasty of UR OF THE CHALDEES (c. 2150-2050 B.C.), and perpetuated in something approaching the following conversation: “Who was that lady I saw you out with last night?” “That was no lady, that was my wife.” In general, the conditions of ancient life seldom admitted of sheer gaiety, and much of the laughter doubtless occurred under the influence of alcohol, when indelicate subjects and allusions would provoke raucous amusement.

In his days of prosperity, JOB may have been a buoyant, cheerful individual (Job 29:24), but aside from the joy of childbirth (Gen. 21:6) and the merry laughter of children at play, scorn and derision seem to have been widely conveyed in laughter (Job 22:19; Pss. 22:7; 52:6 et al.). Thus when God was spoken of as laughing, it invariably involved ridicule (Pss. 37:13; 59:8 et al.).

Because there was nothing of the Western self-consciousness evident in the Eastern male-female relationship, jokes about sex had little place in oriental humor, though indelicate comments on sexual functions would inevitably occur in conversation periodically. In general, the Hebrews had a curious modesty about sex, sometimes referring to the male genitalia by such euphemisms as “hands” or “feet.” For people in the ANE, sex was meant to be indulged in, and precisely the same held true of religion. To the superstitious Mesopotamians, there could be no thought whatever of humor being associated with religion, and this stands in forcible contrast to the modern Western attitude as represented in a cartoon that showed two angels, one of which was saying to the other, “I don’t mind being ignored so much; it’s the awful stories they tell about us that I dislike.” Because humor and wit have been linked in Western thought with certain absolute values, it is inevitable that such religious matters as God, the saints, heaven, and hell should be mentioned in a jocular context. For the orientals, however, and not least the Hebrews, religious beliefs, customs, duties, and the like simply did not admit of anything but the most sober of interpretations.

III. Humor in the OT and Apocrypha. Oriental humor seems to come most properly into the category of wit, since there is usually a degree of intellectual subtlety present in the situation. Probably the most common literary form conveying wit is paronomasia, or wordplay, which was a favored device of poets (see HEBREW POETRY), though not exclusively so. According to one estimate there are more than 500 wordplays in the OT, and obviously only a few examples can be given.

The force of paronomasia lies in the seriousness with which ANE peoples normally treated words. Thus in Gen. 2:7, man (ʾādām) was formed from the ground (ʾādāmā), a pun on his earthy nature, whereas in 2:23 the name “woman” (ʾiššā) was given to the creature taken out of man (ʾîš). In 3:20 is a play on the name of Eve (ḥawwā), the mother of all living (ḥāy). The Tower of Babel (bābel) narrative related the name to the babble (bālal) occasioned by the confusion of tongues (11:9), and similar puns on names occurred in the patriarchal narratives. Thus Abram and ABRAHAM were based on “father” (ʾāb); ESAU suggests “hairy” (25:25); EDM is similar to the word “red”

(25:30); MANASSEH may indicate “forgetfulness” (41:51); and EPHRAIM may be a play on the verb “to be fruitful” (41:52).

The narratives of SARAH have comic aspects also, as, for example, in the embarrassment of her being caught eavesdropping (Gen. 18:10) and subsequently experiencing geriatric conception, which must have produced knowing grins, and perhaps even snide remarks about virility. The son of Sarah was given a name that would remind her of her premature laughter (18:12), and if ISAAC (“laughter”) could be dubbed by the modern slang name of “Joker,” the laugh was clearly upon Sarah in the end. However, if Isaac was a delicate, hypertonic infant, as is often the case with children born to elderly parents, the experience of rearing him even to the point of weaning would be far from amusing.

The pun was most forcefully developed by the PROPHETS, who used it with deadly effect to proclaim the destiny of a disobedient Israel. Thus AMOS spoke of GILGAL going into exile (gālā, Amos 5:5), and an eschatological note was struck in the play on “summer fruit” (qayis) and “the end” (qēs), where the literary figure was sharpened even more by the thought of the fruit being overripe (8:2). HOSEA also used paronomasia effectively to show that the “standing grain” (qāmā) would actually yield no “fruit” (qemaḥ, Hos. 8:7). The highly literary style of ISAIAH lent itself admirably to wordplay, as in Isa. 5:7, where we read that the Lord looked for judgment (mišpāt) but found bloodshed (mišpāḥ), and for righteousness (ṣedāqā) but discovered only a cry (ṣē‘aqā). Again, Isaiah (34:14) spoke of wild beasts (ṣiyyîm) meeting hyenas (‘iyyîm), and of a wife bereft (#259; zûbâ) and grieved (‘āsûbat, Isa. 54:6). A stern note was sounded by JEREMIAH: “Be appalled [šommû], O heavens [šāmayim]” (Jer. 2:12), while pathos was the basis of the plea, “Return [šûbû], faithless [šôbābîm] sons, I will heal your infidelity [mēšûbôt]” (3:22). Because of the similarity between some forms of the Hebrew verbs for “to see” and “to fear,” a number of wordplays resulted, such as, “Ash-keelon shall see [tēre’] and fear [tîrā’]” (Zech. 9:5).

From the foregoing it is evident that comparatively few of the puns in the OT accord with the modern understanding of humor, although all of them are undeniably witty. Satire, an applied form of humor that usually has a didactic or moralistic objective, can be seen in the remark in Job 12:2, “Doubtless you are the people, and wisdom will die with you!” which is timeless in its implications. Other OT passages that can be interpreted humorously include the bargaining of Abraham with God (Gen. 18:22-23), the stabbing by EHUD of the portly EGLON (Jdg. 3:15-27), the death of ABIMELECH at the hands of a woman (9:50-54), the sarcastic and satirical ridicule by ELIJAH of the BAAL prophets on Mount Carmel (1 Ki. 18:26-29), the irony of HAMAN being unwittingly the cause of his enemy’s promotion (Esth. 6:1-11), Haman’s retribution in being hanged on his own gallows (5:14—7:10), the scolding wife (Prov. 21:9; 25:24), the mockery of MICAH (Mic. 2:6-7, 11), and the taunts of NAHUM over NINEVEH (Nah. 3:1-19).

Paronomasia in the APOCRYPHA has been largely lost in translation, although in Susanna and the Elders two pungent wordplays related the fate of the lying elders to the names of the trees that they had supplied in giving evidence, as follows: “A mastic tree [Gk. schinon]...God will split [schisei] you” (vv. 54, 55), and “a live oak tree [prinon]...God is waiting to split [kataprisā] you in two” (vv. 58, 59). Other instances of humor are seen in the beguiling of HOLOFERNES by feminine wiles (Jdt. 12-13), the discovery of priestly deception (Bel 19-22), and the bursting open of the great dragon (Bel 23-28).

IV. Humor in the NT. As can be expected, Semitic concepts of wit, as opposed to the more earthy and coarse characteristics of Greek humor, are found periodically in the NT, although as with the Apocrypha they have tended to suffer through being rendered in Greek form. Thus the Aramaic preserved a play on words not found in the Greek or the versions: “you are to give him the name Jesus [yēhōshūaʿ], because he will save [yāšāʿ] his people from their sins” (Matt. 1:21). Certain witty forms, however, are reflected by the Greek, as with a humorous pun that can perhaps be rendered:

Greek comic actor depicted on a flask (c. 150 B.C.).

“They dispose [aphanizousin] their appearance so as to put on a pose [phanōsin] of fasting in public” (6:16). A more familiar wordplay (16:18) involved PETER (Petros) and rock (petra). The name Christ (“the Anointed”) was reflected (2 Cor. 1:21) in the verb chrisas (“has commissioned”). What was obviously intended as a genuinely humorous remark, and one which is the only example in the NT of the “little woman” joke, was the mention by Christ of the man who had “married a wife” and therefore could not go to the feast when invited (Lk. 14:20). This comment, when accompanied by a smile, must have brought a touch of comic relief to an otherwise deeply serious situation.

Other examples of NT passages with humorous implications include the ridiculous contrast between the speck and the beam (Matt. 7:3-5), the way in which Christ outwitted the PHARISEES in the matter of paying taxes to CAESAR (Mk. 12:13-17), and the SADDUCEES on the question of a much-married woman and her husbands in the resurrection (12:18-27), the ludicrous procedure of straining out a small insect from wine and swallowing a camel (Matt. 23:24), and double entendre in Paul’s remark that “it is better to marry than to burn” (1 Cor. 7:9 KJV), in which he may have been quoting a popular proverb. As opposed to modern custom, the mother-in-law was treated with respect and kindness (cf. Mk. 1:30-31), and was never the subject of humor in the Bible.

Humtah huhm’tuh (חֻמְטָה H2794, “[place of] lizard”). A town in the hill country within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:54). It was apparently near HEBRON, but its precise location is unknown.

Hundred, Tower of the (מִגְדַּל הַמֵּאוֹת). The name of a tower on the N wall of the city of JERUSALEM, located between the Tower of HANANEL and the SHEEP GATE; it was restored by Eliashib the high priest and his fellow priests (Neh. 3:1; 12:39; KJV, “tower of Meah”). Both the Tower of the Hundred and the Tower of Hananel protected the NW approach to the TEMPLE area (see M. Avi-yonah in IEJ 4 [1954]:241-42).

hunger. This word and the term FAMINE are both used by KJV and modern translations to represent the Hebrew word rā'āb H8280, which may refer not only to an individual's hunger but also to acute and general lack of food (similarly Gk. limos G3350). It is not always clear in a given context which is meant. In a few passages individual hunger is meant (e.g. Deut. 28:48; Jer. 38:9), but the great majority of the uses of the word refer to famine. The cognate Hebrew verb rā'ēb H8279, "to be hungry," is more often used of the individual (Prov. 19:15; cf. Gk. peinaō G4277, Matt. 5:6 et al.), but it also can be used to mean "to experience famine" (Gen. 41:55).

F. W. BUSH

hunting. The quest for animals as a source of food, or in order to check marauding, or for sport. There are few references to hunting in the OT, and no direct allusions in the NT. Hunting for food is most common among rural or nomadic peoples except for those who participate in it as a sport. The description "hunter" (Heb. ṣayid H7473) is applied to NIMROD, the founder of BABEL and other cities of the Mesopotamian valley (Gen. 10:9). Evidently the word implies his warlike qualities and his feats as a conqueror. ESAU, also called a hunter (25:27), was commissioned by his father ISAAC to find wild game for him (verb ṣûd H7421, Gen. 27:3); and ISHMAEL, who grew up in the wilderness, became an ARCHER (21:20), adept with the use of the bow and arrow.

Occasional allusions to the killing of wild animals occur in the OT, but they seem to refer mostly to the defense of sheep or cattle against predators, such as the episode of SAMSON and the lion (Jdg.

In this panel from a palace in Nineveh (c. 640 B.C.), Assyrian hunters deploy nets across the path of running deer.

14:56), or DAVID'S adventures with a lion and bear (1 Sam. 17:34-36), or BENAIHAH'S encounter with a lion in a pit (2 Sam. 23:20). Wild animals as well as domesticated cattle are mentioned in the dietary laws, which implies that the Jewish people ate them, and must have been dependent on hunters to supply their needs (Lev. 17:13; Deut. 14:5; 1 Sam. 26:20).

Weapons for hunting included the bow and arrow (Gen. 27:3), nets for birds and fish (Prov. 1:17; Eccl. 9:12), traps (Amos 3:5), and pits into which animals would fall (Ps. 35:17; Ezek. 19:1-4). These terms are frequently used metaphorically. The Israelites were a settled pastoral people rather than nomads who lived by hunting and plundering; consequently the language that they used reflected only the occasional use of weapons. Allusions to the phenomena of hunting are largely figurative. Among other nations of the time, such as the Egyptians and Assyrians, hunting was regarded as a pastime, and was probably a favorite royal sport. The monuments bear ample witness to the practice of hunting in these countries.

M. C. TENNEY

Hupham hyoo' fuhm (חופם H2573, derivation uncertain; gentilic חופמי H2574, "Huphamite"). Son of BENJAMIN, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Huphamite clan; the name occurs only in a census list (Num. 26:39). He is probably to be identified with HUPPIM (Gen. 46:21; 1 Chr. 7:12). See also NOHAH.

Huppah hup'uh (חפה H2904, possibly "shelter"). The leader of a priestly family whom DAVID appointed by lot as the head of the thirteenth division for duties in the sanctuary (1 Chr. 24:13).

Huppim hup'im (חפים H2907, derivation uncertain). Son or descendant of BENJAMIN (Gen. 46:21), usually identified with HUPHAM (Num. 26:39). Elsewhere (1 Chr. 7:12) he is called a son or descendant of Ir (presumably the same as Iri, apparently a grandson of Benjamin, v. 7), but some understand this occurrence as a gentilic, "Huppites" (cf. NIV in vv. 12 and 15, though in the latter passage many scholars suspect textual corruption and delete lēḥuppîm ûlěšsuppîm). See also MUPPIM and SHEPHUPHAM.

Huppite hup'it. See HUPPIM.

Hur huhr (חור H2581, possibly "son," but derivation disputed). (1) A prominent Israelite who aided AARON in holding aloft the hands of MOSES at REPHIDIM so that the Israelites could win over the Amalekites (Exod. 17:10-13). He also assisted in the ruling of the tribes during Moses' absence on Mount Sinai (24:14).

(2) Son of CALEB (the son of Hezron), but primarily identified as the grandfather of BEZALEL (one of the craftsmen who built the TABERNACLE, Exod. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22 1 Chr. 2:19-20, 50; 2 Chr. 1:5). He is also called a "son" (that is, descendant) of JUDAH and "father" (i.e., founder) of BETHLEHEM (1 Chr. 4:1, 4). Jewish tradition makes him the husband of MIRIAM (cf. Jos. Ant. 3.2.4 §54); additional rabbinic traditions make this man Miriam's son.

(3) A king of MIDIAN in alliance with SIHON the AMORITE; Hur and four other Midianite rulers, along with BALAAM, were defeated and put to death by the Israelites (Num. 31:1-8; Josh. 13:21). Some associate his name with the NABATEAN town of Haura<sup>1</sup> (cf. ABD, 3:334).

(4) According to the KJV, the father of one of the twelve district governors who supplied provisions for SOLOMON and the royal household (1 Ki. 4:8). Modern versions, however, do not render the Hebrew as "the son of Hur," but rather understand the name of this officer to be BEN-HUR, who was perhaps a descendant of #2 above.

(5) Father of a certain REPHAIAH who was "ruler of a half-district of Jerusalem" in the time of NEHEMIAH and who repaired a section of the wall (Neh. 3:9). It is possible that "son of Hur" identifies Rephaiah as belonging to a clan descended from #2 above.

W. WHITE, JR.

Hurai hyoor'i (חורִי H2584). See HIDDAL.

Huram hyoor'uhm (חורם H2586, “my brother is lifted up”; see HIRAM). (1) Son of Bela and grandson of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:5).

(2) A king of TYRE, allied with DAVID and SOLOMON. See HIRAM #1.

(3) A skilled craftsman from Tyre employed by Solomon to build his palace and the temple. See HIRAM #2.

Huram-Abi hyoor'uhm-ay'bi (חורם אבי H2587). See HIRAM #2.

Huri hyoor'i (חורי H2585, possibly “son,” but derivation disputed). Son of Jaroah and descendant of GAD (1 Chr. 5:14).

Hurrians hoor'ee-uhnz. A non-Semitic people group that figured prominently in the ANE during the 2nd millennium B.C. Although the name HORITE is sometimes associated with them, the Hurrians are probably not referred to in the Bible.

I. Origin and geographic distribution. Groups either designating themselves as Hurrians (cuneiform Hurri) or writing a language linked elsewhere with them, have been identified all over the ANE from ancient NUZI (E of the TIGRIS River) to Hattusha (Khattusha, in central ASIA MINOR), but also to PALESTINE and even Lower (i.e., northern) EGYPT. In the HITTITE texts from ancient Hattusha, the term for the people of Huri was Hurlas. The term for the language that they spoke and wrote, of which many samples were found at Hattusha, was hurlili. In Akkadian sources, whether from Nuzi, MARI, Hattusha, ALALAKH, UGARIT, or Egypt (TELL EL-AMARNA), the people and their language were termed Hurri. At Ugarit, the native (W Semitic) term must also have been pronounced hurri (although we have only the consonantal writing hry). The Egyptians called the land of Palestine hurri/u, but spelled it in consonants, hr. In the Mitanni Letter found at Tell el-Amarna, the native Hurrian term was hurw-ohe or hurr-ohe. In the OT, the corresponding term is hōrî H3037, “Horite” (LXX Chorraioi), but it is apparently applied to a different ethnic group.

The language of the Hurrians, which is still only partially understood, seems related to only one other known language—Urartian, in which the kings of Urartu around Lake Van composed inscriptions during the first half of the 1st millennium B.C. (c. 900-600 B.C.). It is believed by some that both Hurrian and Urartian belong to languages of the Caucasus (ancient ARMENIA). Although Hurrian shares some structural features with members of the Caucasian family's modern representatives, no convincing case for relationship between the two has been made.

II. History. Hurrians appeared in the ANE as early as the middle of the 3rd millennium B.C. They occupied the great half-circle of the Taurus Mountains from Urkish, N of CARCHEMISH, to the country of Namar, around Lake Van, and perhaps as far S as the Upper Zab River. Hurrian kings (at least kings whose names appear to be of a Hurrian type) reigned in ASSYRIA c. 2200-2000 B.C. The so-called Assyrian King List found at Khorsabad includes the names Tudia, Ushpia, Sulili, and Kik-kia, which are neither Semitic nor Hurrian.

During the reign of the Hittite king Hattushili I (c. 1700 B.C.), Hurrians appeared along the Upper EUPHRATES to the E of the Hittite heartland and carried out occasional raids to the W to harass the Hittites. When Hattushili's successor, Murshili I (c. 1595), led his armies through Syria to sack Babylon, he recorded military encounters with Hurrians. But it was during the following few centuries (c. 1600-1400) that the great Hurrian buildup in SYRIA transpired. Hurrians dominated, if not actually ruled, the kingdom of Kizzuwatna (CILICIA), as well as the kingdom of Alalakh to the S. Indeed, the new dynasty of the Hittites, of which Suppiluliuma I is the most illustrious representative, seems to have been of Hurrian extraction. It is from c. 1400 that the great influx of Hurrian deities and Hurrian myths in the Hittite corpus is dated.

The Hurrians.

The greatest political achievement of the Hurrians was the kingdom of Mitanni, whose capital was Washukkanni in the Middle Euphrates Valley. At its height (c. 1400 B.C.), Mitanni dominated Kizzuwatna and N Syria on the W, Assyria in the central region, and Nuzi in the E. During this period (c. 1500-1400), Mitanni was ruled by kings who bore Indo-Aryan (i.e., not Hurrian) names: Shutarna, Parsashatar, Shaushshatar, Artatama, and Tushratta. They carried on royal correspondence and international trade with the pharaohs of the 18th dynasty of Egypt as equals. Several Mitannian princesses became wives of the pharaohs. It is through the royal correspondence between Tushratta of Mitanni and Amenophis III of Egypt that we possess in the El-Amarna archive the famous Mitanni Letter, still the primary source for the Hurrian language. King Suppiluliuma I of Hatti put an end to the kingdom of Mitanni c. 1380. But the principal contribution of the Hurrians was not in their organized political authority; it was the cultural infusion that they brought into Hittite, Babylonian, Ugaritic, and Hebrew societies that left its permanent mark.

III. Hurrians and Hurrian culture in the OT. The degree of Hurrian cultural influence on the peoples of southern and central Palestine was far less than that in Syria and northern Mesopotamia and Asia Minor. Since ABRAHAM emigrated into Palestine from the E via the HARAN region in Upper Mesopotamia, he brought with him many customs acquired while he lived in that city. Many hitherto obscure aspects of the patriarchal narratives, chiefly having to do with legal customs, have been remarkably clarified by the tablets from Nuzi, a Hurrian settlement in northern Iraq, E of the Tigris.

The presence in Palestine proper of Hurrians can be shown by Hurrian names. The El-Amarna tablets indicate that the Jebusite ruler of Jerusalem (see JEBUS) bore a name that means “servant of (the goddess) Hepa.” Hepa is a shortened form of the name Hapat, or Hebat, the name of the leading goddess in the Hurrian pantheon, the consort of the god Teshub. A Jebusite successor to “Servant of Hepa” is the individual from whom DAVID purchased the site for the future temple of Yahweh (2 Sam. 24:18-25; cf. 1 Chr. 21:18-30). English versions call this king either ARAUNAH or Ornan. The Hebrew consonantal text renders it either <sup>ʾ</sup>wrnh (with definite article, 2 Sam. 24:16; the Qere is <sup>ʾ</sup>rwnh) or <sup>ʾ</sup>rnn (1 Chr. 21:18). The correct form is the first one, for the name (or perhaps title) is Hurrian, and the meaning is supplied by a recently recovered dictionary tablet from Ugarit, which equates Hurrian ewri with Akkadian bēlu (“lord”), and ewir-ne with šarru (“king”). Hurrian ewir-ne is clearly the origin of the Jebusite (king) <sup>ʾ</sup>wrnh.

Clay tablets found in TAANACH and SHECHEM in central Palestine also contain Hurrian personal names. In the OT, several groups that appear to be Hurrian bear the names Jebusite, Horite, and even HIVITE (note that in Gen. 34:2 and Josh. 9:7, the LXX has “Horite” for MT “Hivite,” possibly reflecting scribal confusion between r and w). It is possible that HAMOR the Hivite, who is connected with the town of Shechem, was a Hurrian. Other Hivite centers were at GIBEON (Josh. 3-7; 11:19), and in the LEBANON (Jdg. 3:3) and HERMON (Josh. 11:3) mountains.

husband. The MARRIAGE relation imposed upon the husband certain obligations and conferred upon him certain rights more generally described in the Scripture but rather minutely regulated in the rabbinical law. The modern Jews, in all the civilized countries of the world, are more mindful of and govern themselves much more, if not entirely, by the laws of the countries whose citizens they are.

I. The husband’s duties. The OT and the Mosaic law in particular do not contain express provisions concerning marital rights and responsibilities, except the injunction not to deprive a wife of “her food, clothing and marital rights” (Exod. 21:10). It is upon this casual intimation that the elaborate regulations of the rabbinical code are based. The responsibilities of the husband can be included largely under the following headings: (1) He is to provide his wife with the necessities of life, such as food, clothing, and dwelling; the extent of this responsibility depended upon his fortune and situation in life, and also upon the local customs. (2) He is to have conjugal cohabitation with his wife; a continued refusal, on either side, regarding this duty was not excused by sickness and circumstances and offered sufficient grounds for divorce. (3) He is to provide proper medical care and nursing when the wife is sick. (4) He is to protect his wife and to ransom her in the eventuality of her falling into captivity; the frequent invasion of BEDOUINS in the Near Eastern countries and the continued wars in Europe during the Middle Ages made the provision for such an eventuality quite necessary. (5) He is to provide for her burial in case of her death; this duty included also that of providing for her a tombstone and the covering of expenses for funeral solemnities according to his and her station in society.

II. The husband's rights. The husband's rights according to the Jewish law were as follows: (1) He was entitled to whatever the wife earned by her labor and industry; his right to her earnings was based on the consideration of his obligation to support her. (2) He was entitled to whatever she gained by chance, inheritance, donation, legacy, or in any other way. (3) He was entitled to the usufruct of all the property she brought into marriage at the time of their marriage. (4) He was entitled to become her sole heir on her death. (Cf. L. A. Lambert, Thesaurus biblicus [1880], 386-89; M. Mielzinger, The Jewish Law of Marriage and Divorce [1901], 100-102. For additional bibliography see MARRIAGE.)

husbandman. This English word is used by the KJV to render several terms, including Hebrew ’ikkār H438, “plowman” (e.g., Jer. 51:23 [NIV, “farmer”]) and Greek geōrgos G1177, “agricultural worker” (e.g., Lk. 20:9 [NIV, “farmers”]; Jn. 15:1 [NIV, “gardener”]). See also AGRICULTURE; FARMER; TRADE.

Hushah hoosh’uh (חֹשֶׁה׳ H2592, perhaps “haste”; gentilic חֹשֶׁתִי H3144, “Hushathite”). Son of Ezer and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:4). However, the word “father” in that verse probably means “founder” or “ruler,” in which case Hushah was a Judean town, perhaps the same as modern Ḥusan (c. 4.5 mi. W of BETHLEHEM). The term Hushathite (that is, an inhabitant of Hushah or someone belonging to a clan that bore that name) is applied to a warrior named SIBBECAI (2 Sam. 21:18; 1 Chr. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11; apparently the same as Mebunnai in 2 Sam. 23:27).

Hushai hoosh’i (חֹשֶׁי׳ H2593, possibly short form of חֹשְׁבִיָּה׳ H3116, “Yahweh has taken account” [see HASHABIAH]). (1) An ARKITE, from the territory W of BETHEL (Josh. 16:1-2), who was DAVID’S adviser and “friend” (1 Chr. 27:33). When ABSALOM rebelled, Hushai came out to join the fleeing king, but David asked him to return to Jerusalem and to pretend to favor Absalom, in order that he might defeat the counsel of AHITHOPHEL, David’s former counselor, who had gone over to Absalom (2 Sam. 15:32-37). Ahithophel and Hushai both advised Absalom how to defeat David (16:15—17:4), but Absalom adopted Hushai's advice. Hushai then sent word to David to escape across the Jordan (17:15-22). When Ahithophel found that his advice was not taken, he hanged himself (17:23).

(2) Father of BAANA; the latter was one of the twelve officers commissioned to supply provisions for King SOLOMON'S court (1 Ki. 4:16). Some have thought that this Hushai is the same as #1 above, but it seems improbable that the son of an Arkite (i.e., someone with roots in the tribe of BENJAMIN) would have been placed in charge of a town in ASHER.

Husham hoosh'uhm (חֹשָׁם H2595 [in Gen. 36:34-35, חֹשָׁם], possibly "big-nosed"). A royal figure from TEMAN (some say TEMA) who succeeded Jobab as king of EDOM (Gen. 36:34-35; 1 Chr. 1:45-46). He lived "before any Israelite king reigned" (Gen. 36:31).

Hushathite hoosh'uh-thīt. See HUSHAH.

Hushim hoosh'im (חֻשִּׁים H3123 [Gen. 46:23], חֻשִּׁים H3131 [1 Chr. 7:12], חֻשִּׁים H2594 [1 Chr. 8:8, 11], derivation unknown). (1) Son (Heb., "sons") of DAN and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:23). He is elsewhere called SHUHAM (Num. 26:42), and the relationship between the two names is unclear.

(2) Son (Heb., "sons") of Aher and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:12; NRSV). However, the NIV takes this name as a true plural and renders, "the Hushites." Some scholars emend the genealogy and propose that the reference here is to the same person(s) as in #1 above.

(3) One of the wives of SHAHARAIM, a Benjamite; she bore him two children (1 Chr. 8:8, 11).

Hushite hoosh'it. See HUSHIM #2.

husk. This English word is used by the KJV to render two Hebrew terms of uncertain meaning (zāg H2293, perhaps "skin [of grape]," Num. 6:4; ṣiqḷōnō, perhaps "in his sack," 2 Ki. 4:42 NRSV [apparently untranslated in NIV]). It is also used by the KJV in the NT to render Greek keration G3044, referring to the food, usually fed to animals, which the prodigal son in his hunger would willingly have eaten (Lk. 15:16; see POD).

Huz huhz. KJV form of Uz.

Huzzab huh'zuhb. According to the KJV, Huzzab is the name of a city that was to be taken captive (Nah. 2:7 [Heb. 2:8]). The Hebrew word in question, however, is huṣṣab, which can be easily understood as a hophal perfect of the verb nāṣab H5893, hiphil, "to set up, establish" (thus NIV and NRSV, "It is decreed"). Such a verb, however, fits the context with extreme difficulty and leaves the sentence without a subject (the verbs in v. 7 are fem. and there is no fem. noun in the context that can function as the subject; the words "gates" and "palace" in v. 6 are masc.). R. D. Patterson (Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah [1991], 69-70) understands it as a verb meaning "dissolved" but links it with the end of the previous verse, "the palace collapses and crumbles."

If the word is taken as a noun, its meaning can only be guessed at. Various suggestions have been made, most of them connecting the word by various etymologies either with the Assyrian "queen" (cf. Targum) or the city of Nineveh (cf. RSV, "its [i.e., Nineveh's] mistress"). Others have suggested an Assyrian proper name, perhaps that of the queen, but without evidence. The text may be corrupt.

hyacinth. See JACINTH.

Hydaspes hi-das'peeZ (Ἰδασπης). A river mentioned only in the book of JUDITH along with the EUPHRATES and the TIGRIS (Jdt. 1:6). The context mentions also the king of the Elimeans; see ELAM (COUNTRY). If a river Hydaspes did exist in that general area, it must have been located in a region of the Tigris and Euphrates near the Persian Gulf (one possibility is the Karkheh River, known as Choaspes in ancient times). However, the name Hydaspes is used by Greek writers with reference to a tributary of the Indus, and the author may simply be alluding to some vague and distant geographical area for dramatic purposes.

hyena. A scavenging carnivore larger than a wolf, common in Africa and Asia. The rendering “hyena” is used by the NIV and the NRSV for Hebrew <sup>h</sup>H363 (Isa. 13:22; 34:14; Jer. 50:39), by the NRSV for <sup>š</sup>ābūa<sup>l</sup> H7380 (only Jer. 12:9, but cf. the place name <sup>š</sup>ēbō'im H7391, ZEBOIM, 1 Sam. 13:18; Neh. 11:34), and by others for <sup>š</sup>i H7470 (Isa. 13:21 et al.; NIV, “desert creature”).

Whether or not the hyena can be properly identified in the OT, this animal was in biblical times a common member of the Palestine FAUNA; it is still found in less populated areas, though much rarer than it once was. The striped hyena (Hyaena striata) ranges from India through SW Asia to N and E Africa; it is about forty inches long, with a very powerful head and forequarters and rather sloping back. It is largely a nocturnal scavenger, though where there is plenty of game it is now known to do more actual hunting than was thought possible. In some countries it was the custom to encourage hyenas to remove refuse from compounds and villages, and even human bodies were left exposed, with no trace being left in the morning. Hyenas must have been known to the Israelites to whom their habits would make them unspeakably unclean, but in a land peopled by a nation having a hygienic code far in advance of its times, hyenas would have found fewer pickings than in the countries around. (See E. P. Walker, Mammals of the World, 3 vols. [1964], 2:1263-67; FFB, 45-46.)

G. S. CANSDALE

Hyksos hik'sohs (Ἰκσώς or Ἰκουσσώς from Egyptian ḥk'w-ḥ'swt, “rulers of foreign lands”). Term used by the Egyptian historian Manetho (3rd cent. B.C., quoted in Jos. Ag. Ap. 1.14 §82) for the foreign rulers of the 15th and 16th dynasties in EGYPT, but wrongly interpreted by him as “shepherd kings,” confusing shoshu (“bedouin”) with shosu, the late pronunciation of khosu (“foreign lands”). Corresponding to the six kings of Manetho's 15th dynasty, the Turin Canon of Kings Hyksos gold jewelry from Tell el-Ajjul (prob. ancient Sharuhen) dating to the 17th cent. B.C.

(13th cent. B.C.) has a damaged total: “6 [Hyk]sos who reigned 10[8] years.” The final expulsion of the Hyksos perhaps did not precede the eleventh year of Ahmose I (c. 1540; see C. F. Nims, Thebes of the Pharaoh: Pattern for Every City [1965], 199 n. 2), and Apophis was contemporary of Ahmose’s predecessor Kamose. The 108 years of the main Hyksos 15th dynasty may be reckoned at c. 1648-1540; the “16th dynasty” consisted of petty local princelings subordinate to the main Hyksos rulers.

The origins and rise to power of the Hyksos are much discussed. The JOSEPHUS version of Manetho with its sweeping invasion may be less realistic than the picture of an internal coup d’état in the E NILE delta and MEMPHIS presented in the other views. Such a coup would have supplanted in Memphis (and Ithet-Tawy, its administrative suburb) the ruling 13th dynasty for the mastery of Egypt. The ousted dynasty found refuge in THEBES, perhaps as vassal of the Hyksos kings. Monuments of the latter are very few; only Khayan and Apophis have left statues and building fragments; other princes are known only from scarab amulets. (On Hyksos fortifications, see BETH EGLAIM.)

The career of JOSEPH may have fallen into the late 13th dynasty and early Hyksos period. Apparently, the Hyksos dynasty largely took over the existing Egyptian administrative machine. Its rulers adopted pharaonic style, including the title “Son of Re”; Hatshepsut’s later remark that they ruled without RE reflects on their legitimacy in her eyes, not any hostility of theirs for Re. Scarabs indicate that foreigners duly attained to administrative posts, such as did the chancellor Hur (cf. Joseph). The surviving names of Hyksos rulers are usually W Semitic when not assimilated to Egyptian, such as Khayan, <sup>1</sup>Anat-har, etc. (according to Manetho, the Hyksos came from Phoenicia). Hurrian and Indo-Aryan elements were unimportant, even if present at all. Before the Hyksos’ takeover, Semitic kings had already occasionally ruled Egypt in the 13th dynasty.

Hymenaeus hi'muh-nee'uhs (Ἠμέναιος, "pertaining to Hymen," the god of marriage [see DDD, 820-22]). A heretical teacher at EPHESUS who opposed PAUL, mentioned with ALEXANDER (1 Tim. 1:20) and with PHILETUS (2 Tim. 2:17). The same man is doubtless in view in both passages. That he is mentioned first in both places implies that he was the leader among these false teachers.

Hymenaeus and Alexander were among those who, rejecting conscience, had made shipwreck of their faith (1 Tim. 1:20). Paul's delivery of them to SATAN has been much discussed (cf. 1 Cor. 5:5). Some take the meaning to be simply EXCOMMUNICATION from the church, thereby placing them back into the world, the sphere of SATAN. Others think it rather signifies supernaturally inflicted bodily punishment. A combination of both views may be involved. That more than excommunication is meant seems clear (Job 2:6, 7; 1 Cor. 11:30; Rev. 2:22) when compared with cases of apostolic DISCIPLINE (Acts 5:1-11; 13:11). The discipline, whatever its precise nature, was remedial in its intention, "to be taught not to blaspheme," that is, that they may cease their railing against the true gospel.

The discipline had not produced the desired repentance in Hymenaeus when 2 Tim. 2:17-18 was written. The doctrinal error of Hymenaeus and Philetus, destructively spreading like gangrene, was their denial of an eschatological resurrection. They allegorized the RESURRECTION by insisting that it was a past spiritual experience, having occurred when they were raised from ignorance and sin as they came to know the true God. When they believed that the resurrection took place in the lives of believers is not indicated, perhaps at baptism. They probably based their teaching on a misinterpretation of Rom. 6:1-11 and Col. 3:1. It was motivated by incipient GNOSTICISM, which held that matter was evil and that consequently salvation consisted in liberation from the body. The teaching of a future bodily resurrection was deemed illogical and inconceivable (cf. 1 Cor. 15:12). That Hymenaeus taught that the resurrection takes place in one's children is unlikely (cf. Acts of Paul and Thecla 2.14; Sir. 30:4). The development of this heretical teaching in the Ephesian church was a fulfillment of the warning Paul had given the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:29-30).

Hymn of the Three Young Men. See AZARIAH, PRAYER OF.

hypocrisy. In the NT, the Greek word hypokrisis G5694 (with its cognates) is applied to human conduct that was externally religious but insincerely motivated, that is, the simulation of goodness.

I. Classical Greek. In the classical authors, the term had no evil connotation. The cognate verb (hypokrinomai G5693) could mean simply "to answer." The interpretation of dreams, the oratorical ability of a Demosthenes, the public recitation of poetry, and acting in a play could all be designated with this word. It was, however, especially the part of an actor in a Greek drama represented by this term that influenced its subsequent development. This background in Greek drama and theater was totally unparalleled in the thought and the culture of the Hebrew people. Because of this absence of correspondence of thought and situation, the RSV eliminated both “hypocrisy” and “hypocrite” from its translation of the OT (but cf. NRSV and NIV at Ps. 26:4) even though the KJV employed both.

II. Septuagint. By the time the OT was translated into Greek, the word had taken on negative connotations. Later, in Aquila’s famous revision of the SEPTUAGINT, the term became equivalent to “impiety” or “lawlessness.” The Epistle of Barnabas shows where the development revealed in the LXX eventually took this word. In the description of two ways of life it was noted, “you must not join yourself with those who walk in the way of death; you must hate everything not pleasing to God; you must hate all hypokrisis, and you must not abandon the commands of the Lord” (Barn. 19.2). In English, the word came to signify active evil: the Hebrew term frequently translated by the KJV with “hypocrite” is ḥānēp H2868, “godless” (Job 8:13 et al.).

III. The NT. No sin was so sternly denounced by Jesus as that of hypocrisy. The PHARISEES were guilty at this point, and Jesus both summed up the case against them and warned his disciples against such conduct by the use of this term: “Be on your guard against the yeast of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy” (Lk. 12:1). Jesus did not charge all Pharisees with hypocrisy, nor did he mean that all hypocrites were Pharisees. He did indicate with these words that Pharisees were especially prone to hypocrisy; it was the natural consequence of their teaching. Some of them were play actors of the first order: they had sacrificed truth to appearance and were concerned more about reputation than they were about reality. They lost sight of reality in their deception of others to such a degree that they deceived themselves. God, however, was not deceived; he knew what was only pretense, which would be exposed in his judgment. Jesus consistently called for REPENTANCE from the Pharisees. Repentance requires facing the truth, the very thing hypocrites find difficult to do.

The most graphic representation of hypocrisy was Jesus’ description of the Pharisees as “whitewashed tombs, which look beautiful on the outside but on the inside are full of dead men’s bones and everything unclean. In the same way, on the outside you appear to people as righteous but on the inside you are full of hypocrisy and wickedness” (Matt. 23:27-28). Some Pharisees were intensely religious in their outward actions, but inside their hearts were full of sin and wickedness. Their true motives were concealed under a cloak of pretense.

The topic comes up also in the Epistles. Hypocrites are denounced because they seduce believers from the way of God in the name of religion. They persuade others to listen to them rather than to God (1 Tim. 4:2; 1 Pet. 2:1). PAUL in GALATIANS charges PETER, BARNABAS, and other Jewish Christians with dissimulation because they ate with Gentile Christians at ANTIOCH OF SYRIA, but only until the JUDAIZERS came; then they refused to do so under the pressure of those strict traditionalists (Gal. 2:11-21). In this context the term “hypocrisy” need not be taken as indicating evil motives; rather, it reflects the broader sense of “play-acting.”

Hypostasis of the Archons. A Jewish-Gnostic document preserved in the NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY (NHC II, 4). While the Coptic codex itself is dated to the 4th cent., the original Greek was likely composed in Egypt a century earlier. The work, which has affinities with various “Sethian” texts from Nag Hammadi, may be described as a mythological narrative based on Gen. 1-6, offering esoteric knowledge to Christians. (English trans, in NHL, 161-69.)

Hypsiphronē. The last tractate in the NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY (NHC XI, 4). It purports to record certain visions revealed to Hypsiphronē (“High-minded Woman”), and includes a first-person description of her descent into the world. Since only a few fragmentary paragraphs are preserved, it is difficult to form a good understanding of the document. (English trans, in NHL, 501-2.)

Hyrchanus hihr-kay’nuhs (Ἰρκανός). Son (or descendant) of TOBIAS (2 Macc. 3:11; according to JOSEPHUS [see Ant. 12.4.2 §160; 12.4.6 §186], Hyrcanus was the son of Joseph and the grandson of Tobias). Hyrcanus was a prominent Jewish man who had deposited a large sum of money in the temple. HELIODORUS, an official of the Syrian ruler SELEUCUS IV, came to Jerusalem to confiscate the money, but was overwhelmed as the result of seeing an apparition, and thus the treasure was saved for the temple (3:24-29). Hyrcanus is a name derived from Hyrcania, a region S of the Caspian Sea to which many Jews had been transported. For John Hyrcanus and Hyrcanus II, see HASMONEAN II.A and II.E.

New growth on a hyssop plant.

hyssop his’ahp. This English term is used to translate Hebrew ’ēzôb H257 (which occurs ten times in the OT) and Greek hyssōpos G5727 (only twice in the NT). The most striking reference is in Jn. 19:29, which records that our Lord was given VINEGAR in a sponge put on a stalk of hyssop. The Greek term, however, is also definitely connected with the blood used in sacrifices (Heb. 9:19). Directions are given by MOSES to take a bunch of hyssop and dip it into the blood of the lamb that was in the basin, in order to be able to apply it to the lintel and the two side-posts of the front door of the house; this was the beginning of the PASSOVER (Exod. 12:22; cf. also Lev. 14:4-6, 49-52; Num. 19:6, 18). The reference in Ps. 51:7, “Cleanse me with hyssop,” obviously refers to the application of the blood of the lamb, for it is only, Scripture says, with the shedding of blood that there can be remission of sin (Heb. 9:22). In the description of SOLOMON’S wisdom given by God, we read, “He described plant life, from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop that grows out of walls” (1 Ki. 4:33).

To discover the true name of the plant, one must examine carefully the references. (1) The plant should be bushy; (2) liquid should easily cling to its leaves; (3) it can grow between the stones of a wall; (4) it would be useful if it were aromatic; (5) it could be a “purifier”; (6) it should grow well in Egypt (where the Israelites first used it); in the desert (where again they used it at the Passover service, year by year, on the way to Israel); and in Palestine (where it would have to be used at the Passover service each year).

The hyssop grown today is Hyssopus officinalis, which produces blue flowers from June to September, plus aromatic leaves; when these, with the flowers, are infused in hot water, they are used as an expectorant. It does not grow in Palestine or Egypt, however, and so cannot be the plant mentioned in Scripture. As far as Egypt is concerned, there are indications that it was the sorghum grass. In the case of Solomon’s reference, it could easily be the Capparis sicula (see CAPERBERRY). This plant is found in the SINAI desert and grows on the walls of JERUSALEM. It would have been possible to have used the end of a branch of this shrub to transfer the vinegar in the sponge to the Lord Jesus. Capparis is a straggling, deciduous shrub with white flowers, tinged red on the outside, that fade before mid-day.

Those who believe the plant was the marjoram argue (1) that it grows easily in walls; (2) that it has hairy stems and leaves, which would hold water or blood well; and (3) that it is pleasantly aromatic. The marjoram could be either Origanum maru, of Syrian origin (see FFB, 129-30), or Origanum aegyptiacum, from Egypt.

W. E. SHEWELL-COOPER

Canaanite incense burner from Taanak (12th and 13th cent. B.C.).

I am (who I am). The name of God revealed to MOSES when he asked for credentials that would convince the children of Israel that God had indeed authorized him to lead them out of Egypt (Exod. 3:13-14). The disclosure of the name was given at the BURNING BUSH, which had aroused Moses' curiosity because it was not consumed. Such a phenomenon suggests something eternal and constant. Moreover, the giving of this name was preceded by God's declaration to Moses, "I am the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob," the God who knew the sorrows of his people's bondage in Egypt and had come down to deliver them (3:6-8). Thus the name "I am" (Heb. 'ehyeh, impf. of hāyâ H2118, "to be") or "I am who I am" ('ehyeh 'ăšer 'ehyeh) overarches the past and the future history of the children of Israel and suggests that what God is in the present, he was in the past, and will be in the future to this people.

God's identification with this people is forever, for he has willed to be known as the God who is the God of ABRAHAM, ISAAC, and JACOB, a name which is "my name forever, the name by which I am to be remembered from generation to generation" (Exod. 3:15 KJV). Thus Moses' credentials, and the faith of the children of Israel in God's action of deliverance in the future, are grounded in, and are an extension of, what God has done for their fathers in the past.

There is a difference of opinion whether the expression ʾehyeh ʾăšer ʾehyeh should be translated "I am who I am" or "I will be what I will be." It should be observed that nothing in the record of Exod. 3 attempts to demonstrate or urge that which God was in the past to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This truth was a part of the faith of the children of Israel; even in Egypt, they held this faith. What was requested by Moses and needed by the children of Israel was not a name which disclosed that God was what he was, but that he is and will be in the future what he admittedly was in the past: the God of their fathers and, therefore, the God of their children, the children of Israel, who therefore should accept Moses' claim that God had called him to deliver them out of Egypt.

The most distinctive name by which God was known in Israel is Yahweh (yhwh; KJV, "Jehovah"), which comes from the same root as "I am," but in the third person rather than first, and whose significance throughout the OT is that God has made a covenant with the children of Israel to which he will ever remain faithful. It is within this content of the meaning of Yahweh—a name that appears repeatedly in Exod. 3—that the "I am" was given to Moses as a credential that would convince the children of Israel that God willed through Moses to lead the children of Israel out of Egypt into a better future. (Cf. DDD, 910-19, s.v. "Yawheh.")

The meaning of this "I am" reappears in the claim of Jesus in the NT. Throughout the Gospel of John, the corresponding Greek phrase egō eimi seems to allude to God's name (see esp. Jn. 4:26; 8:24, 28; 18:5-8; this usage possibly also reflects the Heb. ʾānî hûʾ, "I [am] he," Isa. 43:10 et al., LXX egō eimi). The Jews of the NT resisted the summons of Jesus to lead them out of the slavery of sin into a future of freedom by appealing to the past, asserting that they were the children of Abraham—an assertion which Jesus countered, in the interest of his present and future liberating achievements, by declaring, "before Abraham was, I am" (Jn. 8:58).

A more speculative and metaphysical theology sees in the "I am" of Exod. 3 an assertion of God's ontological Being, who is the only reality, and in the light of which the opposition of Pharaoh, the concern of Moses, and the doubts of Israel regarding the future to which Moses is commanded to lead them is, in comparison to the "I am," nothing. But whatever may be legitimately deduced about the metaphysical character of God—that is, of God-as-he-is-in-himself, in distinction from created reality which in itself is nothing except contingent being—the entire context of the passage is historically conditioned. It was given by God not to disclose what he-is-in-himself but to disclose what he is, was, and will be in that historical situation of Egypt's sin, Moses' need, and the doubts and fears that Moses contemplated as the reaction of the children of Israel to God's redemptive purpose for them. See GOD, BIBLICAL DOCTRINE OF; GOD, NAMES OF.

Iaol. See ABRAHAM, APOCALYPSE OF.

ibex. A mountain goat of the genus Capra (esp. C. ibex nubiana), distinguished by its long and backward-curving horns. The English term is used in modern Bible versions to render Hebrew dîšôn H1913, which occurs only once (Deut. 14:5; KJV, "pygarg," following LXX pygargos, "whiterump

An ibex at En Gedi in Israel.

[antelope]”); other possible translations are “antelope” and “bison.” According to some scholars, “ibex” should be the rendering of a different Hebrew term, yā’ēl H3604, which almost all versions translate as “wild goat” (1 Sam. 24:2 [here a place name]; Job 39:1 [“mountain goat”]; Ps. 104:18; cf. ya’ālā H3607, Prov. 5:19, which may be a reference to a female ibex or to a doe). See also ORYX; WILD GOAT.

The incident described in 1 Sam. 24 took place at EN GEDI (Spring of Young Goat), where there is today a wildlife sanctuary especially to preserve the Nubian ibex in the hills where they have always lived. All points seem to confirm the identification. This ibex is the same size as the better known alpine ibex (steinbock) of Switzerland and Italy, with more slender but clearly ridged, curved horns. The general color is gray, becoming browner in winter. Like most goats it both browses and grazes. It is confined to the mountains E of the Nile, in Sinai and S Arabia, with some outlying groups in Israel and perhaps Jordan. (See FFB, 2-3, 46-47; ABD, 6:27-29.)

G. S. CANSDALE

Ibhar ib’hahr (יִבְחָר H3295, “[Yahweh] chooses [him]”). One of the sons of DAVID born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chr. 3:6; 14:5). All that is known of him is that his mother was a wife, not a concubine, of David.

ibis. A wading bird similar to the stork. The term is used once by the RSV (following LXX, ibis) to render yanšûp H3568 (Lev. 11:17), but this Hebrew word is more properly translated “(great) owl,” as the RSV itself does elsewhere (Deut. 14:16; Isa. 34:11 [yanšôp]). The root may suggest a bird that comes out at dusk or one that hisses. Neither would fit the ibis, nor the fact that the setting of Isa. 34:11 is a desolate place. The “sacred ibis” would have been known to the Israelites while in Egypt, where it was a deity, but it did not carry over to Palestine. Another species, the “glossy ibis,” is an uncommon passage migrant. See OWL.

Ibleam ib'lee-uhm (יִבְלֵעַם H3300, meaning uncertain; cf. BALAAM). A Canaanite town allotted to the tribe of MANASSEH but apparently located within the territory of ISSACHAR and ASHER (Josh. 17:11). This perplexing description may indicate that the city was in an area “reckoned at first to the other two tribes” (Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 235); however, Y. Kaufmann (The Biblical Account of the Conquest of Palestine [1953], 36-40) argues that the text should not be translated “(with)in” Issachar and Asher, but rather “beside” (or “along” or “to”) the border of these other two tribes. Manasseh was unable to drive the Canaanites from this city (Jdg. 1:27). AHAZIAH, king of Judah, was slain by JEHU when he fled by chariot at the ascent of GUR, which was near Ibleam (2 Ki. 9:27; in 15:10, some would correct the awkward phrase “in front of the people” to “in Ibleam,” on the basis of the Lucianic recension of the SEPTUAGINT, thus making Ibleam infamous again as the site of SHALLUM’S assassination of the king of Israel, ZECHARIAH).

The name Ibleam is attested already in the 15th cent. B.C. by THUTMOSE III’s list of 119 Canaanite towns (no. 43, Ybrʿm; cf. Aharoni, Land of the Bible, 160). It was on the southern point of the JEZREEL Valley proper, guarding one of the four or five passes on the VIA MARIS from the SHARON Plain. Ibleam is identified with the Levitical city BILEAM (1 Chr. 6:70) and with modern Khirbet Belʿameh, about 16 mi. N of SHECHEM and 12 mi. SE of MEGIDDO.

Ibneiah ib-nee'yah (יְבִנְיָהּ H3307, “Yahweh builds up”; cf. IBNIJAH and JABNEEL). Son of Jehoram and descendant of BENJAMIN; listed among those who returned from the Babylonian EXILE and resettled in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:8).

Ibnijah ib-ni'juh (יְבִנְיָהּ H3308, “Yahweh builds up”; cf. IBNEIAH and JABNEEL). Descendant of BENJAMIN and ancestor of Meshullam, who is listed among those who returned from the Babylonian EXILE and resettled in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 9:8).

Ibri ib'ri (עִבְרִי H6304, “Hebrew”). Son of Jaaziah and descendant of LEVI through MERARI (1 Chr. 24:27); listed among “the rest” of the Levites in the time of DAVID (cf. vv. 20, 31).

Ibsam ib 'sam (יִבְשָׁם H3311, “fragrant”; cf. BASEMATH, MIBSAM). KJV Jibsam. Son (or descendant) of Tola and grandson (or more distant descendant) of ISSACHAR; he is described as head of his family, which probably means he was a military officer (1 Chr. 7:2).

Ibzan ib'zan (אִבְזָן H83, prob. “swift”). One of the minor judges (Jdg. 12:8-10). See JUDGES, PERIOD OF, IV. All that is known about him is that he came from BETHLEHEM, where he was also buried, that he led Israel for seven years, and that he had thirty sons and thirty daughters for whom he secured an equal number of husbands and wives from abroad. The large family and the special reference to these marriages indicates his wealth and social status. JOSEPHUS (Ant. 5.7.13) states that Ibzan’s Bethlehem was the well-known town in Judah, but he is probably wrong because the latter is generally distinguished by adding the words “of Judah” or “Ephratah”; the reference is more likely to Bethlehem of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15, modern Beit Lahm, 7 mi. NW of NAZARETH). Probably stemming from this same confusion, Jewish tradition identified Ibzan as the BOAZ of the RUTH story, making him an ancestor of DAVID (b. Baba Batra 91a).

C. F. Keil (KD, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 276-92, 397-98) makes a good case for limiting the extent of the rule of Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon primarily to the Transjordanian situation with the Ammonite oppression. The author of Judges first gives a short summary of the subject matter for the whole section by introducing the Philistine and the Ammonite threat simultaneously (Jdg. 10:7-9). He next eliminates as quickly as possible that which falls outside the scope of his real theme in chs. 11-12, leaving him free to return to the Philistines as his main concern in ch. 13 and the theme that carries on the narrative to its real goal. Therefore, the forty years of the Philistine oppression cover the same time and go beyond the thirty-one years total for the four judges summoned by the Transjordanian people (Jdg. 12:6-13).

ice. Because of the mildness of the climate, ice is almost never seen in PALESTINE and SYRIA except on the highest mountains. HAIL is common in the winter and is sometimes very destructive. The pools at JERUSALEM have sometimes been covered with ice, but this is rare. At heights of about 4,000 ft., a little ice sometimes forms during the night in winter, but it melts in the sun the next day. Ice (Heb. qerah H7943, which can also refer to FROST) is mentioned in the Bible three times in connection with the power of God (Job 37:10; 38:29; Ps. 147:17). The word is used once in a figurative sense to describe treacherous friends, who are like torrents of water “darkened by thawing ice” (Job 6:16).

S. BARABAS

Ichabod ik’uh-bod (אִי־כְבוֹד H376, possibly “inglorious” or “where is the glory?” or “alas [for] the glory!”; cf. P. K. McCarter, Jr., I Samuel, AB 8 [1980], 115-16). The name given to the son of PHINEHAS (one of ELI’S two evil sons) by his mother when she bore him on her deathbed. News arrived from the battle of APHEK that the PHILISTINES had killed both HOPHNI and Phinehas and captured the ARK OF THE COVENANT of the Lord. When their father heard this tragic news, he fell backward and broke his neck. Phinehas's wife, upon hearing that her husband and father-in-law had died and that the ark was gone, immediately went into labor. In her despondency she named the child Ichabod, saying, "The glory has departed [lit., gone into exile] from Israel" (1 Sam. 4:21-22). Ichabod's nephew, AHIJAH (i.e., AHIMELECH), was the priest who stayed with SAUL and his 600 men at GIBEAH (14:3).

Iconium i-koh'nee-uhm (Ἰκόνιον G2658). A city of ASIA MINOR, modern Konya. According to Xenophon (Anab. 1.2.19), Iconium was the last city of PHRYGIA for one traveling E. In Greek and Roman times, it was considered the chief town of LYCAONIA. It is mentioned several times in the NT (Acts 13:51; 14:1, 19, 21, 16:2; 2 Tim. 3:11). PAUL and BARNABAS reached Iconium from ANTIOCH OF PISIDIA, a journey of perhaps 80 mi. if they followed the route that took them up the Sultan Range, and across 50-60 mi. of the central plateau by the great eastern road from EPHESUS to the EUPHRATES. The Galatian plateau is high and healthy, more like the great Asian steppes than any other portion of the peninsula.

The city's beginnings are lost in history. Iconium is probably a Phrygian word, but a myth was invented to give it a Greek meaning. According to the legend, King Nannakos (the Phrygian Methuselah) had a prophecy that said a deluge would come when he passed away. The king called his people to repentance and supplication, and certain it is, from the evidence of Herondas, the 3rd-cent. B.C. writer of comic pieces, that "the weeping of Nannakos' day" was a proverb. It was of no avail. The flood came as predicted, and with the subsiding of the waters Prometheus and Athena remade man by means of images of mud into which life was breathed. The Greek for "image" is eikōn G1635, hence Iconium. The story is a typical "etiological myth," a story invented to account for an existing fact. Another similar legend was attached to the name of Perseus and an "image" of the Gorgon presented to him. The flood story is not a sign of Jewish influence. The district was subject to flooding.

Section of an ancient city wall at Iconium.

Turning from myth to history, it may be said with certainty that an ancient Phrygian town was transformed into a Greek city by colonization. Rome chose LYSTRA and Antioch as its bastions, but Iconium, in spite of becoming a Roman colony under HADRIAN, remained predominantly Greek in tone and somewhat resistant toward Roman influence. CLAUDIUS, for example, gave some attention to the organization of the rich and fertile area, and granted Iconium the honor of incorporating his name. Claudiconium, however, like Londonderry, similarly prefixed, rapidly shed its honorific syllables.

The compounded name was a curiosity of coinage, a sphere in which such formalities of nomenclature most commonly find place and perpetuation.

As a city of the Galatian “heartland” of Asia Minor, Iconium shared the fortunes of the area. In the 3rd cent. B.C. it fell within the domains of the SELEUCID monarchs of ANTIOCH OF SYRIA, and in the middle of the 2nd cent, was probably dominated by the intruding Gauls who were later confined to the northern uplands of the region. After approximately a generation under such subservience, Iconium was taken over by the kings of PONTUS, to be set free as a political gesture during the Mithridatic wars with Rome. In 39 B.C., Mark Antony handed the city to Polemon, king of CILICIA Tracheia, and three years later to Amyntas, who became king of GALATIA at that time of flux and change. Upon Amyntas’s death, with the organizing of the Roman PROVINCE of Galatia, Iconium became an independent unit once more within the provincial structure.

As a Greek city, Iconium was governed by its assembly of citizens. Greek was the language of its public documents. Even where the Roman name Claudiconium is used on coinage it appears in its Greek form. It was a beautiful place, a natural center of human activity, as its survival into modern times indicates. Two hundred square miles of fertile plain surrounded it, cool, well-watered, and tree-filled. W. M. Ramsay (The Cities of St. Paul: Their Influence on His Life and Thought [1907], 317—19) regards Iconium as the DAMASCUS of Asia Minor, blessed like the great Syrian city with water, genial climate, and the prosperity that goes with both.

The first impact of Christianity on Iconium provoked bitter opposition. The 2nd-cent. story of Paul and Thecla, fiction though it is, contains as its core of truth the tribulations of the apostle and his first converts (see PAUL, ACTS OF). Writing from Rome to TIMOTHY, during his last imprisonment twenty years later, Paul still remembered his ordeal in the Phrygian city. Paul’s foundation, Iconium.

however, stood firm, and the church in Iconium, whose continued presence and activity is signified by numerous Christian inscriptions from the 3rd cent, onward, appears to have triumphed over the attempts of its Judaistic wing to corrupt the simplicity of its doctrine, the assault that occasioned the epistle to the GALATIANS. (See also S. E. Johnson, Paul the Apostle and His Cities [1987], 62—65.)

Idalah id'uh-luh (יָדָלָה H3339, possibly from a root meaning “jackal”). A town in the tribal territory of ZEBULUN, named with SHIMRON and BETHLEHEM (Josh. 19:15; not to be confused with Bethlehem of Judah). Its location is uncertain, but a possible identification is modern Khirbet el-Huwarah, about 6.5 mi. W of NAZARETH.

Idbash id'bash (יָדָשׁ H3340, “honey-sweet” or “honey-brown”). Son of Etam, included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3, following LXX). The MT appears to be textually corrupt; see discussion under ETAM.

Iddo id'oh (יָדָה H6333, also יָדָה and יָדָה, possibly short form of יָדָה H6348, “Yahweh has adorned” or “pleasing to Yahweh” [see A DAIAH]; the additional forms יָדָה H120 [Ezra 8:17], יָדָה H3350 [Ezra 10:43 Ketib; Qere יָדָה], יָדָה H3587 [2 Chr. 9:29 Qere; Ketib יָדָה], and יָדָה H3346 [1 Chr. 27:21] appear to derive from one or two different roots). (1) Father of Abinadab, who was one of SOLOMON'S twelve district officers (1 Ki. 4:14).

(2) Son of Joah and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:21; apparently the same as ADAIAH, v. 41).

(3) Son of a certain Zechariah; he was an officer appointed by DAVID over the half-tribe of MANASSEH in GILEAD (1 Chr. 27:21).

(4) One of the descendants of Nooma (Nebo) who agreed to put away their foreign wives (1 Esd. 9:35 NRSV [cf. Codex B, Ēdos]; KJV, “Edes” [most Gk. MSS, Ēdais]; the parallel passage, Ezra 10:43, has JADDAI [Heb. yadday, but note that the Ketib is yaddô).

(5) A seer (also called a prophet) who received visions concerning SOLOMON and JEROBOAM (2 Chr. 9:29), recorded genealogies associated with REHOBAM (12:15), and composed “annotations” (midrāš H4535) respecting ABIJAH (13:22). His writings served as a source for the Chronicler's material. See CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF, V.

(6) The leader of a group of Levites at CASIPHIA who provided EZRA with attendants for the temple upon their return to Jerusalem after the EXILE (Ezra 8:17; 1 Esd. 8:45-46 [KJV, “Saddeus” and “Daddeus,” due to variants in the Gk. MSS]).

(7) One of the priests and Levites who returned with ZERUBBABEL to Jerusalem (Neh. 12:4). Because his priestly family was headed by someone named Zechariah (v. 16), this Iddo is probably the grandfather of the prophet ZECHARIAH (Zech. 1:1, 7; Ezra 5:1; 6:14).

idleness. Various Hebrew terms can be rendered “idle(ness)” or “laziness.” For example, the niphal participle of the verb rāpā H8332, “to relax, become slack,” is used in PHARAOH'S criticism of the Israelites because of their desire to go away to worship God (Exod. 5:8; 5:17). The noun ʿašlūt H6791 is used in the description of the virtuous woman as one who “watches over the affairs of her household / and does not eat the bread of idleness” (Prov. 31:27; cf. 19:15). In the NT, “idle” renders the Greek words argos G734, “inactive, unproductive” (1 Tim. 5:13 et al.), and ataktos G864 (with cognates), “undisciplined, disorderly” (1 Thess. 5:14 et al.).

The Scriptures criticize the idle person when the situation demands effort and work, as well as the busy person who speaks “idle words” (KJV), that is, who uses meaningless and careless language (Matt. 12:36). Idleness can be both a failure to respond to a situation calling for action and a busy loquaciousness that speaks to no purpose. The Scriptures call for purposeful work and also for purposeful rest (Exod. 20:8-11). The biblically enjoined SABBATH rest is not to be confused with idleness: such rest comes after labor, and implies not laziness but an enjoyment of what has been accomplished. If the laborer is worthy of his hire, he is also free to enjoy his hire, and such enjoyment of the product of his labor is not idleness. In biblical thought, work as mere busyness is not virtuous. The opposite of idleness is not activity, but such purposeful activity as achieves its purpose and can thereupon be entered into and enjoyed. The “busybody” is, therefore, a person who is very active but to no good purpose, and the idle man is the unproductive man, who does nothing and comes to a time of need. See also SLUGGARD.

idolatry (Gk. εἰδωλολατρεία G1630, from εἶδος G1626, “that which is seen, appearance,” and λατρεία G3301, “service, worship”). The worship of idols or images; in a derived sense, the word can refer to blind or excessive devotion to something or someone.

I. Idolatry in ancient times. The ancients believed that the image was the dwelling place of a superhuman force or being, or was the deity itself. Idols were made of wood, stone, or clay, and sometimes of gold or silver. For the Hebrews, idolatry included the worship of anything other than Yahweh. Rabbinic writers considered idolaters as enemies of Israel. According to the TALMUD (Yoma 9b et al.), the three cardinal sins are idolatry, immorality, and bloodshed. Idolatry was given precedence because it implied a denial of REVELATION, thus shattering the entire basis of religion and ethics. In the NT, the term was extended to mean obsession with anything to the degree that it took the place of devotion to God.

Idolatry was the embodiment of human desire and thought. Idols, though made in many shapes and sizes, really represented the image of man, for they expressed his thoughts, desires, and purposes. Pride caused human beings to trust in themselves rather than in God, hence their idols were really expressions of self-worship (Isa. 2:8-22). The Bible repeatedly depicts people as debasing themselves when they worship that which they have made with their own hands.

Idolatry has been practiced from primitive times. The ANE was thoroughly polytheistic. Everything that occurred, whether good or bad, was attributed to the gods, because life was not separated into religious and secular categories. Nature and its unexplained forces were probably the earliest deities worshiped by primitive peoples. The sun, moon, stars, fire, and lightning were objects of worship; for man could not explain them, and they seemed more powerful than he.

The various gods of MESOPOTAMIA, EGYPT, and CANAAN were known to the Israelites. BABYLON exercised greater formative influence upon Hebrew religion than either Egypt or Canaan. Even the father of ABRAHAM worshiped other gods (Josh. 24:2). Abraham must have been acquainted with the cult of the moon-god Sin. His contemporaries built impressive TEMPLES and ZIGGURATS in honor of the moon-god. It is not inconceivable that Abraham himself was a worshiper of the Babylonian deities before God called him to leave his home and land. His willingness to sacrifice his son ISAAC gives evidence that human sacrifice to the gods was not unknown to the patriarch. The ancient Sumerians (see SUMER) believed that the universe was directed by a pantheon of gods, the chief ones being An, Ki, Enlil, and Enki, who controlled, respectively, heaven, earth, air, and water. The Meso-potamian pantheon was composed of more than 1,500 gods, some of the better known ones being ISHTAR, MARDUK, Shamash, and Sin. The fertility gods were especially honored. Ishtar, goddess of love, descended to the underworld to seek her husband TAMMUZ. Nabu (NEBO) was the patron of science and learning. NERGAL was the god of war and hunting.

Ancient Egyptian religion was polytheistic and complex. Though the chief gods were represented in human form, most of the numerous deities were depicted in animal form, such as the crocodile god Sobek and Anubis with the head of a jackal. There were cosmic deities, such as RE, the sun-god. OSIRIS (the patron of agriculture) and his wife Isis (counterpart of Astarte) were associated with regeneration. There were triads of gods such as Osiris, Isis, and their son Horus. Hieroglyphic inscriptions on obelisks on the tombs give the impression that the Egyptians had thousands of deities. Every aspect of nature, animate and inanimate, was thought to be inhabited by a deity. There was even a merger of gods, such as Amun with Re (see AMON #4). The ruler himself was considered to be the incarnation of a god; each one while living assumed the name Horus, the deity who avenged the death of Osiris.

Of particular interest for biblical studies are the gods of Canaan because of the syncretism of Israelite religion with the Canaanite FERTILITY CULTS. Such cults were also common to Mesopotamia and Egypt, but they exerted their strongest influence on the Israelites in Canaan. The chief Canaanite deities were EL, the creator of the earth and controller of storms, and BAAL (both symbolized by the bull as indicative of their procreative powers), and the fertility goddess Astarte (biblical ASHTORETH). She was immensely popular at the temples, and PROSTITUTION was a legalized part of the cult. The consort of El was ASHERAH, the mother goddess (the symbol of fruitfulness). There were many other Canaanite deities, such as Melkart, Koshar (the Vulcan of the Canaanites), and Hauron, the shepherd god. Mot was the god of death and sterility.

The Canaanite religion was particularly dangerous for the Israelites because of its appeal to carnal human desires, especially sexual. Baal and Astarte were associated with fornication and drunkenness. Sacred prostitution and various orgiastic rites characterized the religion. AMOS charged that Hebrew participation in these rites profaned the name of God (Amos 2:7). Canaanite religion was a debasing form of paganism. MOSES warned the Israelites against the dangers of Canaanite influence and instructed them to destroy all the inhabitants of the land so that the nation would not be tempted to follow their gods (Deut. 7:1-5; 20:18). They were also instructed to destroy the high places, the wooden asherim, pillars, and graven images (12:2-3), which were associated with the sexual aspects of Canaanite worship practices.

II. Idolatry in the OT. The worship of idols was an abomination to the protagonists of Hebrew monotheism. They condemned as “idolatry” the tendency of the people to adopt the local Canaanite cults. The OT emphasizes that the worst sin was to acknowledge other gods besides Yahweh and to make an image or likeness of the deity. The ban on images was a new concept in the ANE, even producing a great struggle among the people of Israel, who continually returned to image worship.

The horror and scorn of the biblical writers toward idolatry may be gauged by the variety of terms used for “idol” or “image”: ’āwen H224, “trouble, sorrow” (Isa. 66:3); ’ēmâ H399, “terror” (Jer. 50:38; cf. NRSV); ’ēlîl H496, “worthlessness” (Lev. 19:4); gillûlîm H1658, “rolled about, [shapeless] blocks” (Ezek. 20:31); miplešet H5145, “horrible thing, a cause of trembling” (1 Ki. 15:13); ’āṣāb H6773, “shape” or “distress” (1 Sam. 31:9). All these words express the lifelessness and absence of true deity in an idol or image.

A recurring theme in the OT is the ridicule heaped upon those who would make an idol with their hands and then bow down and worship it (Isa. 44:9-20; Jer. 10:2-10; Hos. 8:5; 13:2; Hab. 2:18). The OT also emphasizes the powerlessness of idols and the gods of the Canaanites. GIDEON destroyed the altar of Baal, and his father mocked the irate worshipers (Jdg. 6:25-32). The image of DAGON fell on the ground before the ARK OF THE COVENANT (1 Sam. 5). ELIJAH mocked the priests of Baal in the contest on Mount Carmel (1 Ki. 18:27).

The extent to which the Hebrews participated in the grosser religious practices in pre-Mosaic times can only be a matter of conjecture. It is a safe assumption that the influence of other religions upon them was great. The prohibition against idolatry found expression in the TEN COMMANDMENTS (Exod. 20:4), which forbade the representation of God in any form. The commandment was not an attack on artists and sculptors, but on idolaters. To worship idols was to go a-whoring after other gods; therefore idolatry was described as adultery (Hos. 1:2; 9:1, 10; Ezek. 16; 23).

There was no period in Hebrew history when the people were free from the attraction of idols. RACHEL took the TERAPHIM (household gods represented by clay figurines) with her when JACOB and his family fled from LABAN (Gen. 31:34). The Israelites worshiped the idols of Egypt during their sojourn there and did not give them up even when led by Moses out of bondage (Josh. 24:14; Ezek. 20:8-18; 23:3-8). They made a molten calf to worship when Moses tarried on the mountain receiving the law from God (Exod. 32; see CALF, GOLDEN). God would have destroyed them for their idolatries had not Moses interceded for them. Even as they neared the end of the wilderness wanderings, they joined with the people of MOAB in the worship of Baal (Num. 25:1-3; 31:16). Just before they entered the Promised Land, Moses warned them not to make any images or to worship other gods (Deut. 4:15-19; 7:1-5), or they would perish (8:19). The one who would entice his fellow Hebrew to worship other gods was to be put to death by stoning (13:6-16; 17:2-5).

The Israelites did not obey the injunctions given by Moses to destroy the Canaanites completely, but instead settled down among them. They continued to worship the foreign gods they had brought from Egypt (Josh. 24:14-15, 23) and also were enticed by the gods of the Canaanites after they settled in the land (Jdg. 2:11-13; 6:25-32; see also chs. 17-18). The EPHOD made by GIDEON became an object of worship (8:24-27). The exact nature of the ephod in early Israel is not certain. It was apparently a garment (1 Sam. 2:18) worn or carried by the priest (14:3) and used in divination (30:7-18).

SAMUEL the prophet said the subjugation of the people to the PHILISTINES was due to their idolatry and promised that they would be delivered if they would put away their false gods (1 Sam. 7:3-4). The teraphim placed in DAVID'S bed by MICHAL when he fled from SAUL (19:11-17) has been interpreted as a household idol. However, W. F. Albright, basing his argument on the texts from UGARIT, has identified it as a bundle of rags arranged to look like a sleeping man. The teraphim were used in divination (Ezek. 21:21; Zech. 10:2), though such use was condemned (1 Sam. 15:23). The OT says little about idolatry during the reign of David, but it must have flourished during the reign of SOLOMON, for he permitted his foreign wives to worship their gods and was, in his old age, enticed to worship them also, including the abominable CHEMOSH and MOLECH (1 Ki. 11:1-8). His sin prompted God to divide the kingdom upon his death (11:9-13).

JEROBOAM, who became ruler of the N tribes that seceded upon the death of Solomon, placed golden calves at DAN (PLACE) and BETHEL SO that the people would not desire to return to Jerusalem to worship (1 Ki. 12:25-33). These calves were either images of the Canaanite deities or pedestals symbolizing their presence, as the ark of the covenant was the symbol of the presence of God. This act brought God's wrath upon the house of Jeroboam (14:7-11). Matters were no better in Judah at this time. Idolatrous practices flourished there also during the reign of REHOBAM, Solomon's son (14:21-24). During the reign of Solomon's grandson ASA, an "abominable image" for Asherah was destroyed, which had been set up by the queen mother MAACAH (15:13 NRSV; NIV, "repulsive Asherah pole").

A hundred years later, following a succession of kings who "walked in the way of Jeroboam," AHAB came to the throne of Israel and established the cult of Baal of SIDON at SAMARIA under the influence of his Phoenician wife JEZEBEL (1 Ki. 16:32). ELIJAH denounced Ahab and challenged the power of Baal (ch. 18). The principal struggle in which Elijah and ELISHA were engaged was to see whether God or Baal would be acknowledged as God. JEHU, who succeeded the Omride dynasty, made an attempt to uproot Baalism by the wholesale destruction of the temple, priests, and worshipers of Baal (2 Ki. 10:18-28) but was not wholly successful in stamping out idolatry, for "he did not turn away from the sins of Jeroboam" (10:29-31).

Beginning with the prophets of the 8th cent. B.C., there was an emphatic rejection of any material representations of God. Amos protested against the Canaanite high places and the images of their gods (Amos 5:26). Hosea denounced the stubborn harlotry of Israel (Hos. 2:16, 17; 8:4-6; 13:2). Isaiah, looking upon the appalling apostasy of the age, grieved over the golden images, the work of men's own hands, and the sins of the new-moon festivals (Isa. 2:8; 40:18-20; 41:6-7; 44:9-20; 45:20; 46:1-2, 5-7). The Bible contains a stinging indictment against Israel as justification for God's destruction of the northern kingdom in 722 B.C. (1 Ki. 17:7-18). Among the charges made were that they built high places and pillars, served idols, burned their children as offerings, and refused to obey the commandments of God.

Conditions were not much better in Judah, as evidenced by the idolatrous practices when HEZEKIAH came to the throne. The people were worshiping the bronze serpent that Moses had made, so Hezekiah destroyed it (2 Ki. 18:4; see NEHUSHTAN). All the great reforms of Hezekiah were undone, however, by his successor MANASSEH, whose idolatries are among the most shocking in all the OT (21:1-18). He revived Baal worship and built altars to astrological gods within the very TEMPLE at Jerusalem. He offered his own son as a human sacrifice. An interesting reference to human sacrifice is found in Ps. 106, where the pagan influences upon Israel are denounced.

In the period before the end of the kingdom of Judah, the prophets struggled against the widespread idolatry that filled the land. Zephaniah warned against the worship of astral deities, against MILCOM, and against pagan superstitions (Zeph. 1:2-9). Habakkuk pronounced woes upon those who would worship a god made with their own hands (Hab. 2:18-19). No prophet fought the apostasies of Judah more vehemently than Jeremiah. He inveighed against the sacrifices to Molech, the worship of the Baalim, the offering of cakes to the Queen of Heaven, and against the gods that were as many as their cities (Jer. 2:23-25; 8:1-2; 10:2-10; 11:13; 23:13-14). Even the sweeping reforms of JOSIAH, which included the destruction of a sanctuary of Chemosh and Milcom built by Solomon (1 Ki. 11:7; 2 Ki. 23:13), could not save the nation that was so polluted by her idolatries (23:4-20), for the people immediately returned to their old ways under his successors. Ezekiel revealed that worship of animals, of the vegetation god Tammuz, and of the sun were taking place within the temple area itself in the final years before the destruction of Jerusalem (Ezek. 8:7-16). He also denounced the sacrifice of children to the gods (16:20-21).

During the period of the Babylonian captivity, NEBUCHADNEZZAR built a great image and demanded that the people worship it. The refusal of DANIEL'S three friends to worship the image would have cost them their lives except for divine intervention (Dan. 3). In the postexilic period, MALACHI, EZRA, and NEHEMIAH violently opposed marriages with foreigners that were taking place. They undoubtedly remembered that such alliances had been denounced in the past and had contributed to the introduction of idolatrous practices that eventually caused God to destroy the nation.

In the 2nd cent. B.C., the Seleucid rulers of Palestine attempted to revive the worship of local fertility gods and the Hellenistic deities. ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) issued an edict establishing one religion for all his subjects. He erected an altar to ZEUS over the altar of burnt offering in the temple at Jerusalem. He required the Jews to take part in the heathen festivals or be slain. His oppressive measures brought about the Maccabean revolt that resulted in a brief period of religious and political freedom for the Jews (see MACCABEE).

III. Idolatry in the NT. Idolatry is not mentioned as frequently in the NT as in the OT. The Christian church arose in a world given to idolatry, but also out of a Jewish background that maintained a stubborn protest against image worship. PAUL gives a picture of the widespread idolatry of the pagan world (Rom. 1:18-25). He observed that idol worship was so multifarious that the Athenians had even erected an altar to an UNKNOWN GOD (Acts 17:23). He never intimated an interpretation widely held today that idolatry represents a primitive phase of religious development. Paul considered it a perversion, a turning away from the knowledge of the true God. Paul called idolatry a work of the flesh (Gal. 5:20) and warned Christians to shun the worship of idols (1 Cor. 10:14).

Church members who lived in heathen communities had to be careful not to compromise themselves with idolatry (Acts 15:29). One problem for early Christians was the eating of meat that had been offered to idols. Paul said that idols had no real existence, so eating meat offered to them would not be wrong, but he added that a Christian should do nothing that would cause a weaker brother to stumble (1 Cor. 8:1-13; 10:14-33; cf. W. L. Willis, Idol Meat in Corinth [1985]; A. T. Cheung, Idol Food in Corinth: Jewish Background and Pauline Legacy [1999]; J. Fotopoulos, Food Offered to Idols in Roman Corinth: A Social-Rhetorical Reconsideration of 1 Cor. 8:1—11:1 [2003]; see also CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO THE). Paul warned that one may abhor idols but commit other sins (Rom. 2:22). He emphatically denied that idols have any real existence (1 Cor. 12:2; Gal. 4:8; 1 Thess. 1:9). His protest against idolatry was so effective in EPHESUS that it hurt the business of those engaged in making silver images of Diana (Acts 19:23-27; see ARTEMIS). Idolatry is used figuratively by Paul to include covetousness (Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5; see COVET; GREED) and GLUTTONY (Phil. 3:19).

MYSTERY RELIGIONS, where the individual or the community sought to appropriate the experiences of dying or rising nature gods such as Osiris, were widespread in the Greco-Roman world of Paul's time. EMPEROR WORSHIP was an accepted practice. HEROD the Great established the cult of AUGUSTUS at Samaria. CALIGULA (A.D. 37-41) ordered his image to be set up in the temple at Jerusalem. Christians suffered severely at the hands of DOMITIAN (A.D. 81-96), who insisted that he be worshiped as "God" and "Lord." The book of Revelation appeared at such a time with its warning against the danger of idolatry (Rev. 2:14, 20). It affirms the powerlessness of idols (9:20), warns against worshiping an image of the beast (13:14-15; 14:9-11), and promises the exaltation of those who refuse to worship the beast or its image (20:4).

IV. Why idolatry is condemned in the Bible. Idolatry is vigorously condemned both in the OT and NT because it degrades both God and human beings. It denies the existence of the true God who created the world and mankind, and whose GLORY cannot be adequately captured in any tangible form.

It is absurd that a person could carve an idol with his own hands and then be afraid of what he has made.

Some religions claim that an image is an aid to worship, though not an object of worship. The danger of such reasoning is that two people may have a different idea of what the image signifies. One person may look upon it as a representation and void of value or power in itself, but another may regard it as the abode of the god and fraught with power, and therefore he will worship the image. A visible representation of the deity tends to restrict people's concept of God, for they will base that concept, consciously or unconsciously, upon the image or picture. Finally, human beings become like that which they worship (Hos. 9:10). If their god is lifeless and cold, it can bring them no real hope or comfort. Only the true and living God can fulfill the hope of eternal life.

idol makers. Craftsmen made idols of various materials—wood, stone, metal, and pottery. Besides this, there were miniature idols or amulets and scarabs made by jewelers and workers in steatite and semiprecious stones. Because of the value of the metal, idols made of silver or gold might be cast hollow. Those made of bronze or lead might be overlaid with silver or gold. There is, however, a bronze alloy that looks much like gold, and this was probably not overlaid with a precious metal. Silver and gold were sometimes beaten into thin plates and then fashioned into shape over wooden, stone, or metal idols (Isa. 30:22). Occasionally idols were decorated with chains and other jewelry (Isa. 40:19).

Small household gods, usually of Astarte (see ASHTORETH), were often made of POTTERY, either in a press mold or fashioned by hand. Small figurines of BAAL were common in SYRIA, but they were usually cast of a base metal and overlaid with gold foil. Isaiah provides a good description of the making of a wooden idol: “The carpenter measures with a line and makes an outline with a marker; he roughs it out with chisels and marks it with compasses. He shapes it in the form of man...” (Isa. 44:13). The following verse mentions some trees used for idol making—the cedar, the holm, and the oak. It is known that each god had his particular sacred tree.

Iduel id'yoo-uhl (Ἰδουήλος). One of the leaders sent by EZRA to IDDO in CASIPHIA, with an order to bring attendants for the house of God (1 Esd. 8:43; called ARIEL in Ezra 8:16).

Idumea id'yoo-mee'uh (Ἰδουμαία G2628, from Heb. אֲדוּמָא H121). Also Idumaea. One of the regions from which crowds came to follow Jesus (Mk. 3:8). A Greco-Roman province carved out of southern Palestine after the Alexandrian conquest, Idumea was larger than the ancient EDOM. The new boundaries included the deserts of the NEGEV and the SHEPHELAH as well as the sites of LACHISH and HEBRON. Because its inhabitants had aided NEBUCHADNEZZAR in his conquest of the Jewish state, they are the subjects of some of the bitterest prophetic invective in the OT (Lam. 4:21; Ezek. 25:12; 35:3; Obad. 1—21; et al.). Edom was overthrown by the NABATEAN Arabs about 300 B.C. who made the red rockhewn city of PETRA their capital. HEROD'S grandfather was appointed governor of Idumea by Alexander Jannaeus after it was conquered by the Jews first under Judas MACCABEE in 165 B.C. and finally by John Hyrcanus in 126 B.C. (see HASMONEAN). Because of this subjection of his country, Herod considered himself a Jew. (See further A. Kasher, Jews, Idumaeans, and Ancient Arabs [1988].)

Iezer i-ee'zuhr (אִיעֶזֶר H404, "help," apparently short form of ABIEZER; gentilic אִיעֶזְרִי H405, "Iezerite"). Son of GILEAD, descendant of MANASSEH, and ancestor of the Iezerite clan (Num. 26:30; KJV, "Jeezer"). He is probably the same as Abiezer, the son of Gilead's sister (1 Chr. 7:18); if so, Gilead was considered his male progenitor for genealogical purposes.

Igal i'gal (יגל H3319, “[Yahweh] redeems”). (1) Son of Joseph and descendant of ISSACHAR; one of the twelve spies sent by MOSES to Canaan (Num. 13:7).

(2) Son of Nathan from ZOBAB and one of DAVID’S mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:36). The parallel list, which appears to have suffered textual corruption, reads “Joel the brother of Nathan” (1 Chr. 11:38; this reading is followed by the Lucianic recension of the SEPTUAGINT in both passages).

(3) Son of Shemaiah and descendant of David in the line of ZERUBBABEL (1 Chr. 3:22; KJV, “Igeal”). According to some scholars, the phrase “and the sons of Shemaiah” (NIV has simply “and his sons”) should be omitted, in which case both Shemaiah and Igal were sons of Shecaniah. See HATTUSH #1.

S. BARABAS

Igdaliah ig'duh-li'uh (יגדליה H3323, “Yahweh is great”). Father of a certain HANAN who is described as “the man of God” (although this epithet perhaps applies to Igdaliah), and whose “sons” (possibly a reference to a prophetic guild) occupied a chamber in the temple into which JEREMIAH brought the family of the Recabites (Jer. 35:4; see RECAB).

Igeal i'gee-uhl. KJV alternate form of IGAL (1 Chr. 3:22).

Ignatius, Epistles of ig-nay'shuhs (Ἰγνάτιος). Letters to several churches written by a Syrian bishop early in the 2nd cent., included among the APOSTOLIC FATHERS.

I. Number and integrity. Ignatius, bishop of ANTIOCH OF SYRIA, was arrested by Roman authorities during the reign of Emperor TRAJAN (A.D. 98-117) and taken by a military guard toward ROME (Euseb. Hist. 3.36.3). His only writings to be preserved are seven letters written on this trip, from two places where he stopped. Four letters were written from SMYRNA, three of which were sent to the churches at Tralles, Magnesia on the Maeander, and Ephesus, cities that lay on an alternate route that Ignatius and his guards had not followed (thus these letters were in lieu of a personal visit for which probably they had hoped). The fourth letter from Smyrna was written to go ahead of Ignatius to the church at Rome, his destination. A little later, from TROAS, Ignatius wrote three more letters: one was to PHILADELPHIA, which he had passed through on the way to Smyrna; one to the church at Smyrna where he had recently stopped; and one to POLYCARP, the bishop in Smyrna.

These are the only genuine writings of Ignatius that are extant. There exists, however, a “long recension” that includes ten spurious letters; the genuine letters were also expanded by interpolation in both Idumea.

Greek and Latin texts. This material appeared by the 6th cent, and may have originated as early as the late 4th cent. There is, in addition, what has been called a “short recension,” really a condensed Syriac version that includes only the letters to the Ephesians, to the Romans, and to Polycarp. This confused textual picture was finally clarified in the last third of the 19th cent. through the research of T. Zahn (Ignatius von Antiochien [1873]), J. B. Lightfoot (The Apostolic Fathers, Part II: S. Ignatius, S. Polycarp, 2nd ed., 3 vols. [1889]), F. X. Funk (Kirchengeschichtliche Abhandlungen und Untersu-chungen, 3 vols. [1897-1907]), and others, who established the authenticity of the seven letters (the so-called “middle recension,” though some scholars prefer to use the term “short recension” for this group).

II. Date. EUSEBIUS in his Chronicle placed the death of Ignatius in the tenth year of Trajan (A.D. 107-108), but Eusebius’s dates are not dependable here. It is impossible to be dogmatic concerning the exact year when the letters were written. The one to the Romans is dated August 24, according to the present system of reckoning, but the year is not given. Ignatius was called the second bishop of Antioch by ORIGEN (Hom. VI in Luc. §1) and Eusebius (Eccl. Hist. 3.22), whatever that might mean. It tends to support the suggestion of Lightfoot that Ignatius died a few years on one side or the other of A.D. 110, that is, during the reign of Trajan, rather than somewhat later under HADRIAN, as suggested by Adolf von Harnack. Theodor Zahn also favored the reign of Trajan. The best suggestion for the date is c. A.D. 115. (Some recent scholars, however, have argued for a date two or three decades later.)

III. Occasion and purpose. The three letters to the churches that he could not visit (the Trallians, the Magnesians, and the Ephesians) were to encourage them to continue on their Christian way, to recognize the authority of their officers, and to keep themselves from heresy. The aim was to “attain unto God.” Jesus’ death is the way to God. Ignatius was thankful for the representatives from these churches (including local bishops) who had come to Smyrna to bring greetings and to assist him. The letter to the Romans, written also from Smyrna, was to prepare the Romans for his coming and to urge them to do nothing to hinder his approaching martyrdom, but rather to rejoice in it as an end devoutly to be desired by a Christian. A phrase in this letter seems to imply that Ignatius had once been a slave (Rom. 4.3), but it may be read otherwise.

From Smyrna Ignatius proceeded to Troas, over one hundred miles to the N, by land or sea. Here he wrote his second and, so far as is known, last group of letters. He wrote with the aid of Burrhus, the Ephesian deacon, who had helped at Smyrna and continued with him to Troas. Probably Burrhus was acting as a secretary. The letter to the Philadelphians from Smyrna was written to a church he had visited shortly before on his journey, though doubtless the visit was brief. Apparently the church at Philadelphia was having trouble with strange or divisive doctrine. Ignatius suggested that Philadelphia greet Antioch by sending a deacon to bring them congratulations. There is an odd reference to the fact that some at Philadelphia had not treated Ignatius's companions with respect (Phld. 11.1).

There were two more letters from Troas, one to the church at Smyrna, which he had just left, and a personal one to its bishop, Polycarp. Ignatius had a high opinion of the church at Smyrna. He urged them to accept the leadership of their bishop in everything. DOCETISM was a pressing danger. The suggestion made to Philadelphia that a representative be sent to the church at Antioch in Syria was repeated to the Smyrneans. His great love and admiration for Polycarp shines through his letter to him. Ignatius stressed the importance of the unity of the church and its patient endurance in the service of Christ. The care of the individual was highly important. It is better for slaves to accept their lot than to seek freedom with the cost charged to the church treasury. All Christians should be suffering in some way. Freedom might simply release them to opportunities for sinning. Ignatius placed a high value on sexual abstinence, though it was not required.

IV. General character. Ignatius wrote in a vivid, compressed style. He was enthusiastic and confident of God. He used metaphors frequently and liked balanced sentences with reciprocal parts. Warmth, love, and concern gleam through his words. Eduard Norden regarded these letters "as the most exquisite part of the literary remains of this time" (see J. A. Kleist, The Epistles of St. Clement of Rome and St. Ignatius of Antioch [1946], 118).

Ignatius was concerned strongly with the message that Jesus Christ is God, God who has become man. He referred to Jesus as God at least twelve times. Jesus was born of a virgin, was baptized, suffered, and rose again. He was the Son of David and the Son of God. The reason for his suffering was "that we might be saved" (Smyrn. 2.1). The result is the potentiality of UNION WITH CHRIST. The prophets of the OT looked forward to Christ. Now one may "attain to" Christ. Believers are members of him and form the body of his CHURCH (see BODY OF CHRIST). The church is like a bride, the bride of Christ. The members who have faith do not sin (Eph. 14.2). When this is not true, repentance is possible (Phld. 8.1).

Two errors that greatly concerned Ignatius were the Judaizing heresy and Docetism. He warned the Magnesians against living according to Judaism and said, "it is monstrous to talk of Jesus Christ and to practice Judaism" (Magn. 8.3). The Philadelphians were also cautioned about Judaism. The members at Tralles and at Smyrna were asked to consider the evil results of Docetism. Christ was truly in the flesh. He rose in the flesh. To reject this is to deny him absolutely (Smyrn. 5.2).

One of the strongest emphases in Ignatius is on CHURCH GOVERNMENT. He was the earliest writer to reflect the existence of the monarchical episcopate. He not only reflected it but insisted upon the importance of such an organization. The BISHOP is like God or like Christ, the elders were compared to the apostles. See ELDER (NT). The DEACONS are the servants of the church, deacons of the mysteries of Jesus Christ. The elders were attuned to the bishop as the strings to a harp. Ignatius spoke as though there were a single bishop in each church and advocated that this should be universal ecclesiastical procedure.

ignorance. In some instances, ignorance in biblical usage denotes merely an innocent lack of information (Acts 23:5; 2 Cor. 1:8). In its distinctively biblical meaning, it is a specifically religious rather than an intellectual concept. Ignorance is a quality, not of the academically unschooled, but of the sinner. It is a result of SIN and refers to the lack of the KNOWLEDGE of God. Thus ignorance no more indicates an intellectual state of poverty than WISDOM is a state of intellectual fullness. Ignorance is the lack of that religious knowledge which, possessed and practiced, is what the Bible calls wisdom. To know religious TRUTH is knowledge; to practice religious truth is wisdom; to know truth and not to practice it is FOLLY, the mark of the fool. Not to know religious truth and, consequently, to live in untruth, is ignorance.

Ignorance is a consequence of sin, for sin darkens the mind, depriving it of true knowledge of God and the self. Ignorance is, therefore, also a matrix of sin. People sin in ignorance because of ignorance. Thus PAUL says about the “princes of this world” who crucified Christ that they knew not the wisdom of God, “for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory (1 Cor. 2:8 KJV). Christians, non-Christians, and even the church itself, sin because of ignorance. Yet, since ignorance is the consequence of human sin, sins done in ignorance are sinful, and those who commit such sins are culpable.

Nonetheless, sins done in ignorance incur less guilt than sins done in full knowledge of their sinful character and which, accordingly, incur greater guilt. Thus PILATE’S guilt for the CRUCIFIXION of Christ is less than that of the Jews (Jn. 19:11); but even the Jews were not fully conscious of the nature of their act, and Jesus, therefore, invoked their forgiveness, “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Lk. 23:34). The same lesser guilt and greater forgiveability of sins done in ignorance appears in Paul’s admission that he was a blasphemer and a persecutor of the church, and indeed the worst of sinners (1 Tim. 1:15) but that he obtained mercy because he acted “in ignorance and unbelief” (1:13 KJV). Paul spoke in a similar vein on Mars’ Hill when he declared that God “overlooked” (“winked at”) the “times of ignorance” during which men likened God to an idol made of stone and worshiped the idol (Acts 17:30). God in his MERCY acts with forbearance on sins done in ignorance by pagans today and in all centuries past; there is a mercy of God greater than all human sins. Hence Paul’s prayer for Israel—who had a zeal that was not according to knowledge, for “they did not know the righteousness that comes from God and sought to establish their own” (Rom. 10:3)—is that “they may be saved” (10:1).

There is, however, a willful ignorance of God's truth. There is a knowledge of God given in the things that are made that pagans sinfully suppressed (Rom. 1:18), exchanged for a lie (v. 25), and were therefore without excuse (v. 20) and were accordingly punished (vv. 24-32). Yet even such sins of willful ignorance of the truth given in general REVELATION incur less culpability than sins of willful ignorance against the economy of special revelation; the former shall perish without law but the latter shall be judged by the law. Sins done either in ignorance, or willfully against the knowledge of God given to all men in the general revelation "that enlightens every man" (Jn. 1:9), can be overlooked by God and can also be followed by REPENTANCE and FORGIVENESS (which is more than being overlooked). That willful ignorance which is the consequence of a conscious rejection of the knowledge of the truth revealed in Christ and made known in the Gospel proclamation, God will not overlook but subject to a divine judgment and fire that will devour the enemies of Christ (Heb. 10:26-27). In self-conscious and knowledgeable rejection of Christ in his disclosure in gospel proclamation, the sin of willful ignorance excludes a person from that mercy of God that can overlook all other sins of ignorance.

Lim i'im (לִּים H6517, "[place of] ruins"; cf. A1). (1) One of the southernmost cities of the tribe of JUDAH, located in the NEGEV, toward the boundary of EDOM (Josh. 15:29). Although not included in the parallel passages (Josh. 19:3; 1 Chr. 4:29), Lim, like other towns in those lists, may have been allotted to SIMEON. Its location is unknown.

(2) KJV and TNIV form of IYIM.

Ije-abarim i'-juh-ab'uh-rim. KJV form of IYE ABARIM.

Ijon i'jon (עֵיֶן H6510, possibly "heap"). A town in N Israel, apparently within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI in the Huleh Valley, mentioned as having been conquered by BEN-HADAD of DAMASCUS (1 Ki. 15:20; 2 Chr. 16:4) and later by TIGLATH-PILESER of Assyria (2 Ki. 15:29). The Huleh Valley is bounded on the W by the Litani River and on the E by Mount HERMON. Both Amen-hotep II and Ramses II took this route on their campaigns as they headed up to the ORONTES River, while northern invaders used it to enter Palestine.

The name possibly appears on the 19th-cent. EXECRATION TEXTS as one of the sixty-four place names given on small figurines (ynw, no. E. 18; so G. Posener, Princes et pays d'Asie et de Nubie [1940], 74, but see S. Ahituv, Canaanite Toponyms in Ancient Egyptian Documents [1984], 120). THUTMOSE III includes the town in his roster of 119 Canaanite towns (yn, no. 95). Tiglath-Pileser III does not list Ijon, but he does mention the city to the S in a broken passage of the Nimrud tablet. The site is probably to be identified with modern Tell ed-Dibbin in Lebanon (near Merj Ayyun, which seems to preserve the ancient name), 9 mi. N of ABEL BETH MAACAH. Others have doubted this identification because surface explorations have not yielded any Iron II (900-600 B.C.) pottery, as the narrative in Kings requires. (See further Y. Ikkesh if'ish (עֲקֵשׁ H6837, "crooked" [perhaps referring to a physical defect]). A man from TEKOA; his son Ira was one of DAVID'S thirty mighty warriors and the commander of a division of 24,000 men (2 Sam. 23:26; 1Chr. 11:28; 27:9).

Ili i'li (יְלִי H6519). An AHOHITE, one of DAVID'S thirty mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:29; called ZALMON in 2 Sam. 23:28).

Iliadun i-li'uh-duhn (Ἰλιαδουν). Ancestor of some Levites who labored on the rebuilding of the TEMPLE (1 Esd. 5:58; KJV "Eliadun"). His name does not occur in the parallel passage (Ezra 3:9).

Illyricum i-lihr'i-kuhm (Ἰλλυρικόν G2665). A Roman PROVINCE in the western portion of the Balkan peninsula N of GREECE. Now principally occupied by Yugoslavia and Albania, it was bounded in antiquity by the Adriatic, the Eastern Alps, the Danube, the Shar-Dagh and the Ceraunian mountains. According to Strabo (Geogr. 7.317), the seacoast boasted of good harbors and the coastal plains were sunny and fertile, but the interior was mountainous and cold. The Greeks were first attracted to the region because of the mines, but the ferocious and piratical nature of the people prevented extensive colonization.

In the 2nd millennium B.C., it was occupied by Indo-European speaking people. The Greeks first colonized it in the 6th cent. B.C. The Macedonian kings warred against the tribes of Illyricum in the 4th cent., but it was not until the 3rd cent. that the kingdom of Scodra was established. Because of attacks on the Greek colonies and acts of piracy against Greek and Roman shipping, the Romans fought two wars (229-228 and 219 B.C.) against the Illyrians led by Queen Teuta. After the defeat of Genthius in 167 it was divided into three parts and connected alternately with the administration of Italy, Macedonia, and Cisalpine Gaul. CAESAR was proconsul there in 59. Octavian (see AUGUSTUS) subdued a number of the tribes in 35-33. In 27 he made it a senatorial province. Illyricum became an imperial province in 11 B.C. because of outbreaks of violence among the Pannonii. At that time the province was extended to the Danube. The last revolt was put down in three years of fighting by TIBERIUS in A.D. 9 and it became a settled part of the empire.

Two references are made to Illyricum in the NT. In a somewhat obscure statement PAUL remarked that "from Jerusalem all the way around to Illyricum, I have fully proclaimed the gospel of Christ" (Rom. 15:19). It is not clear whether Paul meant that Illyricum was the western boundary of the Eastern world and that he preached up to it, or that he actually preached and established churches there. The phrase "in these regions" (v. 23), describing to the extent of Paul's preaching, would suggest an area larger than MACEDONIA and probably refers also to Illyricum. Furthermore, the remark in his second letter to TIMOTHY (2 Tim. 4:10) intimates that the gospel was being preached there. It is well within the realm of possibility for Paul to have gone to Illyricum. The VIA EGNATIA, which ran from the Hellespont to Dyrrhachium, a seaport on the Adriatic, made the southern portion of Illyricum readily accessible to him on the third missionary journey. (See S. Casson, Macedonia, Thrace and Illyria [1926], passim; Pauly-Wissowa, Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft, IX/1 [1914], cols. 1085-88 s.v. "Illyricum," and supplement V [1931], cols. 311-45 s.v. "Illyrioi"; C. E. B. Cranfield, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, ICC, 2 vols. [1975-79], 2:761-62.)

image of God. A phrase used three times in Scripture (Gen. 1:27; 9:6; 2 Cor. 4:4), pointing to a basic theological concept.

I. OT background. Primary evidence for the "image of God" is found in Genesis with some poetic support in Ps. 8. The basic description of man's CREATION is as follows: "Then God said, 'Let us make man in our image, in our likeness, and let them rule...' So God created man in his own image, / in the image of God he created him; / male and female he created them" (Gen. 1:26-27). Other passages use "likeness" and "image" where the likeness of man to God and the image of ADAM in SETH are brought together in the same treatment (5:1-3); and the special value and dignity of human beings as the image of God are emphasized elsewhere (9:6). In poetic form, the psalmist writes: "You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings [or than God] / and crowned him with glory and honor. / You made him ruler over the works of your hands; / you put everything under his feet" (Ps. 8:5-6).

Linguistic studies bring out no sharp distinction between the two nouns, "image" (Heb. šelem H7512) and "likeness" (dēmût H1952). Undoubtedly the writer wished to make some distinction, or increase the impact, or further define the first term by adding the second. The word šelem occurs seventeen times in the OT; in addition to the five occurrences in the Genesis passages, ten of the remaining usages are quite concrete and may be translated "statue," "model," or "picture" (in the remaining two passages, the sense "shadow" or "phantom" is more appropriate, Ps. 39:6; 73:20). The general use of the word, therefore, seems to demand the idea of "image" in some concrete sense, and prevalent scholarship always calls for this as the first interpretation.

The second term, dēmût, "likeness," appears to be a more abstract notion. The author may be attempting to express a very difficult idea, wanting to make clear that human beings are in some way the concrete reflection of God, but at the same time seeking to spiritualize this idea toward abstraction. However, James Barr (in BJRL 51 [1968-69]: 14-15) has argued that the second term is simply "added in order to define and limit" the somewhat ambiguous meaning of the first: thus the meaning intended by šelem is that which overlaps with the notion of "similarity."

It must be borne in mind that the OT writers, being Semitic, leaned heavily on concrete terms and spoke about God in an anthropomorphic way to make themselves clear at all to a people unfamiliar with philosophic abstractions. The use of "likeness" in addition to "image" is a solution insofar as a Hebrew may deal in abstractions at all. It must be pointed out also that in Hebrew thought, the total personality is not treated as a BODY over against a SPIRIT, but as an "inspired-by-the-breath-of-God” kind of a body. It is not a dichotomy of FLESH and spirit, but the total personality, which is treated in modern times as a gestalt. The representation that the man and the woman were made “in the image of God” might mean superficially that they look like God, but to the writer it meant much more. It meant likeness in the inner person as it is embodied in a physical manifestation—powers of thought, of communication, of transcendence, creativity, a sense of humor (which is a kind of transcendence), powers of abstraction, and what are generally put together in personality, that is, self-consciousness and self-determination. Just as art, architecture, poetry, and music may set forth the person of the artist, so the physical human body may set forth to some extent the nature of the Creator.

Interpretations of the image of God, therefore, may swing between two extremes: (a) the absolute, literal, physical resemblance, which seems to be supported in Gen. 5:1-3, where the image of God is clearly paralleled with SETH as the image of his father, Adam; (b) and over against this, the necessary spiritual interpretation supported by Jesus’ classic definition of God, namely, that “God is spirit” (Jn. 4:24). In addition, the OT seems to support the idea that no one ever really looks on God. There is the necessity of a sacramental interpretation, where a sacrament is best defined as “the physical sign of a spiritual reality.” (See further NIDOTTE, 4:643-48.)

II. The NT approach. The OT view of the image of God moves into the NT with similar vocabulary and with the same problems of interpretation, but also with what appears to be a very radical shift in emphasis. PAUL speaks of “the image and glory of God” (1 Cor. 11:7), and the word for image uniformly used is eikōn G1635 (the LXX rendering of šelem). The NT also speaks of “God’s likeness” (e.g., Jas. 3:9), using the word homoiōsis G3932 (the LXX rendering of dēmūt).

There is no question that eikōn refers to perfect reflection. In the NT, however, the focus is no longer on human beings as the image of God but on Christ, who is that perfect reflection or perfect correspondence; Christ is the prototype of essential man perfectly reflecting God. “The Son is the radiance of God’s glory and the exact representation of his being” (Heb. 1:3). To whatever extent “image” in the OT may be associated with the meaning “shadow,” there is no question that reality has now come to take the place of shadow. In Christ there is the true man, and there is no longer the question of a fallen human being. “The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us” (Jn. 1:14). To see Christ is to see the Father (12:45; 14:9), and what the NT emphasizes is that human beings, whatever their condition may have become after the FALL, may now be a “new creation in Christ,” a new person. “We shall be like him” (1 Jn. 3:2).

The intercessory prayer of Jesus has in it the amazing possibility of UNION WITH CHRIST in such fashion that believers are caught up into the very life and nature of God. Jesus prays “that all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you” (Jn. 17:21). We are to be “conformed to the image of his [God’s] son” (Rom. 8:29 NRSV; NIV, “likeness”). Followers of Christ are directed to “put on the new self, created to be like God” (Eph. 4:24). Paul seems to bypass the whole nest of problems growing out of creation in the image of God to emphasize Christ as the real “image of the invisible God” (Col. 1:15). He thinks of the first Adam as physical. He was “a living being,” but the last Adam [Christ] is “a life-giving spirit. The spiritual did not come first, but the natural, and after that the spiritual...Just as we have borne the likeness [eikōn] of the earthly man, so shall we bear the likeness of the man from heaven” (1 Cor. 15:45-49).

III. Persistent questions. Continued study on the image of God keeps raising the same questions, which at least to date have no final answers. The first question is the nature of the image itself; the second question is some understanding of what was lost of the image of God in the fall; and the third question has to do with what is restored or recreated when a person is saved.

Both Roman Catholic and Protestant theologies, with some exceptions, hold that the idea of image in the first Adam has to do with spiritual qualities and powers. Roman Catholics hold that man had a similitudo Dei that was destroyed by original SIN and which can be restored only by BAPTISM. Other qualities were obscured but not lost in the fall. Protestants have traditionally been in general agreement with this understanding, although they express it somewhat differently. Adam was by nature endowed with original RIGHTEOUSNESS. He had a moral likeness to God; he possessed HOLINESS, although he was in no sense equal to God, nor need one argue that he had attained to the fullness of his own potential. At least the slant and direction of his life were toward God. What he lost in the fall was original righteousness, and thenceforth the slant of his life was affected by sin, that is, sin at the origin of every act. But there are elements that he did not lose—elements having to do with his image of God as a person or a personality—traits such as self-consciousness, self-determination, superiority over nature, creativity, and the like.

Paul spoke of "the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor. 4:4). This representation of the risen Jesus speaking to the disciples (with the Latin text of Jn. 20:23a) is found at the Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth.

It must be pointed out, however, that after the fall these powers were impaired and could not be used together harmoniously. The restoration (a process) of these human powers plus original righteousness awaits the new creation, the new birth, the indwelling of Christ, so that a Christian may say with Paul, "I no longer live, but Christ lives in me" (Gal. 2:20). The hope of the Christian faith is the full attainment of that "new self...in the image of its Creator" (Col. 3:10).

IV. Modern discussions. In Protestant theology, primarily in the Barthian tradition, the image of God has been a live issue. There is a clear recognition throughout of the terrible and radically disintegrating effect of the fall. Emil Brunner (Natur und Gnade [1934]) argues somewhat after the manner of Roman Catholic doctrine that there was a "formal" image, that which constituted man as man, which could not be destroyed without destroying mankind. The remains of this "formal" image are necessary for any point of contact for the grace of God. Only what Brunner calls the "material" image has been lost.

Karl Barth (Nein! [1934]) rejected the "formal" image, held that man was utterly corrupted by sin and thus quite incapable of discovering any kind of truth about God or his own condition. Barth constantly demanded the “break-in” of God himself in a new creative way. Both Barth and Brunner engaged in a running fight for many years over the possibilities of natural theology, natural REVELATION, and the salvability of man. In general, however, Protestants still hold to Calvin’s view that there is a natural revelation, or natural theology, but also that apart from the effectual work of the HOLY SPIRIT through the special revelation of Scripture, we cannot see and grasp this knowledge in any saving way.

Another turn in the modern discussion on the image of God is generally related to the writings of Emil Brunner. In brief, it is a shift of emphasis in the use of the term by which one is not to think of the term “image of God” as a noun. It is not that a man has the “image” of God, but that a man “images” God. This particular approach is characteristically Christian, although it has no basis in the straightforward use of the nouns in the OT. It is more helpful as an interpretation or as an illustration than as an exegesis. Emphasis is laid at the outset on the perfect OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST. “My food...is to do the will of him who sent me” (Jn. 4:34). Whereas the first Adam fell in disobedience, Jesus brought “Paradise Regained” when he, under the awful pressure of temptation, continued to obey absolutely. Followers of Christ are not so concerned therefore with the “image” of God as they are with “imaging” God, by obeying him. It is clear how this kind of thinking lends itself to an existential decision, with its emphasis on action rather than on being.

image of Nebuchadnezzar. See NEBUCHADNEZZAR, IMAGE OF.

imagery. This English word is used once by the KJV to render Hebrew maškit H5381, “image” (Ezek. 8:12; NIV, “idol”). In a vision of the temple, EZEKIEL broke through a hole in the wall, entered a door, and saw pictures of all kinds of animals represented on the walls of the rooms to which he had gained entrance. The seventy elders of Israel were in front of these pictures, burning incense and worshiping the images. The meaning of the prophet’s vision is to be found in the practices of the people of his day and the religious condition of Israel. The secret chamber into which he had gained entrance represented the secret IDOLATRY of the people. The seventy elders represented the whole of the nation, revealing how widespread the infection of idolatry was. The pictures on the walls represented some form of animal worship that revealed how very degraded the worship of Israel had become. The pictures are thought to have been of reptiles, suggesting either an Egyptian or Babylonian origin of the cult, although other interpreters have proposed that they represent the hanging on of animistic religion that was indigenous to the area—a totemistic religion that has somehow managed to survive through the centuries. In all likelihood it was a general reference to the lowest form of idolatrous worship, designed to reveal the very low level to which the people had sunk, without any specific reference to a particular cult.

imagine. This English verb, in its earlier meaning “to think,” is used with some frequency by the KJV (Gen. 11:6 et al.). In modern versions it is used occasionally to render, for example, Hebrew ḥāšab H3108 (Ps. 41:7) and Greek noeō G3783 (Eph. 3:20).

Imalkue i-mal’kyoo-ee (Ἰμάλκουε, possibly corresponding to the Heb. name JAMLECH). KJV Simalcue. An “Arabian who brought up Antiochus, the son of Alexander” (Jos. Ant. 13.5.1 §131). See ALEXANDER #2. This wording seems to be taken from 1 Macc. 11:39 by JOSEPHUS, though Josephus calls him “Malchus” (but cf. the more usual transcription of the same name as Iamblichos, Ant. 14.8.1 §129). TRYPHO, one of the commanders of the SELEUCID army, went to Imalkue to tell him of the soldiers’ ill will toward DEMETRIUS and urged him to allow Alexander’s son to be proclaimed king as ANTIOCHUS VI. At first, Imalkue opposed this plot to overthrow Demetrius, but being convinced by Trypho’s evidence, the young child Antiochus was crowned (1 Macc. 11:54). Antiochus gathered around him “all the men of war, whom Demetrius had put away, and they fought against Demetrius, who turned his back and fled” (11:55 KJV). At the same time Antiochus confirmed the high priesthood of Jonathan and made him one of the king’s friends (11:57). See MACCABEE.

Imlah im’luh (יְמִלָּח H3550 [1 Ki.] and יְמִלָּח H3551 [2 Chr.], possibly “[God] fills”). Father of the prophet MICAIAH, who predicted the death of King AHAB in battle (1 Ki. 22:8-9; 2 Chr. 18:7-8 [KJV, “Imla”]).

immaculate conception. In Roman Catholic doctrine, the belief that “the most Blessed Virgin Mary, in the first instant of her conception, by a singular grace and privilege granted by Almighty God, in view of the merits of Jesus Christ, the Savior of the human race, was preserved free from all stain of original sin” (Pius IX, Ineffabilis Deus, December 8, 1854). See MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS.

I. Meaning of the doctrine. Although a full explanation of the theology of the immaculate conception is not possible here, a brief discussion of the meaning of the doctrine is in order. Karl Rahner (Theological Investigations, 1 [1961], 201—13) typifies the newer Catholic tendency to put the doctrine in the broader context of God’s grace in Christ: (a) The dogma of the immaculate conception demonstrates God’s concern with the beginning of each person’s life. (b) It manifests the love of God which surrounds all life (“Now if that is true for one, it is true for all”). (c) It is also a rich promise that God will be faithful after life’s beginning. (d) It means that in a unique way Mary received sanctifying grace, that is, “the gift which is God himself,” from the beginning of her life. (e) It shows that God calls individuals and not just mankind in general to perform special tasks and prepares them in advance to become what they are in Christ. Rahner sees the immaculate conception as one facet of Mary's unique predestination and as "the most radical and most blessed mode of redemption" (ibid., 211).

II. Common misunderstandings. Catholic theologians frequently mention that many laymen, even Catholics, have seriously distorted views of this doctrine. (a) It is not to be confused with the virginal conception of Jesus in Mary's womb (although admittedly most Mariology is strikingly parallel to most Christology); Catholic theologians point out that Mary was conceived in the usual way (unlike Jesus), but without contracting original sin. See VIRGIN BIRTH. (b) It does not imply that Mary's coming into existence was in any way different physically from that of other human beings; therefore the immaculate conception of Mary in no way suggests preservation from any supposed defilement through the marital relations of her parents. (c) It is not based on any future merits of Mary, but is solely based on the redemptive death of Jesus. (d) It is not based primarily on sanctifying grace but more on Mary's unique predestination to be the mother of the Savior.

The angel Gabriel announces that Mary would be the mother of the Messiah. Painting from the Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth.

III. Alleged biblical support. Catholic scholars readily admit that there is no direct reference anywhere in the NT to Mary's conception. T. O'Meara (Mary in Protestant and Catholic Theology [1966], 65) is even willing to say, "If the Scriptures contain explicitly all of revelation then the dogma of 1854 is an absurd innovation"; he also speaks of the doctrine as "the first of those Marian beliefs which seem so foreign to the gospel and seem to be lacking even in the Fathers" (ibid., 60). This does not mean, of course, that most Catholic scholars are now willing to conclude that the doctrine is an innovation or in any way contrary to the primitive kerygma. Following the lead of Pope Pius IX in Ineffabilis Deus, they see implicit and undeveloped references to the belief in at least three passages of Scripture:

(a) Genesis 3:15, the famous protevangelium, is seen as a reference to Mary's crushing, through the birth of her Son, the power of Satan over human nature since Adam's fall. As E. D. O'Connor admits, however, "this text by itself would hardly suffice to make the doctrine known" (NCE, 7:378). It is based on the Latin VULGATE translation, "She [ipsa] shall crush your head." Catholics therefore agree that the verse can no longer be quoted in support of the doctrine. (b) Luke 1:28 is used to argue that if Mary were truly “full of grace” she must have been born with it. Catholic exegetes admit, however, that the Greek kecharitōmenē (pf. pass. ptc. of charitoō G5923) indicates only that Mary was highly favored by God without indicating the extent of that favor. (c) Matthew 1 and Luke 1-2 emphasize Mary’s exceptional holiness. “It is clear that only a flawless holiness would be in any way proportionate to the sacredness of her office” (ibid., 379). But even this deductive argument is the result of further centuries of development. Some theologians have therefore toyed with the idea that the doctrine may have belonged to the nonrecorded oral traditions of the apostles, but most Catholics today agree that historical evidence does not seem to support such a conclusion.

IV. Patristic materials. Explicit evidence from the early church fathers is lacking, and it is acknowledged that Mary’s immaculate conception was not an explicit part of the faith until somewhere between the 7th and 12th centuries at the very earliest, although a precise date when the belief actually was held as a matter of faith is avowedly impossible to determine. Historically, the belief evolved out of “an obscure yet powerful impulse of Christian hearts to attribute to [Mary] the greatest holiness and glory compatible with her status as a creature” (ibid., 379). Among fathers cited in connection with the dogma are the following: (a) ORIGEN, who sharply attacks those who hold that Mary is sinless; in his Homily XVII on Luke, Origen says that Mary must have committed at least one sin for her to be redeemed by Christ. (b) Ambrose, who is cited as a supporter of the belief that Mary was free from the stain of sin. (c) AUGUSTINE, who in a famous but ambiguous passage in De nature et gratia says, “Concerning the Virgin I wish to raise no question when it touches the subject of sin, out of honor to the Lord, for from him we know what abundance of grace to overcome sin in every way was conferred upon her who undoubtedly had no sin” (quoted in O’Meara, Mary, 62). Other references suggest that Augustine was thinking only about actual sin, not original sin. Some have suggested that in a time when Pelagianism was denying the full reality of original sin, Augustine was reluctant to support their position even implicitly by affirming Mary’s preservation from original sin. (d) Nestorius is held to imply that Mary was free from sin. (e) Andrew of Crete and John of Damascus in the 7th and early 8th centuries mention that Mary’s perfect sinlessness is implied in her title “Theotokos” (God-bearer).

V. Some later developments. (a) A feast in honor of Mary’s conception begins in the 7th century and spreads widely in the centuries following. (b) Anselm in 1099 says, “It was fitting that she be clothed with a purity so splendid that none greater under God could be conceived” (De conceptu virginali 18). (c) In the Eastern church, the belief actually disappears after a decline in emphasis, so that in 1854 the Orthodox charge the Roman Catholics with innovation in doctrine. (d) In England in the 12th cent., the monk Eadmer defends both the feast and Mary’s sinless conception. (e) In the W it was opposed by some of the greatest theologians of the Middle Ages, including Bernard of Clairvaux, Albert the Great, Bonaventure, and Thomas Aquinas. (f) Franciscans supported the doctrine, and their position eventually grew in influence until its official definition in 1854. (g) Luther’s view seems to have vacillated. Until 1527 he accepts Mary’s complete sinlessness. In a sermon he preached in 1527, however, he first states that Mary’s body had original sin like anyone else’s, but that her soul was infused into her body without contracting original sin, and in the years following he explicitly affirms the belief that Mary had sinned. Yet in 1544 he seems to revert to his earlier position: “God has formed the soul and body of the Virgin Mary full of the Holy Spirit, so that she is without all sin” (cf. O’Meara, Mary, 117).

VI. Evaluation. Protestants do not in any way deny God's favor to Mary. Nor do they necessarily deny that God favored her in a unique way. But they do insist that the doctrine cannot be accepted as historical fact simply on the basis of centuries of pious reflection and in the absence of any historical data. All that can be legitimately affirmed is that Mary's "immaculate conception" expresses symbolically and kerygmatically the conviction that Mary's life was holy in an unusual way as a result of her closeness to Jesus Christ. From a purely historical perspective Protestants sense the importance of a healthy agnosticism as to the nature of Mary's conception. Some Catholics too say they do not have the slightest idea of what the dogma means (J. L. McKenzie, quoted by Calvin J. Eichhorst in Dialog 10 [Autumn, 1971], 273).

Certainly from a purely biblical perspective Protestants and Catholics are in accord on the conclusion that there are no explicit and only tangentially implicit references at best to the immaculate conception in the Bible. The doctrine, they agree, owes more to Christian piety than to Scripture or history. The Protestant Christian agrees most wholeheartedly that "Catholics and Protestants both must learn to listen to what the Bible says of Mary. If this is done, a greater similarity will be attained in their theologies of Mary and in their total theological approach" (O'Meara, Mary, 347; see further SHERK, 5:455-57; ERE, 7:165-67; W. H. C. Frend in Modern Churchman 44 [1954]: 107-19; D. Moody in Review and Expositor 51 [1954]: 495-507; E. D. O'Connor, ed., The Dogma of the Immaculate Conception [1958]; E. L. Mascall and H. S. Box, eds., The Blessed Virgin Mary [1963]; K. Rahner, Mary, Mother of the Lord [1963]; M. Lamy, L'immaculée conception [2000].)

Immanuel i-man'yoo-uhl (עִמָּנוּאֵל H6672, "with us [is] God"; Ἐμμανουήλ G1842). Also Emmanuel (NT, KJV and other versions). The name given to the child born of the VIRGIN (Isa. 7:14; 8:8 [cf. v. 10]; Matt. 1:23).

I. The "Immanuel" passages. The ISAIAH passages are set in the context of God's sign to Israel of hope of deliverance at a time when enemies threatened to take Jerusalem. The seventh chapter of Isaiah states that in the days of King AHAZ, ARAM and EPHRAIM (northern Israel) were in league to capture JUDAH. Ahaz was frightened and God sent Isaiah to assure the wicked king of God's deliverance. When God offered a sign, Ahaz refused to ask for one, thus refusing to glorify God. God gave a sign anyway, but not for Ahaz's benefit. The sign given was for Israel's benefit (Isa. 7:13). The sign was that a virgin would conceive and bear a child whom she would call Immanuel.

"For the Son of Man came...to save what was lost" (Lk. 19:10). From the Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth.

In Isa. 8 again the name occurs twice. In v. 8 it is used in connection with the warning that Immanuel's land will be overrun by Assyria. In v. 10 the words "God is with us" occur as a comfort to God's people assuring them that the forces of men cannot triumph. The name Immanuel, given to the son born of the virgin, is to be the watchword for God's people, the word of hope, no matter how desperate conditions become. He is the hope because his name means that God is with us. This would indicate that the one born of the virgin is more than man. He is also God. The following chapter would seem to support this inference, for there the child is called "Mighty God" (Isa. 9:6). See further ISAIAH, BOOK OF VI.A.

That this interpretation is correct from the biblical standpoint is made quite clear in the Matthean passage, which states that the birth of Jesus by the Virgin Mary fulfills this prophecy from Isaiah (Matt. 1:23). The meaning of Jesus' birth, we are told, is that now God is truly with us in the person of Jesus the Christ.

II. The beginning of the concept of "God with us." The prophecy in Isa. 7:14 is not the beginning but the climax to the concept of God's being with his covenant people. The development of this concept is a remarkable record of revelation from God. The Bible indicates a growing awareness on the part of his people of both the concept and its meaning.

One day, when MOSES was about eighty years old, God confronted him in a BURNING BUSH as he wandered on the hills of the Sinai mountains. He gave to Moses a great commission, to lead the Israelite slaves out of Egypt into the land of Canaan. Canaan was then held by various peoples who would have to be driven out. Understandably Moses felt unequal to such a task and said so. God's answer was the beginning of God's revelation of his presence with his people.

First, God said in response to Moses' misgivings, "I will be [<sup>ʾ</sup>ehyeh] with you" (Exod. 3:12). Hence, the answer to all Moses' fears was simply this—"God is with you." Moses then asked what he should give as the name of the God who is with us (3:13). To this, God answered by the well-known words "I AM WHO I AM" (or "I WILL BE WHAT I WILL BE," <sup>ʾ</sup>ehyeh <sup>ʾ</sup>āšer <sup>ʾ</sup>ehyeh, 3:14; see the article I AM). Nothing more is needed than this context to demonstrate the meaning of the words. The "I will be" is a reminder of the words of v. 12, where God had said, "I will be with you." From this answer comes that special name for God which is found throughout Scripture, yhwh, Yahweh, the COVENANT name of God, known by his people as "the God who will be with us." See GOD, NAMES OF.

III. The relationship between the names Yahweh and Immanuel. The clear relationship between the personal name of God, Yahweh, and the concept of "God with his people," can be easily and clearly demonstrated. The Hebrew preposition (im H6640 ("with")) occurs at least eighty-nine times in the OT in contexts which indicate God's presence with his people. Either the object of the preposition is named specifically or it is used in conjunction with some pronoun ("with me," "with you," etc.). In all but nine of these passages, the personal name Yahweh occurs as the one who is with his people.

In the remaining nine passages, the context usually makes clear why the name Yahweh does not occur. Sometimes the person speaking is not part of the people of God (Abimelech, Gen. 21:22; Jethro, Exod. 18:19; Pharaoh, 2 Chr. 35:21). The other passages chiefly concern JACOB (Gen. 28:20; 31:5; 35:3; 48:21); since the revelation to Moses had not yet been given, Jacob spoke quite often of God's being with him without using the personal name of God (cf. Exod. 6:3). In the overwhelming number of passages, then, where God's people individually or collectively are assured of his presence, the name Yahweh is used.

IV. The development of the concept in the OT. The concept does occur in certain passages in connection with the patriarchs. Yahweh occurs once in connection with the concept of “God with” in speaking of ABRAHAM (Gen. 24:27), twice with reference to ISAAC (26:3, 28), and three times in the case of Jacob (28:15; 31:3; 46:4). These occurrences may appear inconsistent with the four other references to Jacob, but one must remember that Moses is the author of these passages. We can see that since he knew God as Yahweh, he would understand that same Yahweh to be the One who dealt with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, though they did not actually know God by that name (again see Exod. 6:3).

Four times it is stated that Yahweh is with Moses (Exod. 4:12, 15; Josh. 1:5, 17), in addition to the occurrences in Exod. 3, which have been noted already. Four times it is said of JOSHUA (Deut. 31:23; Josh. 1:5, 9, 17; 3:7). Yahweh is also said to be with the house of Joseph (Jdg. 1:22), with the judges themselves (2:18), and specifically with GIDEON, one of the judges (6:12, 16); then after a considerable lapse of time, with SAMUEL (1 Sam. 3:19), with SAUL (10:7), and with DAVID (17:37; 18:12, 14, 28; 20:13; 2 Sam. 5:10; 7:3, 9; 14:17; 16:18; 1 Ki. 1:37; Ps. 89:3–4, 24). Cf. Ps. 23:4. Finally it is used in connection with SOLOMON (1 Chr. 17:13; 22:11, 16; 28:20; 2 Chr. 1:1). Then after another lapse of time Yahweh is said to be with ASA (2 Chr. 15:2, 9), with JEHOSEPHAT (17:3), and with HEZEKIAH (2 Ki. 18:7), all good kings of Judah.

In a more general sense Yahweh is said to be with “the good” (2 Chr. 19:12), with the believer when he calls on God (Ps. 91:15), and with judges who judge righteously (2 Chr. 19:6). Yahweh frequently is mentioned as being with Israel (Exod. 24:8; 33:16; Num. 23:21; Deut. 2:7; 5:2; 20:1, 4; 29:14; 31:6, 8; 32:12; Jdg. 6:13; 1 Ki. 8:57; 1 Chr. 22:18; 2 Chr. 15:2; 20:17; 32:8; 36:23; Zech. 10:5). More particularly Yahweh is with Judah (2 Chr. 13:12; 32:7–8). However, Yahweh will not be with the Israelites when they fail to follow him (Exod. 24:8) and when they tolerate evil (Josh. 17:12).

From the above passages it is clear that Yahweh is with his people who trust in him, from the time of the establishing of the covenant with Abraham until the end of the OT. Those who walk closely with him in life are more frequently reminded of this fact.

V. The meaning of the concept to God’s people. Clearly, the COVENANT God made with his people is involved in the concept of Immanuel (Exod. 24:8; Deut. 5:2). What does this presence of God mean then to the people themselves? First, it means that God will not leave, forsake, or fail them. That doctrine is taught frequently in Scripture (Deut. 31:6; Josh. 1:5, 7; 3:7; 1 Ki. 8:57; 1 Chr. 28:20). Related to this doctrine is the promise of God’s truth and mercy ever present when Yahweh is with his people (Gen. 24:27; cf. Ps. 89:33; 1 Chr. 17:13). Second, it means that they need not fear evil or be dismayed (Deut. 31:8; 1 Chr. 28:20; 2 Chr. 20:17; Ps. 23:4; Isa. 41:10). They can therefore be strong and of good courage (Deut. 31:23). In the third place, they learn that if Yahweh is with them, they lack nothing (Deut. 2:7). God will purge their evil and perverseness (Num. 13:32; 14:36–37; 32:13), inclining their hearts to go in his way and to keep his commandments (1 Ki. 8:58). This truth then will bring to them PEACE (1 Sam. 20:42; 1 Chr. 22:18), both personal and as a nation. The concept of God with his people is the great distinguishing mark between Israel and the rest of mankind (Exod. 33:16).

There are other benefits related to the covenant of God with his people. He will protect them from their enemies (Gen. 28:15; 31:3; 46:4; Deut. 20:4; Josh. 1:5, 7; Jdg. 2:18; 1 Sam. 18:12, 28), bring victory in battle (Jdg. 1:22; 6:16; 1 Sam. 17:37; 2 Sam. 7:9; 1 Chr. 22:18; 2 Chr. 13:12; 32:7, 8; Zech. 10:5), and cause them to prosper in all that they do (1 Sam. 3:19; 7:3; 10:7; 18:28; 2 Ki. 18:7; 1 Chr. 22:11, 16; 2 Chr. 1:1). The OT then is replete with the concept of Yahweh with his people and with all the benefits that accrue to them by this great covenant. The Immanuel passages of Isa. 7-8 point to the ultimate fulfillment of these promises in the person of One born among men who truly will be “God with us” in the flesh.

VI. The concept of “God with us” in the NT. It is then quite proper to expect that in the NT the coming of Christ is seen as the fulfillment to the utmost of the promise of God to be with his people. At his birth, Jesus was shown to be Immanuel (Matt. 1:23). He is indeed “God with us” in the flesh. This meaning was fully developed in the NT.

A. In Jesus’ earthly life. JOHN THE APOSTLE develops this concept more exhaustively than any other writer of the NT. NICODEMUS, he records, believed that God was with Jesus (Jn. 3:2), and later Jesus assured the disciples that the Father was with him (8:29; 16:32). From this comes the further assurance that Christ would be with the disciples for a little while in the flesh (7:33; 12:35; 13:33; 17:12). Then before his ascension, he assured them that he would never truly leave or forsake them, but be with them forever (Matt. 28:20).

B. The continuing presence of Christ with his church. Jesus, before his ascension, taught his disciples that his departure would make it possible for his Spirit to be with them forever (Jn. 14:16). In the book of Acts the disciples testified that the Father had been with Jesus (Acts 10:38). They also were assured that Christ was now still with them (18:10). Therefore, they were able to assure believers that Christ was and would continue to be with his church. They constantly spoke of the God of peace (Rom. 15:33; Phil. 4:9), and of the grace of the Lord being with the believers (Rom. 16:20; Gal. 6:18). Most emphatically they speak of Christ with believers (Phil. 4:23; 1 Thess. 5:28; 2 Thess. 3:16, 18; et al.).

C. Christ with us forever. When Jesus was on earth, he prayed that the believers should be with him forever (Jn. 17:24). In fulfillment of this prayer, the tabernacle of God in heaven will be with the faithful forever (Rev. 21:3). Those who have died in Christ will be with him when he returns to gather the remainder (1 Thess. 3:13).

In summary, the term “Immanuel” is directly related to the biblical doctrine of the presence of God with his people, so clearly promised in Exod. 3:12, so eloquently declared in Isa. 7:14, and so certainly applied to Jesus in Matt. 1:23. The closing wish expressed in Scripture is just this—“The grace of the Lord Jesus be with God’s people. Amen” (Rev. 22:21; lit., “with the saints”). (See further W. DeBurgh, The Messianic Prophecies of Isaiah [1863], 41–78; W. Arnold in JBL 24 [1905]: 107–65; E. Kraeling in JBL 50 [1931]: 277–97; J. Hyatt in VT 5 [1955]: 130–36; J. Immer (person) im’uhr (אִמֶּר H612, “lamb”). (1) A descendant of AARON whose family in the time of DAVID made up the sixteenth division of priests (1 Chr. 24:14). He thus became the ancestral head of that division and gave his name to an extensive family of descendants; among the priestly clans that returned from the EXILE, his was the second largest (1 Chr. 9:12; Ezra 2:37; Neh. 7:40; 11:13; 1 Esd. 5:24 [KJV, “Meruth”]). Two members of his family at that time, Hanani and Zebadiah, were among those who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:20; 1 Esd. 9:21 [KJV, “Emmer”]).

(2) Father of PASHHUR; the latter was chief officer of the temple in the time of JEREMIAH (Jer. 20:1). It is likely, however, that “son of Immer” here is an indication of ancestry, in which case this Immer would be the same as #1 above; the phrase then distinguishes Pashhur from another priest identified as the “son [descendant] of Malkijah” (21:1; Malkijah was the head of the fifth division, 1 Chr. 24:9).

(3) Father (or ancestor) of ZADOK, who made repairs to the wall of Jerusalem opposite his house, near the HORSE GATE (Neh. 3:29). This Immer too may be the same as #1 above.

Immer (place) im’uhr (  H613, “lamb”). One of five Babylonian places from which certain Jewish exiles returned who were unable to prove their Israelite ancestry (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61). If Immer here is indeed a place name, its location is unknown. However, the parallel in the APOCRYPHA reads, “The following are those who came up from Tel-melah and Tel-harsha, under the leadership of Cherub, Addan [KJV, Aalar], and Immer” (1 Esd. 5:36 NRSV, following a generally accepted conjectural emendation), and some scholars argue that this reading is original.

immortality. In the Scriptures, immortality (athanasia G114; cf. aphtharsia G914, “incorruptibility”), which is attributed to God, and secondarily to human beings, means freedom from decay, dissolution, and DEATH.

I. The immortality of God. The apostle PAUL states the fundamental truth that God alone is intrinsically free from subjection to death; he does not cease to exist or to be active as God (1 Tim. 6:16). This same truth is enunciated by Christ: “the Father has life in himself” (Jn. 5:26). The immortality of God contrasts sharply with human mortality or corruptibility, which comes to expression vividly in the decay and dissolution of the BODY (Rom. 1:23). God’s incorruptibility does not reside in the fact that he is SPIRIT without body, but in his essential immortality as the living and true God (1 Thess. 1:9). Since God alone is immortal, any immortality predicated of human beings can only be derivative, the gift of grace.

Scripture testifies repeatedly that God is eternally, characteristically, and uniquely the living God (Ps. 18:46; 90:2; 115:3-8; Jer. 10:11). This life is not a bare existing or being. God has created and upholds all things by his power (Gen. 1:1; Heb. 1:3). He knows what takes place in the earth; he punishes the wicked, but intercedes to save his people. See ETERNITY; GOD, BIBLICAL DOCTRINE OF.

II. The immortality of human beings

A. In the OT. God made man a living creature (Gen. 2:7) and placed him in the Garden of Eden. The loving obedience required of him was focused in the command not to eat of a particular tree, and the threat attached to disobedience was death (2:17). The implication is that humans were not created mortal. God’s word to ADAM that he was dust and would return to dust (3:19) imposed physical dissolution as punishment, and does not, as commonly understood, describe merely the outworking of a natural process.

On the other hand, man as created was not truly and properly immortal. The probation carried with it the possibility of failure and subjection to death. Obedience would receive as a reward of grace (not of merit) confirmation in life corresponding to the immortality of the NT. When Adam sinned, he died spiritually, being alienated from the source of life. Physically, he was expelled from the original sphere of life in the garden and was denied access to the tree of life. Bodily death intervened at a later point, but not before Adam received the promise of life through the seed of the woman (Gen. 3:15, 20).

The basic principle established from the beginning is the inviolable correlation of SIN and DEATH on the one hand, and of RIGHTEOUSNESS and LIFE on the other (cf. Deut. 30:15-20; Ezek. 33:10-20; Rom. 2:7-8). Confirmation in righteousness carries with it confirmation in life, or immortality. God, who is uncreated and perfectly holy, is uniquely immortal. The unfolding of the principle of sin and death is evidenced in the repeated refrain of Gen. 5, "...and he died," but preeminently in the virtually total destruction of the race by the flood (Gen. 6:5-7). The correlation of righteousness and life is manifest in the statement that God took ENOCH away because he walked with God (5:24), and in the experience of the PATRIARCHS.

Length of life and sustained fellowship with the covenant God and community is the normal expectation of the righteous. ABRAHAM "died in a good old age, an old man and full of years." His passing was a transition to renewed fellowship with his people (Gen. 25:8). Similar circumstances are recorded of other great men of faith (e.g., Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Joshua, David). The fact of death is not denied, but even the place of burial becomes a sign of hope (50:13). Death is a transition from life to life. The God of the fathers is the God of the living (Matt. 22:32), and death results in deepened fellowship with him (Ps. 16:11; 17:15; 73:24).

Artifacts discovered in the tumulus at Vize (NW Turkey, ancient Thracia). Objects were buried with the dead for their use in the afterlife.

The wicked, however, are prematurely cut off from the land of the living (Exod. 14:28; Ps. 52:5; Ezek. 32). The heathen who are without God naturally fall into this category, but also the disobedient from among the covenant people (Lev. 19:8; Num. 16:31-33). Death for the wicked is not annihilation but descent into SHEOL or the Pit. It is a conscious experience of separation from God, of destruction, and therefore of retribution (Ps. 49:11, 14, 19; 88:10-12; Isa. 14:9-11). The commonly accepted thesis that Sheol is the receptacle indifferently of the righteous as well as the wicked needs further clarification and refinement. The hypothetical descent of JOSEPH and JACOB into Sheol would result from an early and unnatural death (Gen. 37:35; 44:31). Premature death is experienced as judgment whether deserved or not (cf. Isa. 38:10, 17-18). JOB falsely imagines that the supposed rest and peace of Sheol is preferable to continued earthly life (Job 3:11-26). It is an expression of the same weakness of faith which causes him to curse the day of his birth. Ultimately Job dies in the full enjoyment of family, wealth, and old age (42:10-17).

The major problem for OT piety arises when the righteous die prematurely and the prosperity of the wicked is prolonged on the earth. The solution lies in the realization that the wicked ultimately will be destroyed (Ps. 37:10; 73:16-20); but, in mercy, God spares the righteous from the brink of total destruction (Ps. 30:3; 116; and frequently in the Psalms). The salvation of the righteous is grounded ultimately in the substitutionary death and resurrection of the Lord's Servant (Isa. 53:8, 10). The reality of a resurrection that includes the body comes to explicit expression in the OT (Job 19:25-27; Isa. 25:8; 26:19; Dan. 12:2).

B. In the NT. Throughout the intertestamental period there was a growing apprehension, more or less adequate, of the doctrine of the RESURRECTION, though it was denied in some quarters. PAUL is able to align himself with the teaching of the PHARISEES over against the SADDUCEES (Acts 23:6; 24:14). However, it is through the gospel of Jesus Christ, who abolished death, that life and immortality are brought to light (2 Tim. 1:10; the word here, lit. "incorruptibility," suggests that life through Jesus Christ is not to be dissociated from the resurrection of the body).

Jesus bore the sins of his people and therefore endured their full penalty. He was cut off from the land of the living in his youth, but his death made ATONEMENT for sin. When the penalty was exhausted, he was raised from the grave with a newness of life corresponding to the perfect divine righteousness which he embodies (Ps. 16:9-10; Isa. 53:8-12; Acts 2:27-28; 13:35). Therefore he is the living one who died but is alive forevermore (Rev. 1:18). By the preaching of the gospel, Christ's own are regenerated and through faith are united to their Savior. From him they receive eternal life. Immortality is, in the biblical pattern of thought, not a universal natural possession but the gift of redemptive GRACE.

Because the Savior gives life at every point where death has intervened, the body also participates in immortality (1 Cor. 15:54). The bodies of those alive at the consummation are transformed, while the bodies of deceased believers are transformed in the resurrection; all are made incorruptible (15:51-55). The necessary correlation of righteousness and life finds fulfillment in the IMPUTATION of Christ's righteousness to believers. Even in the OT it is not human righteousness that is crowned with life. By faith Enoch was pleasing to God and did not see death (Heb. 11:5-6). The justifying FAITH of Abraham is in God who gives life to the dead (Rom. 4:17). The gospel of both Testaments is that the righteous by faith shall live (Hab. 2:4; Rom. 1:17).

The NT deepens the ancient truth that believers who experience the unnatural lingering consequences of sin in the death of the body before the resurrection are more than compensated by a continuing and fuller communion with God (2 Cor. 5:1-5; Phil. 1:23). Their bodies also are still united to Christ awaiting the resurrection (Rom. 8:23). The INTERMEDIATE STATE of both the righteous and the wicked is one of conscious experience rather than annihilation (see PUNISHMENT, ETERNAL). The wicked begin to endure the torments of destruction (Lk. 16:23), but only at the final judgment in the unity of body and spirit are they cast into HELL forever (Rev. 20:13-15). The resurrection of the unjust (Jn. 5:29; Acts 24:15) reveals that death as penalty does not come to expression exclusively or even primarily in the dissolution of the body.

III. In philosophy and recent theology. The biblical teaching on immortality must be radically distinguished from the notion found in Greek thought (cf. Acts 17:32), but also in later idealist philosophy, that the SOUL is naturally immortal, while the BODY being mortal is subject to death and decay. The Greek idea has been incorporated into Roman Catholic theology and is prevalent in some forms of Protestantism. This view presupposes a fundamental but unbiblical anthropological DUALISM of body and soul. While the Bible recognizes a duality, God deals with human beings in their created integrity. Immortality conceived of merely as a personal, conscious, disembodied existence that continues beyond the grave does not measure up to the richness of blessing comprehended by the term in the NT.

Immanuel Kant rejected all attempts to demonstrate the fact of immortality from the substantiality of the soul, but maintained it as a postulate of the practical reason. It is not the redemptive reality revealed and wrought finally and fully through Jesus Christ alone. The philosophy of the Cosmomic Idea (D. H. T. Vollenhoven, H. Dooyeweerd) has exposed the unbiblical character of much philosophical speculation, but has been less successful in establishing a positive view of immortality.

Recent theology has vigorously opposed Christian accommodation to the Greek view by stressing the unity of man. There is a corresponding recognition that the biblical hope of life is in terms of the resurrection of the body (O. Cullmann). The biblical teaching is effectively dissipated, however, when the resurrection is conceived of as suprahistorical (geschichtlich) event (neoorthodoxy) or as myth pointing simultaneously to man's existence in, and transcendence of, the world (existentialist-oriented theologies).

immutability. The quality of not being susceptible to change. In theology it signifies the attribute, or perfection, of God whereby he remains the same in his divine nature and purpose. See GOD, BIBLICAL DOCTRINE OF. The heavens and the earth, the work of God's hands, will perish, says the psalmist, but he will endure; they change, but he is the same and his years have no end. Therefore, believers and their children can dwell secure (Ps. 102:26-29; Heb. 1:10-12). He alone is God forever, with none before him and no god after him or beside him (Isa. 43:10; Deut. 32:39). He is the first and the last (Isa. 41:4; 48:2), who alone is immortal (Rom. 1:23; 1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16). Because the Lord does not change, the sons of Jacob are not consumed (Mal. 3:6). Jesus Christ, Son of God as well as Son of Man, is the same yesterday, today, and forever (Heb. 13:8).

God is immutable also in his saving purpose. He will fulfill his purpose for us because his steadfast love "endures forever" (Ps. 138:8). "He who is the Glory of Israel does not lie or change his mind; for he is not a man, that he should change his mind" (1 Sam. 15:29). "God's gifts and his call are irrevocable" (Gk. ametamelētos G294, lit. "not to be repented of," Rom. 11:29). He does not cast away his people (11:1); rather, he completes what he begins (Phil. 1:6).

There are passages that seem to contradict this doctrine. In anthropomorphic terms God is represented as changing his mind or repenting (Gen. 6:6; 1 Sam. 15:11; Jer. 18:8, 10; 26:3; Joel 2:13; Amos 7:3; Jon. 3:9; 4:2); as changing his purpose (Exod. 32:10-14); of becoming angry and then turning from his anger (Exod. 32:10-14; Num. 11:1,10; Deut. 13:17; 2 Chr. 12:12; 30:8; Ps. 106:40; Zech. 10:3). See ANTHROPOMORPHISM. On one occasion Israel experiences the love of God, on another his wrath. God becomes man in the person of Jesus Christ and becomes subject to the vicissitudes of human experience. The ascended Christ can sympathize with our weaknesses (Heb. 4:15), and the Holy Spirit can be grieved (Eph. 4:30).

Nevertheless, Scripture remains firm in its insistence that in all these relationships with his people, in which God is set forth almost as one of them, he remains God and that his purposes do not fail. He accommodates himself to his people in his revelation and presence among them, but he ever remains the same. That is why he is referred to so often as the ROCK (Deut. 32:4, 15, 18, 30-31, 37; 1 Sam. 2:2; 2 Sam. 22:3, 32; Ps. 19:14; 31:2; 62:2, 6; et al.). He does not change in his nature or purpose. His people can trust in him. This does not mean, however, that God is inert or inactive. He is within, as well as outside, his creation and ever working (Jn. 5:17). Immutability is not immobility but God's sovereign constancy over against, as well as within, a universe of change.

Imna im'nuh (יִמְנָה H3557, "[God] holds back" or "strong"). Son of Helem, listed among the brave warriors who were heads of families of the tribe of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:35; cf. v. 40). Some scholars believe that Imna is a variant of IMNAH and (through textual corruption) of IMRAH, both of which appear in the same genealogy (vv. 30, 36; see D. V. Edelman in ABD, 3:396-97).

Imnah im'nuh (יִמְנָה H3555, "fortunate" or "[God] assigns"). (1) Son of ASHER, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Imnite clan (Gen. 46:17 [KJV, "Jinnah"]; Num. 26:44 [KJV, "Jimna," "Jinnites"]; 1 Chr. 7:30). According to some scholars, IMRAH (1 Chr. 7:36) is a textual corruption of Imnah. See also IMNA.

(2) A Levite whose son KORE was in charge of the EAST GATE and of the free will offerings during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:14).

Imnite im'nite. See IMNAH.

impediment of speech. See DISEASE.

imprecatory psalms. In the book of PSALMS, the authors sometimes appeal in PRAYER to God requesting that he pour out his wrath upon their enemies (notable examples are Ps. 55; 59; 69; 79; 109; 137). Even JEREMIAH prayed for God's vengeance to be meted out to those who persecuted him (Jer. 11). Such prayers have raised a moral difficulty. This is especially true when these petitions are seen as prayers of revenge and therefore regarded as contrary to the teaching of Jesus (Matt. 5:43-48).

PAUL, in writing to the Romans, used the language of imprecatory prayers to indict those who in their sinfulness defiantly oppose God (Rom. 3:10-18). When viewed from the perspective of a holy God, the question does arise—as it did with ZEPHANIAH and HABAKKUK—concerning God’s tolerance of sin. In the case of JEREMIAH, the circumstances and the context are partially given. Jeremiah’s enemies were seeking the life of a man who had been commissioned to proclaim God’s message to a generation awaiting judgment. If Jeremiah, however, made this request merely on the basis of a self-pitying motive, it must be recognized that possibly his prayer was not acceptable to God.

Basically significant in consideration of these imprecatory passages is the fact that such expressions represent prayers or appeals to God. Those who express them do not execute them but make their appeal to God to implement their request. Ultimately the appeal is subject to divine discretion. Jeremiah declared that God exercises kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth (Jer. 9:23-24).

When ABRAHAM prayed for the salvation of the wicked cities of SODOM and GOMORRAH, the cities were not saved, but the righteous people were rescued. Abraham made his appeal on the basis that ultimately the judge of all the earth would do right (Gen. 18:25). When James and John (see JAMES I; JOHN THE APOSTLE) appealed to Jesus to destroy the SAMARITANS (Lk. 9:54-55), their prayer was not answered. Whatever the human motivation was in reference to these requests, they were given consideration only in terms of God’s righteous judgment. This same principle undoubtedly prevailed concerning the imprecatory psalms, of which relatively little is known about the particular circumstances in which they were written. (Cf. J. Vos in WTJ 4 [1941-42]: 123-38; H. E. Guillebaud, Some Moral Difficulties [1949], 126-35; J. E. Adams, War Psalms of the Prince of Peace: Lessons from the Imprecatory Psalms [1991].)

imputation. The act of attributing something to a person. The Hebrew verb ḥāšab H3108 (“to value, consider”) and the Greek verb logizomai G3357 (“to count, estimate, consider”) can both be used in the sense of setting to one’s account or reckoning something to a person. It is said in Gen. 15:6 that God reckoned righteousness to believing ABRAHAM; that is, God regarded him as righteous, attributing or crediting to him that which he did not have in himself. In Gal. 3:6 and Rom. 4:3 the apostle PAUL quotes this passage in arguing a person’s JUSTIFICATION by God through GRACE alone.

If Abraham had been able to justify himself by works he might boast, but man is unable thus to save himself. If he should insist on trying it anyway, Paul reasons, “his wages are not credited to him as a gift, but as an obligation” (Rom. 4:4). If, however, he does not seek to achieve his own justification, “but trusts God who justifies the wicked, his faith is credited as righteousness” (4:5). The meaning is not that God accepted Abraham’s FAITH instead of perfect righteousness as the meritorious ground for his justification. It is rather that God accepted Abraham because he trusted in God rather than in anything that he could do. The former meaning is excluded, first, by the apostle’s argument that Abraham was justified with no merit whatsoever. Justification takes place “freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus” (Rom. 3:24); the fourth chapter uses Abraham and DAVID as examples of salvation by free, unmerited grace. Second, it is excluded by Paul’s conception of faith, which is simple trust in the grace of God manifest in Christ, with no claim to merit.

After the mention of Abraham as an illustration of salvation by pure grace, the apostle refers to David, who pronounced a blessing on those to whom God reckons righteousness apart from works:

“Blessed are they whose transgressions are forgiven, / whose sins are covered. / Blessed is the man whose sin the Lord will never count against him” (Rom. 4:7-8). The Scripture from which these lines are taken (Ps. 32:1-2), like the writings of Paul, emphasizes the sinner’s hopelessness apart from God and the sovereignty of grace. In utter weakness the psalmist confesses his transgressions. He knows that only God can forgive sin. The person who is forgiven is not regarded as wicked, for the Lord does not impute to him his iniquity, but is reckoned as a child of God. His sin is covered; he is counted righteous.

In order to emphasize the relevance to his readers of this teaching about the gracious imputation of righteousness to Abraham, the apostle included all those of later generations who come to God as Abraham did and have faith reckoned to them. “The words ‘it was credited to him’ were written not for him alone, but also for us, to whom God will credit righteousness—for us who believe in him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead” (Rom. 4:23-24; cf. v. 11b).

That this reckoning, or imputation, of righteousness to the believer lies at the heart of the biblical doctrine of SALVATION is corroborated by other Scripture. The apostle Paul uses the phrase “righteousness/justice of God” nine times (Rom. 1:17; 3:5, 21-26; 10:3; 2 Cor. 5:21), and in most of these instances it is mentioned in order to teach that God grants the sinner a new legal standing; that is, the person is counted righteous even while a sinner. A righteousness of God “apart from the law” has been manifested, says Paul, although both law and prophets bear witness to it. It is a righteousness of God “effective through faith in Christ for all who have such faith” (Rom. 3:22 NEB). This righteousness is seen in Christ who brought redemption. In him God proves that he is righteous when he justifies the sinful believer (3:25-26). Law is not overthrown but upheld in this redemption of lost man (v. 31).

Later in the same epistle the author affirms that the great error of his own nation was its ignorance of the righteousness of God and its attempt to establish its own righteousness: “they did not submit to God’s righteousness” (Rom. 10:3). Men and women are not righteous in themselves: “all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God” (3:23). They need God’s righteousness, which has been made manifest in Christ. Above all else Paul wants to be found in Christ. Concerning this and its relation to righteousness, he writes: “...not having a righteousness of my own that comes from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ—the righteousness that comes from God and is by faith” (Phil. 3:9). This righteousness is imputed, or reckoned, to him so that, while strictly speaking it is not his own, yet God reckons it to him; thus the believer is simul justus ac peccator (at the same time righteous and a sinner), to use Luther’s phrase.

The imputation of the righteousness of Christ to the sinner lies at the heart of the doctrine of salvation. It is strange then to hear it denied, as, for example, by Vincent Taylor: “Imputation...can never be anything else than an ethical fiction...Righteousness cannot be transferred from the account of one person to another. Righteousness can no more be imputed to a sinner than bravery to a coward or wisdom to a fool. If through faith a man is accounted righteous, it must be because, in a reputable sense of the term, he is righteous, and not because another is righteous in his stead” (Forgiveness and Reconciliation [1948], 57). With such denial of a cardinal teaching one is not surprised to read the following definition of justification later in the discussion: “It is the divine activity in which God gives effect to his redeeming work in Christ by making possible that righteous mind necessary to communion with himself” (ibid., 66). Taylor here denies clear biblical teaching and endangers the Christian doctrine of salvation. (More recently, some evangelical scholars here questioned, on different grounds, the traditional understanding of imputation. See the discussion by B. Vickers, Jesus’ Blood and Righteousness [2006], which reaffirms this doctrine.)

A second sense in which the word imputation has been used in Christian doctrine is the reckoning of our sin to Jesus Christ. “God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor. 5:21). In this classic text the apostle brings together the two truths of the doctrine of salvation: the burden of human sin became Christ’s burden, and the righteousness of God, or of Christ, became ours. The meaning obviously is not that Christ actually became a sinner, for all of the gospel contradicts that position. It is rather that by virtue of his identification with the human race sin was reckoned to him. Although it is not explicitly said in Scripture that sin is reckoned, or imputed, to Christ, the meaning is clear. It is said that he “bore our sins in his body on the tree” (1 Pet. 2:24), that “the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all” (Isa. 53:6; cf. Acts 8:35), that he was made to “bear” or “take away” the iniquities of his people (Isa. 53:11; Heb. 9:28). Each of these passages of Scripture, the one from Hebrews especially, has in mind the OT institution of SACRIFICE in which guilt was symbolically and ceremoniously transferred to an animal with the laying on of hands on the head of the victim. Applied to Christ, to whom the sacrifices of the OT pointed, the teaching is that he “bore the punishment of our sin vicariously, its guilt having been imputed to Him. The thought of the prophecy is, as Delitzsch says, that of vicarious punishment, which implies the idea of the imputation of the guilt of our sins to Christ” (C. W. Hodge in ISBE [1929], 3:1464).

The same teaching is set forth graphically by Paul in Gal. 3:13, where Christ is said to have “become a curse for us.” The meaning is that he bore the penalty for human sin, that, as Luther declared when commenting on this passage, God dealt with him as though he were the greatest of sinners. Sin was imputed, was reckoned, to him so that man might be forgiven. Imputation is thus bound together with the teaching of vicarious salvation.

Besides the two above doctrines of imputation, a third is the imputation of the SIN of ADAM to the human race, based on the narrative of the FALL (Gen. 3; Rom. 5:12-21; 1 Cor. 15:21-22). According to one interpretation of this Scripture, Adam’s sin was imputed to his posterity by virtue of his having been the federal representative of the human race. Among those who hold this view, there is a difference as to whether that sin was imputed “mediately” (J. La Place, 17th cent.) or “immediately” (also known as the “federalist” view; C. Hodge, Systematic Theology, 3 vols. [1871-73], 2:192-227). According to another interpretation of the fall, Adam’s sin was not merely imputed to his descendants but, inasmuch as they were generically “in” him, his sin is truly theirs. This latter “realistic” theory of the imputation of Adam’s sin was held by W. G. T. Shedd (Dogmatic Theology, 3 vols. in 4 [1889], 2:148-257) and A. H. Strong (Systematic Theology [1912], 597-637). (See further the summaries by B. B. Warfield in SHERK, 5:465-67, reprinted in his Biblical and Theological Studies [1952], 262-69.)

Imrah im’ruh (יִמְרָה H3559, possibly “he rebels”). Son of Zophah and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:36). Some scholars emend the text to IMNAH.

Imri im’ri (יִמְרִי H617, prob. short form of יִמְרִיָּה H618 “Yahweh has said”). (1) Son of Bani and descendant of JUDAH through PEREZ (1 Chr. 9:4). Some have thought he may be the same as the AMARIAH mentioned in a partially parallel passage (Neh. 11:4).

(2) Father (or ancestor) of ZACCUR; the latter helped rebuild the wall of Jerusalem in NEHEMIAH’S time (Neh. 3:2).

incarnation (Lat. incarnatio, from carō [gen. car-nis], “flesh”). In Christian theology, this term refers to the event summed up in Jn. 1:14, “The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us.”

I. The term

A. Derivation. The term can be traced to the Latin version of Jn. 1:14 (“et Verbum caro factum est”) and was used frequently by Latin writers from the 4th cent. There is no exact Greek equivalent in the NT, but the phrase en sarki (“in the flesh”) is not uncommon (1 Jn. 4:2, “Jesus Christ has come in the flesh”; cf. Rom. 8:3; Eph. 2:15; Col. 1:22; 1 Tim. 3:16; 1 Pet. 3:18; 4:1; 2 Jn. 7).

B. Signification. This term refers, in the first instance, to the act wherein the eternal Son “became flesh,” but it is extended to signify the whole experience of human life into which he entered, and also embraces within its reference the fact that Christ still bears his humanity and will do so forever.

II. The origin of the doctrine. While, in the light of the NT, certain OT passages can be seen to point to the incarnation, the OT predictions were not such that the incarnation was anticipated. The idea of God becoming man would have been and still is a scandal to the Jew, and only the overwhelming evidence seen in the person and ministry of Christ could lead any to believe that he was none less than the incarnate Son of God. This belief was no ideal that owed its origin to the fertile imagination of the early church (which allegedly “wrote back” into the Gospels myths of the miraculous birth and ministry of Jesus). The doctrine arose out of the observation of the actual life of Jesus and against all possible explanation of what had been observed.

The Latin inscription on this altar reads, "The Word became flesh" (Jn. 1:14). From the cave at the Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth.

Men found in their midst this Galilean, Jesus. By virtue of his manner of life and personal character they could not but ask who he was—Messiah? Prophet? Or more? There gradually dawned the almost incredible conviction that, human Messiah and prophet that he was, he was so much more; man that he was, he was also divine. The Son of God had “become flesh and made his dwelling among us.”

III. The NT presentation

A. *The Synoptic Gospels. Both Matthew and Luke open with accounts of the miraculous conception of Jesus. See VIRGIN BIRTH. Matthew interprets this unique birth to mean the special presence of God (Matt. 1:23, citing Isa. 7:14). In Luke the angelic messenger designates Jesus Son of the Most High, Son of God (Lk. 1:32, 35). This is not the primary viewpoint from which Jesus is presented in the synoptics. Rather, he is shown as a human child, of claimed descent from Adam, Abraham, and David (Matt. 1:1-17; Lk. 3:23-28). In Luke’s genealogy, Adam is termed “son of God” (3:38), so that as a human Jesus shared in this sonship, the sonship common to all people as the “offspring of God” (Acts 17:29). He went through the normal stages of human development (Lk. 2:52, which speaks of his fourfold development: wisdom, stature, favor with God, favor with men), a full-orbed childhood-to-manhood experience. As a man he was subject to hunger, weariness, human emotions (Matt. 4:2; 8:24; Mk. 1:41; 3:5; Lk. 2:44).

This man came before the notice of men, and all three evangelists trace the impact of his ministry, and the way people were constrained to ask, “Who is he?” “What kind of man is this?” (Matt. 8:27; cf. 16:13-14). The evangelists’ obvious intention is to enable the reader to see as people saw when they beheld his ministry (Matt. 16:16-17), so that, with them, it might be clearly perceived who he really was. The evangelists recorded Jesus’ prayers and other words by which he assumed a relationship with his Father that in essence was different from that of all other human beings (Matt. 10:32-33; 11:27-28; 15:13; 16:17; 18:10-14, 35; Lk. 2:29; 23:34, 46; 24:49). Not only did he claim unique sonship, but he was owned as distinctively the SON OF GOD in the voice at his baptism (see JESUS CHRIST V.C) and at the TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. 3:17; 17:5). Even the demons recognized him (Matt. 8:28; Mk. 3:11).

The synoptics carefully balance Jesus’ common humanity against this uniqueness. Constantly he uses his self-designation, SON OF MAN. The full significance of this term cannot be discussed here, but wherever the roots of this term may be traced and whatever else it may mean, it undoubtedly signified both the genuineness and the representative character of Christ's humanity. He was truly human, sharing with all men and women that which belongs essentially to humanity.

B. Johannine literature. The marked difference between the Gospel of John and the synoptics is due largely to the different viewpoints from which they are written. Here, the primary view is not of the Man whom men came to see as more than man, but of the eternal Son who came into the world to live as man. It is not that John stresses the DEITY OF CHRIST at the expense of his humanity; indeed, one reads more of the human experiences of joy, weariness, and the like in this gospel than in the others. But the primary standpoint, regulative of the whole gospel, is that in an unbroken continuity he who was "from the beginning" entered into human history as a human participant in this history.

The primary question then is not, Who is this man? but, What kind of life and to what purpose did the Word, as man, live in this world? The key, then, to the whole gospel (and much more the foundation to the entire Gospel of John than are the birth stories to the Gospels of Matthew and Luke) is the prologue, Jn. 1:1-18. The heart of this are vv. 1-3, 14, 18, particularly: theos ēn ho logos...kai ho logos sarx egeneto ("the Word was God...and the Word became flesh"). Even more directly than the Pauline "human form" (Phil. 2:8), the use of this term "flesh" (sarx G4922) indicates the full extent of the incarnation, and by his statement John expressly counters the docetic error (cf. 1 Jn. 4:2-3). See LOGOS.

The sarx egeneto of Jn. 1:14 is to be compared with the egeneto (impf. of ginomai G1181) in v. 3. The significance is that all things "came into being"—what was not came to be. Similarly, what the Word previously was not, he came to be, that is, "flesh" (v. 14). We are not to conclude, however, that from being God alone he became man alone, for he continued to be the "only begotten" (v. 18), manifesting the Father's GLORY.

A certain temporality (see below) may perhaps be read into the verb eskēnōsen ("dwelt, pitched a tent, tabernacled"), but the primary reference is to the substantial reality and presence of the Word in this world. Just as the TABERNACLE was a real feature of the Israelite camp, and enshrined the manifestation of the glory and presence of God, so was Christ in "real presence" among men, and in and from him shone the divine glory—the glory primarily of love and moral grandeur (cf. Exod. 33:18-19; other aspects of his divine glory were hidden—see below).

In Jn. 1:18 one purpose of the incarnation is explicitly stated: that this was God's word to human beings; this was he who has "declared" (exēgēsato—the verb has no object), that is, opened to mortals the divine mysteries (v. 18). The clearly attested reading monogenēs theos (read in apposition, "only-begotten, God") emphatically asserts that he who was made flesh is the unique Son, none less than God. This makes his REVELATION an immediate and direct and therefore a truly authentic representation and manifestation of God.

John apparently had no adoptionist error immediately in mind, nor does he make any reference to the mode of incarnation set forth in Matthew and Luke. His account clearly shows that Jesus was not simply a man in whom the Logos took up residence.

Though in this prologue philosophical and metaphysical questions of vast import are touched upon, the evangelist's interest is intensely practical. The truths of the prologue lie at the base of the rest of the gospel; it is all that which gives validity and significance to the ministry of Jesus. As the Word, his life on earth is a revelation; as the only-begotten, God, incarnate, he can be the "lamb of God" able to "take away the sins of the world" (Jn. 1:29). It is because of who he is that his works become “signs” (2:11; 20:30), and his personal claims can be taken at fullest value.

That Christ was Son of God from all eternity follows from two of his recorded claims: his descent from heaven (Jn. 3:13) and his pre-Abrahamic existence (8:58; cf. the self-assertion in 17:5). In the first of these another truth is carefully presented. This preexistent Son, whom God gave (3:16), is just as truly Son of Man (3:13-14; cf. 6:27, 53, 62; 12:23; 13:31). This title occurs much less frequently in the fourth gospel than in the synoptics, but against the theme of the prologue its use is profoundly significant. So too are indications of human suffering in body and soul (Jn. 4:6; 11:35; 12:27; 19:28).

Throughout his earthly ministry he claimed immediate oneness with the Father. This oneness meant not simply a fullness of fellowship or unity of purpose, but a certain equality (Jn. 5:18-23; 10:30, 38; 14:8-11). From this last reference at least two significant conclusions follow: (1) In the fullest sense possible Jesus claimed to be the “image of God,” a full and true revelation of God. (2) There is no “God beyond God,” none beyond him who is made manifest in Christ. Not to say that all that God is, all that ever ultimately is to be known, was visible to men in the incarnate Christ. But all that is revealed in him is a revelation of the one and only true God. The incarnation is the incarnation of the one true God (1:1, 14), and thus a revelation which will never be found to have been in any way false. To question or deprecate the full value of this revelation in Christ is to dishonor God himself (cf. 5:23).

In theme, the opening verses of 1 John are not unlike those of the gospel, though the terms used (“heard,” “seen,” “touched,” 1 Jn. 1:1) more graphically present Christ as not only in the flesh but present to men of flesh: the Word was open to the most direct observation possible. None can deny in any regard the reality of the incarnation without thereby being found to oppose Christ himself, and to be estranged from the Father (2:22-23; 4:1-3; 2 Jn. 7).

This artistic impression from the Church of the Annunciation in Nazareth reads, “Today a Savior has been born to you” (Lk. 2:11).

C. Acts. The early chapters of the book of Acts are especially significant as representing the earliest understanding of the church after the ASCENSION OF CHRIST. There is not, perhaps, the full apprehension of Christ’s person that is found in the Epistles. It is not true, however, as some assert, that there is to be found here an adoptionist theology—that Christ, the man, in due time was made divine. The assigning of certain OT passages to Christ (Acts 2:25-28, 34), and titles given to Christ, such as “the Holy and Righteous One,” “the Author of life” (3:14-15; 7:52), show that Christ is more than mere man. Paul, upon his conversion, almost immediately called Jesus “the Son of God” (9:20).

D. Pauline epistles. Paul sees the cross, by which Christ became the propitiation for our sins and reconciled us to God (Rom. 3:25; 8:3, 32; 2 Cor. 5:19; cf. Eph. 2:13-16), as the real purpose and goal of the incarnation. Moreover, it is that death, and not simply the incarnate life of Christ, that reveals to us the fact and measure of the love of God (Rom. 5:8).

While the earthly life of Christ, and especially his death and resurrection, is of great importance to Paul (see, for example, 1 Cor. 15:3-5, 12-20), the focus of his attention is on the present exalted Christ (2 Cor. 3:17; Col. 3:1-4), though at the same time Christ is to us what he is, not only because of who he is, but also because of what he accomplished in his earthly ministry (1 Cor. 1:23).

Paul constantly designates Jesus Christ as LORD, a term that appears unquestionably to recognize his deity. It is the risen, exalted Christ of whom he so speaks (Phil. 2:11), but there is no suggestion that while he was on earth he was any less the Son of God. It was the Son who came from God (Gal. 4:4), lived on earth, and is now exalted—the one person throughout. So important is it that Jesus is the risen Lord, that he must so be acknowledged if one is to know him as Savior (Rom. 10:9).

There is no doubt with Paul concerning the reality of Christ's humanity. Christ is the "second Adam" (Acts 5:17-18). However, in two passages claiming his physical descent from David (Rom. 1:2; 9:5) and his real humanity, there is the careful qualification, "according to the flesh." Christ is also of other Sonship.

Three passages call for special note: Gal. 4:4-5, already noted, recognizes the preexistence and deity of him who was born in Bethlehem, but also his essential humanity in the phrase, "born of woman." Further, the extent of his condescension in becoming man is seen in his becoming subject to the law designed for sinful men and women.

The second passage is Phil. 2:5-8. Several phrases in these verses have been given widely different interpretations. Full account of these cannot be taken here, but certain facts seem clear. The phrases "form of God" and "form of a servant" and "in the likeness of men" and "in human form" bring out the three essential aspects of the incarnation: he who came into the world was the eternally existing God the Son. He, with no discontinuity of person, became truly man. The now highly exalted Lord is this same Jesus.

The phrase occasioning most controversy is heauton ekenōsen (Phil. 2:7), variously rendered, "made himself of no reputation" (KJV), "emptied himself" (NRSV), "laid it aside" (Goodspeed), "stripped himself [of all privileges and rightful dignity]" (Amplified Bible). Though "emptied himself" is the most literal rendering, its adequacy may be open to question. In any case, the vital issue still is the need to determine what it was that he laid aside. Charles Wesley's "emptied himself of all but love" is purely poetical. It could not be that he renounced any essential elements of deity so that in the flesh he was no longer truly God. Too much elsewhere in Scripture makes this view impossible. Some suggest he laid aside at least the exercise of his divine attributes of omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence, if not the possession of them. Others argue that it was simply certain aspects of the divine glory that were set aside.

Two things seem necessary to say: (1) It is not possible to determine with absolute certainty what was laid aside; one can only say that there was such self-renunciation as was necessary for the assumption of authentic human experience, which involves geographical location, human development in mind and body, the requirement of food and sleep, a real dependence as man upon the heavenly Father, and so on. Truly, "though he was rich...he became poor" (2 Cor. 8:9). (2) It is wholly invalid, on the basis of this passage, to argue for the possible fallibility of the Lord in his earthly ministry. More important, there is solid reason to believe that the question "What did he set aside" may be an inappropriate one. The verb kenōō G3033 is most likely being used figuratively, "to make of no account" (cf. Rom. 4:14), and thus the phrase means "he made himself nothing" (NIV), being parallel to the later phrase, “he humbled himself” (Phil. 2:8).

In the third passage, Col. 1:15-20, Paul speaks of the one person who “is the image of the invisible God” by whom “all things were created,” who “is before all things...firstborn from among the dead...For God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him.” The apostle clearly sees him as the same one throughout his preincarnate existence, his incarnate earthly life, and his present glory. For the purposes of his epistle the emphasis is on the present Christ, he who as Creator, Sustainer, Redeemer, Reconciler, is the all-supreme, all-sufficient Savior and Lord—no other mediator is needed. The later statement that “in Christ all the fullness of the Deity lives [or dwells] in bodily form” (Col. 2:9) refers to Christ in the present.

Obviously, from the way Paul elsewhere strongly contrasts a this-worldly “natural body” with a “spiritual body” (1 Cor. 15:44), there is some great difference between the “body of Christ’s humiliation” and his “body of glory.” The specifically earthly body is his “body of flesh” (Col. 1:22 [NIV, “physical body”]; cf. Heb. 5:7). It might therefore be argued that strictly speaking Christ is not now incarnate. However, he is certainly still possessed of a body (Col. 2:9; cf. Phil. 3:21), and is still man.

Two passages in the PASTORAL EPISTLES are relevant: 1 Tim. 2:5-6 and 3:16. Important in the first is the reference to “the man Christ Jesus,” and the present tense, “there is...one mediator.” Clearly Jesus is still man and by reason of his ATONEMENT (1:6) is able to act as a sufficient mediator. In 3:16 Paul incorporates an early creedal hymn which refers directly to the incarnation in terms of “appearing” (cf. 2 Tim. 1:10).

E. 1 and 2 Peter. In the Petrine literature there is no direct reference to the incarnation, but there is considerable emphasis on the reality of the earthly ministry of Christ, his sufferings and resurrection (1 Pet. 1:3, 11, 19; 2:21-24; 3:18; 4:13; 2 Pet. 1:16), and the glory to which this led (1 Pet. 1:7, 11, 21; 4:13). There is no direct reference to his preincarnate existence, but there is to the predetermined purpose of God that he should appear and should suffer (1 Pet. 1:20; cf. 1:11).

F. Hebrews. The theme of this epistle is the perfection of Christ’s ministry, past, present, and future. He is the perfect Mediator by whom sinful men are reconciled to God. To establish this, the writer points especially to Christ’s deity and humanity, and from this, and by comparison and contrast with the whole OT sacrificial system, to the superiority of his priesthood and the all-sufficiency of his sacrifice.

Reminiscent of John and Colossians is the opening chapter. Reflecting God’s glory and bearing “the exact representation [charaktēr G5917] of his being,” the Son is the perfect Word, the one through whom supremely God has spoken. As the Son he is superior to angels (Heb. 1:3-4) and to all human prophets and leaders (4:3 et al.). Through him all things were created (1:2; cf. Jn. 1:3; Col. 1:16). All this demonstrates the depth of condescension of the Son in becoming man (Heb. 2:9, 14), in every respect like ourselves, including being subject to temptation (2:17; 4:15), even having to “learn obedience” (5:8), yet sinless (4:15).

There is in this book no reference to the mode of the incarnation, but by a quotation in Heb. 10:5-7 from Ps. 40 (following the LXX), there is specific reference to it as the work of God. The language used (“a body you prepared for me”; “I have come to do your will”) is clearly intended to indicate the preincarnate existence of him who thereby came into the world (10:5; cf. 9:11) to be made an offering for sin (10:10).

Here, as elsewhere (cf. 1 Tim. 1:15), the title “Christ” is not limited strictly to the Son after his incarnation, though this might seem technically appropriate. The point is that though at the incarnation he became man, being made “like his brothers” (Heb. 2:17), there was no discontinuity of person. He who was on earth, who lives as High Priest now and forever, is he who lived before and from his exalted position became man (“a little lower than the angels,” 2:9). In this respect, Hebrews is wholly consistent with other epistles.

IV. The OT foreshadowing. NT writers frequently claim the fulfillment of OT prophecies in the life of Jesus, including prediction of the incarnation (see, for example, Matt. 1:23). In general, however, it is difficult to find clear, direct reference to the full truth of the incarnation: that the eternal Son would become flesh and dwell among men and women, and that it would be in this way that the promise of the Servant-Messiah would be fulfilled. In the light of the NT, certain passages take on fuller meaning: the protevangelium of Gen. 3:15 points to Jesus, “the seed of the woman”; Isa. 9:6 foretells the incarnation, speaking of the Son to be given, the child to be born, who is God, and even “Father”; Mic. 5:2-4 foretells at least certain aspects of the incarnation. So also the promise of the “seed of Abraham” (Gen. 12:7; 22:17-18; et al.) finely interpreted by Paul (Gal. 3:16); the promise to David (2 Sam. 7:12-16) which could find complete fulfillment only in Christ, a fact lying at the base of the dilemma Christ raised in reference to Ps. 110:1 (Matt. 22:41-45).

V. Summary of doctrine

A. Nature of the incarnation. From the foregoing examination certain essential truths can be established. (1) The church has spoken of the “preexistence” (more exactly the “preincarnate existence”) of Christ, for he who was born of the Virgin Mary was the Son of God who had lived from all eternity. “In the fulness of time” (Gal. 4:4 KJV), he who was the Creator of all became himself possessor of that human nature which he had created.

(2) Christ became truly human. In saying “the Word became flesh” the evangelist asserts the completeness of the incarnation, that his was the full physico-psychical nature essential to true humanity.

(3) In the incarnation there was a certain temporality yet also permanence. Reference to “the days of his flesh” (Heb. 5:7 KJV) marks out his time as man on earth as a distinct and limited period during which his human nature was in every respect of that kind which God created for life within this physical environment. After this resurrection, Jesus appeared still in the flesh (Lk. 24:39). Yet, at least from and after the ascension, Jesus possesses, not a “lowly body” such as we have, but a body of glory fitted for the environment of the eternal Glory (and into that form we shall be changed, Phil. 3:21). There was thus a temporality in Christ’s assumption of the present bodily form and of the limitations that belong essentially to this present world—but also a permanence, for he became man forever. Glorified, he is still “the man Christ Jesus” (1 Tim. 2:5).

(4) In becoming man, Christ did not cease to be God. It was an incarnation, not a metamorphosis. It is true that certain aspects of his preincarnate existence were not manifested for a time, such as his full divine glory (Jn. 17:5); he also apparently chose not to exercise his uniquely divine powers, at least on his own behalf (Matt. 3:3-4). He did, however, work miracles; and although these were not done without the Father, Christ made no disclaimers such as did Peter and Paul (Acts 3:12; 14:14-15).

(5) From before, and through the “days of his flesh” and forever, Christ is the one person. Furthermore, in the flesh he was a truly unified, or integrated, personality. Though he may properly be regarded as the “God-man,” he was not, and did not act as, two persons, as though there was simply a coordination, albeit perfect, of the two natures. It was the one person, God incarnate, whose life and ministry is recorded in the Gospels.

(6) As IMMANUEL, “God with us,” Christ can be said to represent the absolute immanence of God. He who was present to men and women prior to the incarnation—concerned with their needs, directing their history to achieve his providential purposes, drawing some into the privilege of more immediate fellowship with him—became immediately present with and among them. The incarnation thus demonstrates in fullest measure the immanence of God; such an event, however, was possible in the first place because God is not only transcendent, but also immanent. Then, through the consummation of the ministry of the incarnate Son, every believer experiences the immediate immanence of God in the presence of the indwelling HOLY SPIRIT (Jn. 7:37-39).

B. Mode. The only passages that set out to describe the mode by which the incarnation took place are Matt. 1:18-25; Lk. 1:26-38; 2:1-7. Many have argued against the factuality of these birth narratives, mainly on the basis of assumed improbabilities and highly subjective standards of judgment. However, if the accounts are not accepted, then either Jesus was born of Joseph and Mary through normal sexual intercourse, or Jesus was the illegitimate son of Mary and some other man. In either case, it would make nonsense of the accounts, and it would become impossible to explain the complete untrustworthiness of the evangelists, the contradictory character (in that event) of Mary, and the whole nature, character, and claims of our Lord.

The apparent silence of all other NT writers in this matter need not be explained by asserting that they must have been entirely ignorant of any such thing and that their ignorance must be taken as strong presumption against the credibility of the accounts. Where the incarnation is elsewhere referred to, the attention is not upon its mode but upon its fact and the consequences. Many events described in Scripture are universally accepted on much less documentation. (See VIRGIN BIRTH.)

C. Purpose. At least two purposes are indicated in Scripture, and by some a third is suggested.

1. Revelational. The incarnate Son is the supreme Word, that is, the revelation of God to human beings; this is the force of Jn. 1:1-3, 14, 18. He is the IMAGE OF GOD (2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15). By him, as in no other way, God has spoken (Heb. 1:1-3). He who has seen Jesus has seen the Father (Jn. 14:9). God, as it were, placed himself in the immediate presence of human beings, accessible even to observation by the common senses (1 Jn. 1:1-3), not to be comprehended, however, except through the illumination of the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:7-16). It was the realization of who Christ was and of the nature of his relationship with the Father that gave people a new understanding of God and led them to see his triune nature.

In a double sense Jesus Christ was the image of God. As Son in an immediate and unique sense revealing the divine nature, Jesus was the image of God. As man he also was the perfect example of what was in the mind of God when he said, "Let us make man in our image" (Gen. 1:26). In him is revealed ideal man, man in true and perfect fellowship with God, man as the reflection of the grace and goodness of God, showing the inner graces of love, joy, goodness, and such like. By this, Christ becomes a revelation of what sinful human beings are; by contrast with Christ, they are obviously short of the glory of God (contrast Jn. 1:14 with Rom. 3:23). At the same time he reveals God's purpose for all who commit themselves to his saving purpose, for into this image God transforms them (Rom. 8:29; 2 Cor. 3:18; cf. 2 Cor. 5:17; Col. 3:10).

There is nevertheless a certain hiddenness in the very form of the self-revelation of God in the incarnation. God was, as it were, veiled in Christ so that sinners might look upon him. Certainly, in human flesh the Son of God was not easily recognized (1 Jn. 3:1; cf. 1 Cor. 2:8). For the unrepentant sinner, the full vision of God will occasion unspeakable terror (Rev. 6:15-17); for the believer, the final transformation (1 Jn. 3:2; cf. 2 Cor. 3:18).

2. Soteriological. The last point leads to the truth that the incarnation was essential in the plan of God to deliver men and women from sin and all its dire consequences. Through Christ becoming man, sinful human beings were able in an immediate and direct fashion to receive and acknowledge him as Lord or to repudiate and reject him. For the most part people rejected him; in their laying hands upon the incarnate Lord they were giving the fullest possible expression to sin, and in the act of CRUCIFIXION is exhibited as in no other way the real nature of sin: man's willful refusal to accept the sovereign right and rule of his Creator Lord. Allowing sinners so to act he was still Lord, for it was ordained that in and through his death on the cross he should bear their sins (Acts 2:23; 4:26-28; cf. Jn. 1:29, 36; Rev. 5:6; 13:8; 1 Pet. 2:24). In him God was reconciling the world to himself (2 Cor. 5:19). This was the basic purpose in the incarnation (Heb. 10:5, 10). Furthermore, by virtue of his incarnation, death, and resurrection, he became the new Adam and head of the new race of redeemed humanity (Rom. 5:12-19; Col. 1:18).

These two purposes, revelational and soteriological, are inseparably related. God's revealing activity in all its forms, and supremely in Christ, is soteriological in purpose. This is his answer to human ignorance through sin. Christ is the light of the world (Jn. 8:12), the one through whom God has shone into our hearts (2 Cor. 4:6). The Son came that people might see their sin, learn of God's grace, and so turn to God in true penitence and faith. God's revelatory activity always involves a certain giving of himself to men, and especially was this so in the incarnation. Then in self-giving, God is taking the initial act in restoring them to fellowship with himself. This restoration could not take place, however, without that to which the self-giving of the incarnation led, namely the CROSS (see ATONEMENT). The cross, in turn, is a revelation: in it is revealed as in no other way the inestimable LOVE of the Father and of the Son (Rom. 5:8; 1 Jn. 4:9-10).

3. Consummation of creation. It has been suggested that the incarnation was in the mind of God independently of his redemptive purpose for fallen sinners; that even had Adam not sinned, the Son would still have become incarnate. Indeed, when Adam was created in the image of God, the pattern was that incarnate form which God purposed in due time for his Son. Of this idea, however, Scripture seems to give no clear hint.

VI. Subsequent history of the doctrine. Even within the apostolic period, the reality of the incarnation was challenged. An early and persistent error, strongly denounced in 1 and 2 John (known as DOCETISM, from Greek dokeō G1506, "to seem"), was that Christ only appeared to be human, that his inner spirit was divine, not human, or even that his body was not a truly human body. Despite the emphatic scriptural condemnation of this error, many attempts to define the incarnation have tended to be docetic. Docetism includes any view which sees in Jesus less than a full humanity—less than a full experience of the limitations that essentially belong to human existence (though not the additional limitations inherent in sinful humanity). Jesus Christ was "made like his brothers in every way" (Heb. 2:17).

With the early rise of conflicting views and a natural continued interest in the nature of Jesus of Nazareth, the church had to give increasing and urgent attention to the doctrine of the incarnation. There were two main issues around which there was great controversy in the early centuries after the apostolic period. (1) One was the actual nature of Jesus Christ—to which the church gave answer: he was both human and divine. (2) If so, how were these two natures united in one person? In answer to this second question, the tendency was, and in modern theology still is, to commence from and emphasize either the deity or the humanity, to some diminution of the other.

An early attempt at solution, "Monarchianism," insisted on the unity of God, arguing either that Jesus was in the first place but man, though filled at baptism with divine power and after the resurrection existing as divine ("Dynamic Monarchianism"), or that the Father, Son, and Spirit were only temporary phases (prosōpa) of the one God ("Modalistic Monarchianism"). This latter denied an essential element in the incarnation: the Father sent the Son; it is the Son alone who became incarnate. And though the Son is truly divine ("What God was, the Word was," Jn. 1:1 NEB), one cannot say that in the Word is the totality of God.

The occasion of the great Arian controversy of the 4th cent. was the assertion that the Son is a creature, different in essence (ousia) from and not coeternal with the Father (see ARIUS). Furthermore, the Logos was said to have taken the place of a human soul (a denial, in effect, of his true humanity). The issues were at times clouded by problems of semantics, key words of high technical significance (such as ousia, prosōpon, persona) being used with subtly different meanings.

Prolonged controversy issued in the declaration of the full deity and full and perfect humanity of Christ, but left unresolved the question concerning how these two natures were united in one person, and this question gave rise to further division. Apollinarius (4th cent.) argued that two natures would mean two persons, and that therefore though the body and soul of Christ were purely human, the human mind or spirit was replaced by the Logos. This denied that Christ was truly man, for the mind is the distinctly human element in man's nature. Nestorius, on the other hand, held Jesus to be truly a man, but not in himself divine; rather that God was present in him as he was in the prophets, though in perfection. Any substantial union, he urged, would have meant an alteration in the Logos. This would have meant, not a true incarnation, but simply a unique conjunction, a concord of will and purpose, not the oneness of a single, personal life. Eutyches, strongly anti-Nestorian, asserted that in the incarnation either there was an absorption of the human nature into the divine, or a fusion of the two natures making one new nature ("monophysitism"). Christ then would not have been true man, nor could he be man's true representative, substitute or mediator.

At the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, the last three views were condemned. The formula accepted had at heart the assertion of two natures in the one Christ "without confusion, without mutation, without division, without separation; the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved and concurring in one person and one hypostasis." The formula is open to certain serious criticisms: it is overly negative in form; it is static in form and impersonal in feeling, remote from the living Christ; its terms are too closely linked with the background philosophies of the day. Yet, it was a worthy attempt to preserve the essential scriptural truths.

This Chalcedonian formula has dominated Christian thinking ever since, though the last two centuries have seen much dissatisfaction with it and many new attempts to explain the nature of Christ. Schleiermacher, consistent with his approach to Christian doctrine through personal and subjective religious experience, saw in Christ the supremely God-conscious man, divine in experience rather than in essential nature. Ritschl, critical of much of the traditional formula as being purely speculative, insisted that the inner nature of Christ transcends inquiry. Jesus is known only to the believer, and then mainly as the bearer of perfect revelation.

Of another sort is the KENOSIS theory. There are many variations of this theory, but they are alike in two respects. Their beginning point is the preexistent Son who became incarnate, rather than the man, Jesus; and they attempt, then, to define specifically the "self-emptying" (from the Greek verb kenoō, "to empty," Phil. 2:7) involved in his becoming man. There is much difference of opinion as to what this latter entailed. For most, it means at least the laying aside of the divine attributes of omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence. The major danger is that in strictly defining the "self-emptying," Christ is seen as less than truly divine. Thomasius was the first advocate of this theory. More modern advocates are A. B. Bruce, Fairbairn, Gore, Forsyth, and Mackintosh.

A "back to the Jesus of history" movement rightly repudiated Docetism, but so emphasized Christ's humanity and generally denied any supernatural activity in his ministry, as to reduce him to the supreme religious hero. D. M. Baillie has likewise emphasized Jesus' humanity, and charges much traditional thinking with the error of Docetism. He insists on the human nature (and human limits) of Christ's knowledge, the human character of his miracles and of his moral and religious life. This insistence tends to question the reality of his deity, leaving the impression of Christ as the supremely inspired man.

Into the radical break with all traditional understanding of the historical Jesus made by Rudolf Bultmann, and his demythologizing of the Gospels, one cannot go here. With the denial of the historicity of the recorded life of Christ, including the resurrection and ascension, and the emphasis not on the historical, incarnate Son and his earthly ministry, but on the Christ of the kerygma, so much of the NT explanation of Christ is thrown aside.

From the metaphor of the CHURCH as the BODY OF CHRIST, one modern school of thought sees the church as the extension of the incarnation, the continuation upon earth of the incarnate Christ, his present visible body. However, the metaphor of the body is not used in this way in the NT, which simply stresses the relationship between members of the body of Christ with one another, and emphasizes the mutual dependence and harmony that should prevail. To develop the metaphor further as some have done is to lead to dangerous ideas regarding the authority of the church, and to the church becoming an object of worship and trust as the now incarnate Christ.

Conclusion. On the evidence of Scripture one is compelled, basically, to affirm the traditional formulation of the doctrine of the incarnation, though holding it as subject to, and not as regulative of, the NT presentation. Further, one must guard against the impulse to answer all possible questions in such a way that much more is dogmatically asserted than God has been pleased to reveal. One must unreservedly accept what is revealed in Scripture, and humbly acknowledge and accept the limitations of our understanding of this divine mystery. Sufficient is revealed to constrain adoring worship of, and the fullest faith in, the Lord of Glory, "who for us men, and for our salvation, came down from heaven, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary...was crucified...rose again...ascended...shall come again...whose kingdom shall have no end." incense. Material which is burned to make a fragrant smoke; the fragrant smoke thus produced.

I. Terminology. The most common Hebrew word for "incense," occurring almost sixty times, primarily in the PENTATEUCH, is qēṭōret H7792 (Exod. 25:6 et al.). Note also its cognates with the same meaning, occurring only once each, qittēr H7789 (Jer. 44:21), qēṭôrâ H7777 (Deut. 33:10), and muqṭār H5231 (Mal. 1:11). All of these are derived from the verb qāṭar H7787 (piel and hiphil, “to burn incense”). The term lēbōnâ H4247, often rendered “frankincense,” occurs over twenty times (Lev. 2:1-2 et al.; cf. Gk. libanos G3337, only Matt. 9:4). In the NT, the Greek word for “incense” is thymiama G2592 (only Lk. 1:10–11; Rev. 5:8; 8:3-4; 18:13; verb thymiaō G2594, “to burn incense,” only Lk. 1:9).

II. Incense in the ANE. From the earliest times for which there are records about worship, incense was used by the Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Arabians, and Canaanites. The Canaanites, who were the nearest neighbors of the Hebrews, have left various incense stands, altars, censers, and spoons in city levels dated in the 2nd millennium B.C. Egyptian representations of sieges of Canaanite cities sometimes show a man on the wall holding a stand in which incense is smoking, doubtless to reinforce the prayers offered by men standing behind him with upraised arms.

III. Sources of incense. Incense came from S Arabia (FRANKINCENSE, MYRRH), Somaliland (frankincense), Palestine (SAFFRON, STACTE), Red Sea (ONYCHA), Persia (GALBANUM), India (SPIKENARD), and Ceylon (CINNAMON). Arabs controlled much of the incense trade (Gen. 37:25; 1 Ki. 10:10; Ezek. 27:22), and this trade brought wealth to SHEBA and other kingdoms of S ARABIA. (See also SPICE.)

IV. Kinds and preparation of incense. The incense most often mentioned in the Bible is frankincense, sometimes used alone and also as part of the holy incense. Equal parts of this and of stacte, onycha, and galbanum with a little salt (RSV) were mixed together to make the holy incense used on the incense altar (Exod. 30:34-35; cf. Sir. 24:15). This formula was not to be used for secular purposes (Exod. 30:38). Gifts provided incense for use in the sanctuary (Num. 7:14-86; Jer. 17:26; 41:5), and it was stored in the temple (Neh. 13:5, 9).

The writer of JUBILEES, reflecting the Jewish practice of the 2nd cent. B.C., attributed incense offerings to the patriarchs: to Adam, frankincense and galbanum (Jub. 3.27); to Abraham, frankincense, galbanum, stacte, nard, myrrh, spice, and costus (16.24); to Jacob, incense (32.6). JOSEPHUS says that in the temple of his day (1st cent. A.D.) thirteen elements were used in the holy incense (War 5.5.5). According to the TALMUD (Keritot 6a), the following ingredients were used in making the holy incense of the second temple: resin (corresponding to stacte in Exod. 30:34), onycha, galbanum, frankincense, each seventy manehs; myrrh, cassia, spikenard, saffron, each sixteen manehs; costus, twelve manehs; aromatic rind, three manehs; cinnamon, nine manehs; lye from leeks, six kabs; Cyprus wine, three seahs and three kabs; salt of Sodom, one quarter kab; smoke-raiser, a small quantity; and, according to Rabbi Nathan, also Jordan resin, a small quantity, a total of 368. According to PLUTARCH (Isis and Osiris, 80), the Egyptian incense called kyphi had sixteen elements, and several materials were combined in Babylonian and Assyrian incense offerings. The priestly family of Abtinias was in charge of pounding and mixing the holy incense, and only they knew the secret of making incense whose smoke rose straight up (b. Yoma 38a).

V. Incense in common life. Incense, like PERFUME, brings joy (Prov. 27:9). It might be burned at a revel (Ezek. 23:41) or was passed around in bowls after a banquet (m. Berakot 6:6). It perfumed the carriage of SOLOMON (Cant. 3:6) and was an element of the luxurious life at Rome (Rev. 18:13). Incense was used as fumigation to stop a plague (Num. 16:46-48). It was burned at the funerals of kings (2 Chr. 16:14; 21:19; Jer. 34:5), and perhaps the same custom was observed by the common people (Amos 6:9-10).

VI. Religious use of incense. The worship of BAAL, the QUEEN OF HEAVEN, and other foreign gods by means of incense often is condemned in the OT (e.g., 1 Ki. 11:8; in the Apocrypha, Ep. Jer. 43). Also condemned are the pagan “incense altars” (Lev. 26:30; 2 Chr. 30:14). The burning of incense at the shrines on HIGH PLACES also is often criticized (e.g., 1 Ki. 22:43), either because these high places were associated with IDOLATRY (14:23) or because they conflicted with the centralization of worship in Jerusalem (3:2). The prophetic criticism of incense offering in the worship of the Lord (Isa. 1:13; 66:3; Jer. 6:20) is not an absolute nega tion but only part of the prophets’ condemnation of empty formalism. The NEHUSHTAN or bronze serpent (Num. 21:9) was worshiped with incense until HEZEKIAH removed this temptation to idolatry (2 King 18:4).

According to the law, only the priests descended from AARON could offer incense (Lev. 2:2). Those who tried to usurp this priestly function were punished by death (Num. 16:31-32) or disease (2 Chr. 26:19), and even priests who offered incense improperly were killed (Lev. 10:1-2). In the special case of a plague, Aaron offered the incense with a censer, not in the sanctuary as usually, but in the camp (Num. 16:46-47).

Coptic priests using incense during a liturgical procession at the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

Frankincense was added to various meal offerings on the altar of burnt offering (Lev. 2:1-2, 15-16; 6:15). It also was added to the bread of the Presence (Lev. 24:7) in two dishes (m. Menaḥot 11:5-8), which Josephus says were of gold (Ant. 3.10.7). After a week this frankincense accompanying the bread was burned on the altar of burnt offering (ibid.). The priest offered the compounded holy incense morning and evening on the gold-covered altar in front of the veil. According to Exod. 30:1-10, Aaron as the high priest did this; later priests were chosen by lot to perform this function (m. Tamid 2:5; 5:2, 4; 6:1-3; cf. Lk. 1:9). On the Day of Atonement, the high priest offered the compounded incense in a censer on the ark, or, in the second temple, on a stone in the holy of holies (Lev. 16:12-13; m. Yoma 1:2; 2:4; 3:3-4; 5:1-2; 7:4). According to the apocryphal book of TOBIT, incense was thought to help in the exorcism of demons (Tob. 6:7; 8:2-3).

VII. Figurative references to incense. In the book of ECCLESIASTICUS, the beauty of wisdom and the memory of Josiah are compared to incense (Sir. 24:15; 49:1). In the NT, the word incense is used as a symbol of the knowledge of Christ (2 Cor. 2:14), of the Philippians’ offering to Paul (Phil. 4:18), and of the prayers of the saints (Rev. 5:8; 8:3-4). PHILO JUDAEUS (Who Is the Heir of Divine Things?, 41) and Josephus (War 5.5.5) interpret the varied materials of the holy incense allegorically as symbolic of God's proprietorship over the whole world.

VIII. The function of the incense offering. The basic purpose of incense, as of other offerings, was to honor God (Mal. 1:11). Incense symbolized and expressed prayer (Ps. 141:2; Jdt. 9:1; Lk. 1:10; Rev. 5:8; 8:3-4). The offering of incense made atonement for sin (Num. 16:46-47). The smoke of the incense on the Day of Atonement veiled the mercy seat from the eyes of the high priest so that he would not die from seeing God's glory (Lev. 16:13). Divine revelations were given to Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. 13.10.3) and to Zechariah (Lk. 1:5-21) while they were offering incense. Maimonides, a physician, suggested that incense also may have had the practical value of counteracting the smell of the bloody sacrifices (Guide of the Perplexed 3.45). incense, altar of. One of the pieces of furniture prescribed in the orders God gave to MOSES for the construction of the TABERNACLE in the wilderness (Exod. 30:1-11). It was a cubit square and two cubits high (approximately 1.5 by 3 ft.), with horns on the corners, formed of ACACIA wood and plated with GOLD (Exod. 37:25-28). Rings were added through which poles could be inserted for the purpose of carrying it. The high priest was directed to burn incense on it every morning and evening, but to offer no sacrifice or pour no libation upon it. Presumably this is identical with the golden altar mentioned later (Exod. 39:38), and is distinguished from the large bronze altar that stood in the courtyard of the tabernacle.

The position of this altar in the tabernacle seems to have been within the inner sanctuary just in front of the ARK OF THE COVENANT (Exod. 40:5; Lev. 16:11-14), on which the high priest sprinkled the blood of atonement once a year (Exod. 30:10). The golden altar of Solomon's TEMPLE was placed in the inner sanctuary (1 Ki. 6:20, 22), but in Herod's temple it seems to have been outside the veil within the "Holy Place" (Lk. 1:10). Revelation speaks of an altar of incense that stood before the throne of God (Rev. 8:3). The reference to the golden altar in Hebrews agrees that it was within the inner sanctuary (Heb. 9:3).

The apparent conflict between those passages that locate the altar in front of the curtain (Exod. 30:6; 40:26) and those that place it in the inner sanctuary has been given different solutions. N. Snaith (Leviticus and Numbers [1967], 43) suggests that the original text was modified to suit the arrangement of the second and third temples, and that there was no altar of incense in the tabernacle. He follows J. Wellhausen's argument that two separate sources are responsible for the difference. In the light of the fact that small incense altars were used by the Canaanites from the earliest times in Palestine, it is hardly possible that such were unknown, or that an altar of incense could not have been part of the furniture of the tabernacle. The apparent discrepancy in the location of the golden altar may arise from differing usages between the tabernacle and the temple, or from the fact that it stood so close to the ark that it was classed with the Holy of Holies because it represented an intercessory ministry in the presence of God. One Jewish source suggests that Exod. 25:1-27:19 is the blueprint for the construction of the tabernacle, while Exod. 40:1-33 describes the actual assembling of the building, and consequently a modification of position. See also ALTAR.

India. The great peninsula and subcontinent located S of the Himalaya Mountains, occupied in modern times by the nation of India and other countries. Although explicit references to India occur only twice in the Bible (Esth. 1:1; 8:9; Heb. hōddû H2064, prob. referring only to the area lying W of the Indus and forming the eastern part of the Persian empire), the evidence seems to indicate that Palestine had established commercial relations with the subcontinent much earlier. Some interpreters have contended that the river PISHON (Gen. 2:11) in the land of HAVILAH refers to India. The suggestion also has been made that the goods brought from OPHIR, such as sandalwood (almug trees, 1 Ki. 10:11; 2 Chr. 2:8), ivory, and apes, were Indian. The Tyrian merchandise mentioned in Ezek. 27:15 may also have been from India.

The NT makes no reference to India, but the apocryphal literature of both OT and NT do mention it. ANTIOCHUS Eupator employed elephants ridden by Indians against the Jewish armies (1 Macc. 6:37; Gk. Indos), and he eventually ceded India to the Romans, although, in fact, he had never owned it (1 Macc. 8:8; Gk. Indikē). The principal reference to India in the NT Apocrypha is to be found in the Gnostic Acts of Thomas which purports to tell of the apostle's missionary journey to the Indo-Scythian kingdom of Gundaphorus. There is, however, little indication that it offers any actual historical information. Some Christian missionary may have gone to India in the 1st or 2nd centuries, and this perhaps formed the foundation of the story concerning THOMAS. India has little significance in the biblical record.

infidel (from Lat. infidelis, "unfaithful"). One who is not among the faithful; an unbeliever. Its earliest English reference was to the Saracens (Muslims) who embraced a religion opposed to Christianity. Muslims came to use an equivalent expression denoting all who are not part of Islam. In the ecclesiastical language of Rome, infidelis came to mean "unbelieving," and signified all those outside the church. Used particularly of missionary work in non-Christian lands, it was used synonymously with heathen. As used popularly, an infidel is a person who has knowledge of the Christian faith but avowedly rejects its claims to divine origin and authority. It is usually a term of opprobrium.

inflammation. See DISEASE.

inheritance. Something received from an ancestor through a legal will or TESTAMENT. In the Bible, the term (Heb. naḥālâ H5709, Gk. klēronomia G3100) is often used figuratively in a theological sense.

I. In the OT. In the patriarchal narratives, the principles of inheritance are tied to the BIRTHRIGHT. The FIRSTBORN son—"my might, the first sign of my strength," as the aged JACOB described REUBEN (Gen. 49:3)—had special privileges, deference, and associated duties (44:33). It seems clear that he held by such right a double portion of his father's goods (Deut. 21:17). It is also apparent that, at the dictate of the father, this special position could be forfeited (Gen. 49:3-4; 1 Chr. 5:1). ESAU traded his birthright for food in contempt (Gen. 25:29-34), and ISAAC, in a moment of insight, realizing that action thrust upon him by forces beyond his control had caused him to transfer the firstborn's blessing to another, confirmed what he had unwittingly done (27:33; Heb. 12:16); hence the effort in the passage already quoted (Deut. 21:15-17) to insure protection for the legal firstborn in the case of parental caprice or inequity.

It follows that, if the ancient principles were observed in conservative households of Palestine in NT times, the portion demanded by the prodigal son (Lk. 15:12) was one-third only of the estate, and given by some custom that allowed the younger son to anticipate division and seek his fortune abroad. SARAH'S anger over HAGAR'S son ISHMAEL (Gen. 21:10) appears to show that the sons of wives not in full status could claim a share in the inheritance (Jdg. 11:2). It is a matter of conjecture how far this was carried out, and tension is evident over the rights of inheritance of sons of a secondary marriage.

Considerable illustration of the importance of ordered inheritance is to be found in the records of civilizations contemporary with patriarchal times. The suspicion lingers that the patriarchs, having emancipated themselves from urban society, had shed some of the legal obligations that went closely with membership of an ancient state. In the NUZI tablets, for example, inheritance is revealed as a matter of supreme legal importance. Property was theoretically inalienable, and complicated laws of adoption were necessary to secure any freedom of transfer and conveyance at all. J. A. Thompson quotes details and also an interesting document (The Bible and Archaeology [1962], 27-31). It is evident that Hebrew law, when Moses came to formulate its provisions, had much to order and to regularize.

It was done with brevity and clarity. If a man died without sons to follow him, the inheritance went to the daughters, if there were any; in default of daughters, to his brothers; in default of brothers, to his uncles on the father's side, or to their next of kin (Num. 27:8-11). There was one important provision. If the inheritance fell to a daughter, it was obligatory upon her that she marry within the tribe, a provision designed to keep tribal property stable and uneroded (36:6). (It has been plausibly suggested that in this social legislation lies the explanation for the variant genealogies in Matthew's and Luke's gospels. Matthew gives Joseph's line because he was legally regarded as Jesus' father, an important point in law. It was also necessary, in view of the legislation on inheritance in the closing chapters of Numbers, to establish and record the fact that Mary had fulfilled her obligations by marrying within the tribe. A reasonable hypothesis, therefore, suggests that Luke gives the genealogy of Mary. Joseph, not Mary, is set down as the immediate descendant of Eli, because Joseph authenticated Mary's inheritance by the legal provisions recorded in Num. 27:1-11 and 36:1-13. It is probable that fuller and more exact information would establish some procedure of adoption in such cases. (See GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.)

One notable aspect of the Hebrew law of inheritance was that the widow was not provided for; she was almost considered a part of the inheritance. In the case of a man dying childless, his brother could marry the widow and possibly provide the deceased with heirs (Gen. 38:8, 9; Deut. 25:5-10; Matt. 22:23-25). It was possible for this right or obligation to be transferred to the nearest kinsman. The story of RUTH is built round this theme. NAOMI was past the age of childbearing. Ruth took her place, and BOAZ went through the complicated process of acquiring the right to marry her (Ruth 2:20; 3:9-13; 4:1-12). See GOEL.

The inheritance of landed property was very carefully guarded. Land could not, for example, by Levitical law (Lev. 25:23, 24) be alienated forever. If it was sold it could be redeemed by the next of kin (25:25). AHAB'S offer to buy NABOTH'S vineyard was therefore a flagrant violation of the law (1 Ki. 21:3). The land of Canaan itself was regarded as the inheritance of the whole nation (Exod. 15:17; Josh. 21:19). The Abrahamic COVENANT (Gen. 12:7; 15:18-21) made mention of a land to possess, as well as offspring to possess it. Israel never wavered in this conviction that the land was theirs, that their title was a rightful one, and although they never possessed it to the full limits of its prescribed boundaries, they firmly held the thought that the intruder had no right to be there and could not be permanent.

The prophets who had caught the wider vision of Israel's mission to the world at large looked upon the land as a base from which all Israel's contribution could be made. The firm possession of the land was the essential condition, while its loss in exile or invasion was considered a loss of God's favor and the deprivation of a rightful inheritance. From this privilege the Levites alone were excluded: God was their inheritance (Deut. 18:1-2). (See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.) They were supported by dues and tribute levied on the remaining tribes (Deut. 18:3-5). This idea, like most ideas in the experience of the Hebrew people, acquired spiritual extension, and God was similarly regarded in the language of prayer and devotion as the inheritance of the whole nation (Ps. 16:5-6). There are other figurative elaborations, as for example, the use of the term for God's own "inheritance," his faithful people (Ps. 2:8). It should be noted that the two common Hebrew verbs that can be rendered "to inherit" (yāraś H3769 and nāḥal H5706) convey primarily the notion of rightful possession rather than succession. (See C. J. H. Wright, God's People in God's Land: Family, Land and Property in the Old Testament [1990]; M. Weinfeld, The Promise of Land: The Inheritance of the Land of Canaan by the Israelites [1993]; NIDOTTE, 2:547-49; 3:77-81.)

Such is the information that may be gleaned from the provisions of the law and from incidents relevant to the theme in the historical books, together with the extension semantically into figure and symbol. Wills were not made in Jewish society until Hellenistic times, when the custom was adopted from the Greeks. The rabbis studied the process with their usual meticulous care, and carefully regulated all details. The NT reflects current testamentary practice in two contexts (Gal. 3:15 and Heb. 9:16-17).

II. In the NT. The figurative meaning of inheritance is universal in the NT. Note, for example, the story of the wicked tenants (Matt. 21:33-41), in which the concept of inheritance, though literal in the context of events, is symbolic in its significance. The simplest method of dealing with the theme will be to list all occurrences of the subject under the heading of the words commonly employed.

The Greek verb klēronomeō G3099 originally meant to obtain by means of a lot (klēros G3102), and then to receive, in whole or in part, an estate, property, or possession (Matt. 5:5; 19:29; 25:34; Mk. 10:17; Lk. 10:25; 18:18; 1 Cor. 6:9-10; 15:50 [twice]; Gal. 5:21; Heb. 6:12; 12:17; 1 Pet. 3:9;

Rev. 21:7). The cognate noun klēronomia G3100, from its use in a literal sense of an estate to be passed on, can refer to a divine possession bestowed in virtue of sonship or adoption. This meaning stems largely from the figurative use of the word in the OT for Israel's "inheritance." It reflects the development of the idea of a national Israel into a spiritual body, which is a major development of thought between the Testaments (Matt. 21:38; Mk. 12:7; Lk. 12:13; 20:14; Acts 7:5; 20:32; Gal. 3:18; Eph. 1:14, 18; 5:5; Col. 3:24; Heb. 9:15; 11:8; 1 Pet. 1:4; cf. also the verb klēroō G3103, Eph. 1:11, and the use of the noun klēros in Acts 26:28 and Col. 1:12).

The word klēronomos G3101, "heir," is used figuratively of Christ, who as the son of Adam inherits, or comes into possession of, universal dominion (Gen. 1:26, 27; Ps. 8:4-8; Heb. 2:6-8); as son of Abraham, he is heir to the land of the promise (Gen. 22:16-18; Heb. 2:16; Rom. 4:13); as son of David, heir to the royal throne (Matt. 1:1, 6; Lk. 1:30-33); as the Son of God, the heir of all things (Heb. 1:1-2; Acts 10:36). (See also Matt. 21:38; Mk. 12:7; Lk. 20:14; Rom. 4:13, 14; Gal. 3:29; 4:1, 7, 30; Eph. 3:6; Tit. 3:7; Heb. 1:2, 14; 6:17; Jas. 2:5.) All of these contexts show facets of the extension of the idea of the heirship of Christ to all those accepted in him. (See J. D. Hester, Paul's Concept of Inheritance [1968]; NIDNTT, 2:295-304.)

III. Greece and Rome. The law of inheritance in Greek and Roman society has no necessary place in this survey, but it is well to remember that the NT was written and read in a Greco-Roman world. Inheritance in the Greek world was automatic and formal, on the same model as the Hebrew with a scale of priorities, and rather less subject to modification by the will of the father than appears to have been the case in Hebrew society. A will need not be written. It was valid if made by declaration before appropriate witnesses. In Rome, on the other hand, the will or testamentary deposition was paramount, a legal order of succession coming into operation only in cases of intestacy. The will was a public document, guarded by law, and formalized in law with set forms of language (details are succinctly set out in the OCD, 757-58). As an illustration of a Roman will, note the following document (Pap. Tebt. 381, from Egypt, A.D. 123):

"The 8th year of the Emperor Caesar Trajanus Hadrianus Augustus, Choiak 22, at Tebtunis in the division of Polemon of the Arsinoite name. Thaesis daughter of Orsenouphis son of Onnophris, her mother being Thenobastis, of the aforesaid village of Tebtunis, aged about seventy-eight years, having a scar on the right forearm, acting with her guardian, her kinsman Cronion son of Ameis, aged about twenty-seven, having a scar between his eyebrows, acknowledges that she, the acknowledging party, Thaesis, has consented that after her death there shall belong to Thenpetesuchus, her daughter by her late departed husband Pansais, and also to Sansenus son of Tephersos, the son of her other daughter Taorseus, now dead, to the two of them, property as follows: to Thenpetesuchus alone, the house, yard and all effects belonging to Thaesis in the said village of Tebtunis by right of purchase from Thenpetesuchus daughter of Petesuchus, and the furniture, utensils, household stock and apparel left by Thaesis, and the sums due to her and other property of any kind whatsoever, while to Sansenus she has bequeathed eight drachmae of silver, which Sansenus shall receive from Thenpetesuchus after the death of Thaesis; on condition that the daughter Thenpetesuchus shall properly perform the obsequies and laying out of her mother, and shall discharge such private debts as Thaesis shall prove to owe, but as long as her mother Thaesis lives she shall have power to..."

ink. A writing fluid whose chief ingredient was soot or black carbon. It was mixed with gum or oil for use on parchment, or with a metallic substance for use on PAPHYRUS. The early use of metallic ink in Israel is shown in the LACHISH letters (c. 586 B.C.). The DEAD SEA SCROLLS were written with ink made of carbon. The Letter of Aristeas says that the copy of the law sent to PTOLEMY II was written in gold. The Egyptians must have used a good quality ink, as the bright colors in some papyri show. The ingredients for making ink were kept in a writing case. The word is used once in the OT (Heb. dēyō H1902, Jer. 36:18) and three times in the NT (Gk. melas G3506 [“black”], 2 Cor. 3:3; 2 Jn. 12; 3 Jn. 13).

inkhorn. This English term (meaning a vessel made from a horn and used to hold ink) is used by the KJV to render qeset H7879, which occurs in only one passage (Ezek. 9:2-3, 11). This Hebrew word refers to a writing case for reed pens and some sort of container for ink near the upper end of the case. It was carried in the belt. Monuments of all periods show the Egyptian palette, a long narrow board with grooves for pens and circular hollows for ink.

inn. The Hebrew word mālōn H4869 (rendered “inn” by the KJV in Gen. 42:27; 43:21; Exod. 4:24) means “lodging place” or “camping ground.” It may refer to the camping place of an individual (Jer. 9:2); of a family on a journey (Exod. 4:24); of a caravan (Gen. 42:27; 43:21); of an army (2 Ki. 19:23); or even of a nation (Josh. 4:3, 8). In none of these references is there any implication of a structure, with the possible exception of the one in Jeremiah. When travelers could not find lodging in private dwellings they stayed in the open (cf. Gen. 19:2; 28:11; Jdg. 19:15).

In the TARGUM of Josh. 2:1, RAHAB is called an innkeeper (cf. Jos. Ant. 5.1.2). Perhaps she combined this occupation with her profession as harlot, a practice attested occasionally in Roman times. It is interesting to note that the ARAMAIC word used in this passage is of foreign origin (pûndêqîṭā), from Gk. pandocheion G4106), possibly indicating that the organized inn was an importation into the ANE. It is common knowledge that inns existed in Greek times and throughout the period of the Roman empire. Generally they were considered bad, the traveler being subject not only to discomfort, but also robbery and even death. For this reason, wealthy people who traveled maintained their own deversoria (lodging houses) along the route, or stayed with friends on a reciprocal basis. Inns sometimes were managed independently, sometimes by the slaves or freedmen of the owner of a nearby villa. (See OCD, 759-60.)

When Mary and Joseph discovered that “there was no room for them in the inn” (Gk. katalyma G2906, Lk. 2:7), one should not think of anything resembling a hotel. More likely they found themselves in some sort of village guest house. Indeed, the same word is used to describe the upper room where Jesus ate the Passover with his disciples (Mk. 14:14; Lk. 22:11). It is in fact possible that Mary and Joseph had to stay in the lower level of a house (perhaps the home of a distant relative), where the animals were kept, because the normal living area was full.

In the story of the good Samaritan, the term used is pandocheion (Lk. 10:34). An innkeeper (pandocheus G4107, lit., “one who receives all”) is mentioned who is paid to provide food and lodging for the man who was left in his care. Something resembling a modern inn seems to be in view in this passage. If one may judge from the Khan Hathrur, located today midway between JERUSALEM and JERICHO, the inn of Jesus’ day perhaps consisted of a large building, with an arched doorway opening into a spacious courtyard with a well in the center.

inner being. This phrase is used by the NIV and other translations to render Greek esō anthrōpos, (lit., “man inside,” Rom. 7:22 [KJV, “inward man”; NRSV, “inmost self”]; Eph. 3:16). The concept of an inner being is reflected elsewhere in the Bible. It refers to the true ego, whereas the outer person may or may not be a genuine portrayal of the inner being. Jesus castigated the SCRIBES and PHARISEES for their religious HYPOCRISY, comparing them to “whitewashed tombs” because they appear righteous “on the outside,” whereas “on the inside” they were full of sin (Matt. 23:27-28). He also warned his disciples against false prophets who come “in sheep’s clothing, but inwardly they are ferocious wolves” (7:15).

In the period of the judges, when Israel was clamoring for a king, SAMUEL, under divine guidance, had to make a distinction between the inner and outer person. Seven of JESSE’S sons were rejected, but DAVID, the youngest, was selected for king. Samuel explained, “Man looks at the outward appearance, but the LORD looks at the heart” (1 Sam. 16:7). The inner person is the real and dominant self. PAUL was a living example of the distinction in the better way, and consequently prayed that God would strengthen the Ephesians “with power through his Spirit in your inner being” (Eph. 3:16).

G. B. FUNDERBURK

innocence. This English noun and the adjective innocent are used variously in Bible version to render several Hebrew and Greek terms. Especially common is the Hebrew adjective nāqî H5929, which occurs a number of times in legal passages (Exod. 23:7; Deut. 19:10; et al.), but in other contexts as well (Job 4:7; Ps. 10:8; et al.). The primary Greek term for “innocent” is athōon G127 (in the NT only in Matt. 27:4, 24). In addition, a number of words that mean “clean,” “good,” or the like can properly be rendered “innocent” in some contexts (e.g., Heb. ṣaddîq H7404, “righteous,” Gen.

20:4; Gk. akeraios G193, “unmixed, pure,” Matt. 10:16).

It must be remembered that the OT terms are not freely and easily interchanged and that the underlying idea of neutral or nonjuridicial innocence is foreign to the OT world of thought. The modern concept of a state of noncommitment between two alternative moral choices simply does not exist. Therefore, all men and nations in the OT either are justified by the will of Yahweh or condemned. There is no middle ground. The same set of concepts carries over to the NT, which utilizes a large number of Greek terms to define precisely the notion of JUSTIFICATION by God’s proclamation and upon an ATONEMENT accomplished by Christ.

innocents, massacre of the. This is the conventional name given to the slaughter of children two years old and under in BETHLEHEM at the time of the birth of Christ (Matt. 2:16-18). The statement of the MAGI about a child to be born in Bethlehem who would become “king of the Jews” aroused in HEROD the Great the fear of a claimant to his petty royal power. In his rage when the Wise Men deceived him and did not return to Jerusalem, he ordered the killing, thinking to put an end to any possible rival. Estimates of the number of victims range from 20 to 30 to as high as 60 or 70 (the numbers 3,000 and 144,000 mentioned in some early Christian writings have no support). The objective and detached manner in which the narrative is presented indicates its historicity. It fits perfectly the character and deeds of Herod, especially in his later years; for JOSEPHUS mentions even worse atrocities committed by the king in his obsession for power.

Matthew sees in this incident a fulfillment of Jer. 31:15, though the connection between this verse and Bethlehem is not clear, for RAMAH, the traditional burial place of RACHEL, is about 10 mi. N of JERUSALEM. Many have thought that the citation is “of doubtful appositeness in a strict sense” (A. B. Bruce in EGT, 1:76). However, the passage in Jeremiah is an expression of hope that the tears of exile will come to an end when the people return from captivity. For Matthew, “the tears begun in Jeremiah’s day are climaxed and ended by the tears of the mothers of Bethlehem. The heir to David’s throne has come, the exile is over, the true Son of God has arrived, and he will introduce the new covenant...promised by Jeremiah” (D. A. Carson in EBC, 8:95).

R. C. STONE

inquire. To seek information, especially to consult God with regard to his will. Various terms meaning “to ask,” “to search,” and the like may be used in this connection (such as Heb. bāqaš H1335 piel, Exod. 33:7 et al.; dāraš H2011, Gen. 25:22; šā’al H8626 [with the preposition bě-] Jdg. 18:5 et al.). The people of Israel would come to MOSES to inquire of God in a dispute (Exod. 18:15 NRSV; cf. 33:7-11). The priestly EPHOD was a kind of pouch attached to the breastpiece of the high priest in which the sacred lots URIM AND THUMMIM were placed (Exod. 28:28-30). JOSHUA was to come to the priest to inquire of God and receive answer by the use of these lots to determine when Israel should move (Exod. 28:30). DAVID resorted to the ephod on occasion when he was fleeing from Saul (1 Sam. 23:9-12). SAUL used the same method to decide a vexed question (1 Sam. 14:41). (See further R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel [1961], 349-53.)

When denied divine guidance by this means, Saul resorted to an unlawful medium (1 Sam. 28:6-7). Mediums, wizards, and other such forms of DIVINATION were under God’s ban (Isa. 8:19; cf. Deut. 18:10-12). Later on people would inquire of God by prophets, as King JEHOASHAPATH did of ELISHA (2 Ki. 3:11-12; cf. Jer. 42:2-7). On JOSIAH’S orders, even HILKIAH the priest went with other leaders to inquire of HULDAH the prophetess (2 Ki. 22:12-16). In the NT direct PRAYER is the prevailing form of inquiry, both by teaching (Jas. 1:5) and by practice, as in the case of Jesus in the Garden of GETHSEMANE (Matt. 26:39), and PAUL, when he inquired of God about his nagging thorn in the flesh (2 Cor. 12:7-9).

I.N.R.I. These letters constitute the abbreviation of the supposed Latin inscription on the cross of Jesus: Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum—"Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews." All four Gospels mention the inscription but vary as to the contents. The traditional Latin wording of the title seems to be based on Jn. 19:19 rather than on the synoptic parallels. The abbreviation I.N.R.I. is ascribed by tradition to Helena, Emperor Constantine's mother, who claimed to have discovered it on a board (with the three crosses found in a cave identified as the holy sepulchre; cf. Ecclesiastical History of Sozomen, 2.1-2). It appears in paintings of the CRUCIFIXION by M. Munkacsy, F. Pesellino, Ed. Burne-Jones.

An artistic conception of the board on which Pilate placed the charge against Jesus (in Hebrew, Latin, and Greek).

inscriptions. The discovery of many inscriptions from Bible times has revolutionized the knowledge of its background. Until the 19th cent., students of the Bible were primarily limited in their research to a small number of books in monasteries and libraries, such as the writings of JOSEPHUS and EUSEBIUS. Now from all over the Bible lands inscriptions are available containing laws, treaties, decrees, private letters, memorials, etc. Such inscriptions lead back directly to the ancient setting, bypassing the problems of MS transmission.

Ancient inscriptions were incised on clay, marble, stone, metal, and terra cotta. In the lands of the TIGRIS and EUPHRATES, clay was extensively used, but in EGYPT the hieroglyphs were carefully incised on stone (see WRITING). In GREECE the best inscribing was done in the 5th and 4th cent. B.C., in ATHENS. The direction of writing varies. The letters or symbols may be arranged vertically, read from top to bottom, or horizontally, read either from right to left or left to right; they also can be arranged in a pattern in which case their order may be indeterminate, or in a wandering curved line, or left to right and right to left alternately (boustrophedon, "as an ox ploughing"). Most Semitic inscriptions read from right to left; the earliest Greek followed the same direction. The direction left to right became regular in Greece after the 6th cent. B.C. and consequently was adopted by the Roman and European systems.

The place and position of the inscription varies with its use. Sometimes on Mesopotamian statues or reliefs the inscriptions were cut right across the figures without regard to artistic effect. In Egypt the inscriptions were often inscribed or painted upon the inner walls of tombs; these were intended for the benefit of the dead rather than a source of information for the living, but they now provide a wealth of information. On the other hand, inscriptions which were intended to be seen by the public and to perpetuate a record of events, or to supply useful information, were usually placed in locales of common resort, especially temples and sacred precincts. Sometimes they were cut on convenient rock faces, sometimes on walls of public buildings.

In some cases (as in MOAB) these inscriptions form the only source of information in the absence of literary records; in others (Greece and Rome) they offer a valuable supplement. These inscriptions were written in various languages, most of which have been deciphered, and originated in many different places.

I. Inscriptions relating to Palestine before the settlement of the Israelites

A. Egyptian. The earliest references to Palestine occur in two collections of writings found in EGYPT called the EXECRATION TEXTS, which date from the 20th and 19th centuries B.C. The Egyptians wrote the names of enemy tribes, towns, and rulers on clay figurines or vessels and then broke them in a symbolic act intended to insure the PHARAOH'S victory over the enemy named. Cities named in these lists include Ashkelon, Jerusalem, Aphek, Acre, Mash<sup>al</sup>, Achshaph, Tyre, and many others. Such texts yield valuable information on the political conditions in Syria-Palestine.

Later Egyptian inscriptions left by the pharaohs describe their recurrent campaigns in Canaan to keep the city-states of that country under their domination. THUTMOSE III (c. 1490-1436 B.C.) listed in the temple of Amon at Karnak the names of 119 cities and towns which he captured in Canaan and Syria, thus recording the names of important cities of 15th-century Palestine. Together with his "annals," these lists serve to document the history of Palestine-Egypt relations. The names of places in Palestine contained in the later lists of RAMSES II (c. 1290-1223; found on the Ramesseum at Thebes) and of Ramses III (c. 1179-1147; at Medinet Habu) are mere copies of the list of Thutmose III. Other pharaohs also engaged in campaigns to maintain their sovereignty over Canaan, the corridor to their great rivals in the N, the HITTITES and HURRIANS.

A number of Egyptian inscriptions have turned up at various sites in Palestine. Three stelae, one of Ramses II and two of his predecessor Seti I (c. 1303-1290), came from BETH SHAN, which was occupied by an Egyptian garrison. The larger stela of Seti tells of the capture of Beth Shan by the ruler of HAMATH and its relief by Seti; his smaller one mentions the HABIRU. Many short hieroglyphic inscriptions on the scarabs of various Egyptian kings were also discovered in the mounds of Palestine.

B. Sumerian-Akkadian. Some of the texts from SUMER and Babylonia (see ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA) were incised on stone, but most of them on clay that was then baked. There is a vast amount of material preserved in Akkadian (see LANGUAGES OF THE ANE II.A); several entire libraries have been found, containing many thousands of texts. Much of the material written in MESOPOTAMIA has great significance for biblical studies. The Sumerian King List records the reigns of the earliest rulers in Mesopotamia who are noted for their longevity: the eight antediluvian kings are given reigns totaling 241,200 years!

The earliest known legal codes were written in CUNEIFORM, and the information they contain greatly illuminates the legal background of the OT. The most famous, the Code of HAMMURABI (c. 1792-1750 B.C.) was beautifully inscribed on diorite and is known also from copies on clay tablets. Actually it was a compilation of laws already in existence, many of which were copied from Sumer. Similar collections of law date from the reign of Ur-Nammu of Ur (c. 2060), Bilalama of Eshnunna (c. 1930), and Lipit-Ishtar of Isin (c. 1865).

From MARI, on the middle of the Euphrates, some 20,000 tablets from the 19th and 18th centuries B.C. have been recovered. These texts supply much information on the background of the PATRIARCHS. Another large collection of Akkadian texts was found at NUZI, in NW Mesopotamia, an area inhabited largely by Hurrians. These texts illuminate many customs preserved in the OT, such as the selling of BIRTHRIGHT, and the fact that possession of household gods virtually gave title to an estate.

In Akkadian and Sumerian literature are found a creation story (ENUMA ELISH) and the flood story (GILGAMESH Epic), which have been compared with the biblical account of the flood; the flood story is also preserved in Hittite and Hurrian versions. The TELL EL-AMARNA letters are clay tablets dating from c. 1400-1350 B.C., written in cuneiform, in a form of Akkadian heavily influenced by Canaanite. They were discovered in the palace of Pharaoh Akhenaten and were sent to him by his vassals in Phoenicia, Syria, and Canaan. These letters, supplemented by the letters found at TAANACH, reflect the political and social systems of 15th-cent. Canaan. The personal names in these letters bear witness to the ethnic composition of the country's population at that time. Among others, the Hurrians who are known to have lived in Canaan (Gen. 36:20) are prominently mentioned. Similar tablets written in cuneiform have been discovered also in SHECHEM, GEZER, EGLON, JERICO, and MEGIDDO.

C. Ugaritic. This is a Canaanite language written in an alphabetic cuneiform script. In addition to the many texts found at UGARIT (dating from the 14th cent. B.C.), other objects inscribed in this script and language have been unearthed in Palestine: a knife found near Mount TABOR in lower Galilee and a clay mold of an axe blade found in BETH SHEMESH. The Ugaritic texts have provided much information on the religion and the language of the Canaanites.

D. Alphabetic texts. At Serabit el-Khadim, in the Sinai desert, inscriptions in the Proto-Sinaitic script were found and dated in the 16th and 15th centuries B.C. These inscriptions are brief and their bearing on the OT is indirect but significant. About ten inscriptions in alphabetic writing dating from the 2nd millennium B.C. have been found in Palestine; these are also very brief but significant for the knowledge of the history of the alphabet. Their language is apparently Canaanite.

I. Inscriptions of the Israelite period. This section describes some inscriptions related to the conquest and settlement of Israel in Palestine, and also to the remainder of biblical history.

A. Egyptian. MERNEPTAH (c. 1224-1216 B.C.) commemorated his achievements by inscribing a series of victory hymns on a stela which he set up in his mortuary temple at Thebes (a duplicate is preserved on the temple of Amon at Karnak). Here is found a reference to Israel, which is described as having been defeated along with Ashkelon and Gezer.

The SEA PEOPLES, who had been repulsed by Merneptah, made a full scale attack on Egypt during the reign of Ramses III (c. 1179-1147). Included in the Sea Peoples were the PHILISTINES, who settled on the Palestinian coastal plain after they were driven back by Ramses. The records of these naval and land battles were inscribed on Ramses' mortuary temple at Medinet Habu.

SHISHAK (Shoshenk) campaigned in Israel in the fifth year of the reign of REHOBOAM king of Judah (1 Ki. 14:25-26; 2 Chr. 12:2-9). On the temple of Karnak, Shishak recorded the cities he conquered, confirming the account in 2 Chr. 12 (esp. vv. 4 and 7) that Jerusalem was not captured; the Egyptians were satisfied with the heavy tribute from the temple treasures, including SOLOMON'S gold shields.

B. Akkadian. The royal annals of the Assyrian kings provided a valuable supplement to the historical books of the Bible. On the "monolith inscription" of SHALMANESER III (858-824 B.C.), AHAB king of Israel appears as one of the leaders of an anti-Assyrian coalition. In the mid-9th cent. the growing menace from Assyrian imperialism forced the kings of Aram and Palestine to join forces in an attempt to stem the tide. The king of Aram of DAMASCUS and Ahab king of Israel, who had hitherto been enemies, are described as leading the alliance that faced Shalmaneser III at the battle of Qarqar in 853.

Another inscription of Shalmaneser III (his "black obelisk") describes, and illustrates with a relief, the submission of JEHU of Israel (this event too is not mentioned in the Bible). TIGLATH-PILESER III (744-727) records how MENAHEM of Israel paid tribute (2 Ki. 15:19-20) and mentions the Syro-Ephraimite War, which involved AHAZ of Judah (cf. 2 Ki. 16:5-18).

SARGON II (721-705) described the destruction of SAMARIA and the deportation of the Israelite population (cf. 2 Ki. 18:9-12). SENNACHERIB

Scribal practice tablet written in cuneiform script (c. 700 B.C.).

(704-681) described his campaigns in Palestine and mentioned Sidon (in Phoenicia), Jaffa, Beth Dagon, Eltekeh, Timnah, and Ekron in addition to forty fortified towns in Judah. His inscription narrates how he locked HEZEKIAH in Jerusalem “like a bird in a cage,” but it says nothing about the fate of Jerusalem, which withstood the Assyrian assault (2 Ki. 18:17-35). Sennacherib based his general staff in LACHISH. This is confirmed in the Bible and also in the reliefs (unearthed in NINEVEH) showing the capture of Lachish.

The annals of ESARHADDON (680-669) mention King MANASSEH of Judah as a vassal, and those of ASHURBANIPAL (668-633) describe his invasion of Syria-Palestine and Egypt. Later Babylonian chronicles describe the fall of Nineveh and the collapse of the Assyrian Empire. These records fix the date of the fall of Nineveh and Jerusalem. About 300 tablets from Babylon, dated between 595 and 570, during the reign of NEBUCHADNEZZAR II (605-562), describe rations for captives and skilled workmen around BABYLON. Listed in these records are JEHOIACHIN, king of Judah, and his five sons (cf. 2 Ki. 25:27-30). Other Akkadian records also shed light on NABONIDUS, CYRUS, and other personalities who are related to the OT record.

C. Hebrew. A number of inscriptions written in “Hebrew” have been found in Palestine. At El-Khadr, near BETHLEHEM, were found three bronze javelin heads, each inscribed with the owner’s name. On the basis of paleography these arrowheads are dated from about the 12th century B.C. In Byblos (see GEBAL), metal blades bearing indecipherable inscriptions were found, and in the Lebanon valley another arrowhead (dated c. the 11th cent.) bearing the owner’s name was found. In the GEZER excavations, a list of the various agricultural seasons was found inscribed in early Hebrew characters and dating from perhaps the 10th cent. (see AGRICULTURE V).

Phoenician inscriptions dating back to the 10th cent. are significant for the knowledge of the history of that period and place (see PHOENICIA), and also provide information on the evolution of the ALPHABET. The longest Phoenician inscription comes from Karatepe in E CILICIA and is especially significant because the same text is found in hieroglyphic Hittite.

The MOABITE STONE, erected by MESHA king of MOAB, dates from the 9th cent. and is the only significant inscription in the Moabite dialect of Canaanite. This inscription mentions the Israelite ruler OMRI and sheds additional light on OT history of that period.

About seventy OSTRACA with Hebrew inscriptions were found at SAMARIA in the storerooms of the king's palace. These date from about the 8th cent. and consist of invoices for the deliveries of oil and wine to the royal treasury. Another group of twenty-one ostraca was uncovered at Lachish; these date from the 6th cent., just before the capture of the town by Nebuchadnezzar, in the time of Jeremiah and Zedekiah.

The SILOAM Inscription, found in an ancient tunnel in Jerusalem, dates from the reign of King Hezekiah and describes the construction of the tunnel, which was a remarkable engineering achievement. Two ostraca found at Tel Kasileh date from the 8th cent. and are certificates of the shipment of quantities of oil and gold sent through this port to Phoenicia or Egypt. These ostraca are not written with ink, like the others mentioned above, but are incised.

Three funerary inscriptions found in the village of Siloam, E of Jerusalem, originate from a date close to Hezekiah, judging from their paleography. Also dating from about the time of Hezekiah are rock engravings found in a burial cave E of Lachish. The Yabneh-Yam ostraca were found in 1960 during the excavation of an ancient fort named Matzad Hashabyahu (on the sea coast S of Yabneh-Yam). The most significant ostrakon of these is a fourteen-line Hebrew letter that may date from the 7th cent.

Because the climate of most of Palestine does not share the extreme dryness of Egypt, organic writing materials like PARCHMENT or PAPYRUS have rotted away over the centuries. Recently, however, a papyrus dating from about the 8th cent. B.C. was found in a cave of Wadi Murabba'at near the Dead Sea. This papyrus is a palimpsest (i.e., later writing has been superimposed upon an earlier text); the two decipherable lines of the original text suggest that the piece of papyrus was part of a long letter. Hundreds of other Hebrew inscriptions, usually very brief, have been found on such miscellaneous objects as seals, weights, jar handles, ossuaries, coins, etc.

D. Aramaic. An ARAMAIC stela, found near ALEPPO, was erected in the 9th cent. by a certain Bir-Hadad king of Aram in honor of the god Melkart; many have thought that the reference is to BEN-HADAD (ANET, 655, confirming 1 Ki. 15:18), but recent research has cast doubt on that identification. A brief Aramaic inscription on an ivory from Arslan Tash mentions the name of HAZAEL (cf. 2 Ki. 8:15). This inscription, along with some Assyrian inscriptions, confirms and illuminates the biblical record.

Several significant Old Aramaic inscriptions from Sujin and Zenjirli provide important information for the history of the Aramaic kingdoms. Later Aramaic inscriptions from various sites like Nerab and Asshur provide additional light on history and the language. The most important discoveries from the Persian period are the group of papyri found in Yeb (ELEPHANTINE, in upper Egypt). These documents illustrate the history and manner of life of a Jewish military colony. They also yield information bearing on the history of the Israelites in Palestine under Persian rule.

Various other Aramaic inscriptions of a later period are brief and contain largely personal names. These, however, do shed some light on the evolution of the language.

E. Greek. Inscriptions on Jewish synagogues show that it was the custom in the Hellenistic period for Jews of the DIASPORA to honor the pagan king and his family by naming the synagogue for them.

An inscription found near Hefzi-bah, in northern Palestine, consists of thirty-eight lines dealing with the damage caused to villages in the northern part of the country by the forced stationing of soldiers there. The contents reflect the reign of ANTIOCHUS III (223-187 B.C.). Another inscription consists of eight lines engraved on marble and was discovered in the Acre excavations in 1959 (see ACCO). This inscription was a dedication to Zeus Soter, and it mentions Antiochus VII.

A number of Greek inscriptions were found in the family burial sites in Maresha (159-119 B.C.). In Samaria (Sebaste), a number of inscriptions from the period of the Ptolemies were found (see PTOLEMY). In Kefar Yasif, NE of Acre, a limestone tablet with a seven-line inscription was found. This inscription, dating from the middle of the 2nd cent. B.C., dedicated an altar to the eastern gods HADAD and ATARGATIS.

It should be added that the sands of Egypt have yielded a mass of Greek papyri that shed much light upon the life and language of the early centuries A.D. (see PAPYRUS). Also, a unique Latin inscription was discovered in the excavations of the CAESAREA theater (a building dedicated in honor of the Emperor TIBERIUS), placed there by the prefect Pontius PILATE.

I. Theological definitions. Inspiration does not stand alone. Along with it are such concepts as revelation, authority, illumination, infallibility, and inerrancy—all of which require precise definition to understand what is meant by the inspiration of the Scripture.

A. Revelation. Basic to the evangelical view of Scripture is the conviction that God has chosen to disclose himself. REVELATION is the term used to depict his self-disclosure. God has revealed himself in nature, his CREATION. He has chosen also to reveal himself supremely in the person of Jesus Christ, who is God incarnate (see INCARNATION). The revelation of Jesus Christ is known through the written Word of God, which is special revelation. The purpose of this written Word is to reveal the incarnate Word, Jesus Christ, and the purpose of the incarnate Word is to reveal the Father and bring salvation. Therefore, the Bible is the objective, propositionally revealed Word of God.

God's self-revelation was given through two media. Parts of that revelation came directly and immediately from God in the form of oracular words, signs, visions, and dreams. This kind of data is known only because God chose to communicate it directly to human beings. A great part of the biblical material, however, has come through God's operations in history via his saving acts. This historical material has been made available either through oral tradition or written records, both of which were used when the books of the Bible were indited. MOSES, in the PENTATEUCH, undoubtedly used oral tradition and extant written records in addition to recording what he had experienced personally and what was revealed to him directly by God. In the case of the historical books in the OT, much of the material used in them was taken from extant court records. The same procedure is true for the NT. LUKE, the physician, was also a historian. He searched out his material, using written records and verifying oral traditions. In contrast, JOHN THE APOSTLE penned the Revelation not from oral tradition or written records, but from direct revelation by God.

B. Inspiration. Technically, revelation preceded inspiration. The latter has to do with the divine method of inscripturating the revelation, whether what was written came to the writer by direct communication from God, from his own research, from his own experience, or from extant records. Inspiration includes the superintending work of the Holy Spirit, but the human writers of Scripture were not automatons. Each writer had his own style. Each one used the Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek language according to his unique gifts and educational background. At the same time that God used human authors in harmony with their gifts he also indited holy Scripture.

Some have argued falsely that Scripture was dictated by God and that the writers were mere secretaries who took down for inscripturation what God spoke, and thus were passive rather than active agents in the process. However, evangelicals generally have held that the Scriptures are both the words of men and the words of God. This dynamic view allows for the use of human faculties and at the same time assures that God secured his predetermined ends so that in the fullest sense the Bible is the Word of God written. The purpose of inspiration was to render the writers infallible in their teaching. Inspiration extends to the whole corpus of Scripture so that in its thoughts and words it is plenarily, or fully, and verbally inspired.

C. Authority. Inspiration carries with it the divine AUTHORITY of God so that Scripture is binding upon the mind, heart, and conscience as the only rule of faith and practice for the believer. In its authority, Scripture stands above men, creeds, and the church itself. All of them are subject to Scripture, and any authority that any one of them may exert is valid insofar as it can be supported from Scripture. A CREED is to be accepted only when it concurs with Scripture, for Christian conscience cannot be bound by anything not taught explicitly in Scripture or logically derived from it. Nor can any CHURCH bind people to its teaching except as it reflects the truth of Scripture. Believers, like creeds and churches, are likewise bound to Scripture so that they can neither release others from what it teaches nor bind them to what it does not teach. Sola Scriptura (the Bible alone) is the enduring principle.

D. Illumination. This is the work of the Holy Spirit, who enlightens the minds of believers as they read the Scripture. Because of SIN and its effects, we are incapable of understanding aright the Scripture apart from the enlightenment that comes only from the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 2:6-16). Illumination is not to be confused with inspiration. The latter refers to those who penned the Scripture. The former refers to those who read the Scripture. The writers of Scripture were inspired; the readers of Scripture are illuminated.

E. Infallibility and inerrancy. Although inspiration is different from infallibility or inerrancy, no discussion of inspiration can be continued without considering these terms. Infallibility and inerrancy are synonymous. The ordinary dictionary meaning of infallible is “inerrant” or “unerring.” In bygone years, the term infallible was used extensively with respect to Scripture, but the word was watered down and began to lose some of its force. In the mid-20th cent., many evangelicals began to substitute the word inerrancy. At stake is the question whether inspiration includes infallibility/inerrancy, and whether the latter extends to all of Scripture or only to some of the teachings of Scripture.

Neither of the terms is found in the earliest creeds, yet both are there implicitly. That they are not mentioned specifically is no substantive reason to suppose that they were unimportant concepts. The creeds and confessions of the Reformation and post-Reformation period generally speak about inspiration and infallibility. The Westminster

Illustration of Luke writing under divine inspiration (from a 9th-cent. Greek MS of the Gospels).

Confession of Faith says the Scriptures “are given by inspiration of God.” They are to be received as the Word of God and are to be believed and obeyed. It also speaks of the Bible’s “incomparable excellencies, and the entire perfection thereof” as well as “our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth.” The Baptist New Hampshire Confession states: “We believe that the Holy Bible was written by men divinely inspired, and is a perfect treasure of heavenly instruction; that it has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth without mixture of error for its matter; that it reveals the principles by which God will judge us, and therefore is, and shall remain to the end of the world, the true center of Christian union, and the supreme standard by which all human conduct, creeds, and opinions should be tried.”

Unquestionably, the evangelical creeds commonly stress inspiration and infallibility (or inerrancy). In recent decades, efforts have been made among those formally attached to evangelical theology to reexamine the concept of inerrancy and in some instances to qualify it. At the same time, they have sought to retain a doctrine of biblical authority. These efforts have not produced any really new formulations. Some have said that the purpose and intent of the writers is important and that in some parts of Scripture it was not their intention to write inerrantly. Others have alleged that the writers were men of their times in respect to history, cosmology, physics, and astronomy. They penned what people then believed but now is known to be untrue. Some say that the biblical writers were infallible teachers, but that errors exist in those portions of the Bible that were not written for teaching purposes.

The effort to maintain the inspiration of Scripture while allowing for error is self-defeating. To retain an errant inerrancy dilutes the doctrine of inspiration and radically undermines its meaning and its usefulness. Few theologians would hold that adherence to orthodox notions of inspiration or inerrancy is necessary to salvation, but this should in no way obscure the importance of these concepts.

Inspiration is inextricably linked to authority and inerrancy. Charles Hodge (Systematic Theology, 3 vols. [1871-73], 1:170-71) perceived this connection when he inquired whether the Bible contains historical and scientific untruths. He asserted that there is a vital difference between what the biblical writers thought and believed on the personal level and what they wrote in Scripture. They may have believed that the sun revolves around the earth, but they did not teach this in Scripture. The language of the Bible is everyday language and is based upon the apparent. Phenomenological language was used in that day as it is used today. Moreover, Hodge distinguished between fact and theory. Theories are man-made. Facts are of God. The Bible never contradicts facts but it does contradict human theories. When interpretation conflicts with established facts then interpretation must yield. The Bible has stood this test, and it will stand through all ages with its claims unshaken and its teaching unimpaired.

Those who reject inerrancy often argue that inspiration is a biblically based doctrine but inerrancy is not. It can only be inferred and therefore should not be binding or made a test of faith. This question, which belongs not so much to the realm of theological definitions as it does to biblical exegesis, leads logically to a discussion of the teaching of Scripture about itself, its inspiration, its infallibility, and its authority.

II. Biblical exegesis. The Bible claims for itself the unique distinction of being the Word of God. The phrase “Thus says the Lord,” or its equivalent, occurs over 2,000 times in the OT. Isaiah asserted: “The LORD said to me...The LORD spoke thus to me...” (Isa. 8:1, 11). David exclaimed: “The Spirit of the LORD spoke through me; / his word was on my tongue. / The God of Israel spoke, / the Rock of Israel said to me...” (2 Sam. 23:2-3). Similarly, Jeremiah said: “Then the LORD reached out his hand and touched my mouth and said to me, ‘Now, I have put my words in your mouth’” (Jer. 1:9; cf. 5:14; 7:27; 13:12).

The NT writers do the same. They assert that the OT prophets spoke the Word of God. “In the past God spoke to our forefathers through the prophets at many times and in various ways” (Heb. 1:1). OT prophecies concerning Jesus Christ were “what the Lord had said through the prophet” (Matt. 1:22; 2:15). The Holy Spirit spoke “through the mouth of David” (Acts 1:16), and “through Isaiah the prophet” (28:25). The Jews of Jesus’ day believed the OT to be the infallible Word of God, accepting on every hand the testimony of the writers that what they said was what God said.

A. The testimony of Jesus. Jesus claimed that the Word of God is inspired and infallible. In Matt. 5:18 he said: “I tell you the truth, until heaven and earth disappear, not the smallest letter [Gk. iōta G2740], not the least stroke of a pen [keraia G3037, “dot, tittle”], will by any means disappear from the Law until everything is accomplished.” The use of “iota” and “dot,” referring to the smallest character of the Hebrew alphabet and the tiniest part of any Hebrew letter (see DOT), makes clear how highly Jesus regarded the OT (see IB, 7:292). Even so radical a critic as Rudolf Bultmann says that “Jesus agreed with the scribes of his time in accepting without question the authority of the [OT] Law” (Jesus and the Word [1958], 61).

In many instances, Jesus reiterated his belief in the infallibility of OT Scripture (e.g., Mk. 7:13; Lk. 16:31; 24:27; Jn. 10:35). It was Jesus who “pre-authenticated” the NT (Jn. 14:26; 16:12-13). So great was Jesus’ view of the Scripture that in two instances (Matt. 22:43-45 and Jn. 10:34-35) his whole argument rested upon a single word. He viewed the Scripture as verbally inspired and wholly trustworthy. To deny his view is to deny his person and to accept his person is to accept his view of Scripture.

B. The testimony of the apostle Paul. PAUL, in a key passage dealing with inspiration, said to TIMOTHY, “All Scripture is God-breathed [theopneustos G2535; KJV, given by inspiration of God] and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work” (2 Tim. 3:16-17). The Greek word theopneustos is a compound of theos G2536 (God) and a derivative of the verb pneō G4463 (to breathe). The ending -tos makes the word passive in meaning, so it is properly translated “breathed of God” or “that which is breathed out by God.” (Although some have argued that the verse should read, “Every scripture inspired of God is also useful...,” the traditional rendering is certainly accurate.)

Thus Scripture has its origin in God, not in man. The creative breath of God himself gave us Scripture. Moreover, the phrase “all Scripture” (pasa graphē) refers to the written words, not simply to the divine meaning. The very words of Scripture are thus inspired, or breathed out, by God. Some conservative Bible scholars are not happy that theopneustos has been translated “inspired,” as though to suggest that the Scriptures are human writings to which has been added the divine breath. Paul says that the Scriptures originated from God himself, not simply from men upon whom a divine influence came. Once it has been established that the Scriptures are “breathed out by God,” it follows axiomatically that the books of the Bible are free from error and trustworthy in every regard.

Inspiration guarantees the truth-claim of Scripture, but this has to do with the originals (the autographs), not the copies, for few would deny that there are some copyists’ errors. The human authors of Scripture accepted the common scientific and other notions of their day, but when they wrote about factual, historical, and scientific matters they were preserved from error by the Holy Spirit and never wrote or taught what is not true. Paul’s claim is one that extends to all Scripture, not just parts of it (he does not say that all Scripture is of equal value, however).

Paul’s teaching about biblical inspiration does not mean that everything in the Bible is true per se. Scripture assures us that what Satan said to Medieval Hebrew scroll of the book of Isaiah in Hebrew (A.D. 1350). The lips of Isaiah were cleansed with a live coal so that he might be sent out to speak the words of God (Isa. 6:6-7).

Jesus in the wilderness temptation and what JOB’S friends said to him in conversation are what they really said. Whether what they said is true or false is determined by the context. The biblical writers used figures of speech, and Jesus himself spoke in PARABLES and employed ALLEGORY. These are not to be taken literally. Rather, their meanings are to be ferreted out in accordance with the principles of hermeneutics (see INTERPRETATION).

Elsewhere Paul asserts clearly that what he has written is the revelation of God. In 1 Cor. 2:12-13 he says: “We have not received the spirit of the world but the Spirit who is from God, that we may understand what God has freely given us. This is what we speak, not in words taught us by human wisdom but in words taught by the Spirit, expressing spiritual truths in spiritual words.” A. T. Robertson (Word Pictures in the New Testament, 6 vols. [1930-33], 4:88] comments: “So then Paul claims the help of the Holy Spirit in the utterance (laloumen) of the words...Clearly Paul means that the help of the Holy Spirit in the utterance of the revelation extends to the words. No theory of inspiration is here stated, but it is not mere human wisdom. Paul’s own Epistles bear eloquent witness to the lofty claim here made. They remain today after nearly nineteen centuries throbbing with the power of the Spirit of God, dynamic with life for the problems of today as when Paul wrote them for the needs of the believers in his time, the greatest epistles of all time, surcharged with the energy of God.”

In 1 Cor. 14:37 Paul writes: “If anybody thinks he is a prophet or spiritually gifted, let him acknowledge that what I am writing to you is the Lord’s command.” Here he claims inspiration for his position. As if this were not enough, Paul tells the Thessalonians, “And we also thank God continually because, when you received the word of God, which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men, but as it actually is, the word of God, which is at work in you who believe” (1 Thess. 2:13). Paul says that what he has written is really the word of God. It is not the words of men, although penned by men. It does not contain the word of God; it is the word of God. The Thessalonians accepted Paul’s claim and received what he preached and wrote as that which came from God. Nothing could have been more plain. Paul asserts that his words are Spirit-taught and do not spring from human reason (cf. 1 Cor. 2:13).

C. The testimony of the apostle Peter. Peter writes: “Above all, you must understand that no prophecy of Scripture came about by the prophet’s own interpretation. For prophecy never had its origin in the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit” (2 Pet. 1:20-21). He was seeking to persuade his readers of the divine origin of Scripture. In doing this he said negatively that it did not come from the human will. Rather, the authors of Scripture were holy men moved by the Holy Spirit, who “powerfully excited and effectually engaged them to speak (and write) what he had put in their mouths. He so wisely and carefully assisted and directed them in the delivery of what they had received from him that they were effectually secured from any mistake in expressing what they revealed; so that the very words of scripture are to be accounted the words of the Holy Ghost” (Matthew Henry, A Commentary on the Holy Bible, 6 vols. [repr. 1960], 6:1044).

D. Conclusion. The teaching of Christ, the prophets, and the apostles should settle the matter of biblical authority and inspiration once for all. But for those who desire further confirmation, in addition to the teaching of Scripture concerning itself, there are other evidences. Predictive prophecy testifies to biblical inspiration and trustworthiness (see PROPHETS AND PROPHECY). ARCHAEOLOGY continues to confirm the historical accuracy of the Bible. The pragmatic test of personal experience shows that when people taste and see, they discover that the Bible works in their lives (cf. Ps. 34:8; 119:103). The Holy Spirit bears witness to the spirits of men and women that the Bible is the very Word of God (cf. 1 Jn. 5:6).

Any view of inspiration produces problems, some of which yield easily to solutions and others do not. But this is true of other biblical doctrines as well. No one surrenders his belief in the love of God because of unresolved problems. The church has not dismissed the doctrine of the Trinity because the concept of one God eternally subsistent in three persons is most difficult to understand. So it is with inspiration. Many of the difficult problems have been resolved; some problems remain; but it is unnecessary to surrender the Bible’s own teaching with respect to its inspiration because of some unresolved problems.

The Bible teaches that it is the Word of God and the only infallible rule of faith and practice. But this teaching of the Bible concerning itself would be relatively useless if no one accepted its claims and propagated them. Thus no discussion of inspiration is complete without a historical overview in which the attitude of the Christian church and its theologians toward the Scripture is delineated.

III. Historical summary. The foundation of the church is JESUS CHRIST. Scripture reveals him, and therefore it has been regarded by the church as the written Word of God and held in highest esteem. The testimony of the church to Scripture is one in which its inspiration, authority, and infallibility have been taught, and its truth-claim accepted. In recent times, however, a sustained interest in comparative religion and biblical higher criticism has challenged the truth-claim of Scripture and called into question the normative orthodox view. Therefore, some word must be said about the CANON of Scripture and the attitude of the church toward it over the centuries.

A. *The canon of Scripture. Historically, which books belonged in the OT and the NT was determined differently. In Jesus' day, the Greek S EPTUAGINT already existed and included not only the OT books that Protestants generally acknowledge to be canonical, but also the apocryphal books, which they do not accept. The OT Scripture was divided into three categories: the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. The books of the Law and the Prophets were firmly fixed by NT times. But there were differences of opinion about certain of the books included in the Writings. By A.D. 90, JOSEPHUS could write that the canon of the OT was fixed and unalterable and did not include the apocryphal books. It has even been asserted by some that the rabbis at the Council of Jamnia (c. A.D. 100) excluded the APOCRYPHA from the OT canon. The apocryphal books, which the Jews did not regard as canonical, were included by JEROME in his Latin translation (VULGATE), although he did so reluctantly. These were generally accepted by the church as part of Scripture until the 4th cent. The Reformers, however, refused to regard the Apocrypha as Scripture since they were not included in the Hebrew canon. The Roman Catholic Council of Trent (1545-1563) affirmed the inclusion of the Apocrypha as part of the canon of OT Scripture.

The canon of the NT was fixed after a long battle accompanied by much dissent. By the end of the 2nd cent., the four Gospels and the thirteen letters of Paul were universally regarded as Scripture, and by the end of the 4th century, the NT as now known was fixed, although doubts persisted about the books of Hebrews, Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and the Revelation.

B. *Jesus and Josephus and the OT. It is certain that Jesus was familiar with the Hebrew OT canon and unequivocally affirmed that its books are inspired, infallible, and authoritative. Liberal and conservative scholars alike generally agree that Jesus believed as the Jews of his day did, that the OT was inerrant and everywhere binding. So did the apostles of Jesus. Moreover, nothing in the Gospels suggests that Jesus ever raised any questions about the truth-claims of the OT.

The Jewish historian Josephus, in his treatise Contra Apionem, insisted on the inviolability of the OT and did so in words that called for complete historical reliability and freedom from error. EUSEBIUS, the church historian, quoted Josephus as believing that the OT books had unique authority and sanctity, that they were to be regarded as "oracles of God," and that they contain no discrepancies of fact.

C. *The early church fathers. Once the question of the canon was settled, it was almost universally believed that the books of the Bible were the infallible Word of God written. It is true that inspiration and infallibility were not pivotal issues as the Christological controversies were. Some of the early churchmen held to a mechanical dictation view of the process of inscripturation, and all of them spoke of Scripture in the highest terms and agreed that it was the ultimate source of authority.

In a work known as the Appeal to the Greeks (8.38), the unknown author clearly accepted verbal inspiration, although he seemed to limit inspiration to that which had for its purpose the impartation of religious truths. JUSTIN MARTYR (Dialogue with Trypho 65) held to full inspiration and authority, declaring that there are no contradictions in Scripture. Athenagoras (A Plea for the Christians 9) believed that the writers were passive human instruments played upon by God as men play on harps. IRENAEUS (Against Heresies 1.10; 3.16; 4.20, 34) said God came upon the writers of Scripture so that they had perfect knowledge on every subject. He called the Scriptures “perfect.” TERTULLIAN (On Prescription Against Heretics 22) averred that the Holy Spirit so aided the writers of Scripture “that there was nothing of which they were ignorant.”

AUGUSTINE was undoubtedly the greatest of the church fathers. Of the Scriptures he wrote (Letters of St. Augustine 82.3): “For I confess to your Charity that I have learned to yield this respect and honour only to the canonical books of Scripture: of these alone do I most firmly believe that the authors were completely free from error. And if in these writings I am perplexed by anything which appears to me opposed to truth, I do not hesitate to suppose that either the MS is faulty, or the translator has not caught the meaning of what was said, or I myself have failed to understand it. As to all other writings, in reading them, however great the superiority of the authors to myself in sanctity and learning, I do not accept their teaching as true on the mere ground of the opinion being held by them; but only because they have succeeded in convincing my judgment of its truth either by means of these canonical writings themselves, or by arguments addressed to my reason. I believe, my brother, that this is your opinion as well as mine. I do not need to say that I do not suppose you to wish your books to be read like those of the prophets or of the apostles, concerning which it would be wrong to doubt that they are free from error.”

D. The Roman Catholic Church. This church has consistently taught that the Bible is inspired and also that it is inerrant. The Catholic Encyclopedia (1910 ed., p. 48) says: “For the last three centuries there have been authors—theologians, exegetes, and especially apologists, such as Holden, Rohling, Lenormont, di Bartoli, and others—who maintained, with more or less confidence, that inspiration was limited to moral and dogmatic teaching, excluding everything in the Bible relating to history and the natural sciences. They think that, in this way, a whole mass of difficulties against the inerrancy of the Bible would be removed. But the Church has never ceased to protest against this attempt to restrict the inspiration of the sacred books. This is what took place when Mgr. d’Hulst, Rector of the Institut Catholique of Paris, gave a sympathetic account of this opinion in ‘Le Correspondent’ of 25 Jan. 1893. The reply was quickly forthcoming in the Encyclical ‘Providentissimus Deus’ of the same year. In that Encyclical Leo XIII said: ‘It will never be lawful to restrict inspiration to certain parts of the Holy Scriptures, or to grant that the sacred writer could have made a mistake. Nor may the opinion of those be tolerated, who, in order to get out of these difficulties, do not hesitate to suppose that Divine inspiration extends only to what touches faith and morals, on the false plea that the true meaning is sought less in what God has said than in the motive for which he has said it.’ In fact, a limited inspiration contradicts Christian tradition and theological teaching...As for the inerrancy of the inspired text it is to the Inspirer that it must finally be attributed, and it matters little if God has insured the truth of his scripture by the grace of inspiration itself, as the adherents of verbal inspiration teach, rather than by a providential assistance.”

The Roman Catholic Church did not stop with biblical infallibility. It added tradition as an additional source of revelation, and the magisterium (teaching authority) of the church was used to determine the meaning of Scripture. Thus the church built upon the doctrine of the church fathers and exceeded anything they could have imagined.

E. The Reformers. The Reformation represented a return to the teachings of the apostles and prophets. The Reformers vigorously opposed tradition as a source of revelation. They had no patience with the magisterium of the church. The sola Scriptura to the Reformers meant the Bible alone, minus tradition. It left no room whatever for the church as the final teaching authority. The universal priesthood of all believers brought interpretation of Scripture back to the individual under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Churches, creeds, and people were all subject to the Scripture and nothing else.

F. Warfield and liberalism. At no time during the first nineteen centuries of the Christian era did the question of inspiration and authority rack the church as did the Christological and anthropological controversies of the early centuries, when the nature of Christ and the Augustinian-Pelagian differences were being decided. Only from the 19th cent. on, when German higher criticism and the study of comparative religion dominated the scene, did inspiration, infallibility, and authority become a watershed. Since that time, there have been radical departures both from Reformation and Roman Catholic views of Scripture.

At the turn of the 20th cent., the issue was highlighted by the struggle between the Princeton divines (the Hodges and B. B. Warfield) and their opponents, a key leader of whom was Charles Augustus Briggs of Union Theological Seminary in New York City. In the ensuing battle, the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A., affirmed the views of Warfield, and Briggs was defrocked. The 1920s became a battlefield over biblical inspiration for Presbyterians and many other denominations. Liberalism triumphed over orthodoxy by the 1930s in America even while Europe was embracing the neoorthodoxy of Karl Barth, whose work on Romans appeared in 1919. By the mid-1930s, liberalism's advance appeared to have been halted decisively by neoorthodoxy, and orthodoxy itself seemed to have gained a new lease on life. In the 1940s, neoevangelicalism became a live option, but its impetus was hampered quickly when, having been established as a counterbalance to fundamentalism on the right and neoorthodoxy and liberalism on the left, it was itself fractured by the inroads of higher criticism.

It appears that the inspiration of the Scripture will continue to be a pivotal problem for the church at large, and there is little doubt that any marked departure from the historic view of the church on this matter always leads to further heresies and finally to apostasy.

instruction. See LAW (OT); TEACHER.

instrument. See MUSIC, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

integrity. Moral soundness; steadfast uprightness; incorruptibility. Although several Hebrew words can be translated “integrity,” this English term usually renders the noun tōm H9448, “completeness, wholeness, perfection” (1 Ki. 9:4 et al.; less frequently, tummâ H9450, Job 2:3 et al.); the term occurs especially in the poetic WISDOM Literature (Prov. 19:1 et al.). The adjectives tām H9447 and tāmîm H9459, both meaning “complete, blameless,” are often used to describe sacrificial animals that have no defects (Exod. 12:5 et al.), but also godly men such as NOAH, ABRAHAM, and DAVID (Gen. 6:8; 17:1; 2 Sam. 22:24). (See NIDOTTE, 4:306-8.)

In the NT, “integrity” is used by modern versions to render Greek aphthoria G917, “incorruption”

Copper statue of a Babylonian worshiper from approximately the time of Abraham. God challenged Abraham (Abram) to demonstrate integrity in all he did, including his worship (Gen. 17:1).

(Tit. 2:7). The concept is certainly reflected in other passages, however, and the NIV in one context uses the phrase “man of integrity” to translate alēthēs G239 (Matt. 22:16=Mk. 12:14; NRSV, “sincere”). See RIGHTEOUSNESS; SINCERE.

intercession. The act of pleading on behalf of someone else. See PRAYER.

intercession of Christ. The intercession of Christ refers to PRAYER offered by Christ on behalf of others. It is frequently understood as the activity he exercises in this respect in his exalted glory at the right hand of the Father (see EXALTATION OF CHRIST). This aspect of his heavenly ministry is all-important, and the passages of Scripture that speak expressly of Jesus’ “intercession” refer to it. There are also the examples of Jesus’ intercession while he was on earth, especially Jn. 17. This address to the Father is not exclusively intercession. It includes prayer on his own behalf (vv. 1, 5). But it is largely prayer on behalf of others and is an index to the content of Jesus’ intercession in heaven. Not only do we have this example, but we have express reference to this ministry on his own part (Lk. 22:32) and also the record of intercessory utterance (23:34).

In Rom. 8:34 and Heb. 7:25 (cf. Isa. 53:12), the term for making intercession (entynchanō G1961) is used with reference to Christ. In both passages, it is the intercession offered in heaven. But to this same activity Jesus referred when he said to the disciples: “And I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Counselor to be with you forever—the Spirit of truth” (Jn. 14:16-17; cf. 16:26-27). There are two observations of particular relevance: (1) Intercession is directed to God the Father; this is corroborated by Jesus’ great intercessory prayer in Jn. 17 (cf. vv. 1, 5, 11, 21, 24-25), and it is striking how frequently the name of the Father appears. (2) The prayer to the Father is closely related to the office of ADVOCATE that Jesus executes; the Holy Spirit as the other Counselor (Advocate) implies that Jesus himself performed this function. He is the advocate now with the Father (1 Jn. 2:1). It may well be, therefore, that intercession includes more than prayer; that it involves the pleading of the case of those who come within the scope of the intercession (cf. Acts 25:24; Rom. 11:2). See PARACLETE.

That Jesus pleads the case of God’s people and prays on their behalf points to the economy of redemption and to the distinct functions performed by the persons of the Godhead in terms of that economy. The process of redemption is not yet consummated, and therefore the distinguishing operations of the three Persons are still in effect. If it was consonant with supreme love and wisdom for the Father to send his own Son into this world to redeem his people, it is consonant with the same love and wisdom for the Father to act now in the progressive realization of his saving counsel through a mediation that the Son exercises in intercession.

In those contexts where the heavenly intercession is mentioned, there is an index to the kind of intercession Jesus offers. In Rom. 8:34, the context is one in which believers are viewed as challenged by their adversaries, and the apostle provides the answer to any charge laid against them. The intercession is coordinated with the death, resurrection, and exalted glory of Christ as that which insures the security of the people of God. The active and abiding intercession of Christ is engaged with the bond that unites them to Christ. See UNION WITH CHRIST. The intercession is appealed to for the purpose of assuring believers that the exalted Lord is unceasingly concerned with the conflicts and trials that beset them, concerned by way of prayer on their behalf. As a result they will be more than conquerors in every engagement with their adversaries. It is intercession directed to every exigency of their warfare.

The intercession of Christ is mentioned as that which insures SALVATION to the uttermost (Heb. 7:25). Such salvation is inclusive; it is salvation complete and perfect. The intercession, therefore, brings within its scope all that is necessary to salvation in its consummated perfection; it is interposed to meet every need of the believer. No blessing enjoyed, no need supplied is outside the range of Christ's intercession, and it is the guarantee of all GRACE.

The intercession must be construed as based upon and proceeding from Jesus' atoning accomplishment. In the two passages mentioned above, this dependence is clearly implied. "Christ Jesus, who died—more than that, who was raised to life—is at the right hand of God and is also interceding for us" (Rom. 8:34). Both the preceding and succeeding contexts of Heb. 7:25 are replete with references to Christ's high priestly identity and sacrifice. The intercession is, therefore, to be viewed specifically as a phase of Jesus' high priestly function (cf. also 1 Jn. 2:1-2, which intimates the same relationship). As in the priestly propitiation, the notion that the Father is won over to clemency finds no place. The intercession is one aspect of that provision that God the Father in love has made to bring to perfection his redemptive design. (See further J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, 3.20.17-20; W. Symington, On the Atonement and Intercession of Jesus Christ [1839], 239-81; J. interest. The profit received by a lender as inducement for making a loan (KJV, "usury," but this term in modern usage connotes excessive, ruinous rates of interest). The primary Hebrew term for "interest" is nešek H5968 (Exod. 22:25 et al.), from the verb nāšak 5967, which can be rendered "to charge [interest]" (Deut. 23:20-21; cf. Hab. 2:7; the latter passage suggests that this meaning may be a metaphorical extension of the verb nāšak H5966, "to bite," as by a snake). The noun tarbît H9552 appears to imply "excessive interest" (Ezek. 18:8 et al.). Note also the use of the verb nāšā' H5957 ("to lend") with its cognate noun maššā' H5391, which apparently can mean "interest" (Neh. 5:7 [NIV, "exacting usury"]; cf. vv. 10-11; 10:31). In the NT the term is Greek tokos G5527 ("offspring, produce [of money]"), used in the parable of the talents/ pounds (Matt. 25:27; Lk. 19:23).

It should be understood that, as a rule, ancient rates of interest were ruinously high; in BABYLON, for example, it was common to lend food or produce at about 33 percent interest, and money (i.e., silver bullion) at 20 percent. In NUZI some loans were made at a 50 percent rate. Modern rates of interest at less than 15 percent were quite unheard of. The PENTATEUCH absolutely forbade the lending of money or produce to a fellow Israelite at interest (Lev. 25:36-37; Deut. 23:19-20); the simple condition for lending was return of the principal (Exod. 22:25). In later times these sanctions were disregarded, with resulting hardship to the borrowers, even to the point of taking their children off into slavery (cf. 2 Ki. 4:1). Early in the 6th cent. B.C., EZEKIEL summoned his countrymen to return to the humane rule of the TORAH in this regard (Ezek. 18:8, 13, 17; 22:12), and after the RESTORATION, NEHEMIAH found that the exaction of usurious rates of interest had resulted in the loss of the property and homes of the poor in Judah (Neh. 5:6-13). In his capacity as governor he compelled the lenders to give back all that they had taken at usury, and thus restore a brotherly relationship with their fellow believers. In the NT the practice of lending money at interest, at least through the agency of banks, seems to be accepted by Jesus as normal business procedure (Matt. 25:27; Lk. 19:23). intermediate state. This expression commonly designates that realm or condition in which the soul exists between the decease of the body and the RESURRECTION. Although the Bible says little about the state of the DEAD, it is clear even from the OT that the human personality survives DEATH, whereas the doctrine of IMMORTALITY is a firm tenet of NT faith. Differences of opinion regarding the intermediate state relate to its nature: whether or not it is purgatorial in function, whether or not the human spirit has a chance to repent, and whether or not the soul is conscious of its environment. Regarding the state of the dead, the Bible views bodily resurrection as the goal of individual ESCHATOLOGY. Man does not consist of separate units of BODY and SOUL (or SPIRIT), but is a dynamic integrated personality of which these are aspects. Immortality, therefore, does not mean endless existence so much as freedom from death (1 Cor. 15:53) and from corruption (Rom. 2:7). In Christ, believers will exchange their mortality for immortality at the resurrection (1 Cor. 15:53-54). See also DEAD, ABODE OF THE.

In OT belief, the human personality (nepeš H5883) went at death to SHEOL, a lowly region of darkness and silence (Ps. 86:13; Prov. 15:24; Ezek. 26:20; Job 10:22). The dead, who were gathered in tribes (Ezek. 32:17-32), received the dying (Isa. 14:9-10). Although Sheol was not so much the realm as the style of the dead, it was not life, since that could only flourish in the divine presence (Ps. 16:10), to which God's people would ultimately be brought (16:9-11; 73:24; Job 19:25-26).

The Greek HADES (Matt. 11:23; Lk. 10:15; Acts 2:27; 1 Cor. 15:55; et al.) is the equivalent of Sheol, and takes its place with the other concepts of life after death, such as PARADISE. NT thought about the intermediate state was influenced in the intertestamental period by Pharisaic views on Sheol, the resurrection, and the judgment. In the pre-Christian period, Sheol was regarded not as the permanent home, but only the intermediate place, for the departed spirits. It was the intermediate abode of the righteous only, who would leave it later on at the resurrection (Pss. Sol. 14.6-7; 2 Macc. 7:9; 14:46). Although OT thought saw little connection between God and Sheol, 2 Macc. 12:43-45 records Judas MACCABEE as praying that his fallen soldiers would be released from their sins there to prepare them for the resurrection. According to 1 En. 22, Sheol was divided into three separate places, one for the righteous, another for the wicked who died before divine retribution overtook them, and a third for the wicked who were punished adequately while still alive. In 2 Esd. 7:95 and 2 Bar. 21.23-24, the souls of the wicked are said to go straight to Sheol, whereas the righteous ascend to heavenly chambers to enjoy rest and quietness under the protection of angels before being resurrected.

All intertestamental eschatology was founded upon a "three-storied universe," with HEAVEN (or a series of heavens) being the divine abode above the earth, and Sheol (the place of departed spirits) or GEHENNA (the place where the wicked were punished) as an underworld. Occasionally, Sheol was regarded as the place of punishment also. The soul of ADAM ascended at death to paradise, the third of seven heavens. The term paradise originally meant a "park" or "enclosed garden," and for pre-Christian Judaism it designated the original Garden of Eden as either the eternal abode of the righteous or their locale prior to the resurrection (see EDEN, GARDEN OF). In the NT, the parabolic reference to ABRAHAM'S BOSOM (Lk. 16:22-31) made use of such thought, but was probably not intended to teach anything about the state of the dead. If PAUL'S experience was that of a visit to paradise where he received a revelation (2 Cor. 12:1-4), it appears that he thought of the righteous dead as already living in paradise with the Lord (cf. 2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23). On the cross, Christ promised the penitent thief an abode in paradise (Lk. 23:43), which indicates that the righteous entered paradise at death. The book of Revelation also teaches clearly that at least some righteous enter a celestial abode after death but before the final resurrection (Rev. 6:9-11; 7:9-17).

Intertestamental beliefs regarding the intermediate state were closely linked with the concept of physical resurrection, a doctrine espoused by the PHARISEES but denied by the SADDUCEES. The resurrection of the dead was anticipated in a few OT passages (Isa. 25:8; 26:19; Dan. 12:2), and was encouraged both by speculation on the nature of the intermediate state in Sheol and the joys of the coming messianic age. In the light of the latter in particular, it was only just that the righteous departed should share the joys of divine rule, and the wicked dead be punished correspondingly. The concept of the physical resurrection was a necessary accompaniment to such thought, and in most instances the soul was imagined as coming from Sheol or some other intermediate state to rejoin the body buried on earth previously. Under Pharisaic influence the doctrine of resurrection sometimes developed certain coarse, materialistic features.

People came to assume the existence of another intermediate state later known as purgatory, which was frequently confused with Sheol (2 Macc. 12:39-45). The Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox churches proclaimed the existence of such a place of temporal punishment in the intermediate realm. According to this view, all who died in a state of ecclesiastical grace must undergo a period of purifying so as to make them perfect before God. Thus the bulk of baptized people dying in fellowship with the church would have to pass through purgatory before being translated to heaven. Cultic prescriptions for the duration of the experience vary in degree, as do the sufferings of those thought to be in this state. Monetary and other gifts to the church, prayers, and acts of devotion, are held to shorten or even eliminate the stay of the individual soul in purgatory. This view has no OT or NT support, runs counter to the biblical doctrine of a final judgment, and is flatly contradicted by a passage which the Roman Catholics regard as Scripture (Wisd. 3:1-4).

In the NT, other expressions than “paradise” refer to the existence of the righteous after death (Mk. 12:18-27; Lk. 16:9, 19-31; Rev. 6:9-11; et al.), and whereas much of the language concerning the state of the dead is symbolic, it does at least enlarge the OT revelation that death does not terminate individual existence. It is clear that the saints live on after death in glory in the divine presence realizing the goal of redemption in Christ (2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23; Rev. 14:13). Because the total person is saved, references to the “salvation of your souls” (1 Pet. 1:9; Jas. 1:21) do not contemplate the salvation of the “soul” apart from the “body.” Describing the intermediate state as “rest” (cf. Heb. 4:10) does not mean that those present in it are indolent or inactive, but rather that they are satisfied by the joy of accomplishment.

Even for the righteous, the intermediate state would seem to be one of imperfection, partly because the spirit is without a bodily manifestation and partly because the joys of heaven are not forthcoming for the saints until after the SECOND COMING of Christ and the final judgment. Thus, the experience of the intermediate state presages future divine blessings. Life in the resurrection body in heaven marks the final stage of individual salvation.

interpretation. The correct reproduction of the thoughts of another (either a writer or speaker), often from a different language. Especially when applied to the BIBLE, interpretation has been called hermeneutics, a term first occurring in a work by J. C. Dannhaur in the 17th cent. (from the Gk. verb hermēneuō G2257, “to express, explain, translate, interpret”). See also SCRIPTURE.

I. Biblical interpretation. Interpretation has as its goal the discovery of the thought processes and the meanings of the writer, or writers, of the books of the Bible. The ultimate design is to convey that meaning to contemporary persons. The material of the Bible, written between 2,000 and 3,500 years ago, poses a special problem for the modern interpreter because it was formulated in environments and in languages considerably different from those that prevail in the modern world.

A. Nature. Biblical interpretation has a dual nature: (1) the problem of the language, and (2) the theological significance of the material. The discovery of the true meaning of all words and terms in any biblical passage is the place where interpretation begins. This is essentially an interpretation of language. It embraces such considerations as definition of words, contextual analysis, literary types and forms, historical analogy, and syntactical distinctives. In addition, biblical material is of such a nature as to demand special consideration. The doctrine of INSPIRATION holds the biblical interpreter to a proper regard for the fundamental character of Scripture. It demands a recognition of the theological significance of Scripture, resting upon the REVELATION of God that is not found in any other literature. The extraordinary character of Scripture transcends the usual and ordinary analysis of nonbiblical materials.

B. Method. The language of the Bible is human language and, as such, is subject to the same principles and laws that govern the interpretation of any book or writing other than the Bible. If the language of the Bible were other than a true human language subject to the usual rules of human communication, there would be no basis for human beings to interpret or come by any trustworthy knowledge of its meaning. Because the books of the Bible are records in human speech, they must be handled in view of literary structure, literary form, and literary relations as any other book or writing. In 1860, Essays and Reviews introduced the now famous axiom of Benjamin Jowett: "Interpret the Bible like any other book." Jowett had in mind the meaning of words, the correct reading of the text, etc., but unfortunately his remark has come to mean for many: “just like any other book for there is nothing special about the Bible.”

There are legitimate presuppositions to be brought to Scripture that cannot be brought to other books. Because the Bible has God as its ultimate author, it must be expected that its contents will bear true and faithful relation to that fact. The Scripture itself offers the best insight into how it is to be interpreted—in light of its inspired character. To one who objects that it is illegitimate to bring a presupposition to the Bible as an interpreter, it is to be remarked that in the nature of things every interpreter comes with a presupposition. The question is: Which presupposition? Is the Bible the Word of God or the word of men? The theological problem of interpretation is in a large degree the result of modern studies related to the changing attitudes of scholars toward the doctrine of inspiration and revelation.

C. Means. The evangelical interpreter dares not neglect history in any of its relation to the problem of setting out the true meaning of a biblical text. Indeed, the knowledge of history strengthens the hand of the interpreter who accepts the ultimate authorship of the God of history. Every means of the historical-critical method of interpretation should claim his attention: textual criticism, literary criticism, comparative religion criticism, historical criticism, etc. Beyond all of this, however, the HOLY SPIRIT is to be acknowledged as the only infallible interpreter of God’s Word. The mind of the Lord, as given to the interpreter through the ministry of the Spirit, is an absolute necessity for the interpretation of Scripture. The Bible is not only a special book, but its faithful interpreter must be a special person.

II. History of biblical interpretation. Antecedent to any interpretation of the Bible that could be called Christian were nearly 400 years of Jewish interpretation of the OT. Perhaps EZRA (450 B.C.) made the earliest effort at a definite, systematic interpretation of the law. He was the founding father of that class within JUDAISM, known subsequently as the SCRIBES, who devoted themselves to the exposition of the meaning of the law.

A. Pre-Christian interpretation. Out of Ezra’s emphasis on the observance of the law grew a formulation of the oral law, an interpretation of the law of Moses that, legalistic and fanciful as it often was, created a hedge about the law, making it difficult for the scribes in NT times to interpret the OT correctly. See MISHNAH.

1. Jewish literalism. The OT was dissected by the scribes into its separate words and phrases, to which meanings were sometimes given that disregarded the history, spirit, or context of the material being interpreted. In the decades preceding the NT, three rabbinical leaders were preeminent. HILLEL, who was born in Babylon and came to Jerusalem as a youth, had the greatest influence on his own and succeeding generations. Hillel is said to have drawn up seven laws of interpretation that were influential for generations.

The first of Hillel’s rules was known as the rule of “light and heavy” and was simply an application of the usual argument of “from the lesser to the greater.” The second rule dealt with an inferred relation between two subjects from identical expressions of reference; for instance, it was written that both the SABBATH and the PASSOVER sacrifice must be “at the due season,” and if this meant that the “daily” sacrifice must be offered on a Sabbath, then the Passover sacrifice may also be offered on a Sabbath. The third rule was the “extension from the special to the general”; for example, necessary work on a Sabbath became authorized work on any holy day. The fourth rule was the explanation of two passages by a third. The fifth rule allowed drawing from a general situation an inference that governed special situations. The sixth rule was the explanation of a passage from the analogy of other passages. Rule seven was an application of inferences from passages that were self-evident. In the hands of the scribes these simple rules became the basis for much unwarranted interpretation.

Shammai was the second important rabbi, a rival of Hillel and a formalist in the extreme school of Jewish legalism. According to some, total disregard for the real spirit of the law brought him and his followers into blind slavery to its letter. It has been told that his formalism led him to starve his infant grandson nearly to death in an attempt to make him fast on the Great Day of Atonement. At the Feast of Tabernacles, he insisted that the booth required at the season be built over the bed of his daughter, who was in the agony of childbirth.

GAMALIEL, regarded as the grandson of Hillel, is of special interest because he was the teacher of PAUL. He seems to have been broadminded in his interpretation of the law, due to the fact that he studied and taught Greek literature and advocated the rights and privileges of the Gentiles.

Page from a MS of the Mishnah (tractate Yebamot), offering interpretation on the subject of levirate marriage.

Until later than NT times, the rabbis transmitted all their teachings orally, but in the oral tradition there were several methods of interpretation that were preserved in the later written code (c. 3rd Christian cent.). The Mishnah was the earliest collection of the oral interpretation committed to writing. It consisted of an elaboration of the law of Moses, dealing with its application, called HALAKAH, and a hortatory and illustrative commentary called HAGGADAH. The Midrashim (plural of MIDRASH) were commentaries on selected portions of the biblical books. Halakah combined with Haggadah appeared in the TALMUD as GEMARA, which consisted of rabbinical comments on the Mishnah. (See the important work by A. Samely, Rabbinic Interpretation of Scripture in the Mishnah [2002].)

2. Jewish allegorism. ALEXANDRIA, Egypt, was the center of Jewish allegorical interpretation. Although some ALLEGORY was found in the Palestinian exegesis known as Haggadah, or midrashic interpretation, the philosophical environment of Alexandria was causative to its full development; it was there that Jewish rabbis were equipped to make a philosophical exposition of the OT. The earliest known Jewish exponent of the allegorical approach was Aristobulus, a famous teacher in the Judaism of Alexandria. He was the first to propose that the Greek philosophers and poets derived their ideas from a translation of the law of Moses into Statue of Jerome, an early translator and interpreter of the Bible. From the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem.

Greek, which he believed greatly antedated the SEPTUAGINT.

The most important representative of this school was PHILO JUDAEUS, who made the supreme effort to harmonize the institutions and ideas of Judaism with Hellenistic culture. He taught that all Scripture contained a twofold meaning—literal and allegorical, which corresponded to the body and soul of man. As the soul was judged to be more important than the body, so the allegorical meaning of Scripture was more important than its obvious meaning. By way of example, in his commentary on Gen. 2:10-14, Philo made the four rivers of Eden stand for virtues: prudence, temperance, courage, justice. Likewise, the main source from which the four rivers branched represented goodness, which was judged to be the basic virtue. Philo occupied himself almost exclusively with the Pentateuch.

B. Jesus as an interpreter. JESUS CHRIST never intimated any criticism of the OT as the record of divine revelation. He shared the high regard of his contemporaries for the sacred Scriptures. See TEACHINGS OF JESUS.

1. Relations to rabbis. Jesus was not a RABBI in the tradition of the Jews, especially regarding interpretation of the OT. His familiarity with the interpretation of the rabbis, both concerning method and content, is clearly evident in the NT, for he often protested against it. Although he never attended a rabbinical school, he knew accurately what the rabbis pronounced as the chief commandments (Matt. 22:37-39). Jesus was much more practically religious and ethical in his interpretations than were the rabbinical schools as they are known through Jewish literature. He saw a problem in the first verse of Ps. 110 that the rabbis were unable to explain (Matt. 22:41-45). On another occasion

Jesus reminded his fellow townsmen that the OT revealed the great principle that God was no respecter of persons, citing the ministry of ELIJAH to the woman of SIDON and of ELISHA to the Syrian NAAMAN (Lk. 4:25-27). This was exasperating to the rabbis. When the complaint was lodged with him by the Pharisees that his disciples plucked and husked grain on the Sabbath, he cited the case of David who ate the “showbread.” He described the Pharisees and their followers in the words, “Hear and hear, but do not understand; see and see, but do not perceive” (Isa. 6:9 RSV; cf. Matt. 13:14 et al.).

2. View of the OT. Jesus’ teaching contained no formulated doctrine of inspiration, but he obviously held the OT to possess divine authority (Matt. 5:18; Lk. 16:17). At least in one direct statement he attributed David’s words to the Holy Spirit (Mk. 12:36). The use Jesus made of the OT further substantiates his regard for the OT. He confirmed the historical validity of those Scriptures of the Jews by holding the OT documents to be dependable historical records. He nowhere raised a doubt about the historical reality of any OT event, but assumed the truth of every OT reference that he made. Jesus’ entire and exclusive interest was in the spiritual values of the OT; he is not to be viewed as a biblical critic, but as one who saw in the Scriptures God’s redemptive designs for the human race.

3. Knowledge of the OT. There are thirty-six direct quotations of the OT by Jesus recorded in the Gospels. In addition, he frequently weaved OT terminology into his own teaching. When he appealed to the OT, it was most often for the purpose of reinforcing his teaching by way of a practical illustration. Jesus’ knowledge of the OT was both extensive and detailed, having begun no doubt as a child in NAZARETH. From his devout parents and some half-dozen years in a synagogue school, he gained this knowledge. For eighteen additional years, while he worked as a carpenter in Nazareth, he studied the message of Israel’s prophets and gave thought to his own relation to that message.

4. Interpretation of the OT. Jesus was in the main the authoritative origin of his own teaching. He appealed to no higher authority than himself: “he taught them as one who had authority, and not as the teachers of the law” (Mk. 1:22). Jesus gave a completely new solution to the fundamental question of the meaning of the OT. Luke wrote, “he explained to them what was said in all the Scriptures concerning himself” (Lk. 24:27). The originality of Jesus’ interpretation was not some new intellectual insight, but the happening of an event. With the intervention of God into the human scene through himself, Jesus found the transition from the figure and image of the OT to the reality and actuality recorded in the NT. The fundamentally new principle introduced by the Christ-event was that the distinction was no longer to be made between a text and its true meaning, but instead a relationship was introduced between the meaning of a text and the historical facts of Jesus’ life and ministry as he appropriated that text to himself.

C. Apostolic interpretation. The methods employed by the writers of NT in interpreting the OT have created much debate. Liberal scholarship has viewed the problems related to this subject in such a way as to discredit the doctrine of inspiration. Conservative scholarship, on the other hand, has either denied or ignored the difficulties raised by the use of the OT in the NT, in a supposed defense of that doctrine. There is an undeniable difference between Jesus’ interpretation of the OT and that of the writers of the NT. As previously noticed, Jesus wonderfully transcended the methods of interpretation common in his day. He stood independent of the rabbinic approach to Scriptures in a most remarkable way. The writers of the NT revealed their Jewish heritage in interpreting the OT, but it must be insisted that, though their methods of interpretation were those common in their day, they did not miss the message of the OT. The writers of the NT always viewed the message of the OT through the prism of the Christ-event. It was a reinterpretation of the OT by the methods commonly in use—but with a different import, because of the centrality of the facts of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection in their own experience.

1. Relation to the rabbis. Generally, the interpretation of NT writers was of the kind practiced by the rabbis, though it must be added that the extremes of rabbinism were not brought into the NT. Inspiration did not separate the writers of the NT from their background, but it did guard their message. Although Paul was probably the only contributor to the NT who had experienced formal rabbinical training, most likely all of them had been under the influence of the rabbinical method in the SYNAGOGUE, with the possible exception of Luke, who may have been a Gentile.

Some would argue that the rabbinic disregard of context and historical background in interpretation also appears in the NT. In Rom. 9:25, for example, Paul appears to ignore the primary meaning of Hos. 2:23, but the apostle in no way abuses the essential spirit of the passage, for through Christ a new light had come upon the OT page. A prime example of the allegorical interpretation of the rabbis is thought to be found in Gal. 4:21-31. Again it must be remembered, however, that Paul never implied that the story of Hagar and Sarah was not literal history; he only found in it a parallel between himself and the Judaizers over the issue of Christian freedom as opposed to Jewish legalism. Paul's "allegory" attributed nothing that was false to the OT record. The modern interpreter cannot expect to find modern principles of interpretation in use by the writers of the NT; neither can he justify the uncritical use of the 1st-cent. rabbinical methods of interpretation in modern times.

2. Reverence for the OT. The writers of the NT accepted without question the inspiration and authority of the OT. Over and over again the proof of a matter for the writer of a NT passage was the simple statement of an OT proof text. For the modern reader nothing seems to have been proved, but for the NT writer it was enough simply that he had the word of the OT on the matter (Rom. 3:10-19; 9:14-18; Heb. 1:5-13; et al.). It was undoubtedly the view of NT writers that "not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will by any means disappear from the Law until everything is accomplished" (Matt. 5:18).

The NT writers were especially involved with the messianic prophecies of the OT. They believed that of necessity all such prophecies were fulfilled in Jesus. As a result they seem to have regarded many incidents as having happened primarily for the fulfillment of some prophecy (Jn. 12:37-41). Those writers were eagerly alert to see in the OT any allusion to Christ. Undoubtedly they reflected their times, and most likely many other messianic passages in the OT were used by early Christians that never found their way into the NT. The fact that Matthew saw in Hos. 11:1—"out of Egypt I called my son"—a reference to the sojourn of the infant Christ in Egypt (Matt. 2:15), is a prime example of such interpretation. Because of the Christ-event, for the NT writers there was a new light on the sacred page. For them, the essential and fundamental truth of the OT was messianic, which they found fulfilled in Christ.

D. Patristic interpretation. The patristic writers looked to the OT as inspired and authoritative in much the same fashion as did the writers of the NT. The new note in the church fathers was their view of the NT writings as revelation, constantly increasing in influence until they had been collected into an authoritative canon, taking a position of superiority over the OT. In the beginning, the patristic writers were preoccupied with the OT (Clement of Rome made 149 quotations from the OT, none from the NT; see CLEMENT, FIRST EPISTLE OF), but came at last to put the main emphasis upon the NT. (IGNATIUS made frequent use of the NT and only slight use of the OT.)

1. Testimony of 2 Peter. This work—although not to be classed with the patristic writings—dealt with the issue of biblical interpretation and was perhaps the earliest book to face the problem of interpreting the materials that were later canonized as the NT. The author of 2 Peter was aware of those who twisted the letters of Paul (2 Pet. 3:15-16), and he was confronted by certain critics who asked, “Where is this ‘coming’ he promised?” (3:4). One passage reads, “no prophecy of scripture is a matter of one’s own interpretation” (1:20 NRSV). Those who have defended ecclesiastical authority have used this verse to teach that the church, not the individual, is the proper agent to interpret the Bible. Others have understood the verse to mean that no prophetic passage can be interpreted in isolation from other such passages. In all probability, the correct meaning has nothing to do with interpretation, but sees the verse only as an emphasis upon the divine origin of prophecy (cf. NIV).

The author clarified his meaning in the following statement (2 Pet. 1:21) when he emphatically indicated that the prophets were inspired by the Holy Spirit. Peter was clear in his indication that the doctrine of inspiration did not mean that Scripture was easily understood. In fact, Peter indicated that the prophets themselves were puzzled by what they wrote (1 Pet. 1:10-12) and that Paul wrote some things hard to interpret (2 Pet. 3:16). Second Peter seems to represent a time when the eschatological hope was under attack and Paul was regarded as an author of Scripture. The expression “the other Scriptures” (2 Pet. 3:16) would indicate that the Pauline letters had come to be regarded as Scripture.

2. Epistle of Barnabas. This letter includes 119 quotations from the OT and five from the APOCRYPHA (see BARNABAS, EPISTLE OF). There are twenty-one references to the NT (mostly from Paul and the Synoptic Gospels). The point made by the Epistle of Barnabas was that the OT had meaning only when it was understood in terms of the gospel. This author was given to an extreme TYPOLOGY. History was meaningless; God’s covenant had always been made with Christians. In fact, his attitude toward the OT was not far from that of the Gnostics (see GNOSTICISM). In everything he had to find Christ, so that typology was his basic principle of interpretation.

The celebrated example of Abraham’s 318 servants serves to illustrate his methodology. By combining two separate passages, he arrived at the number of Abraham’s servants as 318, which was represented by the numerical value of the three Greek letters TIH. He said the first letter stood for the cross, and the combination IH for ΙΗΣΟΥΣ, “Jesus.” This was the mystery that Abraham meant to communicate by the number of his servants. Barnabas also contains the earliest Christian attempt to explain the Jewish food laws about the clean and unclean, including a reference to the hyena, which was forbidden as food because it changed its sex, and thus revealed that men must not be corrupters. He was also the earliest Christian writer to base the duration of the world (6,000 years) on the six days of creation combined with the Psalmist’s statement that “a thousand years in your sight are like a day that has just gone by” (Ps. 90:4). In spite of its fantastic interpretation, this letter was highly regarded in the early church and contended for a place in the CANON.

3. Marcion the heretic. MARCION rejected the OT and most of the NT (except an edited version of Luke and ten expurgated Pauline epistles), and his negative views forced the church to decide on the canon of Scripture. Marcion’s attitude toward the OT was thoroughly dualistic; he postulated two gods—the God of the OT, known for his justice and laws, and the God of the NT, known for his goodness and mercy. Marcion also insisted upon a literal interpretation of the OT to justify his rejection of it as Christian Scripture, pointing by literalism to its crudity and not allowing typology to erase that character. Jesus, he believed, destroyed the prophets and the law. As far as the NT was concerned, Marcion made it speak his language by scissoring out as “interpolations” those parts that did not suit him. To the material that remained from the NT he applied a literal interpretation. To his credit, Marcion emphasized the radical newness of Christianity at a time when many forgot that unique difference; on the other hand, he seriously failed as he sought to sever the continuity of the Christian message with its historical heritage in Judaism.

4. Irenaeus. No one of the patristic period did more to determine Christian thought for centuries to come than did IRENAEUS, Bishop of Lugdunum in Gaul (c. A.D. 177-197). He did not approach the Christian message along the line of philosophy, but gave himself exclusively to the exposition of the Bible. He was preeminently a biblical theologian, making a most extensive use of Scripture. He was the first to quote from almost the entire NT, and extensively from the OT as well. It has been said that, as far as biblical interpretation is concerned, he conserved the best that had gone before and anticipated at least in embryo form nearly all that was to follow in Origen and Augustine, and perhaps even in Luther and Calvin.

Irenaeus’s principles of interpretation were governed above all else by his doctrine of inspiration. He spoke of the Scriptures as “perfect,” “spoken by the Word of God and his Spirit,” and as a “gift from God.” For him the foundation of interpretation was the recognition that Christ was the heart of the Scripture. Scripture is about the Savior, and all Scripture must be considered in its redemptive nature. The only way to understand the OT is in the light of that Savior’s coming. The unity between the two Testaments is the Savior. Both Testaments have God as their single author.

The harmony of Scripture and the recognition of the Scripture as its own interpreter were two related principles of interpretation that grew out of his conviction of the unity of the Bible. He believed that every part of Scripture had its proper place and that nothing was included by accident. The principle that Scripture was its own best interpreter likewise came from his belief in the unity of Scripture. He urged that obscure passages must be clarified by appeal to and comparison with passages that were understood. He did not, however, turn from the allegorical method altogether. He did apply mystical interpretations to Scripture and looked for deeper and hidden meanings in the Bible. Some have accused Irenaeus of letting tradition sit in judgment on Scripture, and beyond a doubt he did emphasize the rule of faith enshrined in the heritage of Christianity. It cannot, however, be demonstrated that he ever made tradition the last court of appeal in interpretation, setting tradition over against Scripture.

5. Origen. In a sense, ORIGEN was the first “systematic” theologian of Christianity, employing the entire Bible as the basis for his teaching; and he may also deserve to be designated the first Christian scholar to give serious attention to textual criticism. His interest in exegesis grew out of his concern with the text. It has been said that he did more exegetical work than any other scholar until the Reformation. Origen’s problem was his proclivity for philosophy. His philosophical interest led him again and again to express in extreme allegorism what he regarded as orthodox Christian teaching. Origen was not dedicated to the rule of faith as it had come down from his predecessors, but he tended to rely on his individual scholarship and intelligence.

Origen was the student and successor to CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA in the catechetical school of that city, and from Clement he acquired his theory of the threefold meaning of Scripture. It was compared with the three aspects of human personality as Origen understood it: body, soul, and spirit. The literal meaning of Scripture corresponded to the body, the moral to the soul, and the spiritual to the spirit. In practicality, this reduced to only a twofold distinction, as the shade of difference between the moral and spiritual was almost impossible to maintain. As far as value was concerned, as the spirit of a person had value beyond the body, so the spiritual meaning of Scripture had value beyond the literal. Thus the purpose of Scripture was in terms of the revelation of intellectual truths rather than in terms of a divine intervention in history.

Origen was ambivalent regarding literal interpretation because he identified this with the limited understanding of uneducated and simple people who could not distinguish between parables, allegories, and metaphors in Scripture, and who further insisted that every syllable was literally true. Origen sought to set out the spiritual meaning of Scripture by the allegorical method of interpretation. His influence on subsequent interpretation was considerable, both negatively and positively. He was attacked by the important exegetical school at Antioch (see CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN) and others. His own pupils, however, continued his work; and in the Greek church, Origen's views were published by Basil the Great and Gregory of Nazianzus. Indirectly, he influenced the medieval allegorists who followed centuries later.

6. Augustine. For a millennium, AUGUSTINE dominated the theology of western Christianity. Whereas Origen had been specifically interested in the means and methods of interpretation, Augustine, his successor in influence, was primarily a theologian, and a biblical theologian comparable to Irenaeus. Augustine accepted the inspiration of Scripture without reservation and became famous for his dictum that the Bible was a "narrative of the past, a prophecy of the future, and a description of the present." Augustine's foremost contribution to interpretation was his emphasis upon faith as a necessity for understanding. He taught that understanding of the Scripture was the reward of faith and in direct proportion to the interpreter's faith. He did not eliminate human reason from interpretation, but reason was especially necessary for unbelievers if they were to understand and believe. For believers, it was another matter; understanding and insight into the Scripture came as the result of faith.

Augustine's teaching included a sort of twofold authority for interpretation: first of all Scripture must be believed, and secondly, the tradition of the church measured and assured the accuracy of such belief. To him, the tradition of the church was the final authority, and the principal function of Scripture was to provide a foundation for the creed of the church.

E. Medieval interpretation. During the medieval period (the period from Augustine to the Reformation), the study of the Bible was restricted almost entirely to the monasteries and consisted mostly of the recitation of texts and the copying of biblical MSS. Medieval interpretation cannot be understood apart from a recognition of the prevalence of illiteracy both among the clergy and the congregations, there being practically no public education. During this time the right of declaring the meaning of Scripture became fixed in Rome. The biblical interpretation that did develop had only one objective—to promulgate and support the dogmas of the Roman Church.

1. Dependence on the patristic writers. Tradition was the key to biblical interpretation in the medieval period. All interpretation had to conform to tradition, and tradition was the heritage of the patristic period. It was especially the teaching of the Latin tradition, in light of the Roman Church, that made this period one of religious despotism. The effort of the interpreter was in the direction of harmonizing the patristic writers, and that for the purpose of forming a foundation under Roman dogma. The commentaries of this period were primarily the collection of patristic comments, very much in the fashion of rabbinical practice of NT times. The literal meaning of the Bible faded into insignificance during this period.

2. Scholasticism. Toward the beginning of the second Christian millennium, c. A.D. 1000, an intellectual awakening that anticipated the later Renaissance occurred in religion. This movement was contained within the rigid boundaries of traditional dogmatism and produced a deductive religious philosophy with some dependence upon the principles of Greek philosophy—a movement that came to be known as Scholasticism. It was in reality largely a reshaping of tradition, and interpretation remained to reside in the conformity to the patristic teachings. Scholasticism depended almost exclusively upon the allegorical method of interpretation, but it further perverted the truth of Scripture by use of the dialectical methods of Greek philosophy. There was no recognition of the importance of the original languages of biblical texts, and the entire thought of the interpreter was to support the dogma of Rome. Anselm (Archbishop of Canterbury), Thomas Aquinas, and Guilbert of Nogent were the chief leaders in this movement.

3. Mysticism. Medieval mysticism was a reaction against the traditionalism of the times. It grew out of the instinctive human hunger for conscious fellowship with God, which could not be found in the rigid forms of established religion. Mysticism produced the extreme view that all the individual needed of God could be appropriated directly from communion with God apart from historical revelation. As for interpretation, emphasis was placed upon the devotional study of the Scriptures as might be expected, with allegory freely employed as its method. Hugo of St. Victor and Bernard of Clairvaux were distinguished leaders in this direction. (For a more positive evaluation of biblical hermeneutics in the ancient and medieval periods, see M. Silva, Has the Church Misread the Bible? reprinted in FCI, 17-90; cf. also B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages, 2nd ed. [1952].)

F. Reformation interpretation. This movement was primarily a rebellion against the traditionalism of the past, a movement that sought the enthronement of the Scriptures in the thought and life of Christianity. It was the beginning of a revolution that has continued to modern times. The work of three men delineates the issues of interpretation in this period: Luther, Melanchthon, Calvin.

1. Luther. Although Luther broke with the traditionalism of Rome, he nonetheless remained under the influence of the patristic period to a large degree, being especially indebted to Augustine. In his interpretation he was motivated by theological considerations, reflecting again and again his struggle with Rome that became determinative in his interpretation (i.e. the papal antichrist). Luther did not fully discover the significance of the historical setting of the text for interpretation, but he did make a step in that direction. This tendency is reflected in his reading of Christian teachings into the OT. The literal sense of Scripture was important to Luther, and he placed an emphasis upon contextual significance. To a large degree he escaped the ever-present threat to the interpreter—the allegory. (See further Jaroslav Pelikan, Luther the Expositor: Introduction to the Reformer's Exegetical Writings [1959].)

2. Melanchthon. This disciple of Luther reflected the theological interests of his mentor, his interpretation being entirely governed by such interests. He failed, as did Luther, to distinguish the doctrinal distinctions of the OT from the NT and freely used OT material as support for Christian doctrine. He was, however, able to arrive at the view that the NT was revelation in a complete and final sense, which transcended the OT. Because of his training in humanism, he elevated reason alongside revelation in his theological study.

3. Calvin. John Calvin influenced Protestantism more than any other Reformer. He broke completely with the allegorical method of the past and employed a strong literalism. He escaped almost completely the methods of the patristic writers in interpretation. He was more accomplished in his interpretation of the NT than he was in the OT. The importance he attached to history is obvious in all his writings. Although limited by the lack of historical resources, Calvin ever placed the emphasis upon the historical connection of the text. He was accomplished for his day in literary criticism, recognizing the distinction to be made between the Synoptic Gospels and the Gospel of John. Like most of his contemporaries, however, Calvin showed dogmatism and had scorn for interpretations other than his own. He also contended for the existence of a complete system of theology in apostolic Christianity and gave little place for the doctrine of progressive revelation, even from the OT to the NT. (See further T. H. L. Parker, Calvin's New Testament Commentaries [1971] and Calvin's Old Testament Commentaries [1986].)

John Calvin played an important role in the history of interpretation.

G. Modern interpretation. Until modern times, Protestantism practiced a type of traditionalism of its own, based on the principle of the verbal inspiration of Scripture, and going back to the confessions of faith worked out by the Reformers. There developed however, an ever increasing emphasis on the historical-critical approach to the Bible.

1. Historical criticism. Historical criticism arose in an atmosphere that challenged the inspiration of the Bible, insisting that the only truly scientific approach to the Bible was the same approach applied to any other ancient document. It was a thoroughly human and rationalistic approach. The modern critical approach began in England with Deism and in Germany with the Aufklärung (Enlightenment) in the 18th cent. H. S. Reimarus, professor of oriental languages at Hamburg, insisted that the Gospels preserved only a faint trace of the real Jesus, a man whom his disciples had transformed into the Savior of the world. J. P. Gabler introduced the thought that Christianity like any other religion was to be understood in terms of its history, what men believed in ancient times, without regard to revelation. J. J. Wetstein followed with an emphasis on the parallels between Jewish and pagan literary sources with the NT.

G. W. F. Hegel brought to the forefront the thought of the Christian religion as evolving from its spiritual antecedents, and interpreted history as the manifestation of an absolute spirit in the affairs of men. F. C. Baur fathered the Tübingen school in Germany and taught that Christianity evolved from the historical struggle between Pauline and Jewish influences in the early church, with 2nd-cent. Christianity forming the harmonization of those two contradictory influences. In all of this, the theology of the Scriptures was totally subjected to the history of religions. Albert Schweitzer, who in many ways climaxed the movement, believed that Jesus was an apocalyptic teacher of the 1st cent. and judged the historical Jesus to be irrelevant to modern man. (See E. G. Kraeling, The Old Testament since the Reformation [1955]; W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems [1972]; S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861-1986 [1988]; W. Baird, History of New Testament Research, 2 vols. [1992-2003].)

2. Karl Barth. Barth rose to challenge historical criticism in its purely scientific approach to the Scriptures. In a sense, the preface to his commentary on Romans marked the beginning of modern interpretation. In this preface, Barth embraced the contribution of historical criticism but rejected the use that had been made of the historical-critical method to give the final explanation of Scripture. The purpose of historical criticism in his judgment was simply to establish the facts that were to be interpreted. He resorted to the Reformation principle that Scripture must interpret Scripture. The interpreter of Scripture must learn the spiritual language of Scripture if he is to discover its internal meaning. Above all, he insisted upon due recognition of the inexhaustible reality of divine revelation. In Barth's understanding, historical criticism had the first word for the interpreter, but revelation had the last.

3. Rudolph Bultmann. Although he praised Barth's work, in many respects Bultmann's significance arose out of his opposition to it. Bultmann combined the history of religions approach with existential philosophy. He rejected as a historian the worldview of the Bible that proclaimed a God who acted directly in history. There was no goal in history, and all ideas that proclaimed such a divine intervention in human affairs Bultmann called mythology (see MYTH). He occupied the same position of the rationalists as far as history was concerned; his difference was in his reinterpretation of that which he called mythology. God's acts were not to be found in history but in human existence. The meaning of the gospel was no longer in a historical Jesus of centuries gone, but in the human being of the present time. The supernatural was discarded, and by the use of existential philosophy he sought to find all meaning of Scripture in Christian experience without reference to history.

4. Oscar Cullmann. Cullmann may be considered representative of the "salvation history" approach to interpretation that Kümmel, Goppelt, and others encouraged as a recognition of the limitations of the historical-critical method. Cullmann believed that both revelation and redemption were in connection with historical events, of which Jesus Christ was supremely important. The acts of God were, however, always accompanied by interpretation, never standing alone. The interpretation of the redemptive acts of God was never to be separated from the acts themselves, but the interpretation became a part of history itself. The NT was the supreme interpretation of God in history, therefore the NT could be interpreted correctly only when it was interpreted theologically.

5. The New Hermeneutic. This school was created by Gerhard Ebeling and Ernst Fuchs, students of R. Bultmann and M. Heidegger, in the early 1960s. They sought to wed the centrality of human existence with the phenomenon of language by creating a method in which Jesus' words and deeds become "language events" when encountered through faith. Since all of existence is made available in language, man encounters ultimate being only through "word event," accomplished via the hermeneutical circle: as readers encounter the Word, they discover the Word is encountering them.

6. Hans-Georg Gadamer. Strongly influenced by the later Heidegger's concern for language as providing the framework for being, Gadamer in 1960 published his magisterial Truth and Method, widely considered the most important hermeneutical work of the 20th cent. He argued that interpretation is not so much a method-laden enterprise as it is an aesthetic experience akin to music and art. Therefore, the historian cannot simply go back to an ancient text and allow that text to speak without distortion from one's own tradition. So one must allow the effects of that history to become part of the process. Gadamer calls the process of coming-to-understanding the "fusion of horizons," that is, the coming together of the present horizon of the text with that of the interpreter. It is not unlocking the past meaning of the text but establishing a dialectic with it in the present (p. 353). The "temporal distance" between the text and the reader is bridged when the "preunderstanding" of the reader is made part of the process and provides a common ground with the world of the text. In this way past and present are fused in the act of communication between text and reader (p. 258). The autonomous text has a life of its own, transcending the original author and situation and thereby addressing the reader in the present. The circle occurs as the text addresses the readers and draws them into its world.

7. Structuralism. This movement began with the demise of French existentialism and had its heyday in the 1960s and early 70s. Its proponents believed meaning inheres not in an author's intentions or in the historical setting of a text but rather in the literary structure itself. Structuralists argue that diachronic or historical interests are a barrier to true meaning and that only synchronic or literary factors can guide one to actual understanding.

Two precursors led to this school. First, Ferdinand de Saussure (1915) distinguished langue (the language system) from parole (the individual speech-act), leading to a separation between signifier (term) and signified (the meaning it connotes). Second, Claude Lévi-Strauss, an anthropologist in the 1950s, said that meaning in primitive cultures inhered not in the conscious or surface level of communication but in the deep or unconscious level of mytho-poetic symbols. Structuralists took this approach and constructed a system whereby a text will be broken up into its "codes" or action-units and studied to determine the underlying system of reality it represents. This narrative sequence of codes is then decoded, and the result, proponents claimed, is a timeless meaning, unlike the results of historical criticism. However, due to its preoccupation with linguistics and its failure to develop a strong philosophical foundation, it was largely superseded by poststructuralism by the late 70s.

8. Poststructuralism. Several biblical scholars in the late 1970s (Detweiler, Peterson, McKnight) tried to overcome the problems of a purely diachronic method (historical criticism) and a purely synchronic method (structuralism) by positing a phenomenological “bracketing” of conscious meaning in order to uncover the reality that lay behind it. Poststructuralists like J. Calloud or R. Barthes deny that there is any kind of underlying system that makes linguistic communication intelligible. All meaning is the result of interaction between the reader and the text, and the text is autonomous from all historical understandings, that of the original author as well as of all past interpreters. It is a wholly subjective act, for past understanding must be “bracketed” when one enters the thought world of the text. Susan Wittig in “A Theory of Multiple Meanings” (Semeia 9 [1977]: 75-103) calls for a “semiotic” (signs-oriented) approach with a “second-order” system in which the text has an “unstated” significance that compels the interpreter to complete it. This interplay between text and interpreter demands “polyvalence” or multiple-meaning possibilities. A text is incomplete without a reader who can actualize its meaning, and the process in a sense can be called “at play in the fields of the text.” Any text is a playground in which each interpreter brings his or her own game with its own set of rules. All the games are equally valid, for the field itself is simply there to be played on.

9. Paul Ricoeur. He is the leading philosopher who has intersected biblical hermeneutics and, along with Gadamer, the towering giant in the field. He has wed phenomenology with semiotics and applied it to biblical interpretation. From phenomenology he believes that language forms the core of being and that reading the symbolic expression of a text is a moment of self-understanding. From semiotics he believes the text is a discourse-event divorced from the author and original historical context and therefore open only to a present coming-to-understanding. Yet the worlds of text and interpreter do come together and merge (in this he agrees with Gadamer). Ricoeur’s desire has always been to enable biblical hermeneutics to be done in an atmosphere of philosophical inquiry. For him a text has its own structural integrity apart from its author and so shapes the reader’s understanding by guiding the process of interpretation. It is a “written discourse” that establishes a dialectic with a reader, thus referring beyond itself into its world. The reader must have a “second naïveté” or postcritical attitude that remains open to the text’s imaginative thought-world. Still, like Gadamer, it is the thought-world in the present text, not the referential intent of a past author. He emphasizes the intention of the text, not that of the author. The author is present as part of the action of the text but does not guide the interpretive process. For Ricoeur the author’s intended meaning is possible but can never be more than a theoretical construct while the world-referential aspect grasps the reader in the present. For instance, a parable has a subversive effect upon a reader’s experience of reality and establishes a semantic incongruence that grasps the reader and draws him or her into its textual world.

10. Deconstructionism. For the past two decades no school has been as influential as this brain-child of Jacques Derrida. The leading poststructuralist in the 60s, he published three master works in the same year, 1967—On Grammatology, Writing and Difference, and Speech and Phenomena. He attacks the very foundation of Western philosophy, trying to free language from the constraints of epistemology and metaphysics as currently defined. He argues that logic pretends to be rational but is actually metaphorical, and so “truth” is radically relative. In this he follows Nietzsche, who said, “What, then, is truth? An army of metaphors...a sum of human relations...which after long use seem firm, canonical and obligatory to a people: truths are illusions about which one has forgotten that this is what they are: metaphors which are worn out and without sensuous power; coins which have lost their pictures and now matter only as metal, no longer as coins” (The Portable Nietzsche, 46-47).

Derrida defines deconstruction as a “decentering” process in which the meaning of a structure is disrupted via an infinite number of sign-substitutions, that is, of meaning possibilities. The concepts of sign (with constant interplay between signifier and signified) and play (which destroys the metaphysical via discourse) demand the absence of meaning at the core of the interpretive process. There is no “presence” of meaning in a text, because all attempts to encode the text, to define its horizon or locus of meaning, end up with an endless number of viable interpretations. Since all language is metaphorical at the core, and since all metaphors are open-ended, there is no such thing as the meaning of a text, only an infinite string of possibilities.

Derrida believes that writing has priority over speech and that thinking is simply writing on the mind. So since writing always results in an autonomous text, the speaker’s so-called “presence” in speech becomes a myth, for the spoken word is autonomous the second it is uttered. The result is “difference” (the opposition between the signifier and the signified, resulting in “deferred” meanings) and “absence” (writing as a freeplay that displaces meaning). There is only one solution, to recognize that there is no true transfer of meaning in the interpretive process, for the signified is transformed via the act of reading, and meaning both differs and is deferred from its relationship to all other interpretations, including the original author’s.

So deconstruction is not a formal school but a perspective on discourse and reading. The search for meaning is never ending in the same way that a sign never completes itself. A text is neither past nor present but is a repository of an ever-reconstituted process of discovery. So the interpreter must deconstruct meaning from the restraints of an artificial rational process and engage in freeplay with the infinite meaning possibilities of a text so as to construct their own understanding. In this way followers of deconstruction believe theirs is a positive rather than negative movement. They do not consider themselves hermeneutical anarchists but view themselves as liberators, freeing readers from the false Western constraint of searching for final meaning in a text.

11. Reader-response criticism. A sister movement to deconstruction locates all meaning not in author or text but in the reader. There are two types: the moderate movement of Wolfgang Iser (The Act of Reading: A Theory of Aesthetic Response [1978]), who believes the text guides the process, and the radical one of Stanley Fish (Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities [1980]), who sees the text as an empty work waiting for a reader to give it meaning. Most biblical reader-response critics like Robert Fowler or Robert Culpepper would follow Iser and believe the text has multiple possible meanings but still controls the interpretive process.

For Fish there is an ontological union between text and reader, so that the text disappears and the reader “creates” meaning. However, anarchy does not reign. There is still a determinative force in reading, the interpretive community. All human beings are part of a community, and their understanding is shaped by that community. Therefore, the “reading strategy” is developed within the community, and both critical reflection and understanding come via that community. As Kevin Vanhoozer describes the movement, “Postmodernity does not mean the end of all authority, however, only of universal norms; local norms remain in force. Interpretation is always ‘from below,’ shaped by the reader’s contextually conditioned context and regulated by the authority of community-based norms” (Is There a Meaning in This Text? The Bible, the Reader, and the Morality of Literary Knowledge [1998], 168). The reader/community is now the generating force in hermeneutics, and readers can exult in the present moment of creation, as “readers performing acts” find meaning.

12. The conservative response. It is clear that the last half of the 20th cent. moved inexorably away from author-centered meaning to text-centered (Gadamer, Ricoeur) and then to reader-centered (deconstruction, reader response) hermeneutics. There is much of value in the challenge from the postmodern critics. The importance of the community and the central place preunderstanding has in the interpretive process must be accounted for in hermeneutical theory. Each of us has become part of a faith community, and whether that is Reformed, Lutheran, Baptist, Pentecostal, or some other will determine how we look at Scripture and how we interpret texts. Fish is correct for most of us—community will determine how we interpret passages. Yet it must be asked whether it has to be this way. Can we as readers allow the author-text to guide us to its own meaning?

There is a twofold counter-movement back to the author and the text as the determining force. First, those who follow E. D. Hirsch (Validity in Interpretation [1967])—Walter Kaiser, Elliott Johnson—separate meaning (comprehending a text on the basis of its semantic core) from significance (inserting that meaning into individual modern contexts). Meaning then is grounded in authorial intention and original historical setting and is unchanging, while significance applies fixed meaning to differing situations. Hirsch believes that every text contains “intrinsic genres” that supply the rules which enable interpreters to understand its meaning.

Second, there are those—e.g., Anthony Thiselton, Kevin Vanhoozer, Grant Osborne—who follow Ludwig Wittgenstein (Philosophical Investigations [1953]) and his followers (in particular J. L. Austin, How to Do Things with Words [1962], and John Searle, Speech Acts: An Essay in the Philosophy of Language [1969]) and have developed a “speech act” approach. Wittgenstein took a “game” theory approach, in which the multifaceted character of language leads it to speak differently in various semantic situations or “games.” This functional view of language was developed further by Austin, who argued language has a performative function as well as an assertive dimension. As such, speech acts have three aspects: the locutionary act (the prepositional level of assertion), the illocutionary act (what the utterance accomplishes, such as command, assertion, promise etc.), and the perlocutionary act (the intended effects, such as persuading, teaching, shocking). The latter two are actions and demand an author or agent who decides what the communication is intended to do. Searle says that language is both referential and performative; the sentence is an intentional device that brings the hearers into an arena in which they can apply rules of the language game and recognize its meaning. The context of this “illocutionary act” then provides the proper conditions that guide the listener to the referential meaning. While uncovering the intended meaning is difficult, it is not impossible.

(Historical surveys of biblical interpretation include F. W. Farrar, History of Interpretation [1886]; P. R. Ackroyd et al., eds., The Cambridge History of the Bible, 3 vols. [1963-70]; R. M. Grant and D. Tracy, A Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible, 2nd ed. [1984]; A. J. Hauser and D. F. Watson, A History of Biblical Interpretation, 4 vols. [2003-].)

III. Principles of biblical interpretation. Exegesis is the term applied to the practice of interpretation.

A. Words. To interpret Scripture lexically, the interpreter should have some knowledge of the historical development of words in their meaning. At the same time, one should avoid the “etymological fallacy,” that is, assuming that the meaning of a word can be found in its history (diachronic approach) rather than its conventional use in its current period (synchronic approach). An example of this is reading Hebrew meanings into Greek words used in the NT. It is more important to understand the usage of words by the particular writer being interpreted. Current usage rather than history alone must determine a word's meaning. An author can refer to a past use of a word, but the context must indicate he is doing so. A good lexicon is the best source of this information. The meaning of words should be considered in light of the different periods in the development of the biblical languages. Comparison should be made between different authors of the same period where such is possible.

B. Syntax. To interpret syntactically, the grammatical principles of the language in which the text was written must be understood. A grammar of that language is the source of such information. It must always be remembered that the function of grammar is not to determine the laws of language but to explain them. Language developed first, as a means of expressing thought; grammars were written later to explain the laws and principles of language as it functioned in expressing ideas. In the interpreter's native language, these meanings of grammatical constructions are more or less sensed at once subconsciously; but when work is being done in a foreign language, it is difficult to isolate and understand the ways of expressing thought peculiar to that language, or the idioms of the language. If the interpreter wishes to get the meaning from the text, it is necessary to have the viewpoint of the writer, and follow closely the idioms that the writer used.

Moreover, our understanding of how languages function is constantly developing, so it is important to keep in touch with the latest developments in grammar. For instance, in the past it was common to give the aorist tense in Greek a “once for all” force, and this led to certain theological conclusions, such as the view that Rom. 12:1 (“present [aorist impv.] your bodies a living sacrifice,” KJV) teaches a crisis experience of a second work of grace. We now know the aorist tense did not have such a force, and so such conclusions are grammatical errors.

C. Context. To interpret contextually it is necessary to have regard for the entire composition being interpreted. The nature of the composition is of paramount importance to the interpreter, whether it is a unified discourse or some other type of writing. The subject under discussion immediately surrounding the passage colors the interpretation also. Often a shade of meaning is given to words by the nature of the discussion of which they are a part. The division of the biblical text into chapters and verses has created a considerable problem for interpretation from time to time because the impression is given that the context is insignificant, that each verse stands alone. Also, the sections fail to correspond to the correct divisions of thought. A good example is Col. 2:21, which has been used not infrequently as a text for a sermon on temperance, when actually in its context it is a condemnation of asceticism.

Failure to note context is one of the basic errors in interpretation. For instance, “Behold, I stand at the door, and knock” (Rev. 3:20 KJV) has always been understood as evangelistic, but in its context it refers to a church that needs to repent of sin. Scholars have also tended to interpret PARABLES in highly creative ways by ignoring the context in which a particular parable has been embedded. At the micro level, terms and sentences can only be understood properly when seen in light of their immediate context. At the macro level, episodes like parables or miracle stories can only be understood in light of the developing context of that particular Gospel.

D. History. It is important for interpreters to discover the circumstances that surrounded and called forth the document being interpreted. The source of such information is in the introductory notes to a biblical book in some good commentary, or a special volume of introduction to the OT or the NT. The manners, customs, and psychology of the people associated with the book being studied are of tremendous importance to a correct understanding of the text. The study of the people would include their methods of recording history, figures of speech, types of literature, and their concept of time or chronology. Both general and particular historical works can supply this need for the interpreter.

Every book of the Bible is historical, written to encounter God’s people at a certain time and with certain problems. Failure to understand that dimension will cause us to misinterpret God’s Word, as with the prophecy movement that treats the book of Revelation as a code-book addressing only current history. Background studies can make a text come alive by turning it virtually into a cinematic event. However, in so doing one must be certain that the proper background has been chosen. Allow the meaning of the text to guide the choice of background, so that the fit will be exact. For instance, the relationship between Jesus and his disciples was not based on wandering CYNIC philosophers (as some have alleged) but on Jewish rabbi-disciple models. When such background is applied to texts (e.g., the laws of inheritance and patriarch-son relationships to the parable of the lost son in Lk. 15), the story becomes quite exciting.

E. Analogy of Scripture. One of the most important safeguards for interpreters is to do their work with a regard for the analogy of Scripture. They must use Scripture itself as a guide to understanding Scripture. Any bizarre interpretation of a passage that conflicts with the whole trend of Scripture must be judged to be wrong. Scripture confirms itself. A thorough and accurate knowledge of the biblical viewpoint is a necessity. It is hoped that interpreters seek to divest themselves of their prejudices and seek to read the text through the eyes of its author.

This principle is also critical in developing a systematic theology. When studying an individual doctrine it is critical to collect all the biblical passages on the issue and then to allow Scripture to interpret Scripture. Most determine doctrine on the basis of tradition (the dogma of the particular church or movement one belongs to) more than Scripture. Each side has its own collection of proof texts (a “canon within a canon”) on which they base their views; to that extent the “reader-response” critics are correct (see above). However, the principle of the analogy of Scripture demands that all texts (on both sides of the issue) be studied before a decision is reached. While our tradition is important, it must always be placed under the teaching of Scripture itself.

F. Correct procedure. The goal of interpretation is always the author’s intended meaning, which includes all three aspects pointed out by Austin (see above): the assertion of the text, the act it produces, and the effect it attains. Moreover, it is attainable so long as we realize the goal is probable rather than certain knowledge; that is, what our research unlocks as the more likely reading. There will always be finiteness in all human enterprises.

A “field approach” to hermeneutics has five aspects (cf. G. R. Osborne, The Hermeneutical Spiral: A Comprehensive Introduction to Biblical Interpretation [1991], 412-15): (1) Be aware of your preunderstanding and seek critical interaction with other reading communities; they will force you to be honest with your prejudices. (2) Place yourself “in front of” the text rather than behind it (Ricoeur’s metaphor), thereby allowing the text to have priority in the interpretive process. Let the text challenge, reshape, and change as necessary the presuppositions you bring to it. Until this happens, you can never discover the original meaning, for you will always look for the meaning you wish to find. (3) Seek controls that enable you to work with your preunderstanding rather than be dominated by it. Be open to new possibilities and welcome challenge; seek truth rather than dogma. (4) While polyvalent meanings are unnecessary, a polyvalent attitude is critical. Seek an “interpretive realism” that remains in dialogue with other faith communities, and be willing to change your mind if the data so demands. (5) Above all, allow good hermeneutical principles to guide your study and to draw you out of your narrow world and introduce you to the world of the text and the author behind it. Take the time to use the exegetical tools that alone will help you go back to the historical world of the Bible—good commentaries, dictionaries, encyclopedias, word study books, background books etc.

The hermeneutical process is not as complex as one might think. First, be aware of the genre or type of literature and utilize those rules of the language game that apply to each (for this see G. D. Fee and D. Stuart, How to Read the Bible for All Its Worth, 3rd ed. [2003]). Second, study the structural development of the passage and see how the various parts relate to the whole, thereby seeing how the context develops. Third, study the grammatical and lexical components of the sentence to determine the probable meaning of the developing text (see M. Silva, Biblical Words and Their Meaning: An Introduction to Lexical Semantics, rev. ed. [1994]). The goal is to discover what the author was saying to his original audience, to leap the gap between our world and his. Fourth, use background information to fill in the gaps between what the author expected his original readers to understand and our world today. Unlock the culture and the historical world implied in the text. Fifth, look for the theological threads that tie your passage to others in the book and in the Bible as a whole. Try to determine the theological message of your text and the way it fits into the larger theology of the book as a whole.

Finally, take a critical realist approach to testing your conclusions, searching for their adequacy, coherence, and comprehensiveness. Verify them by studying the conclusions of other scholars and of the community of faith as a whole, then comparing them with your own. Of course, this is done at every level of the process as you make decisions regarding the meaning of the parts within the whole. Still, the constant desire to learn from others and the humble openness to their perspectives is the determining factor in a mature scholar.

H. L. DRUMWRIGHT, JR.; rev. by G. R. OSBORNE

Interpretation of Knowledge. A Gnostic document preserved in the NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY (NHC XI, 1). Written in the form of a homily, the author addresses the problem of jealousy over spiritual gifts in a Christian community. The Coptic MS, which is badly damaged, dates to the middle of the 4th cent., but the work was probably composed about a century earlier. Its content and terminology suggest an origin in Valentinian circles (see GNOSTICISM; VALENTINUS). (English trans. in NHL, 472-80.)

interpreter. This English term, referring to a person who translates from one language to another or who otherwise explains the meaning of a message (as in a DREAM), may be used to render Hebrew mēlîṣ H4885 (Gen. 42:23; this word elsewhere means “mediator” or the like); note also the participle of the verb pātar H7354 (40:8 et al.). In the NT it renders Greek diermēneutēs G1449, referring to someone who explains the speech of those with the gift of glossolalia (1 Cor. 14:28). See TONGUES, GIFT OF.

Iob i’ohb (יֹב H3410 [not in NIV]). Variant of JASHUB (Gen. 46:13 RSV and other versions, following MT).

iota i-oh’tuh (ἰῶτα G2740). KJV jot. Seventh letter of the Greek ALPHABET. In the Hebrew/Aramaic alphabet, the corresponding consonant (י, “yod”) is the smallest letter, and Jesus alludes to it in his statement, “Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled” (Matt. 5:17 KJV). See discussion under DOT.

Iphedeiah if-dee'yah (יִפְדִּיָּהּ H3635, “Yahweh redeems”). KJV Iphedeiah. Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN; listed among the heads of families that lived in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:25; cf. v. 28).

Iphedeiah if'uh-dee'yah. KJV form of IPHDEIAH.

Iphtah if'tuh (יִפְתָּח H3652, prob. “[God] opens”; see IPHTAH EL). KJV Jiphtah. A town in the SHEPHELAH, within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:43). Because it was in the same district as KEILAH and MARESHAH, some tentatively identify Iphtah with modern Tarqumiyeh, about 6 mi. NW of HEBRON.

Iphtah El if'tuh-el' (יִפְתָּח־אֵל H3654, “God opens”). KJV Jiphtah-el; NRSV Iphtah-el. A valley on the N border of the tribe of ZEBULUN and the SE border of ASHER (Josh. 19:14, 27). Its location is uncertain, but two possibilities are Wadi el-Malik and Wadi 'Abbelin.

Ir ihr (עִיר H6553, possibly “stallion [of donkey]” or “city”). (1) Descendant of BENJAMIN and (according to NIV) ancestor of the Shupites and Huppites (1 Chr. 7:12; see HUPPIM); some scholars have suggested that he is the same as IRI (v. 7).

(2) According to some scholars, the name of an otherwise unknown city mentioned by BALAAM in one of his oracles (Num. 24:19; cf. NRSV, NJPS). Most versions understand the term here as the common noun for “city.”

Ira i'ruh (עִירָא H6562, possibly “stallion [of donkey]” or “city”). (1) A Jairite identified as “David’s priest” (2 Sam. 20:26). Since the Jairites were probably descendants of JAIR, from the tribe of MANASSEH (rather than LEVI), his position could not have been sacerdotal. Some have thought that, in DAVID’S time, a few non-Levites were permitted to serve in some sort of priestly capacity; otherwise, the term “priest” here refers to some chief official in the service of the king (cf. the use of the same term in 2 Sam. 8:18, rendered “royal adviser” by NIV on the basis of 1 Chr. 18:17). Because of ambiguous versional evidence, some scholars emend “Jairite” to “Ithrite” and identify this Ira with #3 below.

(2) Son of Ikkes of TEKOA; he was one of David’s thirty mighty warriors and served as commander in charge of the division for the sixth month (2 Sam. 23:26; 1 Chr. 11:28; 27:9).

(3) An ITHRITE who was also one of David’s thirty mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chr. 11:40).

S. BARABAS

Irad i'rad (עִירָד H6563, derivation uncertain). Son of ENOCH and grandson of CAIN (Gen. 4:18).

Iram i'ram (עִירָם H6566, possibly “stallion [of donkey]”). Descendant of ESAU, listed among the clan chiefs of EDOM (Gen. 36:43; 1 Chr. 1:54).

Irenaeus i'ruh-nee'uhs (Εἰρηναῖος “peaceful”). Born c. A.D. 130-140 in ASIA MINOR (possibly SMYRNA, wherein his youth he saw POLYCARP), Irenaeus was educated in Rome, then settled in Lyons, Gaul, where he eventually became bishop. He died, perhaps as a martyr, around the year 200. A firm opponent of GNOSTICISM and other unorthodox movements, Irenaeus is widely regarded as the first great theologian of the Christian church. His principal work was the Adversus omnes haereses (Against All Heresies); fragments are preserved in the original Greek, but all of it is extant in a faithful Latin translation (English trans. in vol. 1 of ANF).

This material provides invaluable information about early church history and theology. Among other contributions, Irenaeus was the first known Christian writer to articulate a clear understanding of the canon; see CANON (NT) V. Also, his many scriptural quotations constitute very early evidence for NT textual criticism; see TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (NT) III.C. (Cf. M. A. Donovan in ABD, 3:457-61; R. M. Grant, Irenaeus of Lyons [1997]; E. Osborn, Irenaeus of Lyons [2001].)

Ir-ha-heres. See DESTRUCTION, CITY OF; SUN, CITY OF.

Iri i'ri (עִירִי H6565, possibly “my stallion [of a donkey]” or “my city”). (1) Son of Bela, grandson of BENJAMIN, and family head (1 Chr. 7:7); some scholars identify him with IR (v. 12).

(2) KJV Apoc. variant form of URIAH (1 Esd. 8:62).

Irijah i-ri'juh (יְרִיָּהִי H3713, “Yahweh sees”). Son of Shelemiah; he was an officer posted at the BENJAMIN GATE in Jerusalem who arrested JEREMIAH on the charge of planning to desert to the Babylonians (Jer. 37:13-14).

Ir-moab ihr-moh'ab (עִיר מוֹאָב, “city of Moab”). An otherwise unknown town on the ARNON River where BALAK went to meet BALAAM (Num. 22:36, NRSV, NJPS). Most versions, however, render the phrase, “a [or the] city of Moab.”

Ir Nahash ihr-nay'hash (עִיר נָחָשׁ H6560, “city of the serpent”). Son of Tehinnah and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:12). More likely, the text should be rendered “Tehinnah the founder [or leader] of Ir [or of the city of] Nahash,” in which case the reference is to a Judahite town, perhaps to be identified with Deir Naḥas (c. 7 mi. W of KEILAH) or with Khirbet en-Naḥas in the ARABAH (for the latter, see Z. Kallai, Historical Geography of the Bible [1986], 117).

iron (metal). A metallic element much used in the manufacture of tools and other articles of everyday use (see METAL AND METALLURGY). Pure iron, which is difficult to make, is almost white and has a density of 7.9. It softens at red heat and may be readily welded at white heat, above which it becomes brittle; it melts at c. 1540°C. Native iron is rare as crustal material, being found as steel-gray to iron-black, strongly magnetic masses in some basaltic lava flows. However, evidence indicates that the core of the earth is made up of a nickel-iron alloy with a density of about 12, and native iron makes up the bulk of meteorites. Most meteorites consist of a nickel-iron alloy (average composition: iron 91%, nickel 8.5%, cobalt 0.5%), thought to be indicative of the composition of the earth's core. On an etched surface, these iron-meteorites show intergrowth of lamellae of a nickel-poor alloy in a nickel-rich base.

The presence of nickel in iron beads used for jewelry in predynastic EGYPT (before c. 3400 B.C.) suggests that at least part of man's early use of iron was of extraterrestrial material. This iron, with nickel, is subject to little or no rusting and survives through time, while most articles of iron, or steel, made from local terrestrial iron ores, rust away in a relatively short time. However, iron rust containing no nickel and associated with Egyptian copper implements of c. 2700-2500 B.C. is indicative of human use, from at least this early date, of iron obtained from local ores by primitive metallurgical processes. The earliest OT reference to iron is in connection with TUBAL-CAIN (Gen. 4:22, Heb. barzel H1366), but the term occurs frequently. It is used figuratively in both OT and NT as a symbol of hardness and strength (e.g., Deut. 28:23; Rev. 2:27; Gk. sidēreos G4969, an adj. from sidēros G4970).

Iron sickle used for harvesting grain.

Iron is one of the most abundant metals in the earth's crust, making up just more than 5% of crustal material. Although iron-bearing minerals are very numerous, only four of them are important ores of the metal: magnetite (ferroso-ferric oxide), haematite (ferric oxide), limonite (hydrated ferric oxide) and siderite (ferrous carbonate). These ores readily yield the metal by smelting with carbon. A certain amount of free or combined carbon occurs in this metal and its proportion and condition regulate the properties and give rise to the three main varieties: wrought iron, steel, and cast iron.

Magnetite (from Magnesia in ASIA MINOR, where the mineral was known to the ancients), an iron-gray strongly magnetic mineral, occurs as a primary constituent of most igneous rocks, including those of the AQABAH granite complex which crops out on either side of the RED SEA. It occurs as magmatic segregations or at the contact of igneous masses and their host rocks, particularly limestone, as in parts of the ANE, including Armenia. The other iron ores occur as sedimentary beds or accumulations. Haematite (from Gk. haima G135, "blood") is steel-gray to black in color when massive, but in finely powdered or earthy varieties it is cherry-red and as red ocher has been used from earliest times as a pigment. This mineral was worked in ancient times, particularly during the reigns of DAVID and SOLOMON, between the DEAD SEA and Feinan and further S in Wadi Sabra, 5 mi. SSE of PETRA. Limonite (from Gk. leimōn, "meadow") shows various shades of brown, with the earthy variety being yellow ocher. Much of it is derived from other iron minerals by alteration, although some limonite beds are true precipitates. The carbonate siderite (or chalybite, from Gk. chalyps, "steel," named from the Chalybes, an ancient tribe of Asiatic iron-workers) varies in color from buff-brown to brownish-black or brownish-red. Some deposits result from direct precipitation, either in lakes or in the sea.

The legendary home of iron is NE Asia Minor where, together with the central plateau of Anatolia, there are rich iron deposits, including magnetite, with a present-day estimated reserve of fifteen million tons of ore with 65% iron in the region of Divrige, E central Turkey. Remains of early iron manufacture are found in this region and also at sites in Syria and Iraq dating from no later than 2700 B.C. As early as 7000-6000 has been suggested for the initial discovery of iron in Egypt. Oxidized iron beads dated about 4000 were found at El Gerzeh, and an iron tool dating from the 4th dynasty (c. 3100) was found inside the great pyramid of Khufu at Giza. It has been argued that there must have been skilled steel workers in ancient Egypt to have built the pyramids and other great constructions of the time as well as to carve statues and hieroglyphics from hard rocks (cf. Job 19:24), including granite. However, the earliest iron objects in Egypt, and elsewhere, were mainly weapons and ornaments. The common manufacture of tools did not come until the beginning of the Iron Age proper (c. 1200 B.C.).

While it is possible that the first iron tools were made (forged) from meteoritic iron, it seems likely that native iron was first found in the ashes of a large fire adjacent to rocks containing haematite or limonite or smelted accidentally from red or yellow ochre pigments in furnaces used for pottery. With the association of red and yellow ochre with fire and iron, the next steps would have been to build fires against exposures of these colored rocks which were subjected to the prevailing winds, and then to fan, with bellows, fires in pits or primitive furnaces. These methods still survive today in the Catalan forge in which the iron ore is reduced to iron, the glowing ball of iron pulled out of the furnace (cf. Deut. 4:20; 1 Ki. 8:51; Jer. 11:4), and while still white hot, hammered vigorously, both to expel as much slag as possible and to weld the hot particles of metal into a coherent mass. The product was wrought iron, with the metal being worked hot enough to be shaped, but not melted. Accidentally steel, containing more carbon, was sometimes produced. With progressive incorporation of various improvements both in methods of producing the air blast and in furnace design, this method, used by the ancients, produced all the iron up to the 14th cent. of our era. Only from the early 14th cent. on, has liquid pig iron and the resultant cast iron been produced. (See further R. Partington, A Textbook of Inorganic Chemistry, 6th ed. [1950], 913-26; H. H. Read, Rutley's Elements of Mineralogy, 26th ed. [1970], 513-23.)

The history of the OT is very much influenced both by the distribution of iron deposits and by the ability to master the metallurgical processes related to the metal. The Israelites in Egypt would have been familiar with the smelting of iron (Deut. 4:20) and its many uses. Accordingly, the indication of an abundance of iron in the Promised Land (Deut. 8:9) would have been very significant. However, the secret of toughening the metal by repeated hammering when hot, and subsequent quenching with water, was guarded by the HITTITES, to the N in Asia Minor, from c. 1400-1200 B.C., but with trade in the metal carried on by the Phoenicians. Part of the reason for the success of Canaanite opposition to Israelite occupation, in the later part of the 13th cent., was the inferior state of Hebrew technology, especially as far as horse-drawn war chariots (Josh. 17:18) and other iron weapons were concerned.

With the decline and fall of the Hittite empire after 1200 B.C., it was the turn of the PHILISTINES to control both the manufacture and export of iron. These people, who had arrived in the Canaanite coastlands during the transition from the Bronze to the Iron Age (see SEA PEOPLES), had probably obtained the secrets of the metallurgical processes as part of the booty of their defeat of the Hittites in Asia Minor. This technological monopoly was guarded by the Philistines who lived on the plains, with the hill-dwelling Israelites too poor to be able to trade for iron. About this time iron was as valuable as gold and silver, with iron weapons and implements being highly prized commodities for the following century.

The possession of up-to-date weapons, as well as experience of military campaigns, assisted the Philistines to defeat the Israelites time after time (e.g. 1 Sam. 4:1-2, 10). To meet this situation, which threatened the work of two hundred years of colonization, the loosely federated tribes of Israel united as a monarchy, with SAUL as king. The Philistines attempted to stop the making of new weapons by prohibiting the trade of smiths (1 Sam. 13:19-20), but the Israelites successfully waged guerrilla war in the hill country using knowledge of the local terrain to more than offset deficiencies in weapons (e.g., 1 Sam. 14:1-16). Nevertheless, pitched battle on the plains, against an enemy with a vastly superior technology, proved to be disastrous (1 Sam. 31).

DAVID managed to keep the Israelites together and, with the decline of Egypt after the death of Ramses XI in 1085 B.C., was able to advance southwards into EDOM (2 Sam. 8:14) to gain control of his own iron (haematite) deposits as well as COPPER deposits, S of the Dead Sea. These deposits were among the largest in the ANE, and the taking and utilization of them was a turning point in the history of Israel, for with natural resources a more advanced technology could be developed (cf. 1 Chr. 22:3). These factors were bases for conquest (e.g., 1 Chr. 18:10), for industry (2 Sam. 12:31), and for subsequent prosperity under SOLOMON (1 Ki. 4-10).

D. R. BOWES

Iron (place) i'ron (יִרְוֹן H3712, meaning uncertain). RSV Yiron. A fortified town within the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:39). It is possibly mentioned by TIGLATH-PILESER III in the list of towns he conquered in GALILEE (cf. Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 372). Iron is identified with modern Yarun, some 22 mi. NE of Acco.

Irpeel ihr'pee-uhl (רְפַאֵל H3761, “God heals”). A town allotted to the tribe of BENJAMIN (Josh. 18:27). It was in the same general area as GIBEON (v. 25) and neighboring towns, but its precise location cannot be ascertained (one possibility is Khirbet Rafat, c. 7 mi. NNW of JERUSALEM).

irrigation. The most explicit reference to irrigation in the Bible is an assertion that the Egyptian practice is irrelevant to the Palestinian hills, where the “rain from heaven” would serve as a perpetual reminder of divine approval or disfavor (Deut. 11:10-17); but the contrast was relative, not absolute. See PALESTINE; RAIN. From Chalcolithic times, irrigation had become widespread in the FERTILE CRESCENT, and the exiles on the river or canal KEBAR were renewing contact with a system of perennial irrigation predating Abraham. Though Egypt’s “basin system” of breaching mud walls to inundate adjacent plots was inappropriate in the hills, patches of the JORDAN Valley were explicitly reminiscent of Egypt (Gen. 13:10). Many a WADI of the rift wall was channeled into flourishing fields along the escarpment base until disaster and malaria-breeding neglect supervened, while larger centers like BETH SHAN and JERICHO with its powerful springs long remained oases of irrigated productivity.

The role of irrigation in the hill country of ancient Israel is less clear. Canaanite settlement was notably concentrated near the spring lines that margined the hills, and it is no accident that over seventy historic sites of Palestine contain the word (ayin H6524 (“spring,” e.g., EN GEDI), and over sixty have bēēr H931 (“well,” e.g., BEERSHEBA). See FOUNTAIN. The land was arid, and the uplands that Israel colonized were largely porous limestone, droughty, yet stippled with springs and increasingly with artificial wells. With the adoption of slaked-lime sealing about 1300 B.C., pool and cistern construction increased, largely for domestic and city supply, but also for stock watering and the irrigation of gardens and orchards (2 Chr. 26:10, Eccl. 2:4-6); the practice increased per-acreage production tenfold.

Methods varied: spaced apertures funneled the water of SILOAM to terraced gardens, bucketfuls were splashed across riverbank and agricultural terrace (Num. 24:7), canals flanked some streams such as the KISHON, while foggaras (a system of vertical shafts and horizontal tunnels) tapped the underground seepages of SYRIA and TRANSJORDAN. Transient flash floods were trapped in soil, conserving and irrigating dams, such as the intricate engineering complex of Kurnub in the NEGEV, where dams, channels, and cisterns were later multiplied by NABATEANS and Byzantines. Herodian and Roman times witnessed the extension of reservoir and AQUEDUCT, but irrigation was singularly vulnerable to the vicissitudes of misgovernment and war: its subsequent decline and recent revival largely postdate the biblical era. (Cf. N. Glueck, The River Jordan [1946]; M. S. Drower in A History of Technology, ed. C. Singer et al., 1 [1954], 520-57; A. Reifenberg, The Struggle Between the Desert and the Sown [1955]; N. G. R. LEWTHWAITE

Ir Shemesh ihr-shem'ish (עִיר שֶׁמֶשׁ H6561, “city of the sun”). A town allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:41). The Danites were unable to occupy the towns in this territory (v. 47), and Ir Shemesh apparently became part of JUDAH, where it was better known as BETH SHEMESH. (See Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 216, 311-13.)

Iru i'roo (עִירוֹ H6564, possibly “stallion [of donkey]” or “city”). Eldest son of CALEB, listed in the genealogy of the tribe of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:15). According to some scholars, the words (îrû)ēlâ (“Iru, Elah”) should be read (îr wē)ēlâ (“Ir and Elah”; cf. LXX ēra Ala, Vulg. Hir et Hela).

Isaac i'zik (יִצְחָק H3663, “he laughs”). Son of ABRAHAM and SARAH, half-brother of ISHMAEL, husband of REBEKAH.

I. Etymology. There is obviously a wordplay on the name Isaac (from ṣāḥḥaq H7464, “to laugh”). Different persons are said to have laughed: Abraham, when he was assured that in old age he would have a son (Gen. 17:17); Sarah, when after a long wait, she too heard that the promise would yet come to pass (18:12); also all persons who finally heard that the promise actually was fulfilled (21:6). Various shades of meaning are to be associated with these instances of laughter, the least acceptable being Sarah's amusement. These instances are then summed up in the name finally given to the child. This approach may still be maintained—especially if other cases of the use of the verb (like 26:8) are also taken into account—as long as only the obvious fact is kept in mind that the biblical writers hardly engage in scholarly etymological studies, but do allow themselves a sort of popular etymology, or a play on words.

Over against this approach, a new attempt to explain the name of Isaac has gained prominence. This is the one which looks at Ugaritic texts in which the god EL is said to laugh. If with this is coupled the fact that many biblical names are, or originally were, theophoric (i.e., verb-forms having some name of a god as subject), then Isaac could be a short form of the unattested name yīṣḥāq'ēl, “the god laughs” (cf. Ugar. il yṣḥq). However, to ignore all the historic instances of laughter in connection with the Isaac story and to have Israel, for all of its literary material, go borrowing from its neighbors, would appear to put the emphasis in the wrong place. In other words, to have “Isaac” mean “let God laugh,” puts an emphasis into the story for which there is no textual warrant.

II. Origin of the Isaac tradition. Some thought may be given to the whole problem of how the Isaac tradition came into being and was transmitted to later generations. The so-called sources (J, E, and P), all of which are thought to have contributed their share to the narrative, have been accepted on the strength of insufficient evidence. It could have happened, as some suppose, that there was an old sanctuary at BEERSHEBA where Isaac in his day worshiped and where some basic tales regarding his life were perpetuated. The shrine continued to exist, and around the original tales clustered others that ultimately came to constitute the body of Isaac tradition now embodied in Genesis. The case hangs on slender evidence, but for want of a better approach, one may regard this as a reasonable possibility.

III. Early life. Though not listed in the catalog of the heroes of the faith in Heb. 11, Isaac still deserves to be classed among the great fathers of the OT and has a character distinctive by itself and not devoid of some elements of greatness. He is the child long waited for according to the OT record and may in some sense in this respect be regarded as a type of Christ. When Abraham first appears on the scene, he is already seventy-five years old and has a long futile wait for a son behind him. From Gen. 12 on the wait continues, reinforced by divine words of encouragement, until the patriarch, at the age of one hundred, finally sees the fulfillment of God’s promise (21:21).

The other major incident in which Isaac figures during his father’s lifetime is the memorable one of the incomplete sacrifice at MORIAH (Gen. 22; the story is often referred to as the Akedah or Aqedah, from the verb ‘āqad H6818, “to tie, bind,” used in v. 9). There the son of promise, according to human insight, was all but lost. The providence of God interposed in a striking manner and the son was spared. That Isaac submitted as he did, when the father was making the preparations for the sacrifice, indicates one of the chief characteristics of Isaac: he was meek and submissive in all situations of life. Nor do we imply that his submission was of a merely weak and cowardly nature. He was by disposition quite unassertive. (For the history of interpretation of this passage, see E. Noort and

This painting from the wall of the Beni Hasan tomb, dating approximately to the period of Abraham, recalls the story of the patriarch and his son Isaac in Gen. 22.

E. Tigchelaar, eds., The Sacrifice of Isaac (Genesis 22) and Its Interpretations [2002]; E. Kessler, Bound by the Bible: Jews, Christians and the Sacrifice of Isaac [2004].)

This fact comes to light also in Isaac’s acceptance of the wife that his father procures for him through the agency of the “old servant” of his household, presumably ELIEZER (Gen. 15:2). It apparently was customary in those days to a large extent for parents to arrange marriages for their children. Nor does the servant regard the assignment as a simple business transaction. He fulfills his task in the spirit of prayer. Isaac, no doubt entirely aware of the spirit that animated both his father and the servant, is totally in sympathy with the choice made in his behalf (24:67). It may properly be said that his attitude is one worthy of a good man and an obedient son. Under entirely different circumstances, Isaac's son JACOB acted on his own initiative and made his own matrimonial arrangements.

IV. Relation to those close to him. Though Isaac and Rebekah were a loving couple (Gen. 26:8), it still appears, especially at the point where Isaac arranges to bless his sons, that the wife is the dominating personality. In his contacts with Ishmael, Isaac, being somewhat younger, was at a disadvantage. The elder lad dominated him to an extent, and HAGAR and ISHMAEL had to be cast out. Whatever difficulties there may have been at an earlier date, it is interesting to observe that apparently the differences were resolved and the two men cooperated in the matter of the burial of their father (25:9).

V. Relation to Jacob. JACOB is a unique child as Isaac was. Both were born, not after the flesh, but according to promise. Rebekah was barren for a long while as Sarah had been. The parents made it a matter of prayer and received a direct answer to their prayer, an answer which defined, from the divine point of view, the ultimate relation of the two sons to be born (Gen. 25:23). Over against Jacob, it appears that there was too wide a disparity of temperament for both to get along in the best of relationships. This led to Jacob's being preferred by Rebekah, but ESAU was the favorite of Isaac. It almost appears as though Isaac could not quite understand the spiritual aggressiveness of Jacob. It made him uneasy, being himself of a passive disposition and utterly unaggressive. For that matter, father and son failed almost completely to understand one another. After the imparted blessing, Isaac would seem to have perceived the issues involved in sharper focus. All this goes on the assumption that when Jacob connived to obtain the blessing of the firstborn, one of the motivations involved was that he had some wholesome spiritual objectives, based in part at least on the promises of God. It seems somewhat remarkable that the stolid Esau should have been closer to Isaac and preferred by him.

VI. In his father's footsteps. When one of the periodic famines occurred in the land in the days of Isaac, he sought first of all to go to the land of Egypt. When God refused to let him take that journey and leave the land of promise, Isaac went to GERAR to the land later held by the PHILISTINES. It is amazing that he resorted to the same stratagem as did his father when the problem arose as to how he was to safeguard his wife in a land of strangers. He represented Rebekah to be his sister, allowing for a broad usage of the term. Like his father, he then had to suffer the humiliation to be justly rebuked by the king of Gerar, a saint rebuked by a sinner.

In another respect, similarity to his father appears to good advantage on Isaac's part. The Lord appeared to him at least twice (Gen. 26:1-5, 24-25). To Abraham he appeared a number of times. For all his shortcomings, Isaac still carried on the line of Abraham, and the promises made originally to Abraham are specifically referred to Isaac also. The spiritual stature of a man cannot be measured in all its aspects by the number of times he is deemed worthy of a divine visitation. God never once appeared to Joseph. Isaac can be said to have been a man who also walked with God. If his gifts and capacities were less and fewer than those of his father, that is a matter of divine apportionment.

VII. His life in summary. Isaac was indeed blessed most abundantly by the Lord, reaping abundantly, even to the point of a “hundredfold” (Gen. 26:12). He was equally blessed in his cattle and, adding to the wealth of Abraham, he became “very wealthy.” His household also increased proportionately, so much so that he became the object of envy in the land. Isaac, for the most part, lived on the fringes of the land, either close to Gerar or down by Beersheba. Abraham, on the contrary, moved freely up and down through the length and breadth of the land, seeking contacts rather than shunning them. Connected with Isaac’s retiring nature is the fact that he cannot be described as an innovator. Typical is the incident of 26:18, where after a more or less systematic harassment by the shepherds in the area of Gerar, including the filling in of certain wells, it is reported that Isaac “reopened the wells that had been dug in the time of his father Abraham” (apparently he did dig one new well, v. 25).

VIII. The big mistake. So strongly did Isaac sympathize with his son Esau that finally, when he became ill and took to his bed and decided to give his final blessing to his sons, he singled out Esau for his blessing, and gave him directions accordingly, directions that were overheard by Rebekah. Esau was to be designated to be the major member of the family, carrying the rich tradition and promises for the future. All this was done in spite of the secondary role that had been divinely assigned to Esau (“the older will serve the younger,” Gen. 25:23). Even though this important word was spoken to Rebekah, there is every ground for believing that Isaac was apprised of what the divine intention was. With a stubbornness that does him little credit, Isaac sought to circumvent this divine pronouncement. This can in no sense be condoned. It makes Isaac’s guilt in the whole episode appear practically as heavy as that of Jacob, who resorted to crafty deceit rather than to silent evasion.

IX. Correction accepted. The plan to send Jacob into Mesopotamia, to be removed from the reach of the anger of Esau, apparently originated with Rebekah, but met with the total approval of Isaac, who seems to have recognized his mistake and was seeking to remedy it. One objective specified in the plan was that the trip to Mesopotamia was to be for the purpose of enabling Jacob to obtain a wife of his own relationship, one with whom the knowledge of the Lord still remained. The parting blessing on this occasion apparently originated with Isaac. He sought to confirm the blessing that had by trickery been diverted to Jacob. This was a tacit admission of his own mistake and a comfort to Jacob, who after all had been divinely designated as the heir of the line of the promise of Abraham.

X. “The Fear of Isaac.” One feature that reaches into the theology of Genesis ought yet to be examined briefly, namely, the unusual designation of God that appears to date from the days of Isaac, the divine name FEAR OF ISAAC, which appears twice (Heb. paḥad yiṣḥāq, Gen. 31:42, 53). This seems to have been one of the names that catch a different aspect of the divine being than the other patriarchs perceived in their day. The name, rightly construed, seems to accord well with the unique temperament of Isaac, his docile, retiring, unassertive attitude. For “Fear” is to be construed as “the object of fear and reverence” as Isaac knew him. In other words, he was the God before whom Isaac bowed in deep reverence, trembling often as he worshiped him. It was to have been expected that each patriarch would catch a partial glimpse of the fullness of the divine being, each experience of this being giving rise to its own designation.

XI. Death. Contrary to expectations, Isaac did not die soon after he had blessed his sons. If all the dates be sifted, it would appear that he lived another thirty or forty years and finally died at the age of 180, having lived the longest of the three great patriarchs.

XII. Typology. There remains the necessity of evaluating the typological aspects of the life and career of Isaac: to what extent may Isaac and his life be construed as having some Christological undertones? There is first of all the overall picture of a father giving his son into death. This element came to full realization in the fact that God “did not spare his own son” (Rom. 8:32). That the Son acquiesced to this demand is a second factor that stands out. It is also noteworthy that the Son bore the very wood on which he was to be sacrificed. All this is typological (see TYPOLOGY). One can well understand why in the early church the sacrifice of Isaac was highly regarded as foreshadowing the sacrificial death of our Lord. Isaac is repeatedly ranked together with Abraham and Jacob (Exod. 2:24-25; Matt. 8:11; 22:32; Acts 3:13; et al.). To this may be added one further aspect in which the Isaac image is used in Scripture (Gal. 4:28): “Now you, brothers, like Isaac, are children of promise.” (See further J. Swetnam, Jesus and Isaac [1981]. For important commentaries, see GENESIS, BOOK OF.)

Isaac and Jacob, Testaments of. Two works that originally may have been written in Greek in the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. but that have survived only in Arabic, Coptic, and Ethiopic translations. Derived from the Apocalypse of Abraham (see ABRAHAM, TESTAMENT OF), they appear to be Christian compositions that commemorate the days set aside to honor these two patriarchs according to the Coptic church calendar. Some scholars, however, think that they are Christianized versions of earlier Jewish documents. Both works, in which the patriarchs are described as being taken to heaven, emphasize holy conduct, with the Testament of Isaac focusing on ASCETICISM. (English trans. in OTP, 1:903-18.)

Isaiah, Book of i-zay'yuh (יְשַׁעְיָהוּ H3833, “Yahweh is salvation [or victorious]”). KJV NT Esaias. The first and largest of the Major Prophets; probably the most widely cherished of the OT prophetic books. The prophet Isaiah is mentioned repeatedly in the book that bears his name and in 2 Ki. 19-20 (also 2 Chr. 26:22; 32:20, 32). The book is dated in the reigns of UZZIAH, JOTHAM, AHAZ, and HEZEKIAH, kings of Judah (Isa. 1:1). Late tradition asserts that the prophet was martyred in the reign of MANASSEH.

I. Historical background

A. General. These were troublous times in Israel's history. During this period the northern kingdom fell and was taken captive. The southern kingdom (Judah) was heavily attacked. Isaiah lived to see the menace of ASSYRIA wane, and his faith in God's promises to Jerusalem fully vindicated.

The period was the era of Assyria's expansion to the W. In a previous century, a coalition of kings that included AHAB had halted an Assyrian drive in the battle of Qarqar in 854 B.C., but the Assyrians were on the march again. TIGLATH-PILESER III (745-727 B.C.) invaded the W, conquered the Phoenician coast, and informed the world that he had taken the tribute of REZIN of DAMASCUS, MENAHEM of SAMARIA, and many other kings. These campaigns are mentioned in 2 Ki. 15:19-29, where Tiglath-Pileser III is also called Pul—his native name witnessed in Babylonian sources. Apparently, about the year 732 he conquered much of GALILEE and deported the two and a half tribes of that area. He had revived the old Assyrian practice of intermixing the peoples of his empire (2 Ki. 17:6, 24).

B. Fall of Samaria. SHALMANESER V (726-722 B.C.) followed his father, Tiglath-Pileser III, and continued his policies. In 731, PEKAH king of Israel had been murdered as a result of an internal conspiracy; HOSHEA then became king and served as a virtual puppet of Assyria. Shalmaneser came W and received tribute from Hoshea (2 Ki. 17:3), but the latter eventually rebelled. Then began the bitter three-year siege of Samaria that destroyed the northern kingdom forever, in 722/1. The impending doom is recorded in the books of AMOS and HOSEA, who were specifically commissioned as prophets to the northern kingdom, before it fell (Shalmaneser is prob. referred to in Hos. 10:14).

It has been debated whether Shalmaneser V actually conquered Samaria or whether it fell to his general and successor, SARGON II (721-705). The latter claims the conquest but may have exaggerated (see E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], pp. 163-68). At all events, the northern kingdom was no more, and Judah lay exposed to the Assyrian menace on both the northern and western flanks. Already Tiglath-Pileser III had taken ASHKELON. Sargon deported 27,290 people of Samaria and ravaged the Philistine plain. Later he defeated a rebellious coalition of allies, including Egyptian troops at the border of Egypt in 711. Due to Isaiah's urgent warnings (Isa. 20:1-6), Judah had not joined the coalition and was spared Sargon's wrath. Sargon ruled from 721 to 705. Much of his time was taken up with wars in ASIA MINOR and the ARARAT area and against BABYLON.

C. Sennacherib's invasions of Judah. Sargon's son, SENNACHERIB (705-681), invaded Judah, which had on several occasions before paid tribute to Assyria. Tiglath-Pileser III claimed having received tribute from "Azriau of Yaudi" (possibly Azariah of Judah; cf. ANET, 282b and see UZZIAH) and "Jehoahaz (Ahaz) of Judah." The Bible mentions tribute paid by Ahaz to Tiglath-Pileser III (2 Ki. 16:8), and it is probable that Sargon also received tribute. Hezekiah gave to Sennacherib 300 talents of silver and thirty talents of gold (18:14). The PHILISTINES had rebelled with Egyptian help; they bound Padi, the Assyrian puppet, at EKRON and sent him to Hezekiah. Sennacherib overcame the Egyptians and the coalition in the battle of Eltekeh about 701. He conquered forty-six cities of Judah, took 200,150 captives, resettled Padi in Ekron, and received Hezekiah's submission. Sennacherib claims that he received 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver (an amount that may be a more inclusive reckoning than 2 Ki. 18:14 or, more likely, a mere exaggeration), and much other plunder. Judah was brought low. Significantly, Sennacherib says he besieged Jerusalem and Hezekiah "like a caged bird shut up in Jerusalem his royal city," but does not claim that he conquered the city. The Bible makes clear that Jerusalem was spared.

Sennacherib was murdered and succeeded by his son ESARHADDON (Isa. 37:38), who reigned from 681 to 669. Possibly under his reign Manasseh was detained for a time in Babylon (2 Chr. 33:11). Assyria was the main power in the days of Isaiah, but as the above synopsis suggests, the interplay of world politics brought several other nations on the scene of Judah's history.

D. The Syro-Ephraimite war. When Tiglath-Pileser first struck W, the natural reaction of the border states was to form an alliance and halt his advance, as Ahab had done at Qarqar a hundred years earlier. In such an attempt, Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel evidently tried to enlist the cooperation of Ahaz about 733 B.C. When Ahaz refused, they determined to overthrow him and seat their own puppet, the son of Tabeel, on the throne of Judah (Isa. 7:1-7). They were not fully successful (2 Ki. 16:5) but did much damage (16:6; 2 Chr. 28:5-15), and the W was thus further weakened by its internecine struggles.

Such local wars led Ahaz to seek help from Assyria in opening a second front to the N of Damascus. Assyria gladly responded to his plea and aided Judah in its struggle against EPHRAIM (i.e., Israel) and SYRIA (ARAM). Ahaz thereby brought in the very foreign power that became the scourge of God to Judah's own near destruction. This Syro-Ephraimite war and Assyrian intrigue is the background of the so-called book of IMMANUEL (Isa. 7-12), where Isaiah bitterly denounces Ahaz's statecraft. A further consequence of the king's vassalage to Assyria was the implied requirement that Ahaz must adopt Assyria's state religion (J. Bright, A History of Israel, 4th ed. [2000], 276-77). Against all the foreign intrigues, Isaiah consistently demanded a policy of nonalignment and full reliance on Yahweh to protect the nation. Isaiah's counsel prevailed, and it is of some note that Judah was the only kingdom in the area that did not fall to the Assyrian might—not even excepting Egypt.

E. The situation in Egypt. EGYPT during this period was weak. The native king of the NILE delta to the N was Tefnakhte (c. 726-716). He reigned at a city called Saias (spelled Sa-a-a in CUNEIFORM). Apparently Hoshea sent to him for help (2 Ki. 17:4; see So). The Ethiopian kings to the S were on the point of conquering the delta, and Shabaka of the 25th dynasty succeeded in about 709, ruling over a unified Egypt until 695. Egypt at this time gave promise of helping to repulse the Assyrian power, and there was a powerful pro-Egyptian party at Jerusalem, against which Isaiah inveighed (Isa. 18-20, 30-31). Finally, in 690, Shabaka's nephew Taharko (TIRHAKAH, Isa. 37:9) came to the throne (he was born about 710) and furnished a diversion for the Assyrians in their attacks on Jerusalem.

F. Babylon. BABYLON also was a prominent power of the day. The history of Babylon concerned not only the times of Isaiah, but also the predictions he made concerning the Babylonian captivity. Contrary to the usual picture, Babylon was an international force during Hezekiah's reign. During the reign of Tiglath-Pileser III, CHALDEAN forces had possessed Babylon for a few years, but the Assyrians had retaken it, and Tiglath-Pileser reigned there under the name of Pulu. Marduk-apal-iddina (MERODACH-BALADAN), also a Chaldean, usurped the throne of Babylon in 721 when Sargon was occupied in wars against Samaria, King Midas in Asia Minor (the king of the fabled golden touch), and the peoples of Ararat (Urartu).

Cities and nations targeted for judgment in Isaiah.

Merodach-Baladan held the throne until 721 when Sargon, returning from his victory at ASHDOD, reconquered Babylon for Assyria. Merodach-Baladan professed subjection, but in 703 shortly after Sennacherib ascended the throne, he usurped Babylon again. This was the occasion of his envoys to Hezekiah (Isa. 39:1-8, though some have associated these messengers with events of the rebellion against Sargon in 711). Hezekiah, against the strong rebuke of Isaiah, entered into the alliance of Egypt (30:1-10), Babylon (39:1-4), and the Philistine area. According to 2 Ki. 18:8, Hezekiah conquered PHILISTIA, which agrees well with Sennacherib's statement that Padi king of Ekron, who was loyal to the Assyrians, lay bound in Jerusalem until Sennacherib put down the rebellion. Sennacherib's prism inscription names Ekron, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Egypt (the Ethiopian dynasty), Hezekiah, and others, in the conspiracy. He first disposed of Merodach-Baladan, then soundly defeated the alliance in the battle of Eltekeh, and thoroughly ravaged the country including Judah. Captives numbering 200,150 were taken, as recorded by Sennacherib. The Egyptian and Babylonian help had been in vain.

It has been questioned whether this campaign of 701 was Sennacherib's only invasion of Judah. It is the only one according to available Assyrian records, but information is scanty for the latter years of his reign. The Bible at first sight gives the impression that there was one campaign only, but it does mention both subjection with tribute, which clearly took place in 701 (2 Ki. 18:14), and a successful resistance when Sennacherib's army was miraculously decimated (18:17—19:37). In connection with this latter action it mentions Tirhakah (19:9) of the Ethiopian dynasty of Egypt, who was only nine years old in 701. It seems therefore better to assume that Sennacherib invaded again in about 688 after Tirhakah became king in Egypt (690), and at this time Hezekiah trusted in the Lord more than in alliances and was marvelously delivered. (See the excellent discussion in Bright, History, 284-88.)

The city of Babylon was destroyed by Sennacherib in 689, perhaps in connection with the assumed rebellion of Hezekiah in 688. Esarhaddon (681-699) rebuilt Babylon and placed his son Shamash-shamukin as crown prince over it. ASHURBANIPAL (668-626) left his brother Shamash-shamukin in control over Babylon until 647, when he had to subjugate the rebellious city again, and held the reins himself until just before his death. The Chaldeans under NABOPOLASSAR retook the city. Nabopolassar held it, expanded its influence, and finally joined with others in overthrowing NINEVEH, the Assyrian capital, in 612. From 605 to 562, his great son NEBUCHADNEZZAR ruled over all Mesopotamia and the W in a brief but brilliant revival of Babylonian power. He was followed in quick succession by Amel Marduk (EVIL-MERODACH, 562-560; cf. 2 Ki. 25:27), Neriglissar (560-550), Labashi-Marduk (556), and NABONIDUS (556-539). Nabonidus retired to TEMA, an oasis in ARABIA, and left his son BELSHAZZAR as coregent in Babylon. Belshazzar therefore bore the brunt of the Persian feeling and died when CYRUS conquered Babylon in the year 539. Through Cyrus was fulfilled Isaiah's great prophecy, "Leave Babylon, flee from the Babylonians...The LORD has redeemed his servant Jacob" (Isa. 48:20).

This famous terra-cotta prism from Nineveh describes the campaigns of Sennacherib in Israel (701 B.C.). The same events are described in Isa. 36-37.

In summary of the above history, Isaiah lived in the era of empire-building as Assyria conquered the whole ANE. He also saw the rising power of Babylon and predicted the Jews' unhappy captivity in that land and their deliverance under Cyrus of PERSIA. In these international movements and intrigues, Isaiah held strongly to his principle that Judah's hope was not in armies or alliances, but in the promised protection of Yahweh. Judah was different from all lands. As a theocracy, it was under the special electing love of God. "Say ye not a confederacy...Sanctify the LORD of hosts himself, and let him be your dread" (Isa. 8:12-13 KJV).

G. Dates of Hezekiah's reign. The dates of Isaiah have not been given in the above survey. He prophesied in the reigns of "Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah" (Isa. 1:1); but what dates do these cover? The problem is complicated by the fact that the reigns of these kings overlapped in ways that are hard to identify with precision. The date of Uzziah's death is given by Thiele (Mysterious Numbers, 118-20) as 740/39. Jotham and Ahaz reigned sixteen years each, and Hezekiah ruled six years before Samaria fell in 721. Obviously there were coregencies. This period has been treated successfully by H. G. Stigers (in ETSB 9 [1966]: 81-90). The details are not essential to the present subject. However, the reckoning of the date of Hezekiah is of significance to the interpretation of the book of Isaiah.

According to 1 Ki. 18:10, Hezekiah began to reign six years before Samaria fell, therefore in 728/7. On the other hand, the writer says (18:13) that Hezekiah began to reign fourteen years before Sennacherib's invasion, therefore in 715. This is by no means a contradiction. It merely indicates a coregency with his father Ahaz. The consequences, however, are important for the background of Isaiah. If Hezekiah reigned twenty-nine years after 715, he died in 686 instead of 699, which would be the case if the twenty-nine years are counted from 728. The later date for Hezekiah's death allows a later date for Isaiah's ministry. He may well have lived into Esarhaddon's reign and witnessed the beginning of the revival of Babylonian greatness. The last chapters of Isaiah may have a background either in the Babylonian struggles for power of the late 8th cent. or in the Babylonian renaissance under Esarhaddon. This would give Isaiah a ministry of some sixty years, which is long but by no means impossible. Actually it is practically necessitated by the reference to Hezekiah's sickness (Isa. 38:1-5). His sickness was "in those days," apparently in the days of Sennacherib's early campaigns. He received ambassadors from Merodach-Baladan who, among other things, congratulated him on his recovery. This would be about 701, and it was predicted that he would live fifteen more years—to 686 as suggested above.

II. The unity of Isaiah

A. Traditional view. The unity of the book of Isaiah was not questioned until the rise of higher biblical criticism in the 18th cent. The book is ascribed to Isaiah in the title, and his name is mentioned in various other chapters (Isa. 2:1; 7:3; 13:1; 20:2-3; 37:2; et al.). The NT quotes from all sections of the book and repeatedly refers to it as the work of Isaiah.

Facsimile of the Great Isaiah Scroll (1QIsa<sup>a</sup>) discovered in Qumran (2nd cent. B.C.).

There is no MS or traditional evidence to show that the book is not a unity. If more than one author was involved in the composition, this fact is totally lost to history, and tradition on the matter begins at about 180 B.C. (Sir. 48:22-25). The DEAD SEA SCROLLS include various copies of the book as well as documents that have numerous references ascribing it to Isaiah, as does the NT. The best preserved document of the Qumran treasures is the great Isaiah scroll (QIsa<sup>a</sup>), which dates from around 125 B.C. and gives no hint of a division at Isa. 40, the primary spot at which critics allege a break.

B. Modern criticism. Nonetheless, the rationalistic criticism of Germany beginning with J. C. Döderlein (Esaias [1775]) has proclaimed with great assurance that Isaiah did not write the second major section of the book (Isa. 40-66). This section is often referred to as Deutero-Isaiah. The impression is abroad that everyone agrees that Isaiah wrote only the first thirty-nine chapters, and an unnamed author (but a man of genius) wrote the last twenty-seven chapters during the Babylonian EXILE.

This popular impression is hardly accurate. The unity of Isa. 40-66 has also been questioned, and many, beginning with B. Duhm, ascribe chs. 56-66 to still another hand—a Trito-Isaiah about 400 B.C. Also the first Isaiah must be dissolved. Few scholars who deny that Isaiah wrote the last part believe that he wrote all the first thirty-nine chapters. Chapters 13-14 at least, and probably chs. 24-27 and 34-35, are also said to be the work of a later hand. Indeed, once the unity of the book is questioned, there seems to be no end of the possible fragmentation. The course of these fragmentizing tendencies can be followed in O. T. Allis (The Unity of Isaiah [1950], 43-50) and E. J. Young (Who Wrote Isaiah? [1958]), as well as in the various OT introductions of the critical school (e.g., O. Eissfeldt, R. H. Pfeiffer) and of conservative persuasion (e.g., E. J. Young, G. L. Archer).

The reasons for this pervasive literary criticism are alleged to be various. The two halves of the book are said to manifest quite distinct styles. This argument is hard for the ordinary reader to evaluate, not knowing Hebrew. It is still harder to establish, in view of the fact that those who fragment Isaiah excessively must deny that there are just two distinct styles visible in the book. There is some talk that the writer (or school of writers) of Trito-Isaiah was immersed in the work of Deutero-Isaiah and copied him, but such a viewpoint is not so convincing when it is remembered that also Isa. 1-39 is allegedly composite. A later school emphasizing oral tradition would have it that all of Isaiah was preserved by word of mouth and all of it written down after the restoration—approximately 450 B.C. Was it all written by one school? If so, is it believable that there were two or three styles? Was it written by three circles of Isaianic disciples? Why were the pieces so cleverly interwoven into one composition without a trace in the MS or tradition?

Actually the Hebrew of the various parts of Isaiah is eloquent, beautiful, and forceful, and no more diverse than that of any other great author, such as Shakespeare. Parts of the book may have been written at a later stage of the author's life. Part may have been sermonic and orally delivered at first. Part of the book (Isa. 36-39) is obviously historical and quite parallel to 2 Ki. 18-20. Part may have been produced originally by Isaiah as a written composition. As many have pointed out in the past, there are significant signs of unity in style in the book (cf. G. L. Robinson in ISBE [1929], 3:1495-1508). And since the 1980s there has been growing appreciation for these features even among critical scholars who do not attribute the whole book to the 8th-cent. B.C. prophet (e.g., see the commentary by J. Blenkinsopp listed at the end of this article).

C. Prophecies of the exile. The most significant objection to the unity of Isaiah is found in the charge that the background of the author of Isa. 40-66 is different from that of Isaiah himself. The claim is made that these chapters reflect the times of the Babylonian captivity and therefore could not have been written in about 700 by Isaiah. Conservatives have answered this charge by pointing out that those chapters include passages that are prophetic. Cyrus, the Persian monarch who conquered Babylon in 539, is mentioned by name (44:28; 45:1). His name is mentioned as the climax of a great prediction of future things. Naturalists, who do not believe in predictive prophecy, must of course postdate such a section, but this is to beg the question. The claim of Isaiah and Christian expositors through the ages has been that such prophecies are true predictions.

O. T. Allis follows out this approach in some detail. He shows that the critical view of the unity of Isaiah rests largely on the preconceived rationalistic assumption. In a chapter entitled "Prophecy according to the Critics" (The Unity of Isaiah, 1-21), he quotes numerous sources to show that the basic reason for the critics' dating of OT prophetic material after the event concerned is that the critical school cannot believe that the OT prophet spoke directly the words of a God who knows whatsoever comes to pass.

Critical students sometimes object to this analysis. They argue that Isa. 40-55 does not even claim to predict the Babylonian captivity. True, it predicts the conquest of Babylon under Cyrus and a return from the exile. But, it is said, these chapters are written as if the exile had already begun; therefore, the exile is assumed, not predicted. The prophet is writing in the middle of the exile and predicts, perhaps by keen insight and devout hope, the return from Babylonian captivity. Therefore it is claimed that at least these chapters must be due to an anonymous prophet writing during the exile.

The critical view must therefore be examined a bit further. What is the background of Isa. 40-66? Anyone can read these chapters for himself to seek an answer to this question. This section of Isaiah is obviously a message to Zion, to Jerusalem (40:2; 41:27). God promised to bring back the captivity of Israel from the E, W, N, and S (43:5-6; cf. 11:11, doubtless written early), which does not seem to refer to the Babylonian exile specifically or exclusively. It is true that the downfall of Babylon is predicted (43:14; 47:1; 48:14), and the return of the Jews and the rebuilding of Jerusalem is predicted (44:26-28; 45:13; 48:20; 51:11). A return from the N, the W, and from Egypt is predicted (49:12, where "Sinim" in the DSS is spelled to indicate that it refers to SYENE or Aswan, then under the control of the Ethiopian king of Egypt).

But it is too much to say that the prophet speaks from the location of a Babylonian exile. James Smart summarizes, "The simple fact, which should be frankly acknowledged, is that the author of chs. 40 to 55 nowhere makes clear to us his geographical location" (J. D. Smart, History and Theology in Second Isaiah [1955], 22). It is, of course, true that the captivity in Babylon is predicted by Isaiah. Critics by their unwarranted division lose the force of Isa. 39:6-8, which is a specific prediction and clearly was written in connection with the well-known usurper king of Babylon, Merodach-Baladan, therefore no later than 701. There are also references to captivity (45:13; 47:6; 49:21; 51:3, 11, 19). The last four of these could as well refer to the awful desolations and captivities in the days of Sennacherib. In any case, they are not written from the standpoint of the Babylonian exile. Contrast them with Ps. 137, which is truly an exilic composition.

The view of J. Barton Payne (in ETSB 6 [1963]: 50-57) should be mentioned, which holds that Isa. 40-55 have their background in the 8th cent. B.C. and the conqueror from the E (41:2) is Sennacherib. This view may not be acceptable in some details, but it underscores the remark by Smart that the background of these chapters is not clearly marked. Either in geography or chronology, it cannot be said that Isa. 40-55 was written by a prophet of the exile, unless the critical assumption be made that truly predictive prophecy referring accurately to distant events is impossible. This idea conservatives refuse to allow.

As to the background of the larger section (Isa. 40-66), it is widely admitted that chs. 55-66 were written in Palestine. The mountain (57:7) does not look like Babylon. The walls of Jerusalem are established (62:6). The Lord appears from Edom (63:1, though this is doubtless eschatological). On the contrary, a complaint (64:10-11) describes the times after Nebuchadnezzar. This section is ascribed by many to Trito-Isaiah writing in Palestine about 400 B.C. This date seems impossible in view of the temple's restoration in 516. Smart (History and Theology, 47) objects to the division at ch. 55, for he claims it posits "two great prophets who were almost identical." Perhaps the simplest answer to the complex problems is to follow L. Koehler and J. Begrich and others, who are pictured by Smart as "treating the text of second Isaiah as a compendium of seventy independent oracles and applying to them the methods of form criticism in order to discover the original character and context of each" (ibid., 18).

Such is the logical outcome of the critical attack. What a genius the final editor must have been to assemble seventy different snippets of writing with varied background and messages, and weld them into a book of the beauty and power and lasting influence of Isa. 40-66! This dynamic genius lived sometime within those dark two centuries from 400 to 200, when Israel was impoverished and her history a blank. His name and fame, however, left no imprint upon his contemporaries or successors. It is perhaps easier to believe in predictive prophecy.

It should be noted that the author of Isa. 40-48 at least does not present his ideas as contemporary material, which anyone of keen political insight could deduce. His is not a late anonymous writing picked up and attached to the earlier book by accident. Nor is his work a pious fraud merely claiming the authority of the great old prophet Isaiah. He claims to predict the future because he gives the word of a God who differs from the idols of the heathen (Isa. 41:22; 42:9; 44:7-8; 45:4; 46:10; 48:3-6; and other less clear passages). Cyrus himself is pictured as coming in answer to a prediction, and the poem predicting his work is a climax and crescendo of prophecy (cf. Robinson in ISBE [1929], 3:1507a; Allis, Unity of Isaiah, 62-78). The alternatives left by such studies are that these chapters in Isaiah are truly predictive of a future captivity and return, or they were written after the event by a deliberate trickster and impersonator. That the wonderful words of this section in Isaiah are the words of a cheat and liar is too much to allow.

D. Unity of Isa. 1-39. Bearing upon these matters is the question of the unity of Isa. 1-39, or at least chs. 1-35. Chapters 13-14 are usually denied to first Isaiah, but the text ascribes this material to him. These chapters refer to Babylon's fall by the hand of the Medes, not exactly like the Persian conquest pictured in chs. 44-45. They are part of a larger whole of prophecies against surrounding nations and some of these other passages concern the time of Isaiah (14:25). The truth is best served by making these chapters fit an early date and regarding the mention of Babylon as a true prediction.

After the oracles against the nations comes a section (Isa. 24-27) widely denied to Isaiah. The reason is not history, but theology. The resurrection of the dead is mentioned (25:8; 26:19). The general attitude toward the doctrine is exhibited by James Smart, who on this basis argues against finding the doctrine of RESURRECTION in Isa. 53:10: "Those who see an individual in the servant have on their hands in this verse the resurrection of an individual from the dead, a somewhat embarrassing phenomenon if the chapter is to be retained as written by the prophet in the sixth century B.C." (History and Theology, 212). The error is that critics think they are able to reconstruct with assurance the history of Israel's religious thought, in spite of the documents, in accordance with their own theories. The psalms of David, the book of Job, Isa. 53, Dan. 12:2, and the section Isa. 24-27 must all be dated late because critics have concluded that the doctrine of the resurrection was derived from the Persians rather than revealed by God.

By the same token, Isa. 34 and 35 are denied to Isaiah because of their APOCALYPTIC cast. The word apocalyptic used of this section and chs. 24-27 needs elucidation. It is held that the prophetic interpretation of history was that repentance will bring God's favor. But after the exile this theory was seen to be deficient, and an apocalyptic view prevailed in which the pious must wait in resignation for God to bring universal vengeance and judgment (cf. S. B. Frost in The Bible in Modern Scholarship, ed. J. P. Hyatt [1965], 104-13). This theology of apocalyptic is denied to earlier times on subjective grounds, although the wording of Isa. 35:8-10 is much like that of the earlier section (11:15-16). It seems that a confusion has arisen between an apocalyptic theology and apocalyptic as a literary style. As for literary style, the apocalyptic typically includes bizarre images symbolizing world history and eschatological events. Examples of such literature are the books of Daniel, Enoch, and Revelation. No one really knows when such literature began. There is no positive evidence against an early date for Daniel, and certainly Isa. 24-27 and 34-35 do not exhibit such symbolic animals; the only exception is 27:1, where LEVIATHAN is described. Unfortunately for higher criticism, Isaiah's description of this evil power is given in terms almost identical with a passage found in the Ugaritic literature of 1400 B.C.

It is obvious that Isa. 36-39 are practically identical with 2 Ki. 18:19—20:19. The main difference is that Isaiah includes Hezekiah's psalm concerning his sickness (38:9-20, note the title). The question is, do these chapters break the unity of Isaiah or of Kings? The answer is, neither one. The chapters certainly belong in the historical record of the kings of Judah. They are said to be abstracted from the chronicles of these kings (2 Ki. 20:20), as are the histories of the previous and following kings. The material is abstracted in 2 Chronicles, which says, "The other events of Hezekiah's reign and his acts of devotion are written in the vision of the prophet Isaiah son of Amoz in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (2 Chr. 32:32). It cannot be pressed that this refers to the books of Isaiah and of 2 Kings. In other cases, a writing of a prophet is cited in Chronicles which appears to be a section of the current books of Samuel-Kings (1 Chr. 29:29; 2 Chr. 9:29; 20:34; et al.). Therefore 2 Chr. 32:32 could mean no more than that this portion of 2 Kings was written by Isaiah, something reasonable enough in view of the other writings of prophets cited as sources by Chronicles—which, of course, uses Samuel-Kings as its main source. However, the reference (2 Chr.

32:32) to both the vision of Isaiah and the book of the kings of Israel and Judah looks much like a declaration that both Isaiah and 2 Kings had these parallel portions in the days of the Chronicles, now widely admitted to be about 400 B.C. There is no problem here, for the chapters fit admirably into the book of Isaiah. The prophecy of Babylonian captivity (Isa. 39:6-7) forms almost a necessary background for the treatment of the Babylonian captivity (chs. 40-48). Someone clearly felt that these chapters helped to explain the material in the book of Isaiah. There is no solid reason why Isaiah himself could not have put them here.

III. Authorship, date, and place of origin. As has been argued above, the author of the whole book is Isaiah the son of Amoz (to be distinguished from the prophet Amos), writing from about 739 to 681 B.C. or slightly longer. Of this man nothing more is known. The prophetic office was not hereditary, and no genealogy is given of any of the prophets except those who also served in other connections (e.g., David). Isaiah was a highly educated man, as shown by the breadth of his vocabulary and the quality of his literature. He was also a prophet of the greatest faith and power. F. Delitzsch (Biblical Commentary on the Prophecies of Isaiah [1866]) calls him “the universal prophet of Israel.” Robinson (ISBE [1929], 3:1496a) calls his style “the climax of Hebrew literary art.” It is hard to overemphasize the influence of his book or the strength of attraction it has had over the centuries. Isaiah, Deuteronomy, and Psalms were the three books most used in the Qumran community. The NT alludes to it over 250 times and quotes it expressly at least 50 times.

Isaiah was a confidante of Hezekiah and moved easily in the royal circles of Jerusalem. Many of the religious reforms of Hezekiah can probably be traced to the influence of this godly court preacher. More uncertain is the question of his priestly office. His inaugural vision is set in the temple of the Lord, into which only priests could go. It was a vision, and the temple that he saw could have been the heavenly prototype. Nowhere is Isaiah specifically called a priest. The idea that he continued into the reign of Manasseh is indicated by Isa. 37:37-38 unless, as is unlikely, this passage is considered a later addition. Further tradition has it that, being persecuted by Manasseh, Isaiah took refuge in a hollow tree; the tree closed around him, but Manasseh had the tree, prophet and all, sawed in two. This legend is from the ASCENSION OF ISAIAH, a post-Christian work now lost. It is possible, but no means certain, that Heb. 11:37 refers to this incident. Other Hebrew tradition found in the TALMUD (b. Yebamot 49b) relates that he suffered under Manasseh, which is probable.

Isaiah's influence was restricted to the southern kingdom (Judah). Samaria is mentioned only as an enemy power in one section (Isa. 7-12). BETHEL and GILGAL, prominent sanctuaries of the N against which HOSEA and AMOS spoke, are not mentioned in Isaiah. It cannot be proved that the chapters are all chronological, but at least Sargon, the Assyrian king who immediately followed the fall of Samaria, is introduced in ch. 20. The fall of Samaria is hardly referred to (10:9-11). The location and outlook of the prophet is exclusively that of the kingdom of Judah. Zion is the center of his interest all through the book, and the policies of the court are his constant concern. They were turbulent days in Judah. Isaiah was God's man for the time of crisis.

IV. Isaiah's canonicity. Isaiah's place in the CANON is sure. As the longest and in many ways the richest of the prophets, it was early accorded high esteem. The evidence of contemporary religious documents is lacking, but later documents honor Isaiah in terms still used today. ECCLESIASTICUS (c. 180 B.C.) speaks of “the prophet Isaiah, who was great and trustworthy in his visions. In Isaiah's days the sun went backward, and he prolonged the life of the king. By his dauntless spirit he saw the future, and comforted the mourners in Zion. He revealed what was to occur to the end of time, and the hidden things before they happened” (Sir. 48:22-25). These statements allude to all parts of the book and show the highest regard for it as the work of a prophet by the Spirit of God. There is no earlier postbiblical witness.

The DSS include the complete scroll of Isaiah dating from around 150 B.C. plus over twenty other copies more or less fragmentary. Beyond this there are several quotations from the book of Isaiah in the Dead Sea literature. The Manual of Discipline, coming from perhaps the late 2nd cent. B.C., quotes Isa. 40:3 as “Scripture” and interprets this verse as referring to “the study of the Law which God commanded through Moses...and with what the prophets also have revealed through God’s Holy Spirit” (T. D. Gaster, The Dead Sea Scriptures, rev. ed. [1964], 64-65).

The Zadokite Document (see ZADOKITE FRAGMENTS) is also found in Qumran in fragmentary form, but there are later copies of it available from the Cairo GENIZAH. It also quotes Isaiah with the words, “as God has said through the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz” (Gaster, 75). Again there is a reference to “what is described by the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz” (ibid., 80). The book of Isaiah also is clearly utilized by the author of the Thanksgiving Hymns (ibid., 149, 180). It is clear that Isaiah was regarded as Scripture, as the Word of God and fully authoritative. The words of the prophets are regularly quoted in Qumran on a par with the law of Moses. And one who should “transgress a single word of the Law of Moses” was to be excommunicated (ibid., 65).

As noted above, the Qumran scribes called their sacred books the “law and the prophets.” Qumran (and the similar NT) usage shows that this sacred canon included the Pentateuch, historical books like Joshua, prophetic books like Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Nahum, Habakkuk, Daniel, et al., and books of poetry and instruction, such as Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. All of these books and others are mentioned in such a way as to show that they were held sacred. In short, the canon of the OT held by the Qumran scribes was probably just like the present canon, although the evidence for every book is not conclusive. Isaiah certainly was especially beloved.

Some earlier information can be gained from comparing Jer. 48 with Isa. 15-16. Many verses are parallel so that it would seem likely that one writing borrowed from the other (cf., e.g., Isa. 15:5 with Jer. 48:34; Isa. 16:6 with Jer. 48:29). It is not at once apparent who borrowed from whom. Yet Jeremiah predicts the end of MOAB (Jer. 48:42, 46), whereas Isaiah speaks more generally (Isa. 16:14). Jeremiah in this section quotes from the book of Numbers (Jer. 48:45, citing Num. 21:28; 24:17). Jeremiah elsewhere quotes Mic. 3:12 (Jer. 26:18); Hos. 10:12; 3:5 (Jer. 4:3; 30:9); Deut. 24:1-4 (Jer. 3:1 and elsewhere); and Ps. 106:1 (Jer. 33:11). In view of Jeremiah’s practice elsewhere, it is likely that Jer. 48 quoted from Isa. 15-16, and not vice versa. In short, such scanty evidence before 180 B.C. is from tradition and a few quotations, but there is no positive evidence against Isaiah’s ancient position in the canon.

V. The text of Isaiah. The remarkable discovery of a MS of Isaiah (1QIsa<sup>a</sup>) among the DSS in 1947 gave Bible students for the first time a pre-Christian copy of an OT book. It was most gratifying to find that the text of the scroll supported the basic authenticity of the MT, which in turn is reproduced in the current Hebrew Bibles. The agreement is not as extensive as is found among MSS of the MT, but is more like that among NT MSS. It appears that the scribes were careful, but did not work with the painstaking exactitude of the medieval scribes. For instance, in the famous passage Isa. 9:5-7, the only differences between the Qumran scroll and the MT are that “peace” has the Hebrew article attached and the words “to establish it, and to uphold it” have “it” in the masculine instead of the feminine. The differences are minimal. In ch. 53, there are several minor differences of spelling and endings that do not change the sense; the conjunction waw, “and,” is added or subtracted about ten times (prob. a matter of style), while equivalent synonymous words are used in two places. The only meaningful difference is in v. 11, where the reading is “he shall see light,” an addition also found in the SEPTUAGINT and accepted by some scholars. (See further O. Pulikottil, Transmission of Biblical Texts in Qumran: The Case of the Large Isaiah Scroll 1QIsa<sup>a</sup> [2001]).

The conclusion is that the MT can now be traced back in this scroll to the 2nd cent. B.C. (and in other documents almost a century earlier). It is significant that the newly discovered document, though very ancient and valuable, is obviously a poorer witness to the original than the later more careful copies that are available. Therefore this early MS actually serves to authenticate the extant text. Another slightly later copy of Isaiah (1QIsa<sup>b</sup>), which is rather fragmentary, is in even closer agreement with the later MT text.

The SEPTUAGINT text of Isaiah has been long known to reflect a Hebrew text very similar to the MT, though there are problems in detail. The famous commission to Isaiah (Isa. 6:9-10) is given in the imperative in the MT, but in the past tense in the LXX (quoted in Matt. 13:14-15 and Acts 28:26-27). Actually the difference is one of vocalization (vowel markings were not used until the early Middle Ages); the consonants are the same for both readings. In general it may be concluded that the text of the book has been well supported by recent study and discoveries. As previously noted, none of the new finds suggests a division of the book in accordance with the critical hypotheses. See TEXT AND MANUSCRIPTS (OT).

VI. Special problems

A. *The book of Immanuel and the virgin birth. The section comprised by Isa. 7-12 often is called the book of IMMANUEL because of the great messianic prophecy in 7:14. It is probable, though not certain, that all of these chapters come from that early period in Isaiah's ministry when he opposed Ahaz's policies. It will be remembered that Tiglath-Pileser was expanding westward about 733. Syria and Israel (northern kingdom) were building defensive alliances and wished Ahaz to join. Ahaz refused, and the coalition threatened to attack Jerusalem to replace Ahaz with a king who would be more cooperative. Isaiah counseled Ahaz not to fear but to rely upon the Lord. Ahaz, no orthodox believer, bypassed Isaiah and appealed to Tiglath-Pileser to help him by establishing a second front beyond Damascus. What happened then is not known in detail. It seems that the Assyrians did help Ahaz, but not in time, for he was defeated by Syria and Israel. The Assyrians also came, though perhaps too late, and carried captive much of Damascus and Galilee.

In such critical days, Isaiah with his son SHEAR-JASHUB accosted Ahaz, probably while he was inspecting the city's defenses and water resources. He first urged Ahaz not to fear the northern coalition. He declared that within sixty-five years Ephraim would be destroyed (Isa. 7:8). It is clear that this prophecy was fulfilled in due time. In about ten years Samaria became a province of the Assyrian empire. Ashurbanipal (668-633) interchanged the populations of Ephraim and Mesopotamia, in effect destroying Ephraim as a people (Ezra 4:10; 2 Ki. 17:24). It is a puzzle, however, why Isaiah speaks of this event as he does. Actually he repeats this prophecy (Isa. 8:1-4), for he predicts that before his second son MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-AZ will be old enough to talk, Ahaz's two enemies will fall before the Assyrians, which would mean two or three years. The problem is solved summarily for some by cutting out the last half of Isa. 7:8. There is no evidence for this, however, in ancient texts or versions. Commentators have few suggestions of merit. If the writer be permitted any theory, it would be that it refers to the age of one of the kings concerned. It could then be understood to mean that before Rezin's sixty-fifth year these things would happen; but scholars know so little of the details that this must remain as theory.

At all events, the prophet bade Ahaz seek a sign that the promise would come to pass (Isa. 7:12). Ahaz answered with what seems clearly a quotation (Deut. 6:16), the same verse cited by Christ in answer to Satan (Matt. 4:7). Ahaz was not sincere. Isaiah probably knew his hypocrisy and that he had already relied on payment of tribute and an alliance with Assyria for help. Isaiah therefore turns on Ahaz with a sharp rebuke.

The famous Immanuel passage (Isa. 7:10-17) is usually thought of as a promised blessing for Ahaz, or at least for the house of David. This view comes from stopping the paragraph at the end of v. 16 (cf. KJV). Rather, the section should be continued through v. 17 (cf. NIV and other modern versions). The prophet in rebuke tells Ahaz that his real enemy is Assyria (v. 17). The petty kings of Israel and Syria are of little account. The real tragedy will be the invasion of Assyria whom Ahaz has hired.

Seen in this light, the VIRGIN BIRTH prophecy was not necessarily a current event full of blessed meaning for Ahaz. For him it was a threat. Before this occurs, the land will be desolated by Assyria. Isaiah did not set a date, for he did not know the date. Elsewhere he speaks of the coming wonderful king of David's line without giving the time. The coming of "the stump of Jesse" is prophesied (Isa. 11:1) in close succession to the downfall of the Assyrians (10:24-34). Isaiah was only to know that at an unspecified time the MESSIAH would come, and he warns Ahaz to mend his ways, because before the coming of the Messiah the Assyrians would invade and bring tragedy greater than the division of Ephraim from Judah. Actually there is no information that this invasion came before the days of Sennacherib in 701, thirty years after the prophecy was given. It could not in any case refer to a child of Ahaz or of Isaiah.

Isaiah refers to the birth of a child. In Isa. 9:6-7 he makes it plain that the longed-for king of David's line will come as a child, indeed a divine child. The names given then are not just names applicable to any human being. Note that the name "Mighty God" is applied to the Lord God (10:20-21). Isaiah was expecting a divine child of David's line. This child had nothing to do with Isaiah's second son Maher-Shalal-Hash-Baz (8:1-4), who was not of David's line. He was born in the normal course to Isaiah and his wife. He was given a rather ordinary symbolic name (meaning "hasten to the booty, hasten to the spoil"), as was Isaiah's first son Shear-Jashub ("a remnant shall return").

Olive tree with a new shoot extending from the base. Isaiah prophesied, “A shoot will come up from the stump of Jesse” (Isa. 11:1).

The prophesied child is named Immanuel (Isa. 7:14), which is apparently the name of God (8:8; the name is translated in 8:10). The child is to be born of a virgin (Heb. ‘almâ H6625). Much controversy has revolved about this word. A Hebrew concordance will show that it occurs six other times (Gen. 24:43; Exod. 2:8; Ps. 68:25; Prov. 30:19; Cant. 1:3; 6:8). Never is it applied to a married woman. The word is used for REBEKAH about to be married (Gen. 24:43), and for MIRIAM, who was evidently just a young girl (Exod. 2:8). The cognate term ‘elem H6624, meaning “boy,” is used of DAVID at the time when he slew GOLIATH and before (1 Sam. 17:56; cf. 20:22). That word also is not used in reference to a married person. The root ‘lm may be related to the verb “conceal” (‘ālam H6623), but this is not sure. It would be an attractive thought that the word refers to a girl still kept at home in her father’s house. The emphasis is not so much on virginity (there is another specific word for that) as on being young and unmarried, which, of course, implies virginity. The translation “young woman” is not specific enough; “unmarried girl” is nearer to the meaning. The older use of English maid or German magd (used by Luther) captures the idea very well. The only further light on this word is from Ugaritic, where the cognate word ‘ilmat is used in poetic parallel with a cognate of the word used of a virgin in the OT (bētûlâ H1435). It is also given as the name of a goddess.

The reference to butter and honey (Isa. 7:15) has been variously interpreted. Some think of it as heavenly food. Others regard it as food of luxury—which it is (7:22). The simplest idea is that in v. 15 it refers to a baby’s first food after weaning. The passage thus declares that before the Messiah Immanuel is born of a virgin and is weaned, the Assyrians will come and depopulate the land.

That this passage predicts a virgin birth is further indicated by the ancient translations. The LXX version, which was made about two centuries before Christ, translates the word ‘almâ by Greek parthenos G4221, the usual Greek word for “virgin” (though it too can mean “young [or unmarried] woman”). It is significant that in places where an OT quotation is found in Matthew alone, Matthew does not follow the LXX. Thus in Matt. 1:23 also, the quotation, though it is short and there is a problem in details, does not agree with the LXX in the best texts. It may be concluded that Matthew gives independent evidence for the rendering “virgin” (Isa. 7:14). The Syriac Peshitta of Isa. 7:14 uses the specific word bētûlâ, “virgin.” The force of the Peshitta, however, is diminished by the fact that there is no definite information on whether it was translated by Christians or Jews.

The usual critical view is that Isa. 7:14 refers to a contemporaneous birth of a child by the wife of Ahaz or Hezekiah. This view denies both the miraculous and the prophetic element. Some who hold a high view of Scripture speak of an immediate as well as a distant fulfillment. If the verse speaks of a truly virgin birth, there is no point in failing to apply it to Jesus. In any case, the prophecy was not fulfilled until after Sennacherib’s campaign of 701, thirty years after Isaiah spoke. If it be remembered that Isaiah shared the ancient hope of the coming of a divine child, then this prediction finds its full raison d’être as a timeless threat to the rebellious Ahaz.

B. The eschatological use of Edom. Many will not have sensed a problem in Isaiah’s mention of the overthrow of EDOM in the last days, but the subject does raise some important questions. The prophecy of Isa. 34:4 presents a picture used by Christ to refer to his coming in judgment (Matt. 24:29; cf. Rev. 6:13-14). This seems therefore to be a prediction of Christ’s return in judgment. The next verses (Isa. 34:5-6) refer to a great slaughter in Edom. Of this the NT is silent. A suggested solution can be found by examining the mention of MOAB in Isa. 25:7-10. There the promise is given that death will be conquered (v. 8, quoted in 1 Cor. 15:54). In Isaiah it is said that Moab shall be vanquished (Isa. 25:10). Moab is not mentioned in this way in the NT. Rather the NT pictures Babylon as the evil power of the end—indeed, not literal Babylon, but Babylon symbolizing Rome, the city that sits on seven hills (Rev. 17:5, 9). It may be held that these verses are eschatological, as is indicated by their context and the NT quotations, and that the various enemy nations were mentioned as symbolic of the last evil persecuting power. The fact that several different nations are so mentioned supports this idea.

Wadi and rocky escarpment in Edom, a country to which Isaiah refers symbolically as the eschatological enemy of God’s people (Isa. 34).

C. The servant poems. Extensive literature has grown up around the problem of interpreting the servant passages (Isa. 41:8 through 53:12). The main sections are 42:1-9; 49:1-6; 50:4-10; and 52:13—53:12. Isaiah also contains brief references to a servant (41:8-9; 42:19; 43:10; 44:1-2, 21, 26; 45:4; 48:20). This usage is distinctive in the book of Isaiah.

The SERVANT OF THE LORD presents a problem, for several times he is clearly stated to be Israel or Jacob, that is, the Hebrew nation. At other times he seems to be an individual and is clearly referred to in the NT as Christ. This situation has given rise to various viewpoints. The interpretation of naturalistic criticism is that the writer was speaking of Israel, and the NT references by error or accommodation transfer the words to Christ. A more conservative view is that of F. Delitzsch, who argues that the prophet speaks of the nation whose spiritual activity culminates in Christ. The nation is pictured as a pyramid, with the Messiah as the top stone representing all the others. Another opinion is that the prophet refers first to the nation, then as the nation fails in its witness for God, he turns to speak of the Messiah who will not fail. There is a cultic view to be added—that the prophet speaks of the king as representing the nation in the cultic drama in which on the feast days the fortunes of the nation are portrayed and God's favor secured.

The present writer's view is that there has been too strenuous an effort to force the various passages into one mold. Other prophets speak of various individuals as God's servants. David is called the Lord's servant; Nebuchadnezzar, likewise (Jer. 27:6). Jeremiah also calls Jacob (the nation) God's servant (Jer. 46:27-28). Zerubbabel is called God's servant (Hag. 2:23). Zechariah called the Branch of David "my servant" (Zech. 3:8), and Ezekiel calls Jacob (the nation) and David God's servant (Ezek. 37:25). Why, then, should there not be some variety of usage in Isaiah?

This variety of usage is rather clearly shown in the second song (Isa. 49:3-6). The servant is clearly called Israel, the nation (v. 3). A complaint is made by Israel, "I said, I have labored to no purposes" (v. 4). The servant continues, however, "The LORD...formed me in the womb to be his servant / to bring Jacob back to him" (v. 5); and continues that the servant will raise up the tribes of Jacob and restore the preserved of Israel and be a light to the nations and God's salvation to the ends of the earth (v. 6). Evidently Israel fails as a servant, and God raises up another servant to accomplish salvation. This should be no more surprising than Ezek. 37:25, where both Israel and the messianic king are called God's servants.

According to this view, each passage should be scrutinized by itself to determine which servant is intended. Israel is named as the servant, the object of God's care (Isa. 41:8). The servant is anointed by God's Spirit for a great work of witness, of judgment, and of testimony (42:1-6). The verses do not fit Israel but apply accurately to Christ, which the NT quotes (Matt. 12:18-21).

Israel is the object of God's care and forgiving grace (Isa. 44:1-2, 21-22). God is the agent; the servant is the recipient. God calls Cyrus for the sake of Israel (45:4), but the situation later becomes more obscure (50:4-10). Christ's humiliation is noticeable (50:6, but the NT does not quote vv. 4-10). The context does not imply that the suffering is vicarious; it says that God will help his servant. These statements could apply to Christ, but it is not clear that they do.

The most famous segment of the book is Isa. 52:13—53:12. This central unit has been greatly used in Christian testimony. It is quoted about ten times in the NT, usually with explicit reference to Christ (Matt. 8:17; Lk. 22:37; Jn. 12:38; Acts 8:32-33; Rom. 10:16; 15:21; Heb. 9:28; 1 Pet. 2:22-25). The portion begins with a reference to the disfigurement of the servant beyond recognition (Isa. 52:14). His rejection is beyond belief, but his suffering is substitutionary. His affliction is more than severe; it is fatal. He is dead, buried, and without issue. His death is said to be a sin-offering (53:10). This remarkable verse unites the work of the Suffering Servant with the symbolism of the temple sacrifices. Emphatically it states that he bears the sin of transgressors and justifies many by his death. It is often overlooked that the next chapters, in sounding the joyful note of praise for the benefits of this sacrifice, go on to base this salvation on the everlasting covenant, based on God's sure love for David (55:3, cf. “David my servant,” Ps. 89:20-24). In this great section, the promises of the Suffering Servant, the Son of David, and the Lamb of God are brought together.

Extensive efforts have been put forth to show that this portion refers to the nation, not to an individual. The statement “my servant shall prosper” (Isa. 52:13 NRSV; NIV, “will act wisely”) includes the Hebrew word yaśkîl (hiphil impf. of śākal H8505). It has been suggested that this is a mistake for the word Israel (yiśrā’ēl H3776), and that the text should read, “my servant Israel.” There is however no evidence for this view (note that the same verb is used of the righteous Branch, the expected Davidic king, in Jer. 23:5).

The expressions of the servant’s suffering and death are so explicit that all attempts to refer the servant to Israel fail. When did Israel ever suffer for sins other than her own and without any deceit in her mouth? In the previous section (Isa. 52:1-12), the Lord promises to redeem Jerusalem and bring again Zion. Israel is as usual the object of Yahweh’s salvation, not the instrument of redemption. The saving work of the Suffering Servant is a work for Israel, not a work by Israel. The Servant will die (53:9), but no weapon formed against Israel shall prosper (54:17). The two must not be confounded.

Effort also has been made to speak of Israel as the Servant and to liken the resurrection of the Servant (53:10) to the return of Israel from Babylonian captivity. Ezekiel likens the return from exile to a resurrection from the dead (Ezek. 37), but the exile is nowhere recorded in the OT as a sacrificial death. Rather, the exile was the judgment of God for obvious sin. Furthermore, Isaiah does not too patently speak of a resurrection (Isa. 53:10). James Smart has been quoted above in a different connection: “Those who see an individual in the Servant have on their hands in this verse (10) the resurrection of an individual from the dead, a somewhat embarrassing phenomenon if the chapter is to be retained as written by the prophet in the sixth century B.C.” (History and Theology, 212). Notice that Smart’s argument is based on purely theoretical reconstruction of Israel’s early theology. Why should the mention of the resurrection of an individual in the 6th cent. be embarrassing? Only by postdating the resurrection psalms, the book of Job, Isa. 24-27, Dan. 12:2, and other passages can the early date of the resurrection doctrine be denied. Smart’s argument is subjective.

Another denial of the messianic interpretation comes from the cultic ideas of the sacral kingship theory. S. Mowinckel (He That Cometh [1954]), I. Engnell (in BJRL 31 [1948]: 54-93), A. R. Johnson (Sacral Kingship in Ancient Israel [1955]), and others argue that ancient Israel, like Babylon and Egypt, deified its kings. The king was the head of the religion. On the great festival days, parallel to the Babylonian New Year festival, the king was first humiliated to bear the bad luck of the preceding year, then was enthroned again amid general rejoicing and acclaimed as deity. This school finds the humiliation of Israel’s king expressed in Isa. 53, Ps. 22, and similar passages. His reenthronement is celebrated in Ps. 2; 110; 45; et al. H. Ringgren finds the metaphors of Isa. 53 derived principally from “two circles of motifs; the Tammuz literature and the kingship ideology” (The Messiah in the Old Testament [1956], 50). These views have been challenged not only because they assume that Israel’s religion was parallel to that of Babylon, but also because it is a fallacious assumption that the Babylonian king was deified (H. Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods [1948], 224, 342). The whole idea is a curious application of the comparative religion approach. Critical scholars place this chapter usually at a late date. Where was any king in Judah then, let alone a king to lead the cult? Or did they think in exile that the Babylonian king was bruised for Israel’s iniquities?

The plain traditional messianic interpretation of the chapter still fits the OT best, and surely is taught in the NT. The coming root of Jesse’s line was also to suffer for sin. In him would be united the symbols of Israel’s faith, the sacrificial death, the Davidic kingship, and the divine child. In him is found the mighty victory of God’s grace. “For your Maker is your husband—/ the LORD Almighty is his name—/ the Holy one of Israel is your Redeemer” (Isa. 54:5). This chapter is not in intimate association with the Babylonian captivity nor the return therefrom; it is far deeper than that. The consequent triumph is far higher than a return from exile. This chapter opens the door on those heavenly passages in the latter part of Isaiah that tell of a time when Zion’s walls shall be Salvation and her gates, Praise (60:18). Then “the LORD will be your everlasting light, / and your God will be your glory” (60:19). (See further B. Jankowski and P. Stuhlmacher, eds., The Suffering Servant: Isaiah 53 in Jewish and Christian Sources [2004].)

D. Other messianic passages. Isaiah is often called “the evangelical prophet” because of his predictions of Christ and his great salvation. In studying Isaiah’s great predictions, it should be remembered that he was expressing the general hope of Israel that appears in other prophets as well. Isaiah’s prophecies do not stand alone. The stream of messianic prophecy, which began with Gen. 3:15, expanded markedly with God’s promises to David (2 Sam. 7). This Davidic covenant is reflected in several psalms and forms the basis of the teaching of the prophets. The Messiah was to be of David’s line. Even Amos, a prophet to the northern kingdom, cites the tabernacle of David as Israel’s hope (Amos 9:11). Other passages, such as Jer. 23:5 and, even after the fall of Jerusalem, Ezek. 37:24-25, are quite clear.

The PHARISEES, in answer to Christ’s question, answered readily that the Messiah was to be David’s Son (Matt. 22:42). Isaiah repeatedly advances this hope and expectation. Note that the divine child was to rule on David’s throne (Isa. 9:6-7). To whom could this refer? Surely not to Ahaz with whom Isaiah was perpetually at odds. This prophecy is datable to the Syro-Ephraimite war (9:11) and therefore is not a prediction of Hezekiah’s birth. He was born at least by 740 B.C. To speak in times like these of the young Hezekiah would surely be inappropriate even allowing for hyperbole, exaggeration, or symbolism of any kind. As argued earlier in connection with Isa. 7:14, the passage reflects rather a future hope for the Son of David who would not be just another king, but would be the messianic deliverer.

In line with this image, Isa. 11 promises the “stump of Jesse,” the “Branch,” the “Root of Jesse” (11:1, 10). He is pictured as a conqueror, but his is no ordinary conquest. His weapon is his sovereign Word. The results of victory are eternal peace, and a peace such as the world has not seen since paradise (11:6-9). There is a close parallel between 11:9 and 65:25, but there is one significant difference. The latter verse speaks of the removal of the curse from men and nature, but mentions that the curse on the serpent given in Gen. 3 will not be removed. The conclusion would be that the curses that are removed are the others mentioned in Genesis, and the Messiah will really come in his ultimate power to undo the curse that was put upon the first parents for sin. No mere earthly Son of David could accomplish this. The hope of Israel was not for a better monarch, but for an ultimate kingdom. It is for this reason that the work of the Suffering Servant (Isa. 53) opens the door not only to pardon from sin, but to those glorious vistas of peace and blessing found in the succeeding chapters. All this is involved in the One who fulfills the Davidic covenant (55:3).

The concluding chapters of Isaiah contain a few references to the coming of Christ, but their identification is not clear because they refer to God’s activity for Israel. The application of these passages to Christ in the NT is a strong argument for his deity. In Isa. 59:15-21 we see the reaction of the Lord to Israel’s sin. All had turned aside; therefore God himself would save, and the Redeemer would come at last to Zion. Verse 20 is quoted in Rom. 11:26 as referring to the salvation of Israel after the period of Gentile salvation.

A superficial reading might suggest that Isaiah was referring to himself as the anointed to preach good tidings (Isa. 61:1-3). The promises given to Israel in the succeeding verses outstrip any legitimate expectation from Isaiah's ministry or from an ordinary king's reign. The "year of the LORD's favor" was as truly future to Isaiah as was "the day of vengeance of our God." It often has been pointed out that when Christ quoted these verses in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk. 4:16-21), he claimed they were fulfilled in himself, but he did not continue with reference to the "day of vengeance of our God." Evidently this judgment remains to be fulfilled.

Later verses give further details on this subject. Another passage, Isa. 63:1-6, threatens total judgment at that "day of vengeance" and likens it to the treading of a winepress in anger. The NT references to coming judgment at the SECOND COMING of Christ are unmistakable (Rev. 14:19-20; 19:15). The conclusion is that through the latter part of Isaiah, the predicted work of the expected One is portrayed on such a large canvas that it is not limited to the first coming of Christ, much less could it have been fulfilled by any ordinary king of David's line. God showed Isaiah final things, and the only Person suitable for their accomplishment is the coming child of David's line who is also the divine Lord and Savior.

E. Eschatological passages. Passages speaking of God's ultimate kingdom already have been referred to in connection with the messianic hope. These portions are claimed as eschatological: Isa. 2:1-5; 11:1-16; 25:6—26:21; 34; 35; 52:7-12; 54; 60; 65:17-25; 66:10-24. Some of these may be grouped together for treatment.

Perhaps the most striking passages are Isa. 11:1-16 and 65:17-25. Indeed, 11:9a is identical with 65:25b. The picture in ch. 11 concerns the coming of the Branch of David's line. His kingdom will be one of perfection and his rule will be in supernatural power. Verse 4 of this chapter has an echo in 2 Thess. 2:8, where it is used of Christ's conquest of the man of sin (see ANTICHRIST) at his return. There is another allusion to it in Rev. 19:15, where Christ returns in glory to destroy the beast and false prophet and to bind the dragon. The three verses help to interpret each other and seem to indicate a fulfillment at Christ's return. The often reprinted picture of the wolf and the lamb dwelling together would also fit that horizon. Surely it does not fit the present church age. As already noted, in the parallel section (Isa. 65:25) is a slight but significant variation. It is said that the curse on nature will be lifted, but there is the curious additional expression, "dust will be the serpent's food." This clause informs us that the curse upon the serpent (Gen. 3:14) is not to be lifted. The natural conclusion is that the other curses that are lifted are those stated in Gen. 3. In short, Isaiah predicts a day when God's curse on nature will be lifted, but the curse on Satan will remain. This obviously does not refer to the present situation, but speaks of the day of Christ's return (cf. Rom. 8:19-23). That day is pictured as a time of great longevity (Isa. 65:21-22). It is not clear whether Isa. 65:17 places the new heavens and earth at this time or not. Many would hold that this verse refers to the eternal state, as the reference in Rev. 21:1 would imply.

Another passage (Isa. 25:6—26:21) emphasizes not so much the glories of Christ's return as the fact of the eventual resurrection of the dead. The swallowing up of death really refers to resurrection, as is shown both by the expression, "the Sovereign LORD God will wipe away the tears" (Isa. 25:8), and the quotation in the NT (1 Cor. 15:54). The reference to Moab in Isa. 25:10 need not argue against the eschatological character of the passage. Probably Moab is taken as a type of evil just as Edom is in Isa. 34:5. In 26:19, the Hebrew word nēbēlātī ("my dead body," KJV) should probably be read as a plural to fit the context, thus: "But your dead will live; their bodies [niblōtām] will rise. You who dwell in the dust, wake up and and shout for joy" (NIV). The statement is in contrast to vv. 14-15, where the wicked are said to perish, but God's own shall live. Most critical scholars hold that resurrection is a later doctrine, and they either date these verses late or deny that they could refer to resurrection. This is reasoning in a circle. There is no reason why Isaiah by God's revelation should not have spoken at an early time of the resurrection day.

As mentioned before, Isa. 34 refers to Edom symbolically as the eschatological enemy of God's people. Verse 4, which speaks of the signs in heaven, is quoted both by Christ of his coming (Matt. 24:29) and by John (Rev. 6:14) in connection with the day of the wrath of the Lamb. The glorious picture (Isa. 35) subsequent to this judgment in ch. 34 shows a world of beauty and blessing in which God's people return to Zion with everlasting joy. This figure of a highway back to Zion and a regathering of God's people is also proclaimed elsewhere (11:16; 60:8-9; and prob. 2:2-3).

The picture of Zion's glory given in Isa. 60 really has 59:20-21 for its backdrop. Israel will not be blessed without a Redeemer. The Hebrew (also LXX and the quotation in Rom. 11:26) can better be taken, "The Redeemer shall come for the sake of Zion." Paul quotes this verse with the comment that God's promises are inviolable. The Romans passage has been taken in two ways. One interpretation has it that Isa. 59:20 is fulfilled in the "church age." It is said that the church inherits the promises of Israel and "so" or "in this manner" all Israel shall be saved. The other and more natural view is defended by John Murray (The Epistle to the Romans, NICNT, 2 vols. [1959-65], 2:96-98). This view holds that the apostle distinguishes national Israel from the church and promises eventual salvation for Israel as a nation in the final time. This view prepares the way for the great sixtieth chapter of Isaiah with its exaltation of Zion and her sons, in a day when violence is heard no more and Jerusalem shall be inhabited by the Lord in his glory. The passage is similar to Isa. 54 and is the basis for the great description of the city foursquare in Rev. 21.

The prophecy of Isaiah ends with a solemn note (Isa. 66). The picture of the glory of Zion is counterbalanced by the punishment to be meted out to the enemies of God. The many slain by the Lord (66:16) and the punishments of the transgressors are described in terms used by Christ of eternal hell (Isa. 66:24; cf. Mk. 9:44, 46, 48).

VII. Contents of the book. The major divisions of Isaiah are clearly marked. Disregarding critical approaches, the book may be outlined as follows:

1. Introduction and condemnation of Judah (Isa. 1-5)
2. The prophet's call and commission (ch. 6)
3. The book of Immanuel (chs. 7-12)
  1. Warnings against alliance with Assyria and the sign of Immanuel's birth (ch. 7)
  2. More warnings against foreign alliances (ch. 8)
  3. The divine son of David, Israel's hope (9:1-7)
  4. The invasion of Assyria and its final defeat (9:8—10:34)
  5. The rod of Jesse and Israel's final blessing (ch. 11)
  6. A psalm of thanksgiving (ch. 12)
4. Prophecies against surrounding nations (chs. 13-23)
  1. Babylon's fall to the Medes (13:1—14:23)
  2. Failure of the Assyrian invasion (14:24-27)
  3. Philistia's temporary relief in 715 B.C. (14:28-32)
  4. Judgment on Moab (chs. 15-16)
  5. Overthrow of Damascus (ch. 17)

6. Failure of the Ethiopian dynasty of Egypt (ch. 18)
7. Failure of Egypt and her eventual blessing (ch. 19)
8. Isaiah's warning against joining the coalition of Ashdod and Egypt against Assyria in 714 B.C. (ch. 20)
9. The fall of Babylon to the Medes (21:1-10)
10. Burden of Edom and Arabia (21:11-17)
11. Jerusalem's military preparation and lack of repentance (ch. 22)
12. Tyre to fall to the Babylonians (ch. 23)
5. The resurrection and eschatology (chs. 24-27)
6. Woes upon God's rebellious people (chs. 28-31)
  1. The sins of the northern kingdom (28:1-13)
  2. Warnings to Judah (28:14—29:24)
  3. Trust in Egypt versus trust in the Lord (chs. 30-31)
7. Eventual blessing for Zion (chs. 32-35) H. Historical material (chs. 36-39)
  1. Sennacherib's invasions of Judah (chs. 36-37)
  2. Hezekiah's sickness in 701 B.C. (ch. 38)
  3. Babylon's bid for an alliance (ch. 39)
8. The Babylonian exile and Babylon's fall (chs. 40-48)
  1. God's promises and his greatness (ch. 40)
  2. God's help for Judah by Cyrus (chs. 41-48)
9. Final deliverance through the suffering servant (chs. 49-53)
10. Blessings following such salvation (chs. 54-55)
11. Current sins of Judah rebuked (56:1—58:15)
12. God's Redeemer and redemption of Zion (58:16-62)
13. The Messiah's vengeance and Isaiah's prayer (63:7—64:12)
14. God's answer and promised kingdom (chs. 65-66)

The above outline shows a wealth of material in the book of Isaiah. There is condemnation of the people for their sin, warnings in a critical international situation, promises of a Redeemer, and visions of the kingdom of glory. In general, the book may be divided into five major parts, although the same themes often recur in the various divisions.

First, there are the introductory chapters (Isa. 1-6). Isaiah sets the tone of the book. He describes his vision, which was probably his prophetic call (ch. 6), and utters many condemnations of the sins of Judah. It may be that these chapters reflect an early period in his ministry. At the same time, this section includes the passage dealing with ultimate peace—when swords shall be beaten into plowshares and nations shall not learn war any more (2:1-4; cf. Mic. 4:1-4). This section is united with the next by a refrain common to both (Isa. 5:25; 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4).

The so-called book of Immanuel has been discussed above in connection with the virgin birth prophecy of Isa. 7:14. Its approximate period is 732 B.C., although in ch. 10 the Assyrian invasion of 701 is described. It is probable that this invasion is stated prophetically, but it is very vivid and pictures the Assyrian army coming right up to the gates of Jerusalem before its downfall is announced (10:34). This section declares in no uncertain terms the sovereignty of Israel's God, who directs the Assyrian invader as a carpenter uses his ax and saw (10:15). The Assyrians come of their own free will and pride, and will be punished accordingly (10:7-12). The coming of Jesse's rod is a promise that goes far beyond the deliverance from Assyria, as has been argued above. The concluding psalm of thanksgiving (ch. 12) has an interesting quotation from Miriam's song of deliverance of Exod. 15.

The third major section, which includes material of varied content, extends from Isa. 13 to ch. 35. It begins with the burdens on the surrounding Gentile nations. This sort of condemnation is repeated in Jer. 46-51 and Ezek. 25-32. It may have been influenced by Amos's rhetorical condemnation on surrounding peoples (Amos 1:3—2:6). Some of the burdens are rather general. Some, like Isa. 14:28 and 20:1, are given specific dates. The section seems to come from that time before Assyria actually invaded Judah in 701. The period was one of great international tension. Political opinions in Judah were many and fluid. Hope was sought in alliance with Egypt or submission to Assyria. Isaiah has strong warnings against an Egyptian or any other alliance. In scorn he calls their treaty with Assyria a covenant with death and SHEOL, with lies and falsehood. In contrast he calls the people to trust in the sure foundation, the precious cornerstone, whom the Lord will establish in Zion (cf. Isa. 8:12-14 and Rom. 9:33; 1 Pet. 2:4, 6). This section also looks beyond the present trials to the future glory (Isa. 35 et al.), as mentioned above.

This panel from a palace in Nineveh (c. 640 B.C.) depicts the Assyrian capture of an Egyptian fortress. Isaiah warned God's people against making alliances with either Egypt or Assyria.

The so-called Deutero-Isaiah comprises Isa. 40-66. It evidences a different background from the parts considered above, as is rightly noticed by critics. No longer is Assyria considered the great enemy, but Babylon. The background for this last section is given by the historical division (chs. 35-39) that tells of Hezekiah's alliance with the Babylonian usurper Merodach-Baladan, probably around 703-701. This ill-fated alliance brings forth Isaiah's revelations of Babylon's future enslavement of Israel and her eventual fall.

These chapters were doubtless written later in Isaiah's life. In those years Babylon was a power with which to reckon. When Isaiah denounced it, his contemporaries got the point and shuddered. Although Sennacherib eventually burned Babylon, the Chaldean power in ELAM remained strong, and later made a comeback, destroying Assyria and conquering Israel as Isaiah had promised.

Through these chapters run two threads of prophecy. The Babylonian exile and the deliverance by Cyrus have been mentioned. This motif ends in Isa. 48. Another thread, which begins in 42:1 and goes through ch. 53, is the mention of God's servant. God's servant is sometimes called Israel, but sometimes he cannot be identified as the nation. As shown above, the word servant is common and has many uses. In the crowning passage, ch. 53, the Servant refers to Christ's suffering, and has been so recognized in many NT passages and in the literature of the church. Significantly, after ch. 53 the word servant in the singular does not occur again. But this is the section where the vistas of the future open up before the prophet's inspired vision. The consequences of the Servant's suffering are nothing less than the creation of a new heaven and a new earth. These chapters, perhaps written in Isaiah's retirement, are full of comfort and promise for the people of God.

VIII. Isaiah's theology. The book of Isaiah, as it stands, is acknowledged to be one of the richest in the OT. Only by dissecting it do critical students reach conclusions concerning a development of Israel's religion in the postexilic times. The great doctrines of God (his creation and providence), of man (his sin and need), and of redemption and the coming Redeemer are all given prominence. The book is not a collection of abstract dogmas. The lessons of God's greatness and love in respect to human need are stated in the concrete historical realities of one of Judah's most critical periods. Isaiah spoke to his own day. What he spoke to his contemporaries was the eternal Word of life.

A phrase characteristic of the whole book is the expression "the Holy One of Israel," used thirteen times in the first thirty-nine chapters and another thirteen times in the last part. This phrase, so expressive of the moral character of God, possibly derives from the triple ascription of HOLINESS to God in the prophet's vision (Isa. 6). No book speaks more earnestly of God's sovereign power and righteous character. In chs. 2 and 5 especially, the moral sins and the idolatry of Judah are rebuked, and the conclusion is, "Therefore the LORD's anger burns against his people" (5:25). The thought is matched later in the book by the statement, "your iniquities separated you from your God" (59:2).

Perhaps the most famous passage in the OT on God's work of CREATION is Isa. 40:12-31. In fine irony, the prophet distinguishes the dumb idol from the transcendent Lord. The same condemnation of IDOLATRY is given elsewhere in scattered verses (2:7-8, 18-21; 30:21, 22; 57:5-8; et al.). Likewise the PROVIDENCE of God is given emphasis. As already mentioned, ch. 10 describes Assyria as only God's tool. Similar expressions of God's control of the Assyrians are given (37:29). Isaiah's picture of the transcendence of the Lord (37:23-35) matches the lofty tenor of the better known ch. 40. Whereas 40:15 likens the nations to the dust of a balance, chs. 10 and 37 also show God in absolute control of the international scene.

Isaiah gives vivid descriptions of human SIN: sins are like scarlet (1:18); God's people "have removed their heart far from me" (29:13 KJV); "Their feet rush into sin; they are swift to shed innocent blood" (59:7). It may be added that Isaiah narrows the responsibility of sin down to the individual: the man that does righteousness as well as the son of the stranger and the eunuch who keep the SABBATH will all receive the promised blessing of God (56:2-5). God hears the cause of the fatherless and the widow (1:23). The faithful individual ELIAKIM will be preserved, though the proud SHEBNA would be carried captive (22:15-25).

The topic of REDEMPTION is so prominent that Isaiah is called the evangelical prophet. Not only is the Son of David frequently prophesied, but as already has been seen, the very sacrificial work of Christ is delineated in the great fifty-third chapter. It may be helpful, however, to note Isaiah's attitude toward the OT sacrificial system. It is perfectly clear that he did not regard the sacrifices as automatic in effect. In a famous passage (1:11-17) he denounces the altar, incense, and the feast days. Yet in 56:2, the Sabbath is enjoined as a thing of blessing. This is no contradiction. In the second passage, the context shows that an insincere fast day is an abomination. This is the key to Isaiah's attitude. He protested against hypocritical and idolatrous sacrifices, but upon his original call to service his own lips were cleansed by a coal from off the altar (6:7). The prophet protests that the beasts of the great mountain Lebanon are insufficient for a burnt offering (40:16), yet the sin offering is central in the interpretation of the suffering servant's work (53:10).

Of Isaiah's ESCHATOLOGY one need not speak further. He sees into the future with eagle eye because God has drawn aside the curtain just a little. Isaiah does not see in balanced perspective the relationship between the current international problems, the coming of the Servant in humility, the coming of the day of vengeance, and the future redemption of the earth from its curse. All of these facets of the future are portrayed upon Isaiah's canvas in wonderfully brilliant hues, so that the final book of the NT could borrow the wording of Isa. 60 to depict the time when Zion will have no need of the sun or moon, "for the glory of God gives it light, and the Lamb is its lamp" (Rev. 21:23).

R. L. HARRIS

Isaiah, Martyrdom and Ascension of. See ASCENSION OF ISAIAH.

Iscah is'kuh (יִסְכָּהּ H3576, derivation uncertain). TNIV Iskah. Daughter of HARAN and niece of ABRAHAM (Gen. 11:29).

Iscaiot is-kair'ee-uht. See JUDAS ISCARIOT.

Isdael iz'dee-uhl (יִסְדֵּאֵל). Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned after the EXILE (1 Esd. 5:33; RSV, "Giddel" the reading Geddēl is preferred by R. Hanhart, Esdrae liber I, Septuaginta 8/1 [1974], ad loc.). Apparently the same as GIDDEL (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

Ishbaal ish'bay-uhl. See ISH-BOSHETH.

Ishbah ish'buh (יִשְׁבָּח H3786, "[God] soothes" or "may [God's wrath] subside" or "[God] congratulates"). Son of MERED (apparently by his wife BITHIAH, Pharaoh's daughter) and father of ESHTEMOA; included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:17; note that NRSV, to clarify the sense, includes here part of v. 18).

Ishbak ish'bak (יִשְׁבָּק H3791, possibly from a root that in Arabic means “to anticipate, surpass”). Son of ABRAHAM and KETURAH (Gen. 25:2; 1 Chr. 1:32); no descendants are mentioned.

Ishbi-Benob ish'bi-bee'nob (יִשְׁבִּי בִּנְבִּי H3787, meaning unknown). A descendant of Rapha (see REPHAITES) of GATH whose bronze spearhead weighed more than seven pounds; fighting on the side of the PHILISTINES against the Israelites, he vowed to kill DAVID but was defeated by ABISHAI (2 Sam. 21:16-17, 22). As a result of this incident, the Israelite soldiers would not allow David to fight again. Many scholars, on the basis of the Ketib (wyšbw instead of wyšby), emend the text to wayyēšbū bēgōb, “and they dwelt in Gob” (cf. vv. 18-19). (For a more substantial emendation, based on some Gk. MSS, see P. K. McCarter, Jr., II Samuel, AB 9 [1984], 448; and for the view that the term yālîd H3535 should be rendered “votary” rather than “descendant,” see ibid., 449-50.)

Ish-Bosheth ish-boh'shith (אִישׁ-בִּשְׁתַּי H410, “man of shame”). Son of SAUL; he was made king over Israel by ABNER in repudiation of DAVID'S claim to the throne (2 Sam. 2:8-4:12; NRSV, “Ishbaal”). He is also called ESH-BAAL (ʿešbaʿal H843), meaning “man of the Lord” or “the Lord exists,” which was probably his original name (1 Chr. 8:33; 9:39; these two references suggest that he was Saul's youngest son, unless he is the same as ISHVI, listed second in 1 Sam. 14:49). The difference between Ish-Bosheth and Esh-Baal is generally attributed to an intentional alteration of the name of BAAL because of intense hatred for that pagan deity (this word, which means “lord,” could apparently be applied to Yahweh early in Israelite history). It is also possible that the name was given him as a result of his shameful demise. (For a different view, see M. Tsevat in HUCA 46 [1975]: 71-87.)

The appointment of Ish-Bosheth brought forth the question of the means of royal succession. David's right was charismatic, Ish-Bosheth's was hereditary, and the former eventually prevailed. Ish-Bosheth was forty years of age when he was enthroned at MAHANAIM and reigned for only two years (2 Sam. 2:10). Abner transferred his loyalty to David as a result of an accusation by Ish-Bosheth (3:7-12; but Abner was murdered shortly thereafter, v. 27). Ish-Bosheth, lacking support, was finally assassinated (4:5-8). (See J. A. Soggin, Old Testament and Oriental Studies [1975], 31-49; J. C. VanderKam in JBL 99 [1980]: 521-39; D. V. Edelman, “Eshbaal,” in ABD, 2:615-17.)

T. E. McCOMISKEY

Ish-hai ish'hi (אִישׁ-חַי, “man of life”). Father of Jehoiada and grandfather of BENAIAH (one of DAVID'S mighty warriors), according to 2 Sam. 23:20 KJV, following the Ketib. The Qere, however, has ben-ʾîš-ḥayil, lit., “son of a man of power,” an expression applied to Benaiah and probably meaning “valiant warrior” or the like; this reading (found in the parallel, 1 Chr. 11:22) is followed by most versions.

Ishhod ish'hod (אִישׁ-חֹד H412, “man of splendor [or vitality]). KJV Ishod. Son of HAMMOLEKETH, who was apparently the sister of GILEAD; included in the genealogy of MANASSEH (1 Chr. 7:18). It is unclear why his father's name is not given. See discussion under ABIEZER #1.

Ishi (divine name) ish'i (אִישִׁי, from אִישׁ H408, “man, husband,” plus first person sing. pronoun). This name appears in the KJV of Hos. 2:16, “And it shall be at that day, saith the LORD, that thou shalt call me Ishi; and shalt call me no more Baali” (modern versions usually translate the first name with “my husband,” and the second with either “my Baal” [NRSV] or “my master” [NIV]). The word for BAAL (baʿal H1251) means “owner” or “lord,” but it too can mean “husband.” Because of its associations with the idolatrous worship of the pagan Baal, the prophet declares that this name will not be used in the worship of the true God. Some have thought that this word, when it has the meaning “husband,” implies a formal or legal arrangement, and that the change of name may thus indicate also a return to a closer spiritual relationship.

Ishi (person) ish’i (ישעי H3831, prob. short form of ישעיהו H3833 [ISAIAH], “Yahweh is salvation”).

(1) Son of Appaim and descendant of JUDAH through the line of JERAHMEEL (1 Chr. 2:31).

(2) A descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:20); his genealogical connection is unclear.

(3) A member of the tribe of SIMEON whose sons led five hundred Simeonites in an invasion of the hill country of SEIR (1 Chr. 4:42).

(4) A head of family in the eastern part of the tribe of MANASSEH; he and several others are described as “brave warriors, famous men” (1 Chr. 5:24). The larger context of the passage (vv. 18-26) focuses on how the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh were successful in enlarging their territories but fell into idolatry and were taken captive by the king of Assyria.

Ishiah i-shi’uh. TNIV form of ISSHIAH.

Ishijah i-shi’juh (ישחיה H3807, prob. “Yahweh forgets” see ISSHIAH). NRSV Isshijah. One of the descendants of Harim who put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:31; called Asaias in 1 Esd. 9:32 [KJV, “Aseas”]).

Ishma ish’muh (שמעיה H3816, “[God] hears” short form of ISHMAEL). Son of Etam and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:3, NIV and other versions, following LXX). The MT is unintelligible; see discussion under ETAM #1.

Ishmael ish’may-uhl (שמעאל H3817, “God hears” gentilic שמעאלי H3818, “Ishmaelite”). (1) Son of ABRAHAM and HAGAR, and eponymous ancestor of the Ishmaelites (Gen. 16:11-16; 17:18-27; 21:9-21; 25:12-18; et al.); see further below.

(2) Son of Azel and descendant of BENJAMIN through SAUL (1 Chr. 8:38; 9:44).

(3) Father of a certain Zebadiah who was head of the tribe of Judah during the reign of JEHOSEPHAT (2 Chr. 19:11).

(4) Son of Jehohanan; he was one of the commanders under JEHOIADA who took part in the revolt against ATHALIAH (2 Chr. 23:1).

(5) Son of Nethaniah, known primarily as the royal officer who assassinated GEDALIAH, the governor appointed by the Babylonians over Judah (2 Ki. 25:25; Jer. 40:7-41:18). Ishmael himself belonged to the royal family (2 Ki. 25:25; Jer. 41:1). After the destruction of Jerusalem, he had joined Gedaliah in MIZPAH. Perhaps hoping to lay a claim to the throne, Ishmael with ten of his men killed not only Gedaliah, but also the Jews who were with him in Mizpah and the Babylonian soldiers. The following day he slaughtered a large group of men who were bringing offerings to the temple. He then took the rest of the people captive and set out to join the Ammonites. The army officers, led by Johanan son of Kareah, pursued Ishmael and were able to rescue the captives, although Ishmael himself escaped.

(6) One of the descendants of Pashhur who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:22). The rest of this article is devoted to Ishmael son of Abraham.

I. Name. The name Ishmael is patterned on a common Semitic theophoric formation in which the deity is the subject of a sentence, in this case EL (ʾēl H446, “God”), and the other element the predicate, in this case the verb “to hear” (šāmaʿ H9048). The time and mode of the sentence are determined by the circumstances leading to the naming, particularly the circumstances surrounding the person’s birth. Thus “Ishmael” may mean “God will hear,” “God hears,” “God heard,” “May God hear.” In this case the significance is that God had heard, or given heed to, the affliction of Hagar (Gen. 16:11; cf. also 17:20; 21:17). There is no reason to doubt this meaning, as the circumstance surrounding birth was a perfectly normal way to arrive at a name for a child (see R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel [1961], 43-46).

II. The birth of Ishmael. In some parts of the ANE it was obligatory for a wife who was barren to provide her husband with a slave woman who would bear children for her. The children were to be under the control of the wife, not the slave; a case from NUZI is discussed by E. A. Speiser (Genesis, AB 1 [1964], 120-21). Childless SARAH obtained a son by Hagar, and Ishmael was legally the child of Sarah. This does not explain Sarah’s treatment of Hagar, in spite of the fact that some translations of the Nuzi document in question add the clause “Kelimninu may not send the offspring away” (cf. ANET, 220). This translation is based on a misreading of the tablet, which Speiser renders, “Kelimninu will obtain offspring (by the slave).” The closest parallel is still to be found in the Code of HAMMURABI, §146. Although this is a specialized case involving the rights of a priestess, the principle seems to be established that a productive slave woman may not assert herself against the unproductive wife. If she does so, she would be reduced to slave status. As Hagar violated this principle, Sarah was within her right to “deal harshly” with her (Gen. 16:6).

III. Life of Ishmael. Ishmael was born when Abraham was eighty-six years old (Gen. 16:16) while he was dwelling near HEBRON (13:18). His mother Hagar was an Egyptian, but she had been confronted by God in a time of her need (16:7-13). When Ishmael was thirteen (17:1), God made his COVENANT with Abraham, according to which all the members of Abraham’s household were to be circumcised (see CIRCUMCISION). Ishmael was included. When it was announced to Abraham that Sarah would bear a son, his response, “Oh that Ishmael might live in thy sight” (17:18 NRSV), suggests that Ishmael fell short of Abraham’s expectation.

Several years later, after ISAAC had been born and weaned, Ishmael and his mother were expelled from the family to wander in the desert around BEERSHEBA. At one point they were near death from thirst when God heard the boy crying and provided water (Gen. 21:17). With the help of God, Ishmael lived the rest of his life in the desert, especially in the wilderness of PARAN. It was here that he became proficient in the use of the bow; and the relative proximity to Egypt, as well as his mother’s background, explains his marriage to an Egyptian. That he did not altogether break contact with the main patriarchal family is shown by his presence at the burial of Abraham (25:9) and by the fact that ESAU married Ishmael’s daughter MAHALATH (28:9). Ishmael lived 137 years and “was gathered to his people” (25:17).

IV. Divine statements concerning Ishmael. (a) God selects his name and, whatever the significance, the similarity of wording to Isa. 7:14 is striking. (b) God describes his character as that of a wild donkey (Gen. 16:12) in the sense of his being a wandering nomad (cf. Job 39:5-8). As such, he will be in opposition to his more settled kinsmen. He shall camp “in defiance of them” rather than “to the east of them” (Speiser, Genesis, 118). (c) God destines him for greatness outside the covenant; Gen. 17:20-21 makes it clear that Ishmael was to be blessed by God as a great nation with the same twelvefold organizational structure as Israel was to have, but without direct experience of the covenant. This distinction between national greatness and covenant experience says implicitly a great deal about what the covenant really involved (G. von Rad, Genesis [1961], 203; note that national greatness is also promised in 21:13, 18). Moreover, 17:22, 27 shows that the covenant is not to be identified with circumcision no matter how much that identification may appear to be necessitated by 17:10. For Ishmael was circumcised as God had commanded (v. 23) and yet was not the covenant son.

V. Abraham and Sarah’s treatment of Ishmael. Abraham treated Ishmael as the son whom God had promised. Even when God revealed that Sarah was to have a son, Abraham did not understand why that was necessary rather than having Ishmael as heir (Gen. 17:18). Even after Isaac’s birth, Abraham acted kindly toward Ishmael and was grieved at Sarah’s desire to repudiate him. On the other hand, Sarah saw Ishmael as a threat to Isaac’s position in the family and found opportunity to have him expelled (ch. 21). This request to cast out the handmaid and her son seems to be against all principle of ancient law. The children of handmaids could be demoted if there was adequate reason, but hardly cast out. The fact that Abraham was against such a treatment and followed only on God’s command suggests that the action taken was not in accordance with contemporary patterns.

The question also must be asked whether there was something that Ishmael did that was a threat to Isaac or whether it was his existence which constituted such a threat. This is bound up with the meaning of the term ṣāḥaḳ H7464 (piel ptc. mēṣaḥēq) in Gen. 21:9, whether it represents Ishmael as “mocking” or “playing with” Isaac. It is questionable whether the word ever means in the OT “to mock, deride,” and it is likely that Sarah objected to Ishmael as a competitor of Isaac, not for some specific action he had done. (See below, section VI.)

VI. Purpose of the Ishmael sequence in Genesis. The author of Genesis includes the Ishmael account primarily to bring about a contrast between Isaac and Ishmael, not so much as persons but as illustrations of God’s working. The point is that God, in fulfilling his promises to Abraham, was in no way bound to the natural and the ordinary (the FLESH). He allowed the operation of these in the birth of Ishmael but he superseded them in the birth of Isaac. Although God’s preference for Isaac, as son of the wife, was in accord with custom, the rejection of Hagar and Ishmael served to make the contrast bolder, and thus ultimately to remind Israel that all was of GRACE.

VII. Descendants. The descendants of Ishmael are given identically in two passages (Gen. 25:12-16; 1 Chr. 1:29-31). What is most striking is the fact that there were twelve sons listed as there were twelve sons counted to Jacob. With this is to be compared the twelve sons of Nahor (Gen. 22:21-24) and the twelve “sons” of Esau (36:10-14). Other parallels are possible (Keturah’s “sons” [25:1-4] are thirteen) and suggest an organizational pattern common to these peoples. The Ishmaelites were ruled by tribal princes (nāśīʾ H5954, 25:16). These Ishmaelite tribes settled in the general area where their ancestor had grown up, that is, the wilderness of Paran. This area is described in 25:18 as “from Havilah to Shur, near the border of Egypt, as you go toward Asshur” (Assyria).

Some of the names of his descendants are attested in Assyrian records as tribes. More important of the twelve are NEBAIOTH (prob. on linguistic grounds not to be identified with the later NABATEANS) and JETUR, a name found later in the name ITUREA of NT times (Lk. 3:1). (For details see J. Montgomery, Arabia and the Bible [1934].) On occasion the Ishmaelites are pictured as hostile to the Israelites (1 Chr. 5:19) in accordance with the statement of God concerning Ishmael (Gen. 16:12). Finally, the Ishmaelites are coupled with the Midianites (some of the descendants of KETURAH) in some passages, thus suggesting an overlapping of the two terms (see MIDIAN). The term ISHMAELITE is applied to the Midianites (Jdg. 8:24), and the same group receives both names in connection with the story of JOSEPH (Gen. 37:25-28, 36; 39:1; there is no need to distinguish a Midianite from an Ishmaelite account of the sale of Joseph).

VIII. Paul’s use of the Ishmael sequence. Although he does not mention Ishmael by name, PAUL is obviously developing his teaching in Gal. 4:21-31 on the basis of the Genesis passages. Ishmael was born “according to the flesh” (NIV, “in the ordinary way”) and “persecuted him that was born according to the Spirit” (Gal. 4:29 RSV). The fact that the next verse is a quotation from Gen. 21:10 suggests that Paul has that context before his mind, and that it is from that context that he derives the remark about Ishmael persecuting Isaac. However, the Genesis context does not suggest any such persecution. J. B. Lightfoot (Saint Paul’s Epistle to the Galatians, 10th ed. [1898], 184) presents two explanations: (1) Paul was influenced by, although without endorsing, rabbinical traditions of Ishmael’s opposition to Isaac that were read into the Genesis account; (2) Paul read back into the individuals that enmity which characterized their descendants. From this, Paul concluded that the Galatians, who are free in Christ, should cast out the ones seeking to bring them into bondage. Of these facts drawn from the OT, Paul says that they are allēgoroumena (Gal. 4:24, from allēgoreō G251), an expression which is open to different interpretations. Does he mean that the passage in Genesis is to be understood as an ALLEGORY, or that it is to be applied allegorically?

Ishmael, Rabbi. A prominent Jewish sage during the first decades of the second century A.D. He has traditionally been viewed as the founder of a school of interpretation that stressed the ordinary use of biblical language, in contrast to the emphasis on linguistic detail characterized by his contemporary, Rabbi AKIBA. Rabbi Ishmael is credited with the elaboration of thirteen rules of biblical exegesis (cf. H. L. Strack and G. Stemberger, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash [1992], 23-25); he is also associated with some mystical movements. (See the extensive work by G. Porton, The Traditions of Rabbi Ishmael, 4 vols. [1976-82].)

Ishmaelite ish'may-uh-lit (יִשְׁמָעֵלִי H3818). A descendant of ISHMAEL. The Bible refers to the Ishmaelites in connection with the story of JOSEPH (Gen. 37:25-28; 39:1), in the narrative of GIDEON and the Midianites (Jdg. 8:24), and in a list of enemies of Israel (Ps. 83:6). In addition, a certain JETHER the Ishmaelite is included in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:17; called "Ithra the Israelite" in the MT of 2 Sam. 17:24), and the man in charge of DAVID'S camels was an Ishmaelite named OBIL.

Twelve sons (or descendants) of Ishmael are listed in the Bible (Gen. 25:13-15; 1 Chr. 1:29-31), and most of these names correspond to Arabian tribes (or place names) attested in extrabiblical sources. For example, the second name, KEDAR, clearly corresponds to the Qedarites, a particularly powerful tribe mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions as early as the 8th cent. B.C. (cf. I. Eph'al, The Ancient Arabs: Nomads on the Borders of the Fertile Crescent 9th-5th Centuries B.C. [1982], 223-27). Similarly, TEMA (Teima, Tayma) gave his name to a major trade center in N ARABIA.

It is clear that, no later than the 8th cent. B.C., the Ishmaelites formed a major tribal confederacy spread throughout most of N Arabia. Some scholars (e.g., Eph'al, Ancient Arabs, 233-40) dispute that these tribes are to be linked with the biblical "sons of Ishmael," but the evidence seems to favor ethnic and political identity (see E. A. Knauf in ABD, 3:513-20, including map on p. 516). In addition, there is reason to believe that the name Ishmaelite functions in the Bible as a generic term for desert tribal peoples, since it can apparently include the Midianites (cf. Gen. 37:28, 36 [MT "Medanites"]; Jdg. 8:24 [cf. v. 22]; see E. A. Knauf, "Midianites and Ishmaelites," in Midian, Moab and Edom, ed. J. F. A. Sawyer and D. J. A. Clines [1983], 147-62; id., Ismael, 2nd ed. [1989]).

Ishmaiah ish-may'yuh (יִשְׁמָעִיָּה H3819, "Yahweh hears"). (1) One of the band of warriors, kinsmen of SAUL, who joined with DAVID when the latter took refuge at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4; KJV, "Ismaiah"). He was from GIBEON (as was Saul) and is described as "a mighty man among the Thirty, who was a leader of the Thirty" (his name does not appear in the list of 2 Sam. 23:24-39, presumably because the composition of the Thirty changed over time).

(2) Son of Obadiah; he was a ruler appointed by David over the tribe of ZEBULUN (1 Chr. 27:19). The appointments were part of an extensive effort to bring greater organization to the nation.

Ishmerai ish'muh-ri (יִשְׁמֵרָי H3821, "[Yahweh] preserves"). Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:18); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (cf. v. 28).

Ishod ish'od. KJV form of ISHHOD.

Ishpah ish'puh (יִשְׁפָּה H3834, possibly "smooth or bald"). KJV Ispah. Son of BERIAH and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:16); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (cf. v. 28). His father and uncle, however, are described as “heads of families of those living in Aijalon and who drove out the inhabitants of Gath” (v. 13).

Ishpan ish’pan (יִשְׁפָּן H3836 derivation uncertain). Son of Shashak and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:22); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (cf. v. 28).

Ish-sechel ish-see’kuhl (אִישׁ שֶׁכֶּל, “man of understanding”). This transliteration is used by some in Ezra 8:18 (e.g., ASV mg.) on the grounds that the context calls for a proper name. Most versions, however, take the words as common nouns (e.g., NRSV, “a man of discretion” NIV, “a capable man”).

Ishtar ish’tahr. The Sumero-Semitic goddess of love and fertility and, mainly in ASSYRIA, goddess of war. In SUMER she was known as Inanna (or [I]nnini). Ishtar was worshiped widely throughout Babylonia and Assyria, where temples were dedicated to her in the main cities and chapels in many towns. In addition, at BABYLON alone there were 180 wayside open-air shrines, for hymns and prayers to her as goddess of fertility were frequent. As “Lady of the lands,” she was revered throughout the ANE, though sometimes under other names. She was identified with Isis (in EGYPT; see OSIRIS), the male deity <sup>1</sup>Attar (S ARABIA), Astarte (GREECE) and ANATH (Syria; see UGARIT).

In the OT, Ishtar is referred to as ASHTORETH. The women of Judah were upbraided for making sacrificial cakes or incense for her under her title as QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Jer. 7:18; 44:19). According to Babylonian tradition, this goddess descended to the underworld in search of her missing lover TAMMUZ, with the result that fertility ceased and women wept (cf. Ezek. 5:14). In her various capacities, Ishtar is represented as the evening and morning star (Venus). (See J. Nougayrol and J.-M. Aynard, La Mésopotamie [1965], 41-44; C. Wilcke and U. Seidl in Reallexikon der Assyriologie 5 [1976-80], 74-89; D. Wolkstein and S. N. Kramer, Inanna, Queen of Heaven and Earth [1984]; J. Black and A. Green, Gods, Demons and Symbols of Ancient Mesopotamia: An Illustrated Dictionary [1992], 108-9; B. R. M. Groneberg, Lob der Ištar: Gebet und Ritual an die altbabylonische Venusgöttin Tanatti Ištar [1997]; DDD, 452-56.)

Ish-tob ish’tob (אִישׁ טוֹב, “man of Tob”). The KJV transliteration of a phrase that is better rendered “the men of Tob” (2 Sam. 10:6, 8). See TOB.

Ishuah ish’yoo-uh. KJV alternate form of ISHVAH.

Ishuai, Ishui ish-yoo’i. KJV forms of ISHVI.

Ishvah ish’vuh (יִשְׁוָה H3796, perhaps “[God] rules” see A. A. Wieder in JBL 84 [1965]: 161). Son of ASHER and grandson of JACOB (Gen. 46:17 [KJV, “Ishuah”]; 1 Chr. 7:30 [KJV, “Isuah”]). Because he does not appear in the list of Asherite clans (Num. 26:44-45), some suspect that the name Ishvah is the result of textual corruption of ISHVI; others speculate that he may have died childless.

Ishvi ish'vi (יִשְׁוִי H3798, derivation disputed [see ISHVAH and ABD, 3:522]; gentilic יִשְׁוִי H3799, “Ishvite” [KJV, “Jesuite”]). (1) Son of ASHER, grandson of JACOB, and ancestor of the Ishvite clan (Gen. 46:17 [KJV, “Isui”]; Num. 26:44 [KJV, “Jesui”]; 1 Chr. 7:30 [KJV, “Ishuai”]).

(2) Son of King SAUL (1 Sam. 14:49; KJV, “Ishui”). While this passage lists only three sons of Saul, 1 Chronicles includes four: Jonathan, Malki-Shua, Abinadab, and Esh-Baal (= ISH-BOSHETH, 1 Chr. 8:33; 9:39). Many believe Ishvi is the same as Esh-Baal/Ish-Bosheth; others speculate that 1 Samuel preserves an earlier list, prior to the birth of Abinadab and Esh-Baal, and that Ishvi died before these last two sons were born.

Isis i'sis. See OSIRIS.

Iskah is'kuh. TNIV form of ISCAH.

island, isle. The Hebrew term <sup>l</sup>î H362 can mean a true island (whether in general, Ezek. 26:18, or referring to a specific one, 27:6), dry land as distinct from wet (Isa. 42:15), and especially a coastland. Sometimes littoral regions are distinguished from interior (Esth. 10:1), and the nearby shores of PALESTINE (Isa. 20:6) and PHOENICIA (23:2, 6) are included. But more commonly distance is implied, especially where “the coastlands/islands of the nations,” extending into the western Mediterranean, are in view (Gen. 10:5 [KJV, “isles of the Gentiles” NIV, “maritime peoples”]; Zeph. 2:11).

Though references are scattered, a notable concentration appears in the Major Prophets, and a definite pattern of Israelite geographical knowledge (based partially on Phoenician and Philistine contacts) seems implied. Items of trade suggest E African or Indian contacts through AQABAH (1 Ki. 10:22; Ezek. 27:15), but neighboring Mediterranean areas, especially KITTIM (CYPRUS), CAPHTOR (CRETE?), and DEDAN (RHODES?) were in clearer view. ELISHAH (Ezek. 27:7) was perhaps the Peloponnesus or S Italy, and metal smelting TARSHISH may have been Cilician TARSUS, Sardinia, or, most likely, Tartessus in Spain. NT references, naturally more explicit, include MALTA and specific AEGEAN islands, while in Rev. 6:14 and 16:20 the broader idea reappears.

Ismachiah is'muh-ki'uh. See ISMAKIAH.

Ismaiah is-may'uh. KJV alternate form of ISHMAIAH.

Ismakiah is'muh-ki'uh (יִסְמַכְיָהוּ H3577, “Yahweh sustains” cf. SEMAKIAH). Also Ismachiah. One of the temple supervisors under CONANIAH, who was in charge of the contributions during the reign of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 31:13).

Ispah is'pah. KJV form of ISHPAH.

Israel iz'ray-uhl (יִשְׂרָאֵל H3776, by popular etymology, “he struggles with God” gentilic יִשְׂרָאֵלִי H3778, “Israelite”). The new name given to JACOB by “a man” with whom he wrestled prior to meeting ESAU. The man wrenched Jacob’s hip, but Jacob said, “I will not let you go unless you bless me” (Gen. 32:26). The blessing was this: “Your name will no longer be Jacob, but Israel, because you have struggled with God and with men and have overcome” (v. 28; cf. Hos. 12:3-4). The scientific etymology of the name is disputed. Most theophoric names have the deity as the subject of the verb; thus, “God struggles.” Others argue that yiśrā’ ēl is originally derived not from the verb śārâ H8575 (“to contend, strive”), but from a different root; alternate meanings suggested include “God rules,” “God saves,” and others (see HALOT, 2:442; J. D. Fowler, Theophoric Personal Names in Ancient Hebrew [1988], 108). Israel subsequently became the name of the nation formed by Jacob’s descendants. See HEBREW PEOPLE; ISRAEL, HISTORY OF; ISRAEL, RELIGION OF; ISRAELITE.

Israel, history of. The origins of the HEBREW PEOPLE go back to the patriarch ABRAHAM, whereas the designation ISRAEL derives from the new name given to JACOB. Israel was constituted a nation at the time of the exodus and had become a kingdom by the year 1000 B.C. Though not always independent, it remained a political entity until A.D. 135.

I. Sources. The primary source for the history of ancient Israel is, of course, the Bible. The Bible gives more relative space to history than any other sacred book. The biblical historians and biographers, however, were more concerned with the moral and theological implications of events than with the mere recital of facts. Archaeological excavations in the Near E have illuminated and supplemented biblical history, which is largely Israelite history. The records and inscriptions of the Egyptians, Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans give a background for, and sometimes deal directly with, the history of Israel. Some Greek and Roman historians record events involving the people of Israel. The histories of the Jewish general and writer JOSEPHUS (c. A.D. 37-103), The Jewish War and The Jewish Antiquities, are important sources, especially for the last two centuries of the history of ancient Israel. (The dates below usually follow G. E. Wright and F. V. Filson, The Westminster Historical Atlas of the Bible, rev. ed. [1956]. Unless otherwise indicated, the dates are B.C.)

II. The exodus (c. 1280, though some scholars place this event much earlier, c. 1450). The exodus, “the going out” (from Egypt), was regarded by the Israelites themselves as the beginning of their national history. The book of Genesis traces Israelite origins back to Abraham, and particularly to his grandson Jacob, also called Israel, and the latter’s twelve sons, the progenitors of the twelve tribes of Israel. These accounts in Genesis, however, are not histories but biographies, dealing with persons and families, not with the nation. The book of Exodus opens with the Hebrews as unorganized slaves in EGYPT. With the exodus, the deliverance from slavery in Egypt, the Israelites became a nation and entered on the course of national development which is recorded in the historical books of the Bible. See EXODUS, THE.

Some of the data that are significant for fitting the exodus into the framework of history are as follows: (1) The name MOSES is probably Egyptian, meaning “son of” or the like, an element of royal names in the 18th dynasty (1570-1305, e.g., THUTMOSE) and in the 19th dynasty (1305-1208, e.g., RAMSES).

(2) A people group known as the Apiru are mentioned in Egyptian records as Asiatic slaves who worked as builders, as did the Hebrews, for pharaohs in the 18th dynasty (e.g., Amen-hotep II) and in the 19th dynasty (e.g., Ramses II). The word Apiru may be related to ‘ibrî H6303, “Hebrew,” and some of these Apiru may have been the Hebrews of the Bible.

(3) Some have equated the HABIRU of the TELL EL-AMARNA letters of the 14th cent. with the biblical Hebrews and therefore have argued for an exodus in the 15th cent. The name Habiru is probably related to Apiru and to Hebrew, and the three names may denote the same class of semi-nomads. The Habiru of the Amarna letters, however, were attacking different cities in Canaan from those which the Hebrews attacked, and elsewhere Habiru are mentioned in SYRIA and MESOPOTAMIA and therefore cannot be identified with the biblical Hebrews.

(4) The Bible (1 Ki. 6:1) places the building of the TEMPLE (c. 958) 480 years after the exodus, indicating a date for the exodus about 1438. Since forty years means a generation, however, many scholars think that 480 years means twelve generations, which is the actual number of high priests from AARON to ZADOK in SOLOMON’S time. And because the number of years in a generation is often less than forty, the actual time was probably less than 480 years.

(5) Another date is given in Jdg. 11:26, which places the coming of the Israelites “three hundred years” before JEPHTHAH and seems to favor an exodus in the 15th cent. But this number may be simply the addition of the periods of the preceding judges and servitudes, some of which were probably contemporaneous, and so the actual time involved was doubtless less than 300 years. See JUDGES, PERIOD OF.

(6) A key passage for the historical setting of the exodus is Exod. 1:11, which states that the Israelites built PITHOM and RAMESES for Pharaoh. Since Ramses II (c. 1290-1224) built both these cities, many scholars put the exodus early in the 13th cent.

(7) The narratives of Moses' meetings with Pharaoh imply that the royal residence was in northern Egypt, probably in Rameses, also called Tanis, not far from the Hebrew settlement in GOSHEN. Tanis was the capital in the time of the 19th dynasty, which ruled during the 13th cent., whereas THEBES in southern Egypt, about 500 mi. up the NILE, was the capital during the 18th dynasty, which ruled during the 15th cent.

(8) Finally, the destruction of LACHISH, EGLON, BETHEL, DEBIR, and HAZOR (all of which the Israelites captured) is dated by archaeological evidence in the latter part of the 13th cent., and therefore the exodus would fall early in that period, about 1280. Some scholars have tried to account for the ambiguity of the evidence regarding the date of the exodus by proposing that some tribes never went to Egypt but rather entered Canaan before the tribes that sojourned in Egypt. But this theory contradicts the evidence that the twelve tribes acted together in the wilderness and in the conquest of Canaan.

Connected with the exodus were certain mighty acts of God. The plagues, showing Yahweh's control over the forces of nature, finally persuaded Pharaoh to let the Israelites leave Egypt. The opening of the RED SEA by a strong E wind to let the Israelites cross and the destruction of the pursuing Egyptians by the returning waters were further evidences of God's hand in the deliverance of Israel. The Red Sea which the Israelites crossed is literally the Sea of Reeds (yam-sûp), and the equivalent of this name was given by the Egyptians to one of the lakes or marshes on the NE border of Egypt. This lake, which has not yet been finally identified, was probably the site of the Israelites' crossing, rather than any portion of what is now called the Red Sea.

God brought Moses and the Israelites through the Sinai mountains following the exodus from Egypt.

For the Israelites, the important thing about the exodus was not the date or the place, but the fact that God had delivered them from bondage and had called them to be his special people with a unique role in history. This great event was commemorated each spring in the PASSOVER festival.

Moses was the leader of the Israelites both in the exodus and in the wandering in the wilderness.

As an Israelite of the tribe of LEVI, he was naturally able to sympathize with the sufferings of his own people. As the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter, he was brought up in the royal court and was fitted to speak to the king on behalf of the Hebrews. Moses would know Egyptian art, literature, law, and methods of administration. He would also know the many gods of Egypt, and he must have heard of the Aten monotheism, which had been introduced a few generations before by AKHENATEN (but which disappeared with the latter's death because it had not reached the common people). Furthermore, Moses' years with the Midianites in Sinai gave him a knowledge of the topography of the wilderness and of the Arab tribes there, an experience that served him well as he later led the Israelites through that same wilderness.

III. Wandering in the wilderness (c. 1280-1240?). The route of the wandering is connected with the location of Mount SINAI, also called Horeb. Some have located Mount Sinai E of KADESH, but this conflicts with the tradition that the Israelites went to Sinai before Kadesh. Others have located Mount Sinai in NW ARABIA because Midianites lived there and because the phenomena at the giving of the law (fire, cloud, rumbling) are thought to indicate a volcanic eruption, which has taken place in that area. But the Midianites were nomadic, and the fire, cloud, and rumbling could betoken a thunderstorm. The above two locations of Mount Sinai would imply that the Israelites crossed the Peninsula of Sinai along a northern route.

The traditional identification of Mount Sinai with Jebel Musa in the southern part of the Peninsula of Sinai agrees with suggested identifications of MARAH, ELIM, DOPHKAH, and REPHIDIM on the way to Mount Sinai, and with a possible identification of HAZEROTH on the way N from Mount Sinai. Also the time recorded for the journey from Egypt to Mount Sinai and from Mount Sinai to Kadesh agrees with this location of the mount. If this traditional location of Mount Sinai is accepted, the Israelites made their way by stages southeastward near the shore of the Peninsula of Sinai and then turned inland to Dophkah, Rephidim, and Mount Sinai.

One problem with the wandering in the wilderness is the large number of Israelites thought to be involved. The usual translation of Exod. 12:37, "about six hundred thousand men on foot," implies a total population of two and a half million. In addition to "thousand," however, the Hebrew term <sup>leleph</sup> H547 can also mean "clan" or "family." The latter meaning would reduce the total to a reasonable and manageable number. Others consider the number a mere exaggeration or believe that it is the number of a much later census.

Several of the miraculous provisions for the food and water of the Israelites in the wilderness are related to actual conditions in the Peninsula of Sinai. The MANNA agrees in many respects with the sweet, white exudations of scale insects on the tamarisk bushes that abound in parts of Sinai. When migrating QUAIL reach land after crossing the Mediterranean in the fall, or the Red Sea in the spring, they often fall exhausted and are easily captured, as they were by the Israelites. Under the soil and rocks of the wilderness there is sometimes water waiting to be tapped (cf. Exod. 17:3-6; Num. 20:11).

The Israelites had hostile contacts with some of the nomadic inhabitants of the wilderness and friendly relations with others. At REPHIDIM they struggled successfully with Amalekites (see AMALEK) over the use of the spring there. On the other hand, JETHRO, the priest of MIDIAN and Moses' father-in-law, came to visit Moses and joined with him in worship of Yahweh. He also gave the good advice to appoint elders to adjudicate lesser cases, while Moses retained jurisdiction over the most serious cases. See ELDER (OT). Later HOBAB the Midianite agreed to guide the Israelites through the wilderness as they proceeded from Mount Sinai.

The first goal of the Israelites was Mount Sinai, the mountain of God, where Moses had received God's call to liberate the children of Israel. There Moses now received moral, civil, and religious laws, as well as directions for the TABERNACLE, a portable tent-shrine. The basic TEN COMMANDMENTS, written on stone tablets, were placed in the ARK OF THE COVENANT, a sacred box similar to the palladium carried by Arab tribes in ancient and modern times. At Mount Sinai also the Israelites made a COVENANT with Yahweh to worship him alone and to keep his laws.

The second focus of the wandering, Kadesh, was also a holy place, which is the meaning of its name. Near this site in northeastern Sinai there are three springs, and this area was Israel's center for many years. From Kadesh spies were sent N into Canaan, and then an expedition entered the land, but was defeated at HORMAH. At Kadesh, Moses and his brother AARON the priest had to deal with various revolts against their civil and religious authority. After most of the generation that left Egypt had died, and when the new generation had been united and hardened by the wandering life in the desert, the Israelites finally set out from Kadesh to enter the land which they believed God had promised to their ancestor Abraham and to them.

IV. The conquest of Canaan (c. 1240-1200). The Israelites approached Canaan from the SE and therefore conquered and settled territory E of the Jordan first. They did not attack EDOM or MOAB, because of ancestral relationship to these nations. SIHON, the AMORITE king whose capital was HESHBON, refused to let the Israelites pass and was defeated by them at JAHAZ near MEDEBA. As a result the Israelites occupied much of the land between the ARNON and JABBOK Rivers. They did not attack the the people of AMMON to the E who were related to them. As they pressed northward, OG, the giant AMORITE king of BASHAN, opposed them at EDREI, but was defeated. Thereupon the Israelites occupied his kingdom from the Jabbok River northward to Mount HERMON. This conquered territory of TRANSJORDAN was settled (a) by the tribe of REUBEN in the southern part, E of the DEAD SEA and N of the Arnon River, (b) by GAD in the center, S and N of the Jabbok River, and (c) by a branch of MANASSEH in the northern part, E of the Sea of Galilee. The soldiers of these two and a half tribes agreed to help in conquering the land W of the Jordan.

Moses continued to be the leader of the Israelites during the conquest of Transjordan, but JOSHUA was the commander of the army in battle. Finally Moses died on Mount NEBO after viewing, but not entering, the land to the W of the Jordan. As liberator, leader, lawgiver, and prophet, he was the founder and former, under God, of the nation of Israel. The leadership of the people during the conquest and settlement of the W devolved upon Joshua, who had long been assistant to Moses. Joshua and CALEB were the only spies who encouraged the people to enter Canaan years before when they were at Kadesh. Now he and Caleb were the only ones who came out of Egypt as adults and who also entered the land.

In order to enter CANAAN proper, the people had to cross the river JORDAN. The waters of the river stopped at a town named Adam so that the people could walk across the river bed. See ADAM (PLACE). It is recorded that in the years A.D. 1215, 1906, and 1927 the high bank opposite Adam fell into the Jordan, temporarily damming the water. So some have suggested that, as in the crossing of the Red Sea, God used natural means with wonderful timing to help the Israelites to go forward.

West of the Jordan, the Israelites first attacked JERICHO, which guarded the valleys leading up into central Canaan. The city was defended by walls, but these fell as the Israelites marched around them. The Israelites spared only RAHAB and her family, because she had sheltered Israelite spies who had visited the city. The Israelites then made their way up a valley and on the central ridge attacked AI. They were repulsed in their first attempt, but in their second attack they lured the inhabitants out of the city and were victorious. By these initial victories in central Canaan, Joshua prevented the N Canaanites from joining those in the S.

Joshua then called the people to sacrifice to Yahweh on Mount Ebal in the center of Canaan. Since there is no reference to a capture of Shechem at the foot of Mount Ebal, some have deduced that Israelites were already living there before Joshua came, but there is no direct evidence for this. To the S, the Gibeonite confederacy, including the cities of Gibeon, Kephirah, Beeroth, and Kiriath Jearim, made a peace treaty with the invaders. The Gibeonite ambassadors pretended to come from afar and so not to be of the inhabitants of Canaan, whom the Israelites considered under the ban of destruction.

The kings of five cities in the S—Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon—now joined to attack the Gibeonites because they had allied themselves with the invaders. Joshua drove the southern coalition from Gibeon and down the valley of Ajalon on the famous long day of battle. The Israelites were then able to capture many cities in the S one by one. Excavations at Lachish, Eglon, and Debir show that these cities were destroyed in the later 13th cent. Having taken cities in central and southern Canaan, Joshua was free for a campaign in Galilee in the N. There he captured the city of Hazor, which excavations have shown was destroyed in the 13th cent.

Then representatives of the tribes were gathered at the central city of Shechem, and portions of the land were assigned to the twelve tribes. Reuben, Gad, and part of the tribe of Manasseh had already been settled E of the Jordan. In western Canaan, Simeon was located in the extreme S, and then going northward were the portions of Judah, Dan, Benjamin, Ephraim, part of Manasseh, Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali. To the Levites (assistant priests) were assigned cities W and E of the Jordan, and to the priests (descendants of Aaron) were given cities in Simeon, Judah, and Benjamin. This assignment of territory illustrates the tribal organization of the Israelites.

By the latter part of the 13th cent., the Israelites were settled in many parts of Canaan. That Israel was in Canaan by this time is confirmed by Pharaoh Merneptah's stela of about 1230 listing Israel among the nations he overcame in Canaan. This boast of Merneptah's, which is not mentioned in the Bible, may be based on an Egyptian campaign which had no lasting effects. The lists of captured cities in Israelite hands show that important cities, especially in the plains and lowlands, were still under Canaanite control. West of the Jordan, Israel was largely limited to the central mountains.

V. The period of the judges (c. 1200-1020). The judges of Israel were not so much officials who decided judicial cases as special leaders who saved their people in times of danger from surrounding nations. The judges were of different tribes and were active in different areas, and some of them must have been contemporaneous with one or more of the others. Also some of the oppressions by other nations in different areas may have been contemporaneous. Therefore, if the years of the judgeships and of the oppressions are simply added, the sum would be much longer than the actual time involved between Joshua and Samuel.

The Canaanites in the N under JABIN of Hazor and his general SISERA tried to subdue the Israelites. A judge and prophetess, DEBORAH, summoned the Israelite tribes to send soldiers to throw off the Canaanite yoke. Six of the northern tribes responded, and the Israelite forces were led by BARAK. Sisera deployed his iron chariots, said to be 900 in number, on the plain of ESDRAELON near the river KISHON. A torrential rain caused the Kishon to overflow, and the Canaanite chariots were mired or swept away. The Israelites, who had no chariots, came down from Mount TABOR and defeated the Canaanites. This victory was celebrated in the Song of Deborah (Jdg. 5), which most scholars think was composed shortly after the event.

Another serious threat came from the Midianites, who made raids riding on camels from the eastern desert, and seized the crops and the lands of the Israelites. This is the first known example of the use of the CAMEL in warfare. In response to God's call, GIDEON, who was known for his opposition to BAAL worship, summoned men from his own tribe of W Manasseh and other northern tribes. By the use of torches and trumpets at night, the Israelites terrified the Midianites and drove them eastward across the Jordan.

The most persistent danger to Israelite independence came from the PHILISTINES. Like the Israelites, they were recent invaders; soon after the Israelites came from the desert to the SE, the Philistines came by sea from the NW, particularly from CRETE. They belonged to a group of Aegeans, whom the Egyptians called the SEA PEOPLES, who attacked the shores of Egypt at the same time and are depicted on the walls of Ramses III's (c. 1175-1144) temple at Madinat Habu in western Thebes. The Philistines established themselves in cities near the coast of Canaan, particularly in GAZA, ASHKELON, ASHDOD, EKRON, GATH, and also S of GERAR and in DOR. The Philistines brought with them the secret of smelting IRON, giving them a superiority over the Israelites, who had weapons and tools of COPPER and BRONZE. The Philistines forced the tribe of DAN to move from its original location between Judah and Ephraim northward into Galilee near one of the sources of the Jordan. The influence of the Philistines is indicated by the fact that after their coming Canaan was often called PALESTINE, that is, the land of the Philistines.

Several Israelite leaders tried to resist the Philistines. The exploits of SHAMGAR and the herculean feats of SAMSON in killing Philistines or burning their fields were on an individual basis and did not remove the Philistine dominance. Finally the Israelites attempted a pitched battle with the Philistines at EBENEZER. They summoned HOPHNI and PHINEHAS, the corrupt sons of ELI, the priest of the central Israelite sanctuary at SHILOH, to bring the sacred ark to insure an Israelite victory. Nevertheless, the Philistines were victorious, killed Hophni and Phinehas, seized the ark (which they later returned), and destroyed Shiloh, as evidenced by excavations there. The Philistines established garrisons to control the Israelites, who became their vassals. SAMUEL, a judge and priest who had been trained by Eli at Shiloh, called the people back to God and led them to a victory over the Philistines at MIZPAH, thus restoring a measure of independence to Israel.

The period of the judges was one of alternate IDOLATRY and return to the Lord, of periodic dominance by surrounding nations, and of tribal disunity as evidenced by the war between BENJAMIN and the rest of the tribes. There was need for a strong, centralized government if Israel and its faith were to survive. ABIMELECH, the son of Gideon, tried to establish a monarchy, but he lacked prophetic and popular support, and his attempt died with his death. See JUDGES, PERIOD OF.

VI. The united monarchy (c. 1090-922).

A. Saul (c. 1020-1000). When Samuel grew old, the elders of Israel asked him to appoint a king to give them political unity and military leadership against their enemies. Samuel saw the wish for a king as a rejection of his authority as well as God's, and warned that a king would curtail their liberties. Finally Samuel consented, and SAUL of the tribe of Benjamin was chosen by lot as king. Samuel drew up a constitution stating the rights and duties of the king.

Saul showed his military ability by victories over the Ammonites E of the Jordan, the Philistines in central Palestine, and the Amalekites who had invaded the S. Saul also built a fortified palace at GIBEAH, which has been excavated, the most impressive structure built by Israelites up to that date.

Saul's later years were embittered by disagreements with Samuel and other priests, and by his jealousy of the young officer DAVID. The latter gained fame by killing the Philistine giant, GOLIATH, and was a close friend of Saul's son, JONATHAN. Saul's attempts to kill David forced the latter to become a wandering outlaw with a band of followers in Judah and eventually to take temporary service in the army of the Philistine ruler of GATH.

The Philistines, whom Saul had driven from the highlands, extended their control along the Valley of JEZREEL as far as BETH SHAN, which oversees the route from the Jordan to the W. This movement of the Philistines cut off the northern tribes from contact with the rest of Israel. Saul led his army to Mount GILBOA, where the Philistines were victorious and killed Saul and Jonathan. The bodies of the Israelite king and his son were displayed by the Philistines on the wall of BETH SHAN, and Saul's armor was placed there in the temple of the goddess Ashtaroth, which has been excavated.

B. David (king of Judah c. 1000-994, king of all Israel c. 994-961). It was David who completed the work that Saul had begun in uniting the Israelites and in defeating their enemies, and David went on to found a little empire that controlled the surrounding nations. After the defeat and death of Saul, his son ISH-BOSHETH was made king in GILEAD E of the Jordan, and David was recognized as king in Judah, making his capital at HEBRON. After the assassination of Ish-Bosheth, the elders of northern Israel invited David to become the king of all the tribes, as Saul had been.

David's first move as king of all Israel was to capture JERUSALEM from the Jebusites (see JEBUS) and to make it his capital. This action helped to allay tribal and sectional jealousies, because Jerusalem had not belonged to any Israelite tribe and lay on the border between Judah and the N. Furthermore, David had the sacred ark transported to Jerusalem, a move that made that city the religious as well as the political center of the nation.

David's genius as a leader was illustrated in Israelite victories over the surrounding nations. In a reversal of fortune, the Philistines were forced back to their original cities and became vassals of Israel. MOAB and AMMON to the E, the Aramean kingdoms of ZOBAH and DAMASCUS to the N (see ARAM), and EDOM to the SE were also subdued and included in David's empire. With TYRE, David was on friendly terms. Within Israel, David had to cope with various rebellions, one of them led by one of his own sons, ABSALOM. The rebellion of SHEBA revealed a sectional jealousy between N and S that boded ill for the continuing unity of Israel.

David's cultural activities included building a palace in Jerusalem and gathering material for the temple to be built by his son. He composed many psalms and is said to have organized the Levitical liturgical singers and musicians for WORSHIP. Excavations show that in his time iron became plentiful in Israelite cities, since the Philistine monopoly on the use of this metal had been broken.

C. Solomon (c. 961 – 922). SOLOMON, born of BATHSHEBA, David's favorite wife, acceded to the throne, although he was a younger son. After his coronation Solomon killed his older brother ADONIJAH, who had aspired to the crown, and also killed or exiled Adonijah's supporters. In spite of this bloody beginning, Solomon's reign was noteworthy, not for military, but for cultural and economic developments.

Solomon's building enterprises were amazing in view of the limited resources of Israel. The most famous building by Solomon was, of course, the TEMPLE of Yahweh in Jerusalem. Solomon employed Phoenician craftsmen to build it and to make its furniture and utensils, the bronze pillars that stood before it, and the great bronze basin for water. The temple itself was built of great stones, and the interior walls were lined with cedar and covered with gold leaf. In the Holy of Holies was the ark, protected by gold-plated statues of cherubim, above which the invisible Yahweh was thought to be enthroned. The construction of the temple took seven years, and Solomon took thirteen years to construct his own palace.

Solomon also constructed administrative buildings and palaces for his many wives. By this building program he extended the city of Jerusalem northward. Outside of Jerusalem, Solomon's building activity is known from excavations in MEGIDDO, GEZER, EGLON, and EZION GEBER. At Megiddo new walls, gates, and forts were constructed. At Ezion Geber the Solomonic structures formerly thought to be smelteries are now recognized as storehouses, doubtless connected with Solomon's commerce through that port.

The wealth to support Solomon's building enterprises came more from international commerce than from rocky Palestine. With the cooperation of HIRAM, king of TYRE, Solomon built a merchant fleet at Ezion Geber, which brought back gold, silver, ivory, apes, peacocks, almug wood, and precious stones from the E. Among the products sent out from this port was probably copper, which was mined and smelted in the Arabah Valley S of the Dead Sea. Solomon also traded in Egyptian and Cilician horses and Egyptian chariots. The purpose of the visit of the QUEEN OF SHEBA to Solomon was not only to hear his proverbial wisdom, but also to trade. Solomon imported cedar wood for his buildings from Tyre, and he repaid with olive oil, grain, and some cities in northern Israel. One reason that Solomon was able to control and profit from the commerce between E and W was that neither Egypt nor Assyria was trying to dominate Palestine at that time.

Solomon's building and luxury were also supported by tribute from the subject nations his father had conquered, from heavy taxes on the Israelites, and from levies of forced Israelite laborers. To secure these taxes and levies of workers and to organize the government Solomon divided the country into twelve districts, each of which had a governor. These districts did not coincide with the territory of the twelve tribes, a break with the tribal traditions.

Ruin of the royal palace at Samaria, a city destroyed by the Assyrians in 722 B.C.

Solomon's activities brought magnificence to Jerusalem, but roused discontent in many quarters. Leaders in Edom and Syria revolted. Furthermore, many Israelites themselves, particularly in the N, resented the heavy taxes, the forced levies of workers, and the favored position of Judah. The prophets objected to the introduction of the worship of foreign gods that came to Jerusalem with Solomon's foreign wives. Solomon had a reputation for WISDOM and he composed many proverbs, but his later policies were not wise, for they harmed his people, his religion, and his dynasty.

VII. The separate kingdoms of Israel and Judah (922 – 722). REHOBAM, Solomon's son and successor, by trying to carry on the oppressive policies of his father, precipitated the secession of northern Israel. JEROBOAM, the spokesman of the northern tribes, had earlier been superintendent of workers under Solomon, had been encouraged to lead a revolt of the northern tribes by the prophet AHIJAH, and had fled to Egypt in fear of Solomon. When Rehoboam arrogantly refused to mitigate the taxes and forced labor, the northern Israelites seceded and chose Jeroboam as their king.

After this break (c. 922), the two kingdoms continued a separate but interrelated existence for 200 years till the fall of SAMARIA in 722. The northern kingdom—including the territories of Ephraim, W Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, Issachar, Dan, and Naphtali, which were W of the Jordan, as well as the Transjordan territories of E Manasseh, Gad, and Reuben—was larger than the southern kingdom, which included only Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin. The northern kingdom was also richer both agriculturally, because of its plains, and commercially, because of the international trade routes running through it. The southern kingdom was more mountainous and more isolated.

For the same reasons, however, the northern kingdom was also more open to foreign cultural and religious influences as well as to foreign conquest. The southern kingdom was more provincial, more faithful in maintaining the religion of Yahweh, and it continued an independent existence for a century and a half after the fall of the northern kingdom. Stabilizing factors in the S were the one Davidic dynasty, the one capital, Jerusalem, and the temple, housing the ark, which symbolized Israel's original covenant with Yahweh. In the N there were nine dynasties, violently replacing each other, three different capitals, and two shrines at BETHEL and DAN (PLACE), which lacked symbolic connection with Israel's religious traditions.

Jeroboam I (c. 922 – 901) made his political capital at SHECHEM, which had been a national center in the time of Joshua. He felt the need of religious centers to keep his people from making pilgrimages to Jerusalem in the S. Therefore he set up golden calves in Bethel and Dan, perhaps under the influence of the animal gods he had seen in Egypt during his exile there in Solomon's time. See CALF, GOLDEN. Since Yahweh was worshiped at these shrines, some have suggested that the calves were considered as pedestals for the invisible God. The prophetic writers condemned these images. During the reign of Jeroboam in Israel, and of Rehoboam (c. 922 – 915) in Judah, Pharaoh SHISHAK invaded Palestine. The biblical account of his plundering of Jerusalem is illustrated and amplified by Shishak's own list on a wall of the temple at Karnak listing the towns he captured both in Judah and in Israel.

BAASHA (c. 900 – 877) founded a new dynasty in Israel and moved the capital to TIRZAH. He fought with ASA of Judah (c. 913 – 873) over the border between them. Asa's fortification of the border town of MIZPAH is illustrated by the thick walls discovered there. ZERAH the Ethiopian, who was repulsed by Asa, was probably a leader in the Egyptian army. OMRI (c. 876 – 869) does not receive much space in the book of Kings, perhaps because he was not regarded as religiously important, but his political importance is indicated by the fact that a century later the Assyrians were still calling Israel "the land of Omri." Omri moved the capital of Israel to a new site, SAMARIA, which soon vied with Jerusalem in the beauty of its buildings. Omri cemented an alliance with Tyre by marrying his son AHAB to JEZEBEL, daughter of ETHBAAL, king of Tyre and Sidon. To the SE, Omri conquered Moab, as recorded on the MOABITE STONE.

Ahab (c. 869 – 850) continued the beautification of Samaria, building there an "ivory house" (1 Ki. 22:39 NRSV). This means that his palace's walls and its furniture were embellished with carved ivory inlaid panels, such as have been found in excavations there. In MEGIDDO, Ahab built tremendous stables with stalls for about 450 horses. Jezebel, Ahab's Phoenician wife, brought with her and encouraged the worship of BAAL and of the goddess ASHERAH. Such idolatry as well as Ahab's seizure of a private citizen's vineyard (see NABOTH) were condemned by the prophet ELIJAH.

Ahab was one of the leaders of a Syrian (Aramean) coalition that checked the advance of SHALMANESER III of Assyria in the battle of Qarqar in 853. According to Assyrian records, Ahab brought to this battle 2,000 chariots (more than any other Syrian contingent) and 10,000 foot soldiers. When they were not menaced by a common foe, Ahab and the king of DAMASCUS fought over the control of GILEAD. Finally the Syrians defeated and killed Ahab at RAMOTH GILEAD, though he was supported by JEHOSEPHAT of Judah.

JEHORAM (c. 849 – 842), Ahab's son, tried with Jehoshaphat's help to quell a rebellion of Moab led by MESHACH. The combined forces of Israel and Judah failed to capture KIR HARESETH, the Moabite capital. Mesha later commemorated the independence of Moab on the Moabite Stone.

The Divided Kingdom.

In Judah, Jehoshaphat's reign (c. 873 – 849) was marked by cooperation with Israel, as indicated above, and by internal religious reforms. He appointed judges in the cities and arranged for appeals to a supreme court in Jerusalem. He destroyed idols and pagan sanctuaries and sent out teachers of the law of the Lord. By defeating a coalition of Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, he reestablished Judah's control over Edom.

An Israelite general, JEHU (c. 842 – 815), supported by prophets, led a revolt against Jehoram. Jehu killed not only Jehoram, but also the latter's nephew, AHAZIAH king of Judah (c. 842), who was a grandson of Ahab. In executing judgment on Ahab's house, Jehu ordered the death of Jezebel, Ahab's widow, and of the brothers of Jehoram and of Ahaziah. He also killed the worshipers of Baal. Shalmaneser III's Black Obelisk shows Jehu bowing down before Shalmaneser, and the inscription states that Jehu presented tribute. In Jehu's later years, HAZAEL of Damascus took away from Israel the control of Transjordan.

Meanwhile in Judah, a daughter of Ahab, ATHALIAH (c. 842 – 837), was trying to wipe out the Davidic dynasty and to encourage Baal worship. After hearing that Jehu had killed her son Ahaziah, she seized power herself and killed her own grandchildren, except for a baby boy, JOASH, who was hidden in the temple. After six years, the high priest JEHOIADA had Joash (c. 837 – 800) crowned as king. Athaliah and MATTAN the priest of Baal were killed, and the temple of Baal was destroyed. Jehoiada gave Joash wise guidance while he was young. In his later years Joash turned to idolatry. The prophets saw it as God's judgment when the Syrians attacked Judah and plundered Jerusalem.

Both JEHOAHAZ (c. 815 – 801) and Joash (c. 801 – 786) of Israel continued to resist Aramean raids, which reached as far as an unsuccessful siege of Samaria itself. In this resistance to Syria, the kings of Israel were encouraged by the prophet ELISHA.

Jeroboam II (c. 786 – 746), the son of Joash, brought the kingdom of Israel to its greatest extent and prosperity. He not only recovered Transjordan from Syria, but also conquered Damascus itself. The material prosperity of Israel is illustrated by large buildings that have been discovered in Samaria, Megiddo, and Tirzah. But beside the great buildings in Tirzah, for example, are the remains of hovels, evidencing the injustice to the poor which the prophet Amos condemned. In Samaria from Jeroboam's time there have been found many tax receipts written on potsherds. These receipts indicate prosperity, and the names on the receipts are compounded not only with Yahweh, like Jedaiah, but also with Baal, like Elibaal, evidences of the combination of Yahwism and idolatry denounced by Hosea and Amos. One reason for the prosperity and expansion of Israel under Jeroboam was the absence of aggression from the great powers of Egypt and Mesopotamia.

Judah also prospered at this time during the long reign of UZZIAH, also called Azariah (c. 783 – 742). He defeated the Philistines on the W and the Arabs on the E, and he carried on his father Amaziah's work of subjugating Edom by rebuilding the port city of ELATH on the Gulf of AQABAH. Some scholars think he is the "Azriau of Yaudi" who, according to Assyrian records, headed a Syrian coalition opposing Assyria (see ANET, 282b).

In the latter 8th cent., Judah came under Assyrian dominance, but was not wiped out. AHAZ of Judah (c. 735 – 715) refused to join PEKAH of Israel and REZIN of Damascus in an alliance against Assyria. When the latter two kings attacked Jerusalem, the prophet ISAIAH urged Ahaz to trust in God for deliverance. Ahaz sent gifts to TIGLATH-PILESER of Assyria and asked his help. The Assyrians subdued both Syria and Israel and exacted tribute from Ahaz also. Ahaz forsook the worship of Yahweh and adopted an Assyrian type of altar.

Since the Assyrians came from the N, Israel more keenly than Judah felt the force of their expansion under Tiglath-Pileser III (c. 745 – 727). This king forced MENAHEM (c. 745 – 738) of Israel to pay tribute in 738. Pekah (c. 737 – 732) of Israel and Rezin of Damascus made an alliance to resist Assyria. Nevertheless in 732 Tiglath-Pileser captured Damascus and took away from Israel the Mediterranean coast to the W, Galilee in the N, and Gilead to the E, carrying many Israelites into exile. When HOSHEA (c. 732 – 724), the king of the remnant of Israel, refused to pay tribute to Assyria and turned for help to Egypt, Shalmaneser V of Assyria began the siege of Samaria.

VIII. The fall of Samaria (722). Samaria withstood the Assyrian siege for three years, but the city finally fell in 722, shortly before the death of Shalmaneser. His son SARGON doubtless assisted in the siege and claims credit for the capture of the city. Sargon states that he carried away captive 27,290 Israelites, and the Bible indicates that they were taken to NW Mesopotamia and to MEDIA. Hebrew names have been found in records at NINEVEH and Nimrud (CALAH), and the later story of TOBIT deals with Israelites who were settled in Nineveh and Media. In place of the deported Israelites the Assyrians introduced settlers from Babylonia and Syria who brought their idols with them. In time these pagan settlers were assimilated to the remaining Israelites and to Yahwism. So the later SAMARITANS were a mixture of Israelite and foreign elements and were therefore despised by the Judeans.

IX. The kingdom of Judah alone (722 – 586). In Judah, Ahaz was followed by HEZEKIAH (c. 715 – 687), who tried to throw off Assyrian control and tribute. He probably took part in the revolt against Assyria led by the Philistine city of Ashdod c. 711, for Sargon in his account of the suppression of this revolt states that he subdued the land of Judah. Hezekiah welcomed ambassadors of MERODACH-BALADAN of Babylon, who was also scheming to rebel against Assyria. Hezekiah strengthened Jerusalem's walls and dug a tunnel 1,777 ft. through solid rock to carry water from the GIHON SPRING to the Pool of SILOAM within the city walls, to insure the water supply during a siege.

Then Hezekiah led other Palestinian states in another rebellion against Assyria. In 701 SENNACHERIB of Assyria crushed this revolt, destroying forty-six cities in Judah, including LACHISH, whose siege is depicted in reliefs from Sennacherib's palace in Nineveh. Sennacherib's records claim that he besieged (but not that he took) Jerusalem and imposed on Hezekiah tribute including the exact amount of gold mentioned in the parallel account in the Bible. Isaiah assured the pious Hezekiah that Jerusalem would not be captured, and the biblical record states that "the angel of the Lord" slew many of the besieging Assyrians in the night. An Egyptian story preserved by HERODOTUS (Hist. 2.141), telling that at this time the Assyrian army was infested with mice, may indicate that bubonic plague was the means used by God to remove the Assyrian army from Jerusalem. Because of the mention of TIRHAKAH (born 710) as leader of the Egyptian army that tried to repulse the Assyrians, some scholars suggest that there may have been a second invasion by Sennacherib in Palestine about 688, but this is not clearly stated in the Bible or in Assyrian records. Within Judah, Hezekiah was known for his religious reforms and his return to the law of the Lord.

The tribute paid by MANASSEH (c. 687 – 642) is mentioned in Assyrian records. He must have tried to revolt, because the Assyrians carried him a prisoner to Babylon, which they controlled. The Chronicler sees this as a punishment for Manasseh's idolatry. After Manasseh repented and returned to the Lord, the Assyrians allowed him to return to his throne in Jerusalem.

JOSIAH (c. 640 – 609) introduced religious reforms, like Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah before him, but he was more thorough than they in removing local shrines and idols. These reforms were based on a book of the law found in the temple. Since Josiah centralized public worship and the observance of Passover in Jerusalem, and since the book of Deuteronomy stresses the one central sanctuary for sacrifice, many scholars have deduced that the book which was found was some form of Deuteronomy. Because Assyrian power was waning, Josiah was able to extend his control and the elimination of idolatry northward as far as Naphtali.

In 609 Pharaoh NECO went through Palestine to aid the Assyrians, who were hard pressed by the Babylonians. Josiah saw this move as a danger to his kingdom, and he opposed Neco's army at the pass of Megiddo in northern Israel. Josiah was defeated and killed, and the prophet JEREMIAH composed a lamentation for him. Neco was delayed by this battle, and the last Assyrian effort to repulse the Babylonians was defeated. With the extinguishing of Assyrian power, Neco took over control of Syria-Palestine. JEHOAHAZ (609), who succeeded Josiah, probably tried to follow an independent policy; Neco deposed him and took him captive to Egypt. Neco put his brother Eliakim in his place and gave him the throne name JEHOIAKIM (609 – 598).

After NEBUCHADNEZZAR of Babylon defeated Neco at CARCHEMISH in northern Syria in 605, Jehoiakim became a vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, and some of the Judean nobility, including DANIEL, were taken to Babylon. After the Egyptian army repulsed the Babylonians in 601, Jehoiakim revolted against Babylon, contrary to the advice of JEREMIAH. The Babylonians besieged Jerusalem, and Jehoiakim was taken captive and died.

JEHOIACHIN (598 – 597) succeeded to the throne of Judah during the siege of Jerusalem. In 597 the Babylonians finally took the city and seized treasures from the palace and temple. Jehoiachin was carried captive to Babylon with thousands of Jewish leaders, soldiers, and artisans. Records discovered in Babylon show that Jehoiachin and his family received regular rations from the Babylonian government. Nebuchadnezzar placed Jehoiachin's uncle Mattaniah on the throne of Judah, giving him the throne name ZEDEKIAH (597 – 587). After some years Zedekiah, disregarding the warnings of Jeremiah, revolted against Babylonia, relying on possible Egyptian help.

X. The fall of Jerusalem (586). Again Nebuchadnezzar invaded rebellious Judah. Letters on potsherds sent to the Jewish commander at Lachish illustrate the advance of the Babylonians as they captured town after town. Lachish itself was taken and burned. Jerusalem withstood the Babylonian siege for eighteen months. An Egyptian expedition to relieve Jerusalem was turned back. Eventually the Babylonians broke through the walls. Zedekiah tried to escape, but he was captured, blinded, and taken to Babylon. In August the Babylonians burned the city, including the temple, and broke down the walls. Some of the Jewish leaders were executed, and 852 others were taken to Babylonia. Only the poor were left to till the soil.

The Babylonians appointed a Jew, GEDALIAH, to govern Judah. At the instigation of the king of Ammon, Gedaliah was murdered together with some Babylonian soldiers. Fearing a reprisal, a group of Jews fled to Egypt, taking Jeremiah with them, though he objected to the move. In 582 the Babylonian reprisal was forthcoming in taking 745 more Jews as exiles to Babylonia.

XI. The exile (586 – 538). Though the EXILE is usually thought of as beginning in 586 with the fall of Jerusalem, it must be remembered that thousands had gone into exile from Israel in 735 and in 722 and from Judah in 597 and in 582. Furthermore, though the main body of exiles from Judah was in Babylonia, there were also exiles from Israel in northern Mesopotamia and in Media, and exiles from Judah in Egypt. In Babylonia the prophet EZEKIEL and other Jewish exiles lived at TEL ABIB on the River Kebar, a canal near the city of Nippur. Other places in Babylonia where Jewish exiles lived were TEL HARSHA, TEL MELAH, and CASIPHIA.

The prophet Jeremiah wrote to the exiles in Babylonia urging them to build houses, plant gardens, and live normal lives. The exiles were allowed to maintain some community organization headed by their own elders. Some Jews went into business and prospered. Daniel is said to have risen to the position of counselor to the king. EVIL-MERODACH (562 – 560), Nebuchadnezzar's son and successor, removed the exiled Jewish king Jehoiachin from prison and gave him residence in the royal palace in Babylon.

Jeremiah in writing and Ezekiel in person taught the exiles that the destruction of Jerusalem and the exile were Yahweh's punishments for their sins. They urged the exiles to keep faith in Yahweh in the midst of idolatry and held out the hope of return to Judah. The prophecies of the second part of Isaiah comforted the exiles with the assurance that God, the controller of history, would lead them out of Babylonia in a new exodus back to Zion, from which the faith in the one true God would spread to all nations.

XII. The Persian period (538 – 333). CYRUS king of PERSIA (c. 559 – 530) was regarded in the second part of Isaiah as an instrument appointed by God to deliver the Israelite exiles. In 539 the army of Cyrus took Babylon, and Babylonia and its dependencies were incorporated into the Persian empire. Cyrus followed a more tolerant policy toward subject peoples and their religions than that of Assyria or Babylonia. Throughout his empire Cyrus favored local cultural autonomy and respected local gods and their temples. The Jews also benefited from this policy, for Cyrus decreed that the temple of Yahweh, God of heaven, should be rebuilt in Jerusalem and that Jews wishing to return to Judah could do so.

SHESHBAZAR, a prince of Judah and perhaps a son of Jehoiachin, was appointed governor of Judah. He led the first group of returnees. With them they carried, with Cyrus's permission, vessels of gold and silver which Nebuchadnezzar had taken from the temple in Jerusalem. On their arrival in Jerusalem, the returnees set up an altar and began the foundations of a new temple. They were suspicious of the racial purity and religious orthodoxy of the Israelites who had not gone into exile and refused to let them help in rebuilding the temple. These “people of the land” retaliated by urging the Persian authorities to halt the construction of the temple and the walls.

Another much larger group of Jewish exiles returned with ZERUBBABEL, who was a nephew of Sheshbazzar, and followed him as governor of Judah. With Zerubbabel came many priests and Levites led by the high priest JESHUA (Joshua). In 520 work was begun again on the temple with the encouragement of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, and the permission of King DARIUS I (522 – 486). Finally in 515 this second temple of Yahweh in Jerusalem was completed.

The book of ESTHER indicates that there were Jews in many parts of the Persian empire during the reign of Ahasuerus, usually identified with XERXES I (486 – 465). The assembling of his military commanders and satraps in his third year (Esth. 1:3) may have been in preparation for his expedition against GREECE. A Persian record mentions an official in Xerxes’ court at SUSA (Shushan) named Marduka, who may be MORDECAI, the cousin and guardian of Esther. The Jewish feast of PURIM celebrates the deliverance of the Jews from their enemies as described in this book.

The prosperity of some of the Jews who continued in exile is illustrated by the business records of the Jewish bankers and traders, Murashu and his sons. These records come from Nippur and cover the second half of the 5th cent. This family traded in many commodities and services with Persians, Medes, Babylonians, Arameans, and fellow-Jews.

EZRA, a priest and scribe and perhaps the adviser for Jewish affairs at the Persian court, led several hundred more exiles back to Judah in the seventh year of ARTAXERXES (Ezra 7:7). Ezra was armed with a royal decree permitting Jews to return with him, commissioning him to reform religious life in Judah according to the law of God, and granting him money and vessels for the sacrificial worship in the temple at Jerusalem.

According to the traditional view that Ezra returned under Artaxerxes I (465 – 424), the date of his return would be 458. Some suggest that the king was Artaxerxes II (404 – 358), in which case Ezra’s return would be in 398, but this dating contradicts several passages that make Ezra and NEHEMIAH collaborators (e.g., Neh. 8:1 – 2, 5 – 6, 9; 12:36). Others conjecturally emend “seventh” in Ezra 7:7 to “twenty-seventh” or to “thirty-seventh,” keeping the identification of the king as Artaxerxes I, which would yield 438 or 428 as dates for Ezra’s return. One of the arguments for placing Nehemiah before Ezra is that the “wall” of Ezra 9:9 seems to imply that Nehemiah’s rebuilding preceded Ezra’s arrival. On the other hand, “wall” may refer to a structure that was pulled down shortly before Nehemiah arrived, or more probably to “protection” (RSV; cf. NJPS, “giving us a hold”) by the Persians, since the Hebrew word here (gādēr H1555) is not the usual one for a physical wall, and the whole district of Judah is said to be protected. The difficulties of the traditional order, Ezra then Nehemiah, seem to be less than the problems arising from the assumption that Jews, writing a few generations after the events, confused the order of the two most outstanding figures of their recent history.

Nehemiah, cupbearer to the Persian king, first came to Jerusalem as governor in 445, the twentieth year of Artaxerxes I. He had a commission from Artaxerxes I to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem with help and supplies from the Persian officials in the province called Beyond the River (i.e., Syria-Palestine beyond the EUPHRATES). This move to strengthen Judah was opposed by the Samaritans, led by their governor SANBALLAT, by TOBIAH, the Israelite governor of Ammon, and by GESHEM, identified in inscriptions as the king of the Kedarite Arabs in NW Arabia. Because of this opposition the Jews had to work on the walls under pressure and with weapons near at hand. Thanks to Nehemiah’s planning and encouragement the walls were completed in fifty-two days. At the celebration of the Feast of Trumpets (Lev. 23:24 – 25, first day of the seventh Jewish month), Ezra with assisting Levites read to the people from the Hebrew law and interpreted, probably in ARAMAIC, the lingua franca of the time, adopted by the Jews in exile. Nehemiah was the first signer of a national covenant with God to obey the law, to avoid marriage with Samaritans and heterodox Jews, to observe the Sabbath and the sabbatical year, and to give tithes for the temple and the priests.

Nehemiah returned to the Persian court in 433, but soon afterward he was sent back to Judah for a second term as governor. This time Nehemiah busied himself with religious reforms: providing for the Levites, enforcing the Sabbath, and condemning marriages with pagans. Ezra and Nehemiah, with their emphasis on racial exclusiveness and on the ceremonial law, strongly influenced later Judaism.

The clash between Nehemiah and Sanballat widened the political and religious breach between the Judeans and the Samaritans. Nehemiah chased out of the temple a son of the high priest who had married a daughter of Sanballat. Some think that this incident is the same as that described by JOSEPHUS (Ant. 11.7.2; 11.8.2) but placed by him, perhaps through an error, a century later in the time of ALEXANDER THE GREAT. Josephus says that the expelled priest's name was Manasseh and that he officiated in a rival temple that Sanballat constructed on Mount GERIZIM for the Samaritans.

Fifth-century Aramaic records from ELEPHANTINE, an island in the Nile near Aswan in southern Egypt, show many aspects of the life of a Jewish garrison there employed by the Persians. In 419 the Jews there received a decree from Darius I, communicated through Hananiah of Jerusalem (perhaps Nehemiah's brother) and Arsames the Persian satrap of Egypt, about the observance of Passover. Later they wrote to Johanan, high priest in Jerusalem, to the sons of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, and to Bagoas, the Persian governor in Judah, about the rebuilding of their temple in Elephantine. They agreed not to sacrifice animals in their new temple, because of Persian and Egyptian opposition to such sacrifice and because of the Jewish law limiting sacrifice to the central national sanctuary, the temple in Jerusalem.

Artaxerxes III (358 – 338) had to face serious revolts in Egypt, Syria, and Palestine. In 345 his armies destroyed Sidon and took captives from Judah to Hyrcania, SE of the Caspian Sea.

XIII. The Greek period (333 – 167). In 333 Alexander the Great (336 – 323) defeated Darius III (336 – 331) of Persia at Issus, near the border between Asia Minor and Syria. Then he made his victorious way conquering and receiving submission through Syria and Palestine. While he was besieging Tyre, Alexander sent to Jaddua, the high priest in Jerusalem, according to Josephus, asking auxiliary troops and provisions. Jaddua refused, saying that he had promised loyalty to King Darius. After Alexander had taken Tyre and Gaza, he headed for Jerusalem. Warned in a dream to submit, Jaddua went out peacefully to meet Alexander, who entered Jerusalem and offered sacrifices in the Temple. Alexander granted the high priest's request that the Jews should be allowed to follow their own religious laws and that the Jews of Judea should be exempt from taxation on the seventh, or sabbatical, year when they took no harvests. Some have questioned Josephus's story of Alexander's visit to Jerusalem, but elsewhere also Alexander visited local sanctuaries and respected local religious customs.

In the division of Alexander's empire among his generals, Palestine was assigned to PTOLEMY I (323 – 283) of Egypt, though SELEUCUS also wanted it. To establish his control of Palestine, Ptolemy had to conduct several campaigns there. He first took control of Jerusalem in 320, entering the city on the Sabbath, when the Jews made no resistance. He took many Jewish captives and settled them, some in ALEXANDRIA, some in CYRENE, and some he made garrisons in various cities of Egypt. In the Hellenistic period that followed, Jews scattered to many places, especially in the eastern Mediterranean countries. These settlements of Jews often became the seed plots for the early Christian church. In the time of Ptolemy I, the high priest in Jerusalem was ONIAS I. That the high priest was the political as well as the religious leader in Judea is shown by the fact that Onias made a treaty of friendship with the king of Sparta.

Ptolemy II (285 – 246) rebuilt and hellenized cities in Palestine, including Rabbah (now Amman) in Transjordan, which he renamed Philadelphia, and Acre (biblical Acco) on the northern coast, which he renamed Ptolemais. The correspondence of Zeno (the steward of Ptolemy II's minister of finance, Apollonius) shows that the family of Tobiah, an enemy of Nehemiah, was in charge of collecting taxes for the Ptolemies in Transjordan as it had been for the Persians. In Egypt, Ptolemy II freed the Jewish slaves who had been taken captive in his father's time.

A letter falsely attributed to ARISTEAS, an officer in Ptolemy II's court, gives a legendary story that Ptolemy sent rich gifts to the temple in Jerusalem and invited the high priest, Eleazar, to send six men from each of the twelve tribes to Alexandria. These seventy-two men are said to have produced a translation of the OT into Greek, called the SEPTUAGINT (LXX) in their honor. It is probably true that Ptolemy sent gifts to the temple in Jerusalem and that at least the PENTATEUCH was translated into Greek in Alexandria in his time. But the translation was probably produced by Alexandrian rather than by Palestinian Jews for the use of the numerous Greek-speaking Jews.

After Ptolemy III (246 – 221) lost a battle with Seleucus II of Syria, the high priest in Jerusalem, ONIAS II, who favored the Seleucids, withheld the payment of tribute to Ptolemy. Ptolemy threatened to send soldiers to dispossess the Judeans of their lands. Joseph of the Tobiah family (see TOBIAS #2) arranged with Ptolemy to take over the collection of taxes and the payment of tribute for Judea. Ptolemy IV (221 – 203) was able to keep control of Palestine by defeating ANTIOCHUS III (223 – 187) of Syria at Raphia on the border of Egypt in 217. After the battle Ptolemy tried to enter the temple in Jerusalem, but the high priest, SIMON II, prevented him. This Simon is given fulsome praise in the book of ECCLESIASTICUS (Sir. 50:21).

Finally in 198, in the battle of Paneas in N Palestine, Antiochus III defeated the army of young Ptolemy V, and Palestine became a part of the Seleucid empire. The people of Jerusalem welcomed Antiochus, who promised the return of Jewish war refugees to their homes, reduction of taxes, the right to follow their religious laws, help in the repair of the temple, and regular contributions to the expenses of the temple worship. The successors of Antiochus did not follow his benevolent policy toward Judea, however. For example, Seleucus IV (187 – 175), under the pressure of paying heavy tribute to Rome, tried, though without success, to get money from the temple in Jerusalem. His emissary Heliodorus entered the temple, but was beaten and frightened away.

Antiochus IV (175 – 162), in addition to encouraging Greek culture and customs in Judea, also tried to force Greek religion on the Jews. The high priest, Onias III, was murdered, and Antiochus sold the high priesthood to JASON and then to MENELAUS. In need of money for his wars, Antiochus robbed the temple in Jerusalem. Because of ensuing riots he sent an army which killed, plundered, and destroyed in Jerusalem. Jewish sacrifices and feasts were halted, copies of the Law were destroyed, and circumcision was forbidden. Finally the worship of Zeus Olympios was introduced in the temple, perhaps with the assumption that the supreme Greek god could be identified with Yahweh. Jews who refused to comply with these measures were tortured and killed. The nation of Israel and the monotheistic religion of Israel were in danger of extinction.

XIV. The Hasmonean period (167 – 163). The standard of Jewish revolt was raised by MATTATHIAS, a priest who lived in Modein, near Lydda, with his five sons: John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. Mattathias was the descendant of a priest named Hashmon, and therefore the members of his family were sometimes called HASMONEANS. Mattathias refused to offer sacrifice to a pagan god and killed the Syrian (Seleucid) officer who ordered the sacrifice and also a Jew who was willing to participate. Then Mattathias and his sons fled to the hills and were joined by some of the HASIDEANS (Hasidim, pious Jews).

After the death of the aged Mattathias, his son Judas (166 – 160) took the leadership of the revolt. Because of his skill in leading guerrilla attacks he was called MACCABEE, probably meaning “the Hammerer.” While Antiochus was away with the main Syrian army fighting the PARTHIANS, Judas defeated several Syrian detachments. Finally LYSIAS, the regent of Antiochus, rescinded the orders proscribing Jewish religious practices. In Jerusalem, Judas removed pagan elements from the temple, rebuilt the altar of Yahweh, and rededicated the temple in December, 164. This event is memorialized in the Jewish feast of Hanukkah (DEDICATION).

Antiochus died in 163, and his successor, DEMETRIUS I, appointed ALCIMUS high priest in Jerusalem. Perhaps in disappointment at not being chosen high priest or in fear, Onias, son of the murdered Onias III, fled to Egypt. There he established a Jewish temple at Leontopolis, 10 mi. N of Heliopolis. In Judea, since religious freedom had been attained, some Jews stopped fighting; but Judas carried on the war to achieve political independence from Syria also. To secure foreign support, he made a treaty of friendship with the Romans, who were interested in weakening the Seleucid power. After some victories over the Syrians, he was finally defeated and killed at Elasa in 160.

Judas’s brother, Jonathan (160 – 142), carried on the fight for independence. Because of internal struggles for power in Syria, many Syrian garrisons were withdrawn from Judea. One of the claimants for the Seleucid throne, Alexander Balas, appointed Jonathan high priest and then civil governor in Judea. Jonathan took control of several cities on the coast: Joppa, Azotus (Ashdod), and Ekron. A Syrian general, Trypho, offered to parley with Jonathan, but instead imprisoned and killed him.

SIMON MACCABEE, the last surviving son of Mattathias, took over the rule and high priesthood of Judea (142 – 134). Demetrius II, in return for Simon’s aid against Trypho, who had usurped the Syrian throne, granted to Judea freedom from taxation, which meant practical independence. Simon renewed treaties with Sparta and Rome, and Rome warned the Ptolemies and the Seleucids to respect the independence of Judea. Simon drove out the last Seleucid garrisons in Judea, those in Gazara (Gezer) as well as the Acra fortress beside the temple in Jerusalem. The Jewish people in 140 declared Simon their ethnarch, or national ruler, with the right of succession for his descendants. Antiochus VI sent an army into Judea, trying to reestablish some Syrian control. Simon's sons, Judas and John Hyrcanus, led a Jewish force that defeated the Syrians and forced them to retreat. Except for this incident, Simon's rule was marked by peace and prosperity.

Early in the rule of John Hyrcanus (134 – 104), Simon's son and successor, Jerusalem was besieged by a Syrian army of Antiochus VII. Finally John Hyrcanus had to surrender and pay tribute. After Antiochus was killed fighting the Parthians, John was able to reassert Judean independence. He proceeded to expand his rule beyond the borders of Judea. East of the Dead Sea he captured Medeba. Then he subjugated the Samaritans, taking both Shechem and Samaria and destroying the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim. His northward conquests went as far as Scythopolis (Beth Shan). To the S he subdued the IDUMEANS (Edomites), who had moved into the NEGEV S of Judea after the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. John compelled the Idumeans to be circumcised and to observe the Jewish religious laws.

John Hyrcanus ceased to support the party of the PHARISEES, because they said he should relinquish the high priesthood. The Pharisees carried on the tradition of the pious Hasidim, who had originally supported the Maccabean revolt. The Pharisees emphasized personal piety, study of the law, and observance of the details of traditional ceremonial requirements. John came to favor the SADDUCEES, because they supported him in his priestly as well as in his civil office. The Sadducees were the aristocratic priests who were concerned about the temple, its ritual, and its income.

Some coins of John Hyrcanus have been found at QUMRAN, indicating that the ESSENE community was there in his time or soon thereafter (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). This monastic group withdrew from the world to copy and study the Scriptures and to perform religious rituals, including frequent ablutions. They considered themselves as preparing for the soon coming of the messianic prophet, king, and priest.

Aristobulus I (104 – 103) is said by Josephus to have taken the title of king. He conquered Galilee and forced the Gentile inhabitants to become Jews. Under Alexander Jannaeus (103 – 76), the power of the Hasmoneans reached its greatest extent, but their original religious purpose for the national good was replaced by personal ambition and cruel oppression. Alexander won territory E of the Jordan and cities on the SW coast of Palestine, but he had to fight almost continually with the Egyptians, the Syrians, or the Nabateans. The Pharisee party rebelled against him because of his lax performance of his high priestly duties. Josephus says that Alexander's troops killed 6,000 rioting worshipers in Jerusalem and that Alexander crucified 800 of the Pharisees who had opposed him.

Alexandra (76 – 67), the widow of Alexander Jannaeus, succeeded him as civil ruler. She appointed her son Hyrcanus high priest; another son, Aristobulus, was made commander of the army. Alexandra was known for her piety, and she favored the Pharisees, who sought revenge on those who had wronged them in the time of Alexander Jannaeus.

On the death of Alexandra, the ambitious Aristobulus II, with the help of the Sadducees, seized the throne (67 – 63). Hyrcanus, a mild and retiring person, conceded the high priesthood also to his brother Aristobulus. Antipater, an Idumean, persuaded Hyrcanus to seek help from the Nabatean king, ARETAS III. Hyrcanus and Aretas besieged Aristobulus in Jerusalem. The Roman general Scaurus, a lieutenant of POMPEY, forced Aretas to withdraw from Jerusalem. Aristobulus, Hyrcanus, and a delegation of Pharisees all appealed to Pompey, who was in the process of making Syria a Roman province. Pompey came to Jerusalem and captured the temple after a siege of three months. Aristobulus was sent to Rome to appear in Pompey's triumph. Judea came under the control of the Roman proconsul of Syria. The independence which the Maccabees so bravely won lasted only eighty years.

XV. The Roman period (63 B.C. to A.D. 135). Pompey took away from Jewish control the Greek cities E of the Jordan and Scythopolis (which formed a league called DECAPOLIS, "Ten Cities"), the cities of the coastal plain, and Samaria. Hyrcanus II was confirmed as high priest and leader of the Jewish nation with administration over Judea, Idumea, Perea beyond the Jordan, and Galilee. The real direction in the administration of these Jewish areas came from Hyrcanus's adviser, Antipater the Idumean. All of Palestine was under the oversight of the Roman governor of Syria, and the Jewish administrators of Judea had to come to terms with whatever Roman happened to be in power. The confusion in Palestine in the mid-1st cent. B.C. was due partly to internal factions and partly to changes in Rome and on the international scene.

When Pompey was defeated and killed, Antipater and Hyrcanus gave their allegiance to the victorious Julius CAESAR, who named Antipater procurator and Hyrcanus ethnarch. Antipater gave the administration of Judea to his son Phasael, and of Galilee to another son, HEROD. Herod distinguished himself by the suppression of brigands in Galilee. Aristobulus II and his sons Alexander and Antigonus made various attempts to regain power in Judea. After Antipater was poisoned in 41, his sons Phasael and Herod were appointed joint tetrarchs of Judea by Antony, who at that time controlled the eastern Roman provinces. In 40 the Parthians aided Antigonus the son of Aristobulus II to seize power in Judea. He forced Hyrcanus out of the high priesthood and ruled as the last Maccabean king and high priest 40 – 37, facing the growing challenge of Herod.

The Romans did not want an ally of Parthia in control of Judea and appointed Herod king of Judea in 40. With Roman help Herod finally overcame Antigonus and took Jerusalem in 37. Octavian, when he had defeated Antony and Cleopatra, gave to Herod the cities on the coast, as well as Samaria, Jericho, and cities E of the Jordan. When Octavian had become emperor with the title AUGUSTUS, he gave Herod other territories E and N of the Sea of Galilee. So Herod finally controlled all of Palestine, except for the independent cities of the Decapolis and Ascalon.

Herod's building accomplishments, like those of Solomon, were truly remarkable, especially when the small size of Palestine is considered. He rebuilt much of the city of JERUSALEM and its walls. He also rebuilt SAMARIA, giving it the name Sebaste (corresponding in meaning to Lat. Augustus), and Strato's Tower, calling it CAESAREA, also in honor of Caesar Augustus. In JERICO he constructed a winter palace, which has recently been excavated. For defense he built fortresses such as the HERODIUM, MASADA, and MACHAERUS. He also donated money for buildings, including pagan temples, in Tyre, Sidon, and even in Rhodes and Athens. His most famous building project was the new TEMPLE, which he began in Jerusalem c. 20 B.C. He used tremendous stones for the wall of the court, which can still be seen, marble for the temple itself, and gold on the domes. This was the temple that was often visited by Jesus and which he warned would soon be destroyed.

Herod sponsored not only Hellenistic architecture but also Greek literature. His court chronicler, Nicolas of Damascus, wrote a Universal History, on which Josephus drew for his histories. In his relations to his family, Herod showed jealousy, fear, and cruelty. Out of ill-founded jealousy he killed his favorite wife, Mariamne (MARIAMME), the granddaughter of Aristobulus II. Out of fear he killed three of his own sons. These characteristics are also shown in Herod's attempt to kill Jesus after the latter was born in Bethlehem toward the end of Herod's reign. Herod's physical accomplishments were great, but he was not loved.

Herod left Judea, Samaria, and Idumea to his son Archelaus, who ruled 4 B.C. to A.D. 6 (see HEROD IV). During his rule Joseph and Mary brought the young Jesus back from Egypt to live in Nazareth. After Augustus deposed Archelaus, this area was ruled by Roman procurators A.D. 6 – 41. The procurator during Jesus' ministry was Pontius PILATE (A.D. 26 – 36), who was finally removed for his cruelty to the Jews and the Samaritans.

Another son, Herod Antipas (see HEROD V), was given GALILEE and PEREA, which he ruled as tetrarch from 4 B.C. to A.D. 39. His marriage to his brother's wife, HERODIAS, brought the rebuke of JOHN THE BAPTIST, whom Antipas executed in the fortress-palace of Machaerus, according to Josephus. To marry Herodias he cast off his former wife, and her father, the Nabatean King A RETAS IV, waged war against him and took some cities in Perea. It was this Herod who examined Jesus in Jerusalem before the crucifixion.

A third son of Herod, Philip (see HEROD VI), was tetrarch of the territory N and E of the Sea of Galilee from 4 B.C. to A.D. 34. He made BETHSAIDA, the home of some of Jesus' disciples, his capital and gave it the added name Julias in honor of the daughter of Augustus. He rebuilt Paneas at a source of the Jordan and called it CAESAREA PHILIPPI, in honor of the Emperor TIBERIUS Caesar and of himself. Here PETER confessed that Jesus was the Messiah, the Son of God.

At the CRUCIFIXION of Jesus near Jerusalem most of the elements of Israel's history are represented: the Romans in Pontius Pilate who sentenced him, the Sadducean priests who resented his interference with moneymaking in the temple, the Pharisees who resented his teaching, the Jews of the Dispersion in Simon of Cyrene, the family of Herod in Herod Antipas who examined him—but also the promises of Moses and the prophets that Jesus claimed to fulfill.

The Emperor CALIGULA made Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 37 – 44; see HEROD VII) king over the territory that had been ruled by Philip and over Abilene W of Damascus. Agrippa was the grandson of Herod the Great and the Maccabean princess Mariamne. The fact that he had Maccabean blood made him popular with the Jews. Agrippa's visit to Alexandria, through no fault of his, touched off a violent anti-Jewish riot there. The Alexandrian Jewish philosopher PHILO JUDAEUS, who interpreted the Bible in the light of Plato, headed an Alexandrian Jewish delegation to complain to Caligula about this riot. While Agrippa was in Rome, he persuaded Caligula to withdraw an order to set up the emperor's statue in Jerusalem, an action that would have precipitated a revolution. In A.D. 39 after the deposition of Herod Antipas, Caligula gave Galilee and Perea to Agrippa also. Finally in 41 the Emperor CLAUDIUS added Judea and Samaria to Agrippa's kingdom. The book of Acts, calling him only Herod, indicates that he wanted to please the Jews and therefore executed the apostle James and imprisoned the apostle Peter. Josephus confirms the biblical account of Agrippa's sudden and painful death at a celebration in Caesarea.

During this time, in the mid-1st cent., JUDAISM was prospering in Mesopotamia. A Jew, Asinaeus, rose to be governor of Babylonia under the Parthians. In Seleucia (near modern Baghdad) the thousands of Jews gained such power that there was a violent riot against them. In the little kingdom of Adiabene in NE Mesopotamia the royal house was converted to Judaism. Queen Hellena of Adiabene sent supplies to Judea in time of famine as did the Christians of Antioch through Barnabas and Saul. Helena's tomb can be seen in Jerusalem near St. George's Cathedral.

In A.D. 48 the right to appoint the high priest in Jerusalem was given to Agrippa II (see HEROD VIII). The Romans made him king of Chalcis in Syria two years later, and in the year 53 they gave him in exchange the territory N and E of the Sea of Galilee which his father had ruled. In 56 the Emperor NERO added Galilee and Perea to his kingdom. This Agrippa took part in the examination of PAUL, who paid tribute to his concern for Jewish affairs. Agrippa tried to prevent the Jews from revolting, and when the revolt came, he remained loyal to Rome who had given him his kingdom. He ruled these northern and eastern sections of Palestine until c. 93.

After Herod Agrippa I's death, Judea was again ruled by Roman procurators (A.D. 44 – 66). Two of the procurators are mentioned in the book of Acts, FELIX (52 – 60), who tried Paul when the latter was accused by Jewish leaders, and FESTUS (60 – 62), who sent Paul to Rome for trial before Nero. Some of the procurators had little understanding of the Jewish religion and roused opposition by dishonoring Jewish customs and sacred places. Others like Gessius Florus (65 – 66) openly plundered towns and released brigands in return for bribes. There were repeated demonstrations and rebellions led by such persons as an Egyptian Jew (Acts 21:38) who promised his followers that the walls of Jerusalem would fall before them. The Romans crushed such rebellions with severity.

Finally in A.D. 66, after the procurator Florus had seized money from the temple treasury, widespread revolt broke out. The rebels killed the Roman soldiers in Jerusalem and defeated the forces of the Roman legate of Syria at Beth Horon, where Joshua and Judas Maccabee had won victories. In 67 Nero sent one of his best generals, VESPASIAN, with three legions to quell the revolt. Vespasian first defeated the Jewish forces in Galilee. He spared the life of the Jewish commander there, Josephus, who joined the Romans and vainly urged his countrymen to surrender. It was this Josephus who later wrote histories of his people including this very war. In 69 Vespasian was declared emperor, and he departed for Rome, leaving his son TITUS to complete the subjugation of Judea. In April of the year 70, Titus began the siege of Jerusalem. Finally the temple was burned on August 27, according to Josephus, the anniversary of its burning by the Babylonians in 58 B.C. Thousands of Jews were killed or sold into slavery. Rather than surrender, the garrison of MASADA, the last Jewish fort to fall, committed mass suicide.

After a Jewish revolt in Cyrenaica in A.D. 115, a fresh revolt broke out in Judea in 132 over a decree forbidding circumcision. BAR KOKHBA, who was regarded as a messianic figure, was the leader of the Jews. This name, “son of the star,” may have been an epithet, for some of his letters, recently discovered, give his name as Simon ben Kosiba. In the year 135 the Romans captured and destroyed Jerusalem, as they had in 70. This time the emperor HADRIAN rebuilt the city, naming it Aelia Capitolina, and decreed that no Jew should enter it. The political history of ancient Israel was at an end. The religious fruits of that history, during which monotheism was preserved, continue in scattered Jewish communities, including modern Israel and in the worldwide Christian church, which has sometimes called itself the new Israel. See WARS, JEWISH.

Israel, religion of. Hebrew religion was unquestionably unique in character in the ANE. From geographical origins in MESOPOTAMIA it was gradually fostered through the patriarchal period until it assumed its normative covenantal character at SINAI. The subsequent history of Hebrew religion to the EXILE was one of periodic relapse from covenantal ideals, followed by prophetic exhortations and occasional revivals of religion. The IDOLATRY that was responsible for the deterioration of Israelite faith was purged by the exile, and in the postexilic period, a theocratic religious community in Judea gave rise to the JUDAISM of the immediate pre-Christian period. The religion of Israel is distinctly historical in nature, founded on the mighty acts and revelations of God in definite times and places. More than a series of events, however, this religion is a complex of beliefs about God and his relationships. Therefore the last part of this article summarizes Israel's central religious beliefs.

5. Conclusion: Permanent and temporary in the religion of Israel

I. Religious attitudes in ancient Mesopotamia. From the standpoint of method, any attempt to study the religion of the Hebrews must be grounded firmly in an awareness of the nature and functions of ANE religions generally. This is necessary because the ANE was coterminate with the world of the OT, and its religious concepts and ideals had a continuous bearing on those of the Hebrew people. It is also extremely important to see Hebrew religion in the wide geographical, historical, and cultural setting to obtain a correct perspective with regard to ideas of its growth. Scholars in the 19th cent. who studied the subject usually followed an evolutionary methodology popularized by J. Wellhausen. According to them, the mature Israelite faith grew from the animism and totemism that was attributed to patriarchal WORSHIP, and, under the influence of the literary prophets, developed slowly into ethical MONOTHEISM.

This approach, which leaned heavily on Hegelian philosophy and on the concept of biological evolution current in the mid-19th cent., stood in marked contrast to the OT view of Hebrew religion that attributed monotheism to the earliest of the Hebrews, placing the appearance of ethical concepts at an early rather than a late stage in Israelite religious history. On the basis of a vastly wider range of historical, archaeological, and religious information than was available during the first three decades of the 20th cent., it is now possible for the religion of the Hebrews to be correlated with its counterparts in the ANE at each phase of development for purposes of comparative study and proper methodology. Most important, it can now be asserted that the prehistory of Hebrew religion is to be sought, not in primitive or late BEDOUIN sources, but in the mature cultures of the ANE.

Archaeological excavations have made abundantly clear that the oriental world had left such practices as animism for centuries before the Hebrew patriarchs came on the historical scene, and that the animism or polydemonism in which they and their pagan contemporaries were thought by earlier scholars to have indulged were nothing more than the survivals of religious conservatism from the Neolithic period. Accredited temples dating from the end of the 5th or the beginning of the 4th millennium B.C. have been unearthed from the Ubaid period at Tepe Gawra, Eridu, Uruk and elsewhere, from which were recovered rough models of animals, along with human figurines, generally of the female, with exaggerated sexual characteristics. A similar shrine from the prepottery Neolithic at JERICHO was found to contain some plastic studies of groups of human beings, probably of a family. These artifacts suggest that an animistic phase had long since passed, and this conclusion is further strengthened by the highly developed polytheism that typified Mesopotamian and Egyptian religion in the 3rd millennium B.C.

By this time, the Mesopotamian nations had applied categories of personality to the great cosmic powers that comprised their pantheon, and were venerating them in temples that were thought of as their earthly residences. Furthermore, they had abstracted the concept of divinity from the divine beings of the pantheon, and were already associating it with all that they knew to be of positive value in social relationships. The desirability of positing a single head for any complex organization had led them to infer the existence of a single power behind the manifold operations of the universe. The high god in charge of the cosmos was known to the Egyptians as RE, the sun deity, whereas for the Sumerians of Erech it was An, the god of heaven, who was so worshiped. In Canaan, the supreme being was the god EL, whose offspring BAAL wielded executive power over gods and men alike.

As far as their votaries were concerned, each of these high gods embodied goodness and power in social relationships, making it evident that a comparatively sophisticated cultural and religious situation prevailed in the ANE long before the patriarchal period. Babylonian thought viewed happenings as individual events, with the result that the phenomena involved were given qualities of personality and will. Because natural occurrences were thought of in terms of human experience, the confrontation with the forces of nature or environment involved a mode of cognition far beyond that normally attributed to animism. In Babylonia, this attitude was most fully expressed in the yearly akitu festival, which was intended to secure an identification with the ruling powers of the cosmos and an assurance of blessing and fertility for the land. Even this procedure went far beyond the animism of the Neolithic period in its emphasis and intent.

The same is true regarding totemism, of which Egyptian religion used to be held up as a prime example, but which on examination has none of the characteristic features of totemism as found in Australian, African, or North American forms. If the existence of a genuine totemistic phase in Egyptian religion is suspect, there are even more reasons for denying it to Mesopotamian religion, where there is almost no association whatever of the names of deities with animals or plants. Certainly as far as the sophisticated culture of the late 3rd and early 2nd millennia B.C. was concerned, the original significance of any possible animistic survivals had been long obscured with the passing of time.

II. Patriarchal religion

A. *Divine names. The evidence furnished by both biblical and extrabiblical texts of the 2nd millennium B.C. shows that patriarchal religion was of a distinctive variety, and different in character from the pagan forms of contemporary society. The deity of the PATRIARCHS was the personal God of the clan chief, as indicated by such archaic titles as “the God [shield?] of Abraham” (Gen. 31:53; cf. 15:1), “the Fear [kinsman] of Isaac” (31:42, 53), and “the Mighty One [champion] of Jacob” (49:24). The patriarchal deity was the unseen head of the clan whom the individual patriarch had undertaken to serve, and who was expected to bestow his blessings on the land. The deliberate choice of God by each successive generation of patriarchs represents an extremely ancient religious concept, which is thoroughly consistent with the OT tradition.

The patriarchs also worshiped God under the name EL, a general Semitic designation for deity, which appeared frequently in Hebrew personal names. This situation has been paralleled in Mesopotamia during the Old Akkadian period (c. 2360 – 2180 B.C.) and also in the AMORITE names occurring between 2100 and 1600 B.C., the latter dates embracing the period of ABRAHAM, ISAAC, JACOB, and JOSEPH. In Palestine the patriarchs worshiped God under such ancient pre-Israelite appellations as EL SHADDAI (Gen. 17:1), which may have meant “god of the mountains,” EL ELYON (“God Most High, 14:18), and EL-ROI (“the God who sees me” [?], 16:13; cf. also El Olam or “Eternal God,” 21:33 [see DDD, 288 – 91]). These were not intended primarily as place names, and the extent to which they became associated with the localities where the revelations took place is highly debatable. The patriarchs believed that their God was not confined to one specific area, but was instead the object of veneration of a family that stood in a special relationship of obedience and faith to him.

Although the Genesis narratives convey the general impression that the patriarchs followed a monotheistic religious tradition, it appears from other sources (e.g., Josh. 24:2) that they were still to some extent involved in Mesopotamian polytheism. There seems to be no warrant from the PENTATEUCH for the view that Abraham originated the concept of monotheism, or that he formulated a monotheistic cult within the framework of his own semisedentary society. However, Genesis makes it apparent that Abraham was the ancestor of a nation that was destined to become monotheistic. The patriarchs were consistently represented as objects of divine revelation (cf. Gen. 12:1, 7; 15:1), who were convinced of the need for a personal relationship with their God, characterized by faith and obedience. On such a basis, the patriarchs could confidently expect their God to protect them and meet their material and spiritual needs. When they had been given divine guidance on specific matters they had no choice but to obey the revealed will of God (cf. ch. 22). The closeness of this relationship with the deity led them to commemorate divine beneficence in the names of some of their children (16:11; 30:13; et al.), and in the designations of some areas where a revelation from God had been received (16:14; 32:30; 35:15; et al.). The forms of worship employed in the patriarchal period included SACRIFICE and the offering of PRAYER to God (12:8; 26:25; et al.).

B. Covenants. Contractual agreements of various kinds were a common feature of ANE life, ranging from international treaties to COVENANTS made between individuals for private purposes. In the case of Abraham (Gen. 12:1 – 31), God made an unconditional promise to bring him into a new land, increase his offspring, and make him a blessing to others. Indeed, pagan nations would have cause to bless themselves because of the influence of Abraham, a theme that was continued in Deut. 28:1 – 14. A subsequent covenant instituted by God was of a more particular and detailed nature (Gen. 17:2 – 14), and provided that God would make of Abraham a mighty nation, protecting him and his descendants in Canaan in return for their undivided allegiance and worship. On this occasion, the rite of CIRCUMCISION was adopted to mark out specifically those who were members of the covenant family. This act seems to have been of great significance in designating the ancestors of Israel as a distinctive unit, since it is known that, in contrast to the Egyptians, the peoples of Babylonia did not practice circumcision.

III. Religion in the time of Moses. In calling MOSES, God identified himself as “the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac and the God of Jacob” (Exod. 3:6). Thus the God of Moses is the same God who promised to bless Abraham’s descendants (Gen. 12:1 – 3), to bring them out of Egypt, and to give them the land of Canaan (15:13 – 21).

Then, in response to Moses’ request, God revealed his name, “I AM [WHO I AM]” (Exod. 3:14; see GOD, NAMES OF; I AM). Then the name is given as yhwh H3378 (v. 15), in the third person form of the verb, probably originally vocalized Yahweh, “he is,” or “he causes to be.” The new name revealed to Moses became the name of God most used by the Israelites. In time, as fear of frivolous use of the sacred name increased, the title ʾădōnāy H151, “my Lord,” was substituted by Jews in reading the Bible. This practice, at least as old as the SEPTUAGINT rendering (Gk. kyrios G3261, “Lord”) is followed by most English versions, which render yhwh as “the LORD.”

Several times in the call of Moses, God refers to Israel as “my people” (e.g. Exod. 3:7, 10). Israel’s special relation to God is also expressed by the figure “firstborn son” (4:22). Among the blessings which Israel is chosen to receive are the knowledge of God (6:7), deliverance from slavery in Egypt (3:8), the privilege of worshiping God (3:12), and possession of the land of Canaan. God delivered the Israelites from slavery in Egypt—that was the pivotal event in the national and religious life of Israel. The exodus demonstrated God’s election of Israel for a special historical and religious purpose. This act of deliverance showed that God cared about Israel (Exod. 3:7) and that he was able to control the forces of nature (7:14—12:30; 13:21—14:29) and the army of Pharaoh to accomplish his purpose. Thereafter Yahweh for Israel was the one who brought them out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage (20:2).

The form of God's covenant with Israel at SINAI has been illustrated by the study of HITTITE suzerainty treaties coming from about the time of Moses (see TREATY). In these treaties the Hittite king reminds his vassals of his benevolent acts toward them (cf. Exod. 20:2), the requirements the king imposes are stated (cf. 20:3 – 17 and the other laws of the Pentateuch), vassals are to appear before the king each year bringing tribute (cf. Deut. 26:5 – 10), a copy of the treaty is to be placed in the temple and periodically is to be read publicly (cf. 31:9 – 13), and blessings are pronounced for those who keep the treaty and curses for those who break it (cf. chs. 27 – 28). Finally, the covenant at Sinai was sealed by a sacrifice whose blood was sprinkled on the altar and on the people establishing a bond of relationship between God and Israel (Exod. 24:6 – 8). The laws that Israel must observe to maintain the covenant with God occupy much of the Pentateuch (from Exod. 20 through Deut. 30).

A. Theological laws. The commandments of the Decalogue (Exod. 20:1 – 17; Deut. 5:6 – 21; see TEN COMMANDMENTS) teach that God is one (in contradistinction to the many gods of the other nations), that he only is to be worshiped, that he cannot be represented by an image made and manipulated by human beings, that God's name is not to be used lightly or profanely or for false swearing or magic, and that he is the Creator of all. The Decalogue also gives some of God's attributes: he is a jealous God who brooks no rival; he is a judge who punishes those who hate and disobey him; he is merciful to those who love him and keep his commandments. These laws certainly teach monolatry for Israel; monotheism (that there is only one real God) is implicit in the Mosaic laws. Some trace the origin of the Israelite belief in one God to Egyptian Atenism or to the Kenite religion (of which very little is known), but according to the Bible Moses received the knowledge of the one Yahweh by direct revelation.

B. Ritual laws. (1) Sacrifices might be called enacted prayers (Ps. 141:2). The placing of the offerer's hand on the head of the animal to be sacrificed (Lev. 1:4) seems to indicate that the offerer identified himself with the animal, which became his representative and substitute. The symbolism of the sacrifices included ATONEMENT (sin and guilt offerings), communion and thanksgiving (peace offering), dedication (burnt offering). Incense later was interpreted as symbolizing prayer (Ps. 141:2; Rev. 8:3 – 4). Some, following Wellhausen, have considered this scheme of sacrifices too complex for the time of Moses, but the discovery of related names for various sacrifices among the people of UGARIT has given support to the antiquity of the Mosaic sacrificial laws. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS.

(2) Purification. Some things which the laws classified as ceremonially unclean or defiling were a dead body (Num. 19:11 – 22), skin diseases including leprosy (Lev. 13 – 14), secretions connected with reproduction and childbirth (Lev. 12; 15), and various animals, particularly animals of prey (Lev. 11; Deut. 14). Ceremonial UNCLEANNESS resulting from the above causes debarred a person from public sacrificial worship. Cleansing from uncleanness was effected by water (Lev. 15:5, 8, 10 – 11), sacrifice (Lev. 12:6 – 8; 14:10 – 32; 15:14 – 15), blood (Lev. 14:25), or fire (Num. 31:23). These laws helped to keep Israelites separate from idolaters. Ceremonial cleanness is connected with the HOLINESS of God and with the holiness which he demands from his people (Lev. 11:45). Later the language of ceremonial cleansing was applied to moral and spiritual PURITY (Ps. 51:7). See CLEAN.

(3) The Tent of Meeting and its furniture. At the heart of the Tent of Meeting was the ARK OF THE COVENANT, which contained the stone tablets of the Ten Commandments, the basic requirements of the covenant. The tent reminded the people of the covenant, it illustrated both the availability of God and his holiness, and it served as the center for public sacrificial worship in which the people met with God. Some have suggested that this tent was only an imaginary half-size retrojection of Solomon's TEMPLE, but the study of portable shrines in ancient Egypt and of tent shrines among the Carthaginians and Arabs has persuaded many scholars of the essential historicity of Israel's tent shrine in the wilderness. See TABERNACLE.

(4) Priests. The primary duty of the priests was to perform various rituals in the WORSHIP at the central shrine. For example, the priest placed on the altar the blood and parts of the sacrifice brought by individuals (Lev. 1:5, 8) and he also performed the daily morning and evening general sacrifice (Exod. 29:38 – 42). Only the priests could enter the holy place of the tent, where they presented the bread of the Presence (see SHOWBREAD), supplied oil for the lamps, and offered incense. Second, the priests were to teach the people all the statutes that the Lord had spoken to them through Moses (Lev. 11:10; Deut. 33:10). Finally, the priests acted as judges in difficult cases (Deut. 17:8 – 9, 12). In general the function of the priest was to serve as a mediator between the people and God.

The first high priest was AARON. The high priest was to manipulate the URIM AND THUMMIM, which were kept in a pouch of his breastpiece (Exod. 28:30). These were small objects used to discover the Lord's will, especially for the nation and its leader (Num. 27:21). Another distinctive duty of the high priest was to enter the holy of holies on the Day of Atonement to sprinkle on the cover of the ark the blood of the sin offering to make atonement for the people (Lev. 16:11 – 16). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

The Levites were men of the tribe of Levi but not priests of Aaron's line. They were to carry the tent and its furnishings as the people journeyed, to set it up when the people encamped, and to guard it (Num. 1:47 – 53; 3:25 – 37). They were also to assist the priests in the rituals (Num. 3:6 – 9), and they might be called assistant priests. Some have thought that the distinction of different grades of priests did not arise till the time of Ezekiel, but in Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Ugarit there were hierarchies of high priest, priests, and assistants before the time of Moses. Therefore such a hierarchy in the Mosaic laws certainly is possible and even to be expected. See PRIESTS AND LEVITES.

(5) Holy days. The command to keep the SABBATH is included in the Decalogue, which links human work (six days) and rest (seventh day) to God's working in CREATION and then resting (Exod.

20:11); in addition, the social significance of rest for servants is emphasized by the reminder that the Israelites were servants in Egypt (Deut. 5:15). The feast of PASSOVER and Unleavened Bread was instituted at the time of the exodus (Exod. 12:1 – 28); the sacrifice of a lamb and the presentation of a sheaf of the FIRSTFRUITS of barley acknowledged God as the giver of flocks and crops (Lev. 23:9 – 14). There are many reminiscences of the Israelites' escape from Egypt in the observance of this feast. The Feast of Weeks (PENTECOST) was primarily a celebration of the wheat HARVEST (Exod. 23:16; Lev. 23:15 – 21); Jews later connected it with the covenant (perhaps 2 Chr. 15:10 – 12) and the giving of the Law at Sinai (b. Pesahim 68b).

At the Feast of Booths, as at Passover and Weeks, all adult male Israelites were supposed to gather at the central sanctuary for celebration and worship; this was the final harvest thanksgiving festival (Exod. 23:16; (Lev. 23:33 – 43). The people lived in booths during the week of the feast in memory of the booths their ancestors had lived in after coming out of Egypt. On the basis of certain psalms (Ps. 47; 93; 95 – 99) some scholars have connected with this feast a celebration of the enthronement of Yahweh on a Babylonian model, but most students question such an observance in Israel. See FEASTS.

The Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:1 – 34; 23:26 – 32) was the only fast of the Mosaic law. On this day the high priest sprinkled the blood of a goat on the cover of the ark to make atonement for the sins of the people. Then he confessed over another goat the sins of the people and sent this goat into the wilderness to AZAZEL. Perhaps Azazel was a demon of the wilderness, and sending the goat to him may have symbolized removing sins to their evil source. Some followers of Wellhausen have proposed an exilic origin for the Day of Atonement, but now many scholars recognize ancient elements in this ritual which may well go back to Mosaic times.

So the holy days of Israel served to remind them of their history, their blessings, their sins, and above all of Yahweh, their covenant God, their Deliverer, their Provider, and their Forgiver.

C. Ethical and Civil laws. The covenant required duties not only to God, but also to human beings (Exod. 20:12 – 27; Deut. 5:16 – 21). The Mosaic civil and ethical laws came from God and are constantly related to him, his righteousness, his judgment, and his mercy. These laws in the Decalogue include a positive command to respect one's parents as well as various prohibitions: murder (implying respect for the human person created in the image of God), adultery (respect for the unity of husband and wife as ordained by God, and sexual relations within marriage only), stealing (respect for the owner of objects he uses for his livelihood or for his enjoyment), false witness (respect for one's neighbor, whose name, property rights, and life should be maintained by true witness before the judge and God), and coveting. This last prohibition goes beyond ethical law to the psychological and theological source of sin—a person's desire for something that is not rightfully his. Most of the Mosaic civil laws can be classified under these commandments of the Decalogue. The Mosaic laws of the covenant may be summarized in LOVE for God (Deut. 6:5) and love for your neighbor as yourself (Lev. 19:18; cf. Matt. 22:34 – 40).

Though the Israelites at Sinai had pledged to obey these laws (Exod. 19:5 – 6; 24:7 – 8), they broke the covenant by making and worshiping the golden calf (ch. 32; see CALF, GOLDEN). Some have interpreted the calf as another god, such as Apis, the bull god of Egypt, and thus a breaking of the first commandment against other gods. Since the worship of the calf was part of a feast to Yahweh (32:5), others think that the calf was intended as a pedestal on which the invisible Yahweh stood, a breaking of the second commandment against worshiping images. When Moses came down from the mountain, he broke the tablets of the Decalogue as a sign that Israel had broken the commandments of the covenant. Levites killed many of the worshipers of the calf, and the Lord sent a plague on the people. After Moses' intercession (32:31 – 32) and the mourning of the people (33:4), a new copy of the Decalogue was provided, and God renewed the covenant with them (34:1 – 28). This story illustrates the waywardness of man, the sureness of God's punishment on those who break the covenant, and his grace in renewing the covenant. Some have regarded this story as a retrojection of JEROBOAM'S golden calves (1 Ki. 12:28 – 29), but it is questionable whether Israelites would have invented a story that cast such a blot on their ancestors in the wilderness and on Aaron.

IV. Religion during the conquest and settlement of Canaan. This was not only a period of military conflict between Israel and the Canaanites but also of spiritual conflict between the imageless worship of the one Yahweh and the idolatrous worship of the many gods of Canaan.

A. Circumcision. As the Israelites entered Canaan, they renewed the covenant with God by observing the rite of circumcision (Josh. 5:2 – 9). This sign of the covenant went back to Abraham (Gen. 17:9 – 14). They had practiced it in Egypt, as did the Egyptians, but not in the wilderness (Josh. 5:4 – 7), though it is required in Exod. 12:48 and Lev. 12:3. From the time of their entrance into Canaan, circumcision was practiced by the Israelites and distinguished them from the uncircumcised PHILISTINES (Jdg. 14:3; 15:18). Circumcision was also a symbol of spiritual cleansing (Deut. 10:16).

B. Holy war. The conquest of Canaan and Israel's defensive wars under the judges were wars of Yahweh, holy wars. Those who fought in such wars were sanctified in a state of ritual purity (Josh. 3:5). Sacrifices were offered before battle (1 Sam. 7:9), and God was consulted (Jdg. 20:23, 27). Sometimes the ark was with the army as a sign of God's presence (Num. 10:35 – 36; Josh. 3:6; 6:6). In the battle Yahweh fought for Israel (Josh. 10:14, 42), sometimes using the forces of nature (10:11) and throwing the enemy into confusion (Jdg. 7:22). Everything captured was dedicated to God; for example, after the taking of JERICHO the captured people and animals were slaughtered, combustible objects were burned, and metals were put in the treasury of the sanctuary (Josh. 6:18 – 24). The reason behind such destruction was that pagans left alive might lead the Israelites into idolatry (Deut. 7:16; Num. 33:55). Sometimes unmarried women (Num. 31:14 – 18), cattle, and movable goods (Deut. 2:34 – 36) were divided among the victors.

C. Renewals of the covenant. At Mount EBAL, JOSHUA gathered the people for a renewal of the covenant including sacrifice, writing the law upon stones, reading the law, and the pronouncement of blessings for obedience and curses for disobedience—all in the presence of the ark of the covenant (Josh. 8:30 – 35). Similarly at SHECHEM, in Joshua's old age, the covenant was again renewed with a recital of God's past dealings with Israel, a call to serve the Lord, the people's promise to obey God, the recording of the covenant, and its memorialization by a stone (Josh. 24:1 – 27). Such covenant renewals gave religious unity to the confederacy of the twelve tribes of Israel. That there was at SHECHEM a temple of BAAL BERITH ("Lord of the Covenant," Jdg. 9:4) may indicate that there was a covenant-making tradition there.

D. Special leaders. (1) The judges were leaders called by God to rouse and defend the people. They were endowed by God's Spirit with courage, wisdom, and strength for military leadership against Israel's enemies (Jdg. 3:10; 6:34; 14:19). See JUDGES, PERIOD OF. In addition, some of them did judge legal cases, like DEBORAH and SAMUEL. Some of the judges were religious reformers, destroying idols (Jdg. 6:25 – 32) and calling people to repent and turn back to the Lord (1 Sam. 7:3 – 9). Two judges were also priests, ELI and Samuel.

(2) The NAZIRITES were people dedicated to God. For the period of their vow they were not to shave or to drink wine or to cut their hair (Num. 6:1 – 21). SAMSON (Jdg. 13:4, 5) and Samuel (1 Sam. 1:11, 28) were life-long Nazirites according to the vow of their parents.

(3) The PROPHETS began to give religious leadership during the period of the judges. Among them were Deborah (Jdg. 4:4), Samuel (1 Sam. 3:20), and some unnamed prophets (Jdg. 6:7 – 10; 1 Sam. 2:27 – 36). In the time of Samuel there were bands of prophets who used the playing of musical instruments to induce a state of ecstasy (1 Sam. 10:5 – 6, 10). In Samuel's day a prophet was called a seer (9:9), and as one gifted with clairvoyance Samuel could tell SAUL where the lost donkeys were (9:20). The prophet also was called a man of God (1 Sam. 2:27; 9:6). Of course, the basic work of the prophet was to give God's word of reproof or warning (Jdg. 6:7 – 10; 1 Sam. 2:27 – 36; 3:11 – 18) or of encouragement (1 Sam. 7:3).

E. The conflict of Yahwism and idolatry. Even before entering Canaan, at SHITTIM in TRANSJORDAN, some Israelites had been lured into the worship of BAAL PEOR. These Israelites also indulged in promiscuity with Moabite women, for sacred PROSTITUTION was part of Canaanite worship. This idolatry and adultery were punished by execution of the offending Israelites (Num. 25:1 – 9).

At OPHRAH the angel of the Lord appeared to GIDEON at a sacred tree and received Gideon's sacrifice (Jdg. 6:11 – 23). Then Gideon built an altar to the Lord which he called Yahweh Shalom, "the LORD is Peace" (v. 24). There too was Gideon's father's pagan altar to Baal and beside it the wooden symbol of Baal's consort, the goddess ASHERAH. According to the Lord's command, Gideon pulled down the altar of Baal and cut down the symbol of Asherah (6:25 – 32). Later however Gideon himself made a golden EPHOD and deposited it at the shrine in Ophrah (8:29). The ephod was perhaps a sacred garment holding the sacred lots that were used to discover God's will. This golden ephod itself was worshiped, an example of how objects can become idols.

Asherah figures carved into a Canaanite altar.

The priests of the shrine at DAN (PLACE) were Levites, descendants of Moses himself (Jdg. 18:30). Presumably Yahweh was worshiped at this shrine, but in it was an image, an ephod, and TERAPHIM. Teraphim probably were small images of household gods (Gen. 31:19, 34) used in divination (Ezek. 21:21). Here Canaanite idolatry had contaminated Yahwism.

F. The shrine at Shiloh and the ark. At SHILOH the Tent of Meeting was set up (Josh. 18:1). Thereby Shiloh became the religious center for the Israelite tribal confederacy or amphictyony. There were, of course, other local shrines, for example, at Gilgal, Shechem, Ophrah, Dan, and Mizpah. At Shiloh an annual vintage festival was observed, perhaps the Feast of Booths or Ingathering (Jdg. 21:19). To the sanctuary at Shiloh the family of Samuel made an annual pilgrimage (1 Sam. 1:3). The boy Samuel served in the sanctuary there with Eli the high priest. To Samuel God gave the warning of coming judgment on the priestly house of Eli because of the sins of his two sons (1 Sam. 3:10 – 15). After defeating the Israelites in the battle of APHEK, the Philistines destroyed Shiloh and the shrine of Yahweh (1 Sam. 4:3, 4; Jer. 7:12).

Eli's sons carried the ark from the shrine at Shiloh with the Israelite army to the battle of Aphek. The Philistines defeated the Israelites, killed Eli's sons, and captured the ark. The ark was taken to various Philistine cities, in each of which plague broke out. Also in Ashdod the image of the grain god DAGON fell down and broke before the ark, a sign of Yahweh's superiority over the gods of the Philistines. Finally the Philistines in fear sent the ark back to the Israelites. It was kept at KIRIATH JEARIM till the time of David (1 Sam. 5; 6).

V. Religion during the united monarchy. At first Samuel opposed the people's request for a king like the surrounding nations. Taking a human king would be rejecting Samuel and the charismatic judgeship and ultimately rejecting God as King. Samuel warned the people that a king would reduce their liberties, take them as servants, and tax them to support his own luxury (1 Sam. 8:7 – 18; 10:18 – 19; 12:17). Finally Samuel helped in making SAUL king and drew up a constitution stating the rights and responsibilities of the king (10:25). Probably some of Samuel's regulations for the king were similar to the law of the king in Deut. 17:14 – 20. There it is stipulated that the king should be chosen by God, that he should not depend on horses or alliances for security, that he should avoid luxury, and that he should rule in the fear of God, remembering that his subjects are his brothers. On the basis of royal psalms (e.g., Ps. 2; 72; 110), some have thought that the king was considered divine in Israel as he was in Egypt. But divine kingship is contrary to Israelite conceptions of God as the Creator and Ruler, of human beings as the created subjects of God, and of the king as limited by a constitution and by prophetic criticism.

A. Religion under Saul. God's selection of SAUL was shown in the revelation to Samuel and in controlling the lots. Saul was anointed with oil, a symbol of spiritual empowerment, and shortly thereafter he joined some prophets in ecstatic prophesying (1 Sam. 10:9 – 13). Samuel's relations with Saul changed from initial support to rejection. Saul failed to wait for Samuel, according to appointment, to offer sacrifices at GILGAL. Samuel warned that because of this disregard for him as God's representative God would put another king in Saul's place (13:8 – 14). Later, Saul again did not completely carry out God's command through Samuel to destroy all the possessions and people of the Amalekites. Because of this disobedience Samuel declared that God had rejected Saul from being king (1 Sam. 15).

Saul's relations with the priests also deteriorated. At the battle of MICMASH the high priest was with Saul, and Saul sought the guidance of God through the sacred lots manipulated by the priest (1 Sam. 14:18 – 19, 37, 41). Later Saul killed the priests of NOB and their families because they had given hospitality and weapons to David, whom they regarded as still in Saul's employ (22:11 – 19). When Saul received no further guidance by dreams, by the sacred lots, or by prophets, he sought advice from a medium as a substitute for God (28:3 – 25). Saul himself had banned mediums and wizards following the law of Lev. 20:27 and Deut. 18:10 – 11 (see DIVINATION). His acceptance of the medium's report of the appearance of Samuel at least shows a belief in a personal, conscious future life.

B. Religion under David. By the time DAVID became king (c. 1000 B.C.), he himself had had a variety of religious experiences. He believed that God had chosen him to be king, that God had enabled him to overcome GOLIATH and other enemies of Israel, that God had delivered him from jealous Saul, and that God finally had made him king and given him a much larger kingdom than Saul's. Later, David also experienced prophetic condemnation when NATHAN convicted him of the double sin of adultery with BATHSHEBA and the murder of her husband URIAH. According to the heading of Ps. 51, David truly repented and experienced God's forgiveness. The psalms that are most surely David's (e.g., Ps. 3; 4; 7; 8; 11; 18) show strong confidence that God will help him, deliver him from his enemies, and guide him in the right way.

Through Nathan came the announcement of God's covenant with David (1 Sam. 7:4 – 17). God promised to give David rest from all his enemies, to establish the kingdom of David's son who would build the TEMPLE, and to make sure forever David's royal line and kingdom. This promise was the basis for the hope for the royal Messiah, the ideal king of the Davidic house. David made JERUSALEM the religious as well as the political capital of Israel. He brought the ark from Kiriath Jearim to Jerusalem (2 Sam. 6). Guided by God, he purchased a threshing floor just N of the city and designated it as the site for the future temple (2 Sam. 24:18 – 25; 1 Chr. 22:1). David also gathered materials for the temple (1 Chr. 22:2 – 19; 29:1 – 9), organized its functionaries and singers (23:2 – 4), and gave to Solomon a plan for its construction (28:11 – 19).

C. Religion under Solomon. At the beginning of his reign (c. 961 B.C.), SOLOMON deposed ABIATHAR as high priest and replaced him by ZADOK (1 Ki. 2: 26 – 27). In the contest for the successor to David, Abiathar had backed ADONIJAH (1:25), while Zadok had supported Solomon (vv. 38 – 39). Thereafter the priests at Jerusalem were regularly descendants of Zadok (2 Chr. 31:10; Ezek. 40:46).

Solomon hired HIRAM from TYRE to supervise the construction of the temple in Jerusalem, and much of the fine work was done by Phoenician craftsmen (1 Ki. 5:10, 18; 7:13 – 14). It is therefore not surprising that some features have parallels in ancient temples in Syria like that at Tell Tainat. In general plan the temple resembled the Tent of Meeting, but in a grander and more permanent form. It was thought of as the dwelling place of God. At the dedication of the temple, the building was filled with a cloud symbolizing the presence of God (1 Ki. 8:10; cf. Exod. 33:9). His "name" or presence was there (Deut. 12:5, 11). At the same time Solomon in his dedicatory prayer recognized that heaven could not contain God, much less the house that he had built (1 Ki. 8:27). The temple was intended as a focus of prayer (8:28 – 53), not only for the Israelite but also for the believing foreigner (8:41 – 43).

Solomon was famous for his WISDOM and known for his many PROVERBS and songs (1 Ki. 4:29 – 34). Two collections of proverbs are attributed to him (Prov. 10:1—22:16; 25:1—29:27), and SONG OF SOLOMON and ECCLESIASTES are associated with him. Though many proverbs at first glance seem to be distilled and memorable common sense, Israelite wisdom had a religious basis, namely, the principle that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom (Prov. 9:10).

Unfortunately Solomon did not follow the law of the king (Deut. 17:14 – 20) that prohibited luxury and many wives, and his foreign wives led him into idolatry. He built shrines for his wives' gods, ASHTORETH of the Sidonians, MILCOM and MOLECH of the Ammonites, and CHEMOSH of the Moabites (1 Ki. 11:1 – 8). Such idolatry not only was a violation of the first commandment, but also had evil moral and social results. Sacred prostitution was part of the worship of Ashtoreth, and child sacrifice was offered to Molech and Chemosh.

VI. Religion in the northern kingdom. The prophet AHIJAH promised the ten northern tribes to JEROBOAM. These tribes were to be broken away from Solomon's house because Solomon had broken God's laws, specifically in worshiping other gods. To Jeroboam was promised a lasting dynasty in the northern kingdom, if he would obey God's commandments (1 Ki. 11:29 – 39).

A. Jeroboam's golden calves. Unfortunately for Yahwism in the northern kingdom, Jeroboam (c. 922 – 901) set up golden calves for worship in BETHEL and DAN (PLACE) (1 Ki. 12:26 – 33; see CALF, GOLDEN). Jeroboam did not intend to depart from Yahwism, for he stated that the calves represented the God who brought them out of Egypt. Probably Yahweh was thought of as present but invisible above the calf, just as in the temple in Jerusalem he was present over the cherubim. There was this difference, that the cherubim were thought of as servants of God and were never worshiped, while Jeroboam said that the calves represented God and were to be worshiped. Therefore the calves clashed with the commandment forbidding the worship of any image (Exod. 20:4 – 6). Furthermore the bull was associated with other gods by the Egyptians and the Canaanites so that the calves endangered the uniqueness of Yahweh and easily led to syncretism.

Jeroboam's purpose was that Bethel and Dan would replace Jerusalem as centers for corporate worship for northern Israelites. He expelled regular priests and Levites and installed priests who would carry out his religio-political program (2 Chr. 11:13 – 15). These moves broke the religious unity of Israel. For all these reasons the prophets (1 Ki. 13:1 – 5; Hos. 8:5 – 6; 13:2) and the prophetic historians (2 Ki. 17:16) condemned the calf-worship of northern Israel.

B. Elijah. In most of the incidents of ELIJAH'S ministry he is the protagonist for Yahweh in the contest with the Tyrian Baal, whose worship was introduced by Queen JEZEBEL, wife of AHAB king of northern Israel (c. 869 – 850). In ZAREPHATH in Phoenicia, Elijah miraculously provided food for a widow and healed her son (1 Ki. 17:8 – 24). This demonstration of power in the territory of the Tyrian Baal for a Canaanite woman indicates Yahweh's universal rule and concern (cf. Lk. 4:26).

At Mount Carmel, Elijah represented Yahweh in the showdown with the priests of Baal and of his consort Asherah (1 Ki. 18). There was no answer to the prayers of the prophets of Baal, but in answer to Elijah's prayer, Yahweh sent fire down to burn the sacrifice. So the assembled people acknowledged that Yahweh was the real God, and the priests of Baal were killed. At the same time Yahweh showed his superiority over Baal (who the Canaanites thought controlled the weather) by sending rain after he had withheld it for three years.

At Mount Horeb, God gave to Elijah a demonstration of the ways of revelation (1 Ki. 19:9 – 18). God sent wind, earthquake, and fire, showing his control over natural forces. But God's message came to Elijah in a still small voice, indicating that God also reveals himself in quiet ways. The contents of God's message shows that God acts also in history, in this case by judgments on the house of Ahab through HAZAEL king of Syria (ARAM) and also through JEHU, who would take the crown in Israel. In addition, God shows concern with the perpetuation of the faith by raising up a new prophet (Elisha) and by preserving a sizable remnant of the people who are true to Yahweh.

Elijah also condemned King Ahab for seizing NABOTH'S vineyard and arranging for the death of Naboth (1 Ki. 21). This courageous condemnation demonstrated that even the Israelite king was subject to God's law. The description of the death of Elijah as a departure in a fiery chariot certainly points to a belief in a personal future life where earthly service is rewarded (2 Ki. 2:11).

C. Elisha. While Elijah is a grand and lonely figure, his successor ELISHA worked in cooperation with other prophets. Elisha was anointed by Elijah and received the latter's mantle as signs of endowment with spiritual power (1 Ki. 19:16, 19 – 21; 2 Ki. 2:9 – 14). He served as Elijah's assistant during his mentor's later years. Elisha is associated closely with the prophetic groups called the sons of the prophets at Bethel (2 Ki. 2:3) and at Jericho (2:15), and he was acknowledged as "master" of the group of prophets in Gilgal, for whom he performed some miraculous services (4:42 – 44; 6:1 – 7). When prophesying, Elisha sometimes required music (3:15), as did other members of the prophetic guilds (cf. 1 Sam. 10:5).

Elisha took an active part in the affairs of state. He sent a young prophet to anoint Jehu as king of Israel to bring judgment on the house of Ahab and on Queen Jezebel (2 Ki. 9:1 – 11). Elisha often gave counsel and help to the kings of Israel in their wars against the invading Arameans (6:24—7:20; 13:14 – 19) and together with Judah against Moab (3:1 – 27). Elisha also demonstrated Yahweh's rule over the history and kings of other countries, for example in encouraging Hazael to take the throne of Aram (8:7 – 15). Elisha even directed the healing of the Aramean general NAAMAN who had invaded Israel (5:1 – 27). Many of Elisha's beneficent miracles manifested God's concern for the poor and the sick (4:1 – 37).

D. Micaiah. MICAIAH was one of the prophets consulted by King Ahab of Israel and King JEHOSHAPHAT of Judah before their battle with the Arameans (1 Ki. 22:5 – 28). ZEDEKIAH, leading four hundred prophets, used iron horns to symbolize the victory he promised over Aram. Only Micaiah warned of defeat and death for Ahab, though he knew this message would be unwelcome. Events showed that Zedekiah and his four hundred were false prophets and that Micaiah had brought the true word of the Lord.

E. The revolt of Jehu. As pointed out above, Jehu (c. 842 – 815 B.C.) was anointed by a prophet and commissioned to execute judgment on the house of Ahab (2 Ki. 9:1 – 11). Jehu first removed Jezebel and the descendants and even the friends of Ahab, a wholesale slaughter which Hosea later condemned (Hos. 1:4). By these acts Jehu won the support of the RECABITES, who tried to maintain the desert way of life in order to preserve pure and original Yahwism (2 Ki. 10:15, 16; cf. 1 Chr. 2:55; Jer. 35). Then in Samaria Jehu assembled the priests, prophets, and worshipers of Baal in Baal's temple and killed them all. Though Jehu wiped out Baalism, he maintained the worship of the golden calves (2 Ki. 10:28, 29).

F. Amos. Though he was a Judean, AMOS was called to preach God's message in Bethel, the chief shrine of northern Israel. Under Jeroboam II (c. 786 – 746) in Israel there was luxury for some, injustice for the poor, and a booming performance of feasts and sacrifices. Amos saw God as sovereign over nature (Amos 4:6 – 9; 5:8) and over history (2:9 – 10), and as the righteous Judge of the nations (1:3—2:8). God's primary requirement, according to Amos, is justice (5:24), which he often saw denied to the poor of Israel.

Amos criticized and reinterpreted some assumptions of Israelite popular religion. Many Israelites thought that God's election of Israel meant that God was not interested in other nations and that Israel's security was inviolable. Against such chauvinism Amos preached that God was concerned also with the movements of other peoples, like the enemy Philistines and Arameans (Amos 9:7). God's election of Israel to special religious privilege meant that the judgment of their iniquities would be heavier (3:1 – 2). Another assumption of popular Israelite religion was that the proper performance of ritual was God's principal requirement and that such sacrifices guaranteed God's favor. Amos, on the other hand, asserted that God hated offerings without righteousness in life (5:21 – 25). The cult centers, Bethel, Gilgal, and Dan, where the rich drank wine, indulged in prostitution, and oppressed the poor, would be destroyed, warned Amos (2:7, 8; 5:5 – 7).

Many Israelites thought that the DAY OF THE LORD meant victory over their enemies. On the contrary, said Amos, the day of God's judgment will bring darkness on Israel (Amos 5:18), and Israel will go into exile beyond Damascus (i.e., to Assyria (5:27)). According to 9:9 – 15, Amos, like most other prophets, looked forward to a restoration and prosperity. Some think that this passage is inconsistent with the dark judgment of the rest of the book. Elsewhere also there are gleams of light, such as the hope that God may be gracious to a remnant who will practice justice (5:15).

G. Hosea. HOSEA prophesied not only during the prosperity of Jeroboam II but also during the following internal confusion and increasing external pressure from Assyria. Hosea's wife was unfaithful to him and fell into prostitution and slavery, but Hosea bought her back in continuing love. He saw in his experience with his wayward wife an illustration of God's experience with unfaithful Israel, who had broken her covenant vows to God by engaging in idolatry and who would be punished and eventually restored to fellowship and favor with God. According to Hosea, God wants from his people faithfulness (Hos. 2:20; 4:1; 5:7; 14:4), steadfast love or kindness (2:19; 4:1; 6:6; 12:6), and knowledge of God (4:1; 5:4; 6:3). Love is a characteristic of the covenant-keeping God himself (11:1 – 4; 14:4).

Hosea condemns Baal worship (which he calls adultery) and also the empty formalism and syncretism of the supposed worship of Yahweh. He maintains that the calves, which the Israelites worship, are not God and are rejected by Yahweh (Hos. 8:5 – 6; 10:5; 13:2). The many altars of the Israelites have been places for sin, not true worship, and Yahweh is not pleased with their sacrifices and feasts (8:11, 13). Some Israelites observe the feast days of Baal and forget Yahweh (2:13). At the idolatrous shrines men consort with cult prostitutes, and women commit adultery also (4:13 – 14). Israel does not realize that food and wealth come from Yahweh, not from Baal (2:8).

Because of these religious and social sins, Hosea warns that the Israelites will go into captivity to Egypt and to Assyria (Hos. 9:3, 6; 10:6; 11:5). Samaria's king will perish (10:7), and many of its people will be slaughtered (13:16). Much more than Amos, Hosea speaks of Israel's future return to God (14:1 – 2) and to their homes (11:10 – 11) and of God's spiritual and physical blessings on them (14:4 – 7).

H. Religious interpretation of the fall of Samaria. The writer of 2 Ki. 17:7 – 23 lists religious sins as the ultimate reason for the fall of Samaria (722 B.C.) and the captivity of the Israelites in Assyria. The Israelites had despised God's statutes and his covenant and had refused to listen to the warnings of the prophets. They had worshiped other gods, even sacrificing their children. They had practiced magic and worshiped the golden calves. Therefore the Lord was angry and removed the northern Israelites.

VII. Religion in the southern kingdom. Judah was more stable and less open to foreign influences than Israel in religion as well as in politics. In Judah there were faithless and idolatrous kings, but there were more faithful and reforming kings than in Israel. There were true prophets of Yahweh in the N, but there were more such prophets in the S, and their messages have been more fully preserved.

A. Rehoboam. King REHOBAM, son of Solomon, forsook the law of the Lord (2 Chr. 12:1), and under him the Judeans worshiped idols on the high places and at sacred trees (1 Ki. 14:23 – 24), even making use of male cult prostitutes. When SHISHAK of Egypt invaded Palestine and the prophet SHEMAIAH rebuked the idolatry of Judah, Rehoboam and the princes humbled themselves before God (2 Chr. 12:5 – 6).

B. Asa. King ASA removed idolatrous images and altars and halted the pagan practice of cultic prostitution (2 Ki. 15:12; 2 Chr. 14:3 – 5). He even deposed his mother from her position as queen mother because of her idolatry and burned the image of the goddess Asherah which she had made (1 Ki. 15:13). Encouraged by the prophet ODED (2 Chr. 15:1 – 7), he summoned the people to renew their covenant with God, and they promised to seek the Lord with all their heart (15:9 – 15). Asa, however, imprisoned the seer HANANI, who had upbraided him for relying on help from Aram instead of on God during a war against the northern kingdom (16:7 – 10).

C. Jehoshaphat. Good King JEHOSHAPHAT also removed pagan shrines and obeyed God's law (1 Ki. 22:46; 2 Chr. 17:6). He inaugurated a program of popular religious education by sending out princes, Levites, and priests with the Book of the Law to teach the people (2 Chr. 17:7 – 9). Furthermore Jehoshaphat reorganized the judicial system of Judah on the basis of judging honestly with the Lord's guidance. In addition to local judges, Jehoshaphat appointed Levites, priests, and heads of families as a supreme court in Jerusalem to judge cases of murder and conflict of laws (2 Chr. 19:4 – 11). Before a battle against the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, Jehoshaphat prayed for God's help, and a Levite, Jehaziel, under the power of the Spirit promised victory (ch. 20). On the other hand, the prophets Jehu (19:1 – 3) and Eliezer (20:37) condemned Jehoshaphat for cooperating with the apostate kings of northern Israel.

D. Athaliah. Since Queen ATHALIAH was probably the daughter of Jezebel, it is not surprising that she followed Jezebel's example and tried to foster Baalism in Judah. She was the wife of King JEHOAM. After the latter's death, she counseled her son King AHAZIAH to do wickedly like the house of Ahab (2 Chr. 22:3). After Jehu killed Ahaziah, she killed all Ahaziah's sons, except for JOASH, and took the royal power herself (2 Ki. 11:1 – 3). Under her patronage there was in Jerusalem a temple of Baal (2 Ki. 11:18). To Baal's temple Athaliah transported some of the treasures from Yahweh's temple (2 Chr. 24:7). Finally, Athaliah and her Baalism were swept away under the leadership of JEHOIADA the high priest of Yahweh (2 Ki. 11:13 – 20).

E. Joash and Jehoiada. After he had crowned the young Joash, Jehoiada the high priest made a covenant with the people that they would be the Lord's people (2 Ki. 11:17). They destroyed Baal's temple and killed his priest (11:18). Yahweh's temple was repaired, and its worship was reorganized (2 Chr. 24:12 – 14). After Jehoiada died, however, Joash fell into idolatry and killed Jehoiada's son ZEDEKIAH because of the latter's rebuke (24:17 – 22).

F. Ahaz. King AHAZ refused to trust in the Lord, as Isaiah urged him to do, when Jerusalem was besieged by the armies of Israel and Aram (Isa. 7:1 – 12). Instead he used some of the treasure of the Lord's temple to buy the help of the king of Assyria (2 Ki. 16:7 – 8). In Jerusalem he set up a new altar copied from an Assyrian model (16:10 – 13). Yahweh's brazen altar he used for divination, doubtless by inspecting the entrails of animals to predict the future as was done in Assyria (16:14 – 15). According to 2 Chr. 28:24, he closed the doors of the temple of Yahweh, halting the regular worship there. He also sacrificed his son, probably to Molech (2 Ki. 16:3), and made images of Baal (2 Chr. 28:2). In other words, Ahaz deserted Yahwism and adopted Assyrian and Canaanite polytheism.

G. Isaiah. In his inaugural vision in the temple, ISAIAH (late 8th cent. B.C.) heard the seraphim praising God, “Holy, holy, holy” (Isa. 6:3). One of Isaiah’s characteristic titles for God is “the holy One of Israel” (1:4; 5:19, 24; 10:20; 12:6; 17:7; 29:19; 30:11 – 12, 15; 31:1; 37:23). That God is holy means that he is highly exalted above his creatures in power and wisdom and also in justice and righteousness (5:16). Yahweh alone is God of all the kingdoms of the earth (37:16), a clear statement of monotheism. God has chosen Israel for special privilege like a son (1:2) or a loved one (5:1 – 7), but he also rules and judges the other nations (10:5 – 9, 13 – 19).

The Holy God demands goodness and justice (Isa. 1:17). He will judge such social sins as murder (1:15, 21; 5:7), stealing (1:23), bribery (1:23; 5:23), oppression of the poor (3:14 – 15; 10:2), luxury (3:16 – 26; 5:9; 32:9 – 12), and drunkenness (5:11 – 12, 22; 28:7). God cannot endure sacrifices, feasts, or even prayers if they are combined with iniquity and murder (1:11 – 15). Idols are only the work of men’s hands, and idolatry will incur God’s judgment (2:8, 10). Because of Israel’s rebelliousness toward God (1:2; 30:1) and injustice toward man, judgment will come upon them (2:6 – 21; 5:24; 9:8-10:4), and they will go into exile (5:13). Only a REMNANT will survive the judgment and will return to God (7:3; 10:20 – 23). To faithful believers Isaiah promised that God will protect them. The faithless Ahaz rejected this promise (7:1 – 11). Later Hezekiah believed Isaiah’s word, and God did destroy the Assyrian army besieging Jerusalem (2 Ki. 19).

At the time of his call, Isaiah had a vision of God as the enthroned King whose glory filled the whole earth (Isa. 6:1, 3), and the prophet looked forward to the messianic kingdom when God’s glory would be manifest everywhere. It will be a kingdom of peace centering in Jerusalem, and all nations will acknowledge God’s law (2:1 – 4). The messianic king, of the line of David, will rule in peace and justice for ever (9:6 – 7). The MESSIAH, endowed with wisdom and power by God’s Spirit, will punish the wicked and give justice to the poor. Everything harmful will be transformed into good, and the earth will be filled with the knowledge of God (11:1 – 9).

H. Micah. According to MICAH, a contemporary of Isaiah, the primary demands of God are not sacrifices, but justice, kindness, and humility before God (Mic. 6:6 – 8). The sins Micah condemns include the idolatry of Samaria (1:5 – 7), oppression of the poor and the weak by the rich (2:1 – 11), extortion by the rulers (3:1 – 4), false predictions of peace by the prophets to get food (3:5 – 8), perversion of justice by the judges to get bribes (3:9 – 10; 7:3), teaching for money by the priests (3:11), false measures used by merchants (6:10 – 11), and murder (7:2). Because of these sins, Micah predicts the destruction of Samaria (1:7) and of Jerusalem (3:12). The Judeans will go as exiles to Babylon (4:10).

Micah looks forward to the universal messianic kingdom of peace (Mic. 4:1 – 3 equals Isa. 2:2 – 4). But he pictures the Messiah from BETHLEHEM (David’s town), not as a king (as Isaiah does), but as a SHEPHERD of his people (5:2 – 4). He also refers to God with the same shepherd imagery (7:4) and is confident that God will show steadfast love and compassion to the remnant of Israel (7:18, 19).

I. Hezekiah. A reforming king, HEZEKIAH destroyed idolatrous shrines and images and also the bronze serpent Moses had made in the wilderness (Num. 21:9), which had become an object of superstitious reverence (2 Ki. 18:4 – 6; see NEHUSHTAN). He opened the doors of the temple of Yahweh, which Ahaz had closed, and ordered that it be cleansed and reconsecrated (2 Chr. 29:3 – 36). The Passover was observed with great celebration, and many from northern Israel as well as from Judah came to Jerusalem to participate (30:1 – 22). Through the prophet Isaiah, God sent assurances to Hezekiah that the Assyrians would not capture Jerusalem (19:6 – 7, 20 – 36) and that he would recover from sickness (2 Ki. 20:1 – 11). Also Isaiah rebuked Hezekiah for boastfully showing his treasures to the Babylonian embassy and warned that these treasures would later be taken as booty to Babylon (20:12 – 19).

J. Manasseh. The many idolatries of King MANASSEH, even within the courts of Yahweh's temple, are listed in 2 Ki. 21:2 – 9 (cf. 23:26 – 27). After he was imprisoned by the Assyrians for revolting, he turned back to the God of his fathers. Manasseh then returned to his throne, removed the idols he had made, and served the Lord at the end of his life (2 Chr. 33:11 – 16).

K. Josiah. King JOSIAH ruled c. 640 – 609 B.C., and his destruction of idolatry was more thorough than any preceding reform (2 Ki. 23:4 – 14; 2 Chr. 34:3 – 7). His abolition of local altars, which were pagan or syncretistic, extended not only throughout Judah but also into northern Israel, including the altar of the golden calf in Bethel (2 Ki. 23:15 – 20; 2 Chr. 34:5 – 6). Also Josiah removed or killed the idolatrous priests (2 Ki. 23:5, 20).

When the temple was cleansed, the Book of the Law was found and brought to Josiah. Many scholars have thought that this book was some form of DEUTERONOMY because Josiah's reforms centralized public worship in Jerusalem. Josiah was much concerned when he heard the punishments threatened in this book (perhaps Deut. 28) if Israel disobeyed God's law (2 Ki. 22:9 – 13). The prophetess HULDAH explained that the threatened judgments would come, but not in Josiah's day because of his piety (22:14 – 20). Josiah then made a covenant before the Lord to keep God's commandments as found in the Book of the Law (2 Chr. 34:31 – 32). Like Hezekiah, Josiah celebrated a memorable Passover in Jerusalem, in which not only Judeans but also Israelites from the N participated (35:1 – 19).

L. Zephaniah. A prophet during the early reign of Josiah, ZEPHANIAH condemned the idolatries of Judah (Zeph. 1:4 – 5), the luxury of the officials (1:8), the accumulation of wealth by the merchants (1:11, 13), the rapaciousness of judges (3:3), the faithlessness of prophets (3:4), and the twisting of the law by the priests (3:4). Because of such sins, a day of wrath would come on Judah and on all nations (1:14 – 18; 2:4 – 15). For those who would escape this wrath God requires obedience, righteousness, and humility (2:3). Zephaniah also foresees a day of joy when the remnant of Israel would be cleansed from their sins and freed from their fears. All nations will join in worshipping the Lord (3:9 – 20).

M. Nahum. The main religious teaching of NAHUM is that, though God is slow to anger, he does eventually judge the nations through the events of history, in this case the destruction of NINEVEH in 612 B.C. Nineveh was the capital of the Assyrians, who had terrorized and plundered the ANE for two hundred years. The obverse message is that by the downfall of Assyria God was bringing peace and freedom to the countries Assyria had oppressed, particularly to Judah (Nah. 1:15).

N. Habakkuk. The book of HABAKKUK deals searchingly with the religious problem of THEODICY, the vindication of the justice of God. The prophet asks why God allows violence, flaunting of the law, and injustice in Judah. God's answer is that he is punishing Judah by means of the conquering Babylonians (Hab. 1:2 – 11). This leaves the prophet with the more difficult problem of why God allows the Babylonians' violence and sins, which are worse than those of Judah. God's answer is twofold. As for the righteous they will survive because of their faith in God and faithfulness to God (2:4; cf. Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38-39). As for the Babylonians, their pride, their plundering, their killing, their destruction of cities and countryside, and their idolatry will lead to inevitable doom (2:5 – 19). On the basis of God's mighty acts in creation and in history (the exodus), the prophet rises to joyful faith in God whatever the immediate physical problems may be (3:2 – 19). He is confident that ultimately the earth will be filled with knowledge of the glory of God (2:14).

O. *Jeremiah. More than any other prophet, JEREMIAH reveals his personal religious experience. At his call Jeremiah objects that he is too young to be a prophet, but God insists and promises to be with him in the ministry of uprooting and planting (Jer. 1:4 – 10). Later Jeremiah makes many complaints, such as that God has deceived him, that everyone mocks him, that he regrets his birth (11:18 – 23; 12:1 – 6; 15:10 – 12, 15 – 18; 17:12 – 18; 18:18 – 23; 20:17 – 18). In reply to such complaints, God promises to strengthen him like a brazen wall (15:19 – 21).

Jeremiah uses various figures to describe God, such as the fountain of living waters (Jer. 2:13), the potter with Israel the clay (18:1 – 12), the husband of Israel (2:2), and the father of the nation (3:19). Like other prophets, Jeremiah condemns the sins of idolatry (2:11, 13; 7:18; 32:29, 34 – 35) and of breaking the ethical laws of the covenant (7:9). More than any other prophet, Jeremiah traces sin back to its source in the wicked heart, the evil thoughts (3:17; 4:14; 5:23; 11:8; 13:10; 17:1, 9; 18:12; 23:17).

The cure for Israel's sin is REPENTANCE and a cleansed heart (Jer. 4:14). No prophet more insistently calls the people to return to God (3:12 – 14; 4:1 – 4; 18:11). Jeremiah seems to have supported the reforms of Josiah based on a return to God's law (22:15 – 16), but later Jeremiah became convinced that the people would not repent any more than a leopard would change its spots (13:23).

Because of Israel's sins and lack of repentance, God has sent and will send judgments upon them. In Jer. 14:1 – 6, 12, a drought and a famine in Judah are described as such a judgment. Jerusalem will be besieged by an enemy (1:13 – 16; 4:11 – 22), identified as NEBUCHADNEZZAR king of Babylon (cf. ch. 25), who is God's servant to chastise Judah. The whole land of Israel will become a ruin, and Judah and other nations will serve the king of Babylon for a period. In predicting capture and captivity for his people, Jeremiah came in conflict with the false prophets who promised peace when no peace was morally or politically possible (6:13 – 15; 8:10 – 12). Such prophets were prophesying lies that came from their own minds, not from God (14:14 – 18; 23:9 – 40; 27; 28). Events proved that Jeremiah was right and these prophets were wrong.

Jeremiah criticizes confidence in the outward forms of Israel's religion and gives to some of these forms a moral meaning. The people thought that God's temple was inviolable and that Jerusalem was safe because of it. But Jeremiah points out that a previous national shrine at Shiloh was destroyed because of the sins of the people (Jer. 7:4, 10, 12, 14; 26:6, 9, 12). The people thought that the performance of the sacrifices guaranteed God's favor. Jeremiah maintains that obedience rather than sacrifice is God's primary requirement (7:21 – 23) and that sacrifice with vile deeds will never save them from judgment (11:15; 14:12). Jeremiah interprets the covenant sign of circumcision as a symbol of cleansing from sin (4:4, 14; 9:26) and of obedience (6:10). When the ark (3:16) is gone (as in the exile), the spiritual reality of God's presence (3:17) will remain.

Jeremiah looks forward to Israel's return to Palestine after the exile (Jer. 30:17 – 22; 32:9 – 44; 33:9 – 12). This return will be not only geographical but also a spiritual return to the Lord in penitence (31:16 – 20). Moreover, Jeremiah foresees a new covenant between God and his people (31:31 – 34; see COVENANT, THE NEW). Then God's law will be inward, written on the heart. The knowledge of God will be universal. The forgiveness of sins will be complete. The rule of the Messiah of David's line will be characterized by justice, righteousness, salvation, and security (23:5 – 6; 30:9, 21; 33:15 – 16). One of his titles will be "The LORD Our Righteousness," indicating that God is the source of salvation (23:6). Not only Judah and Israel but also all nations will join in the worship of the Lord (3:17 – 18).

P. Jehoiakim. King JEHOIAKIM persecuted the true prophets and rejected their messages. He killed the prophet URIAH because the latter warned of coming judgment on Judah (Jer. 26:20 – 23). Jeremiah's scroll denouncing Judah's sins and calling for repentance was cut up and burned by Jehoiakim, who vainly tried to arrest the prophet (36:20 – 26).

Q. Zedekiah. The prophet EZEKIEL describes the idolatry and moral degeneracy of Jerusalem during ZEDEKIAH'S reign (Ezek. 5 – 11). Zedekiah sought Jeremiah's advice, but because of popular pressure, he was not willing to follow the submission to Babylon that Jeremiah counseled (Jer. 26:12 – 15; 38:14 – 28). Jeremiah condemned Zedekiah for making a covenant to free Hebrew slaves (cf. Exod. 21:2; Deut. 15:12) and then failing to carry out this promise made before God (Jer. 34:8 – 22). Zedekiah is condemned also for revolting and so breaking the covenant in God's name to be a vassal of the king of Babylon (2 Chr. 36:13; Ezek. 17:13 – 19). According to 2 Chr. 36:13 – 16, Zedekiah's failure to turn to God, the idolatry of the people and even of the priests, and their rejection of the warnings of the prophets were the theological reasons for the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of Judah.

VIII. Religion during the exile and the restoration. Deprived of their historic rituals and unable to follow their usual religious patterns, the exiles were compelled to adopt new forms of worship. Those who had learned the spiritual lessons of the EXILE were ready to follow the teachings of EZEKIEL, who directed them to a rigid monotheism and encouraged a high standard of personal and social morality. It is a testimony to his diligence that pagan practices ceased among the faithful remnant in Babylonia for all intents and purposes. Because worship of the old semipagan type was impossible under the conditions of captivity, a degree of adaptation was a pressing necessity in the expression of Israel's historic faith.

The work of Ezekiel marked an important turning point in Hebrew religion, since it coincided with the breaking of the connection between the service of God and the outward form in which it had for many centuries found its embodiment. Under the new situation, it was necessary to improvise in worship and devise new means of expressing spiritual loyalty to God. Memorial celebrations replaced the preexilic feasts, and acts of special significance for the covenant relationship such as circumcision were stressed anew. Open-air meetings by the KEBAR canal replaced gatherings in the temple and its precincts, and a nonsacrificial type of worship stressed confession, fasting, prayer, and the reading of the law.

The book of DANIEL indicates that the Babylonians were quite tolerant toward the Jewish captives, and even permitted gifted individuals, such as Daniel, to exert authority in the kingdom. Consequently the Jews did not suffer religious persecution as such during the exile, despite the aim of the faithful community to differentiate itself as much as possible from its pagan neighbors. With the growth of house gatherings and the importance attached to the knowledge and observance of the Torah, the basis was laid for subsequent synagogue worship after the return. Of concern to Ezekiel in particular was the role of the Levites, for unlike Jeremiah, who entertained a covenant with the Levitical priests (Jer. 33:17 – 22), Ezekiel distinguished sharply between the Levitical priests and the Levites (Ezek. 40:46; 43:19). He described the former as the “sons of Zadok” who had remained faithful to God (40:46; 44:15; 48:11), distinguishing them from the Levites, whom he regarded as having gone astray after idols and therefore as unsuited for handling sacred things or approaching the altar (44:10 – 14). This concept seems to return to the careful distinction between priest and Levite found in Numbers, as a corrective to the rather more lax attitudes of the monarchy.

With the return from exile began the growth of JUDAISM proper. The returned community assumed the form of a theocracy, making it a church rather than a nation in the strictest sense. It felt itself to be the remnant of Israel, brought by divine grace from bondage in a new exodus and summoned to live once again by the precepts of divine law as the people of God. Cultic personnel were prominent in the lists of repatriates, with Levites, priestly families, and temple servants (NETHINIM) returning under JOSHUA and ZERUBBABEL (Ezra 2). The number of priests was considerably larger than that of Levites, perhaps because many of the latter adopted priestly status. The other Levites responsible for menial duties in the temple were apparently reluctant to return with their compatriots (Ezra 8:15 – 20).

At the laying of the foundation of the second temple, the Levites played a prominent part (Ezra 3:8 – 10) and were also conspicuous when the finished structure was dedicated (6:16 – 20). The books of HAGGAI and ZECHARIAH show that the initial enthusiasm of the repatriates had waned somewhat, requiring considerable stimulation before the new temple was built. The prophecy of MALACHI shows that, about 450 B.C., the Jerusalem priesthood was once again in decline (Mal. 2:1 – 9) and was beginning to exhibit some of those features that had found such fatal expression in the preexilic period. The work of EZRA and NEHEMIAH brought these tendencies to a halt, however, and gave characteristic expression to the concept that the divine will was to be proclaimed to the Jewish commonwealth through the priesthood. Ezra was particularly concerned to see that the latter was a suitable vehicle for the task, and accordingly some of his more urgent reforms were directed at the priests. After recruiting the Levites to his side (Ezra 8:15 – 20), he instituted a reform to ban marriage with non-Jewish women, a move that affected both priests and Levites (9:1 – 2; 10:5 – 44).

Under Nehemiah, the priests and Levites carried on with their full range of duties. Once a section of the wall had been repaired (Neh. 3:17), the Levites occupied themselves with instructing the people in the law (8:7 – 9), and in general participation in the religious life of the nation (11:3; 12:27). The need for strong central enforcement of the Levitical regulations became apparent after Nehemiah had left Jerusalem for a time and certain abuses crept back into the cultus. Thus TOBIAH the Ammonite was allowed to occupy the area in the temple that should have served as a storeroom for the Levitical tithes (13:4 – 5). Because they were deprived of the allotted revenue (10:37 – 39; 12:47), the Levites had forsaken the temple and had gone to work their lands so as to sustain themselves (13:10), a situation which Nehemiah rectified on his return to Jerusalem. In the theocracy, the high priesthood returned to the historic house of ELEAZAR, third son of AARON, in the person of Zadok, and his descendants retained the office continuously until 171 B.C., when it was transferred to MENELAUS by ANTIOCHUS IV.

IX. The rise of Judaism. The aspirations of Ezekiel in this direction for the new commonwealth died hard, and even after 171 B.C., a Zadokite priesthood controlled the Jewish temple at Leontopolis in Egypt until the building was closed by VESPASIAN soon after A.D. 70. The religious community at QUMRAN rejected the contemporary Jerusalem priesthood in favor of a Zadokite regime, and looked forward confidently to the time when the Zadokites would again be priests in Jerusalem (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS).

In the solemn covenant with Ezra, the nation saw as its spiritual ideal the realizing of the covenant concept of a “kingdom of priests and a holy nation” (Exod. 19:6). It was a community whose interests were governed by covenant and law, both of which were necessary if the life and witness of the theocracy was not to be threatened once more by pagan influences. The incursions of HELLENISM in the Greek period presented a serious challenge to the very existence of Judaism, but the emphasis that Ezra had placed upon the covenant, the Torah, and other distinctively Jewish institutions proved to be the salvation of the theocracy. As the Jews were in danger of being swallowed up by the pagan nations that surrounded them (cf. Neh. 13:15 – 31), it was necessary for Judaism to remain as distinctive as possible in its outlook. The emphasis that Ezekiel laid upon attention to ritual requirements in the worship of the temple was given prominence in the cultus, and served as an effective safeguard against further infiltrations of paganism.

None of the postexilic prophets, however, ever suggested that correctness of ritual would be acceptable to God as a substitute for proper moral and spiritual attitudes. The principles of Judaism were fostered by the weekly worship of the SYNAGOGUE, an institution that more than any other gave character to the Jewish faith and brought people in all parts of the land into contact with their religious leaders. The synagogue became the cradle of an entirely new kind of social and religious life, and established the foundation for a spiritual community of universal scope. The early Christian church was quick to capitalize on this situation, and the book of Acts shows the significant role played by the synagogue in the propagation of the new messianic faith.

Typical of developed Judaism was the stress on the keeping of the Torah. To clarify obscurities in the written law there arose a body of oral teaching that gradually acquired a status equivalent to that of the Mosaic enactments themselves. This tradition served to safeguard the provisions of the Torah lest they be broken through ignorance or inadvertence. For Judaism, the law exemplified the ideal concept of a people dedicated to the service of God. Although cultic rites were prominent in the postexilic period, the emphasis in spirituality shifted so that Judaism became a religion of the book, namely that of the law. A class of SCRIBES arose in the pre-Christian period who were experts in the study of the Torah and prominent in synagogue worship as a result. After A.D. 70, they became increasingly important for the way they preserved in written form the oral law and transmitted with great fidelity the Hebrew Scriptures. See MISHNAH; TALMUD.

One of the pre-Christian political parties, that of the SADDUCEES, was important because of its connection with the high priesthood in NT times. Both the name and origin of the party are disputed, but they seem to have been a priestly aristocracy of rather boorish disposition that came to prominence under the HASMONEAN rulers until the reign of Salome ALEXANDRA (76 – 67 B.C.), who preferred the PHARISEES. The Sadducees were highly conservative, attributing divine authority only to the Torah, and rejecting any form of doctrine that could not find support therein. Although a religious minority in NT times, they monopolized the office of high priest, and thus were involved in the condemnation of Christ.

The other chief political party in the pre-Christian era, the Pharisees, laid great emphasis upon the keeping of the Torah and its traditional exposition in the belief that the Babylonian exile had been caused by the failure of the nation to observe the Mosaic law at both individual and corporate levels.

Whereas the Sadducees held that temple worship was the center and main purpose of the law, the Pharisees stressed the individual fulfillment of all aspects of the law, of which cultic worship was only one part, since for them inner attitudes were manifested in outward disposition.

The attempt to safeguard the faith from the inroads of Hellenism led to a growing particularism within Judaism that fostered the idea that Israel alone was the elect of God. Jews tended to draw apart from Gentiles out of self-defense, and even separated from those of their own number who succumbed to the blandishments of Greek culture. On the other hand, the universalism implicit in the ancient monotheistic faith found periodic expression. Proselytes were welcomed into Judaism (cf. Zech. 8:20 – 23) and were given equality before the law in accord with the ancient traditions of Moses (cf. Lev. 19:34; 24:22). By the time of the NT era, a great many converts to Judaism had been made in this manner, although the Jews of the theocracy followed their ancestors in refusing to become an active missionary force in contemporary society.

For orthodox Jews, postexilic doctrine was uniformly monotheistic in emphasis, with the sovereignty and power of God claiming special prominence. In the period between the Testaments there arose an increasing interest in the role of angelic beings. The Qumran sect saw the world as the focal point of conflict between good and evil forces, without, however, entertaining any DUALISM of a Persian character. Orthodox belief held unshakably to the conviction that the God of the Fathers was sovereign in all things and just in all his doings.

From this period emerged also a belief in the existence of PARADISE as an abode of the faithful after death. Although the term paradise occurred in the OT (Neh. 2:8; Eccl. 2:5; Cant. 4:13) it was not used there in any eschatological sense. The belief had its roots in the concept of primeval bliss, but was expanded to include speculations concerning a glorious messianic future. The coming age of grace and glory would have a great deal in common with the Garden of Eden of antiquity, but the Jews also held that paradise was present in their own time, although concealed. This location was the present abode of the ancient patriarchs, and would be the place where the chosen of the present and future would go at death. In the NT (Lk. 23:43), Christ used the term for the location of the soul immediately after death (cf. 16:19 – 31), thereby supporting earlier ideas of the survival of the human personality beyond physical decease. See INTERMEDIATE STATE.

The future hope of Judaism seems to have been a matter of some interest and concern throughout the intertestamental period. Apostate Jews had become involved in the political life of Judea to the point where, in the HASMONEAN period, they were supporting the persecution of their compatriots. For them the traditional faith was bereft of value, and all that lay ahead was an uncertain materialism. Those Jews who were faithful to the ancestral traditions valued the teachings of the synagogue equally with the elaborate cultic rituals of the second temple which, under the Herods, was extended as a political gesture of appeasement. Hope for the future also focused on the person of the Messiah.

From the time of the early monarchy (2 Sam. 7:12 – 16), a promise had been made by God to the nation that from the house of David would emerge a stable kingdom and throne. Although the Davidic dynasty faced many a crisis, the hope of a royal personage from the renowned house survived all the vicissitudes of history. The MESSIAH or “anointed one” was also depicted under such figures as the Servant (Isa. 42:1; 49:5; et al.), who was identified with the Davidic Messiah (55:3 – 4); the Anointed Conqueror, who would make Israel supreme over the Gentiles (60:1 – 22); the Branch (Jer. 23:5 – 6; Zech. 3:8; et al.), who was the Messiah in his kingly and priestly offices; and the Son of Man (Dan. 7:1 – 28), a messianic individual who, although man, originated with God. In the fullness of time, this figure was completely perfected in Jesus Christ. In him the aspirations of ancient Israel were fulfilled, and through him and his church, the Israel of the Spirit, the benefits of the new covenant were given to the world, in a manner that realized the missionary destiny so long neglected in ancient Israelite religious life.

X. Israel's main religious beliefs

A. God's revelation, acts, qualities, and nature. Israel's God was a dynamic and articulate Being who spoke to his creatures and manifested himself to them in many different ways. God shows his power and wisdom generally through nature, which is his CREATION, and through his deeds in history. In nature the heavens are telling the glory of God (Ps. 19:1). After describing the winds and the rain, the plants and the animals, the psalmist exclaims, "How many are your works, O LORD! In wisdom you made them all" (104:24). In history God shows his control over men and nations and events; for example, in the deliverance of Israel from Egypt, the saving of Jerusalem from the Assyrians in the time of Hezekiah, and the punitive destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in the time of Zedekiah.

In special revelations God sometimes shows himself in visible manifestations or theophanies. For example, he appears to Abraham in human form, receives Abraham's hospitality, and talks with him (Gen. 18). Sometimes God appears as "the angel of the Lord" who identifies himself with God (e.g., Exod. 3:2, 6). A more vague manifestation of God is his "glory," which on Sinai resembled fire (24:16 – 17). God sometimes reveals his will or the future by dreams or visions. Dreamers are recognized in the law as recipients of messages from God (Deut. 13:1 – 5), and Solomon received God's promise of wisdom in a dream (1 Ki. 3:5). A vision is some supernatural seeing, as when Isaiah had the vision of the Lord in the temple (Isa. 6). Israelites also believed that God revealed his will through the URIM AND THUMMIM, small objects kept in the breastplate of the high priest's ephod (Exod. 28:30). These sacred lots were used to decide between alternatives (1 Sam. 14:41). With the rise of personal prophetism in Israel, the more mechanical Urim and Thummim were less used. Sometimes God's REVELATION was spoken in words like the Decalogue (Exod. 20:1); Moses is said to have written God's words (24:3 – 4).

Most noteworthy in Israel was INSPIRATION, that is, internal and personal revelation to and through prophets. The prophet was God's messenger, God's mouthpiece (Jer. 15:19). So the prophet could say, "This is what the LORD says" (e.g., Amos 1:3 and often). There were prophets, for example, in ancient Byblos and Mari; but their function was to offer advice in specific situations. The depth and breadth of the theological and ethical teaching of Israel's prophets are unmatched in the ANE.

Many of God's statements about himself (e.g., Josh. 24:2 – 13) and many of Israel's confessions of faith (e.g., Deut. 26:5 – 15) deal primarily with God's actions. (1) Deliverer. In the introduction to the Decalogue, God says, "I am the LORD your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the land of slavery" (Exod. 20:2). God is also the deliverer of the believer from enemies, as in the case of David (Ps. 18), and from sickness, as with Hezekiah (2 Ki. 20:1 – 11). (2) Creator. The Decalogue states that God created the heavens, the earth, the sea, and all that is in them (Exod. 20:11). God created by his word (Gen. 1:3 and often), by his Spirit (Ps. 104:30), and by wisdom (Prov. 8:22 – 31). New life depends on the continued creative activity of God (Ps. 104:30). (3) Provider. The Israelites in offering the firstfruits of the harvest acknowledged that God was the ultimate giver of crops (Deut. 26:10). God also provided for special needs as he gave water, manna, and quail to the Israelites in the wilderness. (4) Lord and ruler. God controls the forces of nature, as in the plagues of Egypt. He directs the lives of individuals, commissioning Moses to free the Israelites (Exod. 3 – 4). He manages the nations, bringing the Israelites from Egypt and the Philistines from Caphtor (Amos 9:7). God's kingdom rules over all (Ps. 103:19). (5) Righteous judge. The Decalogue mentions God's activity in punishing iniquity (Exod. 20:5). He punishes individuals like Saul and David. The prophets often picture God as a judge trying Israel (Isa. 1; Jer. 2; Mic. 6). Ultimately God will judge all nations (Ps. 96; Isa. 24:1, 6, 16 – 23).

God also reveals much about his qualities. (1) Power. The power of God over nature and human beings is shown in such acts as creation, the flood, the crossing of the Red Sea, and the provision of water and manna for the Israelites in the wilderness. The regular forces of nature, such as the wind and the rain, also are demonstrations of his power (Ps. 104). Thus his power is used morally, sometimes in the provision for human needs, sometimes in saving the righteous, sometimes in judgment on the wicked. (2) Knowledge. God knows the actions and even the thoughts of every individual (Ps. 139:1 – 6). Since God knows the future, he can declare to his prophets things to come (1 Sam. 10:2 – 6; 2 Ki. 19:7, 32 – 34). “His understanding has no limit” (Ps. 147:5). (3) Omnipresence. God is active everywhere through his Spirit (Ps. 139:7). He is a God at hand, filling heaven and earth (Jer. 23:23 – 24). Because God is everywhere, no image can adequately represent him or localize him. (4) Eternity. “From everlasting to everlasting you are God” (Ps. 90:2). “But you, O LORD, sit enthroned forever” (102:12). (5) Moral attributes. A list of God's moral attributes that reveal his “name” or personality is found in Exod. 34:6 – 7: merciful, gracious, slow to anger, abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness, forgiving, and punishing iniquity. It is noteworthy that this list stresses the goodness much more than the wrath of God. (6) Holiness. The holiness of God is his “otherness and perfection when compared with all created things” (W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, 2 vols. [1961 – 67], 1:273). Holiness expresses the awesome superiority of God not only in power but also in goodness (Lev. 19:2; Isa. 5:16; 6:1 – 5).

Israelite religion is more concerned with the actions and character of God than with his essence, which remains a mystery. Two aspects of God's nature, however, are apparent in his revelations to Israel. (1) God is personal. He plans, he loves and hates, he acts. He speaks, hears, and sees. He is living (Deut. 5:26). Yahweh differs from the pagan gods, who often are only personifications of natural forces. Some have said that Israel's God was anthropomorphic, like man (see ANTHROPOMORPHISM). In Israelite terms this likeness is expressed by the reverse comparison: man is theomorphic, like God in personality. (2) God is one. Here also Israelite religion differed from the surrounding polytheisms. The oneness of Yahweh, taken in conjunction with his activities such as creator and ruler of all, certainly implies monotheism, which becomes explicit in Amos and Isaiah. If Yahweh is the only real God, he cannot but be jealous of the worship of idols, which are no gods. Finally, though God is one, some references in the OT to his Spirit, his word, and his wisdom, and to the angel of the Lord imply a complexity in the divine unity.

B. God's relationships. God created the heavens and the earth and everything in them (Gen. 1). He also controls the world and supports its creatures and ongoing processes (Gen. 8:12; Job 38 – 41; Ps. 74:16 – 17; 104). In the messianic kingdom peace will be established among animals as well as among human beings (Isa. 11:6 – 9).

God sends superhuman creatures called angels as his messengers to encourage and protect the righteous (Josh. 5:13 – 15; Ps. 34:7) or to destroy the wicked (2 Sam. 24:16; 2 Ki. 19:35). Angels also offer praise to God (Ps. 148:2). The ministers of God called cherubim (Gen. 3:24) and seraphim (Isa. 6:2, 3) were later classified as angels. See ANGEL; CHERUB; SERAPH.

In the prologue of the book of JOB (whose dates of origin and of composition are uncertain), SATAN, the accuser of Job and the cause of his troubles, acts only by permission of God. God finally turns Satan's evil to a good end for Job. Two preexilic figures were later identified with Satan: the tempting serpent in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 3) and the Day Star fallen from heaven (Isa. 14:12). The doctrine of Satan was more developed in postexilic times.

God made man, male and female, in his image. One aspect of man's likeness to God is the dominion God has given him over the earth and its creatures (Gen. 1:27 – 28). We are intended to obey, worship, and love God (Deut. 6:4 – 5). Man has rebelled against God (Gen. 3), but if a person confesses his sin and repents from the heart, God will forgive him (Ps. 32; 51).

One answer to the problem of suffering is that it is God's punishment of sin (Gen. 3:15 – 19). Often specific suffering is a punishment for specific sins (Deut. 28; Jdg. 2:11 – 15; 2 Sam. 12:14 – 18; Hos. 8:7). Some, like Job's three friends, made the false deduction that all suffering is punishment for specific sins (Job 4:7 – 9; 8:4 – 6; 22:21 – 29), but this deduction is rejected by God himself (42:8). A further explanation of suffering is given in the prologue of Job (Job 1 – 2): that God sometimes permits suffering as a means through which a believer can give a witness of disinterested faith before the world. Still another view of suffering is that God uses it to humble our pride and teach us our need of him. This disciplinary aspect of suffering is presented to Job by Elihu (chs. 32 – 37). Another attitude toward suffering is to admit that we cannot understand all the reasons for suffering and to have faith that the wise and good God is doing right (42:1 – 6).

God's election of Israel began with the call and promises of blessing to their ancestor Abraham. God gave to Israel special privileges in the exodus, the covenant at Sinai to be their God, the law, and in the conquest of Canaan. God's special concern for Israel also was shown in the warnings and instruction of the prophets. The prophets interpreted the exile as a punishment of Israel's sins, but also promised that a remnant would return.

But God also has an interest in the NATIONS. He created Adam, from whom all nations are descended. God promised that through Abraham's descendants all nations would receive blessing. God watches over the history of nations, moving the Philistines from Caphtor and the Arameans from Kir (Amos 9:7). God judges the nations for their sins (Amos 1:1—2:3; Isa. 13 – 19), but he also uses Assyria (Isa. 10:5) and Babylonia (Jer. 25:9) as instruments for disciplining other nations including Israel. Eventually all nations will have a part in the worship of the Lord and in the universal blessings of the messianic kingdom of peace (Isa. 2:2 – 4; Jer. 3:17; 16:19; Zeph. 3:9, 10).

C. Israel's duty to God. Israel is to pay obedience to the law and to wisdom, both of which come from God. While the law deals primarily with religious and civil matters, PROVERBS emphasizes personal affairs, like family relationships, friendship, honesty, industriousness, chastity, and sobriety. The fear and love of God and love and justice to one's neighbor are basic principles of both law and wisdom (Deut. 6:4; Lev. 19:18; Prov. 1:7).

Israel is also instructed to worship God. The rituals, place, and priestly personnel of sacrificial worship as found in Exodus and Leviticus are outlined above. Sacrifices had the value of teaching the need for confession, atonement, forgiveness, dedication, and fellowship with God. The prophets stressed obedience (1 Sam. 15:22) and steadfast love (Hos. 6:6) as more basic requirements than sacrifice. According to Ps. 51:17, the sacrifice God most desires from a sinner is a contrite heart. To understand the meaning of Israelite worship one must turn to the PSALMS, the hymnbook and prayerbook of Israel. The Hebrew name of this book means "praises," and in the Psalms God is praised for his greatness and his grace (Ps. 116 – 118; 146 – 150), for his works in nature (19; 104).

and in history (105 – 106), for his word (19; 119), and for forgiveness (32). The psalmists pray for forgiveness (6; 25; 32; 38; 51; 130; 143), for deliverance from disease (88), and from enemies (35; 69; 109). Many of the psalms express joy in worship: “I rejoiced with those who said to me, ‘Let us go to the house of the LORD’” (122:1).

D. The future. Certain indications point to Israel’s belief in the personal conscious existence of a man’s spirit after DEATH. The burial of a body was considered very important (Gen. 23; 2 Sam. 21:13 – 14). Death is sometimes described as being gathered to one’s fathers (Gen. 25:8). The very forbidding of necromancy (Lev. 20:27) indicates that the spirits of the dead were considered to have a conscious existence. The place of the spirits of the dead was SHEOL, in the depths of the earth (Deut. 32:22), sometimes pictured as a gloomy place (Job 10:21 – 22). On the other hand, it is implied that the future life holds a reward for Enoch (Gen. 5:24) and Elijah (2 Ki. 2:11). Finally, some passages in the Psalms point to a joyous future life in the presence of God (Ps. 16:10 – 11; 49:15; 73:24).

The time of final judgment is called “the day of the Lord” or “the day.” All nations will be included in this judgment, and all God’s enemies will be destroyed (Isa. 13:9 – 16; 24:21 – 22; Zeph. 1:14 – 18; 3:8). The final kingdom of God will be characterized by peace (Isa. 2:4). All harmful things in nature will be transformed to good (11:6 – 9). Death and sorrow will be no more (25:8). The kingdom will be inaugurated with a great feast (25:6). Both Israel and the nations will join in the worship of the Lord and in obedience to his law (2:2 – 3). The king of the line of David will be endowed by the Spirit with wisdom and power. He will rule with justice and righteousness for ever (Isa. 9:5 – 6; 11:1 – 5). His name, his qualities, will be “Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace” (Isa. 9:6).

Ketef Hinnom tombs (Jerusalem, c. 600 B.C.). Within Israelite religion, burial of the body was considered very important.

E. Conclusion: Permanent and temporary in the religion of Israel. Some aspects of the religion of Israel are of permanent validity for the Christian. First is the OT teaching about God, that he is one, personal, good, and just, that he created and rules the world, guides human history, and answers prayer. Another is the Israelite belief about man, that he was created in the image of God, that he is a sinner, that he can be forgiven and transformed by the grace of God. The moral law is the best guide to satisfying individual and social life. The hope of the Israelite, like that of the Christian, is that God’s kingdom will come. The above beliefs are assumed in the NT and are basic for understanding the NT.

From a Christian standpoint, some temporary aspects of Israelite religion have been abolished or fulfilled in the NT. The oft-repeated sacrifices of animals have been fulfilled in the one sacrifice of Christ. The sometimes narrow nationalism of Israel has given way to the conviction that Jew and Gentile can be united in Christ. The OT concern with ceremonial defilement is replaced in the NT by an emphasis on moral purity. The distinction between clean and unclean foods that separated Israelites from Gentiles is no longer appropriate in the international fellowship of the CHURCH. The old covenant with its law written on stone has been replaced by a new covenant whose law of love is written on the heart. The dimness of the OT view of immortality has been illuminated by the RESURRECTION of Christ. The Israelite hope that the Messiah would come has become reality in Jesus, IMMANUEL, “God with us” (Matt. 1:23). The prophetic promise of the outpouring of God’s Spirit (Joel 2:28 – 29) has been fulfilled in PENTECOST (Acts 2) and in the continuing experience of God’s people in the church. Israelite iz’ray-uh-lit. One who belongs to the nation of ISRAEL. The gentilic Hebrew form yiśrē’ēlī H3778 occurs only four times (twice feminine and once masculine in Lev. 24:10 – 11 [KJV, “Israelitish”]; and masculine also in a textually uncertain passage, 2 Sam. 17:25 [NRSV “Ishmaelite,” on the basis of 1 Chr. 2:17]). The corresponding Greek form, Israēlitēs G2703, occurs nine times in the NT (Jn. 1:47; Acts 2:22; et al.). The KJV uses “Israelites” in some passages to render the Hebrew yiśrā’ēl H3776 (particularly if it is the subject of a plural verb; e.g., Josh. 3:17), or the singular “Israelite” to render ’išyi#347;rā’ēl, “a man of Israel” (Num. 25:14). In addition, modern versions frequently use the term to render the phrase bēnē-yiśrā’ēl, “sons/children of Israel” (Gen. 32:32 et al.).

Issachar is'uh-kahr' (יששכר H3779 [Qere ישכר]), possibly “a man of [or there is] hire/reward”). (1) The ninth son of JACOB and the fifth of LEAH (Gen. 30:18; 35:23). (2) Seventh son of OBED-EDOM, included in the list of divisions of the Korahite doorkeepers in the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:5). The rest of this article is devoted to Issachar son of Jacob.

Issachar had four sons and with them went down into Egypt with Jacob (Gen. 46:13; Exod. 1:3). Practically nothing is preserved of the personal history of the patriarch beyond his share in the common actions of the sons of Jacob. Issachar died in Egypt and was buried there; his descendants formed a tribe, consisting of five great tribal families (Num. 26:23 – 24). At Sinai the tribe of Issachar numbered 54,400 men of war over twenty years of age (1:29); at the end of the wanderings, the number had grown to 64,300 (26:25). The place of Issachar in the desert march was with the standard of the tribe of JUDAH (along with ZEBULUN) on the E side of the TABERNACLE (2:5); this group formed the vanguard of the host (10:14 – 17). Igal, son of Joseph, was Issachar's representative to spy out the land of Canaan (13:7).

Issachar.

Although a dozen or more towns are listed in Josh. 19:17 – 23 as belonging to Issachar, the location of most of these is uncertain. In the ceremony described in Deut. 27 – 28, it was the tribe of Issachar, along with several other tribes, who stood upon Mount Gerizim “to bless the people” (27:11). The territory of Issachar lay S of Zebulun and NAPHHTALI, and N of MANASSEH. On the E it was bounded by the Jordan. Whether it ever reached the sea is uncertain (Deut. 33:18 – 19); it probably remained an inland tribe. Its lot included the very fertile plain of ESDRAELON, but this area for the most part remained in the possession of the Canaanites. See TRIBES, LOCATION OF.

TOLA, one of the JUDGES, was from Issachar (Jdg. 10:10) as were two kings, BAASHA and his son ELAH (1 Ki. 15:27; 16:6). DEBORAH and BARAK belonged to Issachar; and in Deborah’s song (Jdg. 5:15), the tribe is mentioned as having taken part in the battle against SISERA. The battle took place on the plain of Issachar, and the victory secured free passage between the Israelites in the hill country of Ephraim and those in Galilee.

In the time of DAVID, the tribe of Issachar numbered 87,000 (1 Chr. 7:5). Of the 200 “heads” of the men of Issachar who came to David at Hebron it is said that they were men “who understood the times and knew what Israel should do” (1 Chr. 12:32). In Solomon’s arrangement of administrative districts, Issachar’s territory formed an independent province (1 Ki. 4:17). In the arrangement of 1 Chr. 4 – 7, the extended genealogy of Issachar may be found in 7:1 – 5, whereas that of Zebulun is missing. A company from Issachar came to the celebration of the PASSOVER when it was restored by HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 30:18). In the ideal division of the land according to the vision of Ezek. 48:25, the territory of Issachar lies between that of Simeon and of Zebulun; these three tribes have the three gates on the S side of the new Jerusalem named after them (Ezek. 48:33). The tribe of Issachar is also mentioned in Rev. 7:7, where it is said that 12,000 were sealed.

Isshiah i-shi”uh (יִשְׁיָהּ) H3807, short form of יִשְׁיָהוּ H3808 [used in 1 Chr. 12:6], probably “Yahweh forgets”; see ISHIAH). TNIV Ishiah. (1) Son of Izrahiah and descendant of ISSACHAR; a military chief (1 Chr. 7:3 [KJV, “Ishiah”]).

(2) One of several Korahite warriors who joined DAVID at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:6 [KJV, “Jesiah”]; cf. vv. 1 – 2). These soldiers may have been Levites from the family of KORAH, but some argue that the reference is to a different Korah or even to a locality in the tribe of BENJAMIN.

(3) Son of Uzziel and descendant of LEVI (1 Chr. 23:20 [KJV, “Jesiah”]; 24:25).

(4) Son of Rehabiah and descendant of Levi (1 Chr. 24:21).

Isshijah i-shi’juh. See ISHIAH.

issue of blood. See DISEASE.

Istalcurus is’tuhl-kyoor’uhs (Ἰσταλκούρος) Descendant of Bigvai and father of Uthai, who was among those who returned from the EXILE (1 Esd. 8:40). It is possible, however, that “Uthai the son of Istalcurus” is a corruption of “Uthai and Zaccur” in the parallel passage (Ezra 8:14).

Itala version. See VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE, ANCIENT, II.A.

Italian Regiment (σπεῖρα Ἰταλική). Also Italian Band, Italian Cohort. A unit of the Roman army to which CORNELIUS, who was a CENTURION, belonged (Acts 10:1). Because there is no direct evidence for any such regiment at the time, some have doubted the story of Cornelius (cf. HJP, rev. ed. [1973 – 87], 1:365 and 366 n. 60). Several inscriptions, however, attest that a force called cohors II Italica was stationed in Syria from at least A.D. 69 and possibly earlier. It would have been composed, at least originally, of as many as 1000 troops mustered in Italy and holding Roman citizenship (however, see Marble statue of Septimius Severus (emperor A.D. 193 – 211) in military dress. Cornelius, a member of the Roman army stationed in Judea, would have worn a similar uniform.

F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles: The Greek Text with Introduction and Commentary, 3rd ed. [1990], 252). Some have thought that an Italian cohort was indeed stationed in CAESAREA around A.D. 40 or that Cornelius (perhaps retired?) happened to be in this city at the time even though the unit may have been on duty elsewhere (see T. R. S. Broughton in BC, 5:441 – 43). See also AUGUSTAN COHORT.

Italy it'uh-lee (Ἰταλία G2712). The name Italia is likely a hellenized form of an old Italic word, Vitelia, “[land of] calves.” It was originally applied to the southern tip or “toe” of the peninsula, and then extended gradually with the unification of the peninsula under Roman power (see ROME). Northern Italy (Cisalpine Gaul) was not incorporated and included under the name until the time of AUGUSTUS. It was only then that Italy first reached its Alpine frontiers. Italy is mentioned three times by Luke, once in connection with PRISCILLA AND AQJILA, who had to leave the country when CLAUDIUS expelled the Jews (Acts 18:2), and twice in connection with PAUL’S voyage to Rome (27:1, 6); it is also mentioned once by the author of HEBREWS when conveying greetings from Italian friends to his readers (Heb. 13:24), an important detail for determining the historical context of the epistle.

The leg-shaped peninsula is less than 700 mi. long and in breadth never more than 150 mi., except in the northern plain. The Alps form a northern barrier, but not impassable, as Hannibal demonstrated. The northern plain, wide open to invasion, lies between the Alps and the Apennines. This chain branches from the Alps near Genoa, thus eastward to bound old Cisalpine Gaul, rises in height, and sweeps southeastward toward the Adriatic coast, and forms a spine for the peninsula. The mountains, and the plains which they enclose, form the Italian landscape, the former beautiful but infertile, the latter rich and productive, and well watered. Timber, in early days, was abundant, and Italy has always grown the olive and the vine, temperate fruits, and cereals in rich quantity.

Hence the attraction that the peninsula held for invaders, the Etruscans from Asia Minor, as well as the Latins, Oscans, and Umbrians (three branches of Indo-European stock), and other groups of migrants, including the founders of the chain of Greek cities around the southern coasts. The Latin stock, from their enclave around the Tiber, prevailed. Seven centuries of expansion resulted in Rome's political unification of the most strategically located of the Mediterranean peninsulas, the key, as demonstrated from the days of Carthage to the Second World War, to the possession of the central Mediterranean. (See E. T. Salmon, The Making of Roman Italy [1982]; T. W. Potter, Roman Italy [1987].)

itch. See DISEASE.

Ithai ith'i (אִתַּי H416, variant אִתִּי H915, possibly “[God is] with me”; see ITHIEL). Son of Ribai, a Benjamite from GIBEAH; he was numbered among DAVID'S mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:29 [most versions, ITTAI]; 1 Chr. 11:31).

Ithamar ith'uh-mahr (אִתְּמָר H418, derivation uncertain; see HALOT, 1:44, ABD, 3:579). Youngest son of AARON and Elisheba (Exod. 6:23; Num. 3:2; 1 Chr. 6:3; 24:1). Together with his three brothers (ELEAZAR, NADAB, and ABIHU) and Aaron, Ithamar was consecrated to the priesthood (Exod. 28:1). His two elder brothers, Nadab and Abihu, were slain for offering strange fire (Lev. 10; cf. Num. 3:4; 26:61; 1 Chr. 24:2).

During the wilderness wanderings he was leader over all the Levites (Exod. 38:21), and more specifically over the Gershonites (Num. 4:28) and the Merarites (4:33; 7:8). He founded a priestly family, to which ELI and his descendants belonged (1 Chr. 24:4 – 6). Because of this connection, some scholars believe that a conflict developed between the descendants of Ithamar and those of Eleazar (the Zadokites; cf. ABD, 3:579 – 81). According to Ezra 8:2, the family of Ithamar continued after the captivity.

L. L. WALKER

Ithiel ith'ee-uhl (אִתְּיֵל H417, “God is with me”). (1) Son of Jeshaiiah, descendant of BENJAMIN, and ancestor of Sallu; the latter was one of the provincial leaders who settled in Jerusalem after the EXILE (Neh. 11:7).

(2) An otherwise unknown man to whom the words of AGUR were addressed (Prov. 30:1). Many argue, however, that instead of “to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal” (lěîṭî'ēl lě'îṭîēl wə'ukāl), the text should be rendered, for example, “I am weary, O God; I am weary, O God, and I languish” (la'îṭî'ēl la'îṭî'ēl wā'ēkel; cf. NIV mg.). Other changes have been proposed (cf. NRSV), but none has received wide support (cf. B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 15 – 31, NICOT [2005], 455 – 56, 467 – 68). See also UCAL.

Ithlah ith'luh (יְתֻלָּה H3849, possibly from יָתַלַּה H9434, “to hang”). KJV Jethlah. A town within the territory allotted to the tribe of DAN (Josh. 19:42). It was apparently near AIJALON, but its precise location is unknown. The Danites were unable to take possession of this territory (v. 47).

Ithmah ith'muh (יְתֻמָּה H3850, perhaps “fatherless”). A Moabite, numbered among DAVID'S mighty warriors known as the “Thirty” (1 Chr. 11:46).

Ithnan ith'nan (יְתַנָּן H3854, derivation uncertain). A town in the NEGEV allotted to the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:23). It was near the boundary of EDOM (v. 21), but its location is unknown.

Ithra ith'ruh (יִתְרָא H3859, “abundance”). Father of AMASA, who led ABSALOM'S rebel army; Ithra was married to ABIGAIL, David's sister or half-sister. In 2 Sam. 17:25 MT (cf. KJV, RSV), he is called “Ithra the Israelite,” but in 1 Chr. 2:17, where the variant form JETHER occurs (cf. also 1 Ki. 2:5, 32), he is described as “the Ishmaelite.” Perhaps he was an ISHMAELITE by race who had joined the nation of Israel. In the former passage, some emend “Ithra” to “Jether” (cf. NIV), or “Israelite” to “Ishmaelite” (cf. NRSV), or both. It has been suggested that he should be identified with NABAL (see J. D. Levenson and B. Halpern in JBL 99 [1980]: 511 – 12). Because the Hebrew text of 2 Sam. 17:25 says only that Ithra “went to Abigail,” some argue that the two were not legally married (cf. P. K. McCarter, II Samuel, AB 9 [1984], 393).

Ithran ith'ran (יִתְרָן H3864, prob. “abundance” [יִתְרִי with a diminutive suffix; see HALOT, 2:442]; cf. ITHRA; JETHER). (1) Son of Dishon and descendant of SEIR the HORITE (Gen. 36:26; 1 Chr. 1:41).
(2) Son of Zophah and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:37); apparently also called Jether (v. 38).

Ithream ith'ree-uhm (יִתְרֵאִם H3865, “the Kinsman [i.e., ancestral god] excels” or “remainder of the people”). The sixth and last of the sons of DAVID who were born in HEBRON; his mother was Eglah (2 Sam. 3:5; 1 Chr. 3:3).

Ithrite ith'rit (יִתְרִי H3863, gentilic of יִתְרִי H3858 [JETHER] or יִתְרוֹ H3861 [JETHRO]). A Judahite clan descended from CALEB through HUR and SHOBAL; the Ithrites made up one of several families associated with KIRIATH JEARIM (1 Chr. 2:53). Two of DAVID'S mighty warriors, Ira and Gareb, are described as Ithrites (2 Sam. 23:38; 1 Chr. 11:40); however, some argue that the Hebrew here should read yattîrî, that is, a native of the city of JATTIR.

Ittah-kazin it'uh-kay'zin. KJV form of ETH KAZIN.

Ittai it'i (אִיִּתַּי H915, variant אִיִּתִּי H416, possibly “[God is] with me”; see ITHIEL). (1) Son of Ribai, a Benjamite from GIBEAH; he was numbered among DAVID'S mighty warriors (2 Sam. 23:29 [NIV, “Ithai”]; called ITHAI in 1 Chr. 11:31).

(2) A Gittite (i.e., from GATH) who joined himself to David and commanded six hundred men and families. When ABSALOM rebelled against David, Ittai fled with the king and refused to return to Jerusalem. David made him commander of a third part of his army, with JOAB and ABISHAI; he participated in the battle in the forest of Ephraim when Absalom was killed (2 Sam. 15:18 – 22; 18:2, 5, 12).

Iturea it'yoor-ee'uh (ἡ Ἰτουραία χώρα, “the Iturean country,” from Ἰτουραῖος G2714). Also Itu-raea. A small principality in the northern section of Palestine that included the Lebanon and Antilebanon mountain ranges and the Lake country around Huleh with its watershed. The capital was at Chalcis. It is mentioned only in Lk. 3:1 as one of the sections of Palestine ruled over by the tetrarch Philip, son of HEROD the Great. The Greek term usually occurs in the masculine plural, Itouraioi (i.e., “the Iturean people”). It was thought, though not without disagreement, to be derived from the name of one of ISHMAEL’S sons, JETUR (Heb. yəṭṭūr H3515, LXX Iettour, Gen. 25:15; 1 Chr. 1:31; in 1 Chr. 5:19, LXX has Itouraioi).

With the decline of the power of the Seleucid empire (see SELEUCIA), which had come into being after the conquests of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, the native rulers and their vassals began to carve out of the decaying central administration little principalities of their own. Not the least of these was Iturea, established in the region known to the Seleucids as COELESYRIA. Stephanus of Byzantium, a geographer of the time of Constantine IV (emperor of Constantinople c. A.D. 685), records a chieftain of the Arabs, Maniko, who established a dynasty of indigenous princes at Chalcis in the 2nd cent. B.C. The tribespeople of Iturea, though probably of Arab ancestry, utilized the ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, which was then the lingua franca of large portions of the ANE. They also adopted much of the mixed Greek and Semitic culture that was then in vogue.

In 161 B.C. Judas MACCABEE defeated the army of Nicanor the commander of the Seleucid forces, which led to Jewish independence. During the era of the remaining Maccabees and their successors, the political fortunes of Israel expanded into the power vacuum that existed between Ptolemaic Egypt on the S and Seleucid Syria on the N. John Hyrcanus, the second HASMONEAN ruler, continued this policy in the N, and his son Aristobulus captured a large portion of the area of Iturea in 105 – 104 B.C. The inhabitants were circumcised and forced to become Jews (Jos. Ant. 13.9.3).

The Itureans are mentioned by Strabo (Geogr. 16.2.18), who locates them as follows, “All the mountainous areas are occupied by Itureans and Arabians, all of whom are brigands...[who] use strongholds as bases.” An inscription of the time of P. Sulpicius Quirinius (c. A.D. 5) indicates that the Itureans had established themselves on the plain of Massyas, between Laodicea and their capital of Chalcis. Some coinage is known from the eras before and after the Jewish conquest. Aristobulus was a popular ruler among the Greek and Arab elements in his Jewish kingdom. The PHARISEES did not approve of this new pro-Greek aristocracy nor did they favor a kingship that was not of the Davidic family.

In 65 B.C. Rome began its eastward expansion under the consulship of G. POMPEY, who soon conquered the northern reaches of Syria and finally took Jerusalem. He enlarged the province of CILICIA and generally settled matters between the previously disputing royalty of the ANE. The ruler of Iturea at the time was a certain Ptolemy son of Menneus; he sent Pompey a payment of 1,000 talents to assure Rome’s agreement to his tenure as Iturean king. He shielded the last of the Hasmoneans and was reasonably able to stay aloof from Roman interference; his son Lysanias, however, was murdered by the agents of CLEOPATRA with the compliance of Antony, c. 36 B.C. (Jos. Ant. 15.92.3). At this time the once sizable realm was greatly diminished, although the name was still retained for the area of Chalcis and its environs.

Another and more obscure LYSANIAS then inherited the throne of Iturea. He may have been a descendant of the king of the same name murdered by Cleopatra; in any case he held his kingdom by the authority of Rome. It is he who is mentioned in Lk. 3:1 as the tetrarch of ABILENE, one of the remnants into which the old Iturean state had been divided. Herod the Great had annexed segments of the old state to their holdings. When Herod died, the Roman emperor, AUGUSTUS, then added the area to that ruled by the tetrarch Philip about 4 B.C. His lands consisted of Auranitis, Batanea, and Traconitis, all of which once had been sections of the Arab kingdom of Iturea, and it was this fact which Luke assumes in the statement, “Philip tetrarch of Iturea.” When the Syria-Palestine political system was again overhauled after the invasion of TITUS, c. A.D. 70, Iturea disappeared from the map. (See the articles by G. Schmitt and W. Schottroff in ZDPV 98 [1982]: 110 – 24 and 125 – 52; note also the discussion by E. A. Knauf in ABD, 3:583 – 84.)

W. WHITE, JR.

Ivah i’vuh. KJV form of IVVAH.

ivory. A hard substance that forms the tusks of ELEPHANTS. Ivory was indicative of wealth in ancient times. Ivory tusks were brought to TYRE, a trading nation, in exchange for her abundant goods (Ezek. 27:15; Heb. šēn H9094, the usual word for “tooth”). In Rev. 18:12 – 13, “articles of every kind made of ivory [elephantinos G1804]” are mentioned with other numerous products of great value in trade and commerce. The material was secured from a breed of Indian elephants in the upper EUPHRATES, where there were large herds in the 2nd millennium B.C. There are Assyrian accounts of elephant hunts with many slain in that period. They became extinct there about the 8th cent. B.C. Ivory was also obtained from INDIA by ocean-going ships, and from Africa-Rhodes (or Dedan, KJV), doubtless referring to that traffic passing through (Ezek. 27:15). In Solomon’s time his “ships of Tarshish” brought in ivory with gold and silver (1 Ki. 10:22). The fact that they came every three years shows how far ranging they were, probably reaching India. Excavations at ALALAKH in Syria turned up large ivory tusks. Egyptian and Assyrian art shows tusks as trophies of war.

In the Bible we learn that there were ivory beds (Amos 6:4) and houses (1 Ki. 22:39; Ps. 45:8; Amos 3:15); and Solomon’s throne was of ivory overlaid with gold (1 Ki. 10:18; 2 Chr. 9:17). The Phoenicians may have decorated their ships with it, for Tyre is said metaphorically to be a ship with ivoryinlaid decks (Ezek. 27:6). Qualities of the body are likened to ivory (Cant. 5:14; 7:4), the product being suitable to represent flesh.

We learn from extrabiblical sources that ivory was used in making figurines, spoons, flasks, gaming boards, combs, boxes, and articles of furniture such as chairs and beds in which there was doubtless much inlay work. There were guilds of ivory workers in Phoenicia who supplied products for export to middle eastern lands and probably beyond. Conquerors have listed objects of ivory in booty taken from Palestine, as did Sennacherib, who listed in the tribute paid him by Hezekiah in 701 B.C. “couches (inlaid) with ivory” (ANET, 288). Extraordinary stores of ivory have been found at Ras Shamra (see UGARIT) and MEGIDDO, a hoard of 383 pieces of carved work from the latter alone in 1932, ascribed to 1350 – 1150 B.C. Thus, whether as raw material or in the form of finished products, ivory was of considerable value in the commerce of the ancient world. (See J. W. and G. M. Crowfoot, Early Ivories from Samaria [1938]; G. Loud, The Megiddo Ivories [1939]; R. D. Barnett, “Phoenicia and the Ivory Trade,” Archaeology 9 [1956]: 87 – 97; R. D. Barnett, Ancient Ivories in the Middle East [1982].)

Ivory backrest, possibly from a couch, discovered in Nimrud (8th cent. B.C.); it depicts warriors and the fruit of the lotus tree.

Ivvah iv’uh (עִבְיָה H6394). KJV Ivah. One of several Syrian city-states vanquished by SENNACHERIB (2 Ki. 18:34; 2 Ki. 19:13; Isa. 37:13). The commander of the Assyrian forces, seeking to shake HEZEKIAH’S confidence in the Lord, claimed that the gods and kings of those cities were powerless before Sennacherib. Because Ivvah is listed along with HAMATH and ARPAD (also SEPHARVAIM and HENA), it is thought to have been located in N Syria, but the location is unknown. It is probably the same as AVVAH (2 Ki. 17:24, 31). Some scholars, noticing that Hena and Ivvah are not mentioned in similar lists (2 Ki. 17:24; Isa. 36:19), and suspecting that they are not true geographical names, have suggested that they are pagan deities, or that the text is corrupt, or that the words should be rendered “he has taken away and overthrown” (see ABD, 3:137 – 38).

ivy. This term (Gk. kissos) occurs only once in the APOCRYPHA, which states that, on the birthday celebration of ANTIOCHUS IV, the Jews “were compelled to wear wreathes of ivy and to walk in the procession in honor of Dionysus” (2 Macc. 6:7; see MACCABEES). This plant is undoubtedly Hedera helix, a climbing plant. It is found on walls and rocks in the Holy Land, and is connected with Bacchus (DIONYSUS), the God of wine. In ancient Roman days, a spray of ivy hung outside the door of every tavern in which wine was sold. This sign was similar in effect to the colored, striped poles outside barbers’ shops. The Greeks dedicated the ivy to Bacchus, and the Jews therefore hated entering the pagan temple to be made to worship, carrying his plant, the ivy.

Iyar ee’yahr. Also Iyyar. The second month of the Hebrew CALENDAR, corresponding to April-May. Its earliest occurrence is in the ELEPHANTINE PAPYRI (ʿyr), but the name is equivalent to Babylonian Aiaru. In the Bible, the second month is known by its Canaanite name, Ziv.

Iye Abarim i’yuh-ab’uh-rim (עֵי הָעֲבָרִים H6516, “ruins of the regions beyond”). Also called IYIM. A stopping place of the Israelites in their wilderness wanderings, between Oboth and the Valley of ZERED or DIBON Gad (Num. 21:11 – 12; 33:44 – 45). It was either in MOAB (33:44; NIV, “on the border of Moab”) or in its vicinity (21:11). Its location is uncertain, though one possible identification is modern el-Medeiyneh, c. 19 mi. ESE of the S tip of the DEAD SEA (on the N slope of the Zered Valley). Possibly the place was associated with the ABARIM mountain range.

Iyim i'yim (עִיִּים H6517, “ruins, stone heaps”). KJV and TNIV Iim. A shortened form of IYE-ABARIM (Num. 33:45). This place is not to be confused with Iim (Josh. 15:29), even though the form is identical in Hebrew.

Izhar, Izharite iz'uh-hahr, iz'uh-hah-rz't. KJV alternate forms of IZHAR and Izharite.

Izhar iz'hahr (יִזְהָר H3659, “[God] shines”; gentilic יִזְהָרִי H3660, “Izharite”). KJV also Izehar, Izeharite. (1) Son of KOHATH, grandson of LEVI, father of KORAH (and two other sons), uncle of MOSES, and eponymous ancestor of the Izrahite clan (Exod. 6:18, 21; Num. 3:19, 27; 16:1; 1 Chr. 6:2, 18, 38; 23:12, 18). Several of his descendants were prominent Levites (1 Chr. 23:18 [cf. v. 33]; 24:22; 26:23, 29).

(2) Son of Asshur (by his wife Helah) and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:7; cf. v. 5). So the NRSV, following the Ketib; the NIV and NJPS follow the Qere in reading ZOHAR (Heb. ṣōḥar H7468), while the KJV's “Jezoar” is a hybrid of the two forms.

Izliah iz-li'uh (יִזְלִיָּה H3468, “long-living” or “Yahweh delivers”). KJV Jezliah. Son of ELPAAL and descendant of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 8:18); he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (cf. v. 28).

Izrahiah iz'ruh-hi'uh (יִזְרְהִיָּה H3474, “Yahweh goes forth [or shines]”; see JEZRAHIAH). Son of Uzzi and great-grandson of ISSACHAR; a military chief (1 Chr. 7:3).

Izrahite iz'ruh-hit (יִזְרְהִיָּה H3473). Although this term in Hebrew does not have the usual gentilic form (i.e., with the ending -î), it apparently refers to someone from Izrah, a place otherwise unknown. The term is applied to a certain SHAMHUTH, who was the commander of the fifth monthly division under DAVID (1 Chr. 27:8). Some emend the text to read zarḥî H2439, “Zerahite” (i.e., a descendant of ZERAH of Judah; cf. v. 11). The problem is further complicated by the likelihood that “Shamhuth the Izrahite” is the same as “Shammah the Harodite” (2 Sam. 23:25), also called “Shammoth the Harorite” (1 Chr. 11:27). Clearly scribal activity has created confusion, and we are no longer able to identify the original form(s) of the name.

Izri iz'ri (יִזְרִי H3673, possibly “[Yahweh] has formed”; see JEZER). A Levitical musician who, with his sons and relatives, received the fourth lot (1 Chr. 25:11); the name is probably a variant of ZERI (v. 3).

Izziah i-zi'uh (יִזְיָה H3466, “Yahweh sprinkles”). One of the descendants of Parosh who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:25 [KJV, “Jeziah”]; 1 Esd. 9:26 [KJV, “Eddias”]).

This capital from the 11th or 12th cent. A.D. depicts the beheading of James.

J (Jahwist) yah'wist. An abbreviation for Yahwist (German Jahwist); it is used (along with D, E, and P) to designate one of the supposed sources of the PENTATEUCH, according to the Documentary Hypothesis.

Jaakan jay'uh-kan (יֶאֱקָן [not in NIV]). KJV Jakan. Son of EZER and grandson of SEIR the HORITE; he probably became the progenitor of a clan in EDM (1 Chr. 1:42 NRSV, following MT). On the basis of some Hebrew MSS and the parallel passage (Gen. 36:37), many scholars emend ya'āqān to wa'ādqān ("and Akan"; cf. NIV). See also BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN and BENE JAAKAN.

Jaakanite jay-a'kuh-nit. See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN.

jay-uh-koh'buh יֵשׁוּבָה H3621, "[God] protects"; see JACOB). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1

Chr. 4:36). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38 – 41).

Jaala jay’uh-luh (יַעֲלָא H3606, variant יַעֲלָה H3608, “mountain goat”). Also Jaalah. A servant of SOLOMON whose descendants returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:56 [KJV, NRSV, “Jaalah”]; Neh. 7:58; 1 Esd. 5:33 [KJV, “Jeeli”; NRSV, “Jaalah”]).

Jaalah jay’uh-luh. See JAALA.

Jaalam jay’uh-lam. KJV form of JALAM.

Jaanaï jay’uh-ni. KJV form of JANAI.

Jaar jay’uhr (יַעַר H3625, “forest”). The name of a place that, along with EPHRATHAH, was associated with the ARK OF THE COVENANT (Ps. 132:6; KJV, “the wood” [cf. LXX]). Jaar is generally regarded as a (poetic) short form of KIRIATH JEARIM (meaning “town of forests”), where the ark remained twenty years before DAVID brought it to Jerusalem. Some believe that the name was applied to a wooded area in the environs of Kiriath Jearim. It is possible that in this passage Ephrathah does not refer to BETHLEHEM specifically, but to a larger area that extended as far N as the border between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin.

Jaare-Oregim jay’uh-ree-or’uh-gim (יַעֲרֵי אֲרָגִים H3629, “forests of weavers” [but scribal error suspected]). Father of Elhanan; the latter is described as the killer of GOLIATH the Gittite (2 Sam. 21:19). Jaare-Oregim is apparently called JAIR in the parallel passage (1 Chr. 20:5). For possible solutions to the discrepancies between these two verses, see ELHANAN.

Jareshiah jay’uh-ree-shoi’uh (יַעֲרֵשִׁיָּה H3631, “Yahweh plants”). KJV Jaresiah. Son of Jeroham and descendant of BENJAMIN; he is listed among the heads of families who lived in Jerusalem (1 Chr. 8:27).

Jaasau jay’uh-saw. KJV form of JAASU.

Jaasiel jay-ay’see-uhl (יַעֲשִׂיָּאל H3634, “God makes [or carries out, or treats well]”). KJV Jasiel. (1) Son of ABNER (SAUL’S cousin); he was made an officer over the tribe of BENJAMIN during the reign of DAVID (1 Chr. 27:21).

(2) A MEZOBAITE, mentioned last among David’s mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:47). Some scholars emend “Mezobaite” to “from Zobah.” It has also been suggested, but without good reason, that this Jaasiel is the same as #1 above.

Jaasu jay’uh-soo (יַעֲשִׂיָּה H3632 [Qere יַעֲשִׂיָּה], possibly “[God] treats well”; see JAASIEL). KJV Jaasau. One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:37).

Jaazaniah jay-az'uh-ni'uh (יֶזַנְיָהוּ H3280, variants יֶזַנְיָהוּ H3279 [Jer. 35:3; Ezek. 11:1] and יֶזַנְיָהוּ H3471 [Jer. 40:8], “Yahweh listens”; see JEZANIAH). The name appears on a number of ancient archaeological remains, showing that it was common in OT times.

(1) A military commander identified as “the son of the Maacathite”; he was among the officers who went to MIZPAH to join GEDALIAH, the governor appointed by the Babylonians after the fall of Jerusalem (2 Ki. 25:23; Jer. 40:8 [KJV, NRSV, “Jezaniah”). It is usually thought that Jaazaniah belonged to the family that descended from MAACAH, CALEB’S concubine (1 Chr. 2:48), but there are other possibilities. Some speculate that this is the Jaazaniah whose name is inscribed on a seal discovered in Mizpah (modern Tell en-Naṣbeh; see M. Cogan and H. Tadmor, II Kings, AB 11 [1988], 326).

(2) Son of Jeremiah (not the prophet), a leader of the RECABITES, whose loyalty to their ancestral precepts the prophet JEREMIAH used as a lesson to his own countrymen (Jer. 35:3).

(3) Son of Shaphan and, apparently, a prominent elder in Jerusalem at the time of the EXILE; he is the only one mentioned by name among the seventy elders of Israel whom EZEKIEL, in a vision, saw offering incense to idols (Ezek. 8:11).

(4) Son of Azzur; he and Pelatiah son of Benaiah were leaders of the people in Jerusalem at the time of the exile, and Ezekiel was commanded to prophesy against their sin (Ezek. 11:1).

Jaazer jay'uh-zuhr. KJV alternate form of JAZER (Num. 21:32; 32:35).

Jaaziah jay'uh-zi'uh (יֶזַחְיָהוּ H3596, “Yahweh nourishes”; see JAAZIEL). Son of MERARI and grandson of LEVI; he is not mentioned in most of the genealogies (e.g., Exod. 6:19), but only in a list of Levitical families that served during the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 24:26 – 27). The Hebrew text is difficult, however, and some regard it as a later gloss (e.g., KD, Chronicles, 259 [on 23:23]).

Jaaziel jay-ay'zee-uhl (יֶזַחְיָהוּ H3595, “God nourishes”; see JAAZIAH). One of the Levites who played the lyre when the ARK OF THE COVENANT was brought to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:18; called AZIEL in v. 20; some also identify him with the first JEIEL listed in 16:5).

Jabal jay'buhl (יָבֵל H3299, possibly “[God] leads” or “wanderer”). First son of LAMECH by ADAH; he was “the father of those who live in tents and raise livestock,” meaning probably that he originated the profession of herding animals, which often required the nomadic lifestyle of constant travel in search of pasture (Gen. 4:20). The word for “livestock” (miqneh H5238), which more generally means “possessions,” may be a wordplay on the name of his ancestor CAIN (qayin H7803). Less likely is the suggestion that the name Jabal alludes to ABEL, the first shepherd. See also JUBAL.

Jabbok jab'uhk (יַבְבֹּק H3309, prob. “overflowing”). A river in TRANSJORDAN (Nahr ez-Zerka, “river of blue”), about 60 mi. in length and, next to the YAR-MUK River, having the greatest drainage area in that region. It is a perennial stream, deriving from the 28 – 32 in. of rainfall annually. Its average fall is c. 80 ft. per mi., cutting a deep valley or gorge through the E JORDAN Valley escarpment. The source lies in the vicinity of modern Amman (ancient RABBAH of AMMON, and Hellenistic Philadelphia), from whence it swings eastward and northward, forming a large loop before wending westward to the Jordan Valley. The lower gorge is under sea level to a point 7 mi. E of the rift, at an elevation of more than 2,000 ft. below the Gilead Plateau to the N and the Amman Plateau to the S.

Colorful oleanders line most of its banks in the hill country. After emerging into the Jordan Valley near Tell Deir (Alla (prob. ancient Succoth), it meanders across the Ghor before joining the Jordan River near ed-Damiyeh (biblical Adam).

The Jabbok River valley looking W.

The loop N of Amman formed the W boundary of the Ammonites at the time of the conquest (Num. 21:24), and the contained area was settled by the tribe of GAD, as far W as present es-Salt. The western part of the river formed a physical and political boundary between the two parts of GILEAD (Deut. 3:12, 16; Josh. 12:2 – 6), and also divided the kingdoms of SIHON and OG. Nelson Glueck found numerous occupation sites in the Wadi ez-Zerka in his surveys, and several biblical cities were located on, or near, its course. The specific ford referred to in Gen. 32:22 has not been identified, but the nearby site called Peniel (v. 31) is probably Tell edh-Dhahab esh-Sherqiyeh, about 8 mi. E of the Jordan; see PENUEL (PLACE). (See D. Baly, The Geography of the Bible [1957], 229; E. Orni and E. Efrat, Geography of Israel [1964], 91 – 94; Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 34, 38, 327.)

Jabesh jay'bish (יָבֵשׁ H3314, “dry”). Father of King SHALLUM of Israel, who murdered King ZECHARIAH and usurped the throne (2 Ki. 15:10, 13 – 14). However, since the name Jabesh (yābēš H3315) is also a short form of JABESH GILEAD, the expression “son of Jabesh” may mean “a native of Jabesh [Gilead].”

S. BARABAS

Jabesh Gilead jay'bish-gil'ee-uhd (יָבֵשׁ גִּלְעָד H3316, “dry place of Gilead”; also referred to simply as יָבֵשׁ H3315). A city in N TRANSJORDAN (see GILEAD). The first mention of Jabesh Gilead comes at the end of a long story beginning in Jdg. 19 and continuing to the end of ch. 21. Briefly told, a Levite and a concubine, after spending some time with her people in BETHLEHEM, made their way N. They stopped for the night in GIBEAH, where an old man entertained them. In the course of the night, the Levite yielded to the sadistic cravings of the men of Gibeah and gave to them his concubine. In the morning she was dead on the doorstep, so the Jabbok River.

Levite dismembered her and sent the parts around the country. This incident started a war between BENJAMIN (of which Gibeah was a part) and the other Israelite tribes. The battle was indecisive for a while, but finally the Benjamites were defeated and almost completely annihilated. Because no one from Jabesh Gilead had fought against Benjamin, the Israelites went and slaughtered all but 400 eligible virgins in the city, and these were given to 400 surviving soldiers of Benjamin for wives. The 200 others were given permission to seize girls as they danced at the annual SHILOH festival (Jdg. 21:23). Apparently the town of Jabesh was repopulated by neighboring Gileadites.

The next episode centering on Jabesh is recorded in 1 Sam. 11, where the Ammonite NAHASH attacked the town. The only peace treaty acceptable to Nahash was that he gouge out one eye from each man of Jabesh. During the week of deliberations the citizens requested help from SAUL, the newly crowned king. He mustered the forces of Israel at BEZEK, marched all night, attacked Nahash early in the morning, and by noon had the enemy scattered. Because of this, Saul gained the allegiance of Jabesh Gilead and all Transjordan. Its inhabitants showed their devotion to Saul by giving him an honorable burial when, after his and JONATHAN'S defeat and death on Mount GILBOA, their decapitated bodies were hung on the wall of BETH SHAN. The valorous gesture involved an all-night walk and a crossing of the Jordan by the men of Jabesh Gilead (1 Sam. 31:8 – 13; 1 Ch r. 10:8 – 12).

When DAVID came to power, one of the first things he did was to commend, congratulate, and bless the brave men of Jabesh Gilead for what they had done for Saul (2 Sam. 2:4 – 6). Later, David had the bones of Saul and Jonathan removed from Jabesh Gilead and buried in the land of Benjamin with KISH, Saul's father (2 Sam. 21:10 – 14).

Modern Wadi Yabis, which enters the Jordan from the E about 25 mi. S of the Sea of Galilee, bears the same name as this ancient town. One might well expect to find Jabesh Gilead on this river. Since the often correct Onomasticon of EUSEBIUS locates it c. 6 mi. S of PELLA (Ṭabaqat Faḥil), the double mounds of Tell el-Meqberek and Tell Abu Kharaz are favored by some (N. Glueck, The River Jordan [1946], 159 – 69, and AASOR 25 – 28 [1951]: 211 – 23). Both of these have produced surface pottery of the period of Saul and stand near enough to the Jordan—in fact, on the edge of the valley itself—to fit well the story of the recovery of Saul and Jonathan's bodies. Most scholars, however, prefer Tell el-Maqlub, farther up the Wadi Yabis, about 7 mi. E of the Jordan (cf. Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 127 – 28). It has been objected that such a location is too far from Beth Shan (about 13 mi. SE of this city) to allow for the events described in 1 Sam. 31:11 – 13, but it is quite possible that the men of Jabesh Gilead on that occasion traveled a good part of the day as well as all night to retrieve the bodies (see ABD, 3:594).

R. L. ALDEN

Jabez (person) jay'biz (יַעֲבֵז H3584, derivation uncertain). A man in the line of JUDAH noted for his honorable character (1 Chr. 4:9 – 10). In this passage, the genealogy is interrupted with the following information: “Jabez was more honorable than his brothers. His mother had named him Jabez [ya(bēš)], saying, ‘I gave birth to him in pain [bē(ōšeb)].’ Jabez cried out to the God of Israel, ‘Oh, that you would bless me and enlarge my territory! Let your hand be with me, and keep me from harm so that I will be free from pain.’ And God granted his request.” (The wordplay on his name requires a transposition of the consonants b and š; the meaning “pain” must be regarded as a popular etymology.) This abrupt introduction of Jabez, who had not previously been mentioned, is puzzling. Some speculate that he may have been a son (or brother) of Koz (v. 8; it has even been suggested that in this verse the name Hazzobebah [haššōbēbâ] is a corruption of Jabez). A few scholars have further speculated that Jabez was the founder of the town by the same name. See JABEZ (PLACE).

Jabez (place) jay'biz (יַעֲבֵז H3583, derivation uncertain). A city in JUDAH, perhaps near BETHLEHEM, occupied by clans of scribes that were descendants of CALEB through Hur and Salma (1 Chr. 2:55). However, these clans, which consisted of Tirathites, Shimeathites, and Sucathites, are also identified as “the Kenites who came from Hammath, the father of the house of Recab.” C. F. Keil (KD, Chronicles, 77) seeks to “explain the incorporation of the Kenites in the Judaeian family of the Calebite Salma, on the supposition that one of these Kenites of the family of Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses, married an heiress of the race of Caleb. On this account the children and descendants sprung of this marriage would be incorporated in the family of Caleb, although they were on their father’s side Kenites, and where they followed the manner of life of their fathers, might continue to be regarded as such, and to bear the name.” See HOBAB; KENITES. (For further discussion of this verse, see esp. G. N. Knoppers, I Chronicles 1 – 9, AB 12 [2004], 315 – 16.)

Jabin jay'bin (יָבִין H3296, possibly “perceptive”). (1) King of HAZOR and head of a coalition of Canaanite kings who sought to withstand the Israelites (Josh. 11:1 – 12). The confederacy of Canaanite princes produced an army “as numerous as the sand on the seashore” (v. 4). Excavations at Hazor, conducted by Y. Yadin in 1955, indicate that the city was quite extensive, with a population of about 40,000. In view of the size of the coalition, an imposing force blocked further entry into Canaan. JOSHUA’S advance, however, took the Canaanites by surprise and enabled the Israelites to defeat them. Hazor was then destroyed, and Jabin was put to death along with the other princes of the confederation (vv. 10 – 12).

(2) A Canaanite king who reigned in Hazor; probably a descendant of #1 above (Jdg. 4:2; some suggest that Jabin was a dynastic title). The idolatry of the Israelites led to their being oppressed by him for twenty years. His armament was extensive, being described as 900 chariots of iron (v. 3). The commander of his forces was SISERA, who seemed to be more prominent in the incident than Jabin the king. The oppression of the Canaanites was overthrown by DEBORAH’S plan. BARAK effected the strategy that resulted in eventual victory (vv. 23 – 24). The victory was celebrated in song (Jdg. 5; cf. Ps. 83:9).

Jabneel, Jabneh jab'nee-uhl, jab'neh (יַבְנֵאל H3305, “God builds”; short form יַבְנֵה H3306 [2 Chr.

26:6]; Ἰάμνεια [1 Macc. 4:15 et al.; gentilic Ἰαμνίτης, “Jamnite,” 2 Macc. 12:9], also Ἰαμνίων v [Jdt. 2:28]). (1) A town on the S boundary of the tribal territory of NAPHTALI (Josh. 19:33). It is identified with Tell en-Na<sup>a</sup>m, 3.5 mi. W of the S tip of the Sea of Galilee; the modern village of Yavneel is situated nearby (the Talmudic Jabneel is identified with Kh. Yamma).

(2) A town on the W boundary of the tribal territory of JUDAH, between JOPPA and GAZA, near the coast (Josh. 15:11). It was an important station on the VIA MARIS, and was later also known as Jamnia. The modern town of Yavne (Yebna), c. 13 mi S of Joppa, is located on the site.

The only biblical event associated with this city took place in the 8th cent. B.C., when King UZZIAH, campaigning against the PHILISTINES, “broke down the walls of Gath, Jabneh and Ashdod” (2 Chr. 26:6), thus gaining an access to the sea at the mouth of the Yarkon River. After the OT period, in 332 B.C., ALEXANDER THE GREAT moved down the Palestinian coast. After capturing Acco, he proceeded to Strato’s Tower, then probably inland before returning to the coast at LOD, thence through Jabneh (Jamnia) and ASHKELON, to the siege of Gaza, which lasted two months, after which he wintered in Egypt.

In 163 B.C., there was an unsuccessful attack on Jamnia by the Maccabean Jewish army leaders, Joseph and Azarias (1 Macc. 5:55 – 62; see MACCABEE). Jamnia was an important SELEUCID military base (1 Macc. 4:15; cf. 10:69; 15:40), and in a subsequent campaign, Judas razed the port of Jamnia with fire (2 Macc. 12:8 – 9, 40). In 147 B.C., the Battle of Jamnia was fought. Jonathan was challenged by Demetrius II’s general, Apollonius, and having 10,000 men, was joined by Simon with another battalion. Together they moved against Joppa, then S, and were ambushed between Jamnia and Azotus. Heavy fighting occurred, with a signal victory for the Jews (1 Macc. 10:69 – 87). The Seleucid forces continued to occupy Jamnia, and under the leadership of Cendebeus, built a fort at Kidron (near modern Gedera), from which they harassed the Judeans. John Hyrcanus attacked the fort and gained a solid victory (see HASMONEAN II.A). The town is also mentioned in JUDITH (Jdt. 2:28; KJV, “Jemnaan”). Along with several coastal and interior towns, Jamnia was liberated by POMPEY (63 – 55 B.C.) from Jewish rule and annexed to Syria. It is probable that AUGUSTUS (c. 30 B.C.) added the city to the kingdom of HEROD, for the latter left it in his will to his sister Salome (who in turn bequeathed it to the Empress Livia). Jamnia probably was visited by PHILIP on his preaching tour from Azotus (ASHDOD) to CAESAREA (Acts 8:40). In A.D. 67, during VESPASIAN’S campaign, Jamnia and Azotus were captured by the Romans. The city became the headquarters of the exiled SANHEDRIN from the time of the fall of Jerusalem (70) to the second revolt (132 – 135).

Jamnia is best known as the site of a gathering that supposedly made formal decisions about the CANON c. A.D. 90. The primary basis for this “Council (or Synod) of Jamnia (Yavneh)” is a statement by Rabbi Simeon ben Azzai recorded in the MISHNAH: “I have heard a tradition from the seventy-two elders on the day when they made R. Eleazar b. Azariah head of the college [of Sages], that the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes both render the hands unclean” (the expression “render the hands unclean” indicates canonical status). There was then some debate on the matter, but in the end, “According to the words of Ben Azzai so did they dispute and so did they decide” (m. Yadaim 3:5; a number of other rabbinic references to “on that day” refer to the time when Eleazar was appointed head of the academy). Some modern scholars speculated that it was at this meeting that the OT canon was officially closed, the Hebrew text standardized, and the breach between Judaism and Christianity formalized. This hypothesis was widely accepted, and many works published in the 20th cent. treat such a council as proven fact.

While it is true that for a number of decades after A.D. 70 Jewish sages gathered in Jamnia from time to time to debate a variety of problems, and that these meetings often led to decisions (whether by formal vote or by consensus), the use of such terms as council or synod is misleading. These gatherings should not be compared with the Christian ecumenical councils that reached decisions binding on the church as a whole. Moreover, there is no evidence that questions about the canon were a major concern when the rabbis met. (See R. C. Newman in WTJ 38 [1975 – 76]: 319 – 49; S. J. D. Cohen in HUCA 55 [1986]: 17 – 53; J. P. Lewis, “Jamnia,” in ABD, 3:634 – 37; id., “Jamnia Revisited” in The Canon Debate, ed. L. M. McDonald and J. A. Sanders [2002], 146 – 62.)

Jabneh. See JABNEEL.

Jacan jay’kuhn (יָכָן H3602, meaning uncertain). KJV Jachan; TNIV Jakan. Son of Abihail; he was one of seven relatives from the tribe of GAD who occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:13; cf. v. 10, 14).

Jachan jay’kuhn. KJV form of JACAN.

Jachin jay’kin. See JAKIN

jacinth. A gem variety of the mineral zircon (zir conium silicate), now almost universally referred to as hyacinth. It is transparent and generally red in color; sometimes it is orange or brownish. Jacinth (hyacinth) is not a common mineral. It occurs, together with other zircons, in the gem gravels of Ceylon, but many gem stones called hyacinth are deep orange-brown garnets (cinnamon-stone or hessonite). The Hebrew term lešem H4385, of uncertain meaning, is rendered “jacinth” by the NIV and other versions (it is found only in Exod. 28:19; 39:12 [KJV, “ligure”]). The Greek term hyakinthinos G5610 probably was used by ancient writers to refer to a blue mineral (cf. NIV “dark blue,” Rev. 9:17; NRSV, “sapphire”; both versions render it “jacinth” in 21:20).

D. R. BOWES

jackal. The usual Hebrew term for “jackal” is tan H9478 (always pl. and used in figurative contexts), but šû’āl H8785, which most often refers to the FOX, can be used with the same meaning (Lam. 5:18; Ezek. 13:4), as can perhaps other terms (cf. Isa. 13:21 NIV; FFB, 31 – 32). Jackals are related to foxes and even more closely to domestic dogs, for with them they belong to the genus Canis. The Palestine species is the oriental jackal (Canis aureus), with head and body 24 – 30 in. in length, and a tail of up to 12 in.; its color is a dirty yellow mixed with reds and blacks. Jackals usually go about in packs of up to a dozen, feeding mostly at night, and it is interesting that in all cases the Hebrew word is plural. The jackal is basically a scavenger, living rather as a HYENA in game country, where it can clean up after the larger carnivores have killed. In contrast, the fox is more solitary, feeding on a wide range of vegetable matter and small animals, and taking less refuse than the jackal. Several times it is prophesied that lands (e.g., Babylon, Jer. 51:37; Edom, Mal. 1:3) shall become the haunt of jackals, which are almost a symbol of desolation (more than half of the passages have this theme). To the casual observer foxes and jackals look very similar, and it is possible that they were often given the same name.

Jackal Well. Also Jackal's Well (RSV). A well or spring in JERUSALEM, apparently between the VALLEY GATE and the DUNG GATE (Neh. 2:13 NIV). The rendering "Jackal," however, assumes that the Hebrew tannîn H9490, which means "serpent" or "sea monster," should be read as tannîm (pl. of tan H9478, JACKAL; cf. the Ketib at Lam. 4:3). Others take the word in its usual sense (thus KJV, "dragon well"; NRSV, "Dragon's Spring"). It is common to identify the Jackal (or Dragon) Well with EN ROGEL, a spring about 800 ft. S of the SE ridge of Jerusalem (thus just below the junction of the HIN-NOM and KIDRON Valleys). It has also been argued that the reference is to the GIHON SPRING, which follows a serpentine course. Some, however, suggest that the Hebrew term (ayin H6524 here means "eye" rather than "spring" (if so, no one knows what Serpent's Eye might refer to). Finally, it should be noted that the SEPTUAGINT rendered the Hebrew phrase as pēgēs tōn sykōn, "fountain of the figs" (no doubt reading tē'ēnîm, pl. of tē'ēnâ H9300, "fig"). See also ZOHELETH, STONE OF.

Jacob jay'kuhb (עֲקֹב H3620; possibly "[God] protects," but by popular etymology, "he takes by the heel, supplants, deceives"; Ἰακώβ G2609, ἰά κωμος G2610 [see JAMES]). (1) Son of ISAAC and REBECCA, younger twin brother of ESAU, husband of LEAH and RACHEL. He later was called ISRAEL (Gen. 32:28; 49:2) and thus, through his twelve sons, became the eponymous ancestor of the Israelites. (2) Son of Matthan and father of JOSEPH, Mary's husband, listed in Matthew's GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Matt. 1:15 – 16; see also HELI). The rest of this article is devoted to the Hebrew patriarch.

1. Birth
2. Jacob and Esau
3. In Haran
4. Return from Haran
5. Jacob the patriarch

I. Birth. At his birth he was holding his older brother's heel and thus was named Jacob (Gen. 25:26).

The word for “heel” is the Hebrew noun (ʾāqēb H6811, and its cognate verb, (ʾāqab H6810, can mean both “to take by the heel” (Hos. 12:3) and “to supplant, deceive” (Jer. 9:3). When Jacob stole his older brother’s blessing, Esau affirmed that Jacob was correctly named, “For he has supplanted me [wayya(qēbēnī)] these two times” (27:36 NRSV; NIV, “has deceived me”). Personal names containing this same Semitic root (but prob. with the meaning “protect”) are also found in the extrabiblical documents contemporary with the patriarchs but are not found elsewhere in the OT. No individual in Israel, apart from the patriarch, bore the name Jacob until the Hellenistic period, when it usually occurs in the Greek form Iakōbos.

The birth of Jacob is described in Gen. 25 and his death is recorded in Gen. 50, so that his life covers one half of Genesis. Since Rebecca, like SARAH, was barren, the birth of Jacob was miraculous and an answer to prayer (25:21). This miraculous conception of Rebecca resulted in the birth of twins: Esau, the firstborn, was hairy and later became a hunter; but Jacob, who was born holding Esau’s heel, became “a quiet man, staying among the tents” (25:25 – 27). Almost immediately, tension and strife existed in the home because Isaac favored Esau whereas Rebecca favored Jacob.

II. Jacob and Esau. One day when Esau the hunter came in from a futile chase, he bargained away his BIRTHRIGHT to Jacob for a batch of pottage (Gen. 25:30), and thus Jacob gained the rights which by birth were not his. This custom of selling a birthright is described in the Nuzi tablets. (On this and other cultural parallels, see C. Gordon in BA 3 [1940]: 1 – 12; more cautious is M. J. Selman in Essays on the Patriarchal Narratives, ed. A. R. Millard and D. J. Wiseman [1980], 93 – 138; very skeptical is T. J. Thompson, The Historicity of the Patriarchal Narratives [1974].)

On another day when Esau was out hunting, Jacob listened to his mother and followed her strategy for deceiving his father, whereby he received the father’s blessing that was intended for Esau, the FIRSTBORN (Gen. 27; see BLESS). Although Isaac was suspicious and doubtful, in his blindness he pronounced upon Jacob the death-bed benediction. Shortly thereafter Esau returned and Isaac realized how he had been deceived, but the oral blessing could not be revoked (another custom apparently confirmed and illuminated by the Nuzi tablets). Since Isaac’s blessing was irrevocable, as the Bible emphasizes (27:33 – 37), Jacob became the bearer of God’s promise and the inheritor of Canaan (cf. Rom. 9:10 – 13), and Esau received the less fertile area known as EDOM. Rebecca, the mother, obtained Isaac’s permission for Jacob to flee from Esau’s anger to her home in PADDAN ARAM (Gen. 27:41—28:5). Jacob was no longer a young man when he sought to escape from his brother's vengeance and to find a wife from his mother's kindred (note that Esau at the age of forty had married the HITTITE women, 26:34; 27:46).

III. In Haran. En route from BEERSHEBA to HARAN, Jacob camped one night near BETHEL, and as he slept he was granted a vision of a ladder between heaven and earth with ascending and descending angels upon it. The God of his fathers again revealed himself and confirmed to Jacob the promise previously given to Isaac and ABRAHAM. Jacob commemorated this dream by setting up the stone on which he had rested his head, pouring a libation of oil over it, and assigning the name Bethel ("House of God") to the site (Gen. 28:18 – 19).

The next scene reveals Jacob at a well in "the land of eastern peoples" (Gen. 29:1). The following verses reveal the great love Jacob had for Rachel, a love probably reflected in the great display of physical power at the wellside (29:10), as well as during the patient years of toil for Rachel, which "seemed like only a few days to him because of his love for her" (29:20). After this love-at-first-sight episode, LABAN came and took his nephew Jacob home and agreed to give him Rachel in exchange for seven years' service. Jacob fulfilled the bargain and brought his uncle great prosperity (30:27 – 30). Laban, however, deceived Jacob, making him take the elder and less attractive sister, Leah. A week later Jacob married Rachel after agreeing to serve Laban seven additional years. Jacob should not be primarily blamed for the polygamy that brought trouble into his home life. The rivalry between Leah and Rachel—Judah and Joseph—was not based on Jacob's choice but Laban's fraud. Laban "changed the wages" of Jacob ten times (31:7, 41).

Jacob's years of service for his wives were followed by six years of service rendered for a stipulated wage. Laban's cunning in limiting the amount of this wage in a variety of ways was matched by Jacob's cunning in devising means to overreach his uncle, so that the poor wanderer of twenty years before became the wealthy owner of countless cattle and of the hosts of slaves necessary for their care (Gen. 32:10). God gave to each his due reward: to Jacob, the rich returns of skillful, patient industry; to Laban, rebuke and warning.

At least twelve children were born to Jacob during his stay in Mesopotamia (Gen. 29:31—30:24). The disdained Leah bore REUBEN, SIMEON, LEVI, JUDAH, ISSACHAR, ZEBULUN, and a daughter, DINAH. Leah's maid ZILPAH bore GAD and ASHER. Rachel, being barren (29:31; 30:1 – 2), gave her maid BILHAH to Jacob to obtain children by her (30:3 – 8). Bilhah bore DAN and NAPHTALI. Finally, Rachel herself bore a son, JOSEPH, a positive answer to her prayer (30:22 – 24). It is probable that other unnamed daughters were born during this time (cf. 37:35).

IV. Return from Haran. Eventually the Lord told Jacob (Gen. 31:3, 13) to leave the area of Haran, a region noted for trade as well as agriculture and pasturage, and return to “the land of your fathers and to your relatives.” A two-day head start enabled Jacob and his flocks to travel as far as GILEAD in N TRANSJORDAN before he was overtaken by Laban after seven days’ travel. Jacob reminded Laban of how well he had served him, complying with all the requirements of a good herdsman, and how ill he had been rewarded. A pact was made and Laban used his authoritative position to dictate the terms: his daughters would not be harmed, nor would Jacob take another wife. A pillar was then erected to commemorate this covenant, a sacrifice was made, and the two parties shared a meal as a sign of their good will. Throughout these episodes in Jacob’s life, the hand of God was at work, protecting and prospering Jacob in the midst of family quarrels.

As Jacob approached the land that God had promised him, a band of angels met him (Gen. 32). Next he sent out scouts to discover Esau’s attitude. Meanwhile, Jacob took care to safeguard half of his possessions and also sent a large gift to his brother. After he had asked for divine protection, and as he was about to ford the river JABBOK, he became engaged with a stranger who wrestled with him until daybreak. The man prevailed only by dislocating Jacob’s thigh, but Jacob eventually won from the antagonist a blessing that entailed the change of Jacob’s name to Israel, showing that he was able to contend with God (cf. Hos. 12:4).

As Esau came to meet him, Jacob feared that Esau’s hostility had not subsided with the years, and therefore approached the dreaded meeting with his usual cleverness, seeking to pacify his wronged twin and also to protect himself and his family from any possible attack. To his strategy, however, Jacob added prayer (Gen. 32:9 – 12), for he realized that it was ultimately God with whom he dealt. Esau’s friendly greeting did not overcome the fears of Jacob, who turned down to SUCCOTH instead of following his brother. Esau went to SEIR and there became the ancestor of a nation; Jacob remained in Palestine to assume his inheritance. These twins were not to meet again until their father’s death (35:27 – 29).

From Succoth Jacob traveled to SHECHEM, where he built an altar (Gen. 33:20). Jacob’s experiences at Shechem (ch. 34) in his relations with the Canaanites are reminiscent of Abraham’s relations with these inhabitants of the land (14:23), or Isaac’s (ch. 26). God then instructed Jacob to return to Bethel and make an altar “to God, who appeared to you when you were fleeing from your brother Esau” (35:1). In preparation for this, the people put away their foreign gods and purified themselves. At Bethel, the patriarchal promises were again given to Jacob, and again he was told that Israel would be his new name. At this, Jacob raised anew his monument of stone, and stamped forever by this public act upon ancient Luz (35:6) the name of Bethel, which he had privately given it before (28:19).

Losses and griefs characterized the life of Jacob during this period. The death of his mother’s nurse at Bethel (Gen. 35:8; 24:59) was followed by the death of his beloved wife Rachel at EPHRATH (35:19; 48:7) in bringing forth the youngest of his twelve sons, BENJAMIN. At about the same time the eldest of the twelve, Reuben, forfeited the honor of his station in the family by becoming intimate with Bilhah, an act that showed all too clearly the effect of recent association with Canaanites (35:22 – 23). Finally, death claimed Jacob's aged father, whose latest years had been robbed of the companionship, not only of this son, but also of the son Esau. At Isaac's grave in HEBRON, the poorly matched twins met once more, thenceforth to go their separate ways, both in their personal careers and in their descendants' history (35:29).

Next, Jacob resided near Hebron (Gen. 37:14). Although the following material revolves around Joseph, Jacob remains the true center of the narrative until his death. The self-willed older sons come and go at his bidding (42:1 – 5), and Joseph's great concern is for his aged father (43:27; 44:19; 45:3, 9, 13, 23; 46:29).

Finally, when severe famine gripped Canaan, Jacob and his sons set out for Egypt. At Beersheba he received further assurance of God's favor (Gen. 46:1 – 4). In Egypt he dwelt in the land of GOSHEN until his death. At the end, Jacob bestowed a blessing upon Joseph's sons, EPHRAIM and MANASSEH (48:8 – 20), and then upon his own sons (ch. 49). God's promise to Jacob was beautifully fulfilled; at his death the Egyptians paid him great homage, and his sons buried him with Isaac and Abraham at the family grave in MACHPELAH.

V. Jacob the patriarch. The mighty patriarch Jacob inherited from his father Isaac an affectionate attachment to his family, which appears in his life from beginning to end. From his mother Rebecca he inherited shrewdness, initiative, and resourcefulness—qualities that she apparently shared with her brother Laban. Like both Isaac and Abraham, he sometimes lacked courage, and his life frequently revealed deceit and dishonesty. Yet through the entire narrative there is a persistent faith in the God of his fathers. Jacob's life is a story of conflict. He was constantly beset with dangers from every area of life, and upon many occasions his inheritance of the blessing was threatened.

Outside GENESIS, the OT has much to say about Jacob's life (Josh. 24:3 – 4, 32; Ps. 105:10 – 23; Hos. 12:2 – 4, 12; Mal. 1:2). If the book of Genesis were lost, the significance as well as the basic outline of his life could be reconstructed. The NT references recall events in his life or traits of his character (Jn. 4:5 – 6, 12; Acts 7:12, 14 – 16; Rom. 9:10 – 13; Heb. 11:9, 20 – 21). Jacob is considered the child of favor (Mal. 1:2; Rom. 9:10 – 13), an heir of the divine promise (Heb. 11:9), and a man of blessing (Heb. 11:20 – 21). As Israel's third great patriarch, he is often linked with Abraham and Isaac, especially in connection with their God (Deut. 29:13; 2 Ki. 13:23; Matt. 8:11; Mk. 12:26 – 27; Acts 3:13).

Jacob as a synonym for Israel and thus as a poetic name for the Israelites occurs especially in the prophets. Besides being called the house of Jacob (Exod. 19:3; Isa. 2:5 – 6.; 8:17; 27:9; Amos 3:13; 9:8; Mic. 2:7), or the sons of Jacob (1 Ki. 18:31; Mal. 3:6), or the seed of Jacob (Isa. 45:19; Jer. 33:26), or the assembly of Jacob (Deut. 33:4), the Israelites are also simply called Jacob (Isa. 9:8; Hos. 10:11); in Mic. 1:5 the name refers to the northern kingdom alone, and in Nah. 2:2 to Judah alone. Jacob is sometimes used also as a representative of the nation that bears his name. Israel is the “house of Jacob” (Lk. 1:33); its God is the “King of Jacob” (Isa. 41:21); and his temple is a “habitation for the God of Jacob” (Acts 7:46).

Jacob, Ladder of. Title given to a pseudepigraphic writing, dating possibly to c. A.D. 100, but preserved only, and with many editorial changes, in a medieval Slavonic work. It may be described as an apocalyptic expansion of the narrative about JACOB’S vision of a ladder (Gen. 28:11 – 22). The work places great stress on monotheism and on the future glory of Jacob’s descendants. (English trans. in OTP, 2:401 – 11.)

Jacob, Prayer of. A brief pseudepigraphic work, preserved in a 4th-cent. Greek MS, but composed probably two centuries earlier. Much of the prayer is a series of invocations (perhaps influenced by GNOSTICISM), but near the end there is this request: “Fill me with wisdom; empower me, Lord; fill my heart with good things, Lord.” (English trans. in OTP, 2:715 – 23.)

Jacob, Testament of. See ISAAC AND JACOB, TESTAMENTS OF.

Jacob’s well. There is just one reference naming Jacob’s well in the Bible (pēgē tou Iakōb). According to the Gospel of John, Jesus early in his ministry had to pass through SAMARIA and in so doing reached SYCHAR, “near the plot of ground that Jacob had given to his son Joseph. Jacob’s well was there” (Jn. 4:5 – 6). The location of Sychar is problematic. The modern ʿAskar, which sounds most like it, though in the vicinity, is not near enough to the well. Furthermore, ʿAskar has its own spring. Perhaps Sychar is an evolution of the name SHECHEM. When JACOB came to Shechem, he bought the land on which he was camped (Gen. 33:18). There is no OT record of his digging a well there, but that he should do so is certainly reasonable and expected (cf. 48:22). Shechem is identified with modern Tell Balaṭah, and Bir Ya ʿaqub (as the well is presently called) is about one mile E of this tell. It is also at the foot of Mount GERIZIM, to which the Samaritan woman alluded (Jn. 4:20).

According to the woman’s comment, the well was deep (Jn. 4:11). Today it is c. 75 ft. deep, but it has probably been filled with much debris over the years since it was dug. There are hardly any sites that have less doubt as to their authenticity than the site of Jacob's well. All traditions agree on this as being the scene described in Jn. 4, and the biblical details fit perfectly. Through the centuries, churches have been built over the well, as various medieval pilgrims have recorded. Today the well is in a cave, or crypt, under the floor of a Greek Orthodox church that has never been finished above the exterior walls.

Jacob's well is known for its soft, or light, water that is supplied in two ways: through underground sources that make it a true well and by percolated surface water, which makes it a cistern (Gk. phrear G5853, Jn. 4:11). This detail may have prompted Jesus' remark about living water (v. 14). (See G. H. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways [1935], 212 – 215.)

R. L. ALDEN

Jacubus juh-kyoo'buhs. KJV Apoc. form of AKKUB (1 Esd. 9:48).

Jada jay'duh (יָדָע H3360, possibly "[God] has known [i.e., cared]" or "skillful, shrewd" ). Son of Onam, grandson of JERAHMEEL, and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:28, 32).

Jadah jay'duh (יָדָה H3586 [MT יָדָה], short form of יְהוָה־יָדָה H3389, possibly "Yahweh has adorned"). KJV, NRSV, Jarah. Son of Ahaz and descendant of King S AUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 9:42 NIV, following some Heb. MSS and LXX; MT, "Jarah"); called JEHOADDAH in the parallel passage (8:36).

Jadau jay'daw. KJV form of JADDAI.

Jaddai jad'i (יָדָי H3350 [Qere יָדָי], derivation uncertain; see IDDO). KJV Jadau. One of the descendants of Nebo who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:43; called "Iddo" in 1 Esd. 9:35 [KJV, "Edes"]).

Jaddua jad'yoo,-uh (יָדוע H3348, "known [by Yahweh]"; see JEDAIAH). (1) One of the Israelite leaders who sealed the covenant with NEHEMIAH after the return from the Babylonian captivity (Neh. 10:21). The covenant signified the willingness of the people to abide by the Law of God.

(2) Son of Jonathan (or Johanan) and descendant of JESHUA the high priest (Neh. 12:11, 22). He is widely thought to be the Jaddua whom JOSEPHUS refers to as a high priest at the time that ALEXANDER THE GREAT was beginning his conquests (Ant. 11.8.2; however, see E. M. Yamauchi in EBC, 4:582 – 83; detailed discussion in J. C. VanderKam, From Joshua to Caiaphas: High Priests after the Exile [2004], 63 – 85).

T. E. MCCOMISKEY

Jaddus jad’uhs (Ιοδδους, variant Ιαδδους). Husband of Agia and ancestor of some Israelites that could not prove their right to the priesthood because their genealogy was lost (1 Esd. 5:38; KJV, “Addus”). He is said to have taken his father-in-law’s name, BARZILLAI, and that is the name found in the parallel passages (Ezra 2:61; Neh. 7:63).

S. BARABAS

jade. A general term used to include various mineral substances of tough compact texture, and nearly white to dark green color, used by early man for utensils and ornaments. It includes two mineral species: (1) nephrite, a variety of fibrous amphibole, either tremolite (whitish calcium-magnesium silicate) or actinolite (green calcium-magnesium-iron silicate), and (2) jadeite, a green sodium-aluminum silicate of the pyroxene group, and a dark green to nearly black kind of jadeite called chloromelanite. Much jade has come from Upper Burma, Central India, and southeastern Turkestan. The term is used by the NEB to render Hebrew yāhālōm H3402, a word of uncertain meaning (Exod. 28:18; 39:11; Ezek. 28:13; NIV, “emerald”; NRSV, “moonstone”).

D. R. BOWES

Jadon jay’don (יָדֹן H3347, possibly “[Yahweh] rules” or “frail one”). A man from Meronoth (see MERONOTHITE) who, along with MELATIAH of GIBEON, helped in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:7). These two individuals are further described as “men from Gibeon and Mizpah,” suggesting that Meronoth and MIZPAH are somehow connected or even that they are two names for the same town. Gibeon and Mizpah (or Melatiah and Jadon personally—cf. NRSV) are described as being “under the authority of the governor of Trans-Euphrates.” (JOSEPHUS [Ant. 8.8.5] gives the name Jadon to the man of God who went from Judah to JEROBOAM to warn the king of his sin, 1 Ki. 13; later Jewish tradition identifies this prophet with IDDO the seer, 2 Chr. 9:29.)

S. BARABAS

Jael jay’uhl (יֵאֵל H3605, “mountain goat”). The wife of HEBER the Kenite and slayer of SISERA, a Canaanite commander (Jdg. 4:17 – 22; 5:6, 24). The Canaanite King JABIN of HAZOR oppressed Israel for twenty years. The Canaanites had a formidable force of 900 chariots. The KENITES were their friends, and, because of the Kenite skill in metalworking, were doubtless useful to the Canaanites. Heber, however, lived apart from the other Kenites (4:11). Under the inspiration of DEBORAH, BARAK formed a large force of Israelites at Mount TABOR to fight the Canaanite army, led by Sisera their general, along the River KISHON. The Israelite assault, probably aided by a storm (5:20 – 21), routed the Canaanites. Sisera ran away on foot and came to the tent of Jael, who extended him hospitality. She covered him with a rug, and in response to his request for water gave him milk. Then, as Sisera slept, Jael murdered him by hammering a tent peg through his temple into the ground. Jael’s act is celebrated in the ancient Song of Deborah (ch. 5).

N. B. BAKER

Jagur jay'guhr (יגור H3327, possibly “stone heap”). A town in the NEGEV, the extreme S of the tribal territory of JUDAH, near the border of EDOM (Josh. 15:21). Its precise location is unknown, although one suggestion is Khirbet el-Gharrah, some 11 mi. E of BEERSHEBA (J. Simons, The Geographical and Topographical Texts of the Old Testament [1959], 142).

Jah jah (יה H3363, short form of יהוה). This name, an abbreviation of Yahweh (Jehovah), is used in the KJV only once (Ps. 68:4), but the corresponding Hebrew form occurs over forty times (Exod. 15:2; 17:16; Isa. 12:2; 26:4; 38:11; the rest of the occurrences are in Psalms). In all these other passages it is translated “the LORD.” See GOD, NAMES OF.

Jahath jay'hath (יחא H3511, perhaps “[God] snatches up”). (1) Son of Reiah and descendant of JUDAH; Jahath's sons, Ahumai and Lahad, and possibly also other relatives, are identified as “the clans of the Zorathites” (1 Chr. 4:2). See ZORAH.

(2) Son of Libni, grandson of GERSHON, and great-grandson of LEVI (1 Chr. 6:20 [NIV, “Jehath,” apparently a misprint]). He is also described as the son (descendant?) of Gershon and as the father of Shimei in a list of ASAPH'S ancestors (v. 43), but this may be the result of a scribal error. See SHIMEI #1.

(3) Son of Shimei and descendant of Gershon (1 Chr. 23:10 – 11).

(4) Son of Shelemoth and descendant of Levi (1 Chr. 24:22).

(5) Descendant of Levi through MERARI and an overseer of the workmen who repaired the temple in the reign of King JOSIAH (2 Chr. 34:12).

S. BARABAS

Jahaz, Jahzah jay'haz,jah'zuh (יחז H3403, variant יחזק H3404 [1 Chr. 6:78; Jer. 48:21], derivation unknown). KJV also Jahaza (Josh. 13:18) and Jahazah (21:36). A city in TRANSJORDAN where SIHON, an AMORITE king, was defeated in a great battle by the Israelites when he refused to allow them to pass through his territory (Num. 21:23; Deut. 2:32; Jdg. 11:20). MOSES assigned the city to the tribe of REUBEN (Josh. 13:18), and it was one of the cities given to the Levites descended from MERARI (21:36; 1 Chr. 6:78 [“Jahzah”]). According to the MOABITE STONE, the king of Israel lived in Jahaz while at war with MOAB, but he was driven out, and MESAHA took the city and added it to Moabite territory (see also ATAROTH). The Bible also refers to Jahaz as a city of Moab (Isa. 15:4; Jer. 48:21 [“Jahzah”], 34). Its precise location is uncertain, although some tentatively identify it with Khirbet el-Medeiyineh, c. 11 mi. SE of MEDEBA (for other possibilities, see ABD, 3:612).

Jahaziah jay'hu-zi'uh. KJV form of JAHZEIAH.

Jahaziel juh-hay'zee-uhl (יחזיאל H3487, “God sees”; cf. JAHZEIAH). (1) One of the ambidextrous Benjamite warriors who joined DAVID while he was in exile from SAUL at the PHILISTINE city of ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:4; cf. v. 2).

(2) One of two priests appointed to blow trumpets before the ARK OF THE COVENANT when David brought it to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 16:6).

(3) Son of Hebron and descendant of LEVI in the line of KOHATH; contemporary of David (1 Chr.

23:19; 24:23).

(4) Son of Zechariah and descendant of Levi through ASAPH; moved by the Spirit, he encouraged King JEHOASHAPATH of Judah and his army to fight against the Moabite, Ammonite, and Edomite invaders (2 Chr. 20:14 – 17).

(5) Descendant of Zattu and father of Shecaniah; the latter was among the family heads that returned to Jerusalem after the EXILE (Ezra 8:5, following some LXX MSS; 1 Esd. 8:32 [KJV, “Jezelus”]). However, the MT does not include the name Zattu and leaves the connection between Shecaniah and Jahaziel unclear (cf. KJV).

Jahdai jah’di (יָהֲדַי H3367, prob. “Yahweh leads”). Apparently a descendant of JUDAH, included in the genealogy of CALEB (1 Chr. 2:47). The genealogical connection is unclear, although the expression “The sons of Jahdai...” suggests that the reference is to a man, probably a descendant of Caleb. In the light of the context (cf. vv. 46, 48), some believe that Jahdai was one of Caleb’s concubines, possibly Ephah. (See discussion in G. N. Knoppers, I Chronicles 1 – 9, AB 12 [2004], 313.)

Jahdiel jah’ddee-uhl (יָהֲדִיעֵל H3484, “God rejoices” or “may God give joy”; cf. JEHDEIAH). A clan chief of the half-tribe of MANASSEH; he and others are described as “brave warriors, famous men, and heads of their families” (1 Chr. 5:24). Because of their unfaithfulness, however, they and their families were taken captive by the Assyrians (vv. 25 – 26).

Jahdo jah’doh (יָהֲדוֹ H3482 [see BHK<sup>3</sup> apparatus for the reading יָהֲדוֹ], possibly “[God] rejoices,” otherwise related to a root meaning “to join, be together with”). Son of Buz, descendant of GAD, and ancestor of Abihail; the sons of Abihail and other Gadites occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:14; cf. v. 10).

Jahleel jah’lee-uhl (יָהֲלֵעֵל H3499, “wait for God” or “God shows himself friendly”; gentilic יָהֲלֵעִי H3500, “Jahleelite”). Son of ZEBULUN and eponymous ancestor of the Jahleelite clan (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

Jahmai jah’mi (יָהֲמַי H3503, “[God] protects”). Son (or descendant) of Tola and grandson (or more distant descendant) of ISSACHAR; he is described as head of his family, which probably means he was a military officer (1 Chr. 7:2).

JahoeI. See ABRAHAM, APOCALYPSE OF.

Jahweh. Variant spelling of Yahweh. See GOD, NAMES OF; JEHOVAH.

Jahzah jah’zuh. Alternate form of JAHAZ.

Jahzeel jah’zee-uhl (יָהֲזֵעֵל H3505, variant יָהֲזִיעֵל H3507 [1 Chr. 7:13], “God apportions” or “God favors”; gentilic יָהֲזֵעִי H3506, “Jahzeelite”). Firstborn son of NAPHTALI, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Jahzeelite clan (Gen. 46:24 [NIV, “Jahziel”]; Num. 26:48; called “Jahziel” in 1 Chr. 7:13).

Jahzeiah jah-zee’yah (יְחִזְיָהּ H3488, “Yahweh sees”; cf. JAHAZIEL). KJV Jahaziah. Son of Tikvah. When EZRA told the Israelites that those who had married foreign women should divorce their wives, Jahzeiah was one of four men who opposed him (Ezra 10:15). The Hebrew text, however, can be understood to mean that these four men supported Ezra (cf. LXX as well as the parallel in 1 Esd. 9:14 [KJV, “Ezechias”]); thus the NJPS renders, “Only Jonathan son of Asahel and Jahzeiah son of Tikvah remained for this purpose, assisted by Meshullam and Shabbethai, the Levites.” According to some scholars, the Hebrew expression (omdû’al-zō’t, lit., “stood upon this”) does indicate opposition (cf. 2 Chr. 20:23 et al.), but what Jahzeiah and the others resisted was the delay proposed by the assembly (Ezra 10:12 – 14); in other words, the four men favored Ezra’s decision and argued for swift punishment (cf. H. G. M. Williamson, Ezra-Nehemiah, WBC 16 [1985], 156 – 57).

Jahzerah jah’zuh-ruh (יְחִזְרָה H3492, possibly “prudent” or “cunning”). Descendant of IMMER and grandfather (or ancestor) of a certain Maasai, who was one of the priests to resettle in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:12); probably the same as AHZAI (Neh. 11:13).

Jahziel jah’zee-uhl. Variant form of JAHZEEL.

Jair jay’uhr (יָאִיר H3281, “[God] gives light”; יָעִיר H3600 [only 1 Chr. 20:5; Ketib יָעִיר], “[God] stirs”). (1) Descendant (lit., “son”) of MANASSEH who at the time of the conquest of Canaan occupied sixty villages on the border of GILEAD and BASHAN (see also ARGOB); these settlements came to be known as HAWOTH JAIR (Num. 32:41; Deut. 3:14; Josh. 13:30; 1 Ki. 4:13). According to 1 Chr. 2:21 – 23, Jair’s father was SEGUB, who descended from JUDAH through HEZRON, but whose mother is described as the daughter of Manasseh’s son, MAKIR; thus Jair was apparently regarded as a Manassite through his mother’s side.

(2) A Gileadite who judged or led Israel for twenty-two years (Jdg. 10:3 – 5). He is said to have had thirty sons, each of whom rode a donkey and ruled one of the towns of Hawoth Jair. The connection between this man and #1 above is unclear. It is possible that Jair of Gilead inherited the towns that had been previously under Jair of Segub.

(3) Son of Shimei, descendant of BENJAMIN, and father of MORDECAI, who was the cousin and guardian of ESTHER (Esth. 2:5).

(4) Father of Elhanan, who killed the brother of GOLIATH (1 Chr. 20:5; on the apparent discrepancies between this verse and 2 Sam. 21:19, see ELHANAN).

Jairite jay’uh-rit (יָאִירִי H3285, “of Jair”). A gentilic referring apparently to someone who descended from JAIR #1. It is used to identify IRA, a priest (or royal adviser) of DAVID (2 Sam. 20:26).

Jairus jay-i’ruhs (Ἰάριος G2608 [WH, Ἰάριος], prob. from Heb. יָאִיר H3281 [see JAIR]). (1) Ancestor of a family of temple servants (NETHINIM) who returned from the EXILE (1 Esd. 5:31 [KJV, “Airus”]; possibly corresponding with REAIAH in the parallels, Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:50).

(2) The name of a SYNAGOGUE official whose dead daughter Jesus raised to life (Mk. 5:22; Lk. 8:41). The incident, which took place near Lake Galilee, is recorded in all three Synoptic Gospels

(Mk. 5:21 – 24, 35 – 43; Lk. 8:40 – 42, 49 – 56; Matt. 9:18 – 19, 23 – 26), but the man's name is not given by Matthew. (Although the words “named Jairus” in Mk. 5:22 are omitted by CODEX BEZA and by the Old Latin, there is no reason to suspect, as some have done, that the name was originally absent and added from Luke later.) Jairus is called an archisynagōgos G801, “synagogue ruler” (Mk. 5:22, 35; Lk. 8:41; but Matt. 9:18 and 23 simply say archōn G807, “ruler”), thus indicating he was a leader, whose duties included responsibility for the physical arrangements of the worship services (see RULER OF THE SYNAGOGUE).

Jairus came to Jesus and implored him to heal his daughter (Mk. 5:22 – 23), who was twelve years old (cf. v. 42). As they walked toward his house, a woman who had suffered bleeding for a period of twelve years touched Jesus' cloak and was immediately healed (vv. 25 – 29). At that point, some men arrived and reported that Jairus's daughter had died, but Jesus said to him, “Don't be afraid; just believe” (v. 36). When they reached the house, Jesus stated that the girl was not dead but asleep (prob. indicating that her death had no finality), then took the girl by the hand and said, “Talitha kōum” (Aramaic for “Little girl, get up”), and at once she got up and began to walk around (vv. 39 – 42; see TALITHA CUMI).

It has been suggested that the name Jairus is symbolical, being derived from Hebrew yā'îr H3600, meaning “he stirs up, awakens,” and that the narrative is therefore legendary. This name, however, occurs only once in the OT (1 Chr. 20:5), where the more common name is yā'îr G3281, which means “he gives light”; moreover, Jesus did not tell the girl to wake up, but to get up or arise (Gk. egeirō G1586). It is perhaps possible, though, that the early Aramaic-speaking Christians preserved the memory of the ruler's name because they saw such a connection (cf. R. H. Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross [1993], 267).

W. H. MARE

Jakan jay'kuhn. KJV form of JAAKAN; TNIV form of JACAN.

Jakeh jay'kuh (יָכֵחַ H3681, possibly “prudent” or “[God] preserves”). Father of AGUR, who was the author of sayings recorded in the book of PROVERBS (Prov. 30:1).

Jakim jay'kim (יָכִים H3691, “[God] establishes” [or takes a stand]; see JEKAMIAH). (1) Son of Shimei and Benjamite family head who lived in Jerusalem in DAVID'S day (1 Chr. 8:19; cf. v. 28).

(2) A priest chosen during the time of David to head the twelfth of the twenty-four courses of priests who took turns serving in the sanctuary (1 Chr. 24:12).

Jakin (person) jay'kin (יָכִין H3520, “[God] establishes”; gentilic יַכִּינִי H3522, “Jakinite”). Also Jachin. (1) Son of SIMEON and eponymous ancestor of the Jakinite clan (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12; apparently called JARIB in 1 Chr. 4:24).

(2) A leader of the Levites, appointed by lot as the head of the twenty-first course of priests during DAVID'S time (1 Chr. 24:17).

(3) One of the priests who lived in Jerusalem after the EXILE (1 Chr. 9:10; Neh. 11:10). It is possible, however, that the name may here be used as a family name denoting the priests in the twenty-first course, or the division of which Jakin was the head. In a list of six priests (1 Chr. 9:10 – 13), three of them have names that may be found in the list of divisions (24:17), and two of the remaining names (Adaiah and Maasai) are carefully traced back to ancestors who were the heads of

Jakin (pillar) jay'kin (יָכִין H3521, “[God] establishes”). Also Jachin. The name of one of two bronze pillars SOLOMON placed in front of the TEMPLE; the one he placed on the N side was named Boaz, and the one on the S, Jakin (1 Ki. 7:21; 2 Chr. 3:17). See BOAZ (PILLAR); TEMPLE, JERUSALEM IV.B.5. Both pillars were beautifully adorned with capitals of lily-work, and their primary purpose appears to have been decorative and symbolic. As gateposts visible to the people (most of whom were not allowed inside), they probably indicated the entrance of the God of Israel into his earthly dwelling. (See S. Yeivin in PEQ 91 [1959]: 6 – 22; C. L. Meyers in CBQ 45 [1983]: 167 – 78.)

Jalam jay'luhm (יָלָם H3609, derivation uncertain). KJV Jaalam. Son of ESAU by OHOLIBAMAH; an Edomite chief (Gen. 36:5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. 1:35).

Jalon jay'lon (יָלֹן H3534, derivation uncertain). Son of Ezrah and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:17).

Jambres. See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

Jambri jam'bri (Ἰαμμυρί). The name of a family or tribe that came out of MEDEBA (originally an AMORITE city, Num. 21:31) and took captive John, the brother of Jonathan MACCABEE, and seized everything that he possessed. This outrage was avenged by his brothers, Jonathan and Simon, who ambushed a wedding party of “the sons of Jambri,” killing many, and taking their spoils (1 Macc. 9:36). See MACCABEES.

James jaymz (Ἰάκωβος G2610, hellenized form of Ἰακoυ G2609 [see JACOB]; English James derives from Jacomus, an alteration of Latin Jacobus). This name in the NT most frequently refers to James son of ZEBEDEE, one of the original twelve disciples and brother of the apostle John; his early martyrdom (c. A.D. 41) is recorded in Acts 12:1 – 2. Another James, the brother of Jesus, was not a believer until after the resurrection, but during the 40s he became the leader of the church in Jerusalem (cf. Acts 15:13 – 21); he was probably the author of the epistle of James. A third individual named James, the son of Alphaeus, was one of the twelve disciples. A certain “James the younger” (Mk. 15:40; KJV, “the less”) is sometimes identified with the son of Zebedee and more often with the son of Alphaeus, but he may be a fourth person with the same name. Finally, the father of the disciple Judas (not Iscariot) was named James.

I. James son of Zebedee. References to this James are found only in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts (Matt. 4:21; 10:2; 17:1; Mk. 1:19, 29; 3:17; 5:37; 9:2; 10:35, 41; 13:3; 14:33; Lk. 5:10; 6:14; 8:51; 9:28, 54; Acts 1:13; 12:2). Modestly, John in his gospel refrained from mentioning his brother by name, though he revealed his presence with the other apostles after Jesus' resurrection (Jn. 21:2). The only mention of James by name outside the first three Gospels is in the listing of the apostles (Acts 1:13) and the reference to his death (12:2).

A. Family. James was called the son of Zebedee and the brother of John (see JOHN THE APOSTLE). In the Gospels, the common use of James's name before that of John probably indicates that James was older (Matt. 10:2; 17:1; Mk. 3:17; 5:37). In each of these passages John is identified as the "brother of James." However, in Acts the identification is reversed. James is mentioned as the "brother of John" to those who were less familiar with the earlier unbroken circle of apostles (Acts 12:2).

The father, Zebedee, was a fisherman who owned several boats on the Sea of Galilee and had hired servants (Mk. 1:20; Lk. 5:11). The establishment must have been considerable. Some infer additional evidence of affluence from the fact that John was "known to the high priest" (Jn. 18:15). Perhaps the family owned property in Jerusalem and spent some of their time there. Fishermen with large boats and sufficient manpower were able to catch more and larger fish in the deep waters. When the local market of BETHSAIDA Julias and even of CAPERNAUM had been satisfied, salted fish were delivered as far inland as Jerusalem. Not only Old photo of men repairing their fishing nets on the shore of the Sea of Galilee. James son of Zebedee worked as a fisherman on these same shores.

James and John belonged to the firm (Matt. 4:21); Simon PETER was also a partner (Lk. 5:10), and possibly ANDREW (Mk. 1:16). The mother of James and John was probably SALOME, thought by some to be the sister of the mother of Jesus (cf. Matt. 27:56; Mk. 15:40; Jn. 19:25).

B. Call. James seems not to have been with Peter and Andrew in their pilgrimage to Judea, where they learned of the coming of the “Lamb of God” and received their first call to discipleship (Jn. 1:35 – 51). Perhaps John son of Zebedee was the other disciple of JOHN THE BAPTIST who was with Andrew (v. 40). If so, James probably stayed home to tend the business while three members of the company went to observe the great movement under the Baptist and even attached themselves to him as his disciples. When, upon their return to GALILEE, they recounted the events of Judea, James no doubt caught their faith and enthusiasm. At any rate, he was well prepared for the seemingly abrupt call later at the Sea of Galilee (Lk. 5:2 – 11).

C. Discipleship. Once James became a disciple, he soon occupied a prominent place. He was chosen among the twelve disciples. In each list he stands second or third among the names mentioned, always in company with Peter, John, and Andrew (Matt. 10:2; Mk. 3:17; Lk. 6:14; Acts 1:13). Along with Peter and John, he became a special confidant of Jesus. The three were together at the house of Peter’s mother-in-law with Andrew (Mk. 1:29 – 31). At the house of JAIRUS, Jesus permitted only these three from the circle of the disciples to enter the room with him to the child (Mk. 5:37; Lk. 8:51). At the TRANSFIGURATION, Jesus chose these three to climb the mountain with him (Matt. 17:1; Mk. 9:2; Lk. 9:28). They were not even allowed to tell what they had seen until after Jesus arose from the dead (Mk. 9:9). Finally, at GETHSEMANE, they were again chosen to accompany Jesus (Matt. 26:37; Mk. 14:33).

James was involved in two less complimentary episodes. Soon after the transfiguration, when Jesus was passing through SAMARIA on his way to JERUSALEM (Lk. 9:51 – 52), James and John were deeply offended at the poor reception accorded Jesus by the populace (9:53). So recently having seen the transcendent glory of their Lord, they could not bear the humiliations to which he was subjected. They asked Jesus, “Lord, do you want us to call fire down from heaven to destroy them?” (v. 54). Jesus rebuked them (v. 55). Perhaps this tendency to impetuosity and even fanaticism was in the mind of Jesus when he called them BOANERGES, “Sons of Thunder” (Mk. 3:17).

The other outburst was more selfish. On the occasion of Jesus’ last journey to Jerusalem (Mk. 10:32), presuming on their intimacy with Jesus and possibly on their kinship, the two brothers made the request, “Let one of us sit at your right and the other at your left in your glory” (10:37). The appeal was supported by their mother, a follower of Jesus and faithful supporter of the group (Matt. 20:20 – 28). Jesus rebuked the request (Mk. 10:40) and restored peace (vv. 42 – 45).

On two other occasions, James’s presence is mentioned. He was one of the four on the MOUNT OF OLIVES who asked questions about the end times (Mk. 13:3 – 4). He was also present at the Sea of Galilee when the risen Lord appeared a third time to the disciples and when the miraculous draught of fishes was made (Jn. 21:1 – 14). Of course, the presence of James was also assumed among the disciples at other times when the names were not listed.

D. Death. James is the only one of the Twelve whose martyrdom is related in the NT. He was also the first martyr among the apostles. King Herod Agrippa I (see HEROD VII) made James the first target in his attack upon the church in a wider move of persecution that included the arrest of Peter (Acts 12:1 – 3). That James was prominent enough to be singled out for execution may indicate that Peter, James, and John still formed a special group among the leaders in the church at Jerusalem, as they had among the followers of Jesus, though the martyrdom is the only episode related of James in Acts. If James was not among the most prominent, he must certainly have been among the most feared and hated of the Christians. In his death James fulfilled the prophecy of Jesus that he too should drink of his Master's cup (Mk. 10:39).

E. Apocryphal accounts. Later legends expand the narrative of the NT. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (Hypotyposis) and EUSEBIUS (Hist. 3.25) refer to The Acts of St. John, a heretical work of the 2nd cent., which gives an account of the call of James and of his presence at the transfiguration. Fantastic details regarding the body of Jesus are given. Other accounts are recorded of missionary journeys of James to India, to the "Twelve Tribes" scattered abroad, and to Spain. Based on late legend (6th or 7th cent.), James was made the patron saint of Spain. Marvelous stories are told of his evangelizing and of the return of his body by angels after his martyrdom in Palestine. The angels are said to have guided a ship without sail or rudder to Spain with the holy cargo that was prepared by a series of miracles for veneration. The apostle's alleged bones were discovered in the 9th cent. near a town that was named Santiago de Compostela and that became a place of Roman Catholic pilgrimage (Santiago is Spanish for Saint James, from Latin Sanctus Iacobus, shortened to Sanct Iagus). Though the early death of James robs the legends of even a minimal historical base, the son of Zebedee is known in Christian tradition as James the Great to distinguish him from James the Less (possibly the son of Alphaeus).

II. James, "the Lord's brother." This James is listed first among the BROTHERS OF JESUS, indicating, no doubt, that he was the oldest (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3). PAUL names him as one of the two leaders he met in Jerusalem three years after his own conversion (Gal. 1:19; some argue from this text that Paul regarded him as an apostle, but the Greek is ambiguous). In various passages he is simply called James (Acts 12:17; 15:13; 21:18; 1 Cor. 15:7; Gal. 2:9, 12; Jas. 1:1; Jude 1). In the Gospels he is mentioned by name only twice, and then only to reflect on Jesus' humble origin (Matt. 13:55; Mk. 6:3). However, he is almost certainly included in the brothers who sought to interview Jesus and to dissuade him from his strenuous ministry (Matt. 12:46; Mk. 3:20 – 21, 31 – 32). The brothers also accompanied him to Capernaum (Jn. 2:12). Later they attempted to persuade Jesus to leave Galilee and go to Judea at the time of the Feast of Tabernacles (7:3). At this time the brothers did not believe in Jesus (v. 5), but, as good Jews, they went to the feast (v. 10).

A. Family. The relationship between Jesus and his “brothers” has been much discussed. The most natural interpretation of the word “brother” at the time of the writing of the NT and of other early Christian literature is the literal one—that James and the others were children of Joseph and Mary after the birth of Jesus, Mary’s “firstborn.” This is called the Helvidian view (named for Helvidius, a 4th-cent. Latin theologian). On this view, it appears that James was of a fairly large family. Four brothers of Jesus are named—James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas. Reference is made also to “all his sisters” (Matt. 13:56), an expression that suggests there were at least three of them. It appears then that Jesus had at least seven siblings. The specific references to brothers and sisters for the sake of identification support the Helvidian position, for it would seem remarkable that the speaker or writer had only a general relationship in mind in the use of the terms. This impression is strengthened by the seemingly normal use of the words “son” and “mother” (Matt. 13:55, 56; Mk. 6:3).

An early alternate view, the Epiphanian (named for its chief advocate, EPIPHANIUS, c. 315 – 403, Bishop of Salamis), became popular in the context of reverence for Mary and belief in her perpetual virginity. This idea, supported by various church fathers, was that these “brothers” were children of Joseph by a previous marriage. Since the canonical Gospels furnished no evidence for this position, several apocryphal writings attempted to supply the lack (see APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT I). The tradition that Joseph was over eighty years old at the time of his second marriage lent plausibility to his acceptance of Mary’s perpetual virginity and gave sufficient time for a family that was no real kin of Jesus or Mary. It did, of course, introduce other complications, not the least of which is putting the “brethren” in the wrong generation to match the data of the Gospels, Acts, and the Epistles.

The third major view, the Hieronymian, was suggested by the youthful JEROME to refute Helvidius. He argued that the word “brothers” is a broad and general term that could as well mean “kindred” or “cousins.” Jerome claimed no traditional authority for his theory, but depended entirely upon critical and theological arguments. Though Jerome did not hold to his theory staunchly or consistently (cf. J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul’s Epistle to the Galatians, 10th ed. [1898], 259 – 60), it has been widely held and is the officially recognized view of the Roman Catholic Church. Elaborate but uncertain identifications have been made of relatives, friends, and followers of Jesus to support the Epiphanian and Hieronymian views or at least to provide alternatives to the natural meaning of brother.

The vigorous objections that have been raised against the Helvidian view do not stem from the NT accounts themselves, but from an ASCETICISM that is foreign to both Jewish theology and the teaching of Jesus, and from the emerging doctrine of the perpetual virginity of Mary. On the basis of the gospel records themselves, some degree of departure from the ordinary meaning of words is required if one is to build a case against the view that Joseph’s abstinence was only “until she [Mary] gave birth to a son” (Matt. 1:25; “her firstborn,” Lk. 2:7) and that later several brothers and sisters were born. Judging not only from the place of leadership that James assumed in the church, but also from the fact that his name occurs first in the list of the brothers of the Lord, he must have been the oldest of these children of Joseph and Mary and but a little younger than Jesus himself.

B. Conversion. James and the other brothers were not in sympathy with the ministry and claims of Jesus. Though reared in a godly home and apparently responsive to the religion of the Jews, they did not believe in Jesus (Jn. 7:5). At times they chided him (vv. 2 – 4). Even the mother seems to have doubted his equilibrium on at least one occasion (Mk. 3:21, 31). When Jesus was rejected at NAZARETH, he implied that opposition was even “among his relatives and in his own house” (6:4). Perhaps this same loneliness and sadness of personal experience is reflected in the warnings of Jesus that his followers must be prepared for the opposition of those nearest and dearest to them (Matt. 10:34 – 37; Lk. 14:26). However, the tension between James and Jesus seems not to have reflected long-standing dislike. It is likely that a warm friendship had existed, based on a real admiration for Jesus. Otherwise, would James have so quickly reacted from hostility to faith at the time of the resurrection? There may have been some family resentment over the economic loss when Jesus left his employment to be a rabbi. Such claims as he made must have embarrassed and puzzled the brothers.

The conversion of James must have been a surprising and unexpected event to those who had known his attitude toward Jesus. However, as with Paul, the eruption of faith likely had antecedents that prepared for the crisis. The claims of Jesus may have caused earlier stirrings of conscience that James had ruthlessly suppressed. Even the hostility toward Jesus may have been a reflection of James’s own confusion and frustration. In any case, the matter was resolved by a special appearance of the risen Christ (1 Cor. 15:7). Two results followed at once. James became a staunch believer, joined to the Jerusalem group. Secondly, having seen the risen Lord, he was recognized as a part of the select group of witnesses to the resurrection, a fact without which he would likely never have risen to so great prominence in the church (1 Cor. 9:1; Acts 1:22). The place and circumstances of the appearance to James are unknown. The account in the Gospel of the Hebrews is fanciful, late, and legendary (see HEBREWS, GOSPEL OF THE), but the crucial importance of the event is clear.

C. Prominence. Tradition makes James the BISHOP of Jerusalem (Euseb. Hist. 2.1). It is not likely that he was ever so elected. But the personal character and high spiritual gifts of James, together with his kinship to the Lord, most certainly exerted an influence that soon became a vigorous leadership. As the apostles became involved in broader ministries and missions, James, who stayed in Jerusalem, became the practical leader. At any rate, no one disputes his prominence and influence. Paul, three years after his conversion, met James in Jerusalem (Gal. 1:19). Peter, having escaped from prison, sent word to James and the other believers (Acts 12:17). At the COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, James’s opinion bore the most weight (15:12 – 21). On Paul’s last return to Jerusalem, it was James and the elders who received him (21:18). It was “certain men...from James” who influenced Peter in Antioch (Gal. 2:12). The epistle of James makes evident the authority and wide influence of its writer. JUDE found “brother of James” sufficient identification for himself (Jude 1). This prominence, however, does not indicate office in a separate formal organization called the church. The believers still considered themselves loyal to their Jewish heritage and sought to win their countrymen to the faith. Neither James nor the others in Jerusalem had any thought that he was a “bishop” in the technical sense.

If James achieved leadership in Jerusalem, it is only natural that his influence would spread to the rest of Palestine, whose life centered in Jerusalem. Beyond Palestine, the prestige would be observed mostly among the Jewish Christians of the Gentile lands. Note ANTIOCH OF SYRIA, for instance, where a visit of emissaries from James sent Peter scurrying from the informal fellowship of the gospel to a strict Jewish ceremonialism (Gal. 2:11 – 14).

D. Character. Tradition supports the NT picture of James as a man of large influence, impressive character, and intense piety according to the finest Hebrew ideals. According to the 2nd-cent. writer Hegesippus (as recorded by Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 2.23), James was known as “the Just” and as “the bulwark of the people.” He lived a life of such holiness and piety that he was respected even by nonbelieving Jews. He never ceased to keep the Jewish law with rigor and care. In Hegesippus’s exaggerated account, James was both a NAZIRITE and an ascetic—“he was holy from his mother’s womb, wine and strong drink he drank not, nor did he eat flesh; no razor touched his head; he never anointed himself with oil; and he used not the bath.” His knees were said to be hard as a camel’s because he was so constant in prayer and entreaty to God for pardon for the people.

Though the extreme statements must be discounted, the basic picture agrees with what is known of James. He may have been stern and austere, but he was not narrow and mean. Note his insight and consideration during the Council at Jerusalem (Acts 15:13 – 19). He may have been somewhat prosaic in temperament, but no one doubts his uprightness. The epithet “the Just” correctly reflects the consistency of his faithful conformity to the right way of life as he saw it. Along with his outstanding sincerity and zeal was also a costly fault. Though he admitted the legitimacy of Gentile Christianity, he was too steeped in tradition to follow the Spirit of God into the broad universal thrust of the gospel in an adequate way. The nationalistic faith of James was outstripped by Paul’s more adequate grasp and proclamation. Worse than that, James found himself tied to a doomed and perishing sectionalism, though he had sniffed the air beyond.

E. Writing. One of the NT Epistles identifies the author as “James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ” (Jas. 1:1). Although the authorship of this letter has been disputed, it seems most likely that it was written by James, the Lord’s brother. If so, it may have been composed in the late 40s, making it the earliest NT writing, but some date it as late as the year 60. See further JAMES, EPISTLE OF.

F. Death. JOSEPHUS (Ant. 20.9.1) relates that between the death of FESTUS and the arrival of a new governor, the high priest ANANIAS seized the opportunity to call the judicial council together. He charged James and others with violating the law. Details are not known, but the charges probably involved Christian doctrine. Because of this, James was stoned to death. Josephus reports that the unjust act was protested by pious non-Christian Jews who respected James for his faithfulness to Jewish observances. The high priest was relieved of his office.

Hegesippus (Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 2.23) gives a much more elaborate account of the martyrdom, presumably with legendary embellishments. He reports that, misled by James’s careful keeping of the law, the Jewish authorities supposedly did not realize all that James believed. Having caused him to stand on the wing of the temple to dissuade people from becoming Christians, the Jews were grieved and enraged to hear him give powerful testimony for Jesus. They responded by throwing him down and stoning him. A priest tried to stop the murder, but a fuller ran up and beat James to death with the club he used to beat clothes. This much is true: James died about A.D. 62 for his faith. (See B. Chilton and J. Neusner, eds., The Brother of Jesus: James the Just and His Mission [2001]; P. J. Hartin, James of Jerusalem: Heir to Jesus of Nazareth [2004]; J. Painter, Just James: The Brother of Jesus in History and Tradition, 2nd ed. [2004].)

III. James son of Alphaeus. the only references to James the son of ALPHAEUS in the NT are mere inclusions of his name in the lists of the twelve apostles (Matt. 10:3; Mk. 3:18; Lk. 6:15; Acts 1:13), unless, as many suppose, he is the same person as James the younger (discussed in section IV, below). He heads the third group of four disciples in each of the lists of the Twelve, being coupled with Thaddaeus in Matthew and Mark, and with Simon the Zealot in Luke and Acts. Since MATTHEW, or Levi, is also called the son of Alphaeus (cf. Matt. 9:9; Mk. 2:14), he may possibly be a brother of James. If this is true, however, it is remarkable that these brothers were not associated in any way in the Gospels, as were Simon and Andrew and the sons of Zebedee. Legend says that James was of the house of Gad, was stoned by the Jews for preaching Christ, and was buried near the sanctuary in Jerusalem (E. A. W. Budge, The Contendings of the Apostles, 2 vols. [1899 – 1901], 2:50, 264 – 66).

IV. James the younger. Many believe that James the son of Alphaeus is designated by various names, including “James the younger” (Mk. 15:40; Gk. mikros G3625, lit., “little”; KJV, “James the less”). The expression may refer to his small stature. Or, if he is being compared with the son of Zebedee, he might be both younger and less renowned. James the younger was the son of a certain Mary and the brother of Joses. “Mary the mother of James” is mentioned as present at the crucifixion (Matt. 27:56; Mk. 15:40) and at the discovery of the empty tomb (Mk. 16:1; Lk. 24:10). She is often thought to be the same person as Mary of Clopas (Jn. 19:25). Most English versions translate the text “wife of,” but the Arabic renders it “Mary the daughter of Clopas” (E. Bishop, “Mary [of] Clopas and Her Father,” EvT 73 [1962]: 339). On this basis, the common identification of James the son of Alphaeus with the son of Mary becomes more natural, though it is entirely possible that the same man bore both names, Alphaeus and Clopas. Literature refers to a Simon son of Clopas (Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, 2:50) who has been identified with Simon the Zealot (see CANAN-AEAN). If this were admissible, it would account for pairing James with Simon in Luke and Acts (as other brothers are listed among the Twelve). Others argue that “Mary the mother of James” is the same as the mother of Jesus (cf. Mk. 6:3 and see R. H. Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross [1993], 977). With so few explicit references in the NT, most of these identifications will likely continue to be conjectural, at best.

V. James the father of Judas. All that is known of this James is that he is the father of the apostle JUDAS (not Iscariot), as recorded in Lk. 6:16 and Acts 1:13 (KJV, “Judas the brother of James”).

James, Apocalypse of. Two documents under this title (to be distinguished from the Apocryphon of James) are contained in Codex V of the NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY. The First Apocalypse (NHC V, 3) takes the form of a dialogue between Jesus and JAMES, the brother of the Lord. The first part of this document falls before the PASSION and deals with questions raised by James, who is fearful of future sufferings; the second part, more fragmentary, falls after the resurrection. Most of the Second Apocalypse (NHC V, 4) is formally a speech delivered by James prior to his martyrdom, including an account of an appearance of Jesus and the revelation given by him. Part of the interest of these texts lies in the link that they provide between Gnosticism and the Jewish Christianity that gave so high a place to James. (English trans. in NHL, 260 – 69; see also C. W. Hedrick Nag Hammadi Codices V, 2 – 5 and VI, with Papyrus Berolinensis 8502, 1 and 4, ed. D. Parrott [1979], 105 – 49.)

James, Apocryphon of. A “secret book” included in the NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY (NHC I, 2; cf. line 10). Composed in the form of a letter written by JAMES, the Lord’s brother, it reports a postresurrection dialogue between Jesus and both James and PETER, though much of it may be regarded as a revelatory discourse. The work is preserved only in a 4th-cent. Coptic MS, but the original Greek was produced at least a century earlier and seems to reflect the teachings of Valentinian GNOSTICISM. (Text, English trans., and notes in Nag Hammadi Codex I (The Jung Codex), ed. H. W. Attridge, 2 vols. [1985], 1:13 – 53, 2:7 – 37; trans. also in NHL, 29 – 37.)

James, Ascents of. A document mentioned in connection with the EBIONITES by EPIPHANIUS (Pan. 30.16), who says it presented JAMES, the Lord’s brother, as speaking against the temple, sacrifice, and the altar fire. He also says that it was violently hostile to PAUL. Taking Acts 21:39 as a starting point, the Ebionites alleged that Paul was a Greek, born of Greek parents, who after a stay in Jerusalem wanted to marry the high priest’s daughter, and so became a proselyte and submitted to circumcision. Later, enraged at the disappointment of his hopes, he wrote against circumcision, the Sabbath, and the law.

The presentation of James and the hostility to Paul recall the Jewish Christianity of the CLEMENTINE LITERATURE, especially the final chapters of the first book of the Recognitions (G. Strecker, Das Judenchristentum in den Pseudoklementinen [1958], 252 – 53, postulates a common archetype). There are also links with the account of the martyrdom of James from Hegesippus (quoted in Euseb. Eccl. Hist. 2.23.3 – 18), and J. B. Lightfoot suggests that the story to which Hegesippus was indebted “was the grand finale of these ‘ascents,’ of which the earlier portions are preserved in the Recognitions” (Saint Paul’s Epistle to the Galatians, 10th ed. [1898], 367 n. 1). The book probably owes its title to the fact that it described the ascents of James up the temple stairs, from which he harangued the people (Lightfoot, Galatians, 330 n. 2). H. J. Schoeps (Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums [1949], 381ff.) discusses possible connections with a lost Ebionite Book of Acts.

I. Background. The epistle of James is the most Jewish book in the NT. Except for two or three explicit references to Christ, it would fit rather well in the OT. The life to which the epistle exhorts is that of a profoundly pious Jew who is fulfilling the law in every regard. Gospel, redemption, incarnation, and resurrection are not mentioned. The interest is in the fruits, not the roots. The author is indeed a Christian, writing to believers, but the focus is not on how to become believers. It is on the second stage—on how to advance along the way of HOLINESS and to translate the ethical implications of the new faith into practical realities (R. V. G. Tasker, The General Epistle of James, TNTC [1957], 11). The gospel fulfilled the law.

Though there are only five direct verbal quotations from the OT (Jas. 1:11; 2:8; 2:11; 2:23; 4:6), the atmosphere of the Hebrew Bible dominates the book. Allusion is made to passages from all three divisions of the OT CANON. Among specifically Jewish terms used are “Lord of hosts” (5:4 NRSV) and GEHENNA (“hell,” 3:6). W. E. Oesterley (in EGT, 4:393ff.) remarks that a still more cogent Jewish factor is the accumulation of many small points that indicate Hebrew methods of thought, expression, and phraseology. This Hebraic coloring is, he believes, one of the most pronounced characteristics of the epistle. Though the Greek is often compared with the best in the NT, the stylistic expression seems, occasionally at least, to be molded from a Hebrew pattern. A strong tendency to assonance and pleonasm as well as a terse and forceful way of putting things are Hebraic qualities.

A still more striking fact is the number of parallels between this epistle and the words of Jesus. As A. Ross says, “this Epistle contains more verbal reminiscences of the teaching of Jesus than all of the other apostolic writings” (The Epistles of James and John, NICNT [1954], 16). Instead of quoting specifically from the Gospels, it seems that the author is simply reflecting the words he heard from the lips of Jesus himself, perhaps as they worked together as youths in NAZARETH. He certainly knew and shared the insights and attitudes reflected in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT, in PARABLES, and in other teachings about life, poverty, and values (cf. Jas. 1:22 with Matt. 7:20, 24; Jas. 3:12 with Matt. 7:16; Jas. 2:5 with Matt. 5:3; Jas. 4:11 – 12 with Matt. 7:1; Jas. 5:2 with Matt. 6:19; and Jas. 5:12 with Matt. 5:34 – 37).

II. Unity. Opinions differ concerning the unity of this epistle. Some see no particular thematic connection in it (A. Jülicher, An Introduction to the New Testament [1904], 215). Various ideas of composite authorship have been suggested, often based on a core of materials coming from James in Jerusalem, perhaps in Aramaic, later rewritten in good Greek (e.g., F. C. Burkitt, Christian Beginnings: Three Lectures [1924], 65 – 70). A. T. Cadoux, at the other extreme, finds the epistle “probably the most completely patterned book in the Bible” (The Thought of St. James [1944], 6). He calls attention to its four divisions, each containing four subdivisions.

The truth may not be at either extreme. There is a tone of authority that hardly goes with a late and composite authorship. Fifty-four imperatives occur in one hundred eight verses. This seems to reflect the kind of certainty that belongs to a recognized leader and spokesman among the apostles. Likewise, the absence of the usual references to incarnation, atonement, and the death and resurrection of Jesus inclines toward unity of authorship. Late editors, overlooking the cause for the omissions, would almost certainly have supplied this lack. Furthermore, hortatory materials tend to have their own peculiar kind of unity. Wisdom literature, of which James is a part, is sometimes more like a string of beads—a series of loosely connected ideas. There may be some truth in Tasker’s suggestion (James, 9) that the epistle is more of a “collection of sermon notes” than a polished sermon. Even so, there is a unity and pattern of thought centering around the exhortation to constancy and holy living that could hardly have been the work of any but the original writer. (Note below, under Contents, how the main body of the epistle is an elaboration of the three elements of Jas. 1:19.)

The authority, freshness, directness, and intrinsic outline can hardly be explained other than by unity of authorship.

III. Authorship. The epistle, if not pseudepigraphic, must have been written by JAMES, the Babylonian design of a horse with a bit and bridle. James compares the power of the tongue to the power of the bit placed into the mouth of a horse to guide it (Jas. 3:3).

brother of the Lord. EUSEBIUS and JEROME mention the opinion of some in the early church that it may have been published by another under James's name. This view has also appealed to those modern scholars who on general considerations assign it a late date and who regard it as a moral treatise instead of a letter. However, the absence of motive for a pseudonymous production is a strong argument against it. If it is merely a moralizing tract, why did it need James's authority, and why should he be chosen? Furthermore, the epistle bears none of the marks usually claimed as indications of PSEUDONYMITY. In the one verse that exhibits any strictly epistolary character (Jas. 1:1), there is no mention of apostleship. Nor is there any autobiographical reference in the body of the writing.

In view of these facts and of the total absence of proof that any canonical book was ever written under an assumed name, it is better to believe that the church's acceptance of the book involved a general agreement on its genuineness. Besides, would an unknown 2nd-cent. writer really have gained a hearing for such a discursive document merely by taking the common name of James? Does not the meaning of the name depend on the well-accepted authority of this president of the Jerusalem church? Once this identity is established, does it not carry with it a Sitz im Leben quite impossible to counterfeit?

Certainly the author was a Jew (see below, section V). Moreover, he calls himself simply "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Jas. 1:1). If this had been the son of ZEBEDEE or the son of ALPHAEUS, he would likely have called himself an apostle or would have given some added identification, as did JUDE (Jude 1), and as is common with all but one who bore the name of James. At any rate, the son of Zebedee died too early (no later than A.D. 44), and there is no evidence that the early church assigned the epistle to the son of Alphaeus. The James at Jerusalem who needed no further identification was unquestionably the Lord's brother. He had the recognized authority that would permit him to speak so freely in the imperative mood. It was he who appeared in the unvarying role of leader in Jerusalem—when Peter escaped from prison (Acts 12:17), at the COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM (15:13 – 21), when Paul made his final visit to Palestine (21:18), and whenever his name appears in Scripture or tradition.

Other factors support the identification. There are coincidences of phraseology between the epistle and both the speech of James at the Council of Jerusalem and the letter from that council (cf. Acts 15:23 with Jas. 1:1; Acts 15:13 with Jas. 2:5; Acts 15:19 with Jas. 5:19 – 20; and Acts 15:17 with Jas. 2:7). The epistle therefore is the work of the type of mind reflected in all that is known of this James. He was strict, careful, and zealous, possibly to the point of ASCETICISM. Severe with himself, he commanded discipline on the part of others. Finally, there are the verbal reminiscences of the teaching of Jesus, to which attention has already been called. The abundance and naturalness of these do not indicate the work of a 2nd-cent. forger. These are not formal quotations from a hardened tradition. They drop freely as from a mind saturated with the thoughts of Jesus from long association with him.

Objections have been raised. W. Barclay, for example, marvels that such a book should have only two incidental references to Jesus, and none at all to the resurrection, or to Jesus as the MESSIAH (The Letters of James and Peter [1958], 38 – 39). The good Greek also seems strange to some as coming from a Jew. The answer to the first problem seems to be in the purpose of the book. James is not presenting the gospel. He is defending the practical and ethical demands of God upon his people. The point at issue is not God's provision, but human obligation. The epistle is a prophetic diatribe against unfaithfulness and lack of discipline. Why should it be complicated with theological questions that would only divert the pressure from their smarting consciences? As to the excellence of the Greek, estimates vary. Is there any reason that a bilingual Jew from Galilee of the Gentiles could not polish his Greek in thirty-two years of discussion and debate at a center like Jerusalem until he could handle it with skill, especially in its simple terse forms? It should be remembered that James avoided complex sentences. Short, pungent commands served his purpose better.

IV. Date. Those who accept James the Just, brother of the Lord, as author of the epistle are obliged to date it before A.D. 62, the year of the death of James, between the governorships of Festus and Albinus. Others tend to date it anywhere from late 1st cent. to late 2nd cent., with perhaps A.D. 125 a general favorite. W. E. Oesterley (in EGT, 4:405) avoids the difficult choice by suggesting the possibility that the core of the epistle was a work of James, but was elaborated as time went on by commentary—much after the manner that, on a much larger scale, the comments on the words of Scripture became the MISHNAH, the comments on these the GEMARA, and finally the TALMUD. For reasons already discussed (see above under Unity), this composite authorship should likely be rejected. If Lightfoot and others are correct in seeing James reflected in 1 Clement (see CLEMENT, EPISTLES OF), the epistle must belong to the 1st cent. James gives the thought in a more terse and rugged form than Clement, and he must have written first (J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James [1913], clxix). Once a 1st-cent. date has been conceded, little reason remains for rejecting James as author and for objecting to the early date. The writing comes too close to the lifetime of James for one to borrow his name successfully.

A choice still remains for those who accept James as the author. Was it before or after the COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM? The seemingly settled condition of affairs and the presence of wealth and perhaps intellectualism in the Christian communities tend to indicate as late a date as possible, therefore around A.D. 60. JOSEPHUS, at least, makes abundant mention of the oppressive rich in the period leading up to the rebellion against Rome (A.D. 67 – 70). However, none of these arguments are conclusive for the later period. Would not the foundations of the Jewish Christian church have already been well laid by the year 45 or 50? Were there not people of means among the followers of Jesus and even among the apostles (as, for example, the sons of Zebedee, Matthew, and the ladies who ministered of their means)? Did not Mary the mother of Mark have a large home with servants in the early days of the Jerusalem church? And might not the temptation to fawn on the rich be all the greater where their numbers were few?

It still seems possible to hold, with Mayor and others, to an early date, even the earliest of any NT book. Indeed, the epistle reflects no knowledge of the existence of Gentile Christians. There is no whisper of the controversy relating to the Council of Jerusalem. James came early to a position of authority (Acts 12:17). No man in the apostolic circle at this period had the ear of the Jewish Christians as did James. One does not have to wait many decades to find need for strong ethical preaching to those converted out of either heathen practices or the sins of the Jews. The extreme “Jewishness” of writer and reader in every way tends to confirm the probability of an early date—perhaps A.D. 45 – 48.

V. Place of origin. If the previous conclusions are accepted, there can be little doubt as to the place of origin of this epistle. There is no record of James’s absence from Jerusalem after his assumption of the leadership of the Jewish church, nor would there need to be. The influence of the Jerusalem church provided a natural support for the leadership of its president in matters that affected Jewish Christians, wherever they were found. As the temple in Jerusalem had been the hub of the Jewish world to which worshipers traveled from afar, so the believing Jews gravitated to Jerusalem with their questions and problems. James was apparently a cosmopolitan figure without the necessity for travel. The thoroughly Jewish background of the writer has already been discussed (see above, section I). Though it must be admitted that he knew Greek well and constantly associated with Hellenistic as well as Palestinian Jews, there is nothing in the epistle incongruous with the view that it originated in Jerusalem under the pen of James the brother of the Lord.

VI. Destination. The epistle presupposes not only a Jewish author but also readers of the same background. The most natural understanding of “the twelve tribes in the Dispersion” (Jas. 1:1 NRSV) would be that the epistle is addressed to Jews scattered throughout the Roman empire. The fact that they are repeatedly called “brethren” and “beloved brethren” perhaps implies that they are Christian believers. The matter is practically settled by reference to their having faith “in our glorious Lord Jesus Christ” (2:1). Further confirmation, if needed, is found in the appeal to the near return of the Lord (5:8). If the epistle was written before the Jerusalem council, the only generally recognized Christians would be Jewish Christians, meeting in synagogues and homes. Indeed, the word for “synagogue” is used in the Greek (2:2). The distinctly Jewish references throughout appear to communicate rather than obstruct. The primary addressees are Jews scattered abroad but bound together in a common faith in Jesus Christ. However, unconverted Jews would find much that is familiar in the ethical treatise that demands fulfillment of the law. And Gentile Christians, when they appear, would certainly find in it the way of Christian living. If the epistle was written much later than here suggested, it might then be necessary to apply it to the spiritual Israel, the Christian believers of whatever background who were scattered for their faith.

VII. Occasion. Some deny that the epistle is occasional; that is, they see no particular circumstance that specifically called for the book to be written. Several circumstances did, indeed, precede the writing. Some see an allusion to a period of persecution in the reference to trials (Jas. 1:2). However, the epistle reflects not a major peak of persecution but animosities aroused, losses endured, liability to insults, and interference with ways of life and religious services. Another circumstance, largely learned from other sources, is the strong position of leadership early achieved by James the Just. It is evident from the writing itself that sufficient time had elapsed for some of the original fervor of the converts to wane. This, of course, need not be many years. Possibly none of these circumstances was the occasion of the writing in any specific sense. All together, they perhaps constituted a situation in which the Spirit of God moved his messenger to rebuke the sins into which the readers were slipping and to call the believers into a disciplined life of holiness.

Alternative views have been held. Some see James engaged in an unlikely diatribe against PAUL'S view of JUSTIFICATION by faith alone. Others see him attacking those who perverted Paul's teaching. Both of these ideas demand a late date of the epistle and tend to exaggerate the differences between Paul and James. Cadoux (The Thought of St. James, 26) offers a better suggestion: there was need to send something back with Jewish Christians who visited Jerusalem so that they could encourage and establish the believers scattered abroad. This concern may have been the occasion for the writing.

VIII. Purpose. The purpose of the epistle is clearly practical and ethical. Doctrine is assumed more than enunciated. The thrust is for action and obedience. The law is to be lived. The ethical implications of the new faith need to be translated into practical realities if the believers are to advance along the way of holiness. The mood is hortatory. The purpose is to correct faults, to instruct the wavering, to instill discipline, to rebuke backslidings, and to encourage genuine godliness throughout the redeemed fellowship, wherever believers could be found among the Jews who were scattered abroad.

IX. Canonicity. Direct external evidence for the acceptance of the epistle is relatively late and sometimes ambiguous. This is not strange if its original thrust was toward a Jewish Christianity that soon withered and was displaced by a more viable universal mission. Unlike the writings of Paul and the Gospels, this epistle had to work its way back into the general church as a secondary audience after its original audience had perished. Not written by one of the Twelve and not addressed to a single church that would preserve and defend it, the epistle's comeback was slow.

ORIGEN is the first to cite James, though he spoke as if some would demur to its authority. The Syriac version includes it, and F. J. A. Hort (The Epistle of St. James [1909], xxviii) thinks it likely that it did so from the first in the older Syriac translation. EUSEBIUS (Hist. 2.23) places James among the antilegomena, as practically accepted in most churches but not in all. He himself, however, quotes Jas. 4:11 as Scripture and 5:13 as spoken by the holy apostle. From Eusebius onward the book had a firm place in the Greek churches. It was used freely by Didymus and Cyril of Alexandria, Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory Nazianzus, and Ephraem of Edessa. The Antiochene Fathers (like CHRYSOSTOM), who kept to the Syrian Canon, used James.

In the W the reception was not so rapid. Neglected largely until late in the 4th cent., it was then adopted through Jerome and AUGUSTINE. The Third Council of Carthage, in 397, finally clarified the status for the Western church, and from that date forward its canonicity was unquestioned until the time of the Reformation, when Erasmus and Cajetan revived old doubts. Luther, finding much straw in it in comparison with his favorites, Romans and Galatians, assigned it a secondary place. Luther's judgment, however, has not been sustained by Protestantism in general.

Thus far, only the more formal evidences for the canonicity of the epistle have been discussed. The more casual references, quotations, and allusions may be even more revealing of the faith of the early church. Formal literature often waits for doubts and questions to arise. Quotations and allusions follow normal use and acceptance from the first. It is remarkable that the earliest witnesses belong to the church at Rome, which was one of the latest to recognize the epistle formally. In the early days, the church at Rome had a large Jewish component (see ROME, CHURCH AT). Having lost this, it had to rediscover James.

At any rate, Clement of Rome, in the 1st cent., reflects knowledge of the epistle. In the 2nd cent., the same appears to be true of IGNATIUS, POLYCARP, JUSTIN MARTYR, the Epistle to DIOGNETUS, IRENAEUS, and Hermas (see HERMAS, SHEPHERD OF). Since canonicity depends not on decrees of councils but on the INSPIRATION of the HOLY SPIRIT, recognized by believers, perhaps the evidence of an early wide use of the epistle of James speaks more loudly for canonicity than the temporary “official” silence could speak against it. See also CANON (NT).

X. Text. Aside from a papyrus of Jas. 2:19—3:9 (P<sup>20</sup>=POxy 1171), the earliest Greek text of James is found in CODEX VATICANUS (B, 4th cent). Other uncials, in order of relative importance, are CODEX SINAITICUS (Ⲛ 4th cent.), CODEX EPHRAEMI (C, 5th cent.), and CODEX ALEXANDRINUS (A, 5th cent.). Relatively brief portions are also found from the 4th cent. in P<sup>23</sup> (POxy 1229), and from the 5th cent. in 048 (Codex Patiriensis), 0166 (Heidelberg), and P<sup>54</sup>. Several others are scattered through the 8th and 9th centuries, including minuscule 33, the “queen of the cursives.” J. H. Ropes says that “in addition about 475 manuscripts dating from the tenth to eighteenth centuries are enumerated in the lists of Gregory and H. von Soden” (A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle of St. James, ICC [1916], 75).

Since most of the important variants were in existence about as early as B, the value of the documents is not primarily based on date but on the soundness of the principles or tastes on which they are built. Careful testing shows that B is relatively free from emendation and thus, with due precaution, should generally be followed except when positive evidence from “transcriptional” or other internal probability outweighs the authority of B. The other witnesses serve two purposes: when they disagree with B, their readings may commend themselves by internal character as superior; when they agree with B, they guarantee that the reading was not due to an idiosyncrasy of B. The wider currency of the reading also increases confidence.

By following the above guidelines, Ropes believes (Commentary, 86), one will not have a perfect text of the epistle but will have fewer emended readings than by following any other document or group of documents. The versions prove that the oldest MSS as a whole are immensely superior to the later eclectic texts commonly used in the Greek-speaking churches from the middle of the 4th cent. The recensions are valuable for the fragments of older texts they contain and not for their continuous texts.

XI. Special problems. The most publicized problem of the epistle is its seeming contradiction to Paul’s doctrine of justification by faith. Luther in particular was greatly disturbed by the position of James (Colloquia, 2:202; see Table Talk in Luther’s Works, vol. 54, ed. H. T. Lehmann [1967], 424–35). Paul said, “For we hold that a person is justified by faith apart from works prescribed by the law” (Rom. 3:28 NRSV). James said, “You see that a person is justified by works and not by faith alone” (Jas. 2:24 NRSV). It is important to understand what each meant. FAITH, to Paul, was a trust that cannot exist without obedience. It must be a vital, working faith, a faith that works by love (Gal. 5:6). For this truth James also contended. Faith is not a magic formula. It must have works that demonstrate its genuineness and efficacy, otherwise it is dead. James and Paul were not fighting each other; they were opposing a common enemy.

Roman Catholics have also claimed the epistle as authority for the sacrament of extreme unction. Anointing with oil is not only reported but recommended in connection with prayer for physical and spiritual healing (Jas. 5:14 – 15; see ANOINT).

“But when he asks, he must believe and not doubt, because he who doubts is like a wave of the sea, blown and tossed by the wind” (Jas. 1:6).

This injunction has been followed and this promise claimed many times in the history of the church. Considerable shift occurred when this practice was divorced from the healing of the sick and made a sacrament for the dying. The problem is not in the text but in its distortion.

The word elder (Jas. 5:14) in an early epistle has puzzled some scholars. See ELDER (NT). Did the early Jerusalem church have that much organization? They did worship in “synagogues.” Jewish synagogues had elders, older men of influence, who directed the affairs. What would be so strange about calling by the same name those who performed a similar function, regardless of the stage of organization (cf. Acts 15:6)?

XII. Contents. Some have likened WISDOM Literature in general and this epistle in particular to a string of beads. In this intensely hortatory situation, one might expect only a series of ideas instead of a logically developed structure. However, even beads may be strung in a pattern; James did outline his thoughts.

The governing idea is PATIENCE, in terms of steadfastness, constancy, or endurance. The frequent use of the word patience in the KJV emphasizes the pattern (Jas. 1:3 – 4; 5:7 – 8, 10 – 11), though synonyms in other versions may communicate better. James is exhorting the readers to endure, to overcome all opposition from within and without, and to remain with undeviating constancy on the course of the heavenly wisdom. Only thus can blessedness be experienced here or hereafter (1:2 – 3, 12). In view of the goodness of God and the source of life in him (1:16 – 18), three rules emerge that form the basic outline of the body of the book: be quick to hear, slow to speak, slow to anger (v. 19).

Chapter 5 returns to the theme of patience or constancy, now in terms of the imminent coming of the Lord and of the efficacy of prayer.

1. Exhortation to constancy (1:1 – 22)
  1. The use of trials (vv. 1 – 4)
  2. The use of faith (vv. 5 – 11)
  3. Triumph over temptation (vv. 12 – 15)
  4. Divine provision (vv. 16 – 18)
  5. Human response (vv. 19 – 22)
2. Elements of constancy (1:23—4:17)
  1. Quick to hear (1:23—2:26)
    1. Hearing and doing (1:23 – 27)
    2. Hearing and impartiality (2:1 – 13)
    3. Faith and works (2:14 – 26)
  2. Slow to speak (3:1 – 12)
    1. Temptation of leaders (vv. 1 – 5)
    2. Threat of speech (vv. 6 – 12)
  3. Slow to anger (3:13—4:17)
    1. Pure and peaceable wisdom (3:13 – 18)
    2. Chaos of human passions (4:1 – 4)
    3. Provision for deliverance (4:5 – 10)
    4. Humble obedience (4:11 – 17)
3. Confirmation of constancy (5:1 – 20)
  1. The certainty of justice (vv. 1 – 6)
  2. The imminence of the judge (vv. 7 – 12)
  3. The power of prayer (vv. 13 – 18)
  4. The value of righteousness (vv. 19 – 20)

XIII. Theology. The theology of the epistle is more implicit than explicit. The thrust is hortatory and ethical. It is addressed to people who already are familiar with the OT and who have been informed of the relevance of Jesus as the One who fulfilled the promises of redemption. They have already believed on him, found life in him, and suffered for their faith. It is not new doctrine that is needed. Rather, the necessary element is steadfastness in what they already know and experience. Theology is not discussed for its own sake in the epistle. It is introduced from time to time in support of practical exhortations.

Even so, James finds expression for his theology. Twice he uses the formula “Lord Jesus Christ” (Jas. 1:1; 2:1), as if the person of the divine Christ were beyond debate. The holiness of God does not even admit of temptation (1:13). Spiritual life comes to us by direct divine bestowal (1:18). God demands ethical righteousness of his people (4:4 – 5). There is a personal devil who can and must be resisted (4:7). Nothing escapes the ears of the Judge, who is already at the door (5:9). The hope of the return of the Lord is sure (5:7 – 8). Prayer is real and effective (5:13 – 18). Nothing is too hard for God.

James, Protevangelium of. The oldest and most famous of the infancy gospels, this document is significant (a) for its evidence of the extent to which devotion to MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS, had already developed by the time of its composition, and (b) for its influence on later developments in the history of Mariology. With the Infancy Gospel of Thomas, this work formed the basis on which the later infancy gospels were constructed (e.g., the Arabic and Armenian infancy gospels, the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, etc.); most of them incorporate considerable parts of its contents along with material drawn from other sources.

I. Content. The infancy narratives in Matthew and Luke carry the story of Jesus back to his birth and to the birth of his forerunner, JOHN THE BAPTIST. The Protevangelium begins with the birth of Mary. The story starts with a wealthy but childless couple, Joachim and Anna. Publicly reproached because he alone has not begotten children in Israel, Joachim goes off sadly to the wilderness, where he remains forty days and forty nights. Meanwhile his wife Anna mourns her childlessness. An angel appears to her (and also to Joachim), promising that her prayers will be granted. In due time the child is born and named Mary. At the age of three she is presented in the temple, and remains there, nurtured like a dove and receiving food from the hand of an angel.

When Mary reaches the age of twelve, the widowers of Israel are summoned together, and JOSEPH is chosen by a miraculous sign to take her under his charge. Leaving her in his home he goes off to his work of building. Mary is chosen with other virgins to weave a veil for the temple, and during this time, the ANNUNCIATION takes place, followed by the visit to ELIZABETH (cf. Lk. 1). On his return after some months' absence, Joseph finds Mary with child, but is reassured by an angel (cf. Matt. 1:18 – 21). The matter is reported to the high priest, and Mary and Joseph are subjected to trial by ordeal, from which they emerge unscathed. Following the edict of AUGUSTUS, they travel to BETHLEHEM. Joseph finds a cave for Mary, leaves her in the care of his sons, and goes in search of a midwife. (Here there is a sudden switch to the first person, as Joseph describes the silence of all things at the nativity.) After episodes concerning the midwife and the unbelieving Salome, the story continues with the visit of the MAGI and the slaughter of the innocents. It is Mary's fear at the news that leads her to lay her child in a manger; John and Elizabeth are miraculously delivered, but Zacharias (ZECHARIAH) is murdered at the altar (he is thus identified with the Zechariah of Matt. 23:35). The final paragraph gives the writer's name as JAMES.

II. Character. The document is marked by evident use of OT motifs, especially from the story of SAMUEL, and by equally clear use of the canonical Gospels. There are quotations from the infancy narratives of both Matthew and Luke, and several passages are written in imitation of the canticles in Luke. The book therefore presupposes the canonical Gospels, although it makes free use of the material drawn from them, and may at some points supplement this material from oral tradition (e.g., in placing the birth in a cave). There is a strong element of the miraculous in the description of Mary's childhood and upbringing, but the tone of the work is on the whole comparatively restrained.

The author was not familiar with Jewish customs and thus was probably neither a Jew nor a Jewish Christian. For example, Joachim's childlessness is made to debar him from presenting his offering; Mary is brought up within the temple; the altar seems to be thought of as indoors. On the other hand, there is nothing specifically heretical in the book, although it was later to be condemned in the Western church. It was clearly written for the glorification of Mary, the Jewish slanders relating to the VIRGIN BIRTH being refuted by implication, and testimony provided for Mary's subsequent virginity by outside witnesses.

III. Text. The oldest MS is the Papyrus Bodmer V, published in 1958 and dated by its editor to the 3rd cent. (E. de Strycker, La forme la plus ancienne du Protévangile de Jacques [1961], 14 n. 3, corrects to the first half of the 4th). Most of the other Greek MSS are comparatively late, from the 10th cent. and after. No complete Latin MS has survived, but there are ancient Latin texts that incorporate portions, and there is evidence that a Latin version was once current (Bib 43 [1962]: 57ff.). In addition, there are versions in Syriac, Armenian, Ethiopic, Georgian, and other languages, not to mention the various paraphrases and adaptations based upon the work. The MS tradition has been exhaustively examined by de Strycker, who concludes that it shows a remarkable homogeneity and continuity (pp. 374 – 75). Even the Bodmer Papyrus, however, already shows numerous errors, although most of them are superficial and it remains by far the most faithful witness.

IV. Title. The title Protevangeliium owes its established position to Postel and Neander, who in the 16th cent. were the first to publish the text. The Bodmer Papyrus has the unusual double title "Birth of Mary, Revelation of James," of which the second part is almost certainly wrong (two Apocalypses of James and an Apocryphon of James in the NAG HAMMADI LIBRARY have no connection whatever with the present work). Later Greek MSS usually have "Story," "History," or "Account," and a statement of the contents, without mention of James; but as noted above the final paragraph affirms that the book was written by James. ORIGEN refers to a "Book of James" for the view that Jesus' "brothers" were Joseph's sons by a previous marriage. The James in question is commonly identified with the Lord's brother, not the son of Zebedee; but some authorities simply speak of James without further identification.

V. Date. The Bodmer Papyrus is proof that the document by the early 4th cent. had been in existence long enough for errors to creep into the text. How much earlier it can be placed depends on our assessment of patristic evidence. Origen apparently knew it, although he gives a different account of the death of Zacharias. It is also possible that the work was known to CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA. On the other hand, while there are links with JUSTIN MARTYR in the reference to the cave and to the Davidic descent of Mary, these are not sufficient to justify the claim that Justin knew the book. The materials from which it is composed may have been current about A.D. 150, but this does not mean that the book itself was already in existence. The use of the canonical Gospels points to a period when these were already fairly well established, although oral tradition was still available. This suggests a date in the latter half of the 2nd cent., but there are also problems relating to the composition and integrity of the work.

VI. Integrity. Three points in particular have given rise to doubts concerning the unity of the work: (a) the first-person passage in 18.2, already mentioned (it is missing from the Bodmer papyrus); (b) Origen's use of a different story of the death of Zacharias, which suggests that this passage was not in the text he knew; and (c) certain variations in chs. 18 – 21 (the Bodmer text is shorter and omits some of the dialogue in the episode of Salome and the midwife).

Following earlier scholars, A. von Harnack distinguished three documents incorporated into the work as we have it; a "Nativity of Mary" (chs. 1 – 17), an "Apocryphon of Joseph" (chs. 18 – 20), and an "Apocryphon of Zacharias" (chs. 22 – 24). The Zacharias section is often considered a later addition in view of Origen's silence, but whether the other two sections were originally separate is more doubtful. The story seems to require the birth of Jesus for its completion, and this leads naturally to the story of the Magi. Possibly only chs. 23 – 24 are later interpolations, together with the passage in 18.2. De Strycker claims that the Bodmer text is not an original version later to be expanded but an abridgement that presupposes the longer version. He rejects Harnack's three-document theory and argues for the unity of the book, although admitting that there are certain redactional anomalies. (English trans. in NTAp, 1:421 – 39; see also H. R. Jamin jay'min (יָמִין H3546, "valued, fortunate"; gentilic יָמִינִי H3547, "Jaminite"). (1) Son of SIMEON, grandson of JACOB, and eponymous ancestor of the Jaminite clan (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12; 1 Chr. 4:24).

(2) Son of RAM, grandson of JERAHMEEL, and descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 2:27).

(3) A Levite who helped EZRA instruct the people in the law (Neh. 8:7; 1 Esd. 9:48 RSV [KJV, "Adinus"; NRSV, "Jadinus"]).

Jamlech jam'lik (יָמֶלֶךְ H3552, "[God] grants dominion"). A clan leader in the tribe of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:34). He is listed among those whose families increased greatly during the days of King HEZEKIAH and who dispossessed the Hamites and Meunites near GEDOR (vv. 38 – 41).

Jamnia, Jamnite jam'nee-uh, jam'nit. See JAB-NEEL #2.

Janai jay'ni (יָנִי H3614, "[God] answers"). KJV Jaanai. A leader in the tribe of GAD in BASHAN, listed as third in importance (1 Chr. 5:12; some take the next name, "Shaphat," as a common noun, thus, “and Janai a judge in Bashan” [see SHAPHAT #4]). He may have been a son of Abihail (v. 14; more likely, this comment refers only to the seven individuals listed in v. 13).

Janim jay’nim (יָנִים H3565 [Qere יָנִים], derivation uncertain). KJV Janum. A town allotted to the tribe of JUDAH in the hill district of HEBRON (Josh. 15:53); the location is unknown, although one proposed identification is modern Beni Na‘im, c. 4 mi. E of Hebron.

Janna jan’uh. KJV form of JANNAI.

Jannaeus, Alexander. See HASMONEAN II.C.

Jannai jan’i (Ἰανναί G2613). KJV Janna. Son of a certain Joseph, included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:24).

Jannes and Jambres jan’iz, jam’briz (Ἰάννης G2614 and Ἰαμβρῆς G2612 [v.l. Μαμβρῆς.?<sub>ς</sub>]; in Heb./Aram. sources, יֹחָנִי and מִמְרָא, but there are spelling variations). The traditional names of Egyptian sorcerers who opposed MOSES before PHARAOH (2 Tim. 3:8, evidently a reference back to unnamed magicians mentioned in Exod. 7:11 – 12, 22). Jannes and Jambres is also the title of a pseudepigraphic work.

In the exodus narrative, Moses and Aaron delivered to Pharaoh the Lord’s message that Israel be allowed to go into the wilderness to worship God, and the monarch refused (Exod. 5:1 – 4). Then Moses performed authenticating miracles, such as making his staff a serpent, which the sorcerers with their magic also did (7:10 – 12, 20 – 22; 8:5 – 7, 17 – 18). It is to this series of events that PAUL is referring in 2 Tim. 3:8.

The names Jannes and Jambres are mentioned in Scripture only in 2 Tim. 3:8, no doubt reflecting Jewish tradition (Tg. Ps.-J. on Exod. 1:15 et al.; b. Menah. 85a; cf. CD V, 18 – 19); they also occur in pagan and early Christian literature. Both PLINY the Elder (Nat. 30.2 §11) and the 2nd-cent. writer Apuleius (Apologia pro se de magia 2.90) refer to Jannes, whereas the Neo-Platonist philosopher Numenius of Apamea (see Euseb. Praeparatio evangelica 9.8.1) was acquainted with both Jannes and Jambres, calling them holy scribes and magicians of Egypt. Various early Christian works refer to these names (e.g., Evangelium Nicodemi 5; Apostolic Constitution 8.1; Cyprian, De unitate ecclesiae 16).

A book that had the title Iannes et Mambres is mentioned by ORIGEN (according to the Latin trans. of his commentary on Matthew, at 23:37 and 27:9) and in a few other sources (see HJP, rev. ed. [1973 – 87], 3/2:781 – 83). Fragments of this work are preserved in a few early Greek papyri and in a medieval Latin MS (for an English trans. and full introduction, see OTP, 2:427 – 42).

That the apostle Paul mentions Jannes and Jambres evidences his acquaintance with this current Jewish tradition (which possibly preserved historical information from OT times). By referring to them, Paul seemingly demonstrates his desire to make vivid the personal and forceful opposition of the Egyptian magician class against Moses. The Jewish tradition about Jannes and Jambres is confused, as shown by EUSEBIUS'S statement (Praeparatio evangelica 9.8) that these two men were sons of Baalim but yet teachers of Moses and later his opponents, and that they died with the Egyptian army in the Red Sea.

Janoah juh-noh'uh (יָנוֹחַ, H3562, "resting place"). (1) A town on the E border of the tribal territory of EPHRAIM (JOS. 16:6 – 7; KJV, "Janohah"; some believe that the form yānôḥâ here is the actual name, but most interpret the -â as a locative ending). EUSEBIUS (Onomasticon 108.20), who calls it Ianō, says it is 12 Roman mi. E of Neapolis (SHECHEM). Janoah is generally identified with Khirbet Yanun (c. 6.5 mi. SE of Shechem) or with the nearby town of Yanun.

(2) One of five cities in N Israel captured by TIGLATH-PILESER, king of Assyria (2 Ki. 15:29). Among several proposals, the most likely identifications are two places, both of which are now known as Yanuh. One of them is c. 6 mi. E of TYRE; the other, much farther S, is c. 11 mi. NE of Acco (cf. ABD, 3:641).

Janum jay'nuhm. KJV form of JANIM.

Jaol. See ABRAHAM, APOCALYPSE OF.

Japheth (person) jay'fith (יָפֶֿתֿ, H3651, possibly "spacious" or "[God] enlarges"). Son of NOAH. In most of the passages referring to him (Gen. 5:32; 6:10; 7:13; 9:18; 10:1; 1 Chr. 1:4), Japheth is listed as the third of Noah's sons. However, one passage (Gen. 9:24; cf. v. 22) seems to indicate that HAM was the youngest. An additional statement (10:21) has also been construed to support the idea that Japheth was the second son rather than the third.

Sometime after the flood, Noah planted a vineyard and became drunk from the wine that he made. In a drunken stupor he lay uncovered in his tent. His son Ham broke the contemporary moral code by looking upon his father's nakedness (although the precise significance of the episode is disputed). Ham seems to have immediately told his brothers what had happened (Gen. 9:20 – 22). SHEM and Japheth placed a garment on their shoulders and walking backward covered their father without looking upon him. Thus they were not guilty of committing the sin. When Noah awoke and learned of the matter, he pronounced a curse upon CANAAN the son of Ham (vv. 23 – 25). He then blessed Shem and Japheth: “May God extend the territory of Japheth; / may Japheth live in the tents of Shem, / and may Canaan be his slave” (9:27). Later generations considered this blessing as a prediction that the descendants of Shem and Japheth would live amicably together, and that the Canaanites would be their servants. The subjugation of the Canaanites in the time of JOSHUA is supposed to be fulfillment of Noah’s curse.

The blessing pronounced upon Japheth by his father carried with it the idea that his descendants would be greatly multiplied (enlarged) in the future. The Table of NATIONS recorded in Gen. 10 indicates that Japheth became the father of a wide-ranging family of peoples, whose homes lay to the N of Palestine and then W. In fact, fourteen nations of Japhethites are listed in that chapter. The area of their occupation ranged all the way from the smelting plants of TARSHISH (prob. in Spain) on the W to the Caspian Sea on the E. This included what is now the steppes of southern Russia, much of ASIA MINOR, the islands of the Mediterranean, and the coasts of southern Europe. Japheth is said to be the father of Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras (Gen. 10:2; 1 Chr. 1:4). These appear to be the progenitors of the Indo-European (Caucasian) family of nations.

Although all the descendants of Japheth are more or less important to biblical history, the writer of Gen. 10 appears to single out the sons of GOMER and JAVAN for special attention. The descendants of Gomer seem to be the Gimirrai (Gimirraya) of the Assyrian chronicles, but known to the Greeks as CIMMERIANS. The sons of Javan are the Greeks, that is, the Ionians of Homer, and especially the Ionians who lived along the coast of western Asia Minor and the islands of the AEGEAN Sea. (See C. H. Gordon, Introduction to Old Testament Times [1953], 25 – 28; M. F. Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament [1954], 73 – 82.)

Japheth (place) jay’fith (יָפֶֿתֿ). An unknown region “facing Arabia” mentioned in connection with the military advances of HOLOFERNES (Jdt. 2:25). Most scholars believe that this and other geographical references in the book of JUDITH are unreliable.

Japhia (person) juh-fi’uh (יָפִֿיָּהּ H3644, possibly “high, tall” or “[God] shines forth”). (1) A king of LACHISH who formed a league with four other AMORITE kings to punish GIBEON for submitting to the Israelites (Josh. 10:3 – 5). JOSHUA defeated them in battle at BETH HORON, killed the five kings, and cast their bodies into a cave (10:6 – 27).

(2) One of the sons of DAVID born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. 5:15; 1 Chr. 3:7; 14:6). All that is known of him is that his mother was a wife, not a concubine, of David.

Japhia (place) juh-fi’uh (יָפִֿיָּהּ H3643, possibly “high, tall” or “[God] shines forth”). A town on the S border of the tribal territory of ZEBULUN (Josh. 19:13). JOSEPHUS, who calls it Japha, fortified it during the Jewish war (War 2.20.6; cf. Life 45). It is usually identified with modern Yafa, c. 1.5 mi. SW of NAZARETH, but without archaeological support (cf. NEAEHL, 2:659 – 60).

Japhlet jaf’lit (יָפֶֿלֶֿתֿ H3646, “[God] delivers”). Son of Heber and descendant of ASHER (1 Chr. 7:32 – 33). See also JAPHLETITE.

Japhleti jaf’luh-ti. KJV form of JAPHLETITE.

Japhletite jaf'luh-tit (יַפְלֵטִי H3647, gentilic of יַפְלֵט H3646). KJV Japhleti. A clan or larger people group whose territory, near BETH HORON, served to mark the S border of the tribe of EPHRAIM (Josh. 16:3). It is possible that they were descendants of JAPHLET, an Asherite, but nothing is known about them.

Japho jay'foh. KJV alternate form of JOPPA (Josh. 19:46).

Jarah jair'uh. See JADAH.

Jareb jair'ib (יָרֵב H3714, derivation disputed). According to the KJV, Jareb is the name of an Assyrian king (Hos. 5:13; 10:6). There is however no evidence, linguistically or historically, of an Assyrian king by that name (though it has been suggested that Jareb was the earlier name of SARGON, who destroyed SAMARIA in 722 B.C.). Because the Hebrew term can be understood as a form of the verb rīb H8189 (qal jussive impf., “let him contend”), some have thought that melek yārēb is a facetious epithet, “King Pick-Quarrel.” Most scholars, however, believe that these words parallel the common Assyrian phrase, šarru rabū, “the great king” (cf. NIV and other modern versions). Such a meaning for the Hebrew requires either dividing the words differently (malkî rāb) or understanding yārēb as an Aramaism (see J. Barr, Comparative Philology and the Text of the Old Testament [1968], 123).

Jared jair'id (יָרֵד H3719 [pausal form יָרֵד], derivation disputed; Ἰάρετ G2616). Son of Mahalalel and father of ENOCH (Gen. 5:15 – 20; 1 Chr. 1:2 [KJV, “Jered”]); his name is included in Luke’s GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. 3:37).

Jaresiah jair'uh-si'uh. KJV form of JAARESHIAH.

Jarha jahr'huh (יָרְחָע H3739, meaning unknown). An Egyptian servant belonging to SHESHAN (1 Chr. 2:34 – 35). Jarha married Sheshan’s daughter (prob. AHLAI, v. 31) and thus was included in the genealogy of JERAHMEEL. Some speculate that by this action Sheshan, who had no sons, made Jarha his heir (cf. ELIEZER, Gen. 15:2 – 3).

Jarib jair'ib (יָרִיב H3743, “[Yahweh] contends [for me]”; cf. JEHOIARIB, JERIBAI, JOIARIB). (1) Son of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:24; apparently called JAKIN in Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12).

(2) One of a group of leaders sent by EZRA to IDDO to get attendants for the house of God (Ezra 8:16; 1 Esd. 8:44 [KJV, “Joribas”]).

(3) A descendant of JESHUA son of Jozadak, listed among the priests in Ezra’s time who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:18; 1 Esd. 9:19 [KJV, “Joribus”]).

(4) KJV Apoc. alternate form of JOARIB (1 Macc. 14:29).

S. BARABAS

Jarimoth jair'uh-moth. KJV Apoc. form of JER-EMOTH (1 Esd. 9:28).

Jarkon jah'r'kon. See ME JARKON.

Jarmuth jah'r'muhth (יֶרְמוּתָּ H3754, “swelling [of the ground], height”). (1) A city in the SHEPHELAH whose king, PIRAM, entered into a conspiracy with four other A`MORITE kings against the Gibeonites to revenge their submission to Joshua (Josh. 10:3 – 5). JOSHUA defeated the five kings at GIBEON and slew them at MAKKEDAH (vv. 9 – 26; cf. 12:11). After the conquest of Canaan, Jarmuth was assigned to the tribe of JUDAH (15:35). Some Jews returned there after the Babylonian exile (Neh. 11:29). According to EUSEBIUS (Onomasticon 106.24), Jarmuth was the same as Byzantine Hiermochōs, about 10 Roman mi. from Eleutheropolis, on the way toward Jerusalem. On this basis, the biblical site is tentatively identified with modern Khirbet el-Yarmuk (Tell Yarmut), c. 17 mi. WSW of Jerusalem, even though there is no archaeological confirmation (cf. ABD, 3:645).

(2) A city within the tribal territory of ISSACHAR allotted to the Levite clans descended from GERSHON (Josh. 21:29). In other lists Jarmuth is apparently called REMETH (19:21) and RAMOTH (1 Chr. 6:73). The site is tentatively identified with Kaukab el-Hawa (Hellenistic Agrippina, c. 6 mi. NNE of BETH SHAN); on this imposing location, 1,500 ft. above the Jordan Valley, the Crusaders built the Belvoir castle (Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography, rev. ed. [1979], 28; NEAEHL, 2:661 – 65).

Jaroah juh-roh'uh (יָרוֹחַ H3726, “soft” or “pitied”; see JEROHAM). Son of Gilead, descendant of GAD, and ancestor of Abihail; the sons of Abihail and other Gadites occupied the region E of GILEAD (1 Chr. 5:14; cf. v. 10).

Jasael jay'say-uhl. KJV Apoc. form of SHEAL (1 Esd. 9:30).

Jashar, Book of jay'shuhr (יֶשָׁר H3839, “upright”; LXX [only 2 Sam. 1:18], τοῦ εὐθεοῦς, “of the upright one”). KJV Jasher. An ancient writing, no longer extant, mentioned twice in the OT (Josh. 10:13; 2 Sam. 1:18). Some scholars think that the phrase “in the book of the song” (preserved only in supplementary material by the LXX, 1 Ki. 8:53) may refer to

The Beth Horon ridge looking W into the Valley of Aijalon. Joshua chased the fleeing Amorite forces down this ridge, scoring a great victory for Israel (Josh. 10). The events of this memorable day, when “the sun stood still,” were also summarized in the Book of Jashar.

the same writing if the Hebrew consonants yšr were read by mistake as šyr, “song”; conversely, it may be that Book of the Song was the original title.

On the basis of the material preserved in these passages, it has been inferred that the book was poetical in nature and that it contained songs of a national character. The references to the book imply that it was well known and respected, and consequently it may have been the source for other material found in the OT (perhaps, e.g., the songs of MIRIAM and DEBORAH in Exod. 15:21 and Jdg. 5). The origin of this document is a matter of speculation, but many scholars believe that it was the result of a gradual compilation begun in the early period of Israel’s history. As time went on it was expanded, and at the time of the institution of the monarchy it probably became a part, and perhaps was the beginning, of the literary archives that formed the official records of the nation. (For a detailed study, see H. St. J. Thackeray in JTS 11 [1910]: 518 – 32; cf. E. Nielsen, Oral Tradition: A Modern Problem in the Old Testament Introduction [1954].) See also WARS OF THE LORD, BOOK OF THE.

The uncertain and mysterious character of the missing Book of Jashar has led to attempts to reproduce, imitate, or falsify it. An example is a late writing also entitled Book of Jashar, one of the last compositions of the haggadic literature of Judaism. It is written in good Hebrew and has to do with the era from Adam to the judges. The greater part of this work is concerned with pre-Mosaic material. Much of the material is invention, interpolated between biblical texts, in the author’s desire to reconstruct the original Book of Jashar. Many legends are added to the biblical narrative. The account of Abraham is given in elaborate detail, including stories of his two journeys to see his son Ishmael, and of an apparition of a star. It contains a detailed explanation of the murder of Abel by Cain. It is believed by some scholars that this attempt to reconstruct the OT Book of Jashar originated in southern Italy. The author was familiar with Italian place names, and the Arabic names in the book are due to the strong influence of Islamic culture on that region. (See L. Goldschmidt, The Book of Jashar [1923].)

Jashen jay’sshuhn (יָשֵׁן H3826, possibly “sleepy”). The father of two or more unnamed warriors included among DAVID’S Thirty (2 Sam. 23:32). It is widely thought, however, that the unusual MT reading here (běné yāšēn, “the sons of Jashen,” without naming them) has suffered textual corruption. The consonants bny are very likely an erroneous repetition (from the ending of the previous word hašša’albōnî, “the Shaalbonite”); moreover, the parallel passage (1 Chr. 11:34) reads, “the sons of Hashem the Gizonite.” Many scholars argue that the original reading was “Jashen the Gizonite” (cf. P. K. McCarter, Jr., II Samuel, AB 9 [1984], 492 – 93). See GIZONITE; HASHEM.

S. BARABAS

Jasher. KJV form of JASHAR.

Jashobeam juh-shoh’bee-uhm (יָשֹׁבֵעַם H3790, “the people [or the father’s relative] has returned”). (1) A Hacmonite (lit., “son of HACMONI”) and chief of DAVID’S officers (haššālîšîm) who killed 300 men in one battle (1 Chr. 17:11). The parallel passage (2 Sam. 23:8), which has very likely suffered textual corruption, speaks of “Josheb-Basshebeth, a Tahke-monite,” chief of the Three (haššālišî), who slew 800 men in one battle. The Hebrew words for 300 and 800 begin with the same letter, making a copyist’s error possible. It has been suggested (Kennicott) that “Basshebeth” is a dittography from the line above (last word of 2 Sam. 23:7) in place of the correct ending, “-am.” Many scholars, following the SEPTUAGINT (2 Sam. Iebosthe, 1 Chr. Iesebaal), think that the original name was Ish-Baal (ISH-BOSHETH arising when the Heb. word for “shame” was substituted for the hated name BAAL) and that both Jashobeam and Josheb-Basshebeth are later scribal corruptions. (See further R. F. Youngblood in EBC, 3:1087 – 88; R. K. Duke in ABD, 3:647 – 48.)

(2) One of several Korahite warriors who joined David at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:6; cf. vv. 1 – 2). Since apparently he was a Levite from the family of KORAH, he probably should not be identified with #1 above. Some argue, however, that the reference is to a different Korah or even to a locality in the tribe of BENJAMIN.

(3) Son of Zabdiel, descendant of PEREZ, and a commander in charge of the division for the first month during the reign of David (1 Chr. 27:2 – 3). Because most of the other commanders listed in this chapter are also mentioned in ch. 11, many believe this Jashobeam is the same as #1 above; if so, it is unclear why one passage describes him as “son of Hacmoni” and the other as “son of Zabdiel” (possibly the former designation refers to the larger clan or is used as some kind of title).

J. OSWALT

Jashub jay’shuhb (יָשׁוּב H3793 [Ketib יָשׁוּב 1 Chr. 7:1], possibly “[God] returns”; gentilic יָשׁוּבִי H3795, “Jashubite”; cf. SHEAR-JASHUB). (1) Son of ISSACHAR and eponymous ancestor of the Jashubite clan (Num. 26:24; 1 Chr. 7:1). In another passage (Gen. 46:13) the MT has yôb, and this reading is followed by the KJV (“Job”), the RSV (“Iob”), and other versions; on the basis of some Greek MSS, the SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, and the biblical parallels, the NIV and NRSV read “Jashub” here as well.

(2) One of the descendants of Bani who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29; 1 Esd. 9:30 [KJV, “Jasubus”]).

Jashubi Lehem juh-shoo’buh-lee’hem (יָשׁוּבִי לֶחֶם H3788). KJV Jashubi-lehem. An otherwise unknown place ruled by descendants of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:22 NIV; the KJV interprets it as the name of a person). The Hebrew text is difficult, however, and the NRSV translates, “who married [Heb. bā’āalû] into Moab but returned to Lehem” (this rendering involves an emendation of wēyāšubî to wayyāšubû). But a place by the name of Lehem is also unknown, so others further emend the word to BETHLEHEM (cf. BHS) or, following the SEPTUAGINT, to the idiom lāhem (lit., “to them,” yielding the simple meaning, “but they returned”; cf. Deut. 5:30).

Jasiel jay’see-uhl. KJV form of JAASIEL.

Jason jay’suhn (Ἰάσον G2619, “healing”; the name was sometimes substituted for Joshua/Jesus by Greek-speaking Jews [cf. Jos. Ant. 12.5.1]). (1) Son of Eleazar; he and Eupolemus were sent by Judas MACCABEE to solicit Roman aid against the Syrians, 161 B.C. (1 Macc. 8:17). Jason’s son Antipater sought to renew the alliance in 144 B.C. (1 Macc. 12:16; 14:22; Jos Ant. 12.10.6).

(2) Son of SIMON II and brother of the high priest ONIAS III; by bribery he secured the high priestly office for himself, and through his influence Greek customs became popularized (2 Macc. 4:7

– 26; see J. C. VanderKam, From Joshua to Caiaphas: High Priests after the Exile [2004], 197 – 203). He gave large gifts for the sacred games at TYRE honoring HERCULES (4:16 – 20). His tenure was only three years (174 – 171 B.C.), for he was supplanted by MENELAUS, who offered ANTIOCHUS IV Epiphanes a greater bribe. Jason fled to the Ammonites, but a false rumor of Antiochus’s death in Egypt brought him back to Jerusalem with a large following to overthrow Menelaus. Antiochus returned to wreak vengeance on the Jews; and Jason again fled to Ammon, then to Egypt, and later to Sparta, where he died (5:1 – 10).

(3) A Cyrenian who wrote a history of the Jewish freedom-struggle against Antiochus Epiphanes and his successor Antiochus Eupator. The book of 2 Maccabees is a condensation of this history. Jason’s name and residence indicate that he was Greek. His account ends with the year 160 B.C.; the book was probably written shortly after that date. The preface of the book tells what is known of Jason. See MACCABEES, BOOKS OF.

(4) A Jewish Christian of THESSALONICA who was probably host to the missionaries PAUL and SILAS. He and others were summoned to court on a charge of being hospitable to seditionists, but freedom was obtained by giving security for good conduct (Acts 17:5 – 9). See also #5, below.

(5) One of two or three “relatives” of Paul (the others being SOSIPATER and possibly Lucius) who sent greetings to the Christians in Rome (Rom. 16:21). According to many scholars, however, the Greek term syngenēs G5150 here means “kinsman” (cf. RSV) and should be understood in the sense of “fellow-Jew” (cf. 9:3). In either case, this Jason is possibly the same as #4 above. Some have speculated that he became a travel companion of Paul and thus was with him in CORINTH when the letter to the ROMANS was written.

R. F. GRIBBLE

jasper. An impure, opaque variety of very fine grained silica (silicon dioxide), allied to CHALCEDONY and FLINT. It is usually red, brown, or yellow (more rarely green, blue, or black), and the brighter-colored varieties are used as gem stones (Heb. yošpēh H3835, Exod. 28:20 et al.; Gk. iaspis G2618, Rev. 4:3 et al.). Even on the thinner edges it is opaque, so the reference to “a jasper, clear as crystal” in Rev. 21:11 may indicate that the ancient jaspis included CHRYSOPRASE as well as partially translucent chalcedony. Egyptian jasper is beautifully banded with different shades of brown. It occurs in nodules, like AGATE, both in the Nile Valley and the Libyan desert. Riband (or ribbon) jasper has the colors, generally brown, in broad stripes. Like other varieties of very fine grained silica, jasper is deposited from circulating water, either ground water or hydrothermal solutions of igneous origin.

D. R. BOWES

Jasubus juh-sool)uhs. KJV Apoc. form of JASHUB.

Jathan jay’thuhn (Ιαθαν). Son of Shemaiah; apparently a relative of TOBIT (Tob. 5:13 RSV; KJV, “Jonathas”; NRSV [v. 14] reads “Nathan,” following CODEX SINAITICUS).

Jathniel jath’nee-uhl (יִתְנִיֵּאל H3853, derivation uncertain; see J. D. Fowler, Theophoric Personal Names in Ancient Hebrew [1988], 134). Fourth son of Meshelemiah and descendant of KORAH; like his father, he and his brothers were Levitical gatekeepers in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:2).

Jattir jat'uhr (יַתִּיר H3848, possibly “extraordinary”). A town in the hill country within the tribal territory of JUDAH (Josh. 15:48); it was allotted to the Levites (21:14; 1 Chr. 6:57). DAVID sent spoil from ZIKLAG to it after hiZs victory over the Amalekites (1 Sam. 30:27). It is identified with modern Khirbet Attir, c. 13 mi. SW of HEBRON.

Javan jay'vuhn (יָוָן H3430, from Gk. “Ἰῶνες [earlier Iawones]). Son of JAPHETH, grandson of NOAH, and father of ELISHAH, TARSHISH, KITTIM, and RODANIM (Gen. 10:2, 4; 1 Chr. 1:5, 7). The name corresponds etymologically to Ionia. As such it is used in the prophets to denote the descendants of Javan in Ionia proper (W coast of ASIA MINOR) but also in GREECE and MACEDONIA; thus the NIV renders the name “Greece” or “Greeks” in these books.

In Isa. 66:19 Javan, in conjunction with Tarshish, Lud, Put, and Tubal, is spoken of as one of the far-off nations to whom messengers will be dispatched to tell of Yahweh's glory and the restoration of Jerusalem; the nations mentioned seem to represent the far western edge of the known world in the OT. In Ezek. 27:13 Javan is included as one of the contributors to the wealth of TYRE; it is grouped with TUBAL and MESHECH as traders of slaves and bronze. In the same vein, Tyre is condemned in Joel 3:6 because she sold citizens of Judah and Jerusalem to Javan as slaves.

The book of Daniel identifies Javan with Alexander's Greco-Macedonian empire. Thus Dan. 8:21 interprets the he-goat from the W as the king of Javan; 10:20 tells of the angel whose task was to fight the prince of Persia and afterward the prince of Javan; and 11:2 refers to the strong king of Persia who would stir up opposition to the kingdom of Javan. In Zech. 9:13, God asserts that he will triumph over the nations, brandishing the sons of Zion over the sons of Javan. Since the theme is God's superiority over warlike nations, Greece is probably singled out for attention here because of the fearsome reputation of Greek mercenary soldiers in the ANE, rather than because of any special enmity between Jews and Greeks at the time of the writing of Zechariah (c. 520 B.C.; see ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF).

Javan occurs in the Hebrew text of Ezek. 27:19 (cf. above on v. 13). However, the context seems to demand a location in ARABIA rather than in the W. The problem is further complicated by the SEPTUAGINT, which has “wine,” apparently representing Jazer.

Hebrew yayin H3516. The LXX rendering may reflect an attempt to interpret the difficult statement, but some consider it a witness to the original Hebrew text. Those who adhere to the MT suggest that a Greek trading colony in Arabia is meant, while others propose GAZA. (See also B. Stade, Das Volk Javan [1880]; D. D. Luckenbill in Zeitschrift für Assyriologie 28 [1913]: 92 – 99; P.-R. Berger in Die Welt des Orients 13 [1982]: 50 – 78, esp. 68 – 69.)

J. OSWALT

jaw. This English term is commonly the rendering of Hebrew lēhî H4305, used often of animals (e.g., the “jowls” of a bull or sheep, Deut. 18:3; a donkey’s “jawbone,” Jdg. 15:15 – 17), but also with reference to the “face” or “cheek” of people (e.g., 1 Ki. 22:24; Job 16:10). Several occurrences are figurative uses (e.g., Isa. 30:28; Ezek. 29:4). See also CHEEK.

Jazer jay’ zuhr (יַעֲזֵר H3597, “[God] helps”). KJV Jaazer. An AMORITE city in GILEAD. There are a dozen biblical references to it, usually as a “city” (e.g., Josh. 21:39), but once as a “land” (Num. 32:1) and once as a “territory” (Josh. 13:25). Jazer was taken by MOSES (Num. 21:32), then settled and fortified by the tribe of GAD. It bordered Ammonite territory (Num. 21:24) and was one of the four towns of Gad given to the Levites (Josh. 21:39). Some of DAVID’S most able men came from Jazer (1 Chr. 26:31), and his census takers reached it (2 Sam. 24:5). Following the death of AHAB, it was captured by the Moabites (cf. Isa. 16:9; Jer. 48:32). During Hellenistic times Judas MACCABEE took it from the Ammonites (1 Macc. 5:8; possibly the same as “Gazara” in 2 Macc. 10:32 [see GEZER]). Jazer is mentioned by JOSEPHUS (Ant. 12.8.1) and EUSEBIUS (Onomasticon 12.1 – 4).

The identification of Jazer has been much disputed. Biblical description places it in S Gilead, WNW of RABBAH of the Ammonites (modern Amman, Josh. 13:25; 2 Sam. 24:5). The Onomasticon places it 8 – 10 Roman mi. W of Philadelphia (i.e., Rabbah) and 15 from HESHBON; it also states that a large river (prob. a perennial-flowing stream) flowed from the town to the Jordan. Several proposals have been made, the most likely being Khirbet es-Sar (c. 6 mi. W of Amman, overlooking the Wadi esh-Shita) and Khirbet Jazzir (c. 7 mi. WNW of es-Sar, at the head of Wadi Shu'eib). J. L. Peterson (ABD, 3:651) claims there is "little doubt" that the latter is biblical Jazer. (See further S. Merrill, East of the Jordan [1883], 272 – 77, 404 – 6; N. Glueck, Explorations in Eastern Palestine, 4 vols., AASOR [1934 – 51], 3:153ff.)

M. H. HEICKSEN

Jaziz jay'ziz (𐤍𐤕𐤓𐤕 H3467, possibly from a root that in Arabic means "to incite"). A HAGRITE who was in charge of King DAVID's flocks (1 Chr. 27:31; NRSV, v. 31).

jealousy. This English term is used in Bible versions to render several words, primarily Hebrew qin'â H7863 (Num. 5:14 et al.) and Greek zēelos G2419 (Acts 5:17 et al.). The concept is plainly present in several places where the precise term is not used. Both the Hebrew and Greek words refer to the intensity of emotion involved, with the Hebrew possibly alluding to the rising of color in the face (in Arabic the verb qana'a can mean "to become red"). In each case it seems to indicate an ardor or zeal for something believed to belong properly to one. The term may refer both to a favorable or appropriate variety of this ardor, and to an improper form of it.

I. Proper jealousy. When jealousy reflects concern for God's honor and glory, it is proper and good. Thus, God himself is several times described as jealous for his honor, his holy name. He desires fervently that his due status and honor be preserved, that the WORSHIP that belongs to him should be given to him. The analogy frequently used is a husband's concern for the love of his wife. This is an expression of the HOLINESS of God, which cannot endure any unfaithfulness. Just as a husband is not indulgent of adultery on the part of his wife, so no infidelity is permitted by God.

It was this exclusiveness of concern that underlay the strong emphasis upon monotheistic worship among the Jews. Because Yahweh is the only true God, he alone is deserving of human worship and devotion. It motivated the prohibition of intermarriage with the heathen nations around Israel, lest they should depart from the exclusive worship of the one true God. An OT example of God's jealousy is found in Exod. 32, where God was angered by the Israelites' worshiping the golden calf (see CALF, GOLDEN). Herod Agrippa (see HEROD VII) was struck dead because he did not disavow the attribution of deity to himself (Acts 12:21 – 23).

Sculpture of a bull representing the Egyptian god Apis. Given the Israelites' experience with idols in Egypt, God jealously demanded the exclusive devotion of his people.

Similarly, this exclusiveness is reflected in the teachings of Jesus: “I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me” (Jn. 14:6). “Anyone who loves his father or mother more than me is not worthy of me” (Matt. 10:37). To determine that a potential follower really was giving to him his supremacy, Jesus would put such a person to a test, as when he asked the rich young man to sell all that he had, and come and follow him (Lk. 18:22). Because Jesus, like the Father, is the only true God, and because he is the only MEDIATOR, he could rightfully exercise this jealousy. God also is jealous for his people. He identifies with them and watches over them (Zech. 2:8; Matt. 6:28 – 33).

The concern for God's due is also found among his people. ELIJAH spoke of his jealousy for the Lord of Hosts in connection with the contest with BAAL on Mount Carmel (1 Ki. 19:14). He had arranged a demonstration to prove that Yahweh alone was God. A similar motivation, but under different circumstances, was shown by PAUL and BARNABAS when the men of LYSTRA tried to worship them as gods (Acts 14:8 – 18).

II. Improper jealousy. Another meaning or application of the word and concept of jealousy is negative in its effect and is strongly condemned by God. It is excessive concern for one's own self, and what one fancies or desires. It may also involve resentment of the good fortune of another. It is an inordinate self-centeredness or possessiveness. It may mean an unreasonable demanding of another person, such as a mate, more than is one's rightful due—requiring total and sole attention, for example.

Biblical examples of this type of jealousy abound, although they are not always labeled as such. The brothers of JOSEPH resented the special favor shown by JACOB, symbolized by a conspicuous coat (Gen. 37:34). King SAUL, hearing the people chant “Saul has slain his thousands, / and David his tens of thousands” (1 Sam. 18:6 – 9), burned with jealousy. In the NT, the older brother complained of the injustice of the prodigal son being given a celebration, when he had never been extended a similar privilege (Lk. 15:25 – 30).

Jealousy that involves an improper inward feeling toward another person is sin in itself, because Jesus said that thoughts and attitudes constitute sin, even without overt acts (Matt. 5:21 – 31). Jealousy is often the motive for sinful actions. Joseph's brothers planned to murder him, and ultimately sold him into slavery. Saul tried to kill David by hurling his spear at him. The older son refused to participate in the celebration over the return of the younger.

It is not surprising that jealousy is so prevalent in human beings. Natural man is self-centered and resists anything that subtracts from his own pleasure or aggrandizement. Because of his finiteness, he is also insecure and is therefore threatened by anything competitive with him. The antidote to jealousy is perfect LOVE. Because love is not self-seeking (1 Cor. 13:5), it does not go beyond its rightful claims. This love, the Scripture teaches, is of divine origin and consequently must come from above. It is only the progressive remaking of the nature of the person that can overcome his tendency toward jealousy.

III. Distinction between the two. A problem arises when these two varieties of jealousy are compared. If jealousy of the second type is wrong for human beings, then is not jealousy of the first type also wrong for God? Is not God guilty of the very thing that he condemns in humans namely self-centered concern for his own rights?

Part of the solution lies in recognizing that the description of God as jealous is an ANTHROPO-MORPHISM, and, consequently, jealousy in God is not identical with jealousy in human beings. God ought not to be pictured as seething with anger over injustices done to him. His jealousy does not originate in insecurity or anxiety. However, one distinction between the proper and improper varieties of this ardor also lies in the object of that zeal. Because the latter kind is concern for the welfare and status of a finite object of value, the human being, it is unjustified. Because God is the highest object, however, everything is rightfully his, and zeal that this be carried out is in order. Indeed, it would be wrong for God not to enforce his rights. Man's concern for his own possessions and honor would be right only if he were God, for then they would be rightfully his.

jealousy, water of. By the so-called “law of jealousy”, a husband who suspected his wife of ADULTERY brought her before the priest with a meal offering. The priest had her take an oath, then drink holy water mixed with dust from the tabernacle floor, as an appeal to God to decide the issue. If no ill effects followed, she was innocent; otherwise she was guilty (Num. 5:11 – 31).

Jearim jee'uh-rim (יְעָרִים H3630, “woods”). The name of a mountain or mountain ridge on the N border of the tribe of JUDAH (Josh. 15:10). The text identifies or associates Mount Jearim with KESALON, which was apparently the name of a border town, today known as Kesla, c. 11 mi. W of Jerusalem. See also SEIR.

Jeaterai jee-at'uh-ri. KJV form of JEATHERAI.

Jeatherai jee-ath'uh-ri (יְעָתֵרַי H3290). Son of Zerah and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON (1 Chr. 6:21). Some believe the text has suffered textual corruption and emend the name to ETHNI (v. 41; note that the Heb. consonants of this name, <sup>y</sup>tny, are similar to those of Jeatherai,<sup>y</sup>try); others simply point out that the genealogies are incomplete.

Jeberechiah ji-ber'uh-kruh. See JEBEREKIAH.

Jeberekiah ji-ber'uh-ki'uh (יֶבֶרְכִּיָּהוּ H3310, “Yahweh blesses”). Also Jeberechiah. Father of a certain Zechariah who was called upon by ISAIAH as a witness of his prophecy against Damascus and Samaria (Isa. 8:2).

Jebus jee'buhs (יְבוּס H3293; gentilic יְבוּסִי H3294, “Jebusite” [KJV, “Jebusi” in Josh. 18:16, 28]). Alternate early name for JERUSALEM. The name Jerusalem goes far back into the history of the land of Canaan, as is known from mention of it in connection with early biblical incidents and from the extrabiblical occurrence of the corresponding name Ur-salimmu (e.g., in the TELL EL-AMARNA letters). However, Jebus was apparently preferred in some circles (Jdg. 19:10 – 11; cf. 1 Chr. 11:4). During several centuries before the time of DAVID, the city was known as the home of the Jebusites, and some argue that Jebus received its name from this people

The ancient city of Jebus was located on the V-shaped ridge descending S into the valley in front of what is now known as the temple mount. (View to the NE up the Kidron Valley, with the Mount of Olives in view.)

group (rather than the place giving its name to its inhabitants). The Jebusites remained here until David conquered the city, made it his capital, and restored its name to Jerusalem.

Jebusites are first mentioned in the Bible in a list of Canaanite clans (Gen. 10:16 – 18). Essentially the same grouping is mentioned a number of times in other books of the Pentateuch as among the peoples whose land had been promised to Israel (Exod. 3:8; 13:5; 23:23; 33:2; 34:11; Num. 13:29; Deut. 7:1; 20:17; Josh. 3:10; 12:8; 24:11; Jdg. 3:5). Other references provide interesting details about the Jebusites. After Israel's smashing victories W of the Jordan, the Jebusites became intensely concerned about stopping JOSHUA and turning the people back (Josh. 9:1). They were among those to whom JABIN of HAZOR sent for help in an attempt to rally sufficient strength to withstand Joshua (11:3). They were known as a people who lived “in the hill country” (11:3). The border of the territory allotted to the tribe of JUDAH apparently ran along the Valley of Ben HINNOM, which as a natural, physical feature was also the terminus of the S slope of the Jebusite area, a locale also called Jerusalem (15:8). These Jebusites were the Canaanite inhabitants of Jerusalem/Jebus whom the Israelites “could not dislodge,” and who dwelt with the people of Judah in Jerusalem from the time of occupation (15:63; cf. also Jdg. 1:21). They were therefore known as the residents of the city of Jebus well into the time of the judges (Jdg. 19:11).

David’s rise to power as ruler over all Israel included the ousting of the Jebusites from this area. He devised a cunning strategy to wrest Jerusalem from its taunting, jeering inhabitants (see 2 Sam. 5:6 – 10; cf. 1 Chr. 11:4 – 7). The usual explanation of the Samuel passage is that David made use of an underground tunnel that, presumably, was part of a water system the Canaanites had built to bring water from a point outside the city to a reservoir located within the city. This system, as well as another one similar to it built by HEZEKIAH (see 2 Ki. 20:20), has been discovered and explored by archaeologists. Knowledge about the system provides a basis for understanding that David could have discovered the concealed source of water outside the city and then followed the tunnel bringing the water to the reservoir within the city. Thus, surely by surprise, he was able to get up “the water shaft” (Heb. ṣinnôr H7562) to attack and to defeat the Jebusites. William F. Albright, however, has offered the plausible explanation that the Hebrew word can just as well be rendered “scaling-hook” (see Old Testament Commentary, ed. H. C. Allen and E. E. Flack [1948], 149). Thus he would understand that David successfully attacked the Jebusites by storming and scaling the wall, rather than by using the underground water system. See also JERUSALEM III.B.

After capturing the city, David purchased a rocky hilltop from ARAUNAH the Jebusite (2 Sam. 24:18, 25; 1 Chr. 21:15, 18 – 28), a place used as a threshing floor on which he envisioned a “house” for the ARK OF THE COVENANT. Successful in these endeavors, David made the conquered city his political and religious center. References to the Jebusites after the time of David are infrequent (in lists, Ezra 9:1; Neh. 9:8; and in a prophetic oracle that recalls their fate, Zech. 9:7). (See J. Simons, Jerusalem in the Old Testament [1952], 60 – 61, 246 – 47; M. F. Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament [1954], 92 – 93, 206 – 9; G. E. Wright, Biblical Archaeology [1962], 127 – 29. For the view that Jebus and Jerusalem were distinct places, see J. M. Miller in ZDPV 90 [1974]: 115 – 27.)

Jecamiah jek’uh-mi’uh. KJV alternate form of JEKAMIAH (1 Chr. 3:18).

Jechiliah jek’uh-li’uh. See JECOLIAH.

Jecholiah jek’uh-lz’uh. KJV alternate form of JECOLIAH (2 Ki. 15:2).

Jechoniah, Jechonias jek’uh-ni’uh(s). See JECONIAH.

Jecoliah jek’uh-li’uh (יְכֹלִיָּהוּ H3525, יְכֹלִיָּה H3524 [2 Chr. 26:3, Ketib יְכִילִיָּה], “Yahweh is [or proves himself] able, powerful”; see JEHUCAL). TNIV Jekoliah. Mother of King Azariah (UZZIAH) of Judah (2 Ki. 15:2 [KJV, “Jecholiah”]; 2 Chr. 26:3 [ASV, “Jechiliah”]).

Jeconiah jek’uh-ni’uh (יְכֹנִיָּהוּ H3527 [only Jer. 24:1], יְכֹנִיָּה H3526, “Yahweh supports” or “may Yahweh establish”; Ἰεχονίας G2651). Also Jechoniah, Jechonias, Jeconias. (1) Alternate name of JEHOIACHIN, king of Judah (1 Chr. 3:16 – 17; Esth. 2:6; Jer. 24:1; 27:20; 28:4; 29:2; Add. Esth. 11:4; Bar. 1:3, 9; Matt. 1:11 – 12).

(2) A Levite who lived in the time of King JOSIAH and who gave sheep and calves for the PASSOVER (1 Esd. 1:9; called “Conaniah” in 2 Chr. 35:9).

(3) Alternate Apoc. name of JEHOAHAZ, King of Judah (1 Esd. 1:34; KJV, “Joachaz”).

Jeconias jek’uh-ni’uhs. KJV Apoc. form of JECONIAH (1 Esd. 1:9).

Jedaiah ji-day’yuh (יְדַיָּהּ H3355 [only #1 and #5 below], “Yahweh has favored”; יְדַיָּהּ H3361, “Yahweh has known”). (1) Son of Shimri and descendant of SIMEON (1 Chr. 4:37); included in the genealogy of Ziza, a clan leader.

(2) Chief of the second division of priests as appointed by DAVID (1 Chr. 24:7). Possibly the ancestor of the 973 priests (of the family of JESHUA) who returned from the EXILE (Ezra 2:36; Neh. 7:39; 1 Esd. 5:24 [KJV, “Jeddu”]).

(3) One of the priests who returned from the exile (1 Chr. 9:10; Neh. 11:10 [possibly through textual corruption, the following person on the list, Joiarib, seems to be regarded as Jedaiah’s father]; 12:6); Uzzi became head of Jedaiah’s priestly family (12:19). There may be a connection between this Jedaiah and #2 above.

(4) Evidently another (but less important) priest of the same name, since he is included in two of the same lists as #3 above (Neh. 12:7, 21).

(5) Son of Harumaph; he made repairs on the wall of JERUSALEM opposite his house (Neh. 3:10).

(6) One of a group of Jewish exiles who brought gold and silver from Babylon to help those who had returned under ZERUBBABEL; from these gifts a crown was to be made for Joshua (JESHUA) the high priest (Zech. 6:10).

J. OSWALT

Jeddu jed’oo. KJV Apoc. form of JEDAIAH (1 Esd. 5:24).

Jedeus jed’ee-uhs. KJV Apoc. form of ADAIAH (1 Esd. 9:30).

Jediael ji-di’ay-uhl (יְדִיעֵאל H3356, “known of God”). (1) Son (or descendant) of BENJAMIN (1 Chr. 7:6, 10 – 11). Since Jediael is not mentioned in the other genealogies of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; Num. 26:38 – 40; 1 Chr. 8:1 – 2), and since the genealogy of ZEBULUN is not included in the context of 1 Chr. 7, some have thought that the passage is textually corrupt and that the family of Jediael was part of the tribe of Zebulun. It is more likely that 1 Chr. 7 preserves a late, independent list giving information about a small Benjamite clan.

(2) Son of Shimri; he and his brother Joha the Tizite were among DAVID’S mighty warriors (1 Chr. 11:45).

(3) A military leader from the tribe of MANASSEH who defected from SAUL and joined David at ZIKLAG (1 Chr. 12:20); some have suggested that he may be the same as #2 above.

(4) Son of Meshelemiah and descendant of KORAH; like his father, he and his brothers were Levitical gatekeepers in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:2).

Jedidah ji-di’duh (יְדִידָהּ H3352, “beloved [of God or Yahweh]”; see JEDIDIAH). Daughter of Adaiah and mother of JOSIAH, king of Judah (2 Ki. 22:1).

Jedidiah jed’uh-di’uh (יְדִידְיָהּ H3354, “beloved of Yahweh” [cf. Deut. 33:12, יְדִידְיָהּ]). The name God gave, through the prophet NATHAN, to SOLOMON when he was born, because “the LORD loved him” (2 Sam. 12:25; lit., “for the sake of the LORD”). The giving of this second name—which appears to be related to that of DAVID and does not occur elsewhere in the Bible—has caused considerable debate. One proposal is that Jedidiah was his initial name and that Solomon (a name that, like JERUSALEM, is apparently built on Heb. šālôm H8934, “peace”) was a throne name David gave to him in anticipation of the child’s future rule in Jerusalem (cf. S. Talmon, King, Cult, and Calendar in Ancient Israel: Collected Studies [1986], 152 n. 19). Others argue that Jedidiah was the throne name (cf. P. K. McCarter, Jr., II Samuel, AB 9 [1984], 303 – 4).

Jeduthun ji-dyoo’thuhn (יְדֻתָּן H3349, possibly derived from יָדָה H3344, “to praise, thank”). (1) A Levitical musician in the time of DAVID who, with HEMAN, was “responsible for the sounding of the trumpets and cymbals and for the playing of the other instruments for sacred song” (1 Chr. 16:41 – 42). His sons, along with the sons of Heman and ASAPH, were set aside “for the ministry of prophesying, accompanied by harps, lyres and cymbals” (25:1 – 6). He is usually thought to be the same as Ethan, which may have been an earlier name of his (6:44); see ETHAN #4. Jeduthun is also called a royal seer (2 Chr. 35:15), though this description possibly means no more than that he gave good advice to David. The name appears repeatedly in connection with temple music at important occasions in the reigns of SOLOMON (2 Chr. 5:12), HEZEKIAH (29:14, with reference to his descendants Shemaiah and Uzziel), and JOSIAH (35:15, with reference to the descendants of Asaph; cf. 1 Esd. 1:15 [NRSV, “Eddinus”] and 1 Chr. 9:16). The family continued to officiate after the EXILE (Neh. 11:17). The phrase “for Jeduthun” (NRSV, “according to Jeduthun”) is found in the titles of Pss. 39; 62; 77. What the connection may be with David’s musician is unclear; some believe it refers to an instrument or to a tune.

(2) Father of OBED-EDOM, who was a gatekeeper (1 Chr. 16:38). It is often taken for granted that he is the same as #1 above, but some argue that insofar as the Obed-Edom mentioned here was descended from KORAH (26:1, 4) and not from MERARI, this Jeduthun must be different (see KD, Chronicles, 219; this argument assumes that Jeduthun the musician is the same as Ethan, who indeed was a Merarite).

S. BARABAS

Jeeli jee’uh-li. KJV Apoc. form of JAALA (1 Esd. 5:33).

Jeelus ji-ee’luhs. KJV Apoc. alternate form of JEHIEL (1 Esd. 8:92).

Jeezer ji-ee’zuhr. KJV form of IEZER.

Jegar Sahadutha jee’guhr-say-huh-doo’thuh (יֵגֶר שְׁהָדוּתָא H3337, “heap of witness”). The Aramaic name that LABAN gave to a heap of stones set up as sign of a covenant between him and JACOB; the latter called it by the equivalent Hebrew name, GALEED (Gen. 31:47). This passage provides the oldest evidence of the ARAMAIC LANGUAGE found in the Bible, and it is part of the evidence that ABRAHAM spoke Aramaic before adopting a Canaanite dialect (which eventually developed into the HEBREW LANGUAGE).

Jehaleleel, Jehalelel jee’-huh-lee’lee-uhl, ji-hal’uh-luhl. KJV forms of JEHALLELEL.

Jehallelel ji-hal’uh-luhl (יְהִלֵּל H3401, possibly “God shines forth” or “may God praise [the child]”; see discussion in J. D. Fowler, Theophoric Personal Names in Ancient Hebrew [1988], 136). (1) A descendant of JUDAH (1 Chr. 4:16; KJV, “Jehaleleel”). His genealogical connection is unclear, but he may have been the eponymous ancestor of a clan related to CALEB son of Jephunneh (cf. v. 15).

(2) A descendant of LEVI through MERARI, and father of Azariah; the latter was one of the Levites assigned to consecrate the temple in the days of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:12; KJV, “Jehalelel”).

Jehath. See JAHATH #2.

Jehdeiah ji-dee’yah (יְהִדְיָהּ H3485, “Yahweh rejoices”). (1) Son or descendant of Shubael; he was a Levite who served in the time of King DAVID (1 Chr. 24:20).

(2) A MERONOTHITE who was in charge of David’s donkeys (1 Chr. 27:30).

Jehezekel ji-hez’uh-kel. KJV form of JEHEZKEL.

Jehezkel ji-hez’kel (יְהֵזְקֵל H3489, “God strengthens”; cf. EZEKIEL, HEZEKIAH, JEHIZKIAH). KJV Jehezekel. A priest who lived in the time of DAVID; he was head of the twentieth division (1 Chr. 24:16). The Hebrew form of this name is identical to that of Ezekiel.

Jehiah ji-hi’uh (יְהִיָּה H3496, “Yahweh lives”; cf. JEHIEL). A Levite who, with OBED-EDOM, was appointed as a doorkeeper for the ARK OF THE COVENANT when DAVID had it brought to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 15:24). He may be the same as JEIEL (v. 18).

Jehiel ji-hi’uhl (יְהִיֵּל H3493, “God lives” [cf. JEHIAH]; also יְהִיֵּאל H3494 [gentilic in form, 1 Chr. 26:21 – 22]). (1) A Levite in the time of DAVID appointed among others to play the lyre (NRSV, harp) as a part of the ministrations before the ARK OF THE COVENANT (1 Chr. 15:18, 20; 16:5).

(2) Firstborn son of Ladan and descendant of LEVI through GERSHON; he was placed in charge of the temple treasury in the time of David (1 Chr. 23:8; 29:8; 26:21 – 22 [“Jehieli”; the Heb. text here is difficult]).

(3) Son of Hacmoni; he was an important official who took care of David’s sons (1 Chr. 27:32).

(4) Son of JEHOSHAPHAT, king of Judah (1 Chr. 21:2). He and his brothers received a very generous inheritance (v. 3). Jehoshaphat’s firstborn, JEHORAM, killed all his brothers when he became king (v. 4).

(5) Descendant of HEMAN the musician; he and his brother Shimei were among the Levites assigned to consecrate the temple in the days of HEZEKIAH (2 Chr. 29:14; NRSV, “Jehuel,” following the Ketib, yěhū’ēl). He is probably the same Jehiel included in the list of supervisors of the temple storerooms (31:13).

(6) One of three temple administrators during the reign of JOSIAH (2 Chr. 35:8; 1 Esd. 1:8 [KJV, “Syellus”]); he is mentioned with Hilkiah and Zechariah as providing numerous offerings for the celebration of the PASSOVER.

(7) Descendant of Joab and father of Obadiah; the latter was head of a large family who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon with EZRA (Ezra 8:9; 1 Esd. 8:35 [KJV, “Jezelus”]).

(8) Descendant of Elam and father of Shecaniah; the latter led a public confession concerning mixed marriages forbidden by the law (Ezra 10:2; 1 Esd. 8:92 [KJV, “Jeelus”]). It is interesting to note that this Jehiel is possibly the same one listed among the descendants of Elam who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:26; called “Jezrielus” in 1 Esd. 9:27 [KJV, “Hierielus”]). If so, Shecaniah may have been the child of a mixed marriage, and thus he apparently supported the sending away of his own mother (but see H. G. M. Williamson, Ezra-Nehemiah, WBC 16 [1985], 149 – 50).

(9) One of the priestly descendants of Harim who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:21; 1 Esd. 9:21 [KJV, “Hiereel”]).

Jehieli ji-hi’uh-li. See JEHIEL #2.

Jehizkiah jee hiz-ki’uh (יְחִזְקִיָּהוּ H3491, “Yahweh strengthens [me]”; cf. EZEKIEL, HEZEKIAH, JEHEZKEL). Son of Shallum; he was one of the princes of EPHRAIM who supported ODED the prophet in warning the Israelites not to take captives from Judah (2 Chr. 28:12).

Jehoadah ji-hoh’uh-duh. KJV form of JEHOAD-DAH.

Jehoaddah ji-hoh’uh-duh (יְהוֹדָה H3389, possibly “Yahweh has adorned [me]” or “Yahweh is adornment” or “Yahweh reckons”). KJV Jehoadah. Son of Ahaz and descendant of King SAUL through JONATHAN (1 Chr. 8:36; called Jarah or JADAH in the parallel passage, 9:42).

Jehoaddan ji-hoh’uh-duhn. See JEHOADDIN.

Jehoaddin ji-hoh’uh-din (יְהוֹדָן H3390, variant יְהוֹדָן H3391 [2 Chr. 25:1 and Qere of 2 Ki. 14:2], “Yahweh is delight”). The mother of AMAZIAH, king of Judah; she is identified as being a native of Jerusalem (2 Ki. 14:2 [KJV, “Jehoaddan”]; 2 Chr. 25:1 [KJV, NRSV, “Jehoaddan”]).

Jehoahaz ji-hoh’uh-haz (יְהוֹאָחָז H3370, “Yahweh has taken hold [for protection]” or “whom Yahweh sustains,” short form יְהוֹאָחָז H3407 [2 Ki. 14:1; 2 Chr. 34:8; 36:2, 4]; cf. AHAZ, AHAZIAH, JOAHAZ).

(1) Son of JEHU and king of Israel (2 Ki. 10:35; 13:1 – 9; in 14:1, the NRSV has “Joahaz”). Jehoahaz became king in 814/3 B.C. (the twenty-third year of Joash of Judah) and reigned for seventeen years. His son JOASH (Jehoash) of Israel succeeded in the thirty-seventh year of Joash of Judah (13:10), and some therefore emend “seventeen” to “fifteen” in 13:1 or “thirty-seventh” to “thirty-ninth” in 13:10. Thiele solves the discrepancy by assuming a shift in the reckoning system (E. R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, 3rd ed. [1983], ch. 2); this theory avoids emendations, but the motive for change is obscure. Others suggest a three-year coregency of Jehu and Jehoahaz.

When Jehoahaz ascended the throne, SYRIA (ARAM) controlled virtually the whole country, having penetrated down the coastal road, taken GATH, and extracted heavy tribute from Judah. Jehoahaz was only allowed to maintain ten chariots and fifty horsemen with 10,000 footmen (earlier, AHAB’S army at Qarqar, with the same infantry, had included 2,000 chariots). Although Jehoahaz had no idea of abandoning the apostate cult of BETHEL (“the sins of Jeroboam”) or removing the ASHERAH from SAMARIA (2 Ki. 13:6, cf. 21:3), he did in desperation invoke the name of the Lord, and his prayer was answered in God’s compassion for his people (13:4 – 5). The oblique reference to “a deliverer” may suggest Adadnirari III, the Assyrian king who began in 805 B.C. to resume the pressure on Syria, but several other identifications have been proposed.

(2) Son of JOSIAH and king of Judah (2 Ki. 23:30 – 34; 2 Chr. 36:1 – 4). Also known as SHALLUM (prob. his personal name as opposed to his throne name, 1 Chr. 3:15; Jer. 22:11), Jehoahaz succeeded Josiah in the summer of 609 B.C., but he was deposed by Pharaoh NECO three months later. According to the biblical narrative, it was “the people of the land” who made him king, and this information suggests that Jehoahaz was not the natural successor (subsequently, his older brother Eliakim, renamed JEHOIAKIM, was placed on the throne by the Egyptians, 2 Ki. 23:36).

The precise meaning of the term “people of the land” has been debated, but it clearly refers to the countryfolk as distinct from the population of Jerusalem, though not quite in the rabbinic sense of “provincials.” They were not necessarily less royalist, but they retained a tribal view of the nature of the kingship. They must have invaded the city in considerable numbers at times of crisis or at festivals, besides coming in the ordinary course of commerce or under threat of invasion (cf. 2 Ki. 11:14; 21:24; 25:19; Jer. 26:2; 36:9; et al.; see AM HA-AREZ). Their action in 609 B.C. recalls the enthronement of Josiah thirty years earlier; but if they felt they had established their right to control the succession, the harsh realities of great power politics soon destroyed this hope. Returning that fall from his campaign in Assyria, and aiming to secure his passage for the future, Neco installed Eliakim/Jehoiakim as his vassal and deported Jehoahaz to Egypt. Comparison of 2 Chr. 36:3 (abbreviated and perhaps miscopied) with 2 Ki. 23:33 indicates that he directed the operation from Riblah (cf. Jer. 22:10 – 12).

(3) Son of JEHORAM and king of Judah. See AHAZIAH #2.

(4) Father of JOAH; the latter was one of three officials who were sent to repair the temple in the time of Josiah (2 Chr. 34:8; rendered “Joahaz” in English versions).

J. LILLEY

Jehoash ji-hoh’ash. Alternate form of JOASH. (For the sake of clarity and consistency, the NIV uses “Jehoash” always when the reference is to the son of Jehoahaz, king of Israel, and “Joash” when referring to the son of Ahaziah, king of Judah.)

Jehohanan jee’hoh-hay’nuhn (יהונן H3380, “Yahweh is [or has been] gracious”; cf. HANANIAH, JOHANAN, JOHN). (1) Sixth son of Meshelemiah and descendant of KORAH; like his father, he and his brothers were Levitical gatekeepers in the time of DAVID (1 Chr. 26:3).

(2) A commander of units of one thousand in the army of Judah during the reign of JEHOSHAPHAT (2 Chr. 17:15).

(3) Father of Ishmael, who was one of the commanders of units of one hundred upon whom JEHOIADA relied in his planning to move against ATHALIAH (2 Chr. 23:1).

(4) Father of Azariah; the latter was a leader in the tribe of EPHRAIM during the reign of PEKAH king of Israel (2 Chr. 28:12; KJV and NRSV, “Johanan”).

(5) Son of Eliashib; he provided a room for EZRA’S mourning (Ezra 10:6 [KJV, “Johanan”]; 1 Esd. 9:1 [KJV, “Joanan”]). The identification of this Jehohanan is disputed because of disagreements regarding the date of Ezra’s mission (cf. JOHANAN in Neh. 12:22 – 23).

(6) One of the descendants of Bebai who agreed to put away their foreign wives (Ezra 10:28).

(7) Son of TOBIAH, who was an opponent of NEHEMIAH; Jehohanan married the daughter of Meshullam son of Berekiah (Neh. 6:18; KJV, “Johanan”).

(8) Head of the priestly family of Amariah during the time of JOIAKIM the high priest (Neh. 12:13).

(9) One of the singers who participated in the purification and dedication of the wall of Jehoiachin ji-hoi'uh-kin (יהויכין H3382, short form יויכין H3422 [only Ezek. 1:2], “Yahweh establishes [or protects]”; see W. F. Albright in JBL 51 [1932]: 81, and in BASOR 99 [1945]: 11; cf. also M. Noth, IPN, 28, 62, 202 n. 1). Son of JEHOIAKIM and last king of Judah before the EXILE (597 B.C.). Also known as JECONIAH and CONIAH.

I. Chronology. Jehoiachin reigned three months and ten days (2 Chr. 36:9), from the death of his father till the capture of Jerusalem (March 16, 597 B.C., dated by the Babylonian Chronicle). This means that Jehoiakim died early in Dec. 598 (D. J. Wiseman in Documents from Old testament Times, ed. D. W. Thomas [1958], 81); some consider that Jehoiachin's reign ended on his departure for Babylon in April, but agree that he became king before the city was besieged (cf. E. Auerbach in VT 9 [1959]: 113 – 21, and 11 [1961]: 128 – 36). If the first year of his exile (spring reckoning) was 597/596, the thirty-seventh was 561/560, the first (full, regnal) of Amel-Marduk (EVIL-MERODACH, 2 Ki. 25:27; Jer. 52:31).

II. Names. Jehoiachin was probably his throne name, because (1) it parallels Jehoiakim, Jehoahaz, and Josiah; (2) it occurs in the Babylonian “ration tablets” and on the seal of Eliakim steward of Yaukin; (3) Jeconiah/Coniah, like Shallum (see JEHOAHAZ), is used by Jeremiah (cf. the personal comment in Jer. 22:28), whereas Kings and Chronicles use Jehoiachin (however, Jeconiah and Shallum occur in 1 Chr. 3).

III. Reign. Jehoiachin came to the throne at the age of eighteen (2 Ki. 24:8). The figure “eight” in the parallel passage (2 Chr. 36:9 KJV, following the MT) is certainly a scribal error; the “ration tablets” show that he had five sons at latest by 592 B.C. (if he was born in 615, Jehoiakim's early paternity would be consistent with that of all the last kings of Judah).
